House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, February 4, 1932.

THIRD SESSION—SEVENTEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the 4th day of February, 1932, met this day at Ottawa, for the despatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that during the recess I received communications from two members, notifying me that the following vacancy had occurred in the representation, viz:

Of John Francis Buckley, member for the electoral district of Athabaska, by decease.

I accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral district.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz:

Of Charles Bourgeois, Esquire, for the electoral district of Three Rivers-St. Maurice.

Of Humphrey Mitchell, Esquire, for the electoral district of Hamilton East.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Charles Bourgeois, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Three Rivers-St. Maurice, introduced by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and Hon. Mr. Guthrie.

Humphrey Mitchell, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Hamilton East, introduced by J. S. Woodsworth and A. A. Heaps.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

In addressing you for the first time, I desire to express my gratification at having been selected by His Majesty as his representative in the Dominion of Canada, and to acknowledge with profound thanks the reception which has been accorded to me by the people of this country. I accept it as a proof of their loyalty and devotion to the crown. I shall count it a happiness as well as a duty to associate myself with you in your labours for the welfare of Canada.

You enter upon your duties at a time of continuing and universal economic disturbance and distress. World conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people. But I rejoice that their resolute adherence to policies designed for the welfare of the nation has minimized the adverse influence of external economic forces. This period of trial has shown the Canadian situation to be fundamentally sound. The oversubscription of the national service loan manifests both the unity and patriotism of the people, and their supreme confidence in the financial strength of the Dominion. Canada still maintains its high place in world commerce. Within the last few months, a favourable balance of trade has been established. The provisions made at the last session of parliament for unemployment and farm relief are proving effective.

You are successfully meeting difficult domestic problems. Conditions are gradually improving. But prosperity in full measure must await the satisfactory adjustment of accounts between debtor and creditor nations of the world and the restoration of international monetary standards, from which the acute financial difficulties have compelled a temporary departure.

Since the last session of parliament my ministers have commenced negotiations with the government of the United States of America for the completion of the St. Lawrence waterway.

A commission has been appointed to inquire into the whole problem of transportation in Canada. My ministers expect that the report of the commission will be ready for submission to parliament during the present session.

My ministers have under consideration a commercial treaty with the Dominion of New Zealand.

A Canadian delegation is participating in the disarmament conference, which was opened at Geneva on the 2nd of February. I join with you in the prayer that the representatives of the nations there assembled may reach an understanding which will put beyond peril the cause of enduring world peace.

On the invitation of my government, an economic conference of members of the British commonwealth of nations will meet in Ottawa on July 18th next.

The Geneva Narcotics Convention of 1931, the Red Cross, Prisoners of War and other conventions, will be submitted for your approval.

Among the other measures to which your attention will be invited will be a bill relating to insurance and bills relating to patents and trade marks.

You will also be asked to consider bills to amend the Canada Shipping Act and the Fisheries Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

The public accounts for the last fiscal year and the estimates for the coming year will be submitted at an early date. The estimates will conform to my ministers' determination to maintain a policy of rigid economy, consistent with the discharge of those statutory and contractual obligations, which is essential to the preservation of the integrity and credit of the Dominion.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I sincerely congratulate you on the fortitude and patience with which the people of Canada have borne the hardships of this period of depression and maintained their usual high regard for law and order. A sense of unity more abundantly prevails. The spirit of sympathetic cooperation has been strengthened. The Canadian people have united in the fight against adversity. Prosperity is their just reward. I know it will be your privilege, by the unselfish and zealous discharge of your duties to hasten its return. May Divine Providence bless and guide you in your deliberations.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Rhodes, Duranleau, Simpson (Algoma West), Stewart (Edmonton West), and Casgrain.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council, appointing the Honourable E. N. Rhodes, Minister of Finance; the Honourable D. M. Sutherland, Minister of National Defence; the Honourable Alfred Duranleau, Minister of Marine and the Honourable T. G. Murphy, Minister of the Interior and Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the Sergeant-at-Arms, with my approval, has appointed Lieutenant J. L. Williams to be his deputy during the present session of parliament.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if it is the intention to adjourn until to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that to-morrow will be devoted to further preliminaries, and that the debate on the address will be proceeded with on Monday?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is correct. Personally I share the view that it would be always wise to proceed at once with the debate on the address, but that view is not entertained in all quarters; therefore we will follow the usual custom of meeting to-morrow and disposing of some preliminary business that might well engage the attention of the house, especially business with respect to those members who are no more. On Monday the debate on the address will take place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask if, since last session, there has been any further correspondence between Ottawa and Washington with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway which might be tabled before the debate takes place?

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is no correspondence except an intimation that on a given day the Canadian minister would be at a given place. There is no correspondence touching the merits of arrangements or negotiations for a treaty between the United States and Canada; up to the present time there has been nothing but purely verbal discussions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has any order in council been passed since last session pertaining to the St. Lawrence waterway?

Mr. BENNETT: So far as I know, Mr. Speaker, no orders in council have been passed since last session. But I will make that perfectly certain, and if there are any I will send copies to the right hon. gentleman.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.10 p.m.

Friday, February 5, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION FOR PROTECTION TABLED BY SECRETARY OF STATE

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I desire to lay on the table a copy of the international convention for the protection of industrial property, which was signed on behalf of Canada on November 6, 1925, and ratification of which was authorized by the Canadian government by order in council and deposited on May 1, 1928. As nearly as I can ascertain, this convention has not been laid before parliament, and, as I wish to introduce a bill based upon it, I am laying it on the table now.

ILLEGAL WARFARE CLAIMS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I wish to lay on the table the interim report made by Errol M. McDougall, commissioner on reparations, upon claims made arising out of the ill treatment of prisoners of war. This report is rather voluminous. Many requests have been made for it, and I should therefore like to make the usual motion as to the printing of the report for distribution. By leave of the house I move:

That six hundred copies of the interim report to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, dated January 13, 1932, made by Errol M. McDougall, Esquire, a commissioner appointed to investigate and report upon illegal warfare claims and reparations payable in respect thereof, laid on the table of the house this day, be printed forthwith, and that standing order 64 in relation thereto be suspended.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will this report be available for discussion?

Mr. CAHAN: I am laying it on the table to-day and am now moving to have it printed at the earliest possible date.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING BOUNTIES

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, as it is required that a statement of the amounts paid by way of fishing bounties be laid on the table of the house, I desire to point out that such payments are mentioned at page 32 of the report of the Department of Fisheries which has been tabled this afternoon.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS

THE LATE CLÉMENT ROBITAILLE—THE LATE JOHN FRANCIS BUCKLEY

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should assume that when we left here in August last it was the sincere hope of every member of the house that upon reconvening our ranks would not be depleted by the hand of death. Unfortunately it is my sad duty to record the fact that two of our number have passed to the great beyond. I offer to my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his associates my very sincere sympathy in the loss they have sustained, a loss which is common to the house as a whole. In the passing of the two members to whom I have referred we have lost warm-hearted, genial companions, men who served their party loyally but whose relations were most friendly with every member of this house.

The first to meet his death was the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Buckley), who had attained the age of forty years only the day before his death. Although born in the neighbouring republic he was a citizen of Great Britain and came to this country while still a young man. After serving with great distinction in the war he attended one of the Inns of Court in London and as his vocation in life adopted the profession of law. Settling in northern Alberta he gained for himself a very creditable reputation not only in his immediate community but throughout that large district, and was elected to this house by a substantial majority.

With the improved conditions for transport there is also an enhanced risk; while motoring on the day succeeding his birthday he met with sudden death. The very large number of people who attended his funeral—the largest known in that section of the country—attest to the high regard in which he was held by the people in the community he served. We have lost one of our number who gave promise of being not only a very worthy citizen in every respect but one who, I doubt not from what I knew of him, would have attained a high place in the councils of his party. I am sure the sympathy of this house is extended to his bereaved widow, who had become his wife only within the year, and to all those who were dear to him through family ties.

The second one of our number to cross the river, the late Mr. Robitaille, represented a riding in the great island of Montreal. He too followed the law as his profession, and although he took no great part in the debates and business of this house he had those qualities which so endeared him to the community in which he lived that time after time he was elected not by majorities of a few hundred but by majorities of many thousands. I am told by those who are well able to express opinions that his position in the profession was one of singular importance because he acted not only for municipalities but as a wise and loyal friend for all those requiring the services and advice of a sound counsellor. We recall him as he sat in his seat, but he will be with us no more. He left behind him a large family, and it will be a matter of satisfaction to them, as it is to us, to know that occupying a place of great importance and having been elected several times by the people of his constituency he was held in such high esteem not only by them but by hon. members in this house of all shades of political opinion. Mr. Speaker, we desire to convey our expressions of sympathy and regret not only to those who will miss him most in this house but also to the immediate families directly concerned and to that wider circle of friends who will feel a deep sense of loss in his passing.

Alas, as I said in my opening words, we had hoped that in the short time we have been separated we might meet with no breaks in our ranks. Such is not the case; we are constantly reminded that death is ever about us and that the span of life, although it is becoming longer through the learning and teachings of science, is always uncertain.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) very warmly for having expressed to those of us on this side of the house who have lost two of our colleagues the sympathy of himself and his party. I thank him even more for the touching tributes which he has paid to the memory of our late friends, who were also friends of many in his own party.

Some lives there are which are lived so quietly, so unobtrusively, that it is not until they are taken from us that we begin to realize how considerable was the place they held in the communities from whence they came, and just what their presence meant to those who shared their accustomed environments. Such was the case with the lives of Mr. Buckley and Mr. Robitaille, each of which was brought to a close with such tragic suddenness.

Mr. Buckley was one of the youngest members of this house, having entered, as the Prime Minister has just said, at the beginning of this parliament. Having just completed his fortieth year, he was among the number of those who have still much of youth on their side. It is an evidence of the hazards and chances of life that, having been among the first to enlist in the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry and having served with his regiment throughout the war, Mr. Buckley should have survived the perils and vicissitudes of the great war, to meet instantaneous death within a short distance of his own home and in the constituency which some eighteen months before had honoured him with its representation in this parliament. The tragedy of his death is further emphasized by the fact, also mentioned by my right hon. friend, that his marriage had taken place only last year.

Mr. Buckley had everything before him; he had pioneered in the land of his adoption, he had risked his life in the service of his country overseas, he had obtained an enviable place in his profession, he had won for himself a seat in parliament, and had gained the happiness of a home. Though he was but a short time a member of parliament, he gave such evidence in this house of manly character and of ability that the promise of future prominence in his profession and in public life was self evident. By his death his province, this parliament, and our country have suffered loss. It is difficult indeed to understand the decrees of fate in circumstances of the kind. We can only hope and believe that somehow, somewhere:

> —that force,
> Surely, has not been left vain!

That:

> Somewhere, surely, afar,
> In the sounding labour-house vast > of being, is practised that strength,
> Zealous, beneficent, firm!

Mr. Robitaille was a member of the same profession as Mr. Buckley. He was, however, considerably his senior in years, he had been for a much longer time a member of the bar, and was a much older member of parliament, having been in this house during the last ten years. To many of us he was a very close personal friend and we shall miss him greatly, particularly because of the quality which has been referred to by the Prime Minister, the quality of loyalty to those whom he supported in the house and to the principles and convictions which he held as a public man and which he espoused so ably. His death too was tragically sudden. Only two days before, he had been at his office, apparently in good health; he passed away almost without warning in the midst of his family circle, leaving to mourn his loss a wife and eleven children.

As has been said, Mr. Robitaille did not take an active part in debate, but he was very faithful in his attendance upon the duties of parliament, and in watching and serving the interests of the large constituency which he represented. The fact that representing, as he did, one of the most populous and important constituencies, namely that of Maisonneuve, he was returned to this parliament by very large majorities on all occasions shows the confidence and affection in which he was held by those who knew him best. All of us in this house will I am sure, as the Prime Minister has said, cherish his memory irrespective of party. We can truly say that he has honoured the name of the province from which he came, and the race which in so many ways has contributed so much of what is best to the public life of this dominion.

I join very warmly, Mr. Speaker, with the Prime Minister in expressing the hope that through you will be conveyed to those who in their homes have been so greatly bereaved, the sympathy of the entire house.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted on behalf of those who sit in this corner of the house to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in conveying our sympathy to the families of the two members who have left us since the house last met.

I had known Mr. Robitaille ever since I became a member of the house. It is true that he was of a very quiet disposition, but I am sure all of us who had come in contact with him for any length of time were very much distressed to hear of his sudden death.

With regard to Mr. Buckley, we in the province of Alberta felt a great affection for him because of the fact that he was one of us. Probably I was the last member of this house to see him, having had the privilege on the sixteenth day of November of meeting him in his home town and congratulating him on his fortieth birthday. I had made arrangements to see him a couple of days later, and when further east of the town of St. Paul I was advised by telephone of his death I can assure you, sir, that I was very much shocked by the tragic news. Mr. Buckley was in the best of health when I saw him and was looking forward to meeting the members at this session. During the succeeding days I had the privilege of meeting many of his constituents, and they assure me that they felt they had lost not only a good friend but a man who would have gone far in his profession and in public life had he been spared.

When, Mr. Speaker, you convey the sentiments of this house to the bereaved families, will you please include the members in this corner as sharing in the general regret at the passing of our two old friends.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES

PORTFOLIOS OF LABOUR AND FINANCE—ACCEPTANCE OF OFFICE BY RIGHT HON. MR. MEIGHEN

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to inform the house that owing to the ill health of the Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) I have been compelled to advise His Excellency to accept his resignation. The Hon. Wesley A. Gordon has relinquished the portfolio of immigration and colonization to become Minister of Labour. He will continue to discharge the duties of Minister of Immigration and Colonization, and of Minister of Mines. It is a question whether those departments should not be merged, and it is one to which the government has given some consideration and attention.

I should like to bear tribute to the service rendered to this country by Senator Robertson. A man of great breadth of view, fair-minded, with a warm appreciation and understanding of the conditions of others, and interested in the welfare of humanity to a singular degree, it may be truthfully said, that he actually wore himself out in the service of his country. If ever there was a casualty in the conflict against economic conditions you may speak of him as a casualty, for he has been stricken by ill health through the services he has rendered to Canada.

The Department of Fisheries will be administered by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), the department to which it was once attached, the former minister (Mr. Rhodes) having relinquished the portfolio to become Minister of Finance—a position which I have relinquished, much, I am sure, to the sorrow of my right hon. friend.

It also gives me very great pleasure to advise this house that Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, a member of the Senate, has been sworn as a member of the administration without portfolio.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has followed the customary procedure in announcing to the house at the beginning of a session the changes which have taken place in the ministry since the last session. In so far as there is cause for rejoicing in the changes that have been made, I see no reason why we on this side of the house should not join very heartily with hon. gentlemen opposite, because after all my right hon. friend has just been carrying out what we have been advising him to do all along. We have urged the appointment of someone other than himself as Minister of Finance; the appointment of a Minister of Labour who would have a seat in this house, and the strengthening of the government generally. I am sure it would have been more to the Prime Minister's own advantage and to the advantage of the country, had he effected what he has just done a year and a half ago, at the beginning of the first session, instead of at the beginning of the third session of this parliament.

I am afraid that for the most part the task of the new ministers will be that of undoing much of the mischief my right hon. friend has done during the time he has more or less monopolized the offices of government.

May I extend to the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) the very warm congratulations of myself and of all who in this house belong to the Liberal party, and wish him well in the discharge of his public duties. He is an old member of parliament, and is well known to us all. He has a fine public record, and possesses high attainments and qualifications which eminently fit him for the position. I am sure we wish him all success in what at this time must be a very onerous and difficult task. I believe that my hon. friend has accepted this office from a high sense of public duty, because it means additional strain and work to him at a time when political ambitions may not mean as much as they did before he had won the name for himself which he now possesses. We will do what we can to join with him in effecting necessary economies, and if he will do something towards stabilizing the tariff and avoiding extremes in other matters, which I think he personally appreciates as being highly necessary, he will find us ready to go a long way with him.

I should like to extend my hearty congratulations also to the new Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), coupled with my best wishes as well for a successful administration of his new department. As he knows, right along we have been advising the Prime Minister to have a Minister of Labour in this house, and now that at last this has been done, I may say that we are pleased with the choice that has been made. May I say to my hon. friend that having had the privilege of holding the portfolio of Minister of Labour for a time in the federal administration I can appreciate both his opportunities and his responsibilities. In the course of the time during which he may hold that position, I hope he may be able to do much in helping to solve the great and complex human problems so intimately associated with labour. It is not to be expected that he will ask for any assistance from this side, but may I say to him that in his efforts to improve industrial conditions in Canada he will at least receive no embarrassment from myself or those of us who sit to the left of the Speaker. Where opportunity permits, we shall be only too glad to afford him all we can in the way of cooperation.

I am only too ready to join with the Prime Minister in expressing profound sympathy with Senator Robertson, and at the same time my appreciation of the services he has sought to render and has rendered this country while acting as Minister of Labour. I agree that Senator Robertson's breakdown in health has been due to the zealous manner in which he has endeavoured to deal with the great problems of his department, and we all deeply deplore the fact that the strain has been such as to impair his health and make it necessary for him to tender his resignation as Minister of Labour. I am equally sure I speak for all in this house when I say that we hope he will soon be restored to full health and strength and again be in a position to resume his duties as a member of the other chamber.

In speaking of Senator Robertson's breakdown, may I say that I believe my right hon. friend will now see that the suggestion and appeal, made in all earnestness, that the great work of unemployment relief should be carried on by a commission and not be left in the hands of a single minister of the crown at a time such as that through which the country has been passing, was a very wise and prudent one. I hope the present Minister of Labour, viewing the situation as it is in Canada to-day and as it is likely to remain for some time to come, will carefully consider whether even yet in his own interests, the interests of his colleagues, the interests of the government and the interests of the country it is not desirable to have this great work of administering unemployment relief in the hands of a properly constituted relief commission. After all, ministers of the crown have enough in the way of responsibility in administering the regular work of their departments, and when a task which is quite exceptional has to be undertaken, it may be necessary to carry it out by exceptional methods. Again I extend to my hon. friend my best wishes.

The Prime Minister has referred to one other ministerial change which is in the nature of an addition to the ministry, namely, the appointment of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, a former Prime Minister of Canada, as a member of the cabinet without portfolio. I do not agree with Senator Meighen's point of view on many things; I do not expect to be able to agree with much that he will have to say with regard to the policies of his party, but I am in entire agreement with hon. gentlemen opposite in my admiration for his outstanding attainments as a parliamentarian, and his exceptional qualifications for the leadership of the house to which he has just been appointed. To him, as an old political opponent but a still older personal friend, I extend my best wishes for successful leadership in the Senate of the party of which he has just been chosen leader.

Yesterday in witnessing the imposing ceremony of the opening of parliament, I could not help but think of the curious twists and turns of which public life gives so many evidences, when I saw the former leader of the Conservative party, one who had held the position of Prime Minister of Canada, occupying a position to the left of His Excellency the Governor General, as leader of the upper house, when I knew that his ambitions had always been much more closely associated with the House of Commons, and when I reflected that to the right of the Governor General in the person of the present Prime Minister was one who, if I am not mistaken, at one time had ambitions which led him rather in the direction of the upper house, and which ambitions he was only prevented from realizing, because his leader of the day would not give him the appointment to which he aspired. As I looked at these two gentlemen on either side of the throne, I could not help wondering what in the course of time this double-barrelled leadership of the Conservative party was going to mean.

Mr. BENNETT: It will mean two or three fewer senators at an early date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will hope that is not the only effect it will have. Up to the present I had thought that as far as the political citadel of the Conservative party was concerned there was not room there for more than one big gun. However, we will wait and see.

Apart from this pleasantry, which my right hon. friend has not found it possible to take in that spirit, I do say that I believe the country even more than the right hon. gentleman will be relieved by the fact that he has surrendered one of the many portfolios which he has held and that the country will welcome at this time particularly whatever evidences he may find it possible to give of a strengthening of his ministry.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): It is not my intention to criticize the past deeds of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) nor to offer him advice for the future. I am merely taking this opportunity to congratulate my good friend (Mr. Rhodes) on the achievement of being appointed to the office of Minister of Finance. We realize that this is a very heavy portfolio and we recognize that he will bring to bear upon the discharge of his duties a very great ability. We hope that he will be successful in the task that lies before him. That is our wish regarding the present Minister of Finance. May I also take this opportunity to congratulate my good friend who has held the portfolio of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon) upon his appointment to the portfolio of Labour. I had some experience with the hon. gentleman last summer and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a member of this house who stands higher in my esteem than does the hon. gentleman who has just been appointed to the office of Minister of Labour. May I again congratulate both hon. gentlemen, repeating that I have no advice to offer the Prime Minister.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: I may say that there are no orders in council with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway. I made perfectly certain that this was so; there has been nothing in the way of orders in council since last session.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

Monday, February 8, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

CHARGES BY HON. G. N. GORDON

MOTION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): At this point I wish to make a motion of which I gave notice on Thursday last and which appeared in the votes and proceedings of this house. In doing so may I be permitted to say that the incident which has given rise to this motion occurred a short time ago in the city of Hamilton.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) but I suggest to him that, as no intimation was given that this matter would be discussed this afternoon, customary procedure would not be violated if he permitted the debate on the address to proceed until His Excellency had been thanked for his address and then took up other matters. That is the correct procedure and I hope my hon. friend will follow it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I believe I am following correct procedure. The orders of the day announced that at a certain juncture motions would be called, and in the regular way I am introducing a motion of which regular notice has been given. The matter is of sufficient consequence to engage the attention of the house for a few minutes. I do not anticipate prolonged discussion; personally I intend to offer very few remarks.

The incident to which I refer occurred at the city of Hamilton a few weeks ago, and as it involves a very dark reflection upon a man who is Prime Minister of Canada and the chief adviser of His Excellency the Governor General, and pertains to matters of public concern, and as the allegation is said to come from a man who served as a member in this house and was at one time a member of the government of this country and is yet one of the king's privy councillors for Canada, the matter is of added importance. To my mind it is of sufficient concern and consequence to be brought to the attention of the house at the earliest possible moment. An opportunity will be afforded to the Hon. Mr. Gordon to state whether in fact he did make the statements as set out in the newspapers and as quoted in the notice of motion, and he will be given an opportunity to state what if any foundation he had for making such statements. This matter concerns the honour of the first citizen of Canada, a member of this house, and concerns also the dignity of the House of Commons. For that reason it is of the utmost importance to proceed at once.

When a matter such as this reaches the press it is looked upon by newspapers throughout the whole length and breadth of Canada as front page material, and for that reason receives wide publicity. Many of us have waited from day to day and from week to week to see if there would be any explanation or withdrawal of the statement. I understand that at a meeting held in the city of Cobourg about the middle of January the Hon. Mr. Gordon made a statement which might be regarded as a somewhat belated explanation of or apology for his remarks pertaining to Mr. Herridge. The present motion does not complain about anything said with respect to Mr. Herridge; it seeks only to investigate the remarks made by Mr. Gordon concerning the Prime Minister of Canada. Mr. Gordon has been singularly silent in regard to any explanation or apology on that branch of the subject.

I beg therefore to move seconded by Mr. Stevens:

That a special committee consisting of seven members of this house to be named hereafter be appointed to enquire into certain charges and allegations made by the Honourable George N. Gordon, K.C., a member of the King's Privy Council for Canada, upon a public occasion in the city of Hamilton, on the 6th day of January, 1932, as reported in the Globe newspaper published at the city of Toronto on the 7th day of January, 1932, and also in respect of a further statement made by the said George N. Gordon at Lindsay on the 8th of January, 1932, and published in the said Globe newspaper on the 9th day of January, 1932, and also published in other newspapers throughout Canada, reflecting upon the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, Prime Minister of Canada and a member of this house, in regard to matters of public concern; and which said charges and allegations published in the said Globe newspaper are in the following terms and were published on the following respective dates—

January 7, 1932.—"The bald charge that Premier Bennett had financed the honeymoon trip of his sister to Europe out of the Canadian treasury, and that he had obtained a new private railway car for his own use at a cost to Canada of $125,000, was made to local Liberals to-night by Hon. G. N. Gordon, K.C., who was deputy speaker in the federal house under the King government."

"He criticized Premier Bennett for having appointed his brother-in-law as Canada's envoy at Washington, and then charged that the cost of Mrs. Herridge's honeymoon trip to Europe had been paid for by Premier Bennett out of the Canadian treasury."

January 9, 1932.—"I have been too long in the public eye to make statements that are not based on facts," Mr. Gordon said, adding that only a small section of his reference to Mr. Herridge appeared correctly in The Globe. A large audience in Hamilton heard every word he said, and he followed his notes very closely, Mr. Gordon continued.

"Major Herridge was Mr. Bennett's brother-in-law, and this was his honeymoon trip," said Mr. Gordon. "He also went to London to argue an appeal before the Privy Council, so if he was a full-time Canadian legal adviser he should not have taken the full time preparing and arguing the appeal before the Privy Council and thus neglecting his duty as the Premier's legal adviser, which Mr. Bennett permitted him to do."

"Mr. Herridge, according to Mr. Gordon, remained a long time in London as a Canadian official, and was in the pay of the Dominion government during the time of his honeymoon trip."

With power to call for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses upon oath and to report from time to time to this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the motion is carried I should like to repeat my former remarks concerning what is due His Excellency in the matter of the speech which he has presented to parliament and for which we were expecting to express our thanks this afternoon. I believe, were one to search the records of British parliamentary institutions the world over, one would not find a case, where, at the instance of the Prime Minister, through one of his colleagues, a matter of this particular character would be interjected as a subject of debate before His Majesty or His Majesty's representative had been thanked for the speech from the throne delivered to parliament with a view to opening its deliberations. I am not surprised that the Prime Minister has absented himself from the house at this time. Quite evidently he knew this matter was to come up, and for reasons best known to himself is not present. However, there is a custom followed in matters of debate and other business in parliament, and we might as well understand at once whether that custom is going to be observed or not. That custom is that each side of the house should receive some due notice and warning of matters which are to come up for public discussion. If this question is of the great importance the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has just said it is, it was certainly due to myself as leader of the opposition that I should have had some notice that it was to be brought before the house to-day, and it was due to every hon. member on this side that that notice should have been given in the regular manner in which notice is generally given with regard to other motions. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice who has just made the motion has been in parliament for many, many years. I do not hesitate to say to him that never in his parliamentary experience has he known anything of this kind, and that if our positions were reversed and he were standing where I am on this side of the house to-day he would be most eloquent and emphatic in the exception which he would be taking to this method of procedure.

As to the motion itself, may I say, Mr. Speaker, that personally I felt more or less shocked when I saw the notice which had been placed on the order paper and realized that it had come from the Prime Minister himself. The Minister of Justice says he is not so much concerned with Mr. Herridge—and I presume that includes Mrs. Herridge—but that with regard to something which has been said about the Prime Minister it is all important that we should have this investigation. May I say that if the Prime Minister had been as considerate of his sister and of his brother-in-law as he has been of himself, he would have been very careful to avoid bringing their names into public discussion in the manner in which he has. This is a means on the part of the Prime Minister to satisfy his self-will and wounded pride of his own. No man in Canada has less reason to take umbrage at what political opponents say about him than has the right hon. Prime Minister. If I had wished to seek revenge for some of the things the Prime Minister has said about me at one time or another, I should not have taken advantage of my position of power and authority in parliament to serve this end; I would have brought action against him for criminal libel; for he has used expressions which I consider of that character. People who live in glass houses ought to be very careful how and where they throw stones.

I am not going to take up any time at the moment in discussing the merits of the motion. If the Prime Minister wishes to have the kind of notoriety for himself and others who are related to him which an inquiry of this kind is certain to give not only in Canada but throughout the world, he is certainly welcome to it; but I think he would be well advised —and well advised by his Minister of Justice —to have this motion withdrawn instead of having it proceeded with. As a matter of fact I think there was a general sentiment throughout this house—and I need not go further than the Conservative organ in this city to express the view of many Conservatives in the country as well as in parliament as they have been expressed since the motion was put on the order paper—that this whole business is a "tempest in a teapot," and that it is not befitting the dignity of parliament that its time should be wasted in matters of this sort. If the time of parliament is to be taken up and the money of the people used for furthering inquiries into matters which affect the vanity or the susceptibilities of the Prime Minister, a lot of public money will be wasted to no good purpose, and I do not believe the people will endorse for one minute the object of this particular investigation.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Gordon, who is mentioned in this motion as having made the statements referred to, did make a public retraction and apology in respect to them. The Minister of Justice says the apology was not sufficient. If it was not sufficient, and something more was required, surely there were other means of obtaining it than by asking this house, before it has begun the business of the session at all, to start an elaborate inquiry by a special committee. This thirst on the part of the Prime Minister for personal vengeance in so many directions is something that the people of this country are beginning to find very difficult to understand. It is perhaps well we should at once realize that something in the nature of a reign of terror is to be started at this session, and that we are to experience in the parliamentary sense of the term as much in the way of "frightfulness" as possible. Well, if that is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite as dictated by their leader, they must take the consequences that will inevitably follow from such a course.

Motion agreed to.

ALBERTA—BRITISH COLUMBIA BOUNDARY

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, respecting the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CAHAN: I would have preferred to explain the purpose of the bill on the second reading. This is a bill to confirm a survey made by the interprovincial boundary commission appointed in 1913 to delimit the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

The boundary between these two provinces is defined by sections 7 and 8 of the Imperial Act 29 and 30 Victoria, chapter 67, which are as follows:

> 7. Until the union, British Columbia shall comprise all such territories, within the Dominion of Her Majesty, as are bounded to the south by the territories of the United States of America, to the west by the Pacific ocean and the frontier of the Russian territories in North America, to the north by the sixtieth parallel of north latitude, and to the east from the boundary of the United States northwards by the Rocky mountains and the one hundred and twentieth meridian of west longitude; and shall include Queen Charlotte's island and all other islands adjacent to the said territories, except Vancouver island and the islands adjacent thereto.
> 8. After the union, British Columbia shall comprise all the territories and islands aforesaid and Vancouver island and the islands adjacent thereto.

This act of the imperial parliament established a natural topographical boundary line along the crest of the Rocky mountains from the international boundary as far north as the most northerly crossing of the one hundred and twentieth meridian of west longtitude and thence followed the said meridian northerly to its intersection with the sixtieth parallel of north latitude. In April 1912 the survey of the boundary was discussed between the surveyor general of dominion lands, and the surveyor general of British Columbia at the instance of the Minister of Lands for British Columbia, with the result that order in council P.C. 337 was approved on the 18th February 1913, recommending that an invitation be extended to the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia to join in a survey to define the exact boundaries. Subsequent orders in council were made with which I will deal later, on the second reading, if it is deemed necessary. At all events, subsequent orders in council were passed by the dominion and the two provinces which, with the consent and cooperation of the three governments, created an international boundary commission, at first composed of three members and later limited to two. This commission was composed of J. M. Wallace, D.L.S., representing the Dominion government until September 20, 1915; R. W. Cautley, D.L.S. and A.L.S., representing the government of the province of Alberta and, after September 20, 1915, representing both the Dominion and Alberta governments, and A. O. Wheeler, D.L.S. and B.C.L.S., representing the government of the province of British Columbia.

This commission carried on the survey of the boundary continuously from 1913 to 1924, at which time the Rocky mountain section of the boundary had been completed, together with 252 miles of the 120th meridian survey to a point in latitude 57°25'40". At this point the governments decided to discontinue the survey for the time being, leaving about 174 miles of the 120th meridian still to be surveyed through uninhabited and unproductive country.

The work of this commission has been highly commended by the officers of the Dominion, the British Columbia and the Alberta governments, and the report of the commission includes an atlas in three parts signed by all the parties.

In order that this boundary as surveyed to the point mentioned, that is, to the end of mile 252 of the 120th meridian at a point in latitude 57°26'40", should be the boundary, a statute was passed at the last session by the legislature of Alberta confirming that boundary as so established, and a statute in similar terms was passed by the legislature of British Columbia approving of the boundary as so determined. However, in order that this may be the boundary under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1871, it must be confirmed by the parliament of Canada. This bill is introduced for that purpose.

INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY

BILL RESPECTING UNFAIR COMPETITION IN TRADE AND COMMERCE

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5 respecting unfair competition in trade and commerce.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We would like to know what is meant by unfair competition.

Mr. SPEAKER: Probably the minister will explain when he moves the first reading of the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, an international convention for the protection of industrial property was signed at Paris on March 20, 1883, and this convention constituted an international union for the protection of industrial property. This convention was subsequently revised at Brussels on December 14, 1900, and again at Washington on June 2, 1911. On September 1, 1923, Canada adhered to the convention which had been so revised, and thereby became a member of the union for the protection of industrial property. A fourth assembly was held at The Hague on November 6, 1925, at which the government of Canada was represented by Mr. Frederick Herbert Palmer, M.C., a Canadian government trade commissioner who was duly authorized in that behalf. This assembly again proposed certain important amendments to the convention which was then in force.

Subsequently, by order in council passed by the government of my right hon. friend, P.C. 648, dated April 19, 1928, ratification of The Hague convention of 1925 was authorized on behalf of Canada, and the ratification on behalf of Canada was deposited at The Hague on May 1, 1928, from which date The Hague convention became binding upon Canada.

It appeared to me that The Hague convention of 1925 was one of those conventions coming within the resolution adopted by the House of Commons on June 21, 1926, to the effect that before His Majesty's Canadian ministers should advise ratification of any treaty, convention or agreement affecting Canada, the approval of the parliament of Canada should be first obtained. It would appear, nevertheless, that through inadvertence or otherwise this international convention for the protection of industrial property which was signed on behalf of Canada on November 6, 1925, and which was formally ratified on behalf of Canada on May 1, 1928, was not laid upon the table of the house until I did so on Friday last. In the meantime representations have been made to the government with regard to carrying out the terms of that convention which really, so far as this bill is concerned, largely affect trade marks.

In order that this convention may be carried into effect I have introduced this bill respecting unfair competition in trade and commerce, which in turn necessitates many amendments to the existing Trade Marks and Designs Act, which is chapter 201 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. In case this bill passes a second reading I shall ask the favourable consideration of the house to a motion to refer it to a select special committee before which those who are interested in the question of trade marks may appear and present their views for the information of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has dealt at some length with the international convention and the labyrinth of stages through which it has passed over a period of years, but he has not yet answered the question as to what constitutes the element of unfair competition.

Mr. CAHAN: The element of unfair competition dealt with has to do with the use of trade marks and industrial designs which affect international trade, and it is that phase of unfair competition with which this bill is concerned. I will be prepared at a later time to enter upon a discussion of the terms of the bill which deal particularly with trade marks. My right hon. friend is well aware that for some time past there have been grave doubts cast upon the constitutional validity of our present Trade Marks Act, but I suggest that the bill is so framed that it will be valid under our constitution, particularly as it, in terms, expressly states that it is for the enforcement of an international convention to which the empire, including Canada, was a party, and which this parliament is called upon to enforce.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Cahan.]

CANADIAN DESTROYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland). On January 26 an American despatch from Washington, D. C. announced that two Canadian ships were guarding the port of Acajutla, Salvador. The despatch reads:

> Washington, D.C., Jan. 26.—The two Canadian destroyers, Skeena and Vancouver, are standing by alone to-day off the Salvador port of Acajutla. The two United States destroyers have moved to La Libertad.

May I ask under whose authority our fleet is in these foreign waters?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): The two destroyers in question were on their usual winter cruise which this year was taking them down past Central America through the canal to the West Indies. At the time that they were practically passing this place Acajutla in the republic of Salvador, these troubles broke out. There were a number of British citizens there and it was thought advisable that the ships put in at that port and be available for the protection of British subjects should it become necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister assure the house that this incident has nothing to do with any attempt to blast a way into the markets of South America?

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) when he expects to be able to present to parliament the report of Sir Alexander Gibb.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): We shall have to have the report before it can be tabled. It has not yet been received but we hope to have it within ten or fifteen days.

REPORT ON MARITIME FISHERIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I might ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) as Acting Minister of Fisheries whether the report of Cockfield, Brown & Company with regard to the fisheries of the maritime provinces has been received, and, if so, when he expects to be able to lay it on the table of the house.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): The report in question has been received but I am informed that it is so very voluminous, covering nearly two hundred pages and containing plans, sketches and so forth, that the printing of it would be out of all proportion. However, there is being prepared a complete digest of the whole report which I think we shall be able to submit probably at the end of this week.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that the report itself will be laid on the table; it is only a question of printing.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It will not be printed, nor do I know whether the report itself will be tabled. We will table a complete digest of it. Of course the report will be available at the department to any member of the house who wishes to consult it.

PURCHASE OF LABRADOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Will the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) be good enough at his convenience to lay on the table of the house any correspondence between the members of the Newfoundland government and the members of his own government relevant to the negotiations regarding the sale or purchase of what is commonly known as Newfoundland Labrador. If there is no such correspondence will the Prime Minister at some future date kindly give a résumé of any conversations between members of the Newfoundland government and members of his own government with respect to the matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There is a question on the order paper dealing with this matter. When that question is answered the information sought will be given.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY MOVED BY MR. CHARLES BOURGEOIS AND SECONDED BY MR. J. H. STITT

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. CHARLES BOURGEOIS (Three Rivers-St. Maurice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour fraught with danger for one inexperienced as I am to ask this house to approve the speech from the throne, since, from times immemorial, hon. members who constitute His Majesty's loyal opposition, invariably find matter in it for criticism. I do not deceive myself to the extent of hoping that on this occasion the opposition will be so gracious as to admit that the government to which I adhere has well administered the country's affairs and that Canada once for all, has again entered the path which leads to progress and prosperity.

However, there is an event over which there can exist no discrepancy of views and feeling in this assembly, an event which has given us great joy: it is the birth last August, of a child who is entitled to the affection of all Canadians, I refer to the birth of the Hon. George St. Lawrence Neuflize Ponsonby. With regard to this happy event, all the members of this hon. house, I feel certain, associate themselves with my humble person in expressing to His Excellency the Right Hon. the Earl of Bessborough and to his gracious spouse, the Baroness of Neuflize, our sincerest congratulations and in formulating for their son, the Hon. George St. Lawrence Neuflize Ponsonby, our best and most sincere wishes of happiness. May they rest assured that all Canadians whatever may be their country of origin and French Canadians in particular, have been deeply moved by the thoughtfulness of Their Excellencies in giving to this noble descendant of two glorious families, from France and England, immediately after the name of His British Majesty, that of St. Lawrence the name of our river which, owing to its beauty and immense flow of water, its resources and the variety of the landscapes of its shores, the innumerable and great acts of heroism it has witnessed, is really worthy of being designated as royal and deserves to be truly associated with the name of His British Majesty whose empire is so vast that the sun never sets over it. This name can only be a good omen, because the St. Lawrence has been the channel over which floated the flag of Montcalm and Wolfe, it was the course followed by our heroic missionaries and our bold explorers. Who can foretell, in the course of his life, what the future has in store for this young Canadian, may he not some day be called upon by the Canadians, his fellow-countrymen—in keeping with the treaty of Westminster—to preside over the destinies of the country of his birth and become one of the successors, at Rideau Hall, to His Excellency the present Governor General, thus fulfilling the sincerest wish of all.

Such thoughts lead to others with reference to Her Excellency Lady Bessborough, the Baroness Roberte de Neuflize. It is, I believe, the first time, since new France has become a possession of Great Britain, that a French lady happens to be "Our Dame" at Rideau Hall. Is that not a reason for us to marvel in seeing how history repeats itself? We know that in the Ursulines' chapel in Quebec, where a cannon ball dug the grave of the Marquis de Montcalm, there stands in front of the statute of the Virgin a lamp which for ever burns. Must not the flame of this lamp of remembrance, kept up by pious hands, have burned more brilliantly when there arrived amongst us this noble French lady, born of the same race as the glorious vanquished of 1759, and whom destiny has chosen to be Vice-Queen of the country ruled in the past by those great patriots. I am led to believe that if this proud but dauntless Louis de Buade, Count de Frontenac, returned to this soil of ours, he would unfurl over the Quebec citadel the old fleur-de-lis flag and once more would welcome through the mouthpiece of his canons the Baroness Roberte de Neuflize and the Earl of Bessborough, his successor as Governor of New France, now the Dominion of Canada.

While this world-wide economic crisis through which we are passing lasts, it is my earnest belief that we should appreciate the serious and effective endeavours put forth by the government which presides to-day over the destinies of the country, endeavours which have already given precious results and which give rise for the future to greater hopes. It is this reassuring situation that the speech from the throne justly points out with reason, and it is also the unequivocal message which I bring to the government on behalf of the people of Three Rivers-St. Maurice.

I have the honour, sir, of representing, I am proud to say, one of the most important ridings which appears on the electoral map; important owing to its history which dates back to the glorious outset of the colony, important owing to the large number of its present rural and city population, in majority French Canadians, however, there is also a large number of English, Irish and Scandinavians; equally important also is the county of Three Rivers-St. Maurice owing to its vast natural resources, especially its forests and water powers, as well as its numerous industries that have been established there. One can easily understand what interest would be taken in the by-election, last summer, under such conditions and circumstances. Besides, the government having been in power for hardly a year, had to deal with problems and difficulties almost insurmountable. In the course of the special session, in September, 1930, as well as during the regular session of 1931, which was then on the eve of closing, our opponents had been relentless in their criticism, contending that the government had sadly failed to redeem its pledges, that the alarming state of the country far from improving, had on the contrary grown worse. I well remember, at that time, having read with much interest, the speeches of those who later on were to become my colleagues on the opposite benches. "You have betrayed," they said, "the trust which the people of this country reposed in you, especially that of the electors of Quebec." If we could have foreseen then, they further added, what is taking place to-day, if you had brought forth on the public hustings the budget which was adopted at that session of 1931, if the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) had stated that his intention was to increase the sales tax, to put a further duty on imports, raise the rate of postage, etc., etc., it is with stones that he would have been chased from public meetings.

The opportunity was given to our opponents to come forward and repeat on the public hustings, before the electorate of Three Rivers, what they had stated with so much apparent conviction on the floor of this house. During three weeks we had to undergo a formidable assault by our friends in the opposition, and this, in a Liberal riding, in a Liberal stronghold considered to be impregnable, in a county which twelve months previous had renewed its trust in favour of a Liberal candidate by giving him a majority of almost 4,000 votes, a constituency which had not once elected a Conservative representative since 1896, when Sir Adolph P. Caron was elected to succeed Sir Hector Langevin, two men who have left lasting names in Canadian politics. The people of the county of Three Rivers-St. Maurice turned a deaf ear to the appeals, prejudices and untimely criticisms of our friends in the opposition. They reposed their trust in a government of worthy men who, having solely the best interests of this country at heart and simply wishing to relieve the anxiety of the people in the economic crisis which is persisting, made a supreme effort so as to strengthen our finances through a tariff policy truly Canadian and thereby reestablish the administration of the affairs of Canada on a solid foundation.

The constituency of Three Rivers-St. Maurice forewarned by the result of the general election, understood the importance of a loyal and generous cooperation with the new leaders that the country had chosen. Yielding to the pressing appeals of the hon. Minister of Marine, my friend the hon. Mr. Duranleau, to whom I wish to publicly acknowledge here my gratitude and appreciation, convinced, I say, of the earnestness of such men and their ability to restore prosperity to this country, within a reasonable delay and with the full cooperation of all citizens, the constituency of Three Rivers-St. Maurice placed their entire trust in the Bennett government and have sent me here to fully express their entire confidence. It is a duty, sir, which I consider among the most outstanding of those covered by my mandate.

The county of Three Rivers-St. Maurice did not allow itself to be deceived by the sophistry of those opposed to the government. It realized that the enormous work already accomplished, although very effective, could not yield full results immediately, and, as the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) so very sensibly stated in a speech which he delivered in Three Rivers, on August the second:

> Would not the farmer be looked upon as senseless who, having just completed his seeding, returned to his fields to cut his crop? Can we expect a manufacturer, who is promoting an industry, to realize immediately large returns? He invests not with the hope of immediate results, but because he is convinced that, once well organized both as regards production and sales, he will gradually increase his output and profits. Such is the case with a new government.

The people whom I represent in the house have clearly stated that they are satisfied with the activities and endeavours of this government. They have come to the conclusion that the past is a guarantee for the future. The speech from the throne which was read at the opening of the session affords us a proof that they were right.

In fact, we are made aware that the government intends to follow up its sound national policy of protection, by efficiently protecting our industries, by encouraging the building of new factories, and this is a very wise step. This policy has already produced marvellous results and the speech from the throne indicates a number of them of great importance: the changing of an unfavourable trade balance to a favourable one in the last months of the present fiscal year, the success obtained by the last national loan; and if we add further the statement which the right hon. Prime Minister recently made of the establishment of about one hundred new factories, we must conclude that these are achievements which prove that the country is in an excellent financial state and that we have reason to have faith in the future.

In my own county, we were given an opportunity of benefiting by the government's policies: a cellophane paper factory was built at Shawinigan Falls; and according to the statement given out by Mr. Purvies, president of the Canadian Industries, which are the owners of the factory mentioned, the establishment of this new industry was made possible owing to the fact that a tariff of 10 per cent was placed on cellophane paper. This applies to other cities throughout the country, and also in the province of Quebec, especially in Sherbrooke, St. Lambert, Scottstown and Montreal, as the Gazette pointed out last week; moreover quite recently in Ste-Thérèse a new factory has opened its doors, known as the Zonite Products Corporation, with an output of $2,000,000 per year. Referring to a news item which appeared in the La Patrie on Feb. 2, the building of this factory was decided immediately after the tariff increase was adopted by the Conservative government. The article further adds that it was the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Parent) who welcomed the company's officials "on behalf of the Canadian government," the hon. member for Terrebonne with whom I have the honour of being personally acquainted, having met him in the course of my last election, when he came forward to preach the Liberal doctrine to crowds of unbelievers in my county. There is no doubt that the statement was incomplete and that the hon. member for Terrebonne—"speaking on behalf of the Canadian government"—did not let this opportunity slip by of praising the new policy which conferred on his beautiful constituency, and especially on the lovely town of Ste-Thérèse, the privilege of possessing a factory of such importance.

Nobody will withhold from the present government his congratulations for having generously helped the various provinces to weather the unemployment crisis through which Canada is passing. It was a very urgent duty. I am unaware whether, in its grants to help the provinces to stem unemployment, the dominion government reserved the right to indicate how the money it supplied was to be spent or whether it intends to do so in the future, through the grants that it may allow them for such a purpose.

Although my knowledge of the economic situation of the country is rather limited and that I do not feel qualified to suggest a specific solution, a sovereign and infallible remedy, I may state that in the province of Quebec and probably also in all the other provinces, though in an unequal measure, the solution of the serious problems of unemployment rests mostly in the return to the farm. I am convinced that our country is still first of all a farming one and that it is by encouraging our farmers that we must begin our economic restoration. As Theodore Roosevelt stated:

The only effective way to help any man is to help him to help himself and the worst lessen to teach him is that he can be permanently helped at the expense of someone else.

In a splendid novel which had a remarkable success in France and which was exceptionally well translated in English by our fellow-citizen, Sir Andrew MacPhail—I refer to "Maria Chapdelaine"—Louis Hémon drew the exquisite portrait of the young French Canadian girl, daughter of pioneers and future mother of forest settlers, an ever present picture, but, in many ways, this portrait is also that of many other young Canadian girls, whether they be from English, Scotch or Irish descent. However, "Maria Chapdelaine" must, to preserve her high ideals and physical beauty, her charm and smile, remain in the country and continue to live the ancestral life. The atmosphere of cities to her is unhealthy, she wastes away, and the same may be said of her cousins, the English, Scotch, Irish, or the French Canadians whom city life unnerves and weakens when it does not contaminate them physically or infect their minds with socialism or even worse, communism. Let us rest assured, there is no Hercules, no adversity capable of laying low the Canadian people, if following the example of Antaeus, their feet stick to the soil, their foster-mother.

I now broach the important question of our railways. One must be blind or in bad faith not to acknowledge that at present their condition is far from being satisfactory. By degrees, our three transcontinental railways were built across Canada: the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Did legitimate hopes justify the building and the completing of these three great railway systems? In a speech delivered at the Sphinx Club, in London, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, an ex-Speaker of this house, after mentioning the existence in Canada of these three great transcontinental railways, predicted that it would soon be necessary to construct the Hudson Bay railway and, he further added:

Yes, we are proud of our system of transportation, and only yesterday the Governor of Canada, one of the best men that the English aristocracy has ever given to Canada, Earl Grey, rediscovered the Hudson Bay which was known to the old traders of the Hudson Bay Company two hundred years ago, the Hudson Bay through which our own Commissioner in London, Lord Strathcona, came nearly eighty years ago. When I was a lad, he left Scotland to serve Canada and to serve the Empire. Yes, Hudson Bay has been rediscovered. To show you the importance of the country, the importance of the foreign interest in Canada, the three transcontinentals will not be sufficient to give an outlet for transportation of our grain, but we shall require, in the near future, the shorter route of the Hudson Bay. All this will benefit Canada, but above all it will benefit the British Empire.

[Mr. Bourgeois.]

But these four railways—for the Hudson Bay railway of which the Hon. Mr. Lemieux proclaimed the necessity, has also been built—are almost all in a deplorable financial state. Does this, however, justify charging this government with a want of foresight or with negligence. No. These conditions of which we deplore the existence, arise from numerous causes. First, we must mention the world-wide disturbance brought on by the war of 1914. We must further take into account the closing of our country to immigrants from Europe and, on the other hand, take into consideration that these European countries and the Argentine republic as well, have been within these last years, growing wheat on a large scale. The consequence, therefore, was that on both these scores our railways were the losers. Less immigrants to transport to the west and less wheat to carry to our Atlantic ports. Add to these causes the competition of motor trucks.

Must we for all that throw up the sponge and allow our railways, especially those that have become state lines, to extricate themselves as best they can? I feel certain that the house holds different views, that it approves the policy of the present government which is to help our railways, and especially those which form part of our national inheritance. However, before further steps are taken, the government has decided to inquire into the conditions prevailing in these extensive systems, in order to remedy their defects, and that is why a commission of inquiry, presided over by Hon. Justice Duff, has been appointed. It is only reasonable to expect that this inquiry will bring to light the shortcomings of our railway systems and point out the retrenchments to be made in their management.

This house learns that our government has entered into negotiations with the United States of America for the purpose of carrying out the St. Lawrence deep waterway. I am not acquainted with the plans prepared in this connection by the engineers to whom the study of this colossal project has been entrusted. All I know is what has been disclosed to the public by the Canadian press. This deep waterway would be undertaken in that part of our great river comprised between Prescott and Cornwall known as the international section, and our rich neighbours, the United States, would contribute largely to this gigantic enterprise. The house feels confident that in the working out of this scheme, the government was guided solely by the interests of Canada; there can be no question in this matter of international courtesy. No one will gainsay that the possession of this great waterway on the greater part of its course, constitutes one of the major assets of this country, I would even go so far as to state that it is the main channel of our economic life. I am not an hydraulic engineer; however, I may state that from the geographical viewpoint, considering the area drained, the width and depth of its course and the enormous flow of water, the St. Lawrence is, without comparison, the most important waterway in the world. None can be compared to it, neither the Amazon, the Nile, the Volga and the Rhine. Pascal said: "Rivers are movable roads." The St. Lawrence is an imperial highway which moves along carrying towards the ocean and Europe the products of the entire northern part of this continent. Over a thousand miles of its course, it is navigable for ocean-going vessels, so much so that at Montreal, we have this unique fact, an ocean port located a thousand miles from the ocean. I represent a constituency of the province of Quebec, and so far as electric energy is concerned—for it is certainly with this purpose in view that the deep waterways of the St. Lawrence is sought—Quebec possesses all the water power it needs. Therefore, it is not as a citizen of the province of Quebec that I am looking into this problem. I consider that such a vast undertaking, one of such a vital interest to the country, should be studied without losing sight of the interests of the Dominion as a whole, and it is not simply as a French-Canadian but solely as a Canadian, one dyed in the wool, that I consider this matter.

We have the firm hope that this great enterprise of the St. Lawrence deep waterway will be carried out in the interest and to the advantage of Canada. This faith rests on the confidence we are reposing, and with good reason, on the patriotism of our Prime Minister and his colleagues. We shall not be deceived, I feel absolutely convinced of this, because they are fully aware of their responsibilities as heirs and followers of the policy laid down by Macdonald and Cartier, they are endowed with the courage and foresight necessary to see that nothing is sacrificed of our interests or nothing is neglected in order to safeguard our rights.

The speech from the throne mentions the Conference on disarmament opened at Geneva on February 2 last. Let us hope that our representatives will work efficiently to establish a lasting peace throughout the world, and thus promote the prosperity and greatness of the British Empire and, thereby, of Canada which forms part of it.

May I now refer to the Imperial Economic Conference, which is to take place at Ottawa, on July 18, next. We are entitled to expect much good from it. This Conference, without doubt, will be one of the most important events in our country's history. The ideas advocated in London by the Prime Minister, in October, 1930, are, we are convinced, on the eve of being entirely put into practice, to the best advantage of Canada and the other dominions forming part of the British Commonwealth.

The various and numerous proposals announced in the speech from the throne lead us to believe that we shall have, during the present session, to fulfil an arduous task. Might I be allowed to wish everyone, in the fulfilment of this task, the indomitable courage, the invincible confidence and heroic tenacity which was shown by one of the most illustrious inhabitants of this Canadian soil.

We have in Three Rivers, in that city almost three centuries old, since it was founded in 1634 by the Sieur de Laviolette, that historical and glorious town of Three Rivers which I have the great privilege of representing here, we have, I say, a humble monument which narrates one of the most thrilling feats of our national history. Along our esplanade, skirting the St. Lawrence river, there is to be found a pedestal upon which the wayfarer reads with emotion:

> On this site was located the house where was born, November 17, 1685, the most illustrious son of Three Rivers, Pierre Gaultier de Varennes, Sieur de la Vérendrye, the discoverer of the Rocky mountains and the Canadian West.

After untold hardships and at the cost of superhuman efforts, La Vérendrye, with his own resources only, without the help of any governing power, started from the post of Kaministikwia and went up this river, skirting Rainy Lake, where he built in 1731, Fort St. Pierre then proceeding along lake of the Woods, where he erected, the following year Fort St. Charles, he continued along the Winnipeg river, where he build in 1734, Fort de Maurepas. Crossing towards the north-west, lake Dauphin (Manitoba) and lake du Cygne, he explored the Biche (Red Deer) river and reached the source of the Saskatchewan river.

In 1738, he erected Fort LaReine (Portage la Prairie) on the north shore of the Assiniboia river and, in the angle formed by this river and that of the Red river, he erected Fort Rouge, where to-day the city of Winnipeg stands, Fort Dauphin on the northwest point of the lake by that name and Fort Bourbon, at the outlet of the Biche river. On January 1, 1743, he came in sight of the Rocky Mountains, a marvel to gaze upon, and like Christopher Columbus intent on discovering a new world. he found himself beneath new skies. He had incurred debts to the extent of £40,000 and had not yet reached the goal of his dreams, that western ocean separating America from Asia. However it was a new world, the unbounded world of the far off prairies, rich in resources and which later on was to become, thanks to the efforts of our pioneers of the West, that marvellous ocean of wheat whose waves of golden sheaves contribute to the feeding of a large portion of the globe and to the wealth of our country. His footsteps had led him towards those fertile regions, represented to-day by our hon. western colleagues, that section of the country which was for a long time, and which will again be, let us hope, the granary of the world, thanks to the sound policy of the right hon. Prime Minister, the most brilliant representative of the Canadian west.

La Vérendrye to achieve this splendid result had to fight against natural obstacles, the bitter cold, the oppression of heat, the depression of fatigue, against the hostilities of men, the spitefulness of his rivals, the discouragement of his companions, against himself, against doubt, this ever terrifying doubt, the negation of endeavour, the chilling of all energy. Let us not forget that in order to help our country to weather the crisis through which it is passing, we must energetically fight, that struggle is part of life. And as Victor Hugo stated in his immortal verses:

Ceux qui vivent, ce sont ceux qui luttent: ce sont
Ceux dont un dessein ferme emplit l'âme et le front
Ceux qui d'un haut destin gravissent l'âpre cime
Ceux qui marchant pensifs épris d'un but sublime
Ayant devant les yeux sans cesse, nuit et jour
Ou quelque saint labeur on quelque grand amour.

At the outset of his glorious but too short a reign, Edward VII said:

So long as I have a breath of life in me,
I shall labour for the good of my people, and on his death bed he whispered:

I have tried to do my duty.

It behooves us to imitate, as much as possible, this splendid example, so as to ensure the greatness and progress of our common country.

[Mr. Bourgeois.]

Perhaps I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to conclude these remarks with a few words in my imperfect English for which I should apologize in advance to this hon. house.

As hon. members are aware, the population of Three Rivers and Shawinigan Falls includes a considerable body of English speaking citizens. They are a great asset and because of what they have in common with my compatriots in the community life, as well as what may be considered to be their own traditional characteristics and attainments, they bring a large contribution to the welfare, progress and happiness of the city of Laviolette and its district. I am glad to say that much of the remarkable development in our economic and social activities has been due to them, to their acquired wealth, to their initiative and enterprise and to their virtues. What I wish particularly to make known, as sincerely and cordially as I can in their own tongue, is the pride and gratefulness I felt when, on the evening of my election it became apparent that the great majority of the English speaking element had cast their votes in favour of the present member for Three Rivers. They have conferred upon me an honour which is fully appreciated, and I desire first to thank them for the trust they have reposed in me. I might perhaps add: the trustfulness of man grows with the trust.

Three Rivers does not enjoy in this difficult time the full prosperity which marked the condition of her industrial life in recent years. We have been suffering from the universal depression; our principal industries have been deeply affected. But everyone remains confident that these hours of stress will soon pass and that in the near future the city and district will rise again as active and prosperous as ever. Everyone has an eye to the great opportunities which are bound to be in store for Three Rivers. It may be pointed out in this connection that the policies of the present government which I support seem to be beginning to make themselves felt in our midst since a new company of considerable importance, The Canadian Industries has been established in Shawinigan Falls and the Canada Iron Foundries is just opening up in Three Rivers a new plant to manufacture valves for water pipes and hydrants.

What is taking place in that constituency is, as a matter of fact, only one of the signs which are already to be found elsewhere in Canada. As the right honourable premier said recently in Toronto, one hundred new manufactories have been opened in the course of recent months throughout the country. These signs are more encouraging and are sufficient to strengthen the hearts of those who, in these days, have to bear the heavy responsibilities and cares of office.

It might be mentioned also that the last Federal election in Three Rivers was a by-election; that it occurred several months after the general elections and culminated in the capture of the seat which had been a Liberal stronghold for years; and that, therefore, the present administration may, in justice to themselves and their policies, as carried out in parliament, attach to it a significance implying a well defined vote of confidence.

In bringing these remarks to a close, Mr. Speaker, and leaving aside all party consideration, I would like to appeal to my fellow citizens of every creed, race and condition and have them say heartily and cheerfully: "Wake up Canada." We are not ruined. We are not bankrupt. We are not despondent. We are not downhearted. Men and women of the east and west; catholics and protestants, Canadians of old Quebec and old Ontario; of the maritime and western provinces; farmers of the St. Lawrence Valley, of the great prairies and of the Fraser river; merchants and bankers of Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, and Vancouver, men of capital, men of management and men of labour; men of all professions; we have still our fields, our forests, our rivers, our mines, our fisheries, our railways, our ships; we have still our great institutions, the treasures of this wonderful country of ours which await our renewed endeavours to make it happier, more prosperous and glorious than it ever was.

Lastly, we have ourselves our everlasting hopes and aspirations, our energy and courage and above all our duty to God and country, I say steadfastly "Canada wake up."

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member perhaps is not familiar with the rule which limits his speech to forty minutes. I direct his attention to the fact that he has exceeded his time.

Mr. BOURGEOIS: (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) that an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, to thank His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament, at the opening of this session.

Mr. JAMES H. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to second the motion of the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois) I realize the inadequacy of language in which to express myself as a humble Canadian let alone as one possessing the sentiments proper on such an occasion as is this. On such an occasion when we meet in this honourable assembly not only to try to promote the progress and prosperity of Canada, but if possible to rehabilitate the welfare of the great commonwealth of nations to which we belong, to try to give social justice to all classes, and, perhaps higher and better still, to promote peace in a world which has been blasted by and is, at the present time, almost on the verge of war, I would not be quite human and less than kind if I did not thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) for the honourable place he has given me in this debate. I do so, however, with the humble realization that this is because of the great constituency which I have the honour to represent and of the great central province, Manitoba, of which it forms a part.

"Manitoba" is a word to conjure with and perhaps delight the fancy. The word "Manitoba" is derived from the language of the original inhabitants of this continent: "Manitou", meaning the Great Spirit, and "Woban", meaning the narrows. The original inhabitants, as they listened to the wind blowing through the narrows of lake Winnipeg, which also happens to be a part of my constituency, believed it was the voice of God speaking through the narrows and they were wont to say "Manitou woban." The original settlers in that part of the country, who were also the original settlers in my constituency, the settlers of Lord Selkirk, took this fancy from the Indians, and our province was called by them "Manitoba". Is it therefore any wonder, when this name was derived in this way, in this place of unparalleled and mystic beauty, when the original settlers believed it was the voice of God speaking in mystery to the water, that I regard the honour of the position which I occupy at the present moment as an honour to my constituency and to my province?

I well recognize the fact that there are many members from the central province who are more eloquent and gifted than I am. I would like to advise the house that only recently, I believe yesterday, three members on this side from the great province of Manitoba and on whose desk the laurel wreath is resting at this moment, won for Canada and for Manitoba the curling championship of the world. Under such circumstances I can well be humble, because there is no doubt that if they had not engaged in carrying the fair fame of Manitoba before the world, someone else would have had the honour of seconding this motion.

I wonder if I might be permitted to say something about the great historic constituency of Selkirk. Selkirk, as hon. members all know, was the original portal to the northland, the portal of the voyageurs whereby they were able to traverse the northern part of the country into Hudson bay. The constituency of Selkirk at the present time might well be termed the portal of the great Canadian west. I believe that at the village of Marquette on the western borders of my constituency, you will find the very heart of Canada, for it is there that the Canadian Pacific Railway, that great transportation system, is bisected into two equal parts, one running to the east and the other to the west. If Selkirk enjoys this invaluable location from a geographical standpoint, it is also a constituency in which there are inhabitants to the number of around 45,000. It is an area which embraces the whole of lake Winnipeg. It is over 250 miles in extent and on the land portion over fifty miles in width. It might be interesting for members of the house to realize that it is in Selkirk that we find the original home of Manitoba No. 1 hard wheat, for it was, I believe, the Selkirk settlers who first grew No. 1 hard and exported it to the markets of the old land.

If Selkirk is the original home of No. 1 hard wheat, it is also the place where the finest butter in Canada is made at the present time. Hon. members may laugh and say that this is an exaggeration. Just a few months ago I had the satisfaction at Stonewall of presenting to a farmer's wife a gold medal for winning at the Royal Winter Fair for the last two successive years, the first prize for the best butter produced on a farm in Canada by a farmer's wife. Furthermore, the best butter in Canada was produced the year before last in the dairy at Teulon in the very heart of my constituency by a new Canadian named George Deorn. It is well for the house to recognize this fact; it is well to realize that in these days of depression, in these days when Canada is faced with such problems as it has never faced before, there are farmers' wives and gentlemen in the factories who make products the finest in the Dominion of Canada.

If my constituency is remarkable for the fact that it was the original home of No. 1 wheat and also for the fact that the best butter in Canada is produced there, it must also be remembered that the fisheries of lake Winnipeg are extensive, for lake Winnipeg is the home of the palatable whitefish and the luscious goldeye. May I direct the attention of the house to the fact that in the province of Manitoba in the year 1930 there was produced $1,830,000 worth of fish, over $1,000,000 of which came from the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this house.

In the first part of the speech from the throne His Excellency expressed gratification at being selected by His Majesty as his representative in this dominion. May I say, sir, that we also express our pleasure, and I should like to say on behalf of hon. members on both sides of the house representing the two great races in Canada how grateful and thankful we are for the coming of His Excellency to Canada. By his coming not only was there forged a further golden link of empire, but history was made because I believe that for the first time the representative of His Majesty was appointed on the recommendation of His Majesty's Canadian privy council.

It may be that upon such an occasion the imagination stirs and one is wont to express himself in verse. Not often has a poor maker of verses an opportunity to express the result of his effort in public. However, the day before His Excellency came to Canada I thought it a proper occasion to celebrate in verse not only the forging of this further link of empire but at the same time the realization of the autonomy of the Canadian people. In part I have written as follows:

There be men in this good land from England and Ireland,
From Wales and from Scotland and lands o'er the sea,
And some of us once broke a lance in a far land,
With men now asleep who were led, sir, by thee.
We hasten to greet thee with song when we meet thee,
Let the iron gun boom and the silver band blare,
In that golden desire for that greater empire
Which is ours and is God's in the life we would share.

We meet at a time of universal economic depression. I believe it is fair to say, however, that the government which I have the honour to support has met the situation by wise policies prosecuted vigorously. Speaking this afternoon, it is not difficult for me to analyze the cause of the economic situation in Canada.

About two years ago it was analyzed by my hon. friends opposite. We are the heirs of world depression; we are struggling as a young nation of ten million people finding ourselves in the aftermath of a war in which was wasted the accumulated wealth of centuries and imperilled the future credit of the world. Gold standards and other standards of currency have been thrown aside; inflation, followed by extravagance, wastage and unemployment, has been the order of the day.

Coming from the constituency of Selkirk I am not one to minimize the situation we now face in Canada. I do believe, however, that we might render some service to the country and to this house if we considered briefly the measures taken by the government to circumvent our difficulties. To summarize, I would mention the following: First, there was the great conversion loan; second, the national service loan; third, the Unemployment Relief Act of the special session; the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931; the protection given to industry by anti-dumping legislation, and lastly a measure, from which we have the most hope, paving the way for action to rejuvenate trade within the empire. In the speech from the throne we have notice that a conference of the British commonwealth of nations will be held in Ottawa on July 18 next. Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is a record of which any government might be proud when we realize that the present government has been in power less than two years.

I have prepared some statistics furnished me by the director of unemployment relief and which show perhaps more clearly than anything else just how colossal has been the undertaking of the government in that regard. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have these statistics incorporated in Hansard:

Dominion Contribution		Total contribution by dominion, provinces and municipalities
Municipal works. . .	$14,000,000	$43,000,000
Provincial works. . .	1,500,000	3,500,000
Provincial highways. .	6,000,000	13,000,000
Trans-Canada highway	3,250,000	6,500,000
Works in Yukon. . .	10,000	10,000
Saskatchewan drought area medical aid. .	100,000	100,000
Federal public works.	6,000,000	6,000,000
Grade crossings—Railway Commission	500,000	500,000
Total.	$31,301,000	$73,078,000

In the first column there is shown the federal contribution to unemployment works and projects, and in the second column the total amount subscribed by the dominion, the municipalities and provinces for these undertakings. Commenting upon these figures, it will be noted that for municipal works the federal government has set aside $14,000,000, and that the total value of the work will be $43,000,000. For purely provincial works the sum allocated by the Dominion government is $1,500,000, and the total value of the work will amount to over $3,500,000. For provincial highways the Dominion government has set aside $6,000,000, and the total contribution is $13,000,000. If the figures I have before me are added together we find that the federal government by the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931, has allocated a total of over $31,000,000 and with the aid of the municipalities and provinces this sum will reach the colossal amount of over $73,000,000. If you add to this figure the $20,000,000 voted at the special session and the extra $20,000,000 subscribed by the provinces and the municipalities you get an additional $40,000,000, making in all $113,000,000. If you add to this amount the $14,000,000 appropriated and almost spent for direct relief the total emerges at about $128,000,000. If you add the bonus on the production of wheat of $10,000,000, you have the grand total of from $138,000,000 to $140,000,000 which this government has raised and expended with the aid of the provinces and the municipalities for the relief of unemployment. Could anything be more eloquent of the fact that a wise policy has been laid down and has been carried out with vigour and with success?

I come from a constituency where there are large numbers of working men. Last winter I was fearful of the conditions that might arise in West Kildonan and in the town of Selkirk, and I want to assure the house that the allocation of moneys under this scheme of relief which was made jointly by the dominion, the province and the municipalities proved a tremendous benefit to those unemployed workers. I desire to pay a tribute to the cooperation of the municipal councils and the provincial government. It may seem strange that I should be able to say that in the districts in my constituency where there was most unemployment there was least complaint, and this was due solely to the wise policies inaugurated by the federal government.

In the speech from the throne reference is made to the St. Lawrence waterway and to the Imperial economic conference. I am sure that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his party generally will support any measure of the government tending to the making of a treaty with the United States for the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway. There is one way in which we can help our farmers very beneficially, and that is to reduce their transportation costs. With the early completion of the facilities at Hudson bay and with the construction, I hope in the near future, of the St. Lawrence waterway, the great western part of Canada will be helped to find more easily and with less expense markets for our products, especially our wheat.

Now, sir, let me say a word in passing with regard to the Imperial economic conference which is to be held in Ottawa next July. There has been considerable debate as to the proposals made with respect to this conference, and during last session we were told by the opposition that the conference would never take place. Is it not remarkable, Mr. Speaker, that the British commonwealth of nations have agreed to meet here next July, when, as it were, the seat of empire will be transferred from London to Ottawa?

In the course of the studies that I have made in preparation for this session I have read diligently the Manchester Guardian, the London Observer and the London Times, and it is apparent from these journals that the people of the old land are serious about the approaching economic conference; there is no doubt about that. As evidence of this I should like to quote an excerpt from the Ottawa Citizen of the 5th instant containing a statement by the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is headed "Britain's Trade Bill Means the End of Free Trade." Mr. Chamberlain said:

> There can be few occasions in all our long political history when the son of a man who counted for something in his day and generation has been vouchsafed the privilege of setting the seal upon a work which his father began, but which, perforce, he had to leave unfinished. Nearly twenty-nine years have passed since Joseph Chamberlain entered upon his great campaign in favour of an Imperial preference tariff reform, and more than seventeen have elapsed since he died without having seen the fulfilment of his aims.
> Time and misfortunes of the country have brought conviction to many who did not fully agree with him then. I believe he would have found consolation for the bitterness of his disappointment if he could have foreseen these proposals which are direct, legitimate descendants of his constructions laid before the House of Commons, which he loved, in the presence of one and by the lips of the other of the two immediate successors to his name.

[Mr. J. H. Stitt.]

Surely there have been few more remarkable incidents in the British House of Commons. In the presence of his brother, the son of the late Joseph Chamberlain was able to announce that the dream of the great imperialist was about to come true. And may we not claim some credit for our leader that England has set her face in the direction of protection? I endorse the statement of Mr. John L. Garvin in the London Observer that Joseph Chamberlain had again become incarnate in the person of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, and I am proud to be a member of this party which has the advantage of such a great leader. For was it not the right hon. gentleman who proclaimed this policy to a reluctant England; was it not he who led the line?

I desire to congratulate the government on the ministerial changes announced last Friday. I think I voice the sentiments of my colleagues when I say that we are very pleased that the mantle of Minister of Labour has fallen upon the Hon. Wesley A. Gordon. Those of us who represent constituencies where there are many working men desire to pay a tribute to the excellent relief work carried out by the Hon. Gideon Robertson, Mr. Gordon's predecessor. If ever a man was a casualty to his country's need I believe the ex-Minister of Labour was, and I tender to him my humble thanks for the patience with which he always received the representations I made to him on behalf of the workers of Selkirk. We are also very much pleased at the elevation of the Hon. Mr. Rhodes to the office of Minister of Finance. With his long parliamentary and business experience we believe he will prove a worthy successor to the long line of great Canadians who have preceded him as finance minister of this dominion.

In this connection I desire to add a word with regard to the elevation to the Senate of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, and to say that I am grateful that his counsel will be available as a member of the cabinet. When I went to the upper house to listen to the reading of the speech from the throne it struck me as rather remarkable that to the right of His Excellency stood Right Hon. Richard Bedford Bennett, while to the left of His Excellency stood that other great Conservative, that other great imperialist, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. If I might venture a remark to the right hon. leader of the opposition, in all kindness I would say that when this double-barrelled leadership of which he spoke fires its guns he may have occasion to regret his statement. The greatest tribute paid to Right Hon. Arthur Meighen on his elevation to the Senate was paid by the Manitoba Free Press, which did the most to defeat him.

I might add a further observation, Mr. Speaker. I believe the right hon. leader of the opposition promised some years ago that the upper house would be reformed. I am sure he will acknowledge that the greatest reform to be made since he uttered that statement has been brought about by the elevation to that chamber of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. If there was one thing I, as a young member of this house, deplored last year—and I say this in all sincerity, not as a politician but as a Canadian citizen—it was the fact that the mantle of infamy had fallen upon our parliamentary institutions, but I think it will add greatly to the prestige of the upper house to have Mr. Meighen there with his broadsword. I hope this is only the beginning of a policy which will mean that the government will not follow the scheme of the opposition in reforming the Senate only when death permitted them to do so.

A great deal of criticism has been levelled against the government; the right hon. leader of the opposition made a very critical speech in Winnipeg, to which I listened over the radio. The following day the right hon. gentleman delivered a splendid speech before the Winnipeg board of trade, in which he amplified the sentiment, contained in his great book Industry and Humanity, of the extension of human opportunity. In the course of his remarks the right hon. gentleman spoke of the great work we ought to do in connection with industry and labour, by which labour perhaps might become a partner with industry.

I want to thank the right hon. gentleman for that speech and for those sentiments, but while doing so I cannot forget the speech he made the previous evening at a Liberal meeting. I think it is fair to say that the ills of Canada were diagnosed, but no prescriptive remedy was offered for our recovery. I do not believe it is going to help this country in the solution of our problems to speak about the virtues of free trade when there is a world war going on at the present time in connection with trade and commerce.

I spoke of the measures which were adopted to protect Canadian industry, particularly in regard to anti-dumping legislation. Surely if it is right that a man should stand up and take his own part, his country should also. What would have happened to this dominion if the national fabric in the east had suffered as it did in the west? Where would we have found our basis of taxation if industry had fallen on the parlous times that have come over agriculture in western Canada? Where would we have found that five cents per bushel—that five cents which has meant $10,000,000 to the western farmers—if it had not been for industry in eastern Canada? Surely in all these matters it behooves us to take a practical course and not to be overcome with an infirmity of mind which might make us believe that we can fit life to a theory, or a pure theory to practical life.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I believe we are met here at a most critical time for Canada. We are facing great and momentous questions, having to do with world trade, internal economy, capital and labour and other matters, and if these questions are not properly handled they may well mean the ruin of this country. But, sir, when I said that the honour I have been given had come to me because of the constituency and the fair province which I represent, perhaps I might have added that possibly it was tendered to me because in a small way I represent that class of men who now are coming in greater numbers to this house, the men who carried the maple leaf in the foremost files of empire to the battlefields of Europe. I believe there are over thirty men in this house, from all provinces and sitting on both sides, who saw service for their king and country and for the peace of the world in the great war. I believe I speak for them, as I believe I speak for every member of this house, when I say that all we desire is to help Canada, to help the British commonwealth of nations achieve its purpose and do its work looking to the peace and prosperity of the world.

I should like to conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by quoting some words of Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, that great servant of empire, that great British ambassador who represented Great Britain at Washington during the world war, written just prior to his death. I am sure that what we desire, and what Canada expects, is that we should consecrate not only our minds but our hearts, our time and our wills to the welfare of our country. Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, perhaps conscious that the end of his life was approaching, wrote these words:

> I vow to thee, my country—all earthly things above—
> Entire and whole and perfect, the service of my love,
> The love that asks no question; the love that stands the test;
> That lays upon the altar the dearest and the best:
> The love that never falters, the love that pays the price,
> The love that makes undaunted the final sacrifice.

Then in conclusion, moved no doubt by that great emotion which possesses all great souls, he wrote:

> And there's another country, I've heard of long ago—
> Most dear to them that love her, most great to them that know.
> We may not count her armies; we may not see her King,
> Her fortress is a faithful heart, her pride is suffering.
> And soul by soul and silently her shining bounds increase,
> And her ways are ways of gentleness and all her paths are peace.

There is a power that rules nations, a power that rules the activities of men. If we only have faith in our country; if we only have belief in an ever-ruling Providence; if we only work together; if unity is our shield and integrity our buckler, and if courage is our sword we can, with belief in God and in enthusiasm for humanity, realize our place among the nations of the world. It is with great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, that I second the motion of my hon. colleague from Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois).

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): After listening to the motion which you have just put to the house, Mr. Speaker, and particularly after hearing what the mover of the address (Mr. Bourgeois) and the seconder (Mr. Stitt, Selkirk) have said in such courteous terms about His Excellency the Governor General, I again experience and must express regret that the first act of this parliament should not have been one of extending to the king's representative in this country the courtesy of a word of thanks for his first address from the throne before taking up the time of the House of Commons with matters that are personal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). Parliamentary institutions under the British flag have many time-honoured customs which deserve to be respected to the full, and I feel that I should be remiss in my duty as one who believes in the British constitution and its practices, and likes to see those practices followed to the letter, if I did not take exception to this strange discourtesy which has been shown His Excellency the newly-arrived Governor General in this country by the first act of this parliament to-day.

I intend to say a few words in criticism of the speech from the throne, and for that reason it may be necessary for me, so that there can be no thought in anyone's mind that I am at all reflecting on His Excellency the Governor General, to say a word about the significance of the speech, the manner of its preparation and the part it is intended to play in the proceedings of parliament. Before I do so, however, I should like at once to follow the customary practice of extending congratulations to the hon. gentlemen who have moved and seconded the address. The mover of the address, the hon. member for Three Rivers, was, I think, appropriately accorded that honour as being the most recent arrival in this house. He will not expect me to congratulate him on his victory, but I do congratulate him very warmly on the manner of his first address in the House of Commons. He comes here with the reputation of one who stands high in his profession; and indeed all who have listened to him this afternoon must have realized that he is accustomed to public speaking and also that as a skilled attorney he is capable of making the best of a bad case. I congratulate him on the manner in which he has discharged his duties to-day. The hon. member for Selkirk has spoken in the house before and to-day he has, I think, acquitted himself in the same creditable manner as he has on previous occasions. He is one of the younger members of the house and this afternoon has given us an interesting, informative and entertaining address. May I reasure him at once, with regard to any fears he may think I entertain of the double-barrelled leadership of the Conservative party. I have realized from the start that this would mean a double offensive so far as I am concerned. But, as he says, the people at this time are more than ever interested in the conditions as they exist in the country; and are going to pay more attention to argument than to sound. He need not be in the least alarmed that having been swept off their feet in one general election by one big gun, the people are likely to be carried away a second time, even if there are two commanders-in-chief instead of one.

Let me return to the speech from the throne. The speech, as all hon. members know, but as some of the public may not know, while it is delivered by His Excellency the Governor General is prepared by the Prime Minister, and His Excellency the Governor General, in presenting to both houses of parliament the address which he does, is not in any way responsible for what appears in its paragraphs but gives to the country what the Prime Minister has prepared as a guide to the proceedings of parliament. It is particularly as a guide to the business of the session on the matters that are likely to be brought forward in legislation, and the more important matters likely to be submitted for consideration, that the speech is intended. It is quite appropriate that it should give, as the speech before us does give, some account of the condition of the times as a sort of background or general setting to the different measures that may be considered during the session. As I am going to take exception to some of the statements in the speech, I desire again to make it perfectly clear that in so doing I am not taking exception to any act of His Excellency the Governor General. There is an old constitutional maxim, "the king can do no wrong," and in this country the king's representative in matters of state can do no wrong so long as he acts on the advice of the Prime Minister; and in presenting to parliament the speech which has been delivered, His Majesty's representative in Canada has simply presented the speech which has been put into his hands by the right hon. the Prime Minister.

There is in the speech one paragraph which being personal to His Excellency, has in all probability, been written by His Excellency himself. It has had the approval of the Prime Minister and may have been written by the Prime Minister at the request of His Excellency. It is the first paragraph in the speech. With what is expressed in that paragraph all hon. members will be in hearty accord. We warmly welcome the kindly expression which, with respect to his arrival in Canada and recognition of the manner in which he has been received here, has come from the king's representative to the people of the country. May I say that the people of Canada most warmly reciprocate towards His Excellency the sentiments which he, as His Majesty's representative, has expressed.

Passing from the introductory paragraph, the speech, it will be seen, falls into three main divisions. The first portion in point of importance sets forth what may be described as the legislative program. This happens to be the briefest part of the speech. Another portion deals with subjects of general interest which are likely to receive a good deal of attention during this session. The third portion consists of a number of general statements, in the nature of assertions and affirmations, some of which are true and some of which I think are untrue. I shall have a word to say later on in the course of my remarks with regard to these statements.

It is not necessary, but it is a custom sometimes followed, to have an amendment moved to the speech from the throne. This year, I believe the people of Canada are anxious that parliament shall get down to business as quickly as possible and that as little time as possible shall be lost in preliminary discussion. If the opposition follows the course which up to the present it has proposed to follow and does not present an amendment, it will not be because we agree with what is in the speech or with many of the government's policies, but simply to show that we approve of His Excellency's part in delivering the speech and wish, after thanking His Excellency for it, to get on with the country's business as rapidly as may be possible. We will reserve to some other time, possibly on occasions of going into supply, what we wish to say with regard to a number of matters.

As I have said, the speech is brief. I shall endeavour to follow an example which I think is a good one, and if possible be briefer than usual in my own remarks. I shall take up the different features of the speech in the order I have indicated.

First of all, I shall deal with the legislative program. It is embraced, so far as actual mention of measures is concerned, in three paragraphs.

The first paragraph reads as follows:

> The Geneva Narcotics Convention of 1931, the Red Cross, Prisoners of War and other conventions, will be submitted for your approval.

We may as well take the legislation of that paragraph as read and accepted. In so far as this side of the house is concerned we are ready to approve these conventions immediately. We know all about them already and in taking them up we need not spend any time beyond what is necessary for the purpose of the formal approval which has to be given by parliament.

The next paragraph reads as follows:

In regard to these measures we shall, of course, have to wait until they are before us and we have opportunity to see what their provisions are. I imagine that they will be controversial not so much in a party sense as in connection with some of the important provisions they contain, and that they will be referred for consideration to either a special or a standing committee. I doubt if except as regards the insurance measure much time of the house will need to be taken up in the consideration of these measures.

The next paragraph reads as follows:

> You will also be asked to consider bills to amend the Canada Shipping Act and the Fisheries Act.

What I have just said applies to this paragraph; until these measures are presented to the house, we will not be in a position to offer any comment thereon.

This is the legislative program. I must express surprise that at a time when unemployment continues to play the part which it does, and particularly after listening to the remarks of the mover and the seconder of the address with regard to the importance of this question and the course pursued by the government in dealing with it, there is nothing in the speech from the throne with reference to any further provision for unemployment or any expression of an intention to deal with the great question of unemployment insurance. I am inclined to feel that unemployment is still the most important question before this parliament and the country at the present time, and that the time of parliament should be devoted to discussing all aspects of it very fully. But no reference is made in the speech to any proposed consideration of matters pertaining to unemployment.

There is another omission. When we consider the importance which is being attached to-day to a consideration of banking and credit, to depreciated and appreciated currencies, it is significant that we find no mention of anything at all suggestive of a forward looking policy with respect to the improvement of our banking and credit systems. No consideration is suggested of the questions of currency which are so all-important. I had assumed that the government would be giving the fullest consideration to matters of this kind and would have had something to place before parliament for its consideration. I notice that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, speaking in Toronto the other evening, was very strong in advising the people to be sure to keep their investments in banks and insurance companies. That may be sound advice, but there are people who are investing their lives in industry; there are people who derive all they have in the way of a standard of comfort from the value to be attached to what they may have in the way of purchasing power. These people are interested in seeing that questions which affect banking and credit and currencies are considered carefully by their representatives in parliament.

Perhaps it is a blessing that the legislative program is so brief. If legislation were to be of the character of that introduced at the last session and at the special session of 1930, then I think the country should be thankful that the program is so brief. If there is a single factor which has helped to contribute to the difficulties of the present time, it is the extremes to which the ministry has gone in the matter of tariff legislation and its administration. As we know, the extensive revision upwards of the tariff and the continuous interpretation of the legislation in connection therewith in a manner to make it not merely restrictive but in many directions prohibitive of trade has been an outstanding feature of the work of this parliament and of the government since the new ministry came into office. The public should be thankful that it has been spared further legislation of that kind.

Much more important than legislation itself is the opportunity to be given the people's representatives to discuss in this parliament questions which are all-important in the minds of the people themselves. During the last two sessions there has not been provided the opportunity which should have been provided to discuss great national problems. By one device or another the government has sought to prevent this House of Commons from discussing at length the most important questions which were before it. The first special session was called to deal with unemployment but instead of being presented with unemployment measures we were faced with a most extensive revision of the tariff, and we were told that unless the Prime Minister was able to get that legislation through in the course of a fortnight, which was all the time available for discussion, he would not be able to attend the imperial conference. We were told also in one of his public addresses that the imperial conference was of great importance to the future of Canada and that it was necessary for him to be present if Canada's interests were to be safeguarded. That session, as I say, was deliberately framed so as to render impossible any discussion by the people's representatives in this house of the question of the tariff, which was the most important question with which any parliament could be concerned.

As regards unemployment, we were presented with a bill asking for $20,000,000 to be used for unemployment relief. No opportunity was given for discussing the general question of unemployment. Very little was said by the government of how they intended to use that $20,000,000. No statement was given to the house of the basis upon which they had asked for this amount. It was simply a case of: We must have $20,000,000 to do with as we please. And that $20,000,000 was voted. I shall refer a little later to what I think the effect of that method of legislating has been on some of the problems that have since arisen. But that was the situation with regard to the special session that was called to deal with the question of unemployment.

Let us consider the last session. The last session was a much longer one. Unemployment had become a still greater problem in Canada. From the beginning of the session until within the last few weeks of its close, I repeatedly asked my right hon. friend what his policy was with respect to unemployment, what he meant when he said that he would end unemployment, what measures he was going to introduce into parliament to redeem that promise and obligation, but I received no reply. When we endeavoured to discuss unemployment, the rules of the house were resorted to in order to make it impossible to proceed with the discussion at any length. We were told by the Prime Minister that the cabinet was the board of directors of the nation. I want to repeat what I said to the Prime Minister at that time in regard to that remark. The cabinet is not the board of directors of the nation's affairs. This parliament, this House of Commons, is the board of directors of the nation's affairs. The cabinet is a committee of the House of Commons, but there are assembled here representatives from all parts of this country who have a knowledge of the conditions with which their constituents have to contend and how those conditions are to be met, much more complete than that which can be possessed by any individual group of men in this house. If parliament stands for anything at all; if the House of Commons, as the forum of the people's representatives, means anything at all, then the people are entitled to hear not only the members of cabinet with respect to their measures, but all hon. members of the House of Commons; and ample opportunity should be given to them to discuss the various measures and subjects of importance.

As I said, at the last session we had little or no opportunity to do this. On the other hand, time and again the customs, traditions, and practices of the House of Commons, were set at naught. In voting public money it has always been customary for a ministry to state the specific object for which moneys are needed, and to seek the appropriation of a specific amount. That is the way in which the House of Commons holds its control over expenditure. What did hon. gentlemen do? They waited until the end of the session, when everyone was well nigh exhausted after several months of the sitting of the house, and presented a bill giving the right to deal with unemployment relief and other matters as they pleased. They secured in this way a blank cheque which they might fill in to any amount and which would enable them to take out of the public treasury, without any further control on the part of parliament, whatever sums of money they wished to spend to that end from that time until the present.

This setting at naught all the practices of British parliamentary procedure, this riding rough-shod over provisions which have been time-honoured and which exist for the protection of the people of the country, is something that must not be further continued, and if there is an effort to continue it, there will be very strenuous opposition from this side. At a time like this we do not wish to make matters more difficult for the government than they are; we are anxious as far as possible to cooperate with them, but it takes two to cooperate, and there will have to be a disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to permit a free expression of opinion from all sides of the house if they wish to have the cooperation of all the members to the degree to which at such a time as this it is desirable to have it.

While I am speaking on the rights and privileges of parliament may I in this connection refer to a remark made by my right hon. friend on Friday last? When he was speaking, I did not catch the significance of what he said or I should have very sharply taken him to task at the moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon members may smile. Perhaps the privileges of parliament are a matter of indifference to them; but if they will bear with me for a moment; if they are upholders of the constitution, I think they themselves will be among those who will agree with what I have to say. It has always been understood that the members of each of the houses of parliament are the custodians of their respective rights and privileges. From the days of magna charta it has been understood under the British constitution, apart from parliament altogether, that any free man has a right to be judged by his peers, and is entitled to the protection of the law of the land. Everyone knows, so far as the Senate is concerned, that that body is the custodian of its own rights and privileges, and when matters have been referred to that honourable body, no member of the House of Commons has any right even to so much as publicly comment upon what is there taking place. Yet, at a moment when I was expressing, as I think hon. gentlemen will agree, in a kindly and straightforward manner, my appreciation of one of the appointments which the Prime Minister had made of a former colleague to be the leader of the Senate; when I had been speaking, as I say, surely in a courteous way, my right hon. friend interrupted to say, to all intents and purposes, that the appointment which he had made had been made in order that he might have in the Senate, in the person of the new leader of the Senate, an instrument of his will, someone who on his behalf is to perform the office of Lord High Executioner, someone who, without any evidence, without any hearing, is to be prosecutor, jury, judge, pronounce the verdict and the sentence, and complete the entire indictment and legal process, all on his own authority. May I say to my right hon. friend I think he is very much mistaken if he imagines the present leader of the Senate is going to be simply an instrument of his will in matters of that kind. He will find the double-barrelled arrangement will not work quite as smoothly as he believes will be the case in this particular instance. But, asides apart, I would say that the Prime Minister of Canada, who is not only the leader of the House of Commons, but, above all others, supposed to be the guardian of the rights and privileges of parliament, should be the last one to set an example which he himself knows to be entirely wrong.

I now proceed to the other matters that are mentioned in the speech from the throne. There are in it some subjects of general interest. It is not indicated that any of them are to be followed by legislation, but it is to be presumed that in the course of the session legislation will be introduced with respect to some of them. I shall take them up pretty much in the order in which they appear in the speech from the throne. One is:

> My ministers have under consideration a commercial treaty with the Dominion of New Zealand.

I wish the government had found it possible to tell us that a commercial treaty had been arrived at which would be presented to parliament. That is what we had understood from the press. It is quite right, however, that the ministry should safeguard its statements, and all we know at the moment is that it has under consideration a treaty with New Zealand.

The thought that comes to my mind is this: If it has been possible within the past few weeks to arrive at a treaty with New Zealand which contains any advantages to both countries, why was that not possible a year ago? Why have we not had the advantages that would flow from such a treaty during the past year when anything in the way of additional trade would have meant a great deal to Canada? Nearly a year ago, the Prime Minister of New Zealand was here in the city of Ottawa, ready to negotiate. He was prepared to sit down with the Canadian ministry and formulate a treaty, but hon. gentlemen opposite were not willing or ready to discuss a treaty with him. When the Hon. Mr. Forbes realized their attitude he went back to New Zealand and made a public statement to his own parliament. In this connection, I read from a Canadian press cable from Wellington, New Zealand, dated June 4, as it appeared in the Montreal Gazette of June 5, 1931:

> The Prime Minister said he hoped Canada would agree to send her minister of trade to New Zealand to negotiate a new trade treaty. New Zealand has been forced to show a strong hand—in placing Canadian imports on the general tariff scale—in view of Canada's "complete failure to listen to representations regarding the butter duty," he said.

Those words are in quotations. Then, the article continues:

> Mr. Forbes added that on the day he had arrived in Ottawa, Canada had taken an unfriendly action by raising the butter duty. "Canada slammed the door in New Zealand's face at the very time when she was anxious to negotiate," the Prime Minister said.

Those words are in quotations—"slammed the door in New Zealand's face". Canada slammed the door in New Zealand's face—that may be a part of the process of blasting a way into the markets of the world. Let us hope however that there will be no more slamming of doors between different parts of the empire. If that is to be the method of procedure at the forthcoming imperial conference I can tell my right hon. friend he will not get very far in any trade negotiations he may have with any part of the empire. Let him take a lesson from what has been the experience with regard to New Zealand and adopt a different method of negotiating with different parts of the empire in matters of common interest. We will hope that the treaty said to be under consideration is one which will prove beneficial to both Canada and New Zealand, and that its provisions will be laid before the house at a very early date.

The speech from the throne contains reference to two conferences. I shall refer first to the paragraph on the Disarmament conference. It reads:

A Canadian delegation is participating in the Disarmament conference, which was opened at Geneva on the 2nd of February. I join with you in the prayer that the representatives of the nations there assembled may reach an understanding which will put beyond peril the cause of enduring world peace.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that is a paragraph in the speech from the throne with which not only all hon. members of this House of Commons but the people of Canada generally will be in complete accord. The people of Canada are most anxious to have this great Disarmament conference do something for the security and peace of the world. In my view, if my right hon. friend will permit me to say so, the paragraph is splendidly worded, and expresses the sentiment cherished by this nation as a whole.

I should like to say a word regarding the meeting of the disarmament conference. It would seem the very irony of fate that there should be meeting at the League of Nations at the present time representatives of the different countries charged with a consideration of the great problem of disarmament while in another part of the world we are witnessing hostilities having many of the features of international conflict. Some have said that this means the League of Nations has failed to function, that it has not done what was expected of it. As there always are dismal prophets in all parts of the world, there are those who are saying that this seeming failure means the beginning of the end of the great movement for which the League of Nations stands. Also there are those who say that in view of what we are witnessing to-day in the orient, we have the strongest reason why the disarmament conference should not make the headway which otherwise we would have hoped it would make. In other words they say that if we are to have adequate protection, instead of nations disarming there ought to be more arming. I do not agree with either of those views. I do not think that the League of Nations has failed; I do not think the cause of disarmament is any less real to-day than it has ever been, and I wish to give my reasons.

The principle upon which the League of Nations is acting is that before hostilities take place between countries there should be an investigation; that the public should be fully informed of the causes and merits of a dispute under some inquiry judicially conducted; that before any part of the world is thrown into a state of turmoil, nations should be in a position to judge as to the right and wrong of the great questions involved. In other words the view of the League of Nations is that in international affairs reason rather than force should prevail.

In 1907 this parliament enacted what is known as the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. That act laid down principles which are identical with those which constitute the basis of the practice of the League of Nations. I am not suggesting that those present at the League of Nations had that act before them, but I do say that the principle of investigating industrial disputes before there are lockouts or strikes and in the first instance of obliging parties in industry to submit to an investigation so that the public may be fully informed as to the right or wrong of the situation is the principle laid down in that act, and that it is a principle identical with that which constitutes the basis of a large part of the work of the League of Nations. I remember very well after that act was passed that in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia its provisions were disregarded at the outset on one or two occasions. The act became law at the time of mining troubles in the west. The miners at the time did not realize the full significance of the measure. They misunderstood its purpose and aim and arrayed themselves in defiance of it. It was not long however before they discovered that having violated a law of the land they had, to a considerable degree, lost the sympathy which might otherwise have been theirs. More important than that however was the fact that they discovered, when they began to study the act, that after all there was a more excellent way of obtaining justice, namely that of basing their case on its merits, knowing as Burke has said that "justice is the common concern of mankind," and that the public when it understands the right and the wrong of a situation may be relied upon to see that justice prevails. What has been the result? That act has been on the statute books of this country now for nearly twenty-five years, a quarter of a century. Conformity with its provisions has become part of the accepted practice of those engaged in the large industries to which the provisions of the law apply. Parties to the industries concerned do not think of lockouts or strikes until the public have been fully informed as to the right and wrong of situations which have arisen.

Take what has been happening within the last few months with respect to the question of rates of wages, hours of work and the degree of employment of the men on the great railway systems of Canada. Before the time of the statute there were lockouts and strikes to settle matters of the kind when in dispute, but to-day before such things may occur each party involved has an opportunity to appoint its own representative on a board of investigation, to meet under the presidency of a common chairman, and the opinion of the board on the facts and merits of the dispute is given to the country before any interruption of the service or disruption of industry takes place. With what result? With the result that since the Act has been in force in the great majority of cases where disputes have been investigated no strike or lockout has ever taken place. Now, that has been Canada's experience in regard to legislation which relates to industrial relations. I should think that the experience of the world in the course of time will be identical with respect to great international problems which involve questions of right or wrong between nations. I am not at all sure that it is not a fortunate thing for mankind that at the moment the world is going to have an opportunity of demonstrating what with regard to the attitude of nations the force of international public opinion may mean in a given situation with respect to any nation which may violate the provisions of great covenants such as those of the League of Nations, and the Kellogg-Briand pact. I do not wish to say anything about the merits of the dispute in the far east beyond this, that I think this country and all other countries were entitled to know the right and wrong of the situation before a shot was fired The machinery for such a course exists and it was due to the nations of the world, whatever the differences or causes of conflict may be that these should have been made clear to some international tribunal before the peace of the world was disturbed.

May I say this, Mr. Speaker, that I believe were it not for the League of Nations being in existence, and for the fact that public opinion has developed as it has with respect to the great question of international peace, that instead of witnessing what we have witnessed in the last few weeks in the orient, isolated encounters here and there, we would to-day have been witnessing the most unparalleled butchery that mankind has ever known. If the world has been saved a tragedy of that kind, it is, I believe, because of the respect which, no matter what the provocation may be, nations now have for the good opinion of the rest of the world of which they are also a part.

With regard to disarmament, far from the present situation being a reason why nations should seek to do more in the way of arming themselves, it affords the strongest reason why disarmament should be striven for more strenuously than ever. What are we witnessing? We are witnessing air forces, land forces, naval forces, all taking part in an international conflict. Assume that the relationship between Japan and China to-day was similar to the relationship between the United States and this country, does anyone believe that there would be that kind of occurrence in the orient at the present time? I venture to say that if the orient had, as we have on this continent, something in the nature of an international joint tribunal which would deal with questions of international difference, we certainly would not be witnessing to-day what we are forced to witness. We can only hope —and I am sure that every member of this parliament will share the hope—that the nations of the orient will realize that there is such a thing as a great family of nations to which they belong, and that all the other members of the family are interested in seeing that justice is done where there is a wrong, and that if given the opportunity so to do, they will find a way of justice being made to prevail, short of the kind of conflict that is taking place at the present time.

With regard to the disarmament conference, let me repeat that this parliament will strongly support those who are representing this country at the conference. I hesitate to say anything in the way of criticism of the delegation which has been appointed by the government to represent Canada at the conference; comparisons are always invidious; but I do say—and I think it is what the country feels—that having regard to the importance of that great gathering, Canada might have sent a stronger and more representative delegation. If I may be permitted to say so, hon. gentlemen opposite might have followed the example which the previous Liberal administration set with respect to representation at Geneva at some of the international gatherings held there. When in office we appointed at one time the late Sir George Foster, a great and distinguished member of the Conservative party, to be one of our representatives at Geneva; we appointed the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), a member of the party that sits in the far corner, also as a representative of Canada at the League of Nations. We did that in order that all parties might be represented as one on a matter which was not a question of political difference. I submit that having regard particularly to the fact that a petition carrying hundreds of thousands of names was carried across the sea, those names including members of all political parties in Canada. The purpose in view would have been much better served if, in selecting the representation for that delegation, the Prime Minister had sought out persons representative of all parties in this country, persons who would be among the most informed on questions of disarmament and best able to speak for all political parties in Canada. However, as I say, subject to this criticism—which of course has no bearing upon the efforts which we know will be made by the present delegation—we all hope and pray that Canada's representation at Geneva will be able to further the great end which it is intended to serve.

The next reference in the speech from the throne is to the economic conference. The paragraph dealing with the economic conference is as follows:

On the invitation of my government, an economic conference of members of the British commonwealth of nations will meet in Ottawa on July 18th next.

May I, Mr. Speaker, as leader of the Liberal party in this house say that we are pleased indeed that the government of Great Britain and the governments of the dominions of the British empire have accepted the invitation of Canada to be present at the imperial conference to be held here this year. We are pleased that at last a date has been definitely fixed and that the conference is to meet in Canada. And may I add in all sincerity that we of the Liberal party will do what we can, in so far as our point of view will permit, to cooperate with hon. gentlemen opposite in making the conference the great success which all Canadians hope it will be. I should be happy if it were possible to believe that this House of Commons could be as one on the policies that would be put before the conference as those of Canada. But unless there is a great change between now and July the 18th in the point of view of hon. gentlemen opposite and of ourselves with respect to the significance of tariffs and the part they should play in governing trade, I fail to see just how we may get together. I would ask of my right hon. friend that there be given to this House of Commons during this session of parliament a full opportunity to discuss the questions that are to come up at the economic conference, in order that the members of this house may speak their mind, and speak it very freely, with respect to the policies that should be put forward at the conference. Indeed, I should very much like to see the government state its policies in the form of a resolution before this house, and have the endorsation of those policies before they submit them to the conference. If they were to do that they would be in a very strong position when presenting the Canadian viewpoint. I hardly expect they will be willing so to do; however, that is for them to judge. But I do say that this House of Commons is entitled to know what particular line the ministry intends to take; that we should have ample opportunity to discuss the pros and cons, so that when Canada's voice is heard at the conference this country will know whether what is being presented is in accordance with some general consensus of view or whether it is the opinion of only one section of the country that is being expressed.

I should like to refer to the economic conference at a little greater length, Mr. Speaker. As it is almost six o'clock I would ask the permission of the house to go on after recess.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the house rose at six o'clock I was beginning to outline the Liberal attitude towards the approaching imperial economic conference. I had said that as a party we were pleased indeed that the Prime Minister had found it possible to receive from the other dominions and Great Britain an acceptance of the invitation of the government of Canada to have the conference meet in this country. It would be strange indeed if the Liberal party were not wholeheartedly in favour of any conference which gives promise of the development of inter-imperial trade, because, as is well known, it was the Liberal party that instituted the British preference which became in time an imperial preference. I believe the records will bear out the statement that what was given in the way of preference originally and whatever has been given in the way of increased preference to Great Britain at any time since has been given by a Liberal administration. One may search the records of this parliament in vain to discover a time when a Conservative administration increased the preference. There are numerous instances, none, of course, so glaring as that afforded at the special session of 1930, where a Conservative administration has materially lessened the preference to Great Britain.

When Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Right Hon. Mr. Fielding decided in 1897 upon the preference as a matter of policy in regard to the tariff there were in the main two reasons that actuated them. One undoubtedly was sentiment, which does play some part in public affairs, particularly where it relates to matters affecting the British Empire. Anything that will make for closer cooperation between the various parts of the empire should receive, and certainly always has received from the Liberal party, the very strongest approval. Before attending an imperial conference in Britain in 1897, at the time of Queen Victoria's diamond jubilee, the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced through the then Minister of Finance the first measure of preference that was brought into this parliament. The other motive was the one that every nation must have in mind primarily, namely, its own interest. When this country adopted the preference it did so because it was believed by the administration of the day that it was good business so to do, and every administration that has remained in office in Canada since then, whether Conservative or Liberal, except the administration of which my right hon. friend is the head, has maintained the preference at the figure at which it stood at the time the administration came into office, or else increased it. So that there has been a pretty general agreement that it was good business to give a preference to Britain. Now it did not mean that by giving a preference to British goods we were simply helping Britain. My right hon. friend put forward that point of view in opposition to an increase in the preference at the last general campaign. He came forward with his so-called doctrine of Canada First, as though there were, in matters of trade, which means an exchange that is mutually advantageous, something to the disadvantage of Canada, because Britain might receive some advantage from the arrangement. That is where I differ so completely from my right hon. friend. Trade, to my mind, is an exchange which in the very nature of things is of mutual advantage. There would be no such thing as trade at all unless each party to the exchange felt that it was to its interest to trade. My right hon. friend takes the view that trade is rather in the nature of economic war and that we have to fight and bargain over the arrangement that is to be made before two countries can do what it is to their mutual interest to do. This, then, is the point of view from which the Liberal party, so far as it has any expression of view in the matter, will approach the forthcoming imperial economic conference. We will welcome it as a conference which we trust will lead to much more in the way of empire trade, to much more in the way of preference on the part of this country towards Britain and towards the other dominions, and, where they have tariffs, more in the way of preference on their part towards us. But I do say to the Prime Minister that if the imperial economic conference is to be the success which this country wishes it to be he will have to change his point of view in regard to trade.

Moreover, he will have to change his methods of dealing with other parts of the British Empire, and he will have to change his policies. I have touched for a moment upon the right hon. gentleman's point of view; let me say a word about his methods. We are looking forward to this economic conference in the hope that it may be a success. Why was the last economic conference not a success? I have already given my view in the house and I repeat it to-night: I think it was because of the attitude of my right hon. friend, because of the way in which he approached that conference, the way in which, before he left Canada at all, at the special session of this parliament, he put up duties against Great Britain and other parts of the empire, doing away with a large measure of the preference they formerly had, and, when he reached England, telling them they must accept what he wanted to have done or he would not be prepared to listen to anything. I do not want to go over the ground I traversed pretty fully a year ago, but, lest anyone may have forgotten what my right hon. friend did say, let me read one paragraph in relation to what he termed his offer to Great Britain. This was after having stated his Canada First policy, the Canada First policy being that whatever can be produced or manufactured in Canada must be produced or manufactured here. Under his Canada First policy, tariff walls were to be so arranged that it would be impossible for goods of the kind mentioned to come into this dominion above those walls from outside, whether from other parts of the empire or from other countries. Preference was to be given by raising the tariff wall against other countries still higher than it was against those to which the preference was to be given. After he had stated his Canada First policy, the right hon. gentleman at the conference said:

> I offer to the mother country and to all the other parts of the empire a preference in the Canadian market in exchange for a like preference in theirs, based upon the addition of a ten per centum increase in prevailing general tariffs or upon tariffs yet to be created.

That is the proposition which the Right Hon. Mr. Thomas very properly described as humbug, and I am afraid my right hon. friend will have to get rid of his humbug policy before this conference meets, if he wishes it to be at all successful. And may I ask, is it not humbug? Consider what that proposal means. To understand it one has to consider first what was done at the special session. At the special session the duties were raised against Great Britain; over a wide range they were increased, and part of the preference was done away with. Under the budget which the Liberal administration put into force just before the conference opened the duties had been considerably lowered; the ground had been prepared for a favourable approach to Great Britain. But my right hon. friend took a diametrically opposite attitude; he raised the duties considerably. Then he went to Britain and said, "I will trade with you on a reciprocal basis on this understanding, that the preference is to be given not by reducing existing duties but by raising still higher the duties against other countries." He put duties up to a point where to begin with British goods could not get into this country to any considerable extent, and then said he would not lower these duties. How was Great Britain or how were other parts of the empire to make any arrangement with him in the face of an attitude of that kind?

Since his return from the trip which he took to England to combine health and business my right hon. friend has told us that he is going to get something important in the way of concessions through the wheat quota which is to be arranged. Whether or not this wheat quota will be of advantage to our country is something we can discuss only when we know on what basis it is to be arranged, what the percentages are to be, and so forth. I will not go into a discussion of the advantage or disadvantage of a quota arrangement, but what I want to ask at the moment is this: If there is any good in a quota, if it will be of any advantage to Canada, why did we not have it as a result of the last imperial conference instead of having to wait for the conference to come on July 18? Why did we not have the advantage of a quota at a time when Canada needed everything she could possibly get in order to improve her condition? The answer is this: my right hon. friend's method of approach. The British government were ready to consider the giving of a quota, they were prepared to take it up at the last conference just as they are prepared to take it up at this conference. But what did my right hon. friend say to them? I quote from the report of the proceedings of the conference. The remarks of my right hon. friend in referring to the quota were as follows:

> Projects other than the one I propose have been placed before you. They have been carefully canvassed by our delegation, and, while we would avoid anything which might savour of premature condemnation, we are constrained to state that none of them can be accepted by Canada as alternatives at all likely to achieve the purpose we have in mind.

If my right hon. friend is going to proceed in that manner when the imperial conference meets in Canada I cannot see that he will get any further than he did at the last conference. That is why I say he will have to—I hope his ministers and others who are supporting him will see that he does—come around to a changed point of view and a changed method of negotiation. May I repeat that I think he will have to change considerably his policies as well.

As I have said, my right hon. friend's method of beginning negotiations has been to put up the tariff against other parts of the empire. What method of approach has Great Britain adopted since she has come to have a tariff of her own? What is the present attitude of Great Britain towards Canada? She will come to this conference with a tariff of 10 per cent against most articles from other countries. What is the duty as against Canada? Nothing at all. We have the preference of free entry into her market. My right hon. friend says: The basis on which I ask each country to negotiate, the basis on which I am prepared to bargain, is reciprocal. I ask him if he is going to follow Great Britain's example and make his basis one of complete free trade with regard to the goods coming into Canada from Great Britain and other parts of the British Empire—that is, the reciprocal basis so far as the present attitude of Great Britain is concerned—or is he going to maintain his present position, his only concession being to increase still higher the duties against other countries? He is on the horns of a dilemma as long as he holds to that position or once he accepts the British position.

May I draw attention to the fact that in preparing for the last imperial conference the Liberal administration which was in office at the time did precisely the kind of thing in the matter of approach which Great Britain has done in anticipation of the coming conference. We did not put up tariff walls against Great Britain; we did not make demands that we would have our own way or nothing would be done. We lowered our tariff considerably. When we discovered that the nation to the south was not prepared to trade with us as fully and as freely as formerly we then took good care to arrange our tariff so that what we were losing in trade in that direction we would gain in trade with Great Britain. We transferred from the United States to Great Britain a purchasing power running into many millions of dollars. This was not any loss to Canada, it was a distinct gain to our country and a distinct gain to Great Britain as well. The attitude of approach was one of showing Great Britain by our actions that we were anxious to trade with her, realizing as we did that she had always given us absolutely free entry into her markets and an equal position in competition with her own people. We said: This will be our position as we approach the imperial conference. I venture to state that if the Liberal administration of that day had sent its representatives to that conference we would have come back from Great Britain with very substantial returns because of that particular attitude. The people of Canada will be anxious to get something out of this conference, and so I plead with my right hon. friend that he adopt—I will not say the attitude adopted by the Liberal party, but the attitude of making a gesture in advance which would assure Great Britain of our good will—the British attitude, if he prefers that term—the Liberal and the British attitude are synonymous—and make it perfectly clear by the action taken with respect to different parts of the empire that he wishes to have more in the way of freedom of trade between them.

I think I have made clear the position of the Liberal party in connection with this conference. We hope that the government will so arrange matters as to make possible much more in the way of freedom of trade between all parts of the British Empire. We believe in trading as much as possible within the empire. May I point out that the Liberal policy always has been since the days of Laurier and Fielding one of world trade plus British preference. That is the broad policy on which we stand. We do not believe in restricting trade solely to the British Empire; we believe in trading with any country that will trade with us. While our policy is one of world trade, the expansion of trade on a world scale, we intend to give a preference in our tariffs to those countries which form the British Empire.

May I point out the wisdom and necessity of a policy of that kind. It bears on one thing which my right hon. friend said when speaking recently in Toronto. He pointed out that Canada was the fifth largest trading country in the world—it came to that position under a Liberal administration. He pointed out also that Canada was exporting per capita more in the way of manufactured goods than any other country in the world except New Zealand.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BENNETT: Not manufactured goods, all goods.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will go one better and say that I believe that as regards manufactured goods Canada exports more per capita than any other country in the world. So far as our manufacturers are concerned they did not suffer under Liberal policies. If you are exporting per capita more manufactured goods than any other country, if the per capita trade of your country is the second largest in the world, what more for manufacturers can you ask from tariff considerations to help the advancement of trade? The fact that this country is in that position means that there is something like two million of our people who are dependent upon external trade. That is to say with those who are engaged in those industries which are exporting and with those who are dependent upon them, at least two million of the people of Canada depend upon what we can get out of foreign trade. Their market is the world and it is all-important that if possible matters should be so arranged that these people are enabled to hold the market they already have and to acquire new markets.

My right hon. friend has said that the tariff is an instrument to deal with industry, that what we need is fair competition and equal opportunity. I agree with him entirely as to the need for fair competition and equal opportunity; but the trouble is this, that when he speaks of fair competition and equal opportunity, he has in mind only one class in the country, namely, those who are engaged in the work of manufacturing. That is to say, if we are to judge him by his actions with respect to the tariff, he says: I will so arrange the tariff that the home market will be exclusively secured to the manufacturers here, and in doing that he puts up the tariff to a point at which he shuts out all possibility not only of competing trade but much of all trade. No country can have trade one way all the time. Sooner or later imports have to be paid for by exports and exports by imports. Otherwise you cannot trade; and when you shut off the possibility of trade between any two countries, you soon begin to lose for your manufacturers that very home market which in other ways you are trying so carefully to conserve for them. In other words, the home market so far as Canada is concerned is not a locality. The home market is purchasing power. The home market is the purchasing power that comes to the people of Canada from whatever source it may come. When you consider the great primary industries of agriculture, mining, lumbering, fishing, you at once see, so far as those industries are concerned, Canada's home market means very little relatively to those engaged in these industries; that their real market is the world market. They get back purchasing power and it is that purchasing power which creates the demand which is the home market of the manufacturers. If the tariff can be used as an instrument of national policy to help one class of industry, surely it can be made an instrument of national policy equally to help the great basic and primary industries. Why should it not be made an instrument of national policy to help agriculture, lumbering, mining, fishing, those great primary industries?

How can it be made an instrument of national policy to serve that end? First of all, by being so arranged as to make as cheap as possible all the instruments of production; in the second place, by lowering the cost of living on the necessaries of life so that our great labouring population will be in a position to get the real wages which they require for their sustenance and the maintenance of their standard of comfort, and that the primary industries will also have their instruments of production at as low a cost as possible. In that way the basic industries will have an opportunity of competing in the world market. After all, it is world prices that determine whether or not our exports are going to be marketable abroad, and if we want to have effective competition in world markets, we have to make the cost of production as low as we can for those industries that have the world as their market. It is essential, if my right hon. friend wants to develop industry in this country, that he change his policies to that end.

In connection with the imperial economic conference there is a real opportunity, because with respect to many of the necessaries of life, particularly those that have to do with clothing and the like, it should be possible to enable the great body of working men and women in this country to obtain what they require at a much lower cost than is the case to-day, without working injury to any industry that is being efficiently carried on in this country.

I shall not enter at greater length into the tariff question to-night, because it will come more suitably on a discussion on the budget, and then I hope there will be a special opportunity to discuss the whole of the economic conference. I wish just to repeat that so far as Liberal policy in the matter is concerned, we stand to-day with respect to the British preference where Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr Fielding stood in 1897 when they granted the preference to Britain for the first time. We stand where the Liberal party has stood every time it has given increased preference to Britain and other parts of the empire. We stand where we stood at the time we brought in our last budget, the one on which we went down to defeat. At that time we introduced in the House of Commons a budget designed specifically to make possible effective negotiations at a great economic conference, and we are and would be prepared, if we were in office at this moment, to restore the position to where it was when we went out of office at the last election in 1930. Therefore hon. gentlemen opposite will not find us standing in their way with respect to the success of any imperial conference; on the contrary, if they see their way to come somewhat to our point of view, which is, as I have already pointed out, the British point of view, in the matter of negotiations, they will receive from this side hearty cooperation in their efforts.

May I say that the question is much larger than one of trade. When one considers the basis of negotiation between different parts of the empire, I question very much if conducting negotiations in a spirit of petty or blustering bargaining is a good method of approach. A voluntary preference, voluntarily given, was the method adopted prior to the time this government came into office, a voluntary preference which, rather than binding or tying Canada's hands, leaves her free to do what she pleases with regard to her tariff in relation to other countries. If you start in a spirit of bargaining, and bargaining is your method, I am afraid it is going to be the beginning of very serious friction and disruption within the empire itself. When we realize how difficult it is to bargain between two parts of the empire, as we discovered at the last imperial conference, what is going to become of bargains that you try to make between seven different parliaments? I believe it is completely unworkable to approach an imperial conference on a bargaining basis. What the government will have to do is to decide what it is in the interests of Canada to do, to do that on a voluntary basis, and when the British delegates come here, to meet them very much along the lines that Britain by her attitude to-day is showing she is prepared to meet us. If we will approach Britain in the spirit in which she is approaching us, I do not say the result will be complete free trade within the British Empire, but it will mean freer trade and thereby very much more in the way of trade within the British Empire, and that is something to be devoutly desired, particularly at this time in the history of our country and of the world.

I shall pass on from the imperial conference to say a word with regard to that part of the speech from the throne which has reference to a description of conditions as they are existing or as they are supposed to exist. I can best describe that part of the speech as being in the nature partly of fact and partly of fiction. It is almost completely in the nature of generalizations, assertions and affirmations. How true these are, I am going to ask the house to judge for itself. Reading that part of the speech, I find first of all that it says:

> You enter upon your duties at a time of continuing and universal economic disturbance and distress. World conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people.

All of that is true, but it has not become true just to-day. It was true two years ago. It was true at the time the government of the day was appealing, and also when my right hon. friend was making his appeal, to the people. We who were in office at the time were very frank with the people of Canada. We told them distinctly there were world conditions that could not be met by any single government, by any policy, by any individual; that there was much that could be done to help to alleviate the situation, but that world conditions were being and would have to be taken into account in considering the problems with which we were faced. My right hon. friend seeks to-day to have us believe that his troubles arise for the most part from world conditions. While it is perfectly true that world conditions do in very considerable measure account for much of the hardship which at the moment, the people of Canada are experiencing, it is equally true that many of the problems which my right hon. friend and his government are grappling with to-day have been of his own creation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is true. He has helped to bring down on his own head much of the adverse situation with which he is faced at the present time.

Let me go back to the discussion in this house on the last budget which was introduced by the Liberal government of the day. Hon. gentlemen opposite in the house fought that budget to the utmost of their ability; they did the best they could to defeat it. They misrepresented its aims and purposes; on the public platform they went through the same procedure, ridiculing it and finally succeeding in defeating it—and with what result? The result was that at the imperial economic conference then pending they made a mess of what otherwise might have been a great success. As everyone in Canada well knows, that budget was designed to make the best of a difficult situation as it had developed in Canada because of world conditions. It was designed to secure immediately the goodwill of all parts of the British empire in matters of trade, and it would have succeeded to that end had it had a chance.

Let me go a step farther in showing wherein my right hon. friend has brought difficulties upon his own head. What did he do at the special session? Though it was called to deal with labour problems, he took that opportunity to make the most extreme changes in the tariff. In that one session he altered the whole tariff schedule, exercising no judgment, discretion or wisdom, but acted just as it suited his whim or caprice, and without the advice of any tariff board. He swept the former tariff board out of existence and made tariff changes which suited him for the moment. What has he been doing ever since? He has been continuously changing that tariff, with the result that nobody knows for more than twenty-four hours ahead what the tariff rate may be. As I have already pointed out, his negotiations at the imperial conference were most unsuccessful. There, again, he brought down on his own head some of the difficulties he is facing at the present time.

Before I leave the special session of parliament, may I again remind the house that it was called to deal with unemployment. As I said this afternoon the only measure he brought in in that connection was to ask this house for a vote of $20,000,000. He did not care to give or was unable to give any explanation as to how that amount was fixed. Although Canada had assisted with unemployment relief at different times during the ten or twelve preceding years, the total amount that had been spent from the federal treasury for that purpose, including a part of the post-war period of depression, was not $2,000,000. Yet my right hon. friend asked for $20,000,000. How much of it did he spend? Before the end of the fiscal year he had not spent $4,000,000, although he had made commitments for something like $17,000,000 or $18,000,000. Was that not adding to his troubles? Had he come to this parliament and pointed out to the people of Canada that during the previous ten years, including one or two years of great distress, all that it had been necessary to take from the federal treasury, in cooperation with the municipalities and provinces, to meet such situations did not total $2,000,000, and had asked for that amount or for $4,000,000, his problem to-day would not be what it is. When he asked for $20,000,000 what was the result? Not being able to use the money and to make the necessary commitments, a great deal of public money was spent for purposes for which there was no necessity whatever, spent during the spring and summer and at times when the money might have been saved and when those receiving the benefits from it might, at least in part, have been getting into some other kind of work.

What was the position the next session? Having asked for $20,000,000 at the special session my right hon. friend, finding conditions worse than ever, began to experience difficulty in fixing the amount for the last year. Facing that situation he found it necessary, in order to do what he thought would satisfy the unemployed, to ask not for $20,000,000, $40,000,000, $60,000,000, $80,000,000 or $100,000,000, but to ask this parliament to give a blank cheque which he might fill in for as much as he wished to draw. To-day, when men, women and children in this land are suffering through lack of food, does my right hon. friend not realize that their position is infinitely aggravated because they know he has in his possession a cheque in an amount of any sum he may wish to make it, in virtue of which funds to any amounts may be drawn from the public treasury? That is one of the reasons why many people to-day are in such an incensed frame of mind. They cannot understand his action. They say that the Prime Minister has the right to spend all he wishes; for parliament has given him that right. He asked for it and got it—"Why should we not receive it"?

May I remind my right hon. friend of the promises he made during the political campaign? Does he think none of his trouble has grown from his promises? He promised to end unemployment, and to do it immediately; he promised markets; he was going to blast his way into the markets of the world—he said that to the farmers. They have been looking for those markets ever since, and the unemployed have been looking for employment. My right hon. friend did not need to say those things. He did not need to promise he would end unemployment; he did not need to promise he would find markets everywhere; he did not need to promise a national highway; he did not need to promise grants to the different provinces for different purposes, including technical education and the like; he did not need to promise 100 per cent payment of old age pensions; he did not need to promise immediate completion of the St. Lawrence waterways development; he did not need to promise bridges and highways. But from one end of Canada to the other he scattered promises right and left. He said, "I will fulfil them all, or perish in the attempt." More than that, he said, "I will ask my own following from Quebec to vote me out of power; I will ask my own following from Nova Scotia to vote me out of power, if those things are not done. These things I will do," he said. There is another place where he made difficulty for himself.

I think I ought to quote again a few of his promises to-night. He told the people—and this is what has brought much of his trouble upon himself—that there were things that governments could do, that there were things which could be done by proper policies, that there were things which could be done by individuals. He said: The reason this has not been done is that the policies of my opponents have been wrong. They have had nine years of office, and have been labouring under wrong policies. That is the reason you have not work at the present time. Then he went on to inquire: What is the matter with the governments? Governments can do anything. For fear that his government might not be able to meet the situation he said let me into office and I will do everything: I will undertake to do it, and you will see that it will happen once the government is mine. I say such statements have contributed to the problems my right hon. friend now faces.

What has added more than anything else to his difficulty has been his mistaken policy with respect to the restriction of trade, the cutting off of all possibility of trade in many directions, making all trade uncertain and creating a situation where no one would venture to invest capital in industry. No one will venture to place orders for fear that inside of a very few hours he will learn there have been tariff changes, or that some ruling has been made which might affect business very seriously. All the departmental orders passed by my right hon. friend's government, the valuations he has placed upon different commodities, the method in which the anti-dumping provisions have been carried out —all these things have irritated and exasperated those engaged in industry, those engaged in commerce and business, to an indescribable degree. These are the things which more than anything else are causing the problems in Canada at the present time.

I said a minute ago that when my right hon. friend was making his appeal he blamed the policies of his predecessors. Let me read one or two statements he made in that regard, and when I read them I would ask hon. members to bear in mind the application of his words to his own policies. At Sarnia on July 17, 1930, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of July 18, my right hon. friend said:

> Canada was now in a "critical condition;" unemployment exists "on a scale which never before was known in the history of this country; all this by reason of the policies of the Ottawa government."

Speaking at Montreal on June 26th, 1930, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of June 27th, my right hon. friend said:

> Unemployment has become a national problem in Canada. It is the direct result of nine years of unsound economic policies applied by Liberals —under Premier King.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just wait a moment. I will not give you nine years of Conservative rule, I will give you the record for one and a half years.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't give us any.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Mail and Empire of January 20th, 1931, contains the following report of a speech by my right hon. friend on the preceding day:

> "Had it not been," said Mr. Bennett "that due to the policies of the preceding eight or nine years which left the country ill-prepared for depression of the present character, Canada would have met the ensuing crisis even better than she has."

That is what my right hon. friend said with regard to the record of the Liberal administration,—an administration which changed deficit into surpluses, which for eight years in succession reduced the public debt, reduced taxation, vastly increased trade, did not do any borrowing but met all expenditures, including capital expenditures, out of current revenues, and brought about a condition of prosperity such as the country had not known before.

Now, then, if policies are responsible for results, what is to be said of the policies which my right hon. friend has put into effect? What is to be said of a policy that inside of a year and a half made it necessary for this administration after borrowing $100,000,000 to borrow not $100,000,000 but over $200,000,000 more; that has created enormous deficits instead of surpluses, that has vastly increased the taxation of the people, that in very large measure has crippled the trade of the country and that has enormously increased the public debt? If you are going to judge policies by results there is the record of hon. gentlemen since they assumed office. But my right hon. friend said "There is something more important than policies, namely governments. Governments can do anything." Let us hear what he has to say on this score.

Speaking at Calgary on June 12th, 1930, according to the Calgary Herald of June 13th, he said:

> This is a new country and there is no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government does its duty.

I do not hear any applause from my hon. friends opposite.

An hon. MEMBER: You will.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us take his next utterance. Speaking at North Vancouver on June 17th, 1930, according to the Vancouver Province of the 18th, he said:

> Governments can regulate policies of the country so that facilities may be provided to give employment and not make it necessary for thousands to leave home and go elsewhere to get jobs to make a living.

At Victoria, according to the Colonist of June 17th, my right hon. friend said:

> Is there any excuse for Canada to have hard times if the government is discharging its duties as it should?

I ask my right hon. friend that question now, in his own words: Is there any excuse for Canada to have hard times if the government is discharging its duties as it should? I am sure that neither my right hon. friend nor any of his colleagues will say that we are not having hard times to-day. If they admit that, there is according to the Prime Minister no excuse for hard times if the government is doing its duty, what according to his own dictum then is to be said for my right hon. friend's government?

Speaking at Sarnia on July 16th, 1930—and these are the words that helped my right hon. friend to win the position of power that he occupies to-day—he was most emphatic:

> "Someone," he said, "is responsible for unemployment; not individuals, but governments; governments by their majorities in parliament are responsible for enacting all legislation."

There is condemnation not only of himself and his administration but of all his followers, for he says:

> Governments by their majorities in parliament are responsible—

So according to the words of the Prime Minister our hard times are due to the action of his government and his followers.

But my right hon. friend left no doubt in the minds of those who heard him that everything was going to be improved. Policies might not work and governments might not do everything, but there was one source that was infallible. From policies he goes to governments; he goes from governments to individuals—to himself. We shall come to that in a minute. Meanwhile what did my right hon. friend say the other day in speaking to a delegation of the Trades and Labour Congress that waited upon him? Did he say that policies or the government of the country could do everything? He said:

> Ten millions of people could have but slight effect upon the movement of world forces.

That is a very different note from what he sounded before he came into office. In seeking office, he told the country that policies and governments could do anything, and as I shall show later, that he himself could do anything. But what is he saying now: At Calgary on August 26, of this year the Montreal Gazette of August 28 refers to what was said of my right hon. friend as follows:

> Mr. Bennett blamed the present depression on speculation and an attempt to live higher than incomes warranted. It was the duty of every Canadian to do his share in effecting the return of normal conditions.

That was not what he said during the campaign. Speaking only the other day, this very year, in the city to a group of young people who carry his name, the Bennett Young Canada Club, my right hon. friend did not say that governments and policies could cure everything. He said:

> The basis of the present trouble is that people have been borrowing too much, living too extravagantly and speculating too much.

That is a very different note from that which he sounded throughout the campaign. Speaking at Toronto on December 18, 1931, before the Commercial Travellers Association, my right hon. friend said:

> In this country, as in other countries, the government cannot do everything. Your problems as a people were not brought upon you by governments, but by yourselves.

That must have given great consolation to the commercial travellers as they were going about the country seeking in vain for orders from an impoverished people.

> Your problems as a people were not brought upon you by governments, but by yourselves. People demanded things, and for these things the country is now paying.

It is true the country is paying, and paying at a pretty heavy rate. Then he added—I do not know whether as a touch of humour or not; it may be that he had in mind the imperial conference and desired to make the people of the old land feel happy:

> I know that people complain when additional or higher taxes are imposed; it is popular to grumble about taxes. But in England men earning as low as $500 a year are glad to pay their taxes so as to do their bit for Britain.

Those are fine sentiments. But are they true? Is there anybody who thinks that the people of Britain are any more delighted to pay taxes than are the people here? If so, human nature is very different in Britain from what it is in Canada.

Let us come now to what my right hon. friend said he himself would do. He got away from policies, away from governments and began telling the electorate what he himself would do. People are asking what my right hon. friend meant when he set forth his Magna Charta of promises, in which he promised something for everybody everywhere, and then said: These pledges I have made, and by them I stand or fall. That is what is troubling him to-day; instead of standing by them he and his government are falling by them and falling rapidly.

Speaking at Regina on June 10, 1930, my right hon. friend said:

> If the party I belong to on the 28th day of July is given authority to conduct the affairs of this country, at the first session of our parliament the government of which I am the head will pass laws that will give Canadians an equal opportunity with their competitors outside of Canada, or will go out of power.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Or will go out of power." At Yarmouth on July 2, 1930, as reported in the Halifax Herald of July 3, my right hon. friend said:

> At the first session of parliament the Conservative chieftain stated he would see to it that Canadians would be afforded fair competition or perish in the attempt.

At North Vancouver, on June 18, 1930 he said:

> After I am Prime Minister on July 28th, I will see that my promises are carried out, or the government will go out of power trying to do so.

People are wondering how the government remains in power, because they do not see that the promises are being fulfilled. Here are familiar words. This is what irritates the farmers.

> Listen, you agriculturists from the west and all the other parts of Canada, you have been taught to mock at tariffs and applaud free trade. Tell me, when did free trade fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you.

At Victoria on June 16th he said:

It is true we must have foreign markets, and as I said the other evening, we will blast a way to those markets on a world-wide basis with any exportable surpluses. We do not have to worry about that.

Then at Calgary, after promising markets to the western farmers, he said:

I told my audience in Winnipeg, and I tell you here and now, that condition I will not permit to continue in this country.

And again at Calgary, referring to access to the world's markets, he said:

These things we must do, Aye, these things I propose to do. That is the answer. These things, I propose to do.

Then at Vancouver on June 17, 1930, he said:

If Mr. Mackenzie King thinks I will not so build up our agricultural and industrial life that its strength will drive our products into the markets of the world, then he is wrong. For that I will do. If he thinks I will not establish new markets for these strive with all my heart to retain them, drive our products with all my power into new markets, into old markets, into reluctant markets, he is wrong. For that I will do.

That is settled—"For that I will do." Then here is one of the gems of the lot. Speaking at Vancouver on June 17, 1930, the present Prime Minister said:

So will I, when the government is mine, continue to blast a way through all our troubles and difficulties.

I think we will all admit that my right hon. friend is the government; that the government is his; but those last few words, "I will blast a way through all our troubles and difficulties" are causing him much of his present trouble.

That was the sort of promise he made to the farmers; but what did he say to labour? He guaranteed that there would be work for everyone. Listen to this, at Victoria, on June 16th. My right hon. friend said this was a new country and there was no excuse for unemployment. Then he said:

Is there any excuse for Canada to have hard times, if the government is discharging its duties as it should?

At Moncton on July 16th he said:

Mr. King promises consideration of the problem of unemployment. I promise to end unemployment. Which plan do you like best?

Again I ask: Is it any wonder that my right hon. friend is meeting with difficulties? Let us contrast the tone of my right hon. friend's remarks to-day; now that he is in office what does he say?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): That was all in your speech last year. Have you nothing new?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have something new, and I am going to give it to my hon. friend at once. I expected to get a rise out of hon. gentlemen opposite by mentioning these things. Now let me give my hon. friend something new. Here is what the Prime Minister said in addressing the United Church Missionary Congress on October 1 of last year; here we get a new note:

How could present difficulties be overcome? Premier Bennett proceeded. Some people looked to governments and said they must do it; others looked to churches and said they must do it; "But men and women," he continued, "it will be one way only—by you and me, ourselves, and by no one else. It is what the individual will do that will determine the issue."

Continuing, the Prime Minister stated that the grace of God had saved England in the eighteenth century. That is a very different note; but he went a step further:

"And," he declared, "I am firmly convinced that nothing but the grace of God will save this world. You may talk about your economic theories, the application of the gold standard, the demonitization of silver, balances of trade, exports and imports, but one thing only will save Christianity and that is the grace of God. That is my conviction."

I am not taking any exception to that statement.

An hon. MEMBER: You had better not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend afraid that the Prime Minister will get after me? What I am taking exception to is that when the Prime Minister was addressing the electorate, when he was seeking to get into power, he did not have something more to say about the grace of God and a little less to say about blasting his way into the markets of the world.

At Edmonton on August 25 last, addressing 1,200 Edmonton Conservatives at a reception, the Prime Minister said:

There will be work for all who desire it.

That is the same old story. A year and a half ago he said everyone would have work who wanted it; he repeated that statement at Edmonton a year later, but speaking in Ottawa as recently as December 13, 1931, in support of the Red Cross campaign, he said:

When men cannot find work to maintain themselves and their families, when expectant motherhood is denied proper care, when children are without food and clothing, and when the aged and disabled are penniless, our human instincts and sympathies must surely compel us to give them such help as may be within our power.

To adequately provide for these we have created a special national emergency fund maintained by voluntary contributions administered by an agency unhampered by governmental regulations or control.

I ask every citizen in Canada who is financially able so to do, and every organization in Canada, to contribute to this fund.

That is a very different story. First my right hon. friend said the government would do it, that he would do it, and then he asked every citizen in Canada to do it, something very different indeed.

What were the words of consolation to the unemployed contained in his New Year's message this year? Here they are:

Hard work and self reliance are the surest barriers against misfortune, and the firmest basis on which to build for good fortune.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hear someone say, "hear, hear".

Mr. RYCKMAN: I said it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That must be a lot of consolation to a man looking for work and unable to get it, and to those thousands to whom the Prime Minister referred when he said:

When men cannot find work to maintain themselves and their families; when expectant motherhood is denied proper care, when children are without food and clothing, and when the aged and disabled are penniless . . . .

In the face of this my hon. friend says, "hear, hear" to such a greeting.

But hard work and self reliance are the surest barriers against misfortune, and the firmest basis on which to build for good fortune.

My right hon. friend is telling the country to-day that he is seeking to redeem his promises, and he points to the way he has raised the tariff and, as some of his followers did to-day, to the millions of dollars he is expending from the public treasury. But may I point out to him and to others that those were not his promises, that he would raise the tariff, that he would spend millions of dollars of public money for unemployment relief, and so on. The promises were that he would end unemployment, and that he would find markets; these other things the tariffs and the expenditures, were the means to that end. We told the people at that time that those means would never meet the situation, that far from meeting it they would tend in the opposite direction, but to-day my right hon. friend is in the position that his promises cannot be redeemed, and he must see that the means he has taken to effect the end he had in view have utterly failed and made the last condition infinitely worse than the first. That is all I have to say at the moment of his seeking refuge under the cloak of world conditions from his failure to fulfil the promises in virtue of which he was returned to power. I repeat that what I have read of his own utterances show that in the main he has created the greatest difficulties for himself.

The speech from the throne goes on:

But I rejoice that their resolute adherence to policies designed for the welfare of the nation has minimized the adverse influence of external economic forces.

The policies the government have put into force have minimized difficulties? Ask the large retail and wholesale establishments; ask the distributing houses from one end of Canada to the other whether the policies of the present administration have made things less difficult or more difficult for them. You will not be very long in getting the answer. One business house after another, and many an industrial concern, has already been put out of business through the policies of my right hon. friend and the way in which they have been administered. Here I might just recall what the Prime Minister said during the campaign about the importance of stability in tariffs:

We pledge ourselves to the stabilization of economic conditions and to continuity of trade and freedom from the manipulation of home and foreign markets.

Will he say that pledge has been kept? Will he say we have such a thing as stability of tariffs in this country at the present time? What else did he say? Speaking at Renfrew on July 16, and having regard to the condition of the country, he said:

We have the capital but capital will not allow itself to be used unless there is stability and certainty.

What about the position to-day? Is not that one of the main reasons why capital is not being invested? There is no stability; there is no certainty. First of all tariffs have been raised up to certain levels and then by order in council, valuations, application of anti-dumping duties and the like have been changed from year to year, from month to month; and, in some cases, from day to day. And my right hon. friend, speaking in Toronto only a few days ago, said that the government would go on changing them by order in council as often as they liked.

May I say that the financial and industrial structure of a country is a very sensitive organization; it might be compared to the nervous system of the individual, which is a very delicate structure. If one part is affected it is apt to affect the whole. It is exactly the same with regard to these matters that affect the financial, industrial and commercial structure of a country. The tariff is an instrument that has to be used very skilfully and carefully, if the whole fiscal, financial and commercial structure of the country is not to be affected. It is an instrument which might be compared to the scalpel of a surgeon, which must be used with great dexterity and skill if the needed change of condition is to be brought about. But what has my right hon. friend done?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wonder that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) laughs. He does not understand it; it cannot enter into his mind—

Mr. RYCKMAN: A medical gentleman behind me was saying that he would like to have his scalpel on your head. That is why I laughed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister, instead of regarding the tariff as a delicate instrument of the kind, has used it as though it were, as someone suggests, a broadaxe—I was going to say a broadsword or a cutlass—after the fashion of a swashbuckling buccaneer in the spacious days of Elizabeth. That is the way in which my right hon. friend handles the tariff; he swings right and left in any direction regardless of where he strikes. Is there any wonder that, with conditions as they are at the present time, the country is in a state well nigh of panic?

There were days when hon. gentlemen opposite used to talk about an adequate tariff, a stable tariff. It seems to me that the present tariff can be best described as a spasmodic tariff, a sort of intermittent fever tariff, for it varies from day to day. Let me say to my right hon. friend that there are a good many business men in the country today who think they are entitled to a right of action against the government. They feel that the way in which the government has used the anti-dumping provisions, the way it has fixed valuations without any authority by act of parliament, resulting in loss to their businesses, is in what it has exacted in duty payments nothing short of confiscation of capital. I suggest to my right hon. friend that he give a fiat to some of those concerns that would like to ascertain what remedy they have in court against the action of his government. I submit that in all seriousness. Unless he wishes to deny simple justice to the business concerns of the country, I suggest that he take that course.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Let me proceed. The speech from the throne says:

> This period of trial has shown the Canadian situation to be fundamentally sound.

This is true, thanks, not to this government, but to a long-suffering people.

> The over-subscription of the national service loan manifests both the unity and patriotism of the people, and their supreme confidence in the financial strength of the Dominion. Canada still maintains its high place in world commerce.

Here is another sentence that is interesting:

> Within the last few months, a favourable balance of trade has been established.

That is a simple statement, but the implication is that some great end has been achieved through the establishment of a favourable balance of trade. May I point out that my right hon. friend has not always held the view that a favourable balance of trade of itself determines progress. Speaking in this house on May 18, 1926, he said, in reference to the budget introduced by the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Robb:

> The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), reflecting his mind, point out that there was a balance of trade in our favour during the past year of $402,000,000. I had thought that the practice of computing a country's prosperity solely by reference to the trade balance had been altogether abandoned.

That was his view then. Now apparently he regards a favourable balance of trade as the all-important objective of government, regardless altogether of circumstances. I do not wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite would like to attach much importance to favourable balances of trade seeing that under the recent Liberal administration they were synonymous with progress. During the days of great prosperity under the Liberal administration there were many instances of favourable balances of trade. There have been few favourable balances under any Conservative administration. Let me give to the house a few particulars with respect to favourable balances of trade so-called. The Conservative party came into power in 1878, when the national policy was introduced, and remained in office until 1896, a period of eighteen years. During that time, under the administration of Sir John A. Macdonald, the national policy was administered for the most part by a master hand. How many favourable balances were there in Canada in that period? In those eighteen years there were five trade balances that were favourable and thirteen that were unfavourable. The total favourable balances amounted to $19,126,193. There was one other instance of a favourable balance of trade under a Tory administration and that was in 1921-22, when there was a favourable balance of $6,122,677. There you have, roughly, six favourable balances, in the period during which a Conservative administration was in office, leaving aside the hectic years of the war and the two post-war years, whereas the unfavourable balances amounted in all to $55,000,000. Take the Liberal administration—and let us take the recent Liberal administration for the moment. It came into office in December, 1921, and was in power for eight and a half years; eight full fiscal years, from 1922-23 to 1929-30. In seven of those eight years there were favourable balances of trade, one having been unfavourable. The total favourable balances in that period amounted to $1,495,452,723. If you subtract the unfavourable balance in the year 1929-30, which was one of the years we were in office, amounting to $103,355,512, you have a net favourable balance over the period from 1922-23 to 1929-30 of $1,392,097,211, or an average favourable balance during this period of $167,000,000. In other words, in each of those years there was a favourable balance of more than three times the aggregate favourable balance under the Tory party during the entire period they have occupied the treasury benches since confederation. In two years the combined favourable balance alone was more than equal to the entire export of Canada during the period that the present government has been in office from October 1, 1930, to September 30, 1931. Leaving aside the war and the post-war period, 1914 to 1919-20, you have fifteen years of favourable balances under Liberal administration as against six years under Conservative governments.

If balances of trade are going to be the index by which to gauge the effects of different policies, then it would appear that the Liberal policies have been a good thing for the country. But may I say that when we wish to estimate the value of a balance of trade as an index to prosperity there are other factors to be taken into consideration. My right hon. friend well knows, because he has said it on different occasions, that there is the money that is brought into the country by tourists, as well as the money that goes out through settlers to other lands; there is also money in the form of investment or capital brought into the country. All these and other things have to be taken into account when you are estimating the significance of a favourable or unfavourable balance of trade. Adjustments have to be made back and forth between countries. Assume for the moment that favourable balances of trade were the only evidence of prosperity: would it be possible for all countries to have favourable balances of trade at the same time? The favourable balance test reduces itself to an absurdity when one considers international relations as a whole and the manner in which credits are adjusted from time to time.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), speaking at the meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers Association on October 22, stated that eighty per cent of our trade was domestic and twenty per cent foreign. From that point he went on to declare that a one per cent increase in our internal trade would total $50,000,000, while a one per cent increase in our external trade would total only $12,000,000, from which he deduced that it was important to increase the domestic trade. What he really did was to make the discovery that one per cent of a larger sum was a larger amount than one per cent of a smaller sum. What he should have done was to point out that when foreign trade falls off, domestic trade falls off as well; that you cannot have trade going all one way, that exports have to pay for imports and imports for exports. Since this administration came into office what has happened? The exports for the twelve months ended September, 1930, amounted to $982,000,000, while for the twelve months ended September, 1931, they had dropped to $661,000,000. According to the Conservative doctrine there should have been a boom in the country at that time because $300,000,000 of manufactured goods had been shut out and the home market should have been bettered to that extent. Can anyone say that that was the result? We stopped importing and we expected our ports to flourish. We were hoping for less in the way of movement by sea but we were expecting more in the way of transportation by land. The truth of the matter is that trade has to be kept up both ways if there is to be trade at all. If the carloadings or any other test is taken it will be found that the truth of what I have said is borne out. A policy which restricts trade will hurt business in all directions; a policy which helps to expand trade will help business in all directions.

I shall not take up at greater length the question of the balance of trade, except to mention that my right hon. friend has said that the country which is borrowing should have a favourable balance of trade. As a matter of fact the whole history of recent economic development on this continent is to the contrary. Up to 1873 the United States was making a very rapid development; during all that time they were borrowing large sums of money from Europe but in every year up to 1873 they had an unfavourable balance of trade. The reason is not far to seek. The States were making investments in Europe; securities were being sold; it was a favourable opportunity because of exchange for the purchasing of merchandise, and merchandise and capital flowed into the United States. The same thing is true of this country since confederation. Will anyone say that during the years of unfavourable balances of trade when Sir John A. Macdonald's administration was in power we had bad times continuously in Canada? Take the years from 1904 to 1911 under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier; I do not think that up to that time there had been a period of like prosperity. And yet during that period there were unfavourable balances of trade. Canada was borrowing largely and was importing large amounts of merchandise. The very prosperity of the country at the time helped to account for the condition of trade. The essential point is this: If a favourable balance of trade is brought about by the expansion of trade then there may be something to boast about in a favourable balance; but if it is brought about by the restriction and contraction of trade then there is nothing to boast about. That is the difference in the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves. They make a sort of fetish of "a favourable balance of trade." They focus their attention on bringing about a favourable balance of trade, but they bring it about by restricting trade, by doing whatever is to be done in the interests of one class, the manufacturing class, in order to retain the home market for its members. They forget about the primary industries, the great basic industries such as agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, and the result is that not only do these great primary industries suffer but the very manufacturing industry which they are trying to help is forced to suffer.

Take the period during the Liberal administration when we were face to face with a situation very similar to that faced by this country at the present time. Our currency was below par in another country, there was considerable depression. The government of the day took this position: We will first balance the budget, then we will reduce the duties on the instruments of production and on some of the articles which enter into the necessaries of life; we will increase the preference and we will do what we can to expand trade. Having adopted those policies we had seven successive years not only of favourable balances of trade but of the largest trade which this country has ever known.

The next sentence in the speech from the throne reads as follows:

> The provisions made at the last session of parliament for unemployment and farm relief are proving effective.

That is one statement with which I wish to take issue. If by proving effective my right hon. friend means that the unemployment condition is improving, then I dispute that statement and I do not think I need enter into any argument concerning it. I will take with it the following sentence:

> You are successfully meeting difficult domestic problems. Conditions are gradually improving.

Let me give the facts which my right hon. friend must have known when he penned those sentences for the speech from the throne. What was the position in 1930? In 1930 the government found it necessary to borrow $100,000,000. What happened this year? They borrowed not $100,000,000 but floated a Dominion national service loan of $223,000,000. That does not look as though conditions were getting better. The first loan was borrowed in New York at four per cent while this last loan pays five per cent. Yet in the speech from the throne the Prime Minister says that conditions are getting better.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The right hon. gentleman is wrong about the four per cent, but I do not think it matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the percentage?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think it was 4·38 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will find that it was four per cent, but I will take his correction. Taking the percentage on that as 4·38, we find that the loan of this year returns 5·25 per cent.

In order that the country may obtain some appreciation of what this sum of money amounts to, may I point out that the total government expenditure in any one year during the time Sir John A. Macdonald was in office never exceeded $62,000,000. During the time Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power the government expenditure in any one year never exceeded $133,000,000. This year this country has had to borrow $223,000,000. My right hon. friend says that conditions are improving. The deficit for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1931, amounted to $83,847,977. What is the estimated deficit for the present year? Only the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) knows, but I think I would be within the mark if I guessed somewhere between $125,000,000 and $140,000,000; this as compared with the $83,000,000 for last year.

Imports	969,663,000	729,869,000	451,355,000
Exports—
Canadian	890,466,000	656,204,000	461,797,000
Foreign	19,261,000	14,046,000	8,667,000
Total trade	1,879,390,000	1,400,119,000	921,819,000

As compared with 1930, the decline for the fiscal year to December 31, 1931, is:

In imports	$278,514,000
In exports—
Canadian	194,407,000
Foreign	5,379,000
In total trade	$478,300,000

Under these circumstances how can it be said that conditions are improving?

Let us next consider the matter of trade. In this connection I will give the figures for 1929, 1930 and 1931. They are as follows:

As compared with 1929, the decline is even more staggering. Let us take the trade of just the month of December in 1929, 1930 and 1931, to see whether conditions are improving. The figures are as follows:

	Dec. 1929	Dec. 1930	Dec. 1931
Imports	$84,365,000	$60,338,000	$40,289,000
Exports—
Canadian	88,520,000	66,819,000	53,255,000
Foreign	1,958,000	1,233,000	962,000
Total trade	$174,842,000	$128,390,000	$94,506,000

My right hon. friend says that conditions are improving. Let us take employment. What is the position with regard to employment? At the beginning of January, 1932, it showed a distinctly pronounced decline. The Bureau of Statistics have tabulated returns from 7,832 firms showing the following decline in their pay-rolls:

	Persons
December 1, 1931	904,492
January 1, 1932	835,960

That is a decrease of 68,532, or 7.6 per cent, in the period between December 1 and January 1, although my right hon. friend says that conditions are improving.

Let us take employment during the last months of the Liberal administration. The index figures for all industries are as follows:

January 1, 1930	111.2
August 1, 1930	118.8

What was the Conservative record?

January 1, 1931	101.7
January 1, 1932	91.6

The ironical feature of the whole thing is that the greatest losses occurred in manufacturing, the index being lower than in any other year since 1925. The figures are as follows:

August 1, 1930	101.2

That is while the Liberals were still in power.

January 1, 1931	93.7
January, 1, 1932	83.9

The most extensive reductions were in the manufacturing of iron and steel and textiles. Yet my right hon. friend says in the speech from the throne that the measures which the government had passed are proving effective and conditions are improving. Let me read what my right hon. friend said in the house on September 10, 1930, at the time of the special session. He was then speaking of the measures which he was going to introduce and which were going to improve conditions. As reported on page 64 of Hansard of that date, he said:

> It will be observed that the present number—
> Speaking of unemployment.
> —is something over 117,000 and it is believed that that number will approximate 177,000 during the winter. If the measures which we submit to the house are productive of the good which we anticipate, we hope that that number will steadily decrease rather than increase, and that the maximum anticipated number of 177,000 will not be reached.

A very short time ago the former Minister of Labour, Senator Robertson, gave a statement with regard to the number of unemployed. My right hon. friend said: We think the numbers are going to decrease from 177,000. What was the report that Senator Robertson made about September 5 of last year? He said: At the present time there are 530,000 without jobs. It should be mentioned that of that number possibly 150,000 would include agriculturists in the west, but if we deduct the 150,000, you have still nearly 400,000 out of employment, whereas my right hon. friend says that the measures that they were introducing, if effective, should bring the numbers down below 177,000. It would be insulting the intelligence of the Canadian people if one were to try to argue the question whether or not conditions have been improved. Everyone in this country knows what the conditions are, and the situation is not made easier or pleasanter for anyone by words of the kind I have read being put upon the lips of His Excellency the Governor General in the speech from the throne.

There are just two other matters to which I wish to refer, and then I shall conclude. Reference is made in the speech from the throne to the St. Lawrence waterway. It reads:

> Since the last session of parliament my ministers have commenced negotiations with the government of the United States of America for the completion of the St. Lawrence waterway.

That paragraph in the speech from the throne may mean very much or it may mean very little. We shall have to wait until the government makes a pronouncement to ascertain what it does mean. I just wish to draw the attention of the house to what it says:

> Since the last session of parliament my ministers have commenced negotiations.

That is as far as it goes. It does not say that anything has been accomplished. It simply says that the ministers have commenced negotiations—and uses the words—"for the completion of the St. Lawrence waterway." This would indicate that the waterway had been considerably constructed already, and that what the government is about to do is to complete the whole construction. The significant words, however, are that negotiations have been commenced. The other day I asked my right hon. friend if any communications had passed between Ottawa and Washington, and he said no. I asked if any order in council of any kind had been passed, and he said there was none. If that be the position of affairs, we may conclude that negotiations have not gone very far; that so far what has taken place have been conversations between the Canadian minister at Washington and the United States minister here, or between the respective ministers and the governments of the two countries, and that those conversations have undoubtedly brought to the attention of the administrations the many factors that have to be considered. But so far, the information which the government has given to us on the subject amounts to no more than that there have been conversations. The St. Lawrence waterway stands very much where it was when we went out of office, with the exception of the conversations.

There is one thing which I should like to ask my right hon. friend, and it is this: I attach to it great importance. If, as we are led to believe, not so much by the speech as by what has appeared in the press recently, the negotiations are looking to a treaty at an early date between the United States and Canada, will he undertake to see that the house is apprised of the proposed terms of the treaty before any treaty is formally entered into between the United States and Canada on the St. Lawrence waterway. I think I am justified not merely in making the request that he should agree to that, but in saying that such is the policy which ought to govern in a great transaction of that kind. It will serve no useful end, either to the project itself or to good relations between this country and the United States to have before the fullest discussion a treaty brought into the house that has been signed by the administration of the day and the House of Commons told that that treaty must be passed or that we shall be defaulting in our international relations. In a matter as momentous as this, the House of Commons should be given all the information that can possibly be given as to the terms of a proposed treaty before the treaty itself is signed. I think the government should be authorized by resolution of the House of Commons to sign a treaty on lines to be indicated before any signature should be permitted to be placed to it. That was the position which the Liberal party, when we were in office, took with respect to this very matter of the St. Lawrence waterway, namely, that before the house was committed to any treaty, we would see that a resolution of the house would pass authorizing the administration of the day to sign a treaty. I say to my right hon. friend that the people of Canada will expect that much will be the course which he and his government will adopt.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Was that the course the right hon. gentleman adopted in connection with the last treaty he made with the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the course the Liberal government said it would adopt in regard to a treaty respecting the St. Lawrence waterway, should one be entered into.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did the right hon. gentleman adopt that course in connection with the last treaty he made with the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not in mind what the last treaty was, but I have in mind very distinctly the question of the St. Lawrence waterway treaty which is a very important matter, very much more important than any treaty in connection with the scenic beauty of the neighborhood in which my hon. friend lives.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It was a treaty regarding water power, which was a very important matter, quite as important as Beauharnois.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I direct attention to the next clause which appears in the speech from the throne:

> A commission has been appointed to inquire into the whole problem of transportation in Canada. My ministers expect that the report of the commission will be ready for submission to parliament during the present session.

There, again, is a paragraph in the speech from the throne which may mean very much or very little. I should like however to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that it is rather significant at a time when the government has chosen to announce to the house its intention to complete the St. Lawrence waterway that they have appointed a commission to inquire into the whole question of transportation. One would have thought this order of things would be the reverse and that the government would have waited until the transportation commission had made its report on all phases of transportation, on the effect of waterways upon transportation, on the effect of motor traffic and aerial navigation. I assume all these matters are being considered by the commission now functioning.

In regard to transportation all we have before us at the moment is that the administration intends to have a report presented to this parliament on that subject. I notice my right hon. friend, speaking at Toronto the other day, said the appointment of the commission was the result of a recommendation of the select committee of this house on railways and shipping. I wish to tell him that he was in fact quite mistaken. The select committee on railways and shipping did not recommend the appointment of a transportation commission. That committee passed on for the consideration of the government a suggestion originally made by Sir Henry Thornton that such an inquiry might be advantageous. May I again comment on the skill with which my right hon. friend seeks to deprive parliament of an opportunity to discuss matters of public interest and public concern. If it was his intention to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the matter of transportation why did he not advise parliament before the last prorogation. Before we left this house last August, he had the report of the committee on railways and shipping which, he says, is the basis of his action. Why was the house not told that as a result of that report the government were going to appoint a royal commission? Why was there not placed in the supplementary estimates a sum of money for the purpose of making provision for the work of this commission? I think I am right when I say this parliament has not appropriated one dollar for any transportation commission, yet we know for the past few months such a commission has been at work across Canada from coast to coast. As I said earlier to-day action of the kind constitutes an ignoring of the rights and privileges of this house. We should not be called upon to vote sums of money for any purpose after the work has been performed, if it is possible to have those sums voted in advance. We should have an opportunity to discuss the reasons for appointment of bodies of this kind and what is to govern their actions when they are appointed.

Concerning the transportation commission I have taken exception to the fact that its deliberations have been conducted in secret. I notice my right hon. friend was very indignant that I should venture to criticize such secrecy. He said when the Liberal administration was in office questions were asked and information refused time and again; that he had been told information could not be given; that it was not desirable to make a statement which might be helpful to competitors. That is perfectly true. The fact however that here and there certain information was thought to be of a character which had much better be communicated privately, rather than publicly, to hon. members of the house did not interfere with this parliament having the freest latitude to discuss all phases of the transportation question.

My right hon. friend forgets—no, he does not forget, because he knows very well—the fact that the whole business of these transportation companies is discussed publicly in the committee on railways and shipping. These companies are before committees of this house and hon. members have the right to ask any questions they desire. There it is customary, where certain matters are of a private nature or should be so regarded, to have the information reserved, so far as the public is concerned, for a time at least. That procedure however is the exception and not the rule.

I take exception to the fact that my right hon. friend has permitted this commission, appointed and paid for out of public moneys, dealing with great national public utilities, to carry on its inquiries from one end of Canada to the other, wholly in secret. The people of Canada have a right to know the information being given to the commission, and ought to be in a position to judge of its value. I shall not go into the question of what is or is not wise with respect to the Canadian National railways, the Canadian Pacific railway or any phase of the transportation question until the report of the commission is before the house. I think that the matter is to a certain extent sub judice, and for that reason we will wait until the report is brought down before we discuss the matter one way or the other.

I should like, however, to stress to the Prime Minister that we would like to have the report presented to parliament in plenty of time to consider the evidence and findings before being expected to discuss legislation based upon its recommendations, or otherwise. We do not wish to be kept waiting until the end of the session and then to have a report sprung upon this house and be told that conditions as shown in the report are such that immediate legislation or some action of a more drastic or dramatic character is necessary in order to save the country from a crisis, or something of the kind. We wish to have an opportunity fully to discuss the report, seeing any data there may be in the report, and having the benefit of the information from which the commissioners have arrived at their conclusion.

May I, in bringing my remarks to a close, draw attention to my right hon. friend's reference to my innocent comment which was in the nature of a criticism made in the public interest concerning this feature of secrecy in the deliberations of the transportation commission. I felt it a public duty to make clear what a very large percentage of the press of this country has been making clear, namely that it was in the public interest to have proceedings of this body made public, and I said so without fear or favour in any direction. My right hon. friend however came to the conclusion that this was a chance to score in his own peculiar fashion, and apparently with that in mind, addressing a body of Conservatives in Toronto recently he went out of his way, it seems to me, to create personal prejudice against myself.

I have in my hand a report contained in the Mail and Empire of January 20, 1932 of a meeting which was held at the Royal York hotel at which about 1,200 Toronto Conservatives were present. Among the enlarged headings I see the following:

Ringing note of faith in banks and insurance fabric features speech.

Stigmatizes Mackenzie King as demagogue.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says "hear, hear"—at least I think it was he.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was an hon. member.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: However, the "hear, hear" came from the benches opposite, and I am pleased it came from there. I should like to read the quotation and then examine the significance of the epithet which has been applied and where it may most appropriately apply. The article continues:

Before an enthusiastic audience of 1,200 Toronto Conservatives in the Royal York Hotel, as well as unnumbered radio listeners throughout Ontario and parts of Quebec and Manitoba, the Prime Minister, in his finest oratorical form, coupled this stirring declaration of hope with a searing attack on Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and others who charge the Duff transportation commission with unwarranted secrecy in its procedure.

Talk of Demagogue

The Liberal leader's speech at Winnipeg denouncing the conduct of the inquiry was, to the prime minister, "the talk of a demagogue rather than a statesman, of one who prefers temporary cheers beyond the plaudits of history." A thunderous crescendo of applause swept the big banquet hall at this declaration.

Well, if there is one thing that Toronto Tories love it is a demagogue, and it is not to be wondered at that the mention of the word itself was sufficient to bring from them this crescendo of applause. I was anxious to know what my right hon. friend had in mind when he was referring to me as a demagogue, so I took the trouble to look up in one or two standard dictionaries the significance of the word. Demagogue, I found, has, according to all the authorities consulted, two significations, one ancient, the other modern; one more or less pleasing, the other sinister. I must confess, having regard to the nature of my remarks, that I am at a loss at even this moment to tell which meaning my right hon. friend really had in mind. I have seen some utterances of his at times which I have thought might merit the sinister meaning of the term he applied to me. I am quite prepared to leave it to the house and to the country to judge between our respective merits in that particular matter.

The Imperial dictionary gives this derivation of the word demagogue:

Demos, the people, and agagos, a leader, from 'ago' to lead.

Then it gives these definitions:

1. A leader of the people; a person who sways the people by his oratory.
2. An unprincipled factious orator; one who acquires influence with the populace by pandering to their prejudices or playing on their ignorance.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I do not know that in my remarks about secrecy I was pandering to any prejudices or playing upon any ignorance. So it must have been the first of these definitions that my right hon. friend had in mind.

The next authority I consulted was Murray's New English dictionary, where I find the following:

Demagogue: a popular leader, a leader of the mob.

1. In ancient times, a leader of the people; a popular leader or orator who espoused the cause of the people against any other party in the state.

Well, I am quite prepared to accept that designation as applicable; but there is another definition given by Murray:

2. In bad sense: a leader of a popular faction, or of a mob; a political agitator who appeals to the passions and prejudices of the mob in order to obtain power or further his own interests.

To be perfectly sure that this was a correct interpretation I looked up yet another dictionary, Webster's New International dictionary, 1928, and I found very much the same definition:

1. A leader or orator popular with, or identified with the people.
2. One who plays an insincere role in public life for the sake of gaining political influence or office; a poser in politics.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman evidently recognizes the bearing. Let me give the remainder of the second definition:

—one who panders to popular prejudice or seeks to inflame reasonless passions in the advancement of his personal interests.

Well, when I read the last definition, I thought, like hon. gentlemen opposite, of some of the things which the Prime Minister, their own leader, had said during the course of the recent campaign, and I decided to look them up again to see whether they did not fit exactly into the class of utterances referred to in that definition.

How did my right hon. friend the present Prime Minister begin his campaign? Speaking of the personnel of the late government in his opening meeting at Winnipeg, this is what he said:

This group of mercenaries, holding office by sham and subterfuge, look upon them as treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation.

Speaking in the city of Regina on June 10, according to the Leader Post of June 11, my right hon. friend said:

They play with the lives of men and women. What for? Do they realize there are lives that they are playing with, food for wives and children, hunger? Nine years of wasted effort before the great betrayal. It did not take Judas that long.

It did not take Judas that long! And that is the right hon. gentleman who as we have seen to-day, is so sensitive when anyone expresses anything in the way of adverse comment with respect to himself.

At Regina on June 10 we get a note that we have become more familiar with of late; a certain evangelical tone! He said:

There is a good time coming. We may not live to see it, but there is a good time coming. I came to call the sinners, not the righteous.

There must have been a rush for the platform at that moment.

At Vancouver on June 18, he said, and, mark you, this is the way in which my right hon. friend gained the position which he occupies to-day:

However blind he may be to your future—

He is referring to myself.

—and deaf to your present needs, surely he cannot stop his ears with smug complacence and self-esteem to the cry that carries across the nation—the cry of the destitute and hungry, the cry of mothers and fathers and little children who call to us as Christians and as Canadians to heal their pain.

Of a meeting at Regina, again on June 10, I find this report in the Toronto Globe of the following day:

Mr. Bennett spoke of the sense of responsibility which seized him in the position he now occupied. Canada was blessed with great natural resources, he proceeded, but yet we find something which saddens my heart to-day. I meet men wearing the white buttons and all they ask for is the chance to work. Think what it is to have a wife and children and all you men ask is a chance for employment.

Then at Victoria, according to the Colonist of June 17th, my right hon. friend said:

You have my promise that if the Conservative party is returned to power that as soon after July 28 as possible parliament will be called together to deal with the problem of unemployment by providing, not doles, but work. Men and women of this country want work, not charity.

Then again at Halifax, on July 3, he said, according to the Halifax Herald of July 4:

If the Conservative party comes into power on July 28th I propose at the earliest moment to call parliament together so that we may find a speedy remedy for this situation and decide on means to provide work for Canadians. Work, I said, not doles. The Canadian workmen want work, not charity.

Then may I conclude with this last gem:

So will I, when the government is mine, continue to blast a way through all our troubles and difficulties.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to leave it to the house and to the country to say which of the two descriptions of a demagogue is the more appropriate to this one who sought to gain office by these particular phrases.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my first duty, and a pleasant one it is, is to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois), who discharged his duty with such ability, gave prompt and adequate evidence of his scholarship and his legal training, as did indeed the seconder of the address, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt).

I was somewhat surprised that the right hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mackenzie King) should have spoken in the terms he did regarding the time at which the address was taken up for consideration. He asserted that it would have been more courteous to His Excellency the Governor General if the motion which was adopted by the house this afternoon had been made after and not prior to this motion being considered.

In this house I have never done more than make a bald denial with respect to matters touching myself personally. The offender in this particular case has said many things which we will not discuss, but the matter that was under consideration was not one touching me personally; it was one in which the Prime Minister of this country was charged with having stolen from the public purse. It was so charged by a member of His Majesty's privy council, and my right hon. friend has often spoken of the desirability of maintaining the dignity of that privy council at a high level. My right hon. friend himself is a member of that council, and at any time might be called upon by His Excellency for advice. That being so, and the charge being levelled not against me personally but against the office which I hold, I felt that it was not fitting or meet that anyone occupying that office should ask this house to consider the address at least until such time as a committee was appointed to determine whether or not the charges so made were well founded. For, sir, one thing is certain, and that is that no man, whoever he may be, is fit to be Prime Minister of this country who is guilty of the offence charged against me in this instance. I offer no apology for taking the course I have taken and which I think any high minded Canadian must have taken with respect to a charge levelled not against him personally but against his office, involving his fitness, as a matter of public honesty, to discharge the high duties of that office, especially when the charge is made by a member of the privy council.

When the right hon. gentleman saw fit to endeavour to criticize the position taken by myself with respect to the crown and the representatives of the crown, I think it would have come with better grace had some other person made that observation. For I recall—and I have in my hand a document that was kept without being made public in June, 1926—a great campaign in one of the provinces waged on the ground that Downing street was dominating Canada, and the only suggestion that Downing street should be consulted with respect to the matter then to be decided was made by the then Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition, who asked Lord Byng to be pleased to have his resignation withheld pending the time it might be necessary for His Excellency to communicate with the Secretary of State for the Dominions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All I ask is that any document from which my right hon. friend quotes shall be laid on the table of the house in the usual way.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the document is taken from the sessional papers of this house; I sent down and got it, anticipating that very objection. So the solicitude for the crown, in which the right hon. gentleman has been so considerate to-night, is one of the new-born faiths that come when one finds himself in opposition and not in power. My right hon. friend was willing to have the representative of the crown in this country attacked from platforms throughout Canada on the ground that Downing street was being permitted to govern Canada—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is talking about something about which he knows nothing whatever, and is saying things that are absolutely incorrect.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not the only instance to which I shall point, not only with regard to inconsistency but worse, before I conclude. I want the right hon. gentleman to understand, when he makes the observations he has made, that I am reading from sessional paper 91 of Monday, February 14, 1927, and the closing paragraph of that letter—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read the whole letter—

Mr. BENNETT: The closing paragraph of the letter, which is signed by W. L. Mackenzie King, reads as follows:

> If there is anything which, having regard to my responsibilities as Prime Minister, I can even yet do to avert such a deplorable and, possibly, far-reaching crisis, I shall be glad so to do, and shall be pleased to have my resignation withheld at Your Excellency's request pending the time it may be necessary for Your Excellency to communicate with the Secretary of State for the Dominions.
> I am, Your Excellency,
> Yours very sincerely,
> W. L. Mackenzie King.

And then a whole campaign was conducted; and within the sound of my voice there are members who declared time after time that this country was no longer a colony and could not be ruled from Downing street, while the right hon. gentleman sat mute from malice. Not a word did he ever say as to the truth; not a word did he ever communicate to the Canadian people as to the fact that he had asked Lord Byng to appeal to Downing street and that Lord Byng had declined. So the campaign was finished. That was the solicitude shown for the crown by my right hon. friend; there you have that position clearly defined.

Mr. RALSTON: Not very clear.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman does not see the point of it? He does not see the point of permitting the crown to be held up to ignominy during a long campaign throughout the country, while all the time the right hon. gentleman was in possession of information that would have stilled the campaign against the crown?

There is one slight difficulty under which the right hon. gentleman labours. He worked himself into a fine frenzy in the closing observations of his speech. One would almost think he had emerged from the valley of humiliation. In his mad effort to secure extrication from the valley he is endeavouring to pull everyone else down into it, and when he finds it impossible to do so his anger knows no limit. Now, in the valley of humiliation and still unable to extricate himself from it, he asks this house not to believe that he is a demagogue but that he is a high-minded statesman. For the purpose of serving his own ends he makes a joke even of our Christian faith.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I knew perfectly that hon. gentlemen would desire to withdraw themselves from such a statement. Last fall they desired to extricate themselves from the valley, and after the speech delivered here they said they were no longer in that valley of humiliation. So the right hon. gentleman went to London for the purpose of endeavouring to make his defence and prove that he was not in the valley of humiliation at all but that someone else was there, and he thought that might placate those who did not believe they were going to be dragged down into the valley with him.

But this I want to say, Mr. Speaker. Having endeavoured in this fine frenzy to work himself out of the valley to-night he has read quotations, for the third time in three successive parliaments, from the same speeches. I now know that this little residence, this sojourn in the valley, has interfered somewhat with the originality of his thought, and he now calms himself by perusing the speeches that were made by my humble self in days gone by. For the third time he has read them to the House of Commons; he read them in 1930, he read them in 1931 and now in 1932 he reads them again.

Mr. YOUNG: Do you object?

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit. I rejoice that he thus associates himself with the policies and principles of the party to which I belong. But there is only one objection I have to make, and I shall make it very briefly. It is passing strange that one who used to be a student of economics and of history fails—alas, because he is no longer in the high, bright light of the clear atmosphere above—to let his mind function upon these matters as it should. The atmosphere of the valley has been unhappy and unpleasant. It has had the effect of souring the disposition of the right hon. gentleman; it has made him somewhat difficult to get along with, and at the earliest opportunity he endeavours to object to everything that is done and to cast aspersions on everyone who dares to differ from him. Is he ignorant of the fact that the conditions of 1929 and 1930 have changed? Is he not aware of the fact that the whole world has changed since then? Does he not realize that even the Bank of England has had to suspend its gold payments, and that England has gone off the gold basis? Does he not know that the financial structure of every country in the world but two has been more or less destroyed? Does he take no stock of that? Does he not realize that in this world we are facing conditions and not theories, that what was true in 1929 and 1930 is no longer true? The world to-day is in a condition for which there is no parallel. Anyone who takes the trouble to read must know that. Then why endeavour to mislead people? Why endeavour every single moment to have them believe that conditions have not changed in Canada as they have elsewhere by reason of a situation that is worldwide? Are conditions in Canada to-day the same as they were a few years ago? Have not world conditions changed the whole face of the globe? Have conditions not changed in the great republic to the south of us? Have conditions not changed in Germany, in England and in every country of Europe? Has not the destruction of the financial structure of England reacted upon the structure of every country in the world? And why should we escape? We have not escaped, and when we venture to point out what the conditions are and what measures must be taken to avoid the pitfalls that have beset others, we are charged with restricting trade, with destroying the life of trade.

Now let me deal with what I conceive to be one of the most important problems which this house has to consider. Confronted with that situation—the destruction of the whole financial structure of the various countries of the world—we realize that the only medium by which international balances of trade are to be adjusted is gold, so long as the world retains the position that gold shall be the standard for international settlements. When England went off the gold standard and other countries followed, international balances had still to be settled in gold. This country has contracts outstanding, obligations in connection with railways, in connection with its own national debt, in connection with the provinces, in connection with the different municipalities, by which we had promised, in the gold coin of other countries, to meet our obligations and liquidate our debts. That was our position. Long months before that, thoughtful men had realized that the conditions in England were such that Great Britain could not long continue to maintain its gold standard. England secured credits, one from France and one from the United States, hoping to avoid the crisis. What was the cause of the crisis? The cause of the crisis was the continued purchasing of more goods than they had goods to sell, so that there was an adverse balance of trade of £2,000,000 per week, as Mr. Chamberlain said a week ago. That had gone on month after month and year after year until the point had been reached when the inevitable crisis could be foreseen. To meet it credits were established, but they were insufficient; and unequal to the task imposed upon it the bank surrendered. A statute was passed in England by which not only were the directors indemnified for the action they had taken on the last day when the bank failed to meet its obligations in gold, but the country was withdrawn from the gold basis. What did that lesson teach us? Long before it came we realized what it meant to us, and on the strength of the legislation which we passed at the last session and the preceding session this government undertook the task of trying to change the trade balance in Canada. That was our task. The right hon. gentleman omitted to state the trade balance in 1929. In the year 1929-30 the adverse trade balance of Canada was $90,000,000; that is, on March 31 we had purchased in trade, in commodities, $90,000,000 worth of goods more than we had sold. The next year, ended March 31, 1930, for which the right hon. gentleman was entirely responsible—his government was still in power—that adverse balance of trade had risen to $103,000,000; and this year, thus far, we have been able to reduce it to less than $10,000,000. In the month of January last $5,000,000 more was taken off it, so that we have every reason to believe that at the end of the fiscal year we shall have overcome the adverse balance.

Do hon. members realize how difficult that task has been? I wonder whether they realize just how far-reaching were the measures which had to be taken to accomplish it. My right hon. friend has complained that the merchants find it disagreeable, and he says there is instability and uncertainty with respect to tariffs. Of course there is; it could not be otherwise. How could it be otherwise? We have had to meet that situation by orders in council, by executive action, by doing everything that prudent men could do to prevent the catastrophe that fell upon England. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who did not believe that the inevitable day was coming as rapidly as in fact it was, told the British people before the election, "Keep on doing what you are now doing and insolvency is bound to come". In Canada we have to meet a non-trading obligation amounting to practically $1,000,000 a day this year, obligations created for interest payments, for instalments on principal payable in foreign countries in the currency of those countries; and against that visible balance which we are endeavouring to create in this country—that favourable visible balance on behalf of Canada—there is only one invisible item, that is the tourist trade. There is something from investments abroad, but that is very limited. We must depend, therefore, more or less largely upon the tourist trade with respect to unfavourable balances to redress not only the trade balance, which must be in our favour if we are to continue solvent but also these enormous obligations amounting to $1,000,000 a day, which this country under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman opposite incurred prior to 1930.

If in 1929 some of us ventured, as you will find in the pages of Hansard, to point out that the day of reckoning was fast approaching; if we believed then, as we still believe, that the maintenance of an equilibrium between imports and exports is not only fundamentally but imperatively necessary if the financial structure is to be maintained; if we believed this and pointed it out, you will admit, Mr. Speaker, that we received, for the views we then took, no support from hon. gentlemen who now sit on your left. They said that all was well. We said, beware. And it is one of the ironies of fate that the responsibility for meeting and dealing with the present crisis is imposed upon those who pointed it out and, believing that it was surely coming, asked those then in power to beware.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: And yet those who sit beyond to the left of you, Mr. Speaker, having created that adverse position, dare to raise their voices in protest.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a world condition.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly it is a world condition; but had this new country taken the steps it should have taken in 1929 to produce a favourable trade balance, conditions would not be what they are. Every thoughtful man knows that. I put this question to every hon. member in this house: What would have happened had we continued with the tariff legislation which we had in 1929? If Mr. MacDonald was right in what he said in England, and I do not think anyone disputes it, then it would have meant insolvency. I have said times without number that the tariff is but an instrument to accomplish a purpose; I have said that I demanded an equal opportunity and fair competition for Canadians, and the tariff is the instrument by which we have endeavoured to bring that about. The tariff is the only instrument of which I know whereby Canadians can maintain that favourable trade balance which will enable them as a borrowing people with a surplus of exports over imports to meet their obligations in the markets of the world and discharge the contracts which they have made.

I intend to make an observation or two with respect to the economic conference. Twenty-nine years ago Joseph Chamberlain conducted a great campaign in England on imperial preference. One of the wisest men of that generation was the late Duke of Devonshire—the eighth duke, not the ninth who was our governor-general.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the right hon. gentleman wish to make a distinction between the two as to wisdom?

Mr. BENNETT: In making that observation the hon. gentleman does credit neither to his intelligence nor to his wit. The Duke of Devonshire, with that prescience which distinguished him and that wisdom for which he was noted, put his finger upon the crux of the problem. The following is his letter of June 15, 1903:

> Is not this question of the alleged decline of exports as compared with imports immensely important, and is it not in fact the sole foundation for any impeachment of the existing system?
> I do not think that Chamberlain can point to any proof that we are going back, except that the exports of some of our manufacturers are declining.
> But if we can export enough to keep up our imports what does it matter? If our iron and steel exports diminish it may be made good either by increased home consumption of iron and steel, or by manufacturing something else either for home or foreign consumption.

That, mark you, was the statement of one of the wisest men of his day, made twenty-nine years ago next June. He foresaw that if the imports of the country were gaining over the exports, then all was not well with England. The succeeding generation of economists pointed that out, but it was without avail, because there were those who believed that a shibboleth was all that was necessary to maintain the economic position of the kingdom. The Cobden school believed in what is called free trade, and believing in that and using that shibboleth, the results that were brought about, slowly, imperceptibly at first, gained momentum until we had in September last the calamity of the destruction of the position of the Bank of England so far as its being the centre of finance was concerned.

Mr. YOUNG: World conditions were not responsible for that?

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. That was the condition of things until after the war. During the early stages of this development England, like other countries, entered upon an era of great prosperity, and it was believed that all was well because there was temporary prosperity. But one must look further than the immediate moment. In 1928 and 1929 I asked hon. members to pause and consider, to think where we were going, to look frankly at the situation created by the adverse balance of trade. There must be those who realize that the government heeded me not, and in the end we are paying the price which England is paying, except that being a new country and having arrested the flow of imports as we have, before it was too late we were able to overtake that adverse balance. When we came into power there was an adverse balance of $100,000,000, which we have converted into a favourable balance as at the end of this year of over $15,000,000. It is not for me to say, but one of the wisest economists the world now knows has affirmed that the achievement of Canada in this regard is the most important victory yet achieved against depression. I put it to the house whether or not the overcoming of an adverse balance of $100,000,000 by ten millions of people was an easy task? Does anyone for one moment think that we did not have to disturb trade? It brought about a measure of instability when we required stability, it brought about unsettlement when we required steadiness; it did all these things, but they had to be done and the executive was clothed with power to do them. We got from parliament the power which enabled us to do it; we did it, and we will continue to do it as long as the emergency exists and necessity demands.

With so much of our trade policies does the right hon. gentleman agree, and with so much does he disagree. He says that on broad and general principles he desires Canadians to have an equal opportunity and fair competition, and that we should develop our great resources. If any hon. member of this house can suggest any method by which that can be accomplished other than by the use of tariff, I should be obliged to hear it. The late Marquis of Lansdowne, who at one time was Governor General of Canada, once said that where you had a protected world about you, where you were dealing with protected powers, it was like a man without a revolver entering a room in which everyone was armed; and he by training certainly was a free trader. That is the condition in which this country, your country and mine, found itself when the present world crisis developed under the circumstances to which I have alluded. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, I ask this house, if they know of any method by which we could have accomplished what we set out to accomplish other than the method I have indicated.

If the right hon. gentleman means that we should have fair competition and equal opportunity, does he mean that we must do what was done a year ago last fall to give equal opportunity and fair competition to Canadians? There is no half way measure to be adopted. It was not a case of our desiring to do this; it was not that we had discovered some means by which we could apply this method here and that there; it was that we were convinced, as every thoughtful man in this house must be convinced, that unless we remedied the condition of an adverse trade balance of $100,000,000 this country would be ruined. Because we did not desire to see it ruined, we, being in a position of responsibility, adopted the measures to which I have alluded. Is there any hon. gentleman here who objects to them? Is there any Canadian who objects to them? Is there any Canadian who does not believe that the obligations thrust upon the Canadian government by a world crisis must be discharged in the manner in which we have discharged them? Why did we seek legislation in 1930? Why did we seek it in 1931? Was it for the purpose of abusing it? Was it so that we might have power which, as the right hon. gentleman would have you believe, we intended to abuse? Was it for the purpose of substituting the executive for parliament? No. It was merely that we as the instruments of the people believed the government might be able to save this country from the impending crash which came in September last.

Incidentally to the discharge of these obligations we have improved employment in Canada. There are a hundred more industries in this country than there were when the present government came into power. From day to day various persons have sent communications to the government indicating the improvement that has been brought about in employment conditions. I do not for a single moment say that conditions are ideal; I have not suggested that, nor have I suggested that conditions have reached that measure of full prosperity which we desire. But I have said that the condition of this country is better than that of any other country in the world. If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to read even to-night's paper and see the review by an economist of the situation in Canada as compared with that in other countries, instead of being prophets of blue ruin as my right hon. friend is, going about decrying Canada from the housetops, decrying his country, belittling the effort of the Canadian people, belittling the effort of the Canadian government to save the situation, they will realize that they would be much better employed in making some attempt to lead people to believe that the Canadian people have rallied and have met the difficulties imposed upon them in the greatest testing time in the world's history.

Let me take one illustration. Last session I was challenged upon the subject of silk. I should like some hon. gentlemen opposite to recall their observations then. Will the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) listen to this story? There are substantially fifteen silk mills in Canada, and the number of employees is as follows:

This is an increase of 585, or 42.1 per cent. That was a direct result of the legislation enacted by the house last session.

Mr. McINTOSH: What about agriculture?

Mr. BENNETT: I would think the hon. gentleman's interest in that is the same as his interest in other things—purely academic.

These are the figures in regard to the entire hours of labour in the silk industry:

	Hours

An increase of 1,733,485, or 50.8 per cent. The production increased 79.1 per cent in yards of one form of silk, and in all others, 55.7 per cent, and the expenditure on plants since September, 1930, was $877,500, these figures not including the office or sales staff. I put this to the house, to every reasonable hon. member: Will they tell me any method by which this could have been accomplished other than the method employed? Then why shrink from it, when by doing it you are going to accomplish that benefit? Why shrink from a duty when you know that the issue is the welfare of your country itself? Although it may mean some little disturbance for the moment to the merchants, although it may mean a little unsettling—and I admit that—I say that we would be recreant to our duty if we did not use the means entrusted to us by parliament to effectuate the purpose I have mentioned.

The leader of the opposition calmly says: I agree with the Prime Minister as to the necessity of equality of opportunity and of having fair competition. I wonder if some hon. members have seen some of the competition. I wonder if any of them have studied the competition to which this country has been subjected during the last twelve months. I wonder if hon. members realize that the surplus products of every country in the world have been thrown at us in the desire to get money to convert into gold, in order to meet international balances and obligations; practically any price being accepted. There was submitted to me an article laid down in this country at $3.60 a dozen, when the cost of the labour alone in Canada amounted to much more than that; the successful exploitation of this market with that commodity would have closed down every Canadian factory engaged in its production. I ask: What would any member of the house do in such a case?

Mr. YOUNG: What was the article?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not care to mention the article. If the hon. gentleman desires to see it I shall show it to him, but for reasons that are international in character I am not mentioning articles or countries at the moment. I ask the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) whether, if confronted with that situation, he would have shut up the Canadian factories. I do not think he would.

Mr. YOUNG: I should like to know all about the case.

Mr. BENNETT: I give that only as an illustration. Day after day at the Finance department men have confronted us with those conditions and we have met them with the power which the house has given us. That is what we have done. I have a letter from the little button industry in Montreal stating that their employees numbered fifty in 1929, sixty in 1930, and in 1931, they are eighty odd; and he thanks the government for what it has done. Is that right or not for this country in this world crisis?

Mr. YOUNG: What is the industry costing us?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman asks: What is the industry costing us? The buttons are being sold at this very moment cheaper than they were before.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not the answer.

Mr. BENNETT: The only question that I am putting before the house is: Are you prepared at this moment to sacrifice the industrial life of Canada?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): The right hon. gentleman has sacrificed the interests of agriculture ever since he has been put into office. What has he done for agriculture?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman asks: What have you done for the basic industry of agriculture? When we came into power we found the New Zealand treaty had been terminated. Canada the year before had bought 40,000,000 pounds of butter from New Zealand.

Mr. McINTOSH: Thirty-five million pounds.

Mr. BENNETT: Forty million pounds of butter in twelve months.

Mr. McINTOSH: Five million pounds too much.

Mr. BENNETT: Not 5,000,000, but 40,000,000 pounds too much. To-day Canada is resuming her place in England as an export country for butter. That is what has happened.

Mr. VALLANCE: What is the price of butter?

Mr. BENNETT: The price of butter keeps pace with the price of other commodities. That affords me an opportunity to make a statement that probably hon. members will like if they are at all interested in getting at the facts. I commend to hon. gentlemen a book that was published in December last by the Duchess of Atholl on "The Conscription of a People." If they want to know about the price of wheat or butter and will read that book, they will understand the situation.

Mr. VALLANCE: We do not need to read about it.

Mr. BENNETT: But those who desire to consider causes and cannot make the investigation themselves, read the words of those who know.

Mr. VALLANCE: What the right hon. member said about the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) is also true of the Duchess of Atholl—her knowledge is purely academic.

Mr. BENNETT: Every quotation in that work is supported by a reference to an original authority in the footnote or in the body of the work. All one has to do is to read that book in order to understand why world commodity prices of agricultural products are what they are. That brings it down to December, and if you go further and bring it down a month later, you will have a very clear appreciation of the situation with respect to other commodities as well. Moreover, this government last session enacted legislation which gave to the wheat growers of western Canada by way of bonus a larger sum of money than they had ever paid in any year in customs duties.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): By order in council you extended it to British Columbia. Why did you not extend it to the rest of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman seems to be a little out in his geography, but it is not a matter of great importance. The elevators that were on the Peace River line across the border on the Northern Alberta Railways were included in it, if that is what he means, and some of them were in British Columbia; there is no doubt about that. Does anybody object to that? I thought the hon. member for Vancouver South objected to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We asked for it last year.

Mr. BENNETT: These are the facts and these are the factors that induced us to take the action we have taken, and we have no apologies to offer for having done so.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is too bad you had not read the book before you made statements during the election campaign.

Mr. BENNETT: The position is as I have indicated. Connected with that of course is the economic conference. I said in London in 1930 that empire trade did not in any sense exclude world trade, for we could not trade exclusively in the empire; we had to trade in the world as well. I made that as part of my observations at the opening of the conference. I desire to point out to this house, however, that in 1902 Sir Wilfrid Laurier in a memorandum which he left with the imperial authorities threatened them in language very polite that if they were not prepared to give the preference in England he was prepared to take action to discontinue the Canadian preference. Did you ever read that? Does my right hon. friend recall the year 1902? Does he recall what Sir Wilfrid Laurier's position then was? The man is still living who wrote that memorandum and left it with the British authorities. My right hon. friend asked why we did not get the wheat quota now. Why did he not get anything for twenty-eight years? Why did he not get it over twenty-five years ago? Why was it that in the last statement made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier he made perfectly clear what would happen if they could not get what they wanted? These are the words he used:

> If after using every effort to bring about such a readjustment of the fiscal policy of the empire, the Canadian government should find that the principle of preferential trade is not acceptable to the colonies generally or the mother country, then Canada should be free to take such action as might be deemed necessary in the presence of such conditions.

And the speeches were in the same sense, and nothing came of it. To-day we have a chancellor of the exchequer in Great Britain delivering a speech in which he says this conference will meet at Ottawa, and "we are committed to the principle of empire preference." Of course, one does not expect in the very nature of things that hon. gentlemen opposite, any of them, would admit that this government in any sense contributed to that end. But there are those who live not in Canada but in England, who will say that the action taken by this administration was a powerful factor in bringing about that end. That we can afford to leave to posterity, and to those who know the facts, I shall not do more than point out what some at least have been fair enough to realize, that the steady and consistent attitude we have taken with respect to empire preference has brought about the end that for so long Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party endeavoured to accomplish.

Further, why is it that to-night the right hon. gentleman has changed his tune? What about his speech in Winnipeg? What about his regard for the empire during the election campaign? Do hon. members recall that in 1930 during the election campaign he was going to and fro taking a very generous attitude towards the empire; that he was then the Simon pure defender of the empire? He and his party and they only were prepared to do what was right, fair and just by the empire. In fact, in one place, namely Barrie, he became so violently patriotic that he put Great Britain before Canada. But that was in a moment of emotional and temporary enthusiasm, because later that sentiment resolved itself into something more solid. Listen to what he said at Winnipeg the other night. I wonder if you realize the position he then took. He told them we were not going to have any "narrow economic imperialism," as he called it. His words are:

> We cannot be content with any restricted interpretation of our nationality either in the constitutional or the economic sense. We are opposed to a narrow economic imperialism for the same reason that we are opposed to a narrow economic nationalism.

That was to arouse sentiments of anti-imperialism in the community in which he spoke. Everyone who has read the Hansard debates is thoroughly familiar with the principle upon which our ideas of preference were based. We have followed consistently the policies of Macdonald and Tupper, policies of mutual preference for mutual advantage. Unless there is mutual advantage there can be no preference, for preference must be mutual or it is not advantage at all. That is the position we have consistently taken, and that is the position which Mr. Chamberlain took, speaking in the House of Commons the other day with respect to Canada, when he said:

> I come now to the position of the empire countries in connection with this change in our fiscal system. The committee is aware that next July the Imperial conference is to be held in Ottawa where the economic relations of the members of the British Commonwealth will be discussed. His Majesty's government attaches the utmost importance to that conference, and they intend to approach it with a full determination of promoting arrangements which will lead to a great increase of inter-imperial trade. Now I have no doubt that the dominions would no more question our right to impose duties in our own interest for the object either of raising revenue or of restricting imports than we have questioned theirs to do the same.

Observe those words,—"restricting imports." While the right hon. gentleman was talking in Halifax about this government restricting trade, the British government was rushing through the House of Commons a fifty per cent import duty measure. Mr. Chamberlain proceeded:

> But considerations of that kind have to be weighed against advantages to be obtained by preferential entry into dominion markets, even though they should involve some surrender of revenue or some lessening reduction of imports; and since, until we meet the dominion representatives, we shall not be in a position to estimate the advantages or disadvantages on either side, and since we desire to mark at every stage our wishes to approach this conference in true spirit of imperial unity and harmony, we have decided so far as the dominions are concerned (and in this arrangement we shall include India and Southern Rhodesia also) neither the general nor the additional duties shall become operative before the Ottawa conference has been concluded.

That is in accordance with the principles for which we have contended now for nearly half a century. The fact that Great Britain has departed from the fiscal principles that governed her policies in days gone by is in itself an indication that that great people realize a tariff still is but an instrument.

It may interest some of you to know that they have copied almost in their entirety some of the provisions which hon. gentlemen opposite condemned so loudly. They have copied measures that were submitted to this house because they believed that through the use of them they could best accomplish that which they desired.

Mr. YOUNG: The power of an evil example.

Mr. BENNETT: It may be the power of an evil example, as the hon. member for Weyburn has suggested, but we prefer to think it is the power of a realization of what necessity commands people to do in the interests of their own country.

One step further. The right hon. gentleman referred also to the wheat quota, which is connected with this transaction, and he read from the opening observations I made at the plenary conference. He did not however read from my closing observations. I said that in the interim the quota system had been suggested and the British government was not prepared to follow it at that time to its end. They suggested it, first of all, for domestic purposes; the extension of it to the dominions was another matter altogether. In the end what happened was that the quota was being further explored and finally after the election it was concluded that it might be used for domestic purposes, and later might be made applicable to the dominions. The right hon. gentleman is very anxious to tell the people of the west that if this quota was good it was deplorable that they did not have it during the last twelve months. Well, he was in power nine years; why did he not get it then? The real fact of the matter is that the quota was being explored, and is still being explored. When we left London the economic committee was not prepared to make a recommendation; the quota principle had not been sufficiently explored to enable them to speak with certainty with respect to its results. I say now as I said at the close of the conference, if anyone is interested in reading what I said—and I know some of you are not—we have not sufficient evidence to enable us to speak with any certainty with regard to the matter.

Now, there are many other subjects dealt with in the speech from the throne to which reference has been made this afternoon, but I do not propose to prolong this debate for the purpose of covering them again. With respect to the St. Lawrence waterway, I have this to say, that I believe the proper course to pursue in the matter is by verbal negotiations and discussions. If a treaty is concluded —of course the very word "treaty" implies that the agreement is between sovereign nations, or communities that speak as sovereign nations—then it is submitted to parliament for approval. If a treaty is to be the subject of discussion in parliament before it is signed, obviously it is not a treaty. Everyone knows that in international dealings after a bargain is made each government instructs its plenipotentiary to sign the instrument constituting the treaty, and the treaty is then submitted for the consideration of parliament. But at no time in the history of this country or of Great Britain has a document been submitted to parliament and been called a treaty unless it was an executed instrument. If it is a bad instrument, then of course, it will be rejected by parliament. Was the Halibut treaty signed or was it not? Was the treaty with respect to salmon signed or was it not? You cannot endeavour to escape responsibilities in that way; you cannot escape your constitutional obligations. I should just like to make this simple observation. We are not hurrying the St. Lawrence waterway treaty. All you have to do is look at the map and see your completed Welland canal and your twenty-seven foot waterway to Albany, and then you know why the Canadian government is concerned about the matter. When the appropriate time comes I fancy Canadians will realize that the reason why this government is now carrying on negotiations for the completion of that waterway is not that we desire to add one more to the burdens we have, but that the development we have reached in connection with our own canal system and the canal systems of our great neighbour to the south makes it essential that now, and at no other time, we should consider it. It is all so easy and simple to condemn governments because they take action. Did it ever occur to hon. members that there are occasions in the lives of nations as of individuals when decisions have to be made or the opportunity is gone for ever? That is the situation here. At the appropriate time if a treaty is concluded this house of course will have the fullest opportunity to discuss it and, if it so desires, to reject it. Because the treaty is not being made in any party sense; if made at all it is a treaty made by the Canadian government on behalf of the Canadian people, and if the representatives of the Canadian people believe it to be a bad treaty, they will do what one would expect them to do, namely, reject it.

So far as the disarmament conference is concerned, so much has been said that I will not repeat the language of the speech from the throne, but I am grateful to the right hon. gentleman for having said that he does not think he has anything to add to it, that it meets with his approval. But I hold the view very strongly that so long as a nation permits conscription legislation to be placed upon the statute books you will never make progress in disarmament. That is my profound conviction. I have had that view for a long time, I have told our delegates that the basis of armaments is the compulsion to arms, and that the basis of disarmament must be the removal of conscription laws in the countries that are to be disarmed. I regret the right hon. gentleman saw fit to suggest that the delegation representing us at Geneva might have been improved upon. All I can say is, it is not an easy task to secure Canadians who are prepared to devote themselves for months to the work that will fall upon the shoulders of our delegation. I know it was a difficult task, and I regret very much having, for instance, to ask the Right Hon. Sir George Perley to leave us at this time, but I felt that the delegation should be headed by a representative of the government. There is no man in our ranks who has a wider knowledge of international relations and who has served this country with more fidelity and greater satisfaction to the country with which he came in contact than the right hon. gentleman who has consented to head our delegation to Geneva.

There is one paragraph in the speech from the throne which the right hon. gentleman has not dealt with; it is a matter of tremendous importance to this country—the maintenance of economy in our public administration. I think you will find that in every department of the public service we have spent less this year than parliament authorized us to spend. That has been brought about largely by the diminution of revenues, because the sales tax that in days gone by had produced $20,000,000 for every one per cent now produces less. But looking about us, realizing our obligations, and desiring that the people of this country should understand fully that the government is anxious to lead the way with respect to matters of economy, we have concluded that we will ask this parliament to pass a statute to reduce by ten per cent the indemnities alike of the Senate and of the Commons, and of the compensation paid to ministers and to every branch of the public service. That must be effected. That we believe is essential for the purpose of enabling this country to have a balanced budget. We will then have done the two things which are necessary in the interests of the Canadian people: first and foremost, we must maintain the national credit, because this new, young country can only go forward into the future if it has credit in the money markets of the world. There is but one money market of the world that is left, practically, and that market is indeed conscious of the high regard we have for our credit obligations, for we have met every contractual obligation of the provinces, the dominion and the municipalities in the money market of New York in the terms of our contract; and that we will continue to do. We have brought that about not only by drastic economies, not only by what I mentioned a moment ago, the maintenance of our position by securing a favourable trade balance; these things we have done, but now we desire to meet the tremendous obligations that rest upon us next year with regard to our railway system. We have determined that we will have this economy begin with ourselves—although we realize that it may be particularly difficult with some, much more difficult than perhaps the average man realizes—alike in the Senate, the Commons and the civil service of this country, except, of course, the judges, who stand in a somewhat different position. That is what we have determined to do. A saving of between $7,500,000 and $8,000,000 will be effected.

But there is one more matter to which passing reference might be made. The right hon. gentleman has referred to the transportation commission. I think he is entirely in error in the quotation he made of what was said by me in Toronto. What I said—and if you will take the trouble to look at the report you will find this to be so—was that the subcommittee reported in these words:

> Your committee desire to call the attention of the house to the proposal made by Sir Henry Thornton at one of the sessions of the committee. He referred to the serious position of the transportation business generally and recommended that a commission be appointed for the purpose of considering the whole question of Canadian transportation. Your committee regard such a recommendation coming from such a source at this time as worthy of the serious consideration of the government.

No provision for that purpose was made in the supplementary estimates. That report was unanimously adopted by this house in July, as you will recall, and after carefully considering it in its every aspect we decided to appoint such a commission. But I have no hesitation, sir, in saying to you and to the members of this house that it was exceedingly difficult to secure the men we desired to get.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt just a moment? I have in my hand the report of the speech made by my right hon. friend in Toronto. Reading from the Mail and Empire account, the words are as follows:

> On the suggestion of the president of the Canadian National Railways the committee recommended that certain matters be inquired into. . . .

The committee did not recommend that; the committee recommended—

Mr. BENNETT: I have read what the committee recommended, and that is what I said in Toronto. I feel sure that what my right hon. friend has read is not in quotation marks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry to interrupt; it is a very small matter, but it is in quotation marks, and evidently the speech was given to the press.

Mr. BENNETT: I am happy to say not only that the speech was not given to the press, as is the custom of my right hon. friend, but that the speech had not been prepared at eleven o'clock in the morning. The notes I made were prepared on the paper of the Royal York hotel at eleven o'clock of the day on which I delivered the speech, and those notes are available to the right hon. gentleman if he desires to see them.

However, this is unimportant; the fact is that we gave the matter our serious consideration and, having done so, we endeavoured to secure a commission. I may say it was very difficult to get the men we desired. The British investor, with his millions and hundreds of millions of dollars in our Canadian railways; the American investors, with their hundreds of millions of dollars also, and the Canadian investor, all had to be considered, and there you have the situation. We sought the leading expert we could obtain in Great Britain; we sought as high an authority as we could secure in the United States, and I think it will be agreed that we selected as chairman one who for breadth of knowledge, fineness of intellect and judicial qualities stands unrivalled in the English speaking world. That I can say with frankness.

Under those circumstances we do feel that the only method that can be successful in dealing with the matter is to enable the members of the commission to understand the problem in all its bearings. I have under my hand reports of instances when time after time the right hon. gentleman, his former Minister of Railways, Mr. Dunning, Mr. Crerar and others said it was not in the public interest that the business of these railroads should be made known either to the public or to their competitors. There were matters that had to be made known to these men that could only be made known to them by the method I have mentioned, and these means were followed to enable the commission from time to time to become informed with respect to the problem with which they had to deal. They themselves, not the government, decided that. Do not for a moment think, sir, that this government gave any instructions of any kind whatever to the commission with respect to that matter. The members of the commission, as judges, as railway men, as business men, decided to what extent they should make their hearings public and to what extent the necessary information should be communicated to them in private. It would be ruinous and destructive to the very interests that were to be served if this evidence with respect to the internal administration and the finances of the railways were to be communicated one to the other. The Drayton-Acworth report was obtained in the same way, and no man in this house but knows that you could not reach anything like finality based upon adequate testimony or knowledge unless it were done in that way.

Then hon. gentlemen suggest that there is some sinister motive behind it. I can only say that as far as the government is concerned it has as little to do with it as any hon. gentleman opposite. This commission has been appointed. It has not been instructed beyond presenting to it the order in council, leaving to it the duty of endeavouring to solve a problem which was not created by a Conservative government. Bear that in mind; the problem arises through a Liberal administration creating two transcontinental systems and subsidizing each to destroy the other. That is the position, and you cannot get away from it; when you think of the problem never forget that fact. I have not seen any Canadian business man in modern times who has been able to suggest why it was done. There are men living now who wish they had taken the advice of Mr. Blair, who left the government on that account. There are men living now who realize that there was no firm basis of judgment exercised in endeavouring, with a population of less than eight million people, to fasten three transcontinental systems upon this country. But it was done, and this government has to deal with the problem.

I wonder, sir, if hon. members of this house have any idea of the magnitude of the task that rests upon us in this respect. When I hear men denouncing the government and talking, with respect to this matter, as though it were just something to pass by with a shrug of the shoulders and a passing sentence, I can only say that the other day, asking what was involved in the financing for 1932, I was told that the taxpayers of Canada must provide $80,000,000. It was $112,000,000 last year; later on you will hear something of that in a supplementary estimate, but here we have $80,000,000 apparently as an irreducible minimum. After you have balanced your budget there is your problem. Is it any wonder that we took time to endeavour to secure the men we did secure? I will not discuss their qualifications, because everyone here must know what they are. At the time the house rose we had not determined what action would be taken, but as the weeks passed by and the situation became worse, it was apparent that the obligation rested upon us to provide some means by which the Canadian people might understand the enormity of the problem with which they as taxpayers had to deal, and the tremendous financial burden that rested upon them. That is all I can usefully say with respect to this matter.

There are other matters to which reference might be made, but ample opportunity will be provided to do so as the session progresses. I deny that this government desires in any way to lessen discussion in parliament. When I think of what took place last session; when I think that not once, not twice but thrice the same speeches were made, I wonder that the right hon. gentleman rose in his place to-day and said no time was given to discuss these matters. I saw a smile flit over the faces of his own followers when they recalled the discussions that did take place. This government welcomes the fullest criticism of its actions in every way; its administration of the finances of the country, its administration of unemployment funds, of relief funds or of all other funds that have been entrusted to its care. If there be any wrong-doing; if there be any slackening of control; if there be any failure to take advantage of those facilities that were provided in the law of last session which was designed to safeguard the public treasury, let us hear about it. We shall endeavour in the future, as in the past, to meet the obligations that rest upon us as a government.

The right hon. gentleman has said that these obligations are upon us because we have brought them upon ourselves. Well, that would not be the judgment of the impartial historian. I have pointed out the distinction that must be drawn between domestic and world conditions, between local and external conditions. The speech from the throne makes that abundantly clear. We are a part of the great cosmos; we are part of the world, and to that extent we are influenced by the great currents and forces of the world. We have never at any time, either before or during the election, endeavoured to minimize that fact, but I said then as I say now that these domestic conditions would not be confronting us if the former government had realized what was coming during the nine years it was in power, if it had read aright the signs that others could see but it could not see. Had they heeded the warnings that were evident we would not be compelled to face the problems we have had to face and are facing to-day. But this I will say further: I defy any man to say that Canadians, faced with these problems, could have adjusted their difficulties as we have done had they retained the policies that were then in force. We have changed them for the public good, and the people of this country realize that in this government they have men who are endeavouring to do their best in these present world conditions. And if the policy of this government commends itself to the judgment of intelligent observers abroad, as it does, and this country occupies the high place it does in the estimate of those who are able to draw conclusions, then we care very little for that carping, blue-ruin criticism which we have heard to-night, but we shall march forward to the duties that lie before us.

On motion of Mr. Gardiner the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 9, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

FISH INSPECTION ACT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Fish Inspection Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The act requires that barrels or other containers of such fish as come under its provisions shall be made in accordance with the defined standards, that the fish be cured, graded and packed as prescribed in the regulations, and that the packer place marks on the containers to represent correctly the kind, grade and weight of contents. At the present time inspectors are not required to inspect and mark every barrel or container. The purpose of this amendment is to make obligatory the inspection of all fish and containers which come under the provisions of this act and to prohibit their sale or shipment unless inspected and properly marked. This amendment is demanded by different associations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to authorize the Minister of Public Works, on behalf of His Majesty, to enter into an agreement with the Corporation of the City of Ottawa to extend the period of the existing agreement with the corporation for one year from 1st July, 1931.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED TEN PER CENT DEDUCTION IN INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES—CONTRIBUTION BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with I desire to make a short statement.

With respect to the statement which I made last evening regarding the reduction in the salaries paid to the members of the public service, I desire to inform the house that some time ago His Excellency the Governor General intimated that, if any reductions were made in the salaries paid to the members of the public service of Canada, he desired, as a voluntary act, to make the same contribution to the treasury as though his salary were included in the reduction, and he also so informed His Majesty the King.

I respectfully took the opposite view, and informed His Excellency that inasmuch as his salary was fixed by section 105 of the British North America Act, I did not think that any contribution of the kind suggested should be made. His Excellency now informs me that, notwithstanding the view which I so strongly pressed, he is firmly of the opinion that he should be permitted to share in the sacrifice involved in the reduction of salaries paid to the members of the Canadian public service, and I have agreed with his insistent view. During the new fiscal year His Excellency will voluntarily contribute to the treasury a proportion of his salary, equivalent to any reduction that may be imposed by statute upon the members of the public service of the country.

AUSTRALIAN WHEAT SHIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to direct a question to the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman). According to press despatches, a shipment of some two hundred and fifty tons of Australian wheat to the city of Vancouver for the use of the poultry industry has been refused admittance. Will the minister kindly give the reason for such refusal?

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): This is the first intimation that I have had of the subject matter upon which the inquiry is made by the hon. gentleman. I understand that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) can give an explanation, and I would ask that he should do so.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. member refers to a cargo of Australian wheat unloaded in Vancouver some few days ago. There is a wheat disease in Australia known as flag smut, and it is against the regulations of this country for any wheat to be admitted from any territory in Australia that is infected with the disease. The only way in which we can protect ourselves is to require that any shipment of wheat from Australia shall be accompanied by a certificate from the Australian authorities that the wheat comes from a district not so infected. No certificate has been produced covering this shipment. The authorities in Vancouver did not want in any way to embarrass the shippers, and we got in touch with the Australian government and asked if they would cable a certificate for the release of the wheat. They had not seen fit to do so. In the meantime the wheat has been unloaded and is being held in quarantine.

TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the Royal Commission on Railways and Transportation will make its final report during this session? In the speech from the throne it is intimated that the commission is only likely to do so. If such a report is to be submitted can the Prime Minister give the approximate date when it may be expected; and can he also inform the house and country whether the commission will hold any further sittings before taking final action?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that I can give no answer to the question. I have no advices as to when the commission will complete its labours, or as to whether or not it desires in the public interest, for the purpose of informing itself, to hold further meetings.

MAFEKING CUT-OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Would the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) kindly inform the house whether we may expect shortly the report of the engineers with respect to the Mafeking cut-off?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, frankly I cannot give an answer at the moment. I will look into the question and deal with it to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED PROCEDURE ON THE DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): It has been customary, I think, Mr. Speaker, to have the debate on the address take precedence over any other business. I presume the reason the ordinary motion was not put last week was to enable the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to make the motion which he did yesterday. But might it not be well now to follow the customary procedure and to have such a motion put, and the debate on the address given precedence over other business?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is not intended, Mr. Speaker, to make any such motion. It is proposed to follow the practice in the Imperial house.

Mr. BENNETT: This will stand as a notice of motion for return.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

J. B. CARTER REPORT

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of the report of J. B. Carter, representing the federal Department of Labour, on the investigation made by him into complaints relating to the expenditure of unemployment relief work on roads and bridges in the county of Gloucester, as well as a copy of any evidence on which such report was made.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING RELIEF EXPENDITURE IN NEW WESTMINSTER, BURNABY AND RICHMOND

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence, and other documents, passing between the Department of Labour, any cabinet minister or any official and the government of British Columbia, and any minister or official of that government, regarding all or any matters affecting or touching upon unemployment, direct relief or unemployment relief in the city of New Westminster and the municipalities of New Westminster, of Burnaby and Richmond.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): With reference to this motion, Mr. Speaker, and to the five notices following it, with respect to the production of documents in connection with unemployment relief, the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act passed last session provides that a complete return shall be made to the house within the time limit set by section 7 of the act. Since the production of the papers requested in these notices of motion will mean quite a burden and a great duplication of work I should like these notices to stand. If, in the interval, there is any particular matter in connection with which hon. members would like to be informed I will be very glad to give them the information required.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. REID: I should be very glad to receive the information in that way if I can obtain it very shortly, because conditions are such as to make this information necessary. Statements have been made by the provincial government and contradicted by the dominion authorities, and for this reason these motions have been placed on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it that the remarks of the minister apply to the first six notices of motion. He suggests that as, under the statute, the information sought will be brought down within a few days, the resolutions might stand in the meantime, and I understand that the hon. member for New Westminster consents to that arrangement. Therefore this resolution, and the following five notices of motion will stand.

Motion stands.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

OUTSIDE APPOINTMENTS TO BE MADE ON RECOMMENDATION OF MINISTER

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, all outside appointments should be taken away from the Civil Service Commission and made upon the recommendation of the minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would be very glad to accept the verdict of the house, if it were favourable, and not say anything. This, Mr. Speaker, is a matter which I think should be disposed of rather quickly. It deals with a procedure which is one of the relics of that war hysteria under which we laboured some ten or twelve years ago, and certainly it is one which should be removed from our statute book. Personally I opposed this legislation when it was introduced some ten years ago. I spoke against it then; I have been against it ever since, and I am against it now. It is not that I particularly want to exercise patronage; after all that is a secondary thing. I think it is part of the responsibility of the government, and responsible government is something that cost our ancestors too much to be lightly thrown away.

Let us for a moment study what takes place under this system. Away back in one of the country ridings a vacancy occurs in the outside service. If the remuneration is over $200 the member has nothing to say with regard to the filling of the vacancy; the one elected by the people, who has the most complete knowledge of conditions, who knows the applicants and their qualifications for the work, is not consulted. Instead, the country is put to the expense of sending some person from Ottawa, over a distance of perhaps three or four hundred miles. This inspector goes out on the street, talks to this or that man inquiring as to the qualifications of the different applicants, and then returns to Ottawa and makes his report. We have no means of knowing whether or not that report is acted upon, but in any case we have a condition where the man who really makes the appointment is responsible to no one.

I think it has been the experience of nearly everyone that the people of this country want their members to be responsible for appointments made in their respective ridings. Possibly it is easier for us to say that we have nothing to do with it, but that it is done by a commission in Ottawa. That is an explanation to which the people do not take very readily, and it does not reflect much credit upon ourselves. Therefore, though we may be making trouble for ourselves, I think we should put this responsibility back where it belongs, on the members elected by the people to look after their affairs.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to ask the hon. member if these sitting members of the house have anything to do with the appointments in any case unless they sit on the government side, so what does it matter?

Mr. McGIBBON: I am trying to restore that privilege to them, if they do not have it now. I hope they will have it in a few days. That is what I am asking for this afternoon.

Miss MACPHAIL: In Southeast Grey the defeated candidate arranges all the appointments.

Mr. McGIBBON: That will be a matter for the people of Southeast Grey to settle at the next election.

Miss MACPHAIL: By that time he will not have anything to do with it.

Mr. McGIBBON: I really do not think it is necessary, Mr. Speaker, to say very much on this subject. As I have said, I opposed this change when it was introduced ten years ago, so it cannot be said that I am inconsistent in this regard. I spoke against it then; I have under my hand the remarks I made as well as the remarks of other members of the house. I have one expression from an ex-minister of the crown of that time, the late Mr. Crothers, another from the late Dr. Edwards, one from myself, not to mention others. But one statement which probably will carry the greatest weight in this house was made a year ago by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). After having been in power some ten years and having seen the working of the act, he came out flatly last year with the view that the outside service should be taken away from the Civil Service Commission. I commend his judgment to the house. If, however, we want further reasons I think we have been getting them during the last few days in the press, reasons which were strong enough and which should be influential enough to wipe out the Civil Service Commission forever. I should like to see it done away with; I should like to see the responsibility for the making of appointments placed where it belongs, on the member elected by the people. I am not so very particular whether that member be a government member or supporter or not, but I think that the man or woman whom the people elect should assume that responsibility, because the elected representative of the people should be held responsible for the character of the appointments made.

Miss MACPHAIL: It is not so at all to-day.

Mr. McGIBBON: I hope the hon. member will follow me and give us the benefit of her views.

Miss MACPHAIL: I will.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not think there is any use debating this motion; probably nine out of ten members in this house are in favour of it. The present system was adopted ten years ago when the members were not favourable to a motion of this kind. The action then taken was one of the incidents of a sort of war hysteria. I have much pleasure in moving that all outside appointments be taken away from the Civil Service Commission and made upon the recommendation of the minister.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): During the recess the government has given consideration to complaints which have been made from time to time with regard to the administration of the civil service. These complaints were voiced in this house during the last session both when the estimates were discussed and also when a certain bill came before the house for consideration. At that time on behalf of the government I asked the house to proceed no further with the bill then under discussion inasmuch as matters of the utmost importance affecting the honour, the efficiency and the good faith of the Civil Service Commission were then before the courts for consideration. I understand that the case which is now pending in the courts at Ottawa will probably be determined within the next few days. In view of that fact, unless members are very anxious to proceed with this discussion to-day, I should prefer to move the adjournment of the debate and in the meantime to suggest on behalf of the government that a committee representing all parties in this house might be appointed to take into consideration this and other resolutions and bills affecting the Civil Service Commission. Such resolutions and bills might be referred to that committee for an independent investigation and report thereon to the house. The matter is perhaps not one with respect to which the government should present a policy to the house. It affects all parties in the house and therefore it might be advantageous if the whole matter were referred to a select committee. In order that this suggestion may be considered by the leaders of the various parties and their associates, I now beg leave to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY MOVED BY MR. CHARLES BOURGEOIS AND SECONDED BY MR. J. H. STITT

The house resumed from Monday, February 8, consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Before I begin to discuss the motion before the house may I take the opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois) upon his speech in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is sometimes quite an ordeal for old members of this house to debate such an important question and I am sure it must be doubly so for a new member like my hon. friend. However, he discharged his duties quite well indeed, and as I do not understand the French language to any great extent I shall take the first opportunity of reading his address when it is translated into English. May I also congratulate my good friend from Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) who seconded the motion. My good friend gave the house descriptions of many beautiful bits of scenery in his constituency and also informed us of the many excellent qualities of soil and the advantages in the way of location with which that constituency is favoured. He rightly informed the house that that part of Manitoba was the first section of western Canada to produce No. 1 hard wheat, and he told us that his people had in their midst some splendid butter makers who were so well versed in the art of making butter as to be capable of winning very valuable prizes. When the hon. member was telling us about the capabilities of the butter makers in his constituency he must surely have forgotten the prices which those butter makers now receive for the excellent quality of butter which can win prizes at various fairs throughout the country. Of course, it is a slippery question and I am not going to pursue the subject any further at the present time.

Yesterday we had the privilege of listening to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). These gentlemen engaged in a very wordy debate and it is not my purpose to intervene between them in this pastime. May I, however, make one reference to a statement which came from the leader of the opposition yesterday afternoon? In my opinion this was the most important statement which he made and it merits some attention. In his address he stated that the tariff was the most important question in Canada. I will admit that the tariff is an important question in every country including Canada but I submit that at the present time it is not the most important question in Canada. We have many other problems more important by far than the tariff. In so far as the primary producers are concerned the tariff is always important, but there are other questions which are much more important.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I think I said that I regarded unemployment to be the most important question, and that the tariff was one of the important factors affecting the present situation.

Mr. GARDINER: I accept my right hon. friend's explanation. I was quoting from my notes and I shall be glad to look them up and see whether I am right or wrong.

Let us look at the world and see how important tariffs are. Great Britain until recently has been a free trading country but she has suffered from unemployment just as much as any other country. The United States has had the highest tariff in the world and yet she has suffered from unemployment just as has Great Britain, a free trade country. This shows conclusively that while tariffs may be important they are not fundamentally important, there are other questions much more important which should engage the attention of this house.

As far as the address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is concerned the only matter to which I shall direct attention is his reference to the ten per cent reduction in the indemnities of members of parliament and in the salaries of the civil service. As a member of this house I have no objection to accepting that reduction; if the government feels that that will help to balance the budget or in any way alleviate the situation with which we are now faced, I, for one, will not protest against the imposing of that reduction. I cannot speak for the civil service, but I desire to take a few minutes to discuss the question of the reduction of salaries and wages as it affects present day conditions. I am afraid the government is giving a lead to the industries of this country which will have far-reaching effects. We can expect in the near future to have trouble between employers and employees because employers will naturally desire to follow the lead given by the government and reduce wages and salaries all along the line. By the reduction of wages and salaries we are reducing the purchasing power of the Canadian people at a time when it is absolutely essential that that purchasing power should be increased rather than reduced. Perhaps from their point of view the government is justified in stating that this is an economic measure because the economies which will be secured will save this country between $7,500,000 and $8,000,000. I believe that is the estimated reduction in expenditure stated last evening by the Prime Minister. As I have stated already that means that there will be a reduction of that amount in the purchasing power of the people.

What is real economy? There are different opinions in this country as to what it is, therefore, I shall state that in so far as I am concerned I believe that economy properly understood is the orderly arrangement and management of the affairs of the community and the wise and efficient use of its resources. To reduce the power of the people to purchase the goods which they need when those goods can be produced in abundance is not economy, yet the broad reduction of the community's income is the only remedy prescribed by those who are concerned in retaining intact the present economic system. We find the same procedure going on the world over. No doubt this so-called economy has emanated from those who are the real rulers of this country. We sometimes think that this parliament is the institution which in the final analysis controls the destiny of Canada, but with all respect to our parliamentary institutions, with all respect to the views held by the people with regard to those institutions, in my judgment the real controllers of this country are the banking and financial institutions. Inasmuch as they will desire to retain the control which they have held in the past and which they hope to hold in the future, it is only to be expected that governments will follow their advice. Their advice always has been and no doubt always will be that during a period of distress such as we are now passing through we must practise economy or, in other words, reduce the purchasing power of the people to the minimum. I have no more to say at the present time regarding this question, other than to repeat what I said before that, personally, I am making no objection to the reduction proposed by the Prime Minister.

I shall now take up a little time in dealing with the speech from the throne. This afternoon we witnessed a rather important departure from the procedure followed by former governments. I do not say that this government is not justified in following the procedure adopted this afternoon, but since I have been a member of this house it has been usual for the Prime Minister to make a motion that the speech from the throne shall be the first item to be considered and that all other business shall be set aside until that is disposed of. We have this afternoon followed the practice set out in the rules of the house but why are we departing from the usual procedure? Is it because the government feels that the speech from the throne is so unimportant that it is not worth while for this house to set aside time in which to discuss it? I hope that is not the attitude being adopted by the government.

In so far as the first paragraph of the speech is concerned I have nothing to say except that we welcome our new Governor General. We were glad to have him read the speech in the chamber of the Senate and we hope that his stay in Canada will be a pleasant one, that when he leaves these shores at the end of his term of office he will take back many happy remembrances of his association with the Canadian people.

The next paragraph is important but I will pick out only those parts which I believe should receive discussion. The first statement to which I desire to call attention is this:

> World conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people.

I admit that world conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people; as far as the Canadian people are concerned they cannot control world conditions and the same might be said of all other countries. But Canada surely has an opportunity to make a contribution to world conditions and in that contribution I believe the government and parliament can do something that is really worth while. While I admit world conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people, may I ask the Prime Minister and his government: What are you doing to improve the situation under conditions that are within the control of the Canadian people? That is the point I consider important. Are we doing everything in our power, in so far as it is possible within Canada to do so, to see to it that the condition of our people is improved? A little later on I shall return to that subject if time permits and give some further viewpoints in regard to it.

The next sentence to which I desire to call the attention of the house, reads as follows:

> This period of trial has shown the Canadian situation to be fundamentally sound.

That is quite an assertion. I do not know whether whoever was responsible for writing this speech from the throne gave full consideration to the exact meaning of that sentence. I ask hon. members to consider that question and to ask themselves: Is the situation in Canada fundamentally sound? If it is, why have we to provide for unemployment relief? Why have we to provide for many of our agriculturists who are facing starvation? How is it that we have in this country starvation in the midst of plenty? If the situation is fundamentally sound, then these conditions should not apply, and therefore whoever was responsible for including that sentence in the speech from the throne, did not give full consideration to the subject matter and its importance. If our situation is fundamentally sound, we should have no hardship in Canada because we have natural resources and the machinery of production in great abundance, all the things that are necessary to provide our people with all the comforts they might expect. Yet at the same time, as I have already stated, we have only to look at the records to find a very substantial portion of our people on the verge of want.

The next sentence about which I wish to say a few words, reads as follows:

> The over-subscription of the national service loan manifests both the unity and patriotism of the people, and their supreme confidence in the financial strength of the dominion.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

To understand the situation thoroughly, we must give some study to the financial situation as we find it in this country to-day. If you look at the bank returns which are available and printed in the Canada Gazette, you will find there has never before in our history been more money on savings deposit; you will find also that current accounts are extremely high, showing very conclusively that there are people who, out of their salaries or wages or whatever profits they are making, are saving very large sums of money and are putting it into the banks for safekeeping. I have been unable to find at present any great field of investment where the investor can put his money so that it will be safe and profitable. We have therefore only to recognize that fact and we shall see immediately why the Canadian people have responded so generously to the various loan flotations that have taken place recently. This is simply because there is no other avenue of investment that is safe and will bring them a return. Consequently, when governments float these different loans, those people are in a position to use their savings, if I may be permitted to describe them as such, to invest in the various bond issues. But I wish to emphasize very strongly the extremely high rates of interest which governments are paying for money under present conditions. I submit under such circumstances the price of money should be about as low as we have any record of in Canada in the past twenty years. Here we have the Dominion government floating a loan ostensibly for $150,000,000, but turning out to be for over $223,000,000, if I remember the Prime Minister's statement correctly, showing conclusively there are ample savings to take care of all these loans. If that be so, why are we paying 5 per cent for money at the present time? All other commodity prices are down, but because the government commenced to float and did float a loan at the high rate of interest of 5 per cent, it simply means it has put on money a price that is out of all proportion to its actual value.

I have another illustration which forcibly reveals how these financial interests are controlling the country. Some few weeks ago Ontario floated a loan at 6 per cent. This loan was over-subscribed, also for the same reason that I have explained, namely, because of the tremendous volume of savings available. What has happened? I have it on the authority of a man connected with municipal affairs in close proximity to Ottawa, that they had made arrangements to borrow, at 5½ per cent, money from the banks for use during the coming season. But the moment Ontario floated the 6 per cent loan, the banks recalled all those loans, called those officials into the banks and told them they would have to pay a higher rate of interest for the money they desired to use, the reason being that other loans had been floated at those high rates of interest. In other words, our governments have been responsible for raising the price of money to such an extent that municipalities are going to be mulcted in the future for every dollar they may use. What applies to a municipality will apply also to industry. During the coming summer we may expect industry to have to pay a high rate for the funds it requires in order to carry on its operations. Under such circumstances, while we all appreciate the fact that the government was able to float this loan and secure ample funds, it is very much to be regretted the government did not see fit to offer those loans at a much lower rate than that quoted at the time of issue.

The next sentence in the paragraph with which I wish to deal for a moment, reads as follows:

> The provisions made at the last session of parliament for unemployment and farm relief are proving effective.

One hardly knows how to approach that subject. I am not very familiar with conditions in the cities where unemployment relief is being given out, but as regards farm relief—and I am speaking only for my district—I must confess that any farm relief which has been given out in the dried-out areas in Alberta, has been totally inadequate to meet the situation. Of that there is no question. Whether it is the intention of the government to follow up this farm relief to a greater extent in the future than they have done in the past, I do not know, but I can say with confidence that in the dried-out areas at least the farm relief has been quite inadequate to meet the situation.

Mr. ARTHURS: Who is responsible for the administration?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not particularly questioning the administration of this act; I am merely pointing out the result.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the hon. member aware that the amount was fixed by the provincial authorities?

Mr. GARDINER: I quite understand that, but inasmuch as the statement is made in the speech from the throne, I am merely pointing out that in my judgment the farm relief is inadequate and whoever is responsible, whether the provincial or the federal government or a combination of them, I simply wish to submit that view to them.

The next paragraph I am going to read in full, because it is very important:

> You are successfully meeting difficult domestic problems. Conditions are gradually improving. But prosperity in full measure must await the satisfactory adjustment of accounts between debtor and creditor nations of the world and the restoration of international monetary standards, from which the acute financial difficulties have compelled a temporary departure.

It would seem from the speech from the throne we are successfully meeting the conditions that we have in Canada. I am very doubtful about that statement; I doubt whether we are meeting our domestic problems with the best ability that lies within us; my judgment is that we are not. I believe we are at present drifting and drifting very badly, and that a time will come very soon when, unless we get away from this manner of drifting, conditions will be more serious than they are now.

The next paragraph states that conditions are gradually improving. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, where they are improving. If they are improving I am very glad to hear it, but I would like to have first-hand information so that I can satisfy myself that there is really improvement. So far as I am concerned I have not been able to find any improvement in conditions in western Canada at least, and I refer not only to agricultural conditions but to business conditions generally in the west. My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) asks, why salary reductions if conditions are improving. I will let my hon. friend from Bow River answer his own question.

The paragraph goes on to state that a full measure of prosperity will not return until such time as the nations of the world adjust their accounts between themselves satisfactorily. To some extent I believe that that is true. It is certainly true that the debtor and creditor nations will have to adjust their accounts between themselves satisfactorily before we can expect any great improvement. But why confine it to other nations? Why not deal with the situation that we have here in Canada? Have we no debts in Canada, have we no creditors in Canada? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that to-day we have a greater volume of debt in Canada than we have ever had before, and that applies not only to governments, federal, provincial and municipal, but to individuals as well, and my judgment is that until such time as there is some adjustment of debts both international and more particularly debts within our own country, we are not going to have any very great improvement in conditions. It is indeed impossible to have that improvement until something is done with regard to this debt situation.

The next paragraph in the speech is a very important one so far as agriculture is concerned. It says:

> My ministers have under consideration a commercial treaty with the Dominion of New Zealand.

I am sure that hon. members on both sides of the house who represent agricultural constituencies will anxiously await the production of this treaty to see what its terms may be. I do not envy the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) the position he occupied in trying to negotiate this treaty, bearing in mind particularly the debates that took place in this house on former occasions with regard to the Australian treaty as applied to New Zealand. It is quite true that treaties between nations cannot be made unless there is give and take, and we are wondering just how much Canada has had to give in order to secure this treaty arrangement. We are wondering what class of producers in this country are going to be called upon to give the most. As I said before, the Minister of Trade and Commerce had a very ticklish job on his hands in negotiating this treaty, remembering past debates in this house with regard to the importation of agricultural products from New Zealand, and I am sure that the house will anxiously await the production of the treaty to see just how far the minister went, remembering those debates to which I have referred and the statements made by his colleagues on his own side of the house. It would appear to me that the minister is rather more fortunate in negotiating this treaty to-day than he would have been had he arranged it some years ago. The great question under the Australian treaty as applied to New Zealand was butter, and incidentally I believe that question was quite an influence in the last general election. The minister of Trade and Commerce is in a much better position to-day than the minister would have been in negotiating a treaty with New Zealand at that particular time because Canada is now on an export basis so far as butter is concerned. That would give the minister more leeway in dealing with that commodity and in negotiating the treaty.

Next I wish to make reference to that paragraph in the speech from the throne which says:

> A Canadian delegation is participating in the disarmament conference, which was opened at Geneva on the 2nd of February. I join with you in the prayer that the representatives of the nations there assembled may reach an understanding which will put beyond peril the cause of enduring world peace.

I believe that every member of this house will heartily endorse that sentiment. Personally I am not very sanguine of the outcome of the conference, but I am hoping against hope. My judgment is that the peace of the world in the final analysis is inherent in and a part of our economic system, and until such time as we are in a position to eliminate the terrific competition between nations for world markets and other factors that arise out of our present economic conditions, I am afraid that there is little hope for permanent world peace. However, we will hope for the best and our hope in this corner of the house is that this disarmament conference will achieve at least some measure of success and mark some progress.

The balance of the speech from the throne is made up of the program of legislation which the government will bring before the house. As I said before, it is meagre and not very important, and it is hardly worth my while dealing with it, particularly as my time is limited.

The speech from the throne in the final analysis is remarkable for what it leaves out rather than for what it contains. There is not one word in it with regard to unemployment, not one word with regard to the primary producers of this country and the conditions under which they are working, including agriculture. There is not a word with regard to these two very important questions. It may be that the government have plans which they will submit to this house later, but, sir, in view of the tremendous depression that we are passing through and the tremendous hardships that many of our people are suffering we expected that the government would give at least a passing notice to these great and important problems, and therefore I believe that the people of Canada will be tremendously disappointed in this speech from the throne. We do not blame His Excellency for this situation; he merely reads to parliament what his ministers advise him to read. Therefore we must put the responsibility where it belongs, and that is upon the government.

I should like briefly to deal with the condition of agriculture, because in the final analysis I represent a purely agricultural constituency. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that in my judgment agriculture to-day in western Canada is in a far worse condition than it was twelve months ago, that there are far more farmers insolvent and on the brink of bankruptcy than there ever have been in the history of the west. I am speaking of western Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: And eastern Canada too.

Mr. GARDINER: I am only speaking of western Canada, because, as I have already said, I do not wish to speak for a part of the country that I do not understand and do not know very much about. But it is my firm conviction that so far as western agriculture is concerned, unless some very drastic measures are taken very soon, we shall have the bulk of our farmers in such an insolvent state that even under better conditions they can never hope to recover their title of ownership in their farms. To-day the equity of the farmer in western Canada in his holdings is slipping from him gradually.

An hon. MEMBER: Gradually?

An hon. MEMBER: It has gone!

Mr. GARDINER: I am trying to put the best light on the situation. I do not want to paint the picture too black, yet I wish to tell the situation as I see it. The equity of the western farmer to-day, I say, is slipping from him gradually—probably more rapidly than gradually. As far as I can see there is no hope for the western farmer except on two conditions: first of all, he must be relieved of some of the responsibilities and debts which he has incurred and is carrying; secondly, he must be relieved of some of the high interest rates which he is paying to-day. Unless either or both of those conditions are met I am afraid that we are going to find our greatest basic industry beyond hope of recovery even if better times do come.

It has been stated that the condition of agriculture is a national problem. Indeed the Prime Minister last session, referring to a certain section of Canada, said that in that part of the country a national calamity had occurred. So far as I see we cannot confine this calamity with respect to agriculture to any section of Canada; it applies throughout the length and breadth of the country. Consequently, if this is a national calamity national means should be taken to see that the industry is not submerged. That being the case, I can assure the Prime Minister that with regard to unemployment and farm relief we shall be very happy indeed to give him the fullest cooperation and offer him any suggestions that we think will assist the people over the difficult path they are now treading.

Time will not permit me to go into some matters which I should like to have dealt with. The world has a problem on its hands, and while we can do something to help the international situation, my judgment is that we can do a great deal within Canada to make conditions much better. The problems which we have before us to-day arise out of our economic or social system; they are inherent in the system itself, they grow out of the system. Therefore we must first understand the system before we can successfully deal with the problems arising out of it. Under present conditions we have some striking contrasts. For instance, we have luxury—starvation; we have ease—overwork; we have wealth—poverty; we have abundance —scarcity: all existing under and part of the same system and indeed growing out of it. To explain that system would take more time than I have at my disposal; therefore it would be useless for me to make the attempt. But may I say, Mr. Speaker, before I take my seat, that I am disappointed with the proposals which the government have made before the house. We can only hope that before the session ends the government will bring such proposals before parliament as will at least be effective in controlling some of the problems with which we are now confronted. If this course is contemplated by the government, I hope they will acquaint the house with their proposals as soon as possible, and so give us an opportunity of dealing with them at an early date.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to speak at any great length in this debate. I share the views expressed by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gardiner) on unemployment of labour and agricultural distress, and I will have the opportunity to discuss those problems later during the session.

The first question I heard from members of both sides of the house when I arrived in Ottawa for the session was: What about that famous station? It is my present duty to make a very short and nonpartisan speech, and in connection with that "famous station" I desire in chronological order to thank the whole press gallery and the daily papers of Ottawa, Quebec, Montreal and Toronto, especially Le Soleil, the Globe, the London Advertiser, the Montreal Standard and even the Mail and Empire, for the support they gave me in their editorial pages. Is not the press often called the fourth estate, the lever that uplifts the world?

I asked for no favours, but last session on behalf of my electors I fought for the redress of an injustice and a wrong. On July 21 last year, the case was discussed fully, and to save repetition I would refer hon. members to Hansard of that date. I have no thanks to offer to the government, because no one should be thanked for doing his duty, but I offer my congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion); who understood at last the justice of my claim. In fact an official of the health department saw to it that twenty-four gallons of muriatic acid were used to fumigate the bugs in the old station building. The sanitary system has been renewed, the floor and walls have been tiled and the roof has been re-covered. The exterior repairs are not yet completed. The platform should be renewed and the adjacent buildings be put in order so that the station may be worthy of welcoming you, Mr. Speaker, and all members of the house and the members of the press gallery, when they come to that garden of the lower St. Lawrence—Riviere du Loup. As there is already a Perley Bridge and as the member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) has been instrumental in that matter, and on account of the numerous speeches delivered last session on the subject, would it not be only fitting to give the station the name of Parley station? It is to be regretted that a new station has not been built in accordance with Canadian National plans, because this would have relieved unemployment in my home town.

The discussion about the matter last year did not cost the country so very much, thanks to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), since several refunds were made. For instance, there was the question of cement. Repairs were to be made to the wharf at Trois-Pistoles, and the cement was supplied by an agent of the Canada Cement Company and another agent of the National Cement Company. When the government changed, the cement was supplied by a prominent Conservative, who sold it to the government at $1.40 a bag, plus transportation. The Minister of Public Works, being notified about the matter, made this man refund the difference between $1.40 and 65 cents a bag as well as the cost of transportation. I also brought charges in this house against a wharf foreman, who took joy rides at the expense of the government and also padded the pay lists. I congratulate the minister on having succeeded in getting that money refunded as well. So my speeches in that connection did not cost the country very much, because I had the cost paid by the Tories of my home town.

Other speeches were made about the Riviere du Loup station by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways, the hon. member for Argenteuil and others. These did cost the country something; I thought that should be made up in some way, so the Minister of Public Works was told about some dirty work being done by a contractor in another constituency, who was using timber which was not in accordance with the contract. The minister had the wharf emptied; the stones were taken out and therefore some economy was made, which partly compensated for the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with the Riviere du Loup station.

This shows one thing, Mr. Speaker; one should never say die. If hon. members opposite sometimes are not satisfied with the answers they get from their ministers they have only to follow my example. It may take some little time, but eventually they will receive their reward if their cause is just. The motto I give them is "Never say die."

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I see the situation the speech from the throne reveals on the part of the government an absolute bankruptcy of ideas. In the face of a world crisis absolutely no lead is given by the government. The speech states that world conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people. That may be so, but the question is what we are to do in the face of such a situation, and to that question no answer whatever is given.

The speech states that within the last few months a favourable balance of trade has been established. I think it was only last year that I had the pleasure of complimenting the government on getting away from that old mercantilist fallacy, but they are back again with the old fetish. I would say that the actual situation facing Canada is rightly interpreted by the president of the Royal bank, who says:

> While the severe dislocation of international trade has naturally resulted in a substantial decrease in our exports—

He goes on:

> —these figures reflect the transition from the period of expansion and development coupled with the investment of foreign capital in Canada to a period of retrenchment and reliance on our own resources.

That simply means that we have a so called favourable balance of trade because we are no longer able to borrow in New York and we are having to pay our debts. That is really the situation, so it is not anything of which we should be very proud.

It is quite true that we have had a very great decrease in imports; I believe that in the last two years they have fallen from some $1,250,000,000 to about $600,000,000 for the calendar year 1931. That is a big decrease, but the Prime Minister has said nothing to us about the corresponding decrease in exports. For the fiscal year 1930 our exports amounted to $1,144,932,070; for the fiscal year 1931 they amounted to $816,938,048, while for the past calendar year they were in the neighbourhood of $600,000,000. That is an enormous decrease in our exports, and I would like this house to consider what that means in the employment of Canadians in this country, because if we are not exporting and the home market is not able to take our goods it simply means that large numbers of our people are left unemployed.

The address goes on to say:

> You are successfully meeting difficult domestic problems; conditions are gradually improving.

And the Prime Minister supplemented these words last night by saying:

> This government has done much to quicken and improve employment.

Well, Mr. Speaker, in this regard all I can say is that these statements are not so; they are not in accordance with the facts. A number of our provinces are on the verge of bankruptcy; many municipalities are at the limit of their resources, and many of our smaller firms are closing. The Prime Minister sought to bolster up his statement by giving three illustrations. The first was that of a silk firm which employs some 585 more people than it did two years ago; the next was that of a small button industry in Montreal which employs some 30 more people now than it did two years ago, while the third was that of an article the name of which he could not give for certain reasons of state and because there might be international complications.

Those were all the instances he brought forward to show that conditions really were improving. On the other hand I should like to quote the words of the president of the Bank of Montreal as contained in his last annual statement. Sir Charles Gordon said:

> Business throughout the Dominion has experienced a general recession more severe than recorded in our last report, and the basic industries of the country have suffered correspondingly.

The basic industries are down even though there may be thirty more people employed in some Montreal button factory. The president of the Royal bank confirms the opinion of the president of the Bank of Montreal; in his annual statement Sir Herbert Holt says:

> Manufacturing has been comparatively quiet during the year and most industries have been working on reduced schedules. Activity in the flour milling industry, steel, automobile and agricultural implement trades has been materially curtailed—in both the maritime provinces and British Columbia the fisheries have had a poor year.

And again:

> The pulp and paper industry has operated at a lower percentage in relation to capacity than at any time in the past.
> The debts of the provinces and municipalities of Canada are in excess of two billions, bringing the total public indebtedness of the country to almost five billions.

Notwithstanding such a situation as is revealed in these statements, Mr. Bennett will claim that there is some button factory in Montreal which is employing thirty more men. Mr. Bennett says that we have improved unemployment in Canada. Again I must say that that statement is absolutely contrary to the facts. I turn to the Labour Gazette of January, 1932, and I read, from the annual review of employment in Canada in 1931:

> The curtailment in industrial activity, which first appeared towards the latter part of 1929 and continued through 1930, became more pronounced during the year just past, with the result that employment in Canada was generally at a lower level during 1931 than in any other year since 1926.

That is absolutely contrary to the statements made by Mr. Bennett on the floor of this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that it is not in order to refer to hon. members by their names. They must be designated by their official positions or the names of their constituencies.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I accept your correction, Mr. Speaker.

> From October 1 the general movement was uninterruptedly downward. . . . Firms in all provinces reported considerably less activity in 1931 than in 1930.

In view of such statements how can the Prime Minister possibly assert that this government has distinctly improved conditions? Let me cite the particular case of my own city. Let us take direct unemployment relief in Winnipeg—and this is entirely outside of the private relief agencies and apart from the amounts that have been spent for public improvements of various kinds for so-called relief purposes. The direct unemployment relief in Winnipeg for the year ending January 2 has cost the city and the two governments the sum of $2,408,474. The number of persons on relief at January 2 totalled 11,177, including 5,274 married men, 5,396 single men and 447 women. Yet in spite of the situation revealed in these figures, the Prime Minister tells us that conditions are improving. It is most astonishing that we should be told, in face of such circumstances, of some particular concern—I do not know whether there are more than this one—which has employed thirty more men. There are in my own city 5,200 families that are kept by the city and nearly 6,000 single men who are fed daily.

The only practical suggestion offered in the speech is a policy of rigid economy, which appears to mean in reality an all round reduction of 10 per cent. Let me mention two or three points in this connection. In the first place, this is very hard on the lower paid employees, many of whom to-day are living below what ought to be regarded as a decent standard. I have pointed out before in this house that there are in my own city, government employees who have been receiving less than is being paid in the form of relief to those who are destitute. A reduction of ten per cent so far as people of this class are concerned amounts to forcing them to live in a degraded condition. Ten per cent is comparatively light for ministers and others who are receiving high salaries. Last year ministers received $2,000 in addition to their salaries in the form of an allowance for motor cars. A ten per cent cut would not amount to a great deal to them; it would not even mean that they would have to go on foot because they could hire taxis at all times when they needed them. It would mean at the most that they would forfeit a few luxuries, whereas a 10 per cent reduction for lower paid employees in the civil service means almost disaster. I have no particular objection to members and senators being reduced if everyone else is reduced, but I would point out that other heavy expenditures go unchallenged. For example, the royal commission on transportation went travelling across the country in a special train and they stayed in the very best suites in the hotels. I cannot see why expenses of that kind cannot be reduced before the indemnities of those who are here representing the people of Canada. Further, I should like to ask this question: If we are reducing all round why should there be an exception of the judges? I cannot see why the judges should go scotfree if everyone else is reduced 10 per cent. Oh, the Prime Minister says, they are in rather a different category. They belong to the higher grades of the Prime Minister's own trade union, I suppose; that is the reason. I know of no other. But there is a more important consideration to which I would call attention. If the salaried employees in the government and the members of parliament are to be reduced 10 per cent why should there not be a 10 per cent decrease on the bonded indebtedness, the interest on which the Prime Minister says amounts to something like $1,000,000 a day? I cannot see why our interest charges cannot be cut down. I do not see why bondholders and mortgageholders should be protected any more than the ordinary people of the country. It would seem to me that the best thing to do, the most sensible thing, the thing most in harmony with all the teachings of economics would be to begin by scaling down the bonded indebtedness of the country and the mortgages held throughout the country. That is the place to begin reductions. As a matter of fact, this program of "rigid economy" is simply an aggravation of the trouble rather than a help. It means that the purchasing power of the people is being reduced, and if their purchasing power is reduced then production will feel the results.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I am not going into the curious interpretation which the Prime Minister gave us of the situation in Great Britain; it is almost grotesque. The only possible excuse I can make for the Prime Minister is that he has followed the lead of the Duchess of Atholl. It will be very interesting for the people in the old country to find that in Canada the Duchess of Atholl is regarded as an authority on questions of trade and commerce and on economics.

In face of the situation with which the country is confronted the address goes on to say—I had almost suggested, has the audacity to say:

> I sincerely congratulate you on the fortitude and patience with which the people of Canada have borne the hardships of this period of depression.

I suggest that this might be characterized as an address to the toad under the harrow, the toad sorely knocked about and blinded by dust; the toad, not knowing which way to turn, hears this: "I sincerely congratulate you on the fortitude and patience with which you have suffered such adversity." But even the toad, I presume, is still capable of some resentment, and I can fancy a speech of this kind will not go unchallenged. In any case, it could be made only by someone in a position of power who feels but lightly the troubles faced by the ordinary people of Canada.

I agree with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), who spoke before me, that after all we have to face the fact that although the nominal representatives of the people are supposed to form the government of this country, in practice the real government is a financial oligarchy functioning through the forms of democracy. In this connection I recall a statement made in 1923 by Mr. Harold J. Laski which was published in the reconstruction number of the Manchester Guardian. He said:

> The modern state is the protective armament of a property system which emphasizes inequality throughout society. Its claim to sovereignty is—once it is realized that political power is the handmaid of economic power—in effect, a claim to maintain these inequalities.

We find our government of to-day functioning not in the interests of the masses of the people but in the interests of no more than, I should say, five per cent of the people.

There is another matter to which I would like to devote some of the little time at my disposal, and that is the obsession which seems to obtain in this country that one of these days we are going to return to "normalcy," to use the phrase of a former President of the United States. I am firmly convinced that there is going to be no return to normalcy. Only the other day the Winnipeg Free Press made this statement:

> It is beginning to be understood that this is not just a dip in the road of prosperity which will pass in a year or so. The world, indeed, is actually off the road: it is in a strange country, threshing about in the darkness.

Some of us were startled a couple of months ago to read the words of warning by Sir George Paish, and at that warning some have been inclined to scoff. It is possible that Sir George Paish saw in clear outlines the troubles which were confronting us but that he failed to understand that they might not be quite so close as he imagined. Someone has said that reformers are sometimes lacking in perspective. That may be true, but this time the voice of Sir George Paish is not a lone voice. Montagu Norman, the governor of the Bank of England, in a recent letter to Governor Moret of the Bank of France, said:

> Unless drastic measures are taken to save it, the capitalist system throughout the civilized world will be wrecked within a year. I should like this prediction to be filed for future reference.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, in spite of a crisis of this character we continue to play the old game. Let me direct attention to what some of our leading economists and bankers have said during the last few years with regard to the economic situation. In a pamphlet issued by the League of Nations—The report of the World economic conference, published in 1927, I read this:

> The eight years of post-war experience have demonstrated the outstanding fact that, except in the actual fields of conflict, the dislocation caused by the war was immensely more serious than the actual destruction. The main trouble now is neither any material shortage in the resources of nature nor any inadequacy in man's power to exploit them. It is all in one form or another a maladjustment—not an insufficient productive capacity but a series of impediments to the full utilization of that capacity. The main obstacles to economic revival have been the hindrances opposed to the free flow of labour, capital and goods.

And later:

> It is essential, as the resolution states, "that nations should take steps forthwith to reverse or diminish those tariff barriers that gravely hamper trade, starting with those which have been imposed to counteract the disturbances arising out of the war." It is essential that a renewed sense of security should mitigate a burden of armaments which is profoundly uneconomic. We have here, and in the erection of tariff walls in order to obtain "self-sufficiency," two of many illustrations of the relation between the problem of economic recovery and of security.

In spite of that we have gone steadily ahead increasing our tariff walls and trying to justify the increase. Let me read a more recent document, also published by the League of Nations, entitled The Course and Phases of the World Economic Depression. This was published in 1931, and reads as follows:

> It is a part—

Referring to the belief in the continued decline of prices.

> —of the larger and indeed the dominating problem how the decline in wholesale prices can be arrested a rapid solution of which is necessary if an intensification of the depression —perhaps a general financial breakdown—is to be avoided.

And again:

> The disastrous consequences of the general lack of confidence in the world to-day are becoming more and more evident, and no considerable revival in economic life can be expected until confidence has been strengthened.

Instead of strengthening confidence, we, like other nations are provoking acts of retaliation on the part of other nations. I will quote from a British document—the report of the Committee on Finance and Industry. This was published in 1931, and is known as the Macmillan report. In part the conclusion reads as follows:

> The lesson of all this for our present purpose is that in the case of our financial, as in the case of our political and social, institutions we may well have reached the stage when an era of conscious and deliberate management must succeed the era of undirected natural evolution.

When we introduced a motion along these lines last year the best that the representative of the government could do was to sneer at those in this corner as being near bolshevists trying to disrupt society. I read further, as follows:

> There are, as we shall see, already signs that the necessity for such a change of outlook is coming to be realized.

I ask the house to listen to this. This is not the utterance of some rabid socialist, it does not come from some street corner orator although it is much in line with what the socialist or the street corner orator has been saying for many years. I read:

> The foundations of our financial system are being reexamined. Dogmas hitherto regarded as canonical are being questioned. The feeling is growing that our former easy-going ways will no longer ensure our prosperity in a crowded and increasingly competitive world. We are, indeed, at the parting of the ways and our future depends on whether we choose the right way. Hence the need for a careful study of the economic map. We must now choose our path deliberately and consciously. In other words we stand in need as never before of a definite national policy in our financial dispositions.

Another even more important document to which I would direct attention is one issued by the banker's committee on the credit situation of Germany. This committee was appointed upon the recommendation of the London Conference with Mr. Wiggin, chairman of the board of the Chase National bank, as chairman of the committee. The report reads:

> But time is short. The body of the world's commerce—whose vitality is already low—has suffered a severe shock in one of its chief members. This has resulted in a partial paralysis which can only be cured by restoring the free circulation of money and of goods.

And later:

> The German problem is part of a larger issue. . . . In order to revive demand and thus to put an end to the continued downward movement of prices—which is enclosing both debtor and creditor countries in a vicious circle of depression—it is essential that the normal process of investment of fresh capital should be resumed, with a well defined economic purpose in view—namely, an increase in the purchasing power of the world.

Just at present the government is doing all possible to curtail the purchasing power, both by its so-called policy of economy and by the effect that this policy will have on the outside public. I continue:

> Secondly, we would point out that the case of Germany provides the most forcible illustration of the fact that in recent years the world has been endeavouring to pursue two contradictory policies in permitting the development of an international financial system which involves the annual payment of large sums by debtor to creditor countries, while at the same time putting obstacles in the way of the free movement of goods. So long as these obstacles remain, such movements of capital must necessarily throw the world's financial balance out of equilibrium. Financial remedies alone will be powerless to restore the world's economic prosperity until there is a radical change in this policy of obstruction, and international commerce—on which depends the progress of civilization—is allowed to resume its natural development.

Had I time I should like to have read too from the Young Plan Advisory Committee, which based its conclusions to a very large extent on those of the committee to which I have just referred. I read only one paragraph from the Young report:

> The economic interdependence of the various countries of the world to-day needs no further proof; recent years have most strikingly illustrated it. Since July last, for example, it has been evident that if the crisis by which Germany has been overwhelmed were not remedied, it would spread to the rest of Europe, destroy the credit system so painstakingly built up, and cause profound repercussions in other parts of the world.

We seem to be travelling along in entire oblivion of those warnings which have been given us by the economists and bankers of Europe and we are pursuing the very policies which they have condemned.

May I refer to another article, and I put this on the record because I believe that the passages which I am reading are worthy of study by the house. At a later date we shall have an opportunity of basing some arguments upon these passages. I read from an article from which I quoted before the house broke up last year, an article which appeared in the Journal de Geneve, by William Martin, entitled "Europe as I see it To-day." Mr. Martin says:

> Protection has increased the cost of living and diminished ordinary consumption at the very moment when it was provoking in foreign countries reactions and reprisals and was compromising foreign markets. So that after a brief period of apparent improvement the statesmen in many countries have realized that they were following the wrong path.

Not our statesmen in Canada, I may interject. I continue reading:

> Unfortunately they are prisoners of the machine which they have set in motion and which is destroying them. . . .

All the statesmen worthy of that name understand perfectly the remedies which might bring back prosperity to Europe; the unification of the world market or at least a much freer circulation of merchandise. But they feel themselves powerless to apply this remedy; individually, because the resistance of private interests is insurmountable in each country; collectively because the League of Nations cannot have a determination different from that of its members. . . .

And, moreover, the improvement of the economic situation is the great business of Europe; if improvement is not brought about revolution is to be faced; for the social situation depends on economic prosperity and in the face of a concurrent mysticism like bolshevism one cannot hope for an eternal continuance of a form of society incapable of assuring nourishment to millions of men who only ask opportunity to work.

One concluding paragraph:

Europe can solve its problems however difficult they may be; but to do this twenty years of peace are necessary. Without these twenty years of peace war will lead Europe to revolution or revolution will lead Europe to war. In the last analysis, then, internal political problems like economic and social problems are international problems. Is a capitalist regime still capable of organizing peace on solid foundations? If the answer is "yes" it will have time to reform its institutions and to assure its future; if the answer is "no" it is condemned to speedy overthrow.

It is because of that conviction which I had forced upon me that I have had placed on the order paper a notice of motion calling upon the house to endorse the principle of a new economic order based not on the present competitive system, which is proving ruinous in our own home land, which led us to a war that rocked the world, and which apparently is leading us into still further international difficulties, a system that is preventing us to-day from having any hope whatever of the real success of the forthcoming disarmament conference. I should have liked to be able to say a word with regard to that. If we regarded this international situation seriously, we would not send to that conference exactly the delegation that we have sent, and I am quite sure they would go with other instructions than those which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) indicated he had given them. If we are simply to centre our attention on one phase of the problem; if we are simply to insist that the trouble is largely that a few nations in Europe believe in conscription while we believe in other means of defending ourselves, the failure of the conference is assured.

It seems to me in view of these quotations which I have read to the house from some of the most eminent bankers and economists of Great Britain and Europe, that it is high time that we in this house should no longer rest content with spending our time in wretched party bickerings, in going over the record of the speeches that have been made in the past or seeking some little advantage in the way in which we introduce business in this house. Rather we should be seized of the imminent danger that we are in to-day of a collapse of our present system. Perhaps someone will say, why not let it collapse? Well, I am willing to have a change of system, but if the system collapses as it has already partly collapsed in some countries of Europe, it will mean hardships that very few of us would like to contemplate. It would seem to me that it is possible for us to use our brains to bring about a change of conditions instead of deliberately following out the old policies until the inevitable disaster comes upon us.

I have often thought of society—and this thought occurred to me especially when I was coming home from Europe this year—as a raft buoyed up by a number of tanks—gasoline drums if you will—filled with air. Puncture one of these tanks, and from a float the tank is transformed into a sinker and the corner of the raft which it supports sags a little. Puncture another tank and it too is transformed into a sinker. Puncture another and another, and soon the raft begins to list, and when one or two more of the tanks have been punctured down goes the raft to the bottom. We face within a week or two the repudiation by Germany of her reparation payments. It has been freely stated in some of the financial papers in England that if Germany repudiates, sooner or later England will have to repudiate. And if England repudiates, what will be the effect on America, and what will be the effect upon us here in this country? Let me ask also, what will be the political consequences if Germany repudiates? What will be the political consequences within Germany herself, and what will be the political consequences so far as France is concerned?—for we can hardly conceive of France in the temper in which she now is taking this repudiation lying down. What will be the political effect—in the United States, which is soon facing an election? I do not think any of us dare speculate very far upon the effects there would be the world over. Then to complicate the matter we have the trouble in India, and more recently the trouble in China. Never before in the history of the world was there such a serious condition as exists to-day. The situation in 1914 was nothing like so critical as the situation to-day. We have no guarantee whatever of continued peace, and we have much smaller guarantee that the present financial and economic system will last us for very many months longer. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that this house should take seriously the warnings that have been given and from this time on and for the rest of this session should get down to business. The country is awaiting a lead. It is sick and tired of the old political fight that has been going on here. It does not want to hear a rehash of those old speeches any more. It is tired of both the old free trade and protectionist policies along the old lines. If we are to have free trade it will have to be based on other arguments than have been advanced here for the past sixty years. I would say also to my friends on the other side of this house that this country expects a lead from the present government. The government has been placed in a position of responsibility in order to give that lead.

In the speech from the throne there is nothing whatever to suggest any new lines of action or any line of action upon the part of the government that is at all adequate to meet the situation which I have just outlined.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): With due apology to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Woodsworth), I wish to make a brief reference to the speech from the throne, particularly to that portion which refers to the commission that has been appointed to inquire into transportation in Canada. We have been told that a report will be made by this commission and that it will be submitted to parliament. It is not my wish to prescribe a course of conduct for other hon. members, but so far as I am concerned, I am willing to postpone further discussion of this problem until that report is before the house. However, I did a few days ago, before the Canadian Club of Toronto deliver what some have called an address, and to which others have referred in terms less complimentary, in which I gave utterance to views which I entertain concerning the railways. In the course of my remarks I gave some figures. One week later Sir Henry Thornton issued a written statement to the press, and with those unrivalled facilities for publicity which are his, it went the round of all the principal dailies in our country and beyond. Sir Henry Thornton stated that he did not agree with me. That is very natural. I did not expect that he would. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read a few lines from his statement, which was published in the Montreal Star on the first of February:

I am afraid—

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Says Sir Henry Thornton.

—that I cannot endorse either the figures presented or the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Hackett. . . . Mr. Hackett leaves the impression of a vastly greater supply of new capital reaching the railway than was actually the case. He overstates the new capital and credit issues by some $215,000,000, and understates the extent to which these new issues were used for refunding purposes to a further amount of $275,000,000 —a difference in all of $490,000,000.

The difference is substantial, and because it is so substantial I am going to ask, Mr. Speaker that I be permitted to reiterate here exactly what I said in Toronto:

Between April 1, 1919, and December 31, 1931, the Dominion government has advanced to the Canadian National Railways, in cash and in credit $1,422,978,169.07. Add to that $94,680,000 for equipment which has been purchased by the Canadian National Railways, and for which trust notes have been issued and now remain outstanding—these notes have not been guaranteed by the Dominion, but the relationship of the Dominion to the roads is such that it would have to assume responsibility for this amount if the roads are to be continued in operation—and you arrive at the stupendous total of $1,517,658,169.07. Less than $100,000,000 out of this amount was used to retire outstanding obligations.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that I do not expect Sir Henry Thornton to agree with me in the conclusions at which I arrived. I have stated here and elsewhere that the policies which have determined railway expenditures were injudicious, and, so far as these policies were formulated by Sir Henry Thornton, it is only natural that he should not agree with me. It is but natural that he should disagree with me when I state that the roads have spent too much money, but, sir, I do not think he should disagree with me when I state how much the roads have spent, especially when in making that statement I quote the figures of Sir Henry Thornton himself or of his officers. I ask the house to refer, in substantiation of my figures, to page 305 of the report of the select standing committee on railways and canals for the year 1931, for there will be found, with the exception of a few additional figures which I will give, the items making up the total to which I have referred. It will be found that from April 1, 1919, to December 31, 1930, the dominion advanced to the railways $447,226,442.25 in cash. It will further be found that between the same dates the dominion guaranteed the bonds of the national railways in the sum of $569,609,027; $77,073,027 was used to retire outstanding obligations. I draw to your attention. Mr. Speaker, the fact that in my statement in Toronto, I allowed $100,000,000 for retirements. In addition I find on the same page of the same report that the government guaranteed the interest in perpetuity on Grand Trunk Railway guaranteed and debenture stocks then outstanding, having a par value of $216,207,144.67; moreover that the government guaranteed the principal and interest on $34,927,098.20, two per cent Canadian National debenture stock to be issued as exchange for a like amount of Grand Trunk Pacific four per cent perpetual debentures, which have since been reduced to $30,559,114. I find that since December 31, 1930, the government has guaranteed further bonds in the sum of $120,000,000. I find that on the 31st day of December, 1931, among the current liabilities of the Canadian National system appears an item of loans from the Minister of Finance of $38,376,444.15. If anybody has the interest or the patience to add together these several items of which I have given the details and the $94,680,000 representing equipment trust notes, he will arrive at the total which I gave in Toronto of $1,517,658,169.07, from which I deducted $100,000,000 as having been used for retirements.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I may say with all candour that if I have made a mistake and have overstated the amounts which have been advanced by the dominion to the Canadian National system I am delighted to learn it, because it is these hundreds of millions of dollars that are causing so much perturbation throughout the country. But if I have made a mistake the mistake is not mine, because the figures I have given are the figures which were put on the record, less those for 1931, by the officials of the railway when before the special committee last spring.

I think it well that at this time the country should have some realization of the huge amounts that have been required by and paid to the railway, either in cash or in credit, since the first day of April, 1919. Everybody concedes to-day that the railway problem is a serious problem, that it threatens the welfare of the dominion in many ways, and I suggest that just as there is no good to be expected from exaggeration and intemperate language, there is no good to be derived from statements which tend to minimize and mislead. I cannot believe that Sir Henry Thornton wished to play on the words "new capital." I notice that he used those words in his statement. My statement was and is that the amount of money which I have mentioned was supplied by the government either in cash or in credit to the Canadian National Railways between the first day of April, 1919, and the thirty-first day of December, 1931.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it was Cromwell who said to young Lely, the artist, "Paint me as I am or you shall not have a shilling." The Protector was willing that his countenance should go forward to posterity with all its blemishes deeply furrowed as it was by care, by war, by vigil, perhaps by remorse. This required courage. Why is it that we cannot look at this railway problem with a measure of courage? Any time that any person suggests that there may be a wart or a wrinkle on the fair countenance of our railways, his utterance is stigmatized as an "attack" and he is said to be "sniping" at the railways. I believe the sentiment of this house is that the facts should be freely and frankly discussed, that from the truth may flow a remedy for this most intricate, far-reaching and tragic of national ills.

MAFEKING CUT-OFF

TABLING OF REPORT OF ENGINEERS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, yesterday an hon. member asked about the report on the Mafeking cut-off. To-day I wish to table the report made by the engineers with regard to the building of the Mafeking cut-off.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The line is not completed as yet, is it?

Mr. MANION: No, it is not completed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

TRIALS BEFORE STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES IN MANITOBA AND SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7 to amend the criminal code (summary trials).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is a very simple amendment which is proposed. In 1930 section 774 of the criminal code was amended and a special clause was inserted with regard to the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. This is the section of the code which permits the trial of certain offences before stipendiary magistrates. The same section was amended last session, but in that amendment the change made in the previous year was omitted through some oversight. The Attorney General of Manitoba and the Attorney General of Saskatchewan have directed our attention to that omission and have asked to have the section restored as it was in the amendment of 1930. That is the whole object of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CONVEYANCE OF PROHIBITED ARTICLES BY FREIGHT, EXPRESS OR SHIP

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11 to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This amendment is drawn with the idea of preventing the conveyance of prohibited articles by freight, by express or by ship. Such articles are now prohibited from transportation under the Post Office Act, but the Post Office Department points out that they are now sent largely by express, and the object of the amendment is to make it an offence to send prohibited articles by express where they are not allowed to go by mail. The amendment relates chiefly to gambling devices and lottery tickets.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8 to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The amendment to the Juvenile Delinquents Act is also very simple. It arises from the fact that the section as it is now in the statute provides that it is an offence for anyone to contribute, promote or procure a child to become a delinquent, but it has been held by certain magistrates in certain courts that while a man may do all in his power to procure a youth to become a delinquent, if that youth does not actually become a delinquent the man is not punishable. At the request of the province of Manitoba, endorsed by six other provinces and by nearly all the childrens' aid societies in the country, it is proposed now to insert a clause providing that it shall not be a valid defence to a prosecution under this section that notwithstanding the conduct of the accused the child did not in fact become a juvenile delinquent.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9 to amend the Judges Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This refers to allowances made to judges of superior and county courts by way of travelling expenses. It is provided that only in cases where it is ordered by the attorney general of the province shall the judges be entitled to receive travelling expenses for holding courts in districts other than their own.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10 to amend and consolidate the Fisheries Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Duranleau moves that said bill be now read a first time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, surely it is the correct order of procedure for an explanation to be given when it is requested.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The primary purpose of this bill is to amend the Fisheries Act so as to make its provisions conform to the decision of the privy council, which in 1929 determined that certain portions of the Fisheries Act relating to the licensing of fish canneries, reduction plants, whale factories and so on were ultra vires. It is therefore desirable that these provisions be deleted from the existing act. In addition there are some provisions of the act that are regulatory in their character which should be deleted also. A list of the deleted sections is set out on the back of the bill under the heading "summary".

Apart from this the more important changes may be stated as these: Section 2 of the bill adds definitions of certain terms in the act so as to remove any doubt as to their meaning. Section 8 of the bill amends section 8a of the existing act so as to authorize the cancellation of fishery licences where operations thereunder are not in conformity with the law. Under the present act cancellation cannot be made until there has been a report made by a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act. As the main object in licensing those engaged in certain branches of the fisheries is to maintain proper control over them, the requirement of an inquiry by a commissioner nullifies the usefulness of the authority to cancel the licence.

There is also another important change proposed in section 20 of the bill, which amends section 31 of the existing act, having to do with the construction of fishways in power dams and other obstructions. The existing legislation merely enables the minister to require a fishway in such an obstruction after it is built if he deems such to be necessary in the public interest. In certain sections of the country dams are now being built to such a height as to make efficient fishways impracticable, as even if the fish were enabled to ascend them the young fish would be killed in coming back over the dams. The bill provides that in such instances the owners of the dams may be required to establish such fish hatchery facilities as may be necessary to maintain the fisheries.

Mr. NEILL: Will the bill be sent to the committee on marine and fisheries?

Mr. DURANLEAU: After second reading the bill will be referred to the marine and fisheries committee.

Mr. DUFF: Is it intended to consolidate the act?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Then why was another bill introduced yesterday? Why are there two bills?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The bill introduced yesterday is to amend the Fish Inspection Act and the one introduced to-day is to consolidate the Fisheries Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE—SITUATION IN BURNABY, B.C.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave to move the adjournment of the house on a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, to discuss the situation that has arisen in the municipality of Burnaby in the province of British Columbia, where hundreds of men who have been employed on unemployment relief work have not received wages or payment for work so performed, on account of a dispute between the government of British Columbia and the federal government as to accounts rendered; and further, that these men are going in privation and want and their situation is of a dire and urgent nature.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion which the hon. member seeks to make is regulated by standing order 31, which provides:

> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

I think the time has passed, at this sitting of the house, at which the application can be received.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the leave of the house to proceed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I have no objection to the discussion taking place, but I do not think that this motion is of the kind contemplated by the rule. This is a local matter. It comes under the jurisdiction of the province of British Columbia and of the municipality in question—

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I take that view and I make that statement. It may not agree with the views held across the floor of the house but that is my opinion. As I say, I have no objection to the discussion taking place but I would make this suggestion. Would it not be well to let the matter stand until to-morrow, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is in his place. He has had no notice of it.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, he has.

[Mr. Sauve.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: He informs me that he has not and I am prepared to take his word rather than the word of the interrupter. To-morrow we can probably have the papers and the facts. However, if the hon. gentleman desires to go on now he may discuss the matter to his heart's content.

Mr. REID: If I may be allowed a remark, it was not my desire to bring this matter up on the floor of the house. Last Friday I approached the Minister of Labour and informed him that there was a serious situation in the municipality in question. I was promised an interview and I tried in every way to get in touch with the hon. gentleman; I left every opportunity open to discuss the matter with him. As the member for the riding I bring it up now because I believed it to be a matter of urgent public importance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I do not want to take up the time of the house, but I may point out that my hon. friend spoke to me on Friday last, I think, in connection with a return to be made to which reference was made yesterday. With regard to giving me any notice of anything of this character, I have not had any notice whatever from the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not usual for an hon. member to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance without giving notice to the Speaker of the house of his intention so to do, in order that the Speaker may have an opportunity of considering the question which is to be put to the house and deciding whether or not it is a definite question of urgent public importance. True, no objection has been taken to the motion for the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing the matter in question, but the Minister of Justice has suggested—and in this he is supported by the Minister of Labour—that the matter be allowed to stand until to-morrow. If, however, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) insists upon proceeding now, he will probably be within his right to do so. Does the hon. member wish to proceed?

Mr. REID: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to proceed with the discussion to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the hon. member has the right to go on.

Mr. REID: At the outset, Mr. Speaker, may I say to the Minister of Labour that I am sorry a misunderstanding has arisen regarding this matter. When I spoke to him on Friday last, I can assure him that I mentioned definitely the situation in the municipality of Burnaby. Regarding the returns, I did not mention them, and I am sorry that there should have been this misunderstanding, or that the minister should not have gathered correctly what I said. It was with reference to this situation that I spoke to him on Friday when the house rose.

When the act of 1931 was first promulgated it was distinctly understood that the Dominion government would finance all undertakings, inasmuch as under the relief act of 1930 the municipalities found it difficult to do the necessary financing. It was realized at Ottawa that under the 1931 act it would be impossible for municipalities individually to raise money, owing to the condition of the bond market.

After the commencement of the works program advice was received from Victoria that they would be required to finance the unemployment work for the first thirty days. This was presumably to wait the result of the national service loan. They were advised on more than one occasion that should this loan be fully subscribed their financial worries would be over, but so far they have not received any benefit from this loan. Because of broken promises the municipality was forced to shut down all relief work for one week in December. This resulted in a good deal of local suffering and some agitation among the unemployed.

Following this a delegation from the council attended at Victoria and placed before the Minister of Finance the urgent need for prompt payment. This resulted in their receiving, on December 22, the first payment under the 1931 act made to any city or municipality in the province of British Columbia, although, mark you, the work had been proceeding continuously from shortly before October 1, 1931. On January 26 a pay was due to the workers for the preceding week but it was only after repeated telephone messages and telegrams had been sent that a small cheque was released from Victoria to help to meet the pay-roll. In making up the difference between the amount of the cheque received and the amount of the pay-roll, all the available cash and credit of the corporation was used. On February 2 another pay was due but although every possible representation was made to the federal representative, Mr. McGeough, as well as to the Minister of Finance and his deputy, up-to-date no funds have been forthcoming. The bank is adamant in refusing further advances and it is impossible for the municipality of Burnaby to meet the pay-roll of the regular staff, which includes school teachers, members of the police department, and so forth, until the two governments pay their share of the expenditures due under the relief act.

Since the inception of this work the municipality of Burnaby has been faced with the most grievous delays on the part of the two governments. These delays have so affected the faith of the bankers that they will no longer trust any written promises but insist upon actual deposits being made. This is an example of the excuses made: Mr. McGeough and representatives of the provincial government were interviewed, at which time Mr. McGeough stated that the delay was due to the fact that no vouchers had been received at Victoria. It was pointed out that the instructions were to file the vouchers at the government office at New Westminster, but the reply was made by the provincial representative that the New Westminster office was acting under instructions from Victoria and were holding the vouchers pending further orders. Not only had the vouchers in connection with Burnaby been held there but they were holding the vouchers for all of the Fraser valley and Vancouver.

The whole council, aroused by the continued delay, attended at Victoria on December 15. They received a letter from the Minister of Finance to the supervisor of the bank stating that the agreement and moneys would be forthcoming not later than the end of that week. On the strength of this letter the bank advanced funds sufficient to meet a large pay-roll, but this promise was not kept. As a result, the confidence of the bankers has been so shaken that, as previously stated, they refuse to go any further unless a substantial payment is deposited with them. The bank has treated the corporation with the utmost consideration, but they realize the absurdity of this municipality attempting to finance the share of both the provincial and the Dominion governments.

The registered unemployed in this municipality number 3,332 out of a population of 25,500, or, in other words, fifty per cent of the workers are unemployed. The corporation has put 1,600 married men and single men with dependents to work. According to the agreement the government promised to take care of single men and transients, but, as yet, none of this class has been put to work although the program is now practically completed.

It is utterly impossible for the corporation to take care of the unemployment situation by means of direct relief. This is quite apparent from the estimate that it would increase the taxation by two or two and one-half mills per month to take care of the corporation's share.

I would like to quote a telegram received from the Minister of Finance in Victoria. It reads as follows:

Every voucher we received for municipal work up to January 14, 1932, has been passed by us and certificates sent to Ottawa. Directly we receive cheques from Ottawa your share will be forwarded to you.

On forwarding a copy of that telegram to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) we received in reply the following telegram:

The federal government has no contact with municipalities. We act through provinces. We have already advanced the province of British Columbia in anticipation of the receipt of vouchers large sums of money and if you are not receiving payment you must look to the provincial treasurer for relief.

It is because of that I moved the adjournment of the house in order to discuss this matter. Men are suffering in this municipality and the buck is being passed by the provincial to the Dominion government and by the Dominion government back to the provincial government. We in British Columbia are in doubt as to who is really telling the truth.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. member has stated the position of the federal government; will he now state the position of the provincial government?

Mr. REID: The claim is that all vouchers have been sent to Ottawa and immediately they receive payment, the municipality will receive its cheque. On February 3 the members of the provincial house stated that all blame lies on Ottawa, while the Dominion representative, Mr. McGeough, states the province is to blame. I submit that the municipality of Burnaby and the workers should not be made to suffer while these governments decide who is responsible. Teachers and other salaried officials have not been paid and no word has been received of further contributions from Ottawa. No cheques can be issued until additional funds are received from both the provincial and Dominion governments, but the province says: We await payment from the Dominion, and the Dominion government says: There is enough money in British Columbia to meet these payments; look to the provincial government for payment.

It is because of this serious situation that I move the adjournment of the house. The unemployed have organized and the reeve has advised me that he will not be held responsible should any grave crisis arise.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I regret that this matter has been brought to the attention of the house without some notice having been given, because I believe the house is entitled to all information in connection with the operation of The Unemployment and Farm Relief Act and that information should be available to hon. members without delay. Since this matter was first brought up a few moments ago I have obtained some information which I think will in large measure clear the atmosphere so far as the government is concerned. I am not unmindful, nor do I think anyone is who is familiar with them, of the conditions prevailing in British Columbia. The position in that province is perhaps a little more difficult than in any of the other provinces. The reason is obvious. It is well known that British Columbia is blessed, or perhaps, in relation to a matter of this kind, we should say cursed, by a fine climate, with the result that it gets all the drifters and those who are engaged in seasonal occupation.

Just at this juncture I should like to make an observation—not, I may add, in any critical sense—which I think has a direct bearing on the position in which British Columbia at present finds itself. My information is that a large number of the unemployed in that province are very new arrivals in Canada, and an analysis of the figures shows that within sixteen months prior to the first of August, 1930, about 99,000 adult males were induced or invited or encouraged to come into Canada, presumably to settle on farms. A large number of them did not settle on farms. Through various influences they were urged to come here and a large number of those people either have displaced Canadian labour or are at present unemployed. A considerable number of them drifted into British Columbia.

The government's attitude towards that province is exactly the same as its attitude towards the other provinces, except that greater consideration has been given. I have no doubt the province and the municipalities out there have great difficulties to face, because the population is scattered and distances are extensive. I believe in the main the people administering the affairs of the province and the municipalities have done what they can, but their difficulties have not been entirely solved. In the month of August last a representative of this government went to British Columbia and explained to the government of that province a tentative program of work, the details of which were to have been submitted by that province within two weeks. Those details did not reach Ottawa until October 28, and they were immediately reviewed. In a conference between the provincial treasurer of British Columbia and the Department of Labour, a program was adopted involving relief works amounting to approximately $6,000,000. This program was made up as follows:

	Total expenditure	Dominion proportion
Municipal works. .	$2,749,746	$1,374,873
Provincial works. .	3,250,000	1,625,000
Approximately. .	$6,000,000	$3,000,000

That is shortly the outline of the program. According to the agreement which was subsequently entered into, the Dominion government was to be supplied with full details on schedule forms to cover the different provincial and municipal projects, but even to this date we have not received from the provincial authorities the full list of the municipal projects. They may have difficulties with which I am not acquainted, but that is the fact.

According to the agreement, payments were to be made on certificates of expenditures referring to the individual schedules approved, but there was considerable delay on the part of the province in forwarding the certificates of expenditure, and as it was in need of funds to finance both provincial and municipal operations, the following advance payments were made to them by the government.

On December 1, the Dominion loaned the province $500,000 to cover the province's share of expenditures for relief purposes. On the same date, the Dominion advanced the province $500,000, being an advance payment of the Dominion's share of unemployment relief expenditures, accounts as received from the province being applied against this advance. On December 23, a further advance of $800,000 was made to the province as an advance payment against accounts to be received from the province for provincial relief expenditures. On January 20, an advance of a further $500,000 was made to the province pending the approval of accounts which, it was understood, were to be rendered to us immediately. In addition to the above, on November 25 the sum of $3,371,664.69 was advanced by way of loan to the government of British Columbia to take care of maturing obligations in New York. The above loans and advances are secured by treasury notes of the province, so that the house will see that the Dominion government has to the full carried out the agreement with the province.

It will thus be seen that the Dominion government has advanced by way of loan $3,371,664.69 to assist the province of British Columbia in taking care of New York maturities, and has advanced the sum of $2,300,000 against works for relief purposes in that province. In addition to this, during the course of the last week a further $225,000 was advanced to the provincial authorities in order that they might carry on the work in connection with their camps. At the present time the Department of Labour has on hand for British Columbia municipal accounts amounting to approximately $225,000. These accounts are now being checked, and will immediately be credited against the advances already made to the province.

I understand from our representative in Vancouver that they have on hand certificates for provincial works amounting to about $1,000,000, which are being forwarded and which will probably be received by us to-day. When they are received and checked, they will be credited to the advances made. As further accounts are received from the province for municipal and provincial works, they will be passed for payment and credited to the advances made until the advances are wiped out. Thereafter the accounts will be paid to the province. The advance payments against accounts to be received as distinguished from loans to the province for their share of unemployment relief amount to $1,800,000, the other $500,000 being a direct loan to the province to enable it to take care of its share.

One difficulty has arisen between the federal government and the province of British Columbia, which, in the opinion of this government, is not insuperable, and that is the province has apparently been unable to forward its vouchers in accordance with the agreement promptly enough to enable it to carry out properly its financial obligations to the municipalities and to the banks. The federal government has insisted that these vouchers be forwarded promptly in accordance with the terms of the agreement entered into, but owing to the distance from Ottawa to British Columbia and to the fact that the works carried on are in areas scattered all over that great province, certain delays must necessarily occur in assembling, checking and forwarding these vouchers. Recognizing this, the federal government has made these advances in anticipation of the receipt of the vouchers, at the same time instructing its representative in British Columbia to check such vouchers carefully and to facilitate the work as much as possible.

That, shortly, is the position in so far as the Dominion government is concerned. I am not in possession of the particular facts with respect to the district of Burnaby to which the hon. member has referred, but the federal government has not only carried out its agreement to the full with British Columbia, but made these payments to that province far in advance of the receipt of the necessary vouchers to equate them. I think I can assure the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that in spite of his anxiety with respect to the locality to which he has made reference, matters are proceeding out there, particularly in the last month or six weeks, in such a way that I anticipate no great difficulty.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) really trespassed upon the rule of the house which permitted the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) to refer to a specific instance in a specific locality as a matter of recent occurrence, because we on this side of the house do not intend this afternoon to have a general discussion on the unemployment problem or on how that problem has been grossly mismanaged in British Columbia. The hon. Minister of Labour in the first place practically accused the province of British Columbia of admitting too many people into the province prior to 1930, thereby inferentially—

Mr. GORDON: Oh, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I welcome the denial of the minister that the inference was not warranted.

Mr. GORDON: You were Minister of Immigration when these people were coming in.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) deserves the thanks of this house and of his constituents for bringing this most serious and urgent problem to the attention of the minister. I could from the city of Vancouver bring a similar problem, only one of far greater magnitude, to the attention of the minister, for they have since the 23rd of September last received only $12,000 when they were due to have received by the 23rd of January last over $350,000. Here we have a scheme of unemployment relief work and direct relief, a scheme which was fastened on this parliament, a scheme which was the product of the brains of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and of the present Minister of Labour, and for that scheme they and the administration must accept full and final responsibility.

What has happened in British Columbia? If I followed correctly the figures given by the Minister of Labour, he referred to the sum of $3,250,000 having been given for unemployment relief work in British Columbia. Work was commenced on the 25th day of August and ceased on the 28th day of October. Why? We from British Columbia later on in this session want a full and thorough and impartial investigation made into how every cent of this money was expended in the province of British Columbia. It did not go to the men who needed work. It went into the construction of 210 camps in the province. The very day that I left Vancouver for my duties here there were some thousands of men in the city on a straight dole, men who were supposed to get unemployment relief work from the province of British Columbia. When my hon. friend's own leader (Mr. Bennett) spoke in Calgary in the last election, he said that under no conditions would he stand for the dole as a solution of the unemployment problem throughout Canada, and now this afternoon we have the unique spectacle of the new-fledged Minister of Labour in this administration defending its policies by attacking the policies of a Tory government in British Columbia. The spectacle is unique. I repeat that we insist on knowing how much money went into the construction of these camps, and how much of the taxpayers' money went to Tory heelers and henchmen for the supplying of materials in connection with the work. We want to know all these things. We want a final accounting made to show how every cent was spent in British Columbia, because to-day, as the hon. member for New Westminster said, we have thousands of men idle and suffering privation and want because of a definite lack of co-operation between this government and the government of British Columbia. I suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour that if his defence is to have any weight on the floor of this house, he should administer a severe rebuke to those in British Columbia who are so grossly maladministering the affairs of the province.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that there is a very bitter feeling existing in British Columbia as regards the administration of unemployment relief. I am not here to attack the Dominion government, but rather to defend it. I understand that this Mr. McGeough is a Dominion government appointee for the province of British Columbia. I have had no personal contact with him in any way, but those who have come in contact with him speak of him as a man of both ability and integrity, and say that he did his best in a very difficult situation. If there is any blame attaching to the Dominion government, I think it is rather for not having realized sooner the class of government ministers that they were dealing with out there, and in not realizing, as they must now realize, that they will have to take the matter more or less into their own hands before it can be settled.

In September, 1930, when the unemployment relief scheme was inaugurated, I am on record as objecting to the placing of such large administrative powers in the hands of the province. I said that the day would come when we would have complaints to make and would bring them to this house, which is the only place we can bring them, and that we would then be told that the Dominion government was powerless because it had placed the administration of the relief in the hands of the province, and therefore the Dominion government was not responsible. That is exactly what has happened. The Dominion government divested themselves of responsibility for the handling of the money they were giving out. They placed too much confidence and too much power in the hands of the province, and now they are reaping the result. I suggested then that some form of commission should be appointed to control the expenditure, and I am still of that opinion. I do not think anyone in British Columbia, no matter what his politics, will deny that the province has made a complete mess of administering relief. That is the mildest term that even the friends of the provincial government use. Inefficiency is evident at every point. The whole thing reeks with suggestions of graft and corruption. Those are strong words. We in British Columbia have got used to many things in the last few years. We have got used to the idea that if a small settler wants to eke out the scanty living he makes on his farm by a few weeks' work on the government roads, it is highly desirable, if not absolutely essential, for him to join the local Conservative organization. As I say, we have got sort of acclimatized to those conditions, but by the blessing of God I hope that we shall never have to get accustomed to the idea, that when a man is destitute and his wife and children are hungry, if he wants to get even the trivial relief that may be afforded him, he should join some political association. I have been told that a number of registration forms were sent to a certain place accompanied with very definite intimation that no work would be forthcoming for the men unless they joined the local association.

The government started out with a scheme which if properly organized and properly carried out would have been a good one; that is a system of registration. The unfortunate thing is that it was not carried out properly and it was not done by the right people. Government agents in some places, and in others the local police, which is a well organized and reputable body, should have had the handling of that matter. Instead, it was entrusted in some cases to political friends, and they did not make the best use of it. In some cases they stood on the sidewalk, like the man in the Bible, and urged the people to come in. "Don't you want to come in and register and get a job?" I have not the regulations before me, but I remember distinctly that they contained a notice that the registrar, whoever he might be, had no option but to register everybody who applied. Mark that! No discretion was given to the registrar to ask if the man were really destitute —you must remember that destitution is a comparative word and that a man might be in need of work without his last cent being exhausted—I say that no latitude was given to the registrar in that regard. He had to register everyone that applied. The registration form, which I have before me is of such a character, so vaguely drawn, that a millionaire could be allowed to register. One question reads: Have you got funds in the bank? Well, a man might have a thousand dollars or a million dollars in the bank, and if he answered "yes" to that question and swore that his answer was correct he was eligible to get a job, and once he registered he got a ticket more or less automatically.

After the work was suddenly shut down, for reasons that I shall explain in a moment or two, a belated attempt was made to check over this list of people registered and to strike out the names of many thousands who should never have been put on at all. There were instances of men employed on relief work who had a hired man at home working for them. But when this belated attempt was made the work had already been stopped, and so it was of no use because it was impossible for lack of funds to start the work going again. As my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has said the government took it into its head to erect a large number of camps throughout the province. One might say they were equipped almost luxuriously with hot and cold water shower baths, electric lighting plants, and I am informed even radios have been provided in some cases. The tools were furnished on a scale never known before in connection with road work. Every man had enough tools to suffice for ten; every man had a wheel barrow; every man had a ten-foot saw, which was entirely unnecessary, and everything was done on a lavish scale. The material, Mr. Speaker, was all bought at the right place, you may depend. We have instances of blankets being bought at gift stores. I take it, sir, that you know what a gift store is, but if by chance you do not know may I explain it is a place where the word gift is terminated with an "e", and where one many buy trinkets for bridge parties, and things of that nature. Blankets were bought at such places for road camps.

The government of the day in British Columbia took occasion to ask this government for an enormous sum of money—something in the neighbourhood of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. Popular gossip was—and it may have been no more than gossip, but I repeat it for what it is worth—that the intention of the government in British Columbia was, had they received this sum of money, to use it to rush an immediate election, because everybody was going to be working. There was a political straw boss on every four cross roads. An attempt was being made to go on with the Pacific Great Eastern Railway and an election was to be sprung before Christmas. To the credit of this government, however—and I do not know whether it was through the action of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) or his then Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson)—they put their foot down and said, "No, we do not believe that you have 62,000 destitute people in British Columbia"—nor have we, Mr. Speaker. They said "we do not purpose to lend ourselves to anything of the kind; you have spent your money largely on camps; we have agreed to spend pro rata on a fifty-fifty basis for the purpose of relief work. The act suggested and all our regulations suggest that that money shall be spent on relief by giving men work to do. What have you done? You have spent yours, not in riotous living, but on unnecessary camps; and you have hardly a good day's work to show for the expenditure except the employment of a few carpenters who have built the camps." The government of the day said, "We will pay our share on the fifty-fifty basis, but it must be spent for some form of work."

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I rise—

Mr. NEILL: The government of the day was in—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) is rising to a point of order, and I ask that he be heard.

Mr. LAWSON: Surely the hon. member is wandering very far away from the motion before the house. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that standing order 31 is an extraordinary provision to meet an extraordinary condition, namely a matter of urgent public importance. Under this rule a matter may be discussed, so I understand, which could not be brought before the house under the ordinary rules of procedure or in the ordinary course of a session. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has moved a motion; you, sir, have ruled that it is of sufficient public importance to merit debate. What is the motion of the hon. member? It is to discuss a situation which has arisen in the municipality of Burnaby in the province of British Columbia. I listened to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) make a speech in which he endeavoured to capitalize politically an apparent difference of opinion or adjustment of moneys between the government of this dominion and that of the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. LAWSON: He did not direct one word to the situation which has arisen in the municipality of Burnaby. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has digressed to tell us about the general administration of the Unemployment Relief Act in the province of British Columbia and the condition in road camps, but I submit that on an extraordinary motion such as this, hon. members should be strictly confined to the subject matter under discussion, in this instance the situation in the municipality of Burnaby in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: Speaking to the point of order may I say it is a well known rule in this house that if latitude is given to one man it must be given to another. If you say "A" you also must say "B." The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) made a general resumé of the situation in British Columbia and I have done no more. I submit that so long as I can confine myself to generalities of that description I am in order, because I am following strictly the remarks and the precedent established by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must rule that the point raised by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) is well taken. It may be true that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is not transgressing the rule any more than others who have spoken to-day. The Minister of Labour dealt with the subject in a general way, and all hon. members who have spoken have followed his example. Nevertheless the point having been raised by the hon. member for West York that hon. members must address themselves to the particular matter raised by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), the rule must be enforced. Therefore I ask the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and any other hon. members of the house who wish to address themselves to the motion to confine themselves strictly to a discussion of the matter before the house. The discussion must concern a situation which has arisen in the municipality of Burnaby in the province of British Columbia, and may not extend to a discussion of the question of unemployment generally. I ask hon. members to confine their discussion to the situation existing in the municipality of Burnaby, in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I suggest your decision may be all right, but it has been made at the wrong time; it should have been made when the Minister of Labour was speaking. I go on, then, under your direction confining myself to the situation which has arisen in Burnaby, with the feeling that there appears to be one rule for myself and another for other hon. members.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAWSON: I think, sir, to say the least it is an insult to the Speaker of this house when an hon. member suggests that the Speaker applies one ruling to him and another ruling to other hon. members.

Mr. NEILL: I did not say "another ruling."

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not fair for the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to make such a statement, and if he did I should hope he would retract it.

Mr. NEILL: For the sake of harmony—and at such an early date in the session we want harmony—may I say that there is but one rule, but it is applied at a different time to different members. If I may be allowed to—

Mr. MALONEY: In that event I should like to suggest that you, Mr. Speaker, allow the hon. member to rave on.

Mr. NEILL: I am sorry to say that I did not hear the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Reverting to the situation as it applies to the situation in Burnaby, and to the remarks by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), and with the knowledge many hon. members from British Columbia and myself must possess to the effect that the same situation is duplicated in many other parts of British Columbia, I would urge this government to take some really drastic steps to end the situation as revealed by the hon. member for New Westminster. Such conditions cannot be smoothed over in a few days or weeks. It is going to be accentuated, and it will be duplicated in many other parts of the country. I honestly believe that I am speaking in the best interests of the province from which I come when I say to the government that they should seriously consider the appointment of a commissioner with very sweeping powers to go to British Columbia and handle the situation very much as though British Columbia were more or less in the hands of the receiver. I think an able, capable commissioner would put an end to the situation which has been outlined to some extent by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and myself, and I do not believe anything less will meet the situation. It needs a strong, capable man vested with wide powers from this government, and if the situation is not so handled it will get worse. I earnestly hope the Minister of Labour will seriously consider this suggestion.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the situation in Burnaby, and to my mind it is very serious. Every hon. member of this house should be only too glad to devote a little time to the matter if something can be accomplished. Burnaby adjoins my riding of Vancouver North; there we have the same trouble, and in fact it extends over practically the whole of British Columbia. Just because we have perhaps the finest climate in the world, and because a lot of people have gone to Burnaby and other parts of British Columbia, is no reason why they should be allowed to starve. Arrangements were made not only in Burnaby but in other parts of the province for thousands of men to do road work, but to-day if you go there you will find that they are not working. Every hon. member here should be anxious to relieve a situation which, to say the least, has become desperate.

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as a member from British Columbia I am also familiar with the situation in Burnaby. I was there about two weeks ago and could not help seeing that the situation is very serious. But, as my colleague from Vancouver North (Mr. Munn) has said, conditions are the same throughout British Columbia. In Prince Rupert the same condition prevails. I have no criticism to offer of the federal government; I think they were sincere last year when they voted money for unemployment relief, but I must agree with other speakers when they say that the money is being misused in British Columbia. If anything I believe this government should be congratulated upon stopping payments to the province of British Columbia, because I think it has been discovered that the British Columbia government is not capable of handling the money. Not only in Burnaby but in Prince Rupert and other places money was spent for the construction of camps while those who actually needed relief could not get work at all. Most of the men in Burnaby and nearby places received only sixteen days employment. Sixteen days in the fall of the year is not sufficient to keep a man for the winter, so I think if a man could be sent to British Columbia to take charge of affairs, as has been suggested, it would be a great help to the country at large, to the province of British Columbia and to the municipality.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): It was not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this debate, but it seems to me that the reply of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) was extremely weak. Here we have a situation which has arisen because of a dispute between the federal and provincial governments as to the payment of men on relief work in the municipality of Burnaby. It has nothing whatever to do with the climate of British Columbia or with the immigration policies of past governments of this country. It is true that there may be quite a number of transients in the province of British Columbia and also in the municipality of Burnaby, but at present they are not affected by the statement made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). So far as my information goes they are looked after by the provincial government in the camps that were built when the unemployment relief scheme was begun.

[Mr. Munn.]

The main question is this: These men on unemployment relief in Burnaby are working for very low wages; they are working part time, yet, after having done their work, because of the dispute between the two governments they cannot get the pittance which is coming to them. That is the point of the whole matter, and we wish to get some assurance now that in the future they will not have to wait for their money. We do not want to hear about the climate of British Columbia; we know all about that. We do not care particularly to hear about the immigration policies of past governments; we have always protested against them. But at this time we do want to know that when these people have done their work for their low wages, they will not have to suffer further privation through having to wait for the federal and provincial governments to come to an understanding as to how and when they are to be paid.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) wish to reply? If so he will close the debate.

Mr. REID: Before withdrawing the motion I should like to have had some assurance from the Minister of Labour that this situation would be looked into, because I think it is unique in all Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: The practice is to withdraw the motion at the conclusion of the debate, it being a motion for the adjournment of the house, and the debate having concluded early in the sitting. Under such circumstances it is not usual to put the motion. Is the hon. member prepared to withdraw his motion?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Motion withdrawn.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING RELIEF EXPENDITURE IN NEW WESTMINISTER, BURNABY AND RICHMOND

On the motion for papers of Mr. Reid:

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) propose to go on with the motions standing in his name for the production of papers, or does the information given yesterday, and the decision he took then, still apply?

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I realize that the information will be brought down sometime in the future, but some of the information I require is specific in its character, and I rather doubt that the details for which I am asking will be given as fully as I should like when the papers are brought down. However, I will ask that the motions stand in the meantime.

Motions stand.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC RESEARCH

PROBLEMS OF DISTRIBUTION, PURCHASING POWER, EXCHANGE VALUES AND UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer) moved:

Whereas; the problem of production has been largely solved, assisted greatly by the application of scientific methods and the results of organized technical research; and

Whereas; the federal government has contributed to that end by the establishment of the National Council of Scientific Research, and by the financial assistance given to that body; and

Whereas; the problem of distribution, with the kindred questions of purchasing power and the exchange values of agricultural and other commodities, together with their relation to the growing problem of unemployment, are still unsolved, and demand immediate attention with systematized investigation and scientific study; and

Whereas; this can best be done at the instance of the state and by men of scientific training enabled to devote their entire time and attention to the study of this important subject;

Therefore be it resolved; that, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the establishment and maintenance of some organized body for this purpose, which body might be known as the National Council of Social and Economic Research.

He said: It will be readily understood by yourself, Mr. Speaker, and by the members of this house, that in presenting this resolution at this time and under immediate circumstances I am confronted with an unusual and rather unexpected situation. Owing to the early and unlooked-for collapse of the debate on the address, which died as it were almost in the moment of its birth, coupled with the rather striking innovation of yesterday's procedure, I have found myself with but scanty time for preparation. Yet, sir, immediate action is necessary if I am to rescue this motion from the oblivion into which it would otherwise be plunged through the procedure which took place yesterday. Owing to these circumstances I shall be as brief in my address as the subject itself will permit. In this anticipated brevity I shall be following the precedent already set in the first part of this session, a precedent which is a bright and shining example and one which, if persisted in and followed throughout the entire session, will stand as a mark worthy of the emulation of future parliaments and future speakers.

Coming to the resolution itself, I think it will be recognized by the house as identical in purpose and in phraseology with the resolution which I presented a little less than twelve months ago. At that time I went into the question as fully and in as great detail as the forty minutes limitation would permit, and I do not propose at this time to indulge in wearisome repetition nor to traverse the same ground I covered then. Rather, I shall endeavour to bring forward and present some additional arguments in support of the resolution which has now been twice submitted.

In presenting the case last year I discussed as accurately and intelligently as possible the situation as it then existed. I pointed out to the best of my ability the enormous strides which had been taken during the past century in scientific attainment and engineering skill, and in our productive capabilities, based upon both. I also, to the best of my ability, paid tribute to some of the fine work done by the present National Research Council, a body composed of trained and distinguished scientists who, under the aegis of this parliament, and financed by the taxpayers of the country, have given material assistance in solving many of the technical problems with which we have been confronted, in improving our methods of production, and in enabling us to utilize more intelligently the vast and valuable natural resources which are found within the borders of the country. I stated then, and I still believe it true, that the problem of production itself has essentially been solved; that is, that while we have still much to learn as to improvement in methods we are now no longer in danger of shortage or famine. No longer is the problem that of a shortage of the necessaries of life. We have at the present time, and we are able at almost any time to produce, all the necessities and most of the luxuries which are required by the people of this country and by the civilized world. Under these circumstances, and having advanced these arguments at that time—those who are interested may read in Hansard what was said last year by various speakers on this subject—I shall confine myself to-day to the additional argument which I think may well be presented and which I hope will overcome the reluctance that at that time was manifest on the part of the government.

If the subject at that time was of importance, and if the time was then opportune for its presentation, both of which I believe are true, then nothing so far as I can see has transpired during the twelve months that have passed to render the subject of less importance, to make the time less opportune, or to leave the subject matter of this resolution less imperative. Indeed, during those twelve months there has been a progression of events, an increasing severity in the situation itself, a growing tenseness of feeling and opinion throughout this land, which renders it even more imperative that such action as I suggest or some similar action should be taken in the interests alike of this nation and of stable government. One year ago it still seemed possible and many, if not the majority of the people, still thought that this depression was similar, save in magnitude and severity, to those which had passed from time to time over this land. Depressions have come in cyclical succession, they have waxed and waned, and each has been followed almost automatically by a period of relative prosperity. That prosperity again gave place to a succeeding depression of a somewhat similar character.

The present depression has assumed a new and more menacing character. Under former depressions the financial or economic systems suffered comparatively little damage, indeed the systems themselves and their chief devotees and beneficiaries at times were benefited by these depressions. During those periods we found a withdrawal to a large degree of the credit which had been advanced during periods of prosperity, credit which had been advanced to the people of this country at a time when money was comparatively cheap, when its purchase value was comparatively low. This credit was drawn back into the system with compounded interest during the periods of depression when money itself was dear and its purchasing value was doubled or trebled. Therefore those whom I might call the high priests of our economic system might well look with some fortitude, if not with some complacency, upon these depressions.

As I stated before, the present depression has passed this phase. No longer are the only sufferers those who have always suffered during times of depression or deflation. First there was agriculture. Agriculture always suffers first through the crash of price values, through the diminution almost to the vanishing point of its purchasing power and the disappearance of credit. The next to suffer always has been industrial labour which suffers through lack of employment and decreased wage levels. Suffering with them in the natural sequence are the merchants of this country who find their normal sales lessened. The weaker and smaller merchants are threatened with insolvency, while the larger and stronger concerns are threatened with vanishing profits and passed dividends. The present depression is of a changed character or rather it has assumed its true character and its sinister aspects are now generally manifested. Not only the farmer, not only the labourer, not only the small merchant is suffering to-day, but like some deadly paralysis it is penetrating further and further into the system. It is conquering—I will not say destroying—and damaging layer after layer of our industrial and economic structure. Because of the stock market crash we find that not only has the speculator lost his earnings and become reduced to penury, but that the prudent investor, the man or woman who invested in stocks and shares which in normal times were as safe as the Rock of Gibraltar, stocks and shares of sound intrinsic values like the shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is suffering from the effects of passed dividends. In many cases such investors have lost their sources of income and without the means of livelihood upon which they depended they have been reduced to penury. In different parts of the country we find the curious and anomalous situation where men and women with property valued at many thousands of dollars are forced to rely upon relief because their property brings in nothing by way of income. It is a curious, a most significant and sinister situation.

As in the past these periods of depression or of deflation followed one another, many people looked upon them not only as a necessary evil, as perhaps the only imperfection in an otherwise perfect system, but even as a wholesome corrective, a species of economic purgative which cleansed the body politic. They were considered as the result of those bouts of inflation, those orgies of extravagance and over-expansion which we have heard about so frequently. To-day it has gone a little further than that. As I stated, it is creeping through the various layers of society, and everywhere throughout this country, throughout the civilized world as well, men and women are asking for leadership. They are demanding that leadership of those who for the time being are sitting in positions of authority and power. They ask that they be led from such conditions and be restored to what may be termed normal conditions, to a better and more perfect system of society. This demand for leadership, this cry of distress is not confined at this time to a few agitators, it is not heard only amongst the ranks of agriculture or of labour, it is not heard only in this corner of the house, it is heard everywhere, in our universities, in our great cities, in the centres of industry and of economic life. Everywhere we find groups of students and intelligent and thinking citizens gathering together to study and discuss the situation which prevails. They seek a way out and they look to this parliament and this government for the leadership which they require.

As far as Canada is concerned, the responsibility lies here. To what degree has this parliament and has this government offered that leadership? Have they offered any suggestions or remedies which will bring this country to the plane which it should occupy? I remember, when this subject was brought up a little less than twelve months ago, that objections were taken to the establishment of such an organization. Those objections were two-fold. In the first place, we were told that such an organization as was suggested was entirely unnecessary. We were assured that within the ranks of the government itself or of the civil employees would be found that leadership and knowledge which was necessary and from that source would come the remedy which this country demanded. A year has passed and as far as I can see, and as far as the people of this country who are within my knowledge can see, no single step has been taken along the lines indicated. Up to the present moment two suggestions alone have emanated from this source as tending to restore prosperity and to bring to us victory over our difficulties and distress.

The first suggestion is that of relief. Unfortunately relief is a necessary thing. We all admit that it is essential and we all deplore that necessity. Not even the most optimistic can look upon relief as being in any sense a solution of the difficulty or look upon it as in any sense a factor which will do other than, as time goes on, increase the burden which rests upon us, increase the burden of public debt and make the problem more severe instead of lighter. The other suggestion—and that was brought forward the other day—was that the government itself should reduce by 10 per cent the purchasing power of its own employees. I leave it to the house and the country whether that, though possibly a necessary step, showed any indication of leadership or of the way out.

I have sometimes been accused, when I speak as I do to-day, of being a pessimist. I am not a pessimist, nor do I preach a gospel of despair, for this reason: as I look around this country, surveying the magnitude of its achievements, the wealth of its resources, I recognize that those conditions under which we are suffering are not inevitable; they are not necessary; they are not an essential part of this country's life, but they are the result of human error, of human effort, of man-made conditions and as such they always are and always must be susceptible to human control. But to control them, to ride triumphant over the storm, to bring us victory and prosperity, prosperity real, lasting and enduring, we can no longer as a nation, as a civilized world, go on in the same haphazard, ruinous, competitive manner. It is useless, I believe, for us to sit down here talking about this and that and solace ourselves with the belief that if we only endure long enough, if we only tighten our belts a little tighter, if we only economize a little more or eat or drink or use a little less, in some mysterious, miraculous way things will right themselves.

I for one do not believe that. I believe in these days we require and must have a planned economy. A planned economy may be anything or nothing, but at least it indicates in the words themselves some definite purpose and some definite method by which that purpose shall be attained. We require a wise and intelligent use and distribution, not only of our great producing ability but of the products of our toil, the wealth we can produce. To do this we must first acquire a better, more complete and more accurate knowledge of the situation itself and of its causes, of our present system and of its defects, than we now possess. It is for that purpose I again urge upon the house and the government to consider and to create some such body as is indicated in the terms of this resolution.

We were told last year not only that it was unnecessary, but that if we endeavoured to build up a planned economy, if we endeavoured to set up such a body as might assist us to that end, we were opening the doors to the dangers of bolshevism and sovietism. Surely it is nonsense to suggest that there is any relation between a council such as is indicated by this resolution and the somewhat ruthless though efficient despotism that we see in another land. There is no relativity there. We all of us recognize that such a system as we see in that other country is not one which would be suitable to Canada or to the temperament of its people, but we believe it is wrong to be so blinded by prejudice as to refuse to organize or to plan in order to meet and to solve our own difficulties, to utilize to the best advantage our own resources and intelligence because, forsooth, in some other country they have planned and organized along lines which we do not approve. I should be sorry if we were to show such complete lack of intelligence as that. Can we not prove here in Canada and demonstrate to the world that an intelligent and organized cooperation of a free people can do more towards the solution of their own problems and towards the betterment of civilization as a whole than the forced and almost controlled obedience of the people of another land? The challenge is thrown out to us and surely we are men enough in this parliament and country to accept that challenge, to plan along our own lines and to prove that our way, our temperament, our freedom and our cooperation are the best. I should like to see us try that.

We are told again that our troubles are the result of world conditions over which a nation with a scattered population of 10,000,000 can have but little effect, can hold but little influence. But what is the world and what are world conditions? The world is composed of a number of single and separate nations and if each one of those nations assumes that counsel of despair, of inert inferiority, sitting there like a rabbit menaced by a snake in paralysed inertia, then world conditions themselves will swallow and destroy us. Surely it is not necessary for us to assume that attitude. Within this country we have many conditions which are within the control of our own people and we can set ourselves to the task, marshalling our forces, intelligence and resources, to meet and to conquer those conditions which are under our own control. Then and not until then, organized in that way, making the best of our own advantages, we are in a position to offer the cooperation which is essential to meet the international problems which must be approached upon an international scale. It is said, to change the metaphor, that in Holland they keep the streets in a perfect state of cleanliness by each householder keeping his own doorstep clean, and if we as a nation, and other nations would seek to remedy our own defects, to take advantage of our strength, each doing that, we would find a clean street.

The main thing, however, is this: are we to wait, to sit in inertia, to hope for something to come to pass, brought about by a power outside ourselves, or are we to adopt some means first of searching and understanding the causes of the troubles which beset us and then of using all the strength, wealth and intelligence that we possess, to meet those troubles? Which, I ask, is the better and more manly method of meeting the present situation? Difficulties are anticipated? Of course difficulties are anticipated. I assume one difficulty with which we shall be confronted if we are to consider such a national council, will be its cost at a time like this, a time of shrinking revenue, a time when the most rigid economy is necessary. I agree with the necessity of economy, wise economy, but there is such a thing as very unwise economy; there is such a thing as that economy which, if carried to excess, makes impossible in itself the rectification of the situation. I have heard, for example, of men in business who, because times were hard, cut out at the first their advertising, hoping in that way to remedy the situation. I am not in business, but I imagine that such a course would be the last one to pursue. The expenditure of a few thousand dollars, which is all that would be necessary to start in a small experimental way a body such as this, would be money well spent if through its researches we had the least light thrown upon the present black and blind turmoil that we call civilization.

There will undoubtedly be many differences of opinion as to the details of such an organization, and it is for that reason that I refrain from dogmatizing at this time. I am simply contenting myself with enunciating a principle, the principle of research, and a method through which it may be carried on. I am not at present concerned as to the particular type of organization established. All I want to see is this, that we have a body of men of fit and proper character, and with the right kind of training, who will be placed in a position where they may devote their energies, their skill, their training and education to this greatest and most overwhelming of all our problems. It might be a body, for example, composed of representatives nominated by different industrial and other groups throughout the country. It might be one sort or another, and therefore I am not dogmatic about it at all. I am prepared to accept, and accept with gratification, any step forward which will tend to bring us out of the morass in which we find ourselves struggling to-day. Undoubtedly this suggestion, as any other suggestion, is open to criticism. The easiest thing in the world is to criticize, to point out defects, but, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the first duty of a critic who points out a weakness in another's suggestion is to bring forward himself a suggestion of a constructive character, which will be an improvement upon the method first suggested. I am willing to accept any suggestion of that sort.

Here we are. The year passes on and we find ourselves not having taken a single step forward. We find ourselves spending huge sums of money for relief, and we find ourselves praying for something to happen in some miraculous way that will relieve us and get us out of this inertia, not now complacent, but helpless inertia, where like Micawber we are simply waiting for something to turn up. It is that attitude which I challenge. Undoubtedly part of our troubles are international in character. There is the question of reparations and international obligations, all of which have a bearing on the matter. But it is unnecessary to go beyond the borders of this country to see the part which debts and indebtedness play in the problem which confronts us. I believe that the internal indebtedness of Canada is just as great a handicap and places just as great a weight upon the shoulders of our people as are the reparations which cannot be paid or the international debts which might just as well be forgotten. Within this country we have some control over our own financial affairs and our own internal indebtedness.

I am simply suggesting lines upon which we might travel. We cannot shield ourselves behind world conditions. We cannot treat world conditions as an excuse for doing nothing ourselves within our own country. Not long ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), in addressing a great gathering of some religious body, is reported to have said, and to have said wisely and well, that only the grace of God could place Canada in the place which she should occupy. Those words were wise and true, but there is an old proverb, Mr. Speaker, that says God helps the man who helps himself, and I urge upon this government and upon parliament the organization of some such body as is suggested within this resolution as a first and essential step in self-help, without which we need not expect and do not deserve the help of either God or man.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): As the seconder of this resolution I wish to make a few observations. Let me first congratulate the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) upon the very able manner in which he has presented this matter to the house. I think all who listened to his presentation of this question at the last session of parliament and again this afternoon will agree that he has presented it with such clarity and forcefulness that it is difficult to understand why the house should not at once accept the resolution unanimously.

In my opinion never was the time more opportune and never was the necessity so great for the appointment of a council such as this resolution calls for, if we are going to meet our present situation intelligently. Someone has said that times are improving. Are they? Last year our bigwigs of finance told us that prosperity was just around the corner. A year has passed, and the corner is still elusive. Is there a man to-day who knows just what the future holds in store? We have all read what Sir George Paish has said, and which was printed in the press within the last month or so. Another great economist, Sir Basil Blackett, has warned the world that action is needed to halt the crisis. I quote:

Sir Basil Blackett, British banker and industrialist, warned the world in a radio address from London that it faced a gloomier year in 1932 unless it exercised concerted control of its economic life and forestalled disastrous political troubles.

"There is a kind of optimism inborn in nearly all of us" he said in part, "which tries to console us with the comforting thought that trade depressions always right themselves somehow, and that this one will be no exception. . . . It is just this unreason that makes the prospects for 1932 seem to be so alarming, coupled with the desperately short time that is left for finding and applying the right remedies before it is too late. Both its intensity and its world-wide character make the present depression totally different from any that has gone before. Surely we have suffered enough already to make us face the facts. But are we facing the facts?

"More and more we are getting back to primitive methods of barter. We have forgotten that money was invented in order to be dealt with solely as a means of facilitating the exchange of desirable things. We have taken to using gold not as a standard of value—but as an everyday means of making and receiving payments.

"How can a farmer expect to avoid bankruptcy if a mortgage of $5,000, which was equal in 1924 to the price of 2,500 bushels of wheat, to him represents in 1931 the price of nearly 6,000 bushels of wheat, and if things go on as they are, may represent 7,500 or more bushels in 1932.

"The first essential to recovery is a rise in wholesale prices, especially of primary products from their present disastrous low level, and then the essential next step is to stabilize the purchasing power of money.

"In the last few years the rise in the purchasing power of money and the disastrous fall in prices have redistributed the ownership of wealth as between the various classes of the community without rhyme or reason in a way that is socially most inequitable and have then gone on to cause a vast destruction of pre-existing wealth, and what is even worse, a vast curtailment of the community's production of new wealth."

[Mr. Lucas.]

Our engineers and scientists, Mr. Speaker, readily overcome the most difficult problems, but our political and economical science belongs to the past, and before any real progress can be made and real and lasting prosperity can be restored many of our old ideas will have to be overhauled and scrapped or brought up to date.

Someone has said:

New times demand new measures and new men.
The world advances, and in time outgrows
The laws that in our fathers' day were best.
And, doubtless, after us, some purer scheme
Will be shaped out by wiser men than we,
Made wiser by the steady growth of truth.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, we need men with minds unafraid to travel, even though the trail be not blazed. I wish definitely to state that I am not a believer in communistic doctrines; I believe the Russian people have a problem of their own, which it is their duty to solve. Their problem however is different entirely from what we have in Canada. As the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) pointed out we have, at least for the time being, solved the problem of production, our great task to-day is to secure the proper distribution of wealth among those who create it. That is our task, and I care not from what source I get ideas if they will help me out of the difficulty in which I find myself. The Russian people have embarked upon a wonderful experiment; as far as I am concerned I wish them God speed and trust their activities will bring a brighter and happier day to a people who have known nothing but oppression.

I am impressed with the fact that they have a problem and to meet it have adopted a plan, with a definite object in view. How much better would Canada have been to-day had we started out in the development of our great country with a definite plan before us. Speaking recently about the Royal Commission on Transportation Sir Henry Thornton is quoted in the press as saying, "The only thing wrong about the royal commission is that it did not sit forty years ago." Visualize what the difference would have been had we started out with a definite plan of railway development. To-day we are duplicating our railways and highways without any idea of the outcome. In the settlement of the three western provinces comprising millions of acres, we had no plan. People poured in from all parts of the world and settled where they pleased. We had no plan for the development of our immense pulp and paper resources with the result that that industry is demoralized, over-developed and millions of dollars have been lost.

Canada, along with the rest of the world, is in the midst of the greatest depression known to civilization. A person sitting on Mars and taking a bird's eye view of world conditions would certainly come to the conclusion that we are anything but intelligent people. My statement may seem paradoxical, but to me the one bright spot on the horizon lies in the seriousness of the situation. Great Britain, with her stubborn pride, refused to go off the gold standard until she was forced to do so. It seems to me that we will do nothing until conditions become so serious that we shall be forced to take action. We are content to cling to old methods which have served their purpose but outlived their usefulness. As the hon. member for Red Deer pointed out, our trouble to-day is entirely man made; we have created a machine of which we have nearly lost control. Control is imperative, however, or we will go under.

One great trouble to-day is the confusion of thought. Everyone admits there is something wrong, but few can agree on real causes and remedies. If our scientists can solve almost any industrial problem placed before them, surely it is not unreasonable to suppose that men with scientific training given the task of finding a solution to our social and economic ills would be able to do something to meet it.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, from an experience of twenty-five years in industry I am in a position to tell the mover and seconder of the resolution that many of the great men in industry both in Canada and the United States would welcome any plan whatever to stabilize industry and to make more permanent the period of time employees might be engaged therein.

There is nothing new in the suggestion of an industrial economic council. I believe it was the great Bismarck, who in 1881, first advocated the inauguration of an advisory industrial committee in Germany. Germany did nothing with the suggestion made by Bismarck until after the war, but in 1919 when the German National Convention met at Weimar there was incorporated in their constitution provision for the setting up of an advisory council to assist in the expansion of German industry and to increase the permanency of the employment of all engaged therein. Anything which will assist in keeping our industries operating and in making employment more permanent has my hearty support. The German council consisted of 326 delegates, representing all of the various economic groups into which industrial peoples are divided. There was provision for equal representation by employers and employed, there being 163 representatives in each group. The council met monthly in the year 1920, met again in 1921 and again in 1922. Before the expiration of the year 1922 the German republic found the cost of the council too great, and since that time a smaller committee has been functioning in an advisory capacity. I presume the council discusses various bills pertaining to industry and economics generally, and sends its recommendation to the ministers of the German government under whose jurisdiction these various matters come.

Following the adoption by Germany of the principle of an economic council eight other European countries adopted the principle. Jugo-Slavia followed the example in 1921, and Poland adopted the principle but did not put it into effect. Spain and Portugal both adopted it, but owing to their economic and other troubles they have not operated it as yet. France adopted it in 1925 and Italy and Great Britain in 1930, while during the present year the republic to our south has had a committee meeting at Washington. That committee went further; it sent what was called referendum 58 throughout the United States, and as a result of their work the committee recommended to the government at Washington the adoption of some plan such as an economic council. Each of these countries has a different plan of operation, but only two, France and Germany, have put their plans into effect. The others have not yet shown what an economic council can do, but as I said a moment ago I am convinced that any council or advisory board that can assist industry and, through industry, assist labour, will be welcomed by the hundreds of thousands of men engaged in labour and by those controlling the capital of the plants which provide employment.

Perhaps owing to the present depression, this subject is more or less paramount to-day. Since 1790 we on this continent have gone through twenty-five periods of prosperity, and we are now in the twenty-fourth period of depression. After each of the great wars has come a period of depression. There was the Napoleonic war, the strife in Europe during the sixties and early seventies, the civil war in the United States and later the great war, and after each of those war periods the world experienced two depressions. There was the primary post-war period depression which we had about 1920-1922, and the secondary post-war depression through which we are now passing. I have made a diligent study of each of those depressions, and I have no hesitation in saying that conditions during the present depression are being grappled with by all countries—and I may say particularly by our own country—in a better manner than was the case at any time during former depressions. It is because of that better handling of the situation that we are not now experiencing the terrible times through which the world went following the Napoleonic wars and the two depressions which came after it, or the conditions which obtained following the civil war in the United States. I want to be fair to all governments; I honestly believe they are doing the best they can under the circumstances to grapple with conditions, and that is particularly true of the government of Canada. I do not like to make narrow, partisan statements, and I would say this if any other party was in power doing the same thing. I believe in giving the present government unstinted credit for the fact that the situation is not much worse in Canada.

Why an economic council? I think as a result of the tremendous upheaval of the war, conditions have arisen that will require the best brains of every part of the country and of every group into which the people are divided. The Great war brought about a condition, particularly with regard to machinery, that did not exist in the world previous to that time. Owing to the terrific demand for man power and for material during the war, all governments encouraged their ablest men, their scientists, their technicians, their business men and their experts all along the line to produce machinery that would do away with a large part of manual labour. I do not want anyone to think I am not in favour of having the best machinery; quite the contrary. The best machinery cuts down the cost of production, and the more we cut down costs the more we create a demand for that which the machine produces. But in my time I have seen the hours of labour shortened from twelve hours a day to eight hours a day, and if the machine is to continue to displace man power as it has in the past, then I think perhaps under present conditions—I do not advocate that it should be a permanent change—the machine should not operate too many hours.

Let me give one or two instances. In Milwaukee there was a plant manufacturing frames for motor cars. The capacity of the plant was 10,000 frames per day, and it employed 2,000 people working eight hours a day. Owing to the war and the subsequent period of expansion, that company found it necessary to manufacture motor car frames much more quickly, so they installed a massive machine which filled the whole plant. To-day 200 men operating that machine turn out 10,000 motor car frames per day, so in that one case we have 1,800 men displaced by machinery. I could give many similar examples, but I will not go further along that line.

Then there is another situation which has developed during the last few years. Prior to 1919 there were many thousands of companies employing five men or less, and the number had been increasing all the time up to that year. But because of the demand for greater production with fewer employees many mergers took place, with the result that after 1919 the number of companies employing five men or less decreased by one-third.

So I say I believe that the best brains of the country should consider these matters. I do not intimate for a moment that the government are not capable of dealing with them, but in these serious times it could do no harm to call upon the best brains both inside and outside of parliament.

Let me go a step further along that line. What can an economic council plan for? A great many of the ablest men in the United States, including employers of labour, appeared before the economic committee at Washington and testified along certain lines. During an investigation I made recently I took occasion to discuss the matter with employers of labour and I am glad to say I learned that the great industrialists were all willing and anxious, as they were at Washington, to do anything they could to relieve the unemployment situation and to place the engagement of labour on a more permanent basis. One of the things suggested was a shortening of the hours of labour or the number of work days per week. Whether that is sound or not I am not prepared at the moment to say, but an advisory council could assist in the discussion of that question. Another thing: everywhere I found the employers of labour convinced that the time has come when some system should be adopted whereby men who are unemployed should be able to draw from some fund to which they have contributed and which has been built up partly as a result of their own labours. Some call this unemployment insurance. Call it what you will; I think the time has come when in periods of prosperity, when things are bounding along, industry is running full blast and wages are good, there should be some system of laying by a fund to tide men over times of depression, because such times are bound to recur. Depressions have followed one another and may continue to do so, but it is up to the public men of to-day to consider some method of mitigating the distress of any future depression, so that conditions will not be as severe on the people, when a period of depression does come, as they are to-day.

I think an economic council might discuss some plan of re-education for men who are displaced. I have often wondered that for example a machine can be put into operation which will displace eighteen hundred men out of two thousand; and one machine operating in the city of St. Louis required seventy-four men where formerly there were seven thousand, without some provision being made to absorb the displaced men. An economic council could look into a matter of that kind and devise some system of re-education. I learned of two very good examples of re-education in the city of New York. A coal company down there decided to dismiss all teamsters and discard all wagons that had been delivering coal and instead to deliver coal by trucks. The men belonged to a teamsters' organization whose secretary must have been a very wise and able man, because apparently he had saved up enough in the treasury to purchase a truck, and with this he re-educated the teamsters in truck driving, so that when trucks began to be used not a man who could drive one was laid off. Some plan of re-education could be suggested by an economic council or whatever you choose to call such a body. I am not tied up to the name economic council or advisory council, so long as there is a body which will consider keeping men employed and industry in operation.

I am convinced that every man in this house, irrespective of party, is just as anxious as I am to support any plan that will alleviate distress, keep industry going and maintain men in employment. It is not at all a party question; it is a national question, a question in which we are all interested, and particularly the great mass of humanity in the country. I shall be happy to support any plan whatever that will achieve satisfactory results, keeping employees occupied and regulating production and consumption. I know very well that as a result of the war production has far exceeded consumption. The extent of productive machinery has brought that about and we must restore a relationship between production and consumption if we are to stabilize conditions and keep industry going. If the plan proposed by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) and supported by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) will bring about such a happy condition, it will have my hearty support.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Last year the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) presented a resolution similar to this. It is true, as he stated a few moments ago, that at that time I questioned the practicability of the appointment of such a body and indicated to the house that within the ranks of the civil service of Canada there were men competent to study these problems and to advise upon them. I could possibly stop here and simply repeat the same thing. I do not wish, however, to be discourteous to my hon. friend or to treat lightly the very valuable proposition that he puts forward—valuable from this standpoint, that it is provocative of study and thought. I shall very briefly review the resolution and glance over the remarks so eloquently made by the hon. gentleman in support of his proposal and then, if time permits, I shall make one or two observations of my own on the general theme.

It will be noticed that the resolution postulates certain things and then proceeds to make a suggestion. In the first place, it states that the problems of production are largely solved. In a measure that is true. My hon. friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) has just indicated from a practical standpoint what tremendous strides science has made along the lines of production. As he observed a moment ago, there is no news in this; it is something which almost everyone who has been studying economic questions readily recognizes. Production has made tremendous strides during recent years, particularly since the years of the Great war, when it was stimulated by the necessities which arose at that time. As far as the resolution deals with that particular phase I think it can be accepted.

Mention is made of the National Council on Scientific and Industrial Research, and in this connection I agree with the resolution. While I do not believe that Canada has made the progress which might be hoped for and which we expect ultimately to achieve in industrial and scientific research, nevertheless considerable progress has been made and the foundation has been well laid for a research body which will, I think, compare favourably with that of any other country located as Canada is.

The resolution then goes on to deal with certain unsolved problems. It states that the problem of distribution is unsolved, and mentions also the problems of purchasing power, exchange values and unemployment. These are problems imminently before the people, and they are all unsolved. The resolution then proceeds to demand a systematic investigation and scientific study of these problems by the state. The practical point in the resolution is that it calls for an organized body for this purpose.

My hon. friend has very ably stated his case, and I compliment him, as I have on previous occasions, on the moderateness and eloquence of his language in presenting it. Cheerfully I pay tribute to his statements to-day. He describes the troubles and perplexities of different classes of people. He points out that there is undoubtedly suffering among agriculturists, small merchants and others, and he brings the description of this condition to a very simple head by calling it "the system". I do not intend to cast reflection upon the remarks of my hon. friend, but may I say: that it is a very simple thing to come before this house or appear before any audience and describe the perplexities and embarrassments with which humanity is confronted. My hon. friend has said that we lack leadership. That is a trite saying which is heard almost daily. There is no question but that we lack leadership. We lack men, not only in this country but throughout the world, who have minds sufficiently colossal to enable them to grasp, understand and analyze these problems and then present a well worked out and complete solution therefor. I get a little restive when I hear a retailing of the problems with which we are confronted, the casting of a reflection because they are still unsolved, and nothing more. My study of history, such as it has been, and my experience in and out of parliament, has taught me one thing if it has taught me nothing else, and that is that the problems, perplexities and difficulties by which we are faced are not overcome by a mere statement of them. They are overcome by the age-old method of line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little, and in no other way. This cry for leadership might be almost characterized as the cry of the helpless. If we are going to cry for leadership, we should exhibit a little practical effort in the solving of these problems. I followed my hon. friend with great care, and while admiring his presentation I listened in vain for one practical suggestion. I ask him to reflect on that.

His final appeal both last year and this year was for the appointment of some body of men to deal with the problems to which he alludes, although he does not say how this body is to be constituted. In that most elementary step there are perplexities. Does the hon. member want a body of men chosen from the economic staffs of our universities? Choose from the universities of Canada the most outstanding economists, gather them together and ask them to tackle this problem, and what would be the result? With all respect to the splendid intelligence of these men, many of whom I know personally; with all respect to their genuineness and the value of their researches, I venture this statement: they would labour for months, possibly for years, without bringing forward a practical solution of the problems with which we are confronted. If the objective is to be a short cut to what my hon. friend calls a planned economy; if we are expected to present to parliament or to the country some scheme which is fully worked out in all its detail, then I say to my hon. friend that failure will dog his steps from the very outset. It cannot be achieved in that way.

What does my hon. friend mean by a planned economy? That is a term to play with—I was going to say a term to trifle with. This word "plan" has been almost immortalized by the efforts of the great Soviet republic, and in saying that I cast no reflection upon that republic or its efforts. I have read a great deal in this regard, and I have been appalled at the magnitude of the task undertaken; I have been almost overwhelmed with the mass of detail which is encumbering their efforts in the working out of their great scheme. No one can study this so-called plan, really the only great economic plan before the world to-day, and fail to recognize that in a country like Canada, peopled as it is by individuals who have rooted in their very nature the most extraordinary type of individualism, the demand for free action, the right of freedom of movement from one part of the country to the other and the right to engage in any pursuit, this so-called planned economy would be very inappropriate.

My hon. friend says that in this planned economy he wants a more equitable distribution of wealth. That is an old-time, worn-out observation which I have heard for the last forty years. It is a very nice thing to have as an objective, and it is one to which we would all subscribe. But when we come to study the problem of first the cause, shall I say, using the old term, of wealth, and then the distribution of wealth, we are confronted at once with all the human elements that enter in. We are confronted with such things as human selfishness, one of the most invidious and difficult elements of human nature to deal with or to overcome. My hon. friend will find this: plan out a scheme that on the surface may appear to be perfect in form, equitable in all its aspects, and yet the minute you come to put it into operation there springs up the human element with its selfish and other tendencies. Therefore it is an easy thing, I say, to present to the house a demand for leadership, for equity, for this, that and the other thing, but I notice there is a strange dearth of useful and practical suggestions of how these things can be achieved.

A word or two, if I may, regarding the general scheme. The problem is not by any means simple. My hon. friend complains that since last year nothing has been done towards the achievement of the ideals that he enunciates in the resolution. I am not so sure that my hon. friend, with all his ability and his time, has spent any more thought or energy on the study of this very problem than I have. I know I have spent many anxious hours trying, in the administration of a department over which I happen now to preside, dealing with trade and with commerce, to find out how we can influence the movement of commerce so that there may be an easier and more equitable flow of goods from one part of the world to another, and, indeed, from one part of the country to another. That is only one tiny phase of the problem, if I may say so; yet one is confronted with terrific difficulties wherever one moves. I have spent hours and days on perhaps one little item or one little detail. I could cite a dozen of them this afternoon. Let me take one problem which just occurs to me, that of the marketing of potatoes from the maritime provinces. My hon. friends from that section are aware they have certain grievances which probably they will air in the house during the next few days. I just cite that. In the department over which I preside, able officers, experienced men, are daily addressing themselves to that and to scores of other problems in the hope that they may solve them.

My hon. friend suggests—scarcely suggests, but insinuates by the very presentation of his case, that there is possible the formation of a general, broad plan which will override all those little difficulties and which will give to this country easy, smooth sailing. I confess to him frankly that I see no possibility of any such thing. At the present time—and by the way, my hon. friend rather emphasizes the existing depression and the economic conditions of to-day—there enter into this question world factors which are far beyond anything with which Canada can deal. He has already cited that. He says that will be advanced as an excuse. I do not advance it as an excuse; I advance it as a very real, definite obstacle in the way. Let us take, for instance, the question of international exchange, the present value of the moneys of the different countries of the world, something over which we have no control, something which is influenced by other factors with which I shall not deal this afternoon but which are very real. Australia, for example, has its currency at a discount of 25 per cent of Great Britain's, approximately 40 per cent of Canada's and 50 per cent of the United States. I cite just that one country as an illustration. Is it not at once apparent what an immense problem presents itself in the movement of trade among even those four countries where you have four, definite, distinct values of the currency of the country in order to make settlement for the interchange of goods? If you step outside of that realm and take, for instance, the orient, there you have an exchange situation fluctuating hourly, which definitely makes or breaks the movement of goods over a period not of days but of hours. So one has but to cast one's vision over the world for a moment to recognize the fact that the problems confronting us are not of a character that are lying dormant, waiting for some supermind to come along and outline a scheme which will furnish a solution and the problem will immediately vanish.

I said a moment ago that these things will come, not by some plan or scheme, but rather by our tackling them step by step, day by day, and hour by hour and working them out in that way. I am not unmindful of the fact that there are certain great world economic problems that call for study and solution. For instance, the question of a stabilized world currency is undoubtedly one of the problems facing the world. I agree with my hon. friend to this extent, that unless and until something in the nature of stabilization of world currency is achieved, there will not be a condition of stabilization in the movement of commerce. In other words, you may have a market one day and lose it the next by virtue of fluctuations in exchange in countries other than the two doing the trading. But I repeat that I recognize fully that some of those problems must be faced.

Let us take, for instance, another problem, the question of shipping, of transport. We have in the last twenty years made tremendous strides in the matter of transport. As from day to day I study the problems with which one is faced, it is amazing to me to be suddenly confronted with the fact that certain ships, which in my memory I look upon as recent, are to-day absolutely obsolete, and I am told that the reason certain trade avenues are, shall I say, dropping off in their efficiency, is simply because those ships have not been replaced by modern ships. Those ships are only ten, twelve or fourteen years old. While in transport there have been tremendous strides, great developments, nevertheless the rapidity with which we are demanding the movement of goods constitutes a very real problem and that carries with it the further problem of the control, the direction of transport, whether it shall be subsidized or state owned. These are the practical problems which are confronting not this nation alone, but the nations of the world, and which are calling for solution.

Let me come now more directly to the resolution itself. My hon. friend asks, to use his own language, for some body of men and I think he said for some body of intelligent men. I have studied this question; I have approached sympathetically the kernel of his resolution, namely that we should make researches in this direction. In fact, last year, before the resolution was on the order paper at all, I had in mind that something of the character might be done. But I state to him again now that if we were to adopt this resolution and start to-morrow to organize this body, we would be confronted with a very grave difficulty and I should like to have heard from him or to hear from some other member who may yet speak upon this resolution, some suggestion of the constitution of this body. I would not be satisfied simply with some body of intelligent men unless there was on that body representatives of practical commerce and industry; for instance, representatives of leaders of industry. I do not say that with any reflection on the workers in industry, but because the men who know the problems are the men who are actually confronted with them and are seeking solutions for them within the ambit of their own activities. Then also you would have to have leaders of commerce, leaders of shipping, and theoretical economists, men who have studied economics from a theoretical standpoint. All of these might be on such a body, and at once you recognize, when I have stated that, that we are getting an unwieldy body. I say to my hon. friend that it is very nice, very convenient sometimes, to suggest that these things should be done, but it is a very different thing to bring together a body of men who will give practical results from their investigation.

I said last year that we had in the employment of the government, in the ranks of the civil service, some very able men. Let me briefly refer to that. In the Bureau of Statistics, for instance, we have some very able economists, men who are daily studying the movement of trade, and compiling figures and giving to the country a very excellent service in that regard. We have in the Department of Agriculture men who have been trained in agriculture and who are acquainted with the producers' standpoint and also with the marketing end. In my own department we have, in the commercial intelligence branch, men who have been trained for years in studying questions relating to the markets of the world, and so forth. In my estimation it is quite possible that we have within our own ranks to-day the intelligence and the experience necessary to give adequate study to this problem. I will go so far as to say this to my hon. friend: I will add to the studies I have already given to this question, and they are not slight, further study with a view to seeing if we cannot give effect to the idea of the resolution by utilizing those that we have in the government service, without disregarding for a moment such trained economists as may be engaged in the various universities or assisting in industry or finance and other branches.

I do, however, wish to impress upon the house that if we start out to form a body such as is called for in this resolution there is a grave danger that we will do either one of two things: Erect a body which to be representative must be so large that it will be cumbersome and useless, or have a body composed of theorists without practical experience whose utterances would have no sanction in the way of practice either by the government or by the country. That danger is there and it is very real. I do not raise these points simply to create obstacles in the way of carrying out the suggestion which has been so ably presented by my hon. friend from Red Deer, but simply because from a long and considered study of the problem I am very conscious of the difficulties which do present themselves. It is doubtless correct to say that in these times through which we and the whole world are now passing we approach the study of economic and sociological problems in a manner different from that which we were inclined to adopt in years gone by. The rapidity of communication and transport has made of this world a very small entity. Not a day passes but one can pick up his newspaper and in fifteen minutes by glancing over the headlines get a fairly good picture of the activities of the world. Not only that, but countries that one could name by the score, which ten years ago had no influence in world affairs at all, are to-day standing forth and impressing upon other countries of the world the significance of problems peculiar to themselves—countries which had no recognition whatsoever a few years ago. So we must approach these problems differently.

Then we do not look upon industrial problems to-day as we did ten or twelve years ago. We have completely outgrown the old method of conflict between employer and employee. True there are remnants of that still with us, but my hon. friends who represent labour in this house will be bound I think to acknowledge that tremendous progress has been made in that regard. Not that the whole problem has been solved, not that every man engaged in labour to-day is able to enjoy comfort and ease. Certainly that has not been achieved, but the time has passed when, in considering the problems of capital and labour, they were approached from the standpoint that one was the enemy of the other. I think that the thinkers of the world, whether they be in politics or in economics or other branches of educational thought, all recognize that it is through the spirit of co-operation that we are going to achieve the greatest successes. I do deprecate the suggestion that all we have to do is to trot out the present system and condemn it in one sweeping gesture, and suggest the replacing of it with some other system, and that that solves the problem. That is not the case and will not be the case in my estimation. There are in the system so called that we have to-day, many things that are good and that are worthy of being maintained and preserved, and these ought to be carefully guarded and not recklessly swept aside. On the other hand, there are no doubt grievances, inequities, faults and weaknesses which ought to be and must be corrected as rapidly as possible. But again, I submit, progress will be made in these matters more by attacking these problems day by day and step by step rather than by seeking some new and great theory that will replace the so-called theories of the present. I would suggest this to my hon. friend. If he will accept this reservation, that the suggestion contained in the resolution is presented to the government for their earnest and sympathetic study—I assure him that so far as I am concerned it will receive that, and there will also be a very genuine effort on my part to achieve something commensurate with the ideas expressed in the resolution—if my hon. friend will accept those assurances and be agreeable to letting the resolution pass in that form, we will accept it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I imagine that there is no doubt about the mover of the resolution (Mr. Speakman) accepting the suggestion the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has made, but in connection with what the minister has said I would like to repeat a remark or two I made on the last occasion when this subject was under discussion in the house.

The object of the resolution is twofold: first, affirmation of the necessity of research in social and economic questions; second, the setting up of an organized body for that purpose. Last year I pointed out to the mover of the resolution that so far as an organized body for the purpose mentioned is concerned, that body is already in existence. It would require, of course, some enlargement of point of view on the part of the ministry to give to the existing body the additional scope which the mover of the resolution has in mind, but we have already in existence a National Research Council. This is the abbreviated title as given in the revised statutes. The act creating the council was passed at the time of the war. Provision was made for a council for scientific and industrial research, and the act was drawn in sufficiently broad terms to enable the ministry to make use of that body for any purpose that came within not only the terms scientific and industrial research, but social and economic research as well. My recollection is that the act provides for a committee composed of four or five ministers who constitute a committee on scientific and industrial research. That committee may refer to the council anything it wishes in the way of research and in turn the council has authority to make provision for the research work referred to it.

The minister has said that the mover of the resolution has not made a practical suggestion. May I say to him that last year I made the practical suggestion that the government should refer to a group of expert economists or social workers the great question of the relief of unemployment, and that the body in existence to which I have referred might very well be the agency under which, for a period of at least a year, such a group might function. That suggestion was along practical lines and was one of which the ministry might well have taken advantage. They have not appointed a commission to investigate unemployment relief; everything was left to a minister of the crown who has broken down through the strain and stress of his duties. We have been spending millions of dollars of public money on unemployment relief and have nothing to show for it except an increase in the public debt. On the other hand, if there had been a body of trained and interested minds working on this question the ministry might at this time have been in a position to go forward with just the sort of further action the mover of the resolution has in mind. Some practical scheme laid before this parliament relating either to unemployment insurance or to some more effective means of cooperation between the provinces and municipalities, and the Dominion government would have been a vast help in dealing with existing conditions.

I do not wish unduly to prolong the debate but I repeat that if to-morrow a bill were brought into this house to create a national council on social and economic research such as my hon. friend has in mind, the bill would be framed on lines identical with the legislation providing for scientific and industrial research. I feel there would be no advantage in a duplication of legislation, but I do think the present measure might well be enlarged, and that the ministry might make use of the body already in existence by assigning to additional individuals the duty of research along social and economic lines.

The minister has said he would not be satisfied with certain people. May I say to him that the statute authorizes him to name whom he likes. A committee of the cabinet has the power to say who shall constitute the advisory committee of the industrial research council, and the act provides for the appointment of fifteen men. Surely the government could find in this number a sufficient number of members of a research council to serve their purposes. Did I not think the government, under the statute already in existence, could deal with social and economic questions I would support a separate act of parliament to provide as my hon. friend from Red Deer has indicated. At this time however the less there is by way of additional expenditure the better. I am heart and soul with him in his desire to have social and economic questions investigated, and more attention given to them by the government of the day. Attention up to the present has been given almost exclusively to questions having to do with the increase of material wealth. Let us realize that times are changing, and that problems affecting human life and well-being are infinitely more important than those having to do with the increase of national wealth.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*FREIGHT CHARGES ON GRAIN

Mr. NEILL:

1. Has the government heard the appeal submitted to it September, 1930, of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan against the ruling of the railway board permitting higher freight charges on grain from the prairies to British Columbia, for local consumption than if for export?
2. If the appeal has been heard when will the decision be given?
3. If not heard, will an early date be fixed for the hearing?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this question, Mr. Speaker, an appeal was lodged against the decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. That appeal has not been heard by the present government and it is impossible to say when a date will be fixed for the hearing. Tentative dates were fixed, but none was finally agreed upon, and the appeal has not been heard up to this time.

*TRADE WITH RUSSIA

Mr. DUGUAY:

1. Has the Russian government made a proposal to the Canadian government to purchase $5,000,000 worth of aluminum in exchange for other goods?
2. If so, what was the answer of the government?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to the first part of the question is no; the answer to the second part is that it is answered by the reply to the first.

2. If so, on what date was the assurance given?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did I understand the minister to say that this question should be passed as an order for return? I would respectfully point out that it only asks a simple question as to whether any assurance was given.

Mr. BENNETT: There is an inference to be drawn from the documents; that is the answer.

LAWYERS EMPLOYED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. BARRETTE:

1. What are the names of lawyers or firms of lawyers who have been assigned government cases in the province of Quebec, since July 28, 1930: (a) for the Department of Justice; (b) for the Department of National Revenue; (c) for the Department of Finance; (d) for the Department of Secretary of State and External Affairs; (e) for the Department of Railways and Canals (1) the railway commission; (2) the administration of railways; (f) for the Department of Marine and Fisheries; (g) for the Post Office Department; (h) for the Department of the Interior; (i) for the Department of Immigration and Mines; (j) for the Department of National Defence; (k) for the Department of Pensions and National Health; (l) for the Department of Public Works; (m) for the Department of Agriculture; (n) for the Department of Trade and Commerce; (o) for the Department of Labour?

OLD AGE PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, legislation was passed last year providing for the payment by the federal government of 75 per cent of the amount spent on old age pensions. May I ask when these payments will be made by the federal government?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman might put his question on the order paper; it involves consideration, and there has been much correspondence between the provinces and the dominion.

NEW ZEALAND TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) when he expects to be able to make an announcement to the house with regard to the New Zealand treaty?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Not for a few days.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF PROPOSED TEN PER CENT DEDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. FRANKLIN AHEARN (Ottawa): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government, when the bill to reduce civil service salaries by 10 per cent is introduced, to name a select committee of this house which will be empowered to hear any representations which may be made by those most affected by the measure?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The answer is no.

SEED AND FEED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I should like to direct a few words to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and in order to make my point clear I will quote freely from the Winnipeg Free Press of February 9, 1932:

> Word still is being awaited from Ottawa concerning Premier Bracken's plea for dominion aid in the cost of shipping seed grain and feed for live stock to farmers in the drought afflicted areas. This was the information given to J. T. McCallum, reeve of Arthur, in the southwestern part of the province, when he called on the provincial Department of Agriculture Monday morning.

The minister will recall a conversation I had with him a few days ago, and he will recognize the fact that this statement does not quite harmonize with what he said to me on that occasion. I wish to request the Minister of Agriculture to make a full statement to the house on this question of seed and feed grains at the earliest possible opportunity. It is an important question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: This does not appear to be a question which should be directed to the ministry on the orders of the day.

AUSTRALIAN TREATY RATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Last year when the treaty between Australia and Canada was being discussed I directed the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to what I considered to be a discrepancy between the preference given on canned salmon and that given on canned crustaceans. At that time the minister stated that he had done the best he could with Australia, but I asked him to take up the matter again and he said he would be glad to discuss it with that country. I would like to know if the minister has had an opportunity of doing so.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): We have had many very satisfactory conversations with representatives of Australia since that time, and without any notice of the question I cannot say offhand just what has been done in this regard. I am under the impression that the matter has been fairly well covered.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister look it up?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC RESEARCH

PROBLEMS OF DISTRIBUTION, PURCHASING POWER, EXCHANGE VALUES AND UNEMPLOYMENT

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Speakman:

> Whereas; the problem of production has been largely solved, assisted greatly by the application of scientific methods and the results of organized technical research; and
> Whereas; the federal government has contributed to that end by the establishment of the National Council of Scientific Research, and by the financial assistance given to that body; and
> Whereas; the problem of distribution, with the kindred questions of purchasing power and the exchange values of agricultural and other commodities, together with their relation to the growing problem of unemployment, are still unsolved, and demand immediate attention with systematized investigation and scientific study; and
> Whereas; this can best be done at the instance of the state and by men of scientific training enabled to devote their entire time and attention to the study of this important subject;
> Therefore be it resolved; that, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the establishment and maintenance of some organized body for this purpose, which body might be known as the National Council of Social and Economic Research.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman). I will summarize its subject matter briefly. It calls to our attention the fact that the problem of production has been to a very large extent solved; that scientific research has greatly contributed to that solution, and that the government has recognized the services of science in that respect and has organized and financed a national council of scientific research. Then the resolution goes on to point out that there are still to be solved some very grave economic problems, for which solutions have not yet been found either in Canada or any other country; it suggests that a body should be organized to take up the study of these questions, and that such body should be known as a national council of social and economic research.

The hon. member for Red Deer brought this matter before the house last session, and on that occasion the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) was highly critical of the suggestion. In his speech yesterday the minister was still very critical indeed, as well as somewhat sceptical of the anticipated results of such a proposal, but withal he exhibited a tolerant if not a receptive attitude of mind, so I would congratulate the hon. member for Red Deer on having made at least some progress with respect to an idea.

I think we might say that the history of philosophy flows into two main streams of thought. The one is that the individual has absolute freedom, that the human being is free to plan and do as he may will. This idea is epitomized in the words "I am the captain of my soul; I am the master of my fate." That is the one idea. The other is that of historical materialism, as it is sometimes called; the idea of economic determinism, that everything is determined by certain economic conditions. These two ideas run through the history of philosophy. The philosophy of history, which is a very different thing from the history of philosophy, shows that both streams flow together into the great sea of human activity. In other words, the ultimate depends as much upon the reaction of the human mind to the events as it does upon the events themselves. I hold the view that there is possible a wise and prudent action which can be taken to meet any given situation but that action is not likely to be wise or prudent unless there is a thorough knowledge of all the facts embraced in the particular situation. Holding that view with regard to matters of social and economic import to the nation, I hold also the view that some body should be entrusted with the responsibility of pursuing and systematizing the study of national matters, with the common weal as the objective. The governments of all countries, as well as the government of Canada, are endeavouring to function to some extent in that capacity. No doubt each government attempts to plan its work in the best way it can, no doubt each government has in view the common weal but the tremendous task of administrative work and the carrying out of legislative policies, especially in times such as these, entirely absorbs the attention of the statesmen, and we cannot expect them to make a special study of the problems which are to-day so pressing.

We have proposed in previous sessions, as we do now, that the government should take into consideration the creation of a body to be known as the council of social and economic research. This body would devote itself to the study of social and economic problems with the viewpoint of the national well-being. It would give the same attention to these matters which scientists in the past have devoted to the question of production and so forth. We believe that this function should be performed by a body other than an administrative body, insmuch as that body always will have sufficient to do in carrying on the ordinary affairs of state. For upwards of a century and a half scientific research has made great strides in the field of production, its contribution to human progress has been amazing and beyond all possible computation. Governments throughout the world have recognized the value of scientific research in matters of industrial pursuit and our own National Council of Scientific and Industrial Research is an example of the foresight displayed by Canadian governments both of to-day and of the past in respect to the value of scientific information in connection with production.

Scientific methods of production however when accompanied by unscientific methods of distribution constitute in a general way the modern problem. I do not hesitate to say that our council of scientific research will do more harm than good if it is not supplemented by social and economic research. Still further to increase production which is to-day so great that we do not know what to do with it, without paying attention to the other half of the problem, that of distribution, will make our problem more acute than ever.

Those of us who believe in the possibility of a planned national economy are sometimes characterized as bolshevists and dangerous characters. I have no objection to being thus characterized. Nevertheless I may say that I advocate the idea embodied in this resolution in the hope that bolshevism may be unnecessary. In my opinion there is no way by which we can prevent the disruption of the world other than by the intelligent planning of the affairs of the peoples and of the countries of the world. If there is no planned defence against chaos, then we will have bolshevism; if we act according to plan, we can avoid such catastrophes.

The hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) made a telling point in his speech of yesterday. He referred to the great problem which faces Canada to-day in connection with her railways and he suggested that if plans had been laid some years ago in connection with the transportation system we would not now be saddled with a problem which is almost too heavy to be borne. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the speech he delivered a few days ago made reference to this railway problem. He said something to the effect that it was difficult to explain why there should have been such a rush to build three transcontinental railways to serve less than ten million people. The reason that was done was because no one had any reason for doing anything, they just did it. Our railroad system grew just as Topsy grew, and we are now faced with the difficulty which that kind of policy brings to any people or to any nation. It must be clear that if there had been any planning from a national viewpoint at the commencement of our railroad policy then the government of to-day would not be confronted with the great problem which now confronts them. I question whether many of us are able to appreciate the magnitude of that problem.

That is an example of the lack of planning. Meanwhile we are building up other systems just as thoughtlessly and just as carelessly which in the near future will result in problems for some other government to solve. It must be clear to everyone that any attempt at planning, even though it is not as successful as it might be, even though it bristles with difficulties as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) pointed out, will have some effect in easing the problems of future statesmanship. Some hon. members may be impatient because our proposal may appear to be very abstract, far away from the balancing of the budget and the equalization of freight rates, a considerable distance away from revenue and all that sort of thing, but we do not expect that the budget will be balanced this year as a result of the adoption of our proposal of planned economy. While we regard our proposal as being quite practical we know that the results will not be apparent at the moment. However, we do argue that its results some day will be very apparent and serviceable to the state. This is the time to begin to plan to prevent the occurrence of some things with which we may have difficulty in our public life years hence.

We appreciate the difficulties which will confront any government which undertakes to establish a body of this kind. I may not appreciate the difficulty to the same extent as does the Minister of Trade and Commerce, some of the difficulties may be never absolutely overcome but we should not stop trying to do a thing because there are difficulties in the way, those difficulties must be overcome in one way or another. Any one of the difficulties which were mentioned yesterday by the minister might have been just as appropriately brought forward as an objection to the scientific research council which is now functioning. It might have been said at the inception of this council: Where will you get your men? Will you go to the universities for them or will you find them at the head of great industrial enterprises? Will you put pure theorists or bolshevists in charge? Who will you put into your scientific research council? The same questions can be asked now. But those difficulties are not insurmountable.

There are those to-day who are fearful for the survival of the economic system. I do not know whether it is going to survive or not. I would say that it has no more claim on eternal life than any other economic system, nor has civilization for that matter. Civilizations in the past have come and gone and we do not know but what ours may go too, although I agree with the minister when he said yesterday that in the present system there are many things which are well worthy of being safeguarded. Nevertheless nobody knows whether the present system is going to survive the existing crisis or not. Supposing we just for the moment imagine it does not survive. Then what? Surely if there is the barest possibility of its not surviving, then we ought to be planning what we are to do when it ceases to exist. But take the other alternative. Supposing it does survive; supposing once more we crawl out of this bog of depression and start on our next cycle. In that event this is the moment to begin planning to prevent the next depression, for just as surely as we emerge with the system as it now is, just as certainly will the next depression fall upon us and it will be more depressed than this one. We shall be deeper in the bog, and if we are going to try to avoid that, now is the day and the hour to begin. There is no use in talking now about this depression; we cannot do anything but try to adjust ourselves to it and carry on. We should have been planning against this ten years ago. If we had done so, it could have been avoided. The next depression can be avoided if we begin now to plan against it.

The minister charged yesterday that we had not been very practical in the suggestions and that he had some difficulty in understanding just what we meant by national planning and what function we expected to be performed by such a body as we proposed. I want to touch for a little on the practical side of the question and I do not think I can do better than read a very short selection from a modern school book which I have no doubt the minister has read, because I know he is an omnivorous reader on matters of this sort. Perhaps the house will bear with me while I read this excerpt from this school book which is entitled "What happens when they work without a plan."

Mr. Fox acquires money—one million dollars. But money must not remain idle. Mr. Fox looks through newspapers, he consults friends, he employs agents. From morning till night the agents comb the city, look about, and make inquiries. What is to be done with the money of Mr. Fox?

At last a business is found. Hats! That is what one should make. Hats sell; men get rich.

There is nothing to hesitate about. Mr. Fox builds a hat factory.

The same idea occurs at the same time to Mr. Box, and Mr. Crox, and Mr. Nox. And they all begin to build hat factories simultaneously.

Within half a year there are several new hat factories in the country. Shops are filled to the ceiling with hat-boxes. Store rooms are bursting with them. Everywhere there are posters, signs, advertisements; hat, hats, hats. A great many more hats are made than are needed—twice as many, three times as many. And the factories continue to work at full speed.

And here something happens that neither Mr. Fox, nor Mr. Box, nor Mr. Nox, nor Mr. Crox anticipated. The public stops buying hats. Mr. Nox lowers his price twenty cents; Mr. Crox, forty cents; Mr. Fox sells hats at a loss in order to get rid of them. But business grows worse and worse.

In all of the papers advertisements appear:

> You may have only one head, but that does not mean at all that you should wear only one hat. Every American should have three hats.
> Buy the hats of Mr. Fox!

Mr. Box offers to sell hats on a three-year instalment plan.

Mr. Nox announces a sale:

> Only for one day! Take advantage of this opportunity!

But this does not help. Mr. Fox lowers the wages of his workers one dollar a week. Mr. Crox lowers the wages two dollars a week. Again business grows worse and worse.

All at once—stop! Mr. Fox closes his factory. Two thousand workers are discharged and permitted to go wherever they please. The following day the factory of Mr. Nox stops. In a week practically all hat factories are standing idle. Thousands of workers are without work. New machines grow rusty, buildings are sold for wreckage.

A year or two pass. The hats bought from Nox, Fox, Box, and Crox wear out. The public once more begins to buy hats. Hat stores become empty. From the top shelves dusty cartons are taken down. There are not enough hats. Prices on hats go up.

And now, not Mr. Fox, but a certain Mr. Doodle, thinks of a profitable business—the building of a hat factory. The same idea also enters the heads of other wise and business-like people—Mr. Boodle, Mr. Foodle, and Mr. Noodle. And the old story begins over again.

There is the story of production on the north American continent, and as well of all the countries of the world. There is absolutely no preparation, no planning, with the result that in connection with some commodities we have a tremendous over-production, and in connection with others, we may have too little. For instance, there is nobody in Canada to-day that knows whether there will be enough boots made in this country next year to go on the feet of the Canadian people. Nobody is looking into that matter. We leave that to chance. Nobody knows whether in Canada next year there will be enough wheat to feed the Canadian people. We take a chance on that because we say the farmers are so foolish they will grow wheat for nothing, so that they will continue doing that.

There is absolutely no plan in any country that I know of that takes care of the national economy in such a way that we may feel sure that production will be sufficient; that it will not be wasteful; that it will not be too much. That is a function that I say has not been performed in any country and it is one that must be performed if we are to avoid disaster in the future. I am not saying that this task should be undertaken by the Department of Trade and Commerce; I am not saying that it should be undertaken as a political matter; I am saying that it should be undertaken as a national, scientific scheme with a view to running the affairs of the country on an intelligent basis.

Let me cite a few more practical suggestions. It was suggested that this national planning was only a phrase which we were in danger of using just to sound wise and, well, trifle with. Let us look at a practical suggestion. Take the issuance of currency and credit in Canada for the years 1931 or 1932, or 1933, the years that are coming. Can there be any question more important to the business welfare, the commercial welfare and indeed the very welfare of the people than that? But there is no planning about it. There is no way of controlling the issuance of currency or credit so that it has the proper volume in relation to the business to be done. That is just left, as in the case of the way in which Mr. Cox and Mr. Nox built their hat factories, to competition between two or three bankers, and that is all the regulation there is. The result is only too apparent.

Take another illustration. Take the investments of insurance funds, an enormous amount of money collected from the people of Canada entrusted to a few private individuals to invest largely for their own gain, because the gains do not return to the policy holders. Think of how some companies invest their money in highly speculative stocks; consider the endangering of these investments. Insurance companies may invest the money they control either inside Canada or outside. Consider the direct effect upon the industrial life of Canada of the investment of such an enormous amount. The effect is tremendous. But there is no national voice which directs how that money shall be invested. It may be invested in mines in Timbuctoo or in soap factories in the Argentine, if they have any there, or in any other industry in any other part of the world. So far as Canada is concerned there is no direction at all. That is a practical proposition for a council such as is suggested in the resolution to deal with.

Then take the question of production itself. No planning is made with regard to quantity of production in Canada or in any other country, so far as I know, except perhaps in Russia. Nor is there any planning with regard to the quality, nor with regard to the variety of production. In this connection I should like to quote a sentence or two from Mr. Stuart Chase, a very orthodox authority whose opinion ought to count for a good deal in an argument on this question. He says:

> We drown in a sea of things which we do not use, which we lose, which get out of style, which we give to friends and which they do not need, which disappear somewhere; fountain pens, cigar lighters, cheap rings, razors, endless trinkets, gew-gaws. We destroy mountains of good iron ore and an endless quantity of horsepower in order in a few months to fill rubbish cans with them.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the hon. member say who Mr. Stuart Chase is?

Mr. IRVINE: I cannot give his pedigree but he is a member of the labour bureau of the United States and a man of considerable authority on practical economics. He has written works on the tragedy of nations and so forth. He is, of course, an American. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is the kind of thing we should do some planning about—the quantity and quality and variety of production. About the only product in Canada that we try to look after to-day in regard to quality is the farmers' wheat. We are very particular to grade the farmers' wheat No. 1 or No. 6, but I do not know anyone who is grading boots or undershirts or anything else we have to buy except the products of the farm. The quality of these different products ought to be guaranteed by the state so that a man would know that when he is buying an article he is getting what he is paying for. That is a matter that should be thoroughly supervised. There should be supervision of production with regard to quantity, quality and variety. There are thousands of things that we do not need at all that are just being made by speculators to make money for themselves by producing some article that tickles the fancy of the public.

How are we going to get a body to consider all these things? I do not believe that it is impossible at all. I will conclude my remarks by saying that we believe that the contribution of science in the field of sociology and political economy can be just as great and just as effective as it has been in the field of production. We feel that the great task of our time is a sociological task; not so much a problem of production, although we do not want to lose sight of that. We believe that unless we can solve the sociological problem as adequately as we have solved the production problem we cannot avoid chaos, and so we urge that the government should give reasonable consideration to our suggestion. We do not expect that to-morrow we shall have a fully fledged scientific bureau at work dealing with these matters, but we hope to create a body of opinion in Canada that will more and more look towards a higher and better knowledge for solutions of the problems of our day, and we trust that steps will be taken very soon to develop such a body charged with such a function. That is our hope in supporting this resolution.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): I desire to make one or two observations with regard to the resolution, not by way of criticism at all, but in an effort to get some enlightenment. I do not propose to attempt to follow my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Irvine) through the maze of his arguments except to say that I am very much afraid that when he undertakes to mould the Canadian people into a character that would accept the grading of our boots and our hats and our coats and specifying that they must be of a particular type and kind and put on the market at a particular time, he will be faced with very considerable difficulty.

I wish to refer to one paragraph of the resolution itself:

> Whereas; the problem of distribution, with the kindred questions of purchasing power and the exchange values of agricultural and other commodities, together with their relation to the growing problem of unemployment, are still unsolved, and demand immediate attention with systematized investigation and scientific study;

In that connection I also wish to refer to a phrase that was used by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution (Mr. Speakman), who referred to the creation of a planned economy that would solve the problems that are dealt with in the paragraph of the resolution which I have just quoted. I take it that what the hon. member has in mind is some plan which will enable us to distribute the products that we create to the satisfaction of the producer on the one hand and of the consumer on the other. If we in this dominion were confined within an airtight compartment independent of all other nations and all other plans, we might reach some measure of success in carrying out the idea which my hon. friend has in mind. I would mention three commodities that we produce in Canada which to-day owing to the industrial conditions are exercising a dire effect on the economic life of our whole country. One of them, the chief, I would say, is the wheat of western Canada. Another is pulp and paper, and the third is lumber. I take the liberty of saying that if these three industries were on a sound and profitable basis our problems in Canada would be very largely solved. But how are we going to work out a plan that will solve the difficulties of these industries? Very few years ago, after an intensive study on the part of those who know, or at least think they understand the question of the production and marketing of wheat, a plan was worked out that seemed at the time to be very satisfactory to that industry. Businessmen all over this country thought the plan was satisfactory, but while that plan was being put into effect somebody else in some other part of the world was working out a different plan. The Argentine, Russia and the wheat-consuming countries in Europe had a different plan entirely from ours, and our plan with regard to wheat went completely to pieces in 1928 and 1929.

The pulp and paper association were working on a plan in connection with their industry, and they had worked out a plan that seemed to be perfect in itself. They could produce and sell because there were consumers to buy, but the market on the North American continent fell from under them, and the result was that their plan went to pieces.

The producers of lumber are in a similar situation. I happen to know something about that myself because for the last year and a half I have been working in association with many others on a plan by which the product which I am engaged in turning out could be put on the British market, but while I was engaged on that plan others were working out an entirely different plan and their plan took that market away from us.

We might trace back through the life of any man who is sitting in this house and see what the plan of that life has been; we might begin by working out a plan such as the hon. member for Red Deer has suggested, stating how much wheat we should produce, how much beef, how much butter, how much lumber, how many pairs of boots, and so on. Following his suggestion, and losing sight altogether of all the other people whose activities we cannot in the least degree control, I wonder what would happen to our plan? As the minister said yesterday, the whole progress of the world has been based on the gradual evolution which men have created by progressing, one step at a time. The position mankind now occupies has not been the result of any definite, fixed plan, and in my judgment to attempt to work out a plan by which we would absolutely control production by saying to this man, "You do this," or "You do that" is not reasonable. The time may come when that may take place, but in my opinion we will not get out of our present difficulties by endeavouring to formulate a plan such as that. On the other hand, we might reach a solution of our troubles, if the problems, now taxing the best brains in the world, were fairly faced by everybody. We will not reach a solution however by any effort to organize a plan which will control what we produce, what we sell, how we produce it and how we sell it.

I should like someone to go to the independent farmers of western Canada and say to one of them, "You must grow wheat," to another, "You must grow barley;" to another, "You must sell this" and to another, "You must sell that"—and at such and such a price. I am very much afraid any organization attempting such a plan would find itself up against very serious difficulties.

I am not going to discuss what is being done in a country about which we hear a great deal. The Russian people and their plan may be all right but, as the minister said yesterday afternoon, to attempt to apply their scheme to an Anglo-Saxon people, to Canadians, would result in nothing but ultimate failure. During the last session and for several previous sessions I listened to speeches such as those we heard yesterday. I am not in the least critical; any hon. member who listened must have admired the manner in which the hon. member for Red Deer presented his case, but up to this moment these gentlemen who have apparently given so much thought and care to the subject have not placed before the house, so far as I know, one constructive suggestion as to how this plan may be worked out, who will work it out, or how it will operate after it has been prepared.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if there are no other speakers to participate in the discussion I should like to say a few words regarding the resolution before the house. It is with some hesitation that I enter upon the debate because last year when I supported the motion of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) and in the course of my remarks mentioned some of the planning that had been done in France and Germany, and then went on to outline the outstanding example of planning in Russia, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) seized upon the mention of Russia to discredit the scheme put forward by the hon. member for Red Deer. I thought the action of the minister was hardly fair because I know the hon. member for Red Deer had not the Russian plan in mind. I should like to say at this juncture that the proposition suggested by him is wholly different from the plan carried out in Russia. In my judgment it is not at all probable that under a competitive system such as we have to-day effect could be given to the resolution of the hon. member. I wish his suggestion however could be given a fair trial, because even under a competitive system we might make some advances in the direction of rational thinking and the rational conduct of our affairs. As I have said, however, I believe a thorough carrying out of a system of planned economy involves a very radical change in our entire economic system.

During the course of this debate several references have been made to the soviet republic. I think the hon. member for Red Deer himself spoke about the system in operation in that country, and said that it is not one suitable to Canada. He referred also to the forced and almost controlled obedience of the people of another land. For a few moments I should like to direct the attention of hon. members to the situation in Russia. During the past few months I had the opportunity of spending a few weeks in that country. I do not suppose any other hon. member has been there, and for that reason possibly the house will not resent a very brief description of what is going on. It seems curious that in this country there is such an apprehension when mention is made of Russia. I understand, according to the press, that certain regular newspapers printed in English published in Russia have been forbidden the mails of this country, and certain ilustrated journals published in Russia containing no propaganda whatever have been given similar treatment.

Upon arriving in England I noticed the Russian ambassador lived in an old town house situated in the very best section of the city of London. I noticed that the headquarters of the soviet republic were located at Busch House just off the Strand within easy access of anyone. I notice that the British chambers of commerce have recently urged upon the government the establishment of a trade treaty with Russia. In fact, although a great many people criticize severely, Russia is not considered in England as a bogey country, and the people are free to speak about it. One day, while attending the House of Commons at Westminster I heard certain policies of Russia discussed. I heard Lady Astor, who had just returned from Russia, rise in her place to reply to the Duchess of Atholl, and throughout there was very free discussion.

At home here, when a discussion of the economic policy of Russia occurs, someone jumps up and says "What about the religious ideas of the people of Russia" or "What about their secret police"? May I say that there are secret police activities in Italy, but when we discuss the economic policies of Mussolini we are not expected to reply to all the criticisms which may be made with regard to the secret police of that country. When we are discussing a trade treaty with Japan we do not have to go into a discussion of the feudal system, relics of which still exist in that country. I should like to say that in this house we should be in a position to discuss the economic policy of any country in the world without necessarily having to endorse everything done in that country or having to defend ourselves from charges of belonging to the Communist party. I think that ought to be made clear. I do not belong to the Communist party, but I think there are many features in the system adopted by the great republic of Russia which we should study with the utmost care, and if I had my way we would send a delegation from this house representative of all parties to study such phases of that economic system as might be applicable in Canada. In the first place may I point out that the two countries, Canada and Russia, differ entirely in their history and in the psychology of their peoples. So no one proposes that we introduce exactly the policies that they have in operation in Russia, or that we follow along exactly the same line of procedure. But I would point this out, that the revolution in Russia did not come as the result of an organized group of revolutionaries; it came because of the failure of the then existing system and of the failure of the old Russian regime to provide for the needs of the people. The armies returned in the latter part of the Great war, broken and hungry; there was no provision whatever for the feeding of the masses of the people; in fact the whole productive machine was almost broken down; so there came a great revolution. And let me say that that revolution was not started by the peasants, nor by the industrial workers; it was started by the business men of Russia when they made an attempt to set up what might be termed a "business men's regime"—a parliamentary system. That was the first revolution. It was only because that revolution failed that the industrial workers came upon the scene and brought about the second revolution, which resulted in the setting up of the soviet system of government.

That system of government has been very much misunderstood in this country. The Russians had no parliamentary institutions of any kind whatever; they had to build from the ground up, and so they called together representatives of the three great parties in the state at that time—the industrial workers, the agricultural workers, or peasants, and the soldiers, many of whom had not been demobilized. They simply said: We will get councils from these three groups to meet together and devise a new system of government. As I understand, the word "soviet" simply means "council." Thereupon these councils of farmers, industrial workers and soldiers came together and began to work out a system of government.

What had to be accomplished, and what was accomplished? To begin with, they had almost no productive machinery. We have been about a century and a half building up our present productive system in western Europe; we have gradually extended our small factories until they became large factories, we have developed our railways, we have introduced agricultural machinery, and we have built up our great organization of distribution. The Russians began without anything of that character whatever. Almost eighty-five per cent of their people lived on the land as peasants, farming in a very small way; they had a few wealthy merchants, but no great middle class such as we have; they had a bureaucracy that carried things with a high hand, and a nobility that seemed to be entirely lacking in sympathy with the aims of the great majority of the people. The Russians had to depend largely on the countries of Europe for their capital to develop their industries, and, as we know, France had extended a very large credit to Russia.

As I say, the Soviets had to begin from the bottom. The old nobility and the old merchant classes were swept out of the way. Naturally they resisted, and they set up counter-revolutions, with the result that for several years there was civil war. As is well-known, most of the countries of Europe backed the counter-revolutionaries, even Canada sending a contingent to assist the so-called White armies. The soviet government had everything against them, financially and politically but gradually they wore down opposition, until to-day, whether we like it or not, the soviet government is considered by the great majority of Europeans as being a going concern. There seems to be no organized opposition within the country itself—in fact organized opposition is very, very dangerous because of the secret police and the methods which those police employ. I am not going into that. But there is the political situation—a great, stable organization governing an enormous territory peopled by a number of different nationalities. The first thing accomplished, then, was the wiping out of the old regime; the soviet got rid of those who had been riding on the backs of the common people. I quite admit that the methods employed to accomplish this were ruthless, but they succeeded in freeing the common people—the industrial workers and the peasants—from this incubus.

How did the soviet government set to work to organize the industrial and economic fabric of the country? There are two or three things to be borne in mind in this connection, and this is the reason that induced me on the spur of the moment to speak on this question to-day. The Russian government felt the need of planning, and the fact that they had no large industries enabled them to plan from the ground up, and thus avoid the anarchy in industry that prevails in other countries to-day. They said: We will plan for the needs of the people. Now, while I must compliment the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) on the moderation of his speech in which he gave the house something worth while, I think it is hardly in keeping with the major portion of his remarks that he should suggest that the member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) and the member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) are really trying to bring about a system under which the people would be told just what kind of clothes or what size of boots or what style of hats they should wear. Nothing of the kind. We are down to serious business now, and I think we should give serious attention to it. The Russians felt: We are almost entirely lacking in agricultural machinery; it is necessary we should provide for the next two, three or four years so many tractors in order to do the work which is apparently essential to provide for the needs of this country and for our export markets; if we are to provide so many tractors we must have so many tractor factories. Therefore they proceeded to set up tractor factories sufficient in number to meet the needs of their agricultural population. Or they said: We are almost entirely lacking in rolling stock and other railway equipment—no one can visit Russia to-day without realizing how badly their transportation system has broken down, or rather how sadly lacking it is, to meet the increased work imposed on it. They said: It will be necessary to set up so many factories to turn out that rolling stock and other railway equipment; in order to carry on those factories it will be necessary for us to have so much steel; in order to get the steel it will be necessary for us to have so many iron mines, and so on. Thereupon they proceeded to plan how much iron, how much steel and how much railway equipment they would need to meet the needs of the nation. That does not seem a very irrational way of proceeding. They have continued to plan along that line. Of course, before they could do that they realized that they would require so much financial credit. It is not easy to carry on even in Canada, because we are told the banks will not lend; they say the country is poor. Well, Russia started out as one of the poorest countries in the world, and yet with comparatively very little foreign credit she has already managed to accomplish a vast amount of work. Why? I take it, simply because she used the credit of the country itself. Russia created various credit instruments and used the national credit to carry on her work. The results have been simply staggering in their colossal proportions. She has planned everything very definitely. Expert economists, not wild men at all, got together and drew up a general plan covering what they thought would be necessary to build up a productive machine over a period of ten or fifteen years. The first part of this plan was called the five year plan, of which they are now entering upon the fourth year. I cannot tell exactly how well they are up to schedule; in some departments they have already accomplished in three years what they set out to accomplish in five years; in some respects they are behind their schedule. On the whole, however, I should say they are attempting to accomplish in the first four years what they had thought originally would require five years.

I should like to give some statistics which I brought to my desk the other day, from an authoritative but I may say confidential British source, which is open to many members of parliament if they care to avail themselves of it. The total sum of capital expenditure on national economy for 1932 is fixed at 21 thousand million roubles, which is approximately £2,100,000,000 at par, as compared with 16,000 millions in 1931. Investments in socialist industries are fixed at 10,700 million roubles, in socialized agriculture at 4,630 millions and in railway, water and aerial transport at 3,330 millions. That is approximately £1,070,000,000, £436,000,000 and £333,000,000 respectively. The annual increase in industrial production is fixed at 36 per cent, as compared with 21 per cent actually arrived at in 1931. The completion in the main of the five year plan in four years is confidently expected.

Figures showing the output in the industries controlled by the Supreme Council of National Economy and the Commissariat of Supplies during the ten months of the current year, as compared with the corresponding period of 1930, have been published by the calculations department of the State Planning Commission. Under group A, including heavy industries, the increase was 21.8 per cent; under group B, including light industries, which takes in foodstuffs as well, the increase was 16.4 per cent. The quality of the goods, however, is still very low, and the cost of production though diminished slightly as a whole, has actually risen in some industries and generaly remains considerably above the prescribed standard.

Following a request for a general increase in wages to meet the increased cost of living, which was made at an all-union labour conference, the Supreme Council of National Economy published an order forbidding factory administrations to raise wages on their own initiative under penalty of prosecution.

The sum of 290 million roubles, approximately £29,000,000, has been assigned for the reconstruction of Leningrad as a model socialistic city. The program embraces extensive housing and public services construction, as well as social and cultural development.

Just one other point in this connection. The fact that over 60 per cent of the peasant householders have joined the collective farms does not appear to have lessened their opposition to the government's grain collection policy, about which there seems to have been considerable difficulty. I take it that the figures I have quoted may be considered fairly accurate and the statements by no means too favourable to the soviet regime.

Mr. POULIOT: Before my hon. friend proceeds I should like to ask him a question. Does he take into consideration the fact that Russia has repudiated her debt to France?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would prefer not to go into the question of repudiation; it is a very complicated matter. I said I hoped we could get through this discussion of economics without bringing in the political affairs of Russia. However, I might just remind the hon. gentleman in passing that when those debts were being contracted the London Times warned British investors against subscribing to the Russian loans, which were being used by the Czar to prevent the establishment of a parliamentary system of government. The French invested in Russian securities notwithstanding warnings of that character. France herself through her inflationist policy, repudiated a great percentage of the debts she owed and there are other countries which will have to repudiate their debts also before many months have passed.

But I want to come back to the Russian economic system. I think no one can read the statistics, or can visit that country, without being tremendously impressed by the economic development that has taken place. I have never seen a country which was experiencing such a boom as is taking place in Russia at the present time. It may be that the boom will not last. I am not a prophet; I am merely stating what is evident to even a tourist. It is a tremendous boom which is in progress at the present time. The soviet authorities have beaten down opposition, as I have said; they have adopted their plan and now they are beginning to get results.

I spent an evening—a very pleasant evening, I may say—with Mr. Yazikoff, who was here some years ago as Russian trade commissioner. A number of members of this house met him at that time. After he had told me a good deal about the progress of Russia in the last six or seven years he turned to me and said, "I have been telling you about Russia; I wish you would tell me something about the progress of Canada in the last five or six years." That question struck me like a blow between the eyes. The progress of Canada in the last five or six years? I felt like throwing up my hands and saying that in the last few years Canada, instead of progressing, has been going back. I think there is not much doubt about that. It is not a question of this or that party being in power; the fact is that Canada has not been progressing in the last five or six years. So the greater part of Europe is stagnant to-day, but in that great country of soviet Russia, at least for the time being, they have struck upon something that is succeeding.

I talked to a large number of American technicians, who had no interest whatever in communism. In fact they repudiated it; they were there simply as experts to give advice, and I think the opinion of these men could be summed up in the words of one of them who was on the train with me as we came out. He said, "I have been all over this country in the last three or four months making a survey. If things were done as efficiently here as they are in America I could have done my work in as many weeks. No doubt there is a great deal of inefficiency and waste, but these Russians do not often make the same mistake twice. They are learning, and I think they are going to make good. If they do there is going to be a hard time ahead for us in America." He was from the western United States and, after having made a survey, that was his opinion. Whether or not we agree with communism it is absolutely stupid for us to adopt that policy which traditionally belongs to the ostrich, that of burying its head in the sand. We cannot refuse to see what is going on. If for no other reason than to compete with communism I think it would be a good thing if the members of this house, and representatives of western Europe generally, looked well into what is going on.

For my part, I am not one of those who would lightly dismiss communist ideas; certainly the communists have hit upon something that is producing results. I am quite willing to admit that it may be that an autocratic system of this kind is possible only with a people having the Russian temperament. It may be that a democracy would not lend itself to the successful carrying through of a communist program. I would take exception however to what was said here yesterday, that we are a free people and can do as we please. We have very little freedom in this country, and while I do not like the dictatorship they have in Russia, and do not hesitate to say so, neither do I like the dictatorship we have in this country of ours, a financial dictatorship which operates under the guise of a democracy.

Mr. PETTIT: Would the hon. member care to deal with the remuneration of the workers who are engaged in this five year plan?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is difficult to compare the two as it would involve very extensive computations. I would recommend the hon. gentleman to read a very fine article by Louis Fischer which appeared two or three weeks ago in the New York Nation. This article goes exhaustively into the question of wages. Personally I believe that wages are lower there than in Canada, but it is not the amount of wages paid, it is what goes with the wages. These people are getting many social opportunities which our people do not get. I attended theatres such as we do not have in Canada. I attended operas such as do not exist in Paris, Vienna or Berlin. Those operas were frequented by the ordinary working people who received tickets at the doors of the factories as part of their wages. Under these diverse systems it is extremely difficult to compare the remuneration received by the two sets of workmen.

This is a big field and if I may I will deal only with the economic phase. In visiting Russia the first thing which strikes one is the fact that they have no unemployment. I was in Austria where unemployment is simply desperate. I was in Berlin where unemployment is affecting not only the unskilled workers, not only the skilled tradesmen, but large numbers of business and professional workers. The civic authorities very kindly took me around to some of the unemployment bureaus. At one they had hundreds of applications for relief. These applications had not been received from working men, but they were from school teachers, university professors, artists, musicians and skilled technicians. There were men who had been at the head of large works as supervising engineers; I saw the applications of men who had been drawing salaries of from $10,000 to $20,000 per year as consultants. These men were down and out and were glad to receive relief from the city. Unemployment is something like paralysis which works up. With us it has only reached the ankles and the knees, with them it has gone higher and higher until it has reached the business and professional classes. There are at least six million unemployed in Germany to-day, involving probably twenty million individuals or about a third of the entire population. You leave Germany and go into Russia and you cannot find any unemployment. In fact they cannot get people in fast enough to do the work.

Mr. PETTIT: That is because they are conscripted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, they are not conscripted. I will give a little illustration. On the same train with me were three Austrians, one a mechanic who had been unemployed and was going to Russia in the hopes of obtaining a job, the other two were musicians. Within a few days after his arrival the working man had got a steady job, and before we left the two musicians came to our hotel and told us that they had signed a contract for a year with a soviet state theatre. The peasants are being encouraged to come in from the country districts to Moscow and the other large cities, after the harvest. I travelled on one of those trains and I would not like to spend another night under such circumstances. Traffic is fearfully congested: but, there is activity all along the line. A contrast with our railway situation!

In Moscow the housing shortage is very great. Nearly every other house is being rebuilt, or the old house being torn down to be replaced with a new one. I have never seen anything like it in my life. What is true of Moscow and Leningrad is equally true of the other cities right through to eastern Siberia. There is tremendous activity everywhere.

A great deal has been said about conscript labour. There may be some in the northern camps, although opinion is divided on that. The great majority of the people are no more working under conscription than are the workmen in this country where if you do not work you cannot get anything to eat. That is perhaps the only conscription they have there and the same applies here in perhaps a more violent form.

They have a planned economy, they know where they are going. It may be that they may not be able to complete the five-year plan, but what about it? If they do not do it in five years, they may do it in six; if they do not do it in six years, they may do it in seven. The vital thing is that they have a plan ahead of them, they are working towards that plan and they are enthusiastic about it. I do not talk Russian but I was able to obtain considerable information from Canadians and from Englishmen who have been resident in Moscow for some years.

I will give a little illustration which I believe I have published somewhere and which I think is very illuminating. We were waiting at a street corner to allow the traffic to pass and a group of high school boys and girls, ranging in age from fourteen to sixteen years, passed, each one with a spade upon his or her shoulder. They were jollying one another and joking as high school youngsters will, and on inquiring where they were going I was told that this was their free day—they have one day free in five, although I believe in the last few months the plan has been altered in some industries where they now put in six days straight—and they were spending their holiday by giving voluntary assistance to some particular state enterprise which was lagging behind its schedule. Mr. Speaker, can you imagine a group of our high school boys and girls putting spades on their shoulders and starting off to tamp ties on the Canadian National railways? They might if we had such a plan. The fact remains that we lack that enthusiasm which seems to be so prevalent in Russia.

Mr. ARTHURS: What would have happended had they refused to take those spades on their shoulders?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They were doing it of their own free will. I suppose the high school boys and girls in our country would not like to carry spades, they are a little too aristocratic for that. My hon. friend across the way is inclined to scoff at the freedom with which they did it.

Mr. COTNAM: The labour unions would not permit it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is quite true. The difference between Canada and Russia is this: here the only possible way in which labour can maintain its position is by adopting the methods more or less in vogue in every organization, that of limiting its numbers and curtailing its output. Lawyers do the same thing, doctors do the same thing, everyone attempts to impose limitations; that is the only way in which they can make their living under a competitive system. In Russia everything is different, the more they produce the greater benefit it is to the public at large. No objection is raised by their unions as it is realized that it is helping along the cause.

In this connection I might mention a visit I paid to one of the gaols. In this country we dare not let the prisoners produce for the public market lest forced labour compete with free labour; in Russia they pay wages to their prisoners and what they produce is sent into the ordinary commercial channels. Under their system the more that is produced in any one department, the better it is for the community at large. In this country, if we produce too much we get into difficulties. We have more wheat in our western granaries today than we had a year ago; we do not know what to do with it, we cannot market it and yet people who are hungry are unable to eat.

It may be true that Russia is behind in production but it must be remembered that they started at the bottom. They did not have very much to begin with, they did not have a productive machine and so they were short of commodities. But to the extent that they are able to produce, they are distributing commodities to the people. So there do not arise many of the difficulties which we have here such as so-called over-production. Quite naturally some of the members who have not thoroughly studied these things may think they have those difficulties in Russia, but that is not the case.

Mr. ARTHURS: What are the living conditions of the workers in Russia as compared with those in Canada?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish I could have gone into the economics of things without being diverted to living conditions, but I am quite free to say in my judgment living conditions are lower in Russia than Canada. I do not consider, however, that is of very material significance in discussing this question. Let me put it in this way: 101 degrees of temperature is not in itself a very significant thing. If a patient has had a very high fever, 101 degrees of temperature is a good symptom. If a man has been living normally and has been infected, then a temperature of 101 degrees is a dangerous symptom. It all depends on the direction we are travelling.

Mr. COTNAM: The hon. member is getting out of his depth.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I may be, but I think there are other doctors in the house who will agree with me, and the reading of a thermometer is surely not altogether a monopoly of a doctor.

Mr. McGIBBON: Interpreting it is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but 101 degrees in one case may be a good symptom, and in another, a bad symptom. I think I may be permitted to use an illustration from the medical profession without being called to task. What I desire to emphasize is that while the standard of living in Russia may be low, so far as I can ascertain it is on the upgrade, while, as I see it in Europe and indeed in almost every country I visited and certainly in Canada, instead of our standards of living rising, they are falling. That is the significant point. Although in Russia the standards of living for the moment are lower than ours, I think they are on the up-grade and that is the most challenging thing about the situation.

If I may come to the point that I was about to mention a moment ago when my attention was diverted, this is to me the most interesting thing in contrasting the two economic systems. In this country if we produce too much we get into difficulties, because under our system we are bound to pay dividends on certain stocks which we have or certain investments which we have made.

Mr. STANLEY: And wages.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And we have to pay wages, of course. We have to pay dividends and if a number of different institutions reach the point, which I think we have reached now, where they cannot at the same time pay dividends and wages, then wages are likely to suffer. Over in Russia it seems to me that under their system it is possible for them to go on steadily with their production and to devote their production to raising the standard of living of their people. The reason they have not raised wages more rapidly—and this may be a criticism—is this, that they have found it was essential for them to complete their productive machine and after that they would have time enough to raise the general standard of living of the people. The living conditions of the people were low; the people had been comparatively content to have them low, and so the plans have been pushed forward. Probably our people would not be as content to live on as low a standard as the Russians have done, but in the meantime this has enabled those people to build up very rapidly a productive machine. It took us one hundred years or more to build up our machine. We were told by all the classical economists in the old days that we could not have accomplished what capitalism has without the incentive of private gain; that is, had not the big owners been able to save and to salt down a great deal of what was produced and put this surplus into new enterprises.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has been speaking for forty minutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I finish this thought? Russia it seems to me, has shown that that position is untenable. Under the communist system it has been possible for them to build up their capital equipment at the same time as they were, to a certain extent at least, raising the standard of living of their people. I trust the house and especially the proposer of the motion will pardon me for introducing Russia; for I know the member for Red Deer has no idea of introducing the Russian system into this country. I take this opportunity of interjecting these remarks because Russia is the outstanding example of a nation with a planned economy.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have been interested in listening to my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth), who, as everybody knows, is a great student of these matters. A few weeks ago I read in L'Illustration the story of a journalist. At a reception in Russia where there were many diplomatists he asked one old gentleman about the Russian five-year plan, and the answer was: yes, the five-year plan is a wonderful success. He went on to another diplomat of equal standing and asked him the same question. The answer was: the five-year plan is a complete failure. So, people's views are divided about the matter, and although my hon. friend is sincere in his opinion, it is doubtful whether this country should follow the example of Russia.

What I do not like in the Russian system is the coercion of labour. A man may have a disposition to do a certain line of work, and you cannot force him to do work for which he has no disposition, especially if he is not paid for doing it. Hon. members will remember reading not long ago in one of our Ottawa newspapers that in Russia butter was selling at $50 a pound and a pair of boots at $100. They have different stores for strangers where one can get luxury articles at a decent price, but there are other stores where the Russian workers can get only the primary necessities of life at high cost, and their life is far from being that of the ordinary working man in Canada. Would the unemployed in this country like to see coerced labour here? The problem is a serious one. For instance, take the case of commercial travellers who have been earning decent salaries for many years, many of whom have been discharged. Could you put those men to work on the trans-Canada highway? That would be pretty hard work for them to do. Everyone should work according to his own disposition and this is one reason why the Russian plan may be criticized. I would not go so far as to say that everything in this country is perfect. The other day I read an article from the president of the American Telegraph and Telephone Company, who said that matters in the United States were not so bad now even in regard to unemployment because there was plenty of foodstuffs in the warehouses, and conditions would be much worse if there were nothing in reserve. That statement can be challenged, because the system of distribution at present is wrong, and in that connection something should be done to improve conditions. The same applies to this country.

The trouble is that during the last few years the rich have become richer, and no one has heard about the poor man becoming richer. There are many reasons for this state of affairs. Let us take for instance the big firm of the T. Eaton Company, Limited. At first they had their own store in Toronto. Now they have large stores in Montreal, Ottawa, Moncton, Winnipeg, and they are concentrating the business in one central firm, the shareholders of which are getting richer and richer at the expense of the country storekeepers. Then also we have the chain stores which are controlled by only a few individuals. They take trade away from a great number of people and a few privileged ones enjoy the benefits that a large number of people had before. This causes a disturbance in the social order. How long this will continue no one knows. This idea of concentrating business in a few hands with great profits to a few is a great mistake and it may cause very serious trouble in this country. Of course, the big firms can sell more cheaply, but they do not give any credit. A few years ago the country merchants were much more prosperous because they had the local people for their customers. I am sure that if the Postmaster General would have an investigation made in his own department to ascertain the amount of money that is sent in money orders to big stores like Eaton's and Simpson's from people in the rural municipalities, the house would be astounded if he would give us the figures. Many of the storekeepers in the rural municipalities have failed because they had to trade with those who were asking them for credit and were sending their money to the big cities to the large firms like Eaton's and Simpson's. This is a matter of the utmost importance, which is worthy of the attention of the house. Last year the Postmaster General was asked to impose a heavy tax on the catalogues mailed by these firms. When I brought the matter up, the Postmaster General regarded the suggestion somewhat favourably, but up to now nothing has been done about it. I hope that action in that direction will be taken very shortly in order to protect the country merchants by decentralizing the trade.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): In closing the debate upon the resolution which has been presented, may I express, Mr. Speaker, my appreciation of the interest which has been shown in the subject and of the many intelligent suggestions which have been made and the excellent speeches which have been delivered. As I propose to take only a very few minutes I may be pardoned if I make no lengthy reference to many of the speeches. This afternoon we listened to what I consider to be a most interesting and informative address upon Russia. I recognize, as I think the house does, that the problem in Russia and the problem in this country are so very different and so far apart that the same policies could hardly apply in both countries. In Russia there is no unemployment. Why? Because, Mr. Speaker, in that country their problem is still the problem of production, which we have solved. They are attempting to build in five years a productive system which we have been building through generations, and which in the western world generally has been building for a century. Their problem is that of production; ours is that of distribution. They are dealing with a people unaccustomed to democratic methods. We are dealing with a people who have been taught to think and act for themselves. With other hon. members I was much interested in and appreciative of that address.

Coming to the resolution and the remarks that have been made thereon it struck me as I listened to the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) that with his usual sympathy and intelligent observation he had advanced several fairly strong arguments in favour of the resolution. He pointed out that various plans had been tried in different industries and had failed, and failed, he said, because they were local plans brought forward by individuals or by local or restricted bodies of people. These plans failed, he said, because they did not take into account the plans of other individuals in other communities and of other people engaged in the same business. That, Mr. Speaker, is what we are attempting in some degree to obviate by what I would term a reasonably planned economy.

I am grateful to the various members who have spoken in support of the resolution. I appreciate the very fine addresses that were given by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), addresses full of thought and indicative of the very careful consideration which they had given to the subject. I also appreciate most sincerely the address and support given by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol). Speaking as he did from the point of view of a practical business man of many years experience and as one who had given a profound and detailed study to the subject in general and to the work done by organizations similar to the one we are now suggesting and to similar work that has already been done in various countries in an experimental way, I believe that his suggestions were of undoubted value.

I come now to the address given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). As always, the minister demonstated the brilliant qualities of his mind. Undoubtedly he is a student and a fair-minded man who gives deep and careful consideration to those problems which fall within his own department and problems which are before the country generally. I appreciate also the decided modification in his attitude since he spoke on this subject twelve months ago. His manner yesterday conveyed some change in the position which he took one year ago. His condemnation was not so sweeping, his opposition by no means so definite and comprehensive as was the case at that time. I thank him for that, and I also accept with some satisfaction the promise of sympathetic consideration given.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, and not unexpected, that his attitude was in the main critical. Generally speaking, his criticism was this, and I shall attempt to be fair: His opinion apparently was that neither in the resolution itself, nor in the arguments with which I attempted to support it, was any practical suggestion to be found. To use his own words, any such resolution as the one under discussion and any such statements as I had made in support of it caused him to become a little restive, because he said he was a little bit tired of the practice of enumerating difficulties and problems and then leaving it at that, simply pointing out the problems which lay ahead and offering no solution for them. I must confess at once, Mr. Speaker, that I have no ready-made plan which I can advance, no short-cut to a successful solution of these problems. Had I advanced such a plan, had I said to this house, I have a plan here which if adopted will solve our problems, then the minister would have been right in his criticism. But I have no such short-cut. The methods which he suggested—line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little—are the only methods that I myself believe can be successful, and it is that very method which has been put before the house in this resolution. I am suggesting that we commence that work, that we approach with a view to trying to solve them, the various problems which go to make up this depression, because evidently someone must set about solving them.

The government could do this. I recognize that within the ranks of the government, in the minds of the minister himself and those who are his colleagues, there is an abundance of intelligence and ability. But, Mr. Speaker, may I in all kindness suggest to them that facing as they do the every-day details of administration, working as I know they do—the Prime Minister and every member of the cabinet—for hours day after day, they have neither the time nor the opportunity to devote themselves to the study of such a question as the one I have outlined. This problem would demand all that was best of strength and energy, and would require full time study by any body of men. Obviously the government of the day cannot devote that much time to it. Following the suggestion he himself has made I agree that these matters must be the subjects of study and careful thought, they must be approached in detail, and not at one sweeping stroke. The government should call to its assistance men who are competent and who could devote to their work the time the government cannot spare; I am sure such a body would assist and not hinder in the task. That is the scope of the suggestion.

I noted that the minister and other hon. members took exception to the term, "planned economy." He said that it was a term to be played if not trifled with. I assume he meant that it is a term which many people have been in the habit of playing or, trifling with. After all however what is a system of planned economy? It does not necessarily mean planned economy after the Russian style any more than one plan need be similar to another. Surely however some plan is necessary. Who would think of opening a business without making plans? Who would commence to construct a house without consulting an architect? Who would commence to build a railroad without first laying down a definite and comprehensive plan embracing every detail of the enterprise? Who would enter into any business without planning carefully and in detail? Surely, Mr. Speaker, the business of the nation itself deserves and demands careful and judicious planning just as imperative as any private enterprise. The suggestion is not that we should establish some super committee which would usurp and override the functions of government and, as suggested by the hon. member for East Algoma, tell the people what they should wear and what they should eat, the hours they should rise and when they should go to bed. Such an observation is beneath the intelligence of the hon. gentleman who made it, and on many an occasion we have had evidence of the hon. member's intelligence. That is not the idea at all. But surely even to those profound persons like himself it would be of inestimable value could they come to some competent body of men who could show them where the greatest opportunities lie, along what lines there may be obvious over-production, and receive from them assistance in planning their own destiny.

I am suggesting that it is still possible for a people without domination, for a people reserving to themselves their freedom of action to come together at least to some degree, in a cooperative spirit and agree upon the best lines along which various enterprises might be promoted. The hon. member for East Algoma stated that civilization as we have it to-day is the result of individual effort without a plan. I believe it is, and that is why I suggest the necessity for a slight change. Would anybody in this country, even the most profound individualist who goes abroad to-day and sees the conditions we have, say that with our individual lack of planning, with individual unregulated enterprise our system had been or is now a tremendous and outstanding success?

I am not going to go into those details or to point out the obvious to every hon. member. Anomalies and contradictions exist in this country; it appears to be impossible to make use of what we have to help those in need. We are confronted with a ridiculous situation wherein we have full granaries and empty stomachs, plenty of clothing and bare backs. I need not go further in that connection. I suggest however to those who recognize that situation—and we must all recognize it—it must be obvious that there should and must be a better way.

The statement has been made that the Russian situation is a challenge to us. I agree; it is a challenge to us. I am not denouncing the Russian system, but if we do denounce it, if we say it is wrong, it is for us to show in our own way and according to our own belief that we can do something better. The interest taken in the Russian republic by the people of western Canada undoubtedly is due to the fact that we are to-day meeting them in competition. As individuals we find that we are going down under that competition, or may all go down under it. Because of that we say, "Plan must be met with plan." Coercion and discipline, if hon. members wish to put it that way, must be met with cooperative action. To assist in that cooperative action and to bring some order out of the chaos which we find in civilization to-day it seems to me we must establish some body of people who will have the time, if the government has not, and who are competent, to search into the causes of these abnormal conditions and, with the good will which should be manifest throughout the country, attempt at least to provide something better than that which we now have.

As I stated before, I appreciate the modified attitude of the minister; I appreciate his suggestion that, subject to the reservation that the government is not pledged to any immediate action, they are pledged to give careful and sympathetic consideration to this matter. I am content to have the resolution accepted on those terms, to leave it to hon. members and to the intelligence, the good will, integrity and knowledge of the government and to their realization that something must be done. At this point I am content to leave the matter for another year to see what steps may be made.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HEALTH—PERIODIC EXAMINATION AND MEDICAL RELIEF

On the motion of Mr. Howden:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration steps which would: (a) provide for periodic medical examination of the Canadian people; (b) afford medical relief for those suffering from disease.

Mr. SPEAKER: Number 16 should have been dropped from the order paper, having been called twice and not spoken to.

It is dropped now.

[Mr. Marcil.]

PRICE OF GASOLINE

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the price of gasoline to the Canadian consumer has for some time past been too high and that this matter should be referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce to investigate and report.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the price of gasoline affects practically every individual throughout the dominion to-day, and it has an important bearing on our economic life. Ever since last June, when the hon. member for Swift Current directed the attention of the house to the price charged in this country for gasoline, newspapers from one end of Canada to the other have devoted considerable space to the discussion of the subject. These articles have agitated the public mind, so that to-day almost every Canadian is talking about the price of gasoline.

Since the invention of the internal combustion engine gasoline has become a vital factor in the life of almost all Canadians. Travel by land, by water or in the air has been affected by gasoline. All over the dominion to-day, our motor cars, motor boats and aeroplanes are propelled by gasoline. But not only is gasoline used for pleasure vehicles, it is also used as motive power by the primary producers, and the price of gasoline affects the cost of the articles so produced. In certain sections of Saskatchewan to-day we find our farmers using gasoline for their engines, and of course its price is of prime importance to them, for it affects the production cost of their grain and other field crops.

To show the importance of the price of gasoline to the people of Canada, I desire to give the house some figures showing the consumption of this motor fuel during the past few years. These figures are taken from the Montreal Standard of December 5, 1930:

Year	Gallons produced in Canada	Gallons consumed in Canada
1926	220,146,704	309,049,380
1927	258,549,734	363,027,308
1928	344,129,861	483,798,833
1929	436,622,614	600,934,668
1930	445,599,419	601,735,656

This will give hon. members some idea of the tremendous volume of gasoline used throughout Canada by automobiles, trucks, buses, farm tractors and other machinery. Therefore if I can show that the Canadian consumer has been charged too high a price for his gasoline, I do not think, sir, that I need apologize to the house or to the country for having introduced this resolution.

In 1930, when we consumed 601,000,000 gallons of gasoline the wholesale price was about 21 cents a gallon. During that year the people of Canada expended $132,400,000 on gasoline. That figure does not take into account the provincial tax nor the cost of distribution to the service stations and other expenditures; it represents only the wholesale price.

It will be observed that in this resolution I state that the price of gasoline to the Canadian consumer has for some time past been too high. In this connection let me cite my personal experience last fall. While in Camden, New Jersey, I had occasion to buy gasoline for my car at several service stations, and in every instance the charge for refilling my tank was 10 cents a gallon. This included the state tax of 3 cents a gallon, so I was really paying a retail price of 7 cents a gallon. True, that is the wine gallon, but the difference between it and the imperial gallon is simply that between 231 and 277.274 cubic inches. At the same time here in the city of Ottawa I was paying 27 cents for gasoline, or 22 cents without the tax. I do now know what was the flash test of this gasoline; I do not know what was its octane test; I do not know what was its specific gravity, but I do know that when I put it in my car the engine seemed to function on that 8.4 cent gasoline just as well as it did on the 22 cent variety. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, I felt that difference right here in my pocket when I paid for the gasoline, and if I felt it why should not the other consumers of gasoline in Canada also feel it just as much? Is it any wonder that I began to consider why this great difference should exist in the prices of gasoline in the two countries? There is no other country but the United States with which we can compare gasoline prices, and it seems to me that a comparison of prices in the two countries is quite fair.

When I came home, therefore, I began to look up the prices of gasoline at different points. I turned to the National Petroleum News, which is taken as an authority in the United States, and from it secured the prices of gasoline in different cities throughout Canada and the United States. In order to make the comparison fair I have taken off the state and provincial taxes and have brought the United States wine gallon up to the imperial gallon. Comparing prices in that way in eight cities of the United States and eight cities of Canada I found the following:

Halifax—24 cents.
Toronto—21 cents.
Border Cities—21 cents.
Fort William—23 cents.
Winnipeg—23 cents.
Regina—27·5 cents.
Calgary—24·5 cents.
Vancouver—22·5 cents.
New York City—15·96 cents.
Buffalo—12·96 cents.
Detroit—14·16 cents.
Duluth—15·06 cents.
Minneapolis—14·64 cents.
Minot, N.D.—16·68 cents.
Butte, Montana—18 cents.
Seattle—16·8 cents.

. In other words, I found that on September 1, 1931, the average price in those eight Canadian cities was 23·3 cents, while the average price in the eight United States cities was 15·5 cents, leaving a difference of almost 8 cents. Then I looked, Mr. Speaker, to see what was the price of gasoline on September 1, 1930. Taking the same basis of comparison for the eight cities I found the prices to be as follows:

Halifax—24 cents.
Toronto—25 cents.
Border Cities—22 cents.
Fort William—26 cents.
Winnipeg—25 cents.
Regina—30 cents.
Calgary—27 cents.
Vancouver—27 cents.
New York City—19·56 cents.
Buffalo—20·16 cents.
Detroit—20·16 cents.
Duluth—21 cents.
Minneapolis—20·64 cents.
Minot, N.D.—22·68 cents.
Butte, Montana—20·40 cents.
Seattle—23·40 cents.

Those were the prices at that time, and the difference then between the average prices was 4·5 cents, the average being 25·5 in Canada and 21 in the United States. I have before me the National Petroleum News for February 3, 1932, from which I should like to quote the prices being paid in just one or two of the cities I have mentioned, in order to give some idea of the prices at the present time. Using the same basis of comparison the price in Duluth was 16·32 cents and in Fort William 23 cents; in Detroit it was 13·8 cents and in Windsor 21 cents.

With those prices before me, Mr. Speaker, I naturally asked myself the next question: What is the cause of this difference? Why should we have this great disparity in prices in the United States and Canada, two neighbouring countries? The first thought that occurred to me was that it was probably because of the duty, so I began to look into the question of the duty on gasoline. I found that under the Liberal government, previous to 1930, the duty on gasoline was ½ cent per gallon British preference, ¾ cent per gallon intermediate and one cent per gallon general

At the special session in September, 1930, the duty was increased to 2 cents per gallon British preference, 2¼ cents per gallon intermediate and 2½ cents per gallon general.

This in itself, however, could hardly account for the difference in price, which as I have said amounted to almost 8 cents per gallon. So I looked for some other reason, and I found that on November 7, 1931, an order in council was passed by the government in these words:

Under the provisions of subsection 2 of section 36 of the Customs Act, you are instructed to appraise importations of refined gasoline from various refining points of the United States as follows:

	Per wine gallon cents
Pennsylvania, New York and district, which includes Atlantic seaboard.	7·72
Toledo, Detroit, Cleveland and district..	8·333
Chicago and district..	7·233
Minneapolis and district..	7·583
Wood River, St. Louis and district.	6·833
Mid-continent district, which includes the states of Oklahoma, Kansas, part of Missouri, part of Arkansas, and North Texas..	5·083
South Texas, Louisiana and district.	6·633
Wyoming and district..	5·083
Montana and district..	8·083

When I looked at those figures, Mr. Speaker, I was struck with the fact that in Camden, New Jersey, I bought gasoline at retail, from the filling station, for 7 cents per wine gallon, while by this order in council the government said I must pay the refiner or the wholesaler 7·72 cents; in other words, I must pay more than the amount for which the gasoline was being sold at retail in the United States. I thought there must be something wrong, so I went to the refiners to find out what the price was, and I was told that the wholesale price was 4 cents per gallon, the same gasoline for which I was paying 7 cents per gallon without the state tax. I was compelled by this order in council to pay 7·72 cents. If when I came to the border my invoice showed that I paid only 4 cents, I would have to pay to the customs office an additional 3·72 cents. If I cannot induce the refiners to take the 7·72 cents, if they will take only 4 cents, I must pay the difference of 3·72 cents to the customs office. In that way the price of gasoline in Canada has been raised to a certain extent.

I do not intend to debate this matter at any great length. I place it before the house simply for consideration. The price of gasoline is of vital importance to every man and woman in this country. It affects the pockets of all of us. Every time we go anywhere in a motor car, motor launch or aeroplane, we must pay for gasoline. This also concerns many of the manufacturers in western Canada who use this form of fuel in their plants. I ask that the matter be referred to the committee on banking and commerce for investigation and report. If it can be proved that the refiners and the wholesalers of gasoline are taking advantage of the tariff in order to raise the price to the Canadian consumer, then I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to put into effect the promise he made at the special session of 1930. At page 242 of Hansard of that session the following appears:

That is the embodiment in statutory form of what I said in the opening of my observations; it confers upon the governor in council power to reduce or remove duties where there has been any effort on the part of the producer to exploit the consumer. Shortly put, that is what the provision is.

If it can be proved either in this house or in the committee that the refiners are taking advantage of this tariff to exploit the consumer, then the government should remove the duty in order to relieve the consumer.

The average price of gasoline in eight Canadian cities during the year 1930 was 25·5 cents per gallon; the average price in the same cities for the year 1931 was 23·3 cents; in other words, the price had been reduced 2·2 cents per gallon. In eight American cities the average price on September 1, 1930, was 21 cents per gallon; in 1931 the average price was 15·5 cents, a reduction of 5·5 cents. In 1931 the reduction to the Canadian people was 3·3 cents less than the reduction made in the United States. If that difference in price is due to the tariff then we must ask that it be removed. I do not claim that the price of gasoline has been increased, but I do claim that it has not been reduced as compared with the reduction in effect in the United States.

In conclusion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) that this matter be referred to the committee on banking and commerce for investigation.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, in seconding this resolution I desire to direct the attention of the house to two or three matters which have come to my attention since I spoke on this subject last year. After the matter had been brought to the attention of the house at the last session a reply, or an attempted reply, to the statements made was published in the Financial Post of June 18, 1931. In this article the oil companies endeavoured to justify the prices which they were charging the public in Canada. I take exception to certain of the figures given in that article, and I believe that many hon. members will agree with me when I say that many of them do not represent the prices charged throughout Canada. For instance, in order to show that in the city of Toronto they were not charging a price greater than that which would permit them to make a reasonable profit, they show an allowance for tank wagon distribution of 4 cents per gallon and an allowance for service station distribution of 5 cents per gallon. I do not know the particular charges in different parts of Ontario, but from my knowledge of those districts on the prairies to which I have had access I can say that no such charges are allowed, and I cannot see how or why such a charge should be allowed in the city of Toronto. The tank wagon allowance runs from 1 to 2½ cents instead of 4 cents, while the service station charge runs from 2 to 3 cents. In setting forth why they require protection they state:

There are several grounds on which the Canadian oil industry based its appeals for protection:

1. That Canada's population of ten million people is scattered over an area greater than that of the United States, and that a large part of the thinly populated territory has to be serviced at a loss.

It will be found that the price of gasoline in different parts of Canada varies according to the district. If you travel away from the railroad you must pay several cents per gallon more than at points on the railway line. I doubt very much the truth of the statement that the people in any particular part of Canada are being serviced at a loss. That is one matter which the committee on banking and commerce could investigate.

The second reason given for the necessity of protection is:

2. That because of the long winter Canadians demand and receive a much better quality of gasoline than is commonly thought necessary in most parts of the United States and that a large number of Canadian service stations outside the large cities lose money in the winter.

It may be true that some service stations lose money during the winter, as there are any number which are not financed by the oil companies and which close during that season. If the others are operating at a loss I imagine they would do so but a short time before they would be closed.

I have a good deal of doubt, too, about the next statement; in any event it could be investigated:

3. That the refining capacity being developed in Canada and the immense sums being spent by such companies as Imperial Oil and British American Oil in the last year on modernizing plants create employment which is of prime national benefit.

Surely that is no reason at all why all the people of Canada who are users of gasoline should be exploited to the extent that the figures given by the hon. member for Willow Bunch would indicate. The next one reads:

4. That since the protection was given the price of gasoline has been successively lowered to its present level, and that the industry could not do better than at present except at a loss, even if it received the crude petroleum for nothing, unless freight rates came down or taxes disappeared. Cost prices given in the tables are average prices. In a city better results can be obtained than in a place of smaller population.

Those are the four reasons which the oil companies allege as entitling them to protection.

The hon. member for Willow Bunch gave figures as to what we are paying for gasoline in excess of what he believes the proper price should be, allowing a reasonable profit. On the 30th of November of last year the Regina Leader-Post obtained by telegram information from fifteen United States cities as to the prices of gasoline, and I want to read to the house the results of their findings. On that date, November 30, 1931, the report showed:

The average price of white gas in Canadian cities was 31·37 cents, against a United States average of 24·21 cents, or a difference of 7·16 cents.

These figures are reached by taking into consideration various government taxes and also adjusting American prices to imperial gallon measure. Gasoline is sold south of the border on a basis of American gallon, smaller than the imperial gallon used in Canada.

Then they give the comparisons showing the average on the 30th of November last. The figures are as follows:

	White gas cents	Ethyl gas cents
Western Canada	31·37	34·93
United States cities	24·21	27·81
Difference	7·16	7·12

They also made inquiries as to prices in different parts of the same states, and this is their finding and report in that regard:

At Minot, North Dakota, close to the Canadian border and almost immediately south of Regina, the price of ordinary gas is 21·5 cents a gallon. In Regina the price is 32·5 cents, 11 cents a gallon more than the Minot price. At Scobey, Montana, just over the border from Saskatchewan, gasoline costs only 28·8 cents.

These American prices are adjusted to the imperial gallon.

In Montana cities there is uniformity in gasoline prices. In North Dakota the same situation is apparent.

On the Canadian prairies there are all sorts of prices. There is two cents difference between the Saskatoon and Regina prices, and in Winnipeg gasoline is selling at 7½ cents less than in Regina.

There are big oil refineries in Calgary, Regina, and Winnipeg, but there are not two cities in western Canada with similar figures for gasoline.

We understand at this time that the matter of gasoline prices is being brought before the Saskatchewan legislature, possibly before all the prairie legislatures. They are or intend investigating the matter from a somewhat different angle. We believe here—and this is a matter over which the house has control—that the difference in price is largely attributable to the exploiting that the oil companies are doing by reason of the tariff legislation of 1930. We believe that although some 80 per cent of our gasoline is produced in Canada and only 20 per cent imported, the producers in this country are holding their prices right up to what gasoline could be obtained at from the other side, even with the fixed valuations, the dumping duty being added on those fixed valuations, and the regular duty. We believe the oil companies are taking advantage of everything the tariff allows them, and there has not been a decrease in gasoline prices to the same extent that there has been in prices of other goods. For these reasons we are asking that this matter be referred to a committee in order that there may be a thorough investigation.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the observations of the hon. members for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) and Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell). It is always well, however, not to prejudge a case on its presentation. I shall therefore refrain from endeavouring to traverse in any respect the allegations that have been made. There is one thing I think I should fairly say, and that is that it is not correct to assume that because we produce gasoline in this country, the raw material from which it is produced is produced in Canada. Unfortunately, except for small quantities of crude naphtha found in Turner valley and very small quantities of crude petroleum found in other places, we are entirely dependent, for the production of gasoline in Canada, on imported raw material.

[Mr. Bothwell.]

The crude petroleum is brought in not only from Columbia and Peru, but from other parts of the world as well.

The agitation in connection with an investigation into the prices of gasoline has been going on for some time in this country. The observations made by the hon. member for Swift Current first started the discussion last year, and it has been continued with more or less vigour ever since. It will be recalled that the great producing oil companies gave an undertaking at the time that the tariffs were changed in 1930, and by that undertaking they are bound. That, coupled with the provisions of the statute, sufficiently indicates the position of the administration. But owing to the discussions that have taken place in the public press, on public platforms and elsewhere, apparently the companies themselves have been seized of these agitations and discussions, and on the 19th of January the Imperial Oil Limited wrote to me a letter reading as follows:

Rt. Hon. R. B. Bennett, P.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir.—

Due to chaotic conditions in the United States, the widespread evasion of gasoline taxes there and to uninformed criticism of the petroleum industry in Canada, an impression has been created that undue profits are being exacted by the industry from the Canadian public. We believe it to be in our own interest, as well as that of the government, that the situation, in respect to gasoline prices, should be thoroughly ventilated.

Our willingness to submit ourselves to inquiry by any competent tribunal is largely prompted by the beneficial results to us which followed the last public investigation, which was conducted at the instance of the government of Ontario, but which was not limited in scope to the jurisdiction of that province.

Voluntarily, all of the refining companies with head offices in Ontario submitted every detail of their business, Canadian and foreign, to the government. The investigation, which covered a period of five years, occupied months; every document required was produced and executives of all the companies concerned were examined under oath.

The finding was that in the years 1920 to 1924 inclusive, the earnings of these Canadian companies had averaged 8 per cent, and that in no year were they exorbitant. The effect of this upon public opinion was extremely helpful.

Actually, the Canadian consumer is now enjoying lower prices for gasoline and other petroleum products than at any time during the period covered by the investigation referred to and the industry is now working upon a narrower spread over raw material costs than then.

As a matter of self interest and because the true position cannot be brought before the public in any other way, except at great expense, we wish to advise your government that any inquiry which it may decide to conduct will be facilitated by us.

Yours respectfully,

Victor Ross,
Vice-President,
Imperial Oil, Limited.

The following communication, dated January 16, 1932, was received from the McColl-Frontenac Oil Company Limited:

Dear Sir,—

During the last few months there have appeared from time to time, either as speeches in the Canadian House of Commons or as articles in the press, charges that the Canadian oil companies have been treating the public unfairly regarding gasoline prices. More recently there have appeared requests from various sources for an investigation by a royal commission appointed by the Canadian House of Commons.

Should such a commission be appointed, I would like to assure you that our company will assist in every way the workings of such commission and be pleased to place before the members all facts pertaining to the operations of our company.

Yours very truly,
McColl-Frontenac Oil Company Limited,
J. A. Wales,
Vice-President.

The following letter, dated February 6, 1932, was received from the British American Oil Company Limited:

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,—

I note in Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of Canada, dated February 4th, notice of motion by Mr. Thos. F. Donnelly, member for Willow Bunch, Saskatchewan, dealing with the price of gasoline to the Canadian consumer.

There has been considerable comment, particularly in western Canada, concerning the price of gasoline compared with the price in the United States, and an investigation would clarify the situation, both from the standpoint of the oil companies and the public. Therefore, on behalf of this company, I advise that I shall be pleased to offer the fullest cooperation should an investigation be determined upon.

I would point out, however, that the manufacture and national distribution of gasoline involves a very comprehensive system of accounting and, therefore, the commission appointed should be technically competent to deal with the situation.

Yours very truly,
A. L. Ellsworth,
President.

I shall therefore make no further comment upon the motion other than to indicate that so far as the government is concerned the motion will be adopted in the terms in which it has been prepared. I might say that it is just possible that a smaller committee would be of greater service for those who are putting forward the views that they express, but in order that there may be no misapprehension or misunderstanding or misconception the government will accept the motion in the exact terms in which it was submitted to this house, and in which it was submitted to the press before it was discussed here.

In view of the representations that have been made by the three largest companies vitally affected, I shall not, as I say, discuss the merits or demerits of the observations that have been made with respect to this matter. To prejudge is not the duty of government, but the fullest possible opportunity so far as the facilities of the committee are concerned will be afforded for the investigation, and in the light of the willingness expressed by the three largest manufacturers of gasoline from petroleum in this country I should think there would be no reason why definite results should not follow from the labours of the committee. The committee may require some technical assistance, and that technical assistance will not be denied.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): I was pleased indeed to hear the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) acceding to the request of the mover of the motion (Mr. Donnelly) to have a committee investigate the price of gasoline. If this matter is to go before the banking and commerce committee, of which I have not previously been a member, I feel like making a few comments which might be helpful to the committee.

I represent a constituency that is, I might say, altogether agricultural. We have large farms of open prairie country which are operated largely by means of the tractor. We have also the combine in use out there, and the motor car, of course, so that gasoline is used very extensively in my constituency. There has been a feeling for some time among the farmers of my district that the price of gasoline is too high. I do not know whether that feeling is warranted or not, and I welcome the opportunity to have the matter properly investigated in a committee so that the correct information may be brought out. In my own district the retail price of gasoline in the past year has been 35 cents per gallon. That includes 5 cents per gallon for provincial tax, leaving the retail price to the motorist 30 cents per gallon. If the gasoline is for tractor purposes there is a slight reduction in the price because of the larger quantity taken. I have here a letter from the secretary of a municipality in my constituency, which perhaps is worthy of presentation to the house. He says:

I am instructed to write you in protest of the duty of 2½ cents on gasoline from the United States as a result of which the Canadian consumer has been paying from three to five cents more for gasoline than his competitor in the United States.

I do not know whether that statement is correct or not. He says further:

At a time when agriculture is in such a desperate condition that a very large number of farmers are faced with "downing tools" it is absolutely impossible to carry on under present economic conditions, we feel that you, representing a western agricultural constituency, must see the injustice of increasing costs to the power farmer at a time when it is imperative that everything possible should be done to reduce these to the minimum in order to allow him to continue to exist.

That represents to a large extent the feeling at least among the power farmers in my own constituency.

There are several factors that enter into the price of gasoline, and I shall briefly mention them. One is referred to in this letter—the tariff. Prior to September, 1930, the general tariff on gasoline was one cent per gallon, with some grades coming in free. In September, 1930, the duty was raised to 2½ cents per gallon, and we were assured by the leader of the house that any attempt to increase the price of gasoline because of the increased duty would be speedily dealt with. So we have an effective weapon to deal with this matter if it should be proven in the committee that advantage has been taken of the tariff. Another important factor bearing on the price of gasoline is the power that rests in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue to set an arbitrary value for duty purposes on gasoline coming in from the United States. Last year there was a price war on in some of the western states and out our way the people were of the opinion that gasoline was down to a very low price in Oklahoma; yet when that gasoline came to the border the Canadian purchaser was compelled to pay duty on a value arbitrarily set by the Minister of National Revenue. That is a feature that could be inquired into by the committee.

Another factor that enters into the price of gasoline is the freight rate. I have a letter here from another municipal council protesting against the high freight rate on gasoline and asking that as a measure of relief for agriculture the freight rate should be cut in half. I do not know whether that is a feasible proposition or not.

[Mr. Carmichael.]

Another fact that is perhaps unknown to a great many of the members here is that gasoline does not weigh up per gallon to the weight used in charging freight. I quote from a letter from the secretary of a municipal council in my constituency. He says:

We find upon examination of freight bills of tank cars of gasoline coming to this point that they are billed with the weight figured on the basis of eight pounds to the gallon, and when a gallon is weighed out it turns the scale at seven pounds.

The average car will run over 6,000 gallons so that the consumer pays freight as a rule on three tons of gasoline which is not carried by the company and never received by the dealer which turns out roughly at $50 per car.

If that is correct, it seems to me that the committee might take notice of it, and have the difficulty rectified. This secretary protests also against the high price of gasoline, and asks for a reduction in the freight rate charges as a relief to agriculture.

There is another feature to which I should like to direct the attention of hon. members. During the past season in my own district a number of farmers and residents have gone across the border into the province of Alberta, a matter of about fifty miles, and purchased what they called distillate at 15 cents a gallon, with no tax payable to either the province of Alberta or the province of Saskatchewan. I am informed that distillate is superior to gasoline for motor car purposes, if you are content to bear with the odour arising from it. So far as power is concerned it seems to test a little higher than refined gasoline. In any case a great many of the residents of my own constituency have been crossing the border into the province of Alberta, purchasing this cheaper product and using it both in their tractors and in motor cars. I understand the distillate is secured in the Turner Valley field of Alberta, and I suggest that if it serves the purpose and can be purchased at a price so much lower than that of distilled gasoline, it is worthy of investigation.

There are several questions now in the public mind which should be answered. From my own constituency I received the following:

In order to obtain a Canadian refining industry employing 4,978 persons with a pay-roll of $8,153,625 we are subsidizing the owners of the refineries to the extent of some $20,000,000.

I do not know whether or not that is a correct statement, but possibly the committee would investigate as to whether or not the owners of the refineries are being subsidized to that extent. If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, I believe his statement was that their dividends were about 8 per cent. To my mind that is a very handsome dividend in these times of depression, and if they are receiving that amount they are very well cared for indeed.

I am very happy to give my endorsation to this resolution. I should like to see a thorough investigation made, and all interested parties brought before the committee. I am not sure that the committee on banking and commerce is the best place to investigate this matter, and it might have been well had the mover recommended a special committee to delve into the problem and make a more thorough and impartial investigation than the committee on banking and commerce could make. I am content, however, to endorse the proposed investigation, and I hope that something useful may come from it.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I had intended to make a few remarks along the line followed by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael). To my mind the order of reference should be sufficiently large to allow the committee to investigate the prices of kerosene and fuel oil.

Mr. YOUNG: And of petroleum products.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, and of petroleum products. When I arrived home last summer I found that the oil companies were charging a price for kerosene that the farmers felt was unwarranted, and as a result they began to import the distillate to which the hon. member has referred. I think however he is mistaken when he refers to distillate as a substitute for gasoline, because as a matter of fact it is a substitute for kerosene to be used in tractor engines. The farmers in my constituency were importing distillate from the United States, paying a duty thereon and finding the importation profitable as compared with the price they were paying for kerosene. The oil companies then reduced the price of kerosene, and I believe there was an undertaking that the reduced price would continue during the summer. The reduction in price indicated that they were evidently very anxious to sell their product. Then, some time during the month of December, notice was given that the price of kerosene would be raised 3 cents per gallon.

To my mind the committee would do well to inquire as to whether there was anything in the general conditions of trade which warranted the increase of 3 cents per gallon in the month of December, or whether the oil companies took advantage of an opportunity to charge a higher price to the householders who were buying kerosene for lighting purposes and, to a somewhat limited degree, for use in engines. I think therefore that the order of reference should be sufficiently large to include not only gasoline but all petroleum products.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I heard with much pleasure the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) before six o'clock to the effect that he was going to offer no objection to this resolution. It was gratifying also to hear the definite terms in which he stated that the fullest investigation would be permitted; and his offer to furnish such technical assistance as might be required. The right hon. gentleman read us certain letters from some of the Canadian oil companies, indicating their willingness to cooperate in any such investigation; that is satisfactory also.

During the dinner recess I had time to consider and in some sort perhaps to analyse those letters and seek to find in them what the line of presentation of the companies would be when the matter comes before the special committee. I find references to a very comprehensive system of bookkeeping and a quite proper suggestion that technicians would need to be available to understand that complicated system. There were also references to a previous investigation which had taken place under the auspices of the government of Ontario, which investigation, it was stated, had occupied many months and had demonstrated that over a period of some four years no profits in excess of 8 per cent had been derived by the Canadian companies in question. I think the deduction is a fair one—I do not wish to be anything but that—that their attitude would be that if they could prove that the Canadian companies had not taken undue profits in recent months or years, they might be allowed to continue the range of gasoline prices as at present existing in Canada.

Now, sir, I submit that that is emphatically not the issue, and that justice will not be done nor the public satisfied if the line of investigation is confined entirely to that point, although, of course, the investigation would include it. I maintain the issue is rather this: have the companies taken advantage of the increase of tariff and of the special provisions and amendments made to the Customs Act in September, 1930, to maintain the prices of gasoline in Canada at a level higher than the comparable level of prices in any competing country—in this case the United States? That is the question which is being asked at the street corners, at business men's luncheons, at farmers' conventions and at fishermens' meetings. The speeches to-day on the resolution all bore out that trend of thought. If the answer is, yes, that they have been taking advantage of this legislation, then, of course, it is obvious that the government should take the action that they indicated in September, 1930.

I see nothing in the correspondence pointing to any intention to answer the point that I have just made, that is, the relative prices of gasoline in Canada and in other competing countries. It will not suffice for the Canadian companies merely to prove on paper that they have taken no excess profits in the recent period. To combat that would necessitate our going very far back and investigating records—not open to us—of the oil companies dominant in the United States. We would have to go into the question of interlocking interests, of a division of assets in years perhaps long gone by, whether the relationship of parent and child did not or does not exist between some of the oil companies in a foreign country and in Canada, and whether the parent on some occasions did not get the best of the deal. I am only suggesting the point. Possibly there might be a common source of supply to the parent and the child, and possibly better prices might have been given to the one rather than to the other. That is something which it would be impossible for us to prove by any information that we could obtain. There would also enter into the matter the question of watered stock, the question of bonuses of stock, of stock issued as dividends, and whether stock so issued should be entitled to claim interest.

As the member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) stated this afternoon, he had personal knowledge of where he could buy gas cheaper retail in the states than he could buy it wholesale in Canada; possibly some of our Canadian profits have been going to meet the close competition in the states. Many of these things it is absolutely impossible to ascertain, or to say whether under the circumstances 8 per cent or one per cent is a fair dividend, whether 8 per cent represents really 8 per cent or a very much larger figure. I recall when I went into business many years ago naturally I met with competition, and it was my endeavour to keep prices so low as to eliminate that competition. But occasionally some big company would get the opportunity to buy a whole carload of some commodity and sell it at cost, or perhaps below cost—what they would call a "special," which probably they figured was a cheap form of advertising. But when my customers came to me complaining of my higher price it was useless for me to show my invoices as proofs that I was paying more for the article than the price at which the big company was selling it. Nor was it any use for me to suggest that the company had paid more for the article than the price at which they were retailing it. My customers were not interested in that at all; the only thing they were concerned about was, could they get the article somewhere else at a price cheaper than that at which they could get it from me. I very soon realized that it was a waste of time to argue that I must have a particular price to give me a fair profit. They were not interested in my welfare, and it was up to me to meet my competitor's price or lose a certain amount of business. The converse was true when a fortunate turn in the market enabled me to buy to advantage and I could sell below my competitors; the public did not ask me whether I was making much or little profit on my sales.

The point I am trying to make is this; there is no obligation whatever on us to maintain prices to give a profit to any oil company any more than there was any obligation on the public to give me profits on my petty line of business. It might just as well be argued that we should provide dividends by way of increased freight rates to the Canadian railways. Of course, if some members of the house held Canadian Pacific Railway shares it would be very gratifying to them if we could arrange for an 8 per cent return on their investment; but I see no disposition in this house or in the country to do that. What about our friends from the prairies if they come forward and show beyond peradventure that they cannot grow wheat profitably at a price below $1 a bushel, are we to formulate policies or vote money to enable them to get that price? We are just as much entitled to do that as to provide any given rate of dividend for an oil company. It is not our business, especially in these days when profits are so minimized, to provide guaranteed profits to anybody.

This is the question: Are they meeting competitive prices without sheltering or-profiteering under the terms of the tariff? If not, it is the duty of the committee to so report and of the government to take appropriate action.

As the government have consented to the passing of the resolution, I will not waste time supporting it in regard to the gas used in cars and tractors, which has been the subject of debate this afternoon; but I do want to say a very few words in connection with another branch of the question which has not been touched upon to-day, and that is as to how the price of gasoline affects the fishing industry—more particularly the small fisherman, because the big fishing companies use expensive Diesel engines and a cheaper fuel in their large boats which the small fisherman cannot afford to buy. It may be said that the automobile is an important or a trivial adjunct of the man in business; but as regards the fisherman, it is absolutely essential that his boat should be fitted with a gasoline engine. When dealers sell us cars they tell us they will go 25 or 30 miles on a gallon of gasoline, but it is a known fact that the average fishing boat cannot go more than 5, 6 or 7 miles on a gallon.

This afternoon the right hon. Prime Minister very kindly gave credit to the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) and the hon. member for Willow Bunch for introducing this matter last session, but so far as the needs of the fishermen are concerned I think I can claim for the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and myself credit for the fact that we antedated those gentlemen in bringing up this question. When the legislation was introduced in September of 1930 the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and myself pleaded with the government to have mercy on the fishermen, explaining their dire need and their inability to meet increased taxation. We went so far as to move an amendment which was rejected, and why was it rejected? A reference was made to the guarantees which had been given by the oil companies, and at page 533 the right hon. gentleman said very definitely:

> I am quite sure that both hon. gentlemen realize that as there is to be no increase in price there is no object in what they suggest. . .

That was with reference to the amendment. At page 597 the right hon. gentleman also said:

> There will be no increase in price.

That was one of the reasons why the amendment was rejected. Again, the question arose as to the guarantees given by the oil companies. It was stated that they only referred to there being no increase in price, and this question was raised: Suppose as a matter of fact, while there is no increase, there is no drop in price when there should be? At page 578, in two places, the right hon. Prime Minister dealt very frankly and fully with that suggestion. On the second occasion he said quite plainly:

> . . . if there should be a great falling-off of prices beside us and an effort made to maintain present prices in Canada, that would be utilizing the tariff to increase the prices and would be a violation of the undertaking.

So whether the price of gasoline was increased or whether it was not reduced when that should have been done, the obligation of the companies would be the same.

The results have been outlined this afternoon by all the hon. members who have spoken, and they have repeatedly shown very plainly the great difference in prices between those in the United States and those in corresponding points in Canada. No mention was made of the great spread in prices between points in the extreme west, such as Seattle and Vancouver. The difference there is greater than at other points named this afternoon. I should like to give just one illustration from a fishing point of view; I should like to get it on Hansard. The increase in duty from one cent to 2½ cents a gallon was not the chief trouble, though that was equivalent to an increase of 250 per cent in the duty. Still, the country voted for high protection in 1930, and cannot very well complain if it gets high protection, and the 2½ cents would appear to be high enough. But that could be endured, perhaps; that has not caused the trouble. The difficulty has been brought about by those changes in the Customs Act, more particularly under section 36. There have been several separate changes, which have made it possible to enormously enhance the duty by means of orders in council.

There are several methods by which this may be done. One is by putting on a price which the customs department considers to be the fair price or cost price in the competing country, plus a fair charge for distribution costs, plus a fair profit. Another method is the more arbitrary one of simply passing an order in council in which the minister declares the value to be whatever he wishes.

I said I wished to give an illustration. This is an actual case, in connection with which I think I could produce proofs if necessary. It has to do with fishermen going to Seattle with fish caught in the waters off Vancouver island. These were taken to the only market available at that time, which was Seattle. In order to make the comparison fair I will translate the prices into terms of imperial gallons. They could buy gasoline in Seattle for 7.2 cents per imperial gallon but, while that was the price at which it was being sold by millions of gallons all down the Pacific coast, our Department of National Revenue ruled that this was not the proper price. They would not allow the people of the United States to fix the price at which they could sell their gasoline; they decided that the correct price should be 13.2 cents, a difference of 6 cents, and of course under the provisions of the Customs Act there automatically came into force a so-called dumping duty of 6 cents per gallon. In addition there was the regular duty of 2½ cents, making a total duty of 8.5 cents on gasoline which cost only 7.2 cents! But even if you add those figures together they fall far short of what was then the current price in British Columbia. The United States fisherman was competing with our fisherman on the same fishing grounds, paying only 7.2 cents for his gasoline, paying less for his engine, but getting 2 cents more per pound for his fish because of the duty of 2 cents per pound on our fish going into the United States.

As I said in June last this creates, perhaps inadvertently, a very great hardship on our fishing population. We talk about Canada first and about equal opportunity, but this situation does not reveal an equal opportunity for our west coast fishermen, though it might be called perhaps a little better than an equal opportunity for the oil companies.

To know that the fishermen are in desperate need one has only to be familiar with current conditions in the fishing industry on the west coast. Not only have prices been shot to an unbelievable extent, but in many cases the market has totally disappeared. Last year the prices went so low that good salmon was bringing one cent a pound, and it is claimed by those in a position to know that the cost of gasoline is 35 per cent of the cost of fishing, so it will be seen that when our fishermen have to pay 22 cents per gallon for gasoline it gives a tremendous advantage to those with whom they have to compete. I should like to quote just a few words from a press item to illustrate this fact:

> The run of sockeye is so far very poor. High boat got 15 fish at 6 cents per pound which will average around 20 cents per fish.

[Mr. Neill.]

In other words the high boat, fishing perhaps 18 or 20 hours a day, made about $3, while the low boat would make probably around $1. I quote again:

> Many trollers have quit and gone ashore. Fish are costing the fishermen more to catch than they get for them from the dealers. Gas here is 22 cents per gallon while it is sold to fishermen across the line at 8 cents. It costs on an average one gallon per hour to keep the troller moving, some more, some less, but boats do not on an average catch more than one fish per hour at 15 cents per fish.

Then the article goes on to give the price of one cent per pound, which I mentioned a moment ago.

That is the situation I wish to bring to the attention of the house in order that it may be on record when this question is referred to the banking and commerce committee, of which I am not a member. I want it to be there so that this phase of the question will not be misunderstood, but I repeat that I am pleased with the attitude of the government in the matter and I hope the work of the committee will be of benefit to users of gasoline both on sea and on land.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. BROWN: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. He was not in the house when I spoke on this matter just before six o'clock. I suggested the desirability of enlarging the order of reference so as to include all petroleum products. Would he care to accept that suggestion?

Mr. SPEAKER: There has been no move on the part of the mover and the seconder of the resolution to adopt that suggestion.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS COMMITTEE OF QUESTION OF ELECTION FUNDS

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton) moved:

> Whereas during the session of 1931 a special committee was appointed to investigate the "Beauharnois power development" and
> Whereas it was shown that enormous sums of money had been contributed for political campaign funds,
> Be it resolved: That, in the opinion of this house, it is desirable that the committee on privileges and elections consider and report upon the question of election funds and draft such amendments to the elections act as may be considered necessary.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak so early in the deliberations of this house, because the experience I have gained from other deliberative bodies is that it is desirable first to gain some background and understand more fully the rules and procedure which govern. During the recent campaign in which I was successful one of the outstanding issues was the Beauharnois scandal and its relationship to campaign funds. The evidence in that regard is definite. I quote from the Toronto Globe of August 18, 1931, as follows:

Mr. Sweezey's evidence summed up the campaign contributions as follows:

Dominion Liberals..	$720,000
Ontario Conservative party.. ..	125,000
Quebec Conservative party.. ..	30,000
Ontario Liberal party..	2,000 or 3,000
Mr. Leslie Bell, Montreal Conservative member..	6,000

From this I think we can all readily agree that the child rests upon the doorstep of both the Conservative and Liberal parties.

The resolution which I have the honour to move is definite in its terms. It reflects the driving force of public opinion, not only in the province of Ontario and particularly in the constituency which I represent, but throughout the whole Dominion. It should be remembered that apart from the hon. member who moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Bourgeois) I come most directly from the people of this country, and I carry a message which interprets their desire that this problem of campaign funds must be confronted and that an honest effort must be made to prevent its recurrence in the political life of this country. I am glad to say that as a representative of Labour I received the support not only of the working people but also of the middle classes and the more well-to-do. These people were amazed at the magnitude of this scandal, which, after all is said and done, strikes at the very roots of democratic government. Many men spent last Christmas within the confines of Kingston penitentiary who had done less than these gentlemen have done, many of whom no doubt spent the holiday season surrounded by the comforts of a first class hotel.

I submit that we have come to a sorry pass when these financial highwaymen can influence indirectly the votes of the people of this country. Money is still an influence in the elections of Canada. Some time ago a well known politician was discussing an election campaign with me. Like all other candidates I expressed the belief that I was going to win, but he replied, "Humphrey, we have the dough and you have the enthusiasm, but we will win." What chance have men with progressive views to win an election when they are pitted against conditions such as this? It is my experience that men with progressive views are generally poor, and being poor economically and socially, they have a terrible struggle to maintain their existence.

I remember well the campaigns which brought into existence in the province of Ontario what I consider to be the greatest public ownership project upon the face of this globe. Up until recently any Canadian, irrespective of the province from which he came, could go to any part of this world and speak with pride of that public ownership proposition. Electricity is one of the greatest civilizing forces in the life of this country; but what chance has this project when it is confronted by something similar to this Beauharnois business? All hon. members who are farmers by profession, whether Conservative or Liberal in politics, must realize that electrical power is the greatest Jersey cow in existence—it is easy to milk.

I know something of the problems which confront a Labour candidate during an election. In many cases he is forced to go on earning his livelihood; money is not coming in very fast and all the problems which confront the average candidate are intensified. If this condition is allowed to continue, what chance have the democratic institutions of this country? Frankly, I believe the Dominion could give a lead to the world on the question of the conduct of elections so far as the financial aspect is concerned. I believe we could pioneer in this regard and show the world that elections can be won on principle and not on the driving force of selfish financial corporations.

Briefly, what are the facts? We all agree that campaign funds are necessary; we all agree that they are desirable, and I think that on a consideration of the evidence we all agree that some of them have been contributed by people who have axes to grind. Let me ask the house: is this a satisfactory way of influencing public opinion? In connection with that, I should like to read an account of an incident which took place, I understand, in the last provincial election in Quebec, where one of the candidates accused another of taking $325,000 from the Beauharnois corporation. This is the reply of that particular candidate:

I hereby state with all the force at my command that never directly or indirectly did I receive a cent from that organization.

He went so far as to charge the candidate who made the accusation as "a vulgar liar and a public calumniator." These were not two highwaymen talking to one another. One was Mr. Gagnon and the other was Mr. Taschereau. Another instance that is worth while quoting I take from the Toronto Globe of Tuesday, August 18, 1931. It reads:

Nor can the general question of campaign funds be kept in the background. At the meeting where Mr. Taschereau flung his challenge to Mr. Gagnon, Mr. Laetere Roy, former member for Levis, discussing the political contribution of the Beauharnois company made this statement:

"During the last federal election the Conservatives had $2,500,000 at their disposal. You know yourselves that in Levis they had barrels of money. And do you know where that money came from? A good part from a railway corporation, and the larger amount from the manufacturers. Mr. Bennett then raised the tariff which allowed them some return for the sums they had advanced."

I am an Englishman, and I am proud of the fact. Of course we are not responsible for our nationality; we had no control over that. Possibly if some of us had, we would not be here now. My attitude in life towards the human family anyway is that we are all human beings. I want, however, to bring up this point: the only argument I know of in favour of titles is that you can get some rich people to pay for titles half a million dollars which go into the campaign fund of a political party, but in this democratic country of ours, they are repaid not in titles but in cold cash.

In conclusion, I appreciate the complexity of the problem that will confront the committee, but I believe, after what has arisen out of that investigation, the house owes a duty to the people of this Dominion to see to it that as far as is humanly possible there shall be no recurrence of the present scandal in the public life of this country. Even if this should mean a distinct and possibly radical departure in connection with the operation of elections, it is the duty of the house to see to it that that departure is made forthwith.

Be it resolved: that, in the opinion of this house, it is desirable that the committee on privileges and elections consider and report upon the question of election funds and draft such amendments to the election act as may be considered necessary.

I am heartily in favour of that motion carrying, and I hope it will meet with the unanimous acceptance of the house. Indeed, the resolution is almost in the exact terms of what at the conclusion of the last session of parliament I suggested should be the first step taken at the beginning of the present session, namely that a select committee of the house should be appointed to consider the question of election funds and amendments to the election act which would be in the public interest. The present resolution suggests the standing committee on privileges and elections. I do not think there is much to choose between the two. The committee on privileges and elections is a proper committee to deal with a matter of this kind. The main point is that there should be at this session a careful consideration of the whole question of campaign funds so called, and if possible, amendments to the election act which, as I said, will be in the public interest.

When I spoke in this house on July 30 last, I went a step further and suggested that it was desirable to have a royal commission to inquire into the whole question of campaign funds, not only of the last campaign, but as well of the campaigns of 1925 and 1926. I repeated that proposal at a meeting which I addressed at London, Ontario, on October 20, my view being that were a royal commission appointed at that time the personnel of which would include commissioners nominated at the instance of the three principal parties in the house—because that is the only kind of royal commission that would meet with any degree of public confidence in a matter of this kind—we would have before us at the beginning of this session a report which would be a great help to the house, or to a committee of this sort in deciding upon necessary amendments to the act. The government, however, alone has power to appoint a royal commission, and the government has not seen its way or thought it wise to take that step. It must of course accept the responsibility therefor.

I should like to quote from Hansard of July 30 of last year what I said with reference to these two matters I shall quote just sufficient to make clear that I am but restating at the moment the position I then took. I said, as will appear at pages 4388-9 of Hansard of July 30 last:

I think that not only should there be a royal commission to go into the matter of party campaign funds from the ground up, so that if at all possible we may have the matter cleared up once and for all, but as soon as the next session of parliament meets there should be appointed a select committee of the house to consider the Dominion Elections Act, and see if in some way it is not possible to have that act further amended so as to render unnecessary, to as large a degree as possible, the collection of moneys for campaign purposes. I make that suggestion in the interests of every hon. member in the house, in the interest of every future candidate, in the interests of every political party, and in the public interest.

Hon. members will see that the course there suggested is practically identical with the one which the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) has recommended in the motion which is before the house and which I have expressed the hope the house will adopt unanimously. I did at the time make, in addition, certain suggestions as to what might be helpful by way of amendments to the elections act to accomplish the purpose in view. I shall not repeat those suggestions at the moment. No doubt if a committee is appointed they will come before the committee, and if they do, I hope that they will be favourably considered.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): May I congratulate the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) on his maiden speech in this chamber? It is quite clear that he is a skilled public speaker and a debater of large experience. His performance was most creditable and I trust will be often repeated in this chamber, as often as may be necessary to meet the circumstances that seem in his judgment to require his intervening in debate.

There is only one question to be considered in connection with the motion now before us, and that is whether or not any good purpose will be served by dealing with the matter at this session. When the census returns are complete it will be necessary to readjust the boundaries of the constituencies, and a complete redistribution will pass this house. It is obvious that the census returns will not be completed to enable that to be done at this session. In point of fact they never have been. Next session will therefore be the first opportunity at which redistribution can be considered.

Side by side with redistribution the whole machinery of elections must be considered. For instance, the question as to whether or not our method of registering the voters is a sound one; secondly, whether or not there should be any educational test imposed. I recall on one occasion having endeavoured to have the registers set up by each elector subscribing his name in a book, and then when he came to vote, if his identity were challenged, he would of course have to sign, and it would become apparent then, if he were a repeater, that he was not the elector entitled to vote. I need hardly say that repeating has in this country assumed very considerable proportions. I recall on one occasion being told at the end of a contested election in a city through which I was passing that a certain visitor from another city, a foreign city, had voted some forty times that day and had left on the evening train. That is one difficulty that has to be overcome. In Great Britain they can have a general election after a very short interval. Here the shortest time within which an election can now be held is some fifty-six days. That is a matter that should engage the attention of those charged with responsibility for the enactment of a new elections act. The other day, for instance, a vacancy occurred in Athabasca. It was quite apparent from the communications that were sent that unless that election were held while the ground was still frozen it might be impossible to hold it at all until well on in the summer, and indeed it might be difficult to hold it at all within the time required by law. You will find that that happens frequently in this country. How can that difficulty be overcome?

Then you have the larger question, to which some attention has been directed, as to corruption in elections. The hon. member for East Hamilton said that there had been evidence of corrupt elections in this country. There have been. Elections have been held in this country in which a very large number of those returned have been charged with participating in fraudulent arrangements whereby they were elected, and the legislature has passed a statute to prevent the matter being inquired into by the courts. That is a matter, of course, that is well understood. Each legislature and parliament chooses its own methods of dealing with these matters. In England and in Canada, both in the federal parliament and in the provincial legislatures, it was the custom, as is well known, in the beginning of the development of our institutions for committees of the house to determine whether or not a member had been properly elected, and it will be within the memory of those who took the trouble to read the history of it that when Wilkes was elected over Colonel Luttrell, although he had a clear majority, the House of Commons undertook to change the return and substitute for the name of Wilkes that of Colonel Luttrell. It will perhaps be within the memory of members of this house that that brought about well nigh a revolution; for it was said that the legislature was not the body charged with responsibility for the election of members, but rather the people of the country, who had already exercised their franchise and returned Mr. Wilkes. That doctrine no longer avails in some parts of this country, and a legislature has seen fit to determine that it, and not the electors, shall say who shall sit in the legislature. I direct attention to that only as indicating the trend of modern democratic thought. In the early days in England, in the middle of the last century, it was believed, as it has been in this country, that the proper method of determining these matters was through the courts; and hence it is that judges—in our country two judges—are called upon to decide whether or not a member has been legally elected to his seat if a petition has been filed against his return.

The causes that vacate a seat are so numerous, Mr. Speaker, that it is almost impossible to say with certainty that any election held in this country might not on purely technical grounds be voided. I point that out to the hon. member for East Hamilton; for we are dealing with practical things, and not with matters of the emotions. When he says that it is desirable to do thus and so I only point out that in the election law that has been on the statute books of this country since we substituted the courts for a committee of parliament we have made so many matters offences under the act that almost any election could be voided. In the end the machinery of the law has very seldom been used. Those are facts known to everyone in this country. Such things, for instance, as the employment of automobiles, the giving of a dinner or a lunch to a friend under certain circumstances, the giving of hospitality of any kind—

An hon. MEMBER: A drink.

Mr. BENNETT: Not necessarily a drink. Hospitality and ginger ale, for instance. It is true that there are constituents of hon. gentlemen present who probably prefer a mixture of alcohol with water to ginger ale, but that need not engage our attention. The point I desire to make is this. For nearly three-quarters of a century we have had upon the statute books in Canada, in Great Britain, in Australia and other countries under the British flag, provisions whereby elections could be voided for corrupt acts; we have endeavoured to define them, and in so doing we have made the conduct of an ordinary election almost technically illegal under the provisions of the statute. Shall that continue as it is? That is something to be considered. Is it wise thus to impose restrictions against what I might call the common sense attitude of most men in these matters? If you meet your friend, take him in to dinner and extend to him hospitality of that kind, are you laying yourself open to a possible offence and to the voiding of an election? This question which arises out of kindred circumstances need not be discussed beyond saying that I have always held the view that if we would limit the number of offences and make them broad and general without endeavouring to particularize as we have done, we would find it less difficult to attain the end we have in mind with respect to the voiding of elections.

You will remember perhaps, sir, that the late Doctor Weldon, who at the time was dean of the law school at Halifax, to whom I owe a debt I will never be able to repay, and whose memory I revere, sought by motion made in this house to disfranchise constituencies for corrupt acts that resulted in the return of a member who should not have been returned. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I have long held the view that there is much to be said in support of that principle. If the constituency is willing to be debauched by a candidate violating the provisions of the statute and committing such corrupt acts as are defined by the law, resulting in the voiding of the election, it might be that if it were proven to be general the constituency itself could be punished for a term of two or three years, or as the case might merit.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What does the Prime Minister mean when he refers to punishing a constituency?

Mr. BENNETT: Depriving it of a member. Perhaps in some cases it would not be a punishment. I understand the point the hon. gentleman has raised. My words were very simple; their meaning was that the constituency would be deprived of a representative in the House of Commons.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the Prime Minister mean that if some individual committed a corrupt act he would punish the whole constituency because of that act?

Mr. BENNETT: No, he did not say any such thing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I just wondered—

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say any such thing, and the hon. gentleman is quite capable of hearing. What he said was that if these acts were general the result would be that the constituency would be disfranchised for a term of years. In England on one or two occasions that was found to be a most satisfactory measure, and resulted—

Mr. YOUNG: If there were ten righteous men in the constituency, would you spare it?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman need not concern himself in that regard, because I fancy he will find there are more than ten righteous men in his constituency.

Mr. McINTOSH: I should think five ought to save the situation.

Mr. BENNETT: But, sir, we have gone a step farther. We have undertaken to punish the constituencies and to punish those guilty of corrupt offences, and we have defined what constitutes corrupt acts. Will anybody say we have made substantial progress in twenty-five or thirty years in that regard? Read election reports in cases where elections were contested—you will find them in the library—and I think you will express great surprise that a seat could be voided under circumstances there stated. In one of the first cases—in fact, I think it is the first case reported in the Supreme court reports—there was reference to undue influence in connection with those who exercised their franchise. All these things are now past and gone, and no one will say, contrasting present day conditions with the allegations made in the case to which I have referred, that we have made very great progress in that regard. Why? The hon. member for East Hamilton was very frank when he said that campaign funds are necessary. I recall reading, during the progress of his campaign, a letter in which the president of the Trades and Labour Council enclosed a subscription to assist the hon. gentleman who is now the member for East Hamilton in his election campaign. Undoubtedly that subscription was to help defray legitimate costs in connection with the campaign. There are legitimate costs; there are legitimate expenses, and the fact that your friend or my friend—

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish to point out that I do not think the Prime Minister read a letter from the Trades and Labour Council.

Mr. BENNETT: I said it was from the president of the Trades and Labour Council.

Mr. MITCHELL: It was the president of the Trades and Labour Congress who sent me a personal cheque.

Mr. BENNETT: If I said Trades and Labour Council I meant to say Trades and Labour Congress. I was not responsible for the donation being made public, and I have merely mentioned that I read in the newspaper that Mr. Moore had sent a contribution to the hon. gentleman. I did not complain of his action, and I am not criticizing it. I merely point out that the hon. gentleman has stated frankly in this chamber that campaign funds are essential and necessary to play their part in an election. Whether the cheque was personal or how it came to be paid I cannot say, but I do know Mr. Moore's contribution was mentioned in a press communication which I read on the train one day. I am not criticizing the receipt of that cheque, or suggesting for one moment that it was improper. If Mr. Moore wished to send his old friend a ten dollar bill, he had a perfect right to do so. If my friend sees fit to give me a thousand dollar bill I say he has a perfect right to do so.

Those who have read the life of Disraeli will recall that Mrs. Willyams gave him a thousand pound note which he put away in the pocket of the coat he that day was wearing. He forgot about it for some time, and subsequently discovered it in the pocket of his jacket The contribution itself cannot by any possibility be said to be wrong. If your friend desires to assist you in maintaining your office or securing your return to the House of Commons, he has a perfect right to do so, and I venture to point out that there are very few members in this house, if there are any, who have not at some time in their lives received assistance, probably very small or very trifling, but yet indicative of the spirit of helpfulness and the good will of the individual contributor towards the one whose return to this house is desired. There cannot be anything wrong in that; the law contemplates that it will be so.

During the life of each succeeding parliament an effort has been made to limit, circumscribe and restrict the extent to which contributions should be made, and more than that, the persons who should make them. Perhaps hon. members will recall that between the years 1921 and 1925 this parliament placed upon the statute books a provision whereby contributions by corporations or companies were made illegal, and, that the hon. member from Winnipeg, who has just asked a question, through his activity in the privileges and elections committee was responsible for its recall; it was repealed before the election of 1930 was held. After the election of 1925 and during the succeeding parliament, owing to irregularities which came about in connection with the election of Athabaska, the privileges and elections committee met, and in no sectional or party sense endeavoured to prepare such legislation for submission to this house as would prevent a recurrence of the condition to which reference had been made. The election of 1930 came on with the restriction eliminated as to corporations.

making contributions. It will be recalled a special provision was made in the statute whereby companies were organized—my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) knows what I mean—for the purpose of making contributions to the cause of the Progressive or farmers' movement in the western provinces, and funds were collected for that purpose; that is well known. It was discussed in the lifetime of the house elected in 1925. I say that to the hon. gentleman for East Hamilton because I suppose, like most new members, he has the very laudable ambition to accomplish a reform, and I take it, that no member will deny him the right to achieve that ambition if he can. But I merely take a little time to point out that for the last half a century successive committees on privileges and elections, not only in Canada, not only in Australia, not only in England, but in every country where democratic government prevails, have made an effort, first, merely to define what constitutes improper practices at elections, and second, to limit the contributions that may be made by individuals or corporations to the funds of (a) the party and (b) the individual. In the United States it will be recalled that in connection with the great national campaigns contributions are now made public and it is stated with particularity by whom they are made. We have such a provision in our law. We have provided that every member of this house shall make a return of his election expenses indicating the sources from which the funds came to pay those expenses, whether from himself or from a contributor. If those who have interest in the matter will go through the returns filed after the last election they will realize that various people made contributions towards their particular favourite candidate, sometimes $5, sometimes $25, sometimes $100, sometimes $1,000. But it is within the memory of members of this house that in at least one return with respect to one of the elections held since 1921 the candidate—mark you, he was not successful—showed he had expended over $75,000. No one for a moment said that that money was not properly expended. There were supporting vouchers, there were the details of the expenditure. It indicated to me, at least, that the ascertaining of the will of the people had become highly expensive for those who endeavoured to speak for a party in the determination of that question.

Now, let us ascertain what other appropriate remedies may be suggested. There may be some difficulty in that regard. In Australia, confronted with similar conditions, they endeavoured to cure the evil by compulsory voting. How many members of this house are prepared to say that the enactment of legislation to make it an offence to fail to vote will cure the evil to which reference has been made?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Don't you think it would help?

Mr. BENNETT: I have always held that it would assist, and I have not changed my mind.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think it would.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe it would. But, remember, this country is so vast in area and its population so scattered that the difficulty of maintaining successfully a charge against an elector for not voting is such as to make it well-nigh impossible to secure a conviction, a situation that makes it most difficult to say that that is the remedy to be sought.

Now, it has been the practice in this country, as it has been in most democratic countries, to say, and quite properly so, that party contributions made by those who are seeking benefits for the purpose of ensuring the receipt of those benefits is wrong. I have heard no one attempt to justify any other view. But the difficulty always has been to ascertain whether or not you had the sequence —the payment, the expectation, the reward. Those have been the really difficult things to determine. If you show that over a long course of years any individual regardless of such expectations has contributed funds to assist in the election of his party's candidates, that is not indicative of any evil intent. But then you come to the question as old as the Pacific scandal in this parliament. I wonder if members sometimes look back upon the journals of the house of the days of the so-called Pacific scandal and realize what progress Canada has made in minimizing what were then regarded as great evils, and if they realize that what in those days was regarded as serious would to-day be regarded as a mere incident. I wonder if that fact is borne in on the minds of hon. members. Read the journals of the house of that day, read the evidence given and compare it with the evidence given last year before the Beauharnois committee, and what is the result? It is for that reason that I suggest the great difficulty that arises in merely saying that something shall go to the committee on privileges and elections where various ideas are thrown into the melting pot and something emerges to be embodied in a statute which accomplishes no good. That is a fact known to every member of this house who has taken the trouble to study the subject. I have felt that compulsory voting might accomplish some good.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: It may be I am wrong as to that. I have inquired of my friends in Australia how in practice compulsory voting has worked out there. I think they have also a similar statute in New Zealand now. I was told that the law had this effect, that, first, it greatly increased the number of men who voted, and, secondly, it did something to lessen the possibility of improprieties in the conduct of elections.

Mr. HEAPS: If the right hon. gentleman will permit a question—could he inform the house whether they have also compulsory registration in Australia?

Mr. BENNETT: I dealt with that in the first few words of my observations on the question of registration. I am not going to develop the idea beyond saying that I think there must be some method of registration and some method of revision, because as the law stands now there are many names of dead men and women on voters' lists that should not be there.

The immediate matter that has given rise to the motion of the hon. member for East Hamilton is the Beauharnois scandal, in connection with which the special committee found that very large sums of money had been paid to a political party. This gives me an opportunity to make just one observation. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) went to Winnipeg and made a speech, in the course of which he took occasion to say that money had been paid to the representative of the then opposition and returned at my instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is that?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the right hon. gentleman said at London, not Winnipeg—that money had been paid to the representative of the Conservative party and at my instance returned. I have always felt —I want to do justice to the right hon. gentleman—that it must have been either an error —a very simple one on his part, but not so simple so far as we are concerned—or it must have been done with malice aforethought. I cannot think any good purpose would have been served by his doing it with malice aforethought, because ultimately he must come back to this chamber and meet here his peers who heard the discussion and read the evidence that dealt with that question. In that evidence it was never suggested by any person that a sum of money had been paid to the federal Conservative party by Beauharnois interests. There is the record and it speaks for itself. Then why should it be said money was so received and returned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend say no money was contributed by Beauharnois to any member of the Conservative party, to be paid into the party funds?

Mr. BENNETT: I am now dealing with the evidence. I say that the right hon. leader of the opposition went to London and made a speech which he either knew was false or he should have known was false, and he therefore was wilfully negligent in the discharge of his duties, for he had the hardihood to say that this sum of money was received and returned at my instance. That was what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that I made no statement, at London or anywhere else, which I knew was false. I would have made no such statement. If I made an incorrect statement I at once retract it, and I accept my right hon. friend's word as to what is right and what is wrong in the circumstances. What I do say is this: what I am speaking of is the contribution—my right hon. friend has just referred to it—being made by Beauharnois, and all along my understanding has been that Beauharnois did make a contribution to a member of the Conservative party, which was to have gone into the funds of the Conservative party and would have gone there but for the fact that the present leader of the government indicated that it should not be done.

Mr. BENNETT: In the report made the next day, and in this case prepared from a printed or typewritten manuscript, this is what is said:

> As the law stands a corporation or an individual has a perfect right to make a contribution to the funds of a political party, and the party a right in accepting contributions. Some years ago a law was enacted which made contributions from corporations to political parties illegal. I much fear the law was never greatly respected, but it was there. At the session of 1930 that section of the Elections Act was repealed. The repeal was made at the request of Labour members in the House of Commons, the reason being that under the law as it stood it would have been illegal for labour unions or farmers' organizations without incorporation as political bodies to make contributions to the campaign funds of Labour candidates or farmer candidates. In commenting upon the amounts contributed to the funds of the Liberal party, and accepted, it is desirable that this fact of there being no illegality about the transaction should be fully and clearly understood.

For reasons which I think are apparent I endeavoured to repeat that to the house this evening. Then the right hon. gentleman went on:

> The next point to note is that contributions were made by those associated with Beauharnois to both political parties, to the Conservative party and members of the party in the federal field, as well as to the party or members of the party in Ontario and Quebec, and that the return of the contribution made to the general fund of the Conservative party was on grounds of party expediency and not of public policy.
> When the general elections came on, Mr. Sweezey made a contribution to the campaign funds of both the Liberal and Conservative parties. Later the contribution given to the treasurer of the Conservative party was returned, he, according to Mr. Sweezey's statement of what he had been told, having had instructions from Mr. Bennett to return the contribution. Now what was Mr. Bennett's reason for directing the return of the amount contributed?

Mark you, it never was contributed, and the evidence shows that to be the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my right hon. friend say that no contribution was made to Mr. McCuaig or any other person—

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what the hon. gentleman was dealing with.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —to be given to General McRae?

Mr. BENNETT: Not so far as I know, and what is more, that is not what the right hon. gentleman was dealing with. The right hon. gentleman went to London and told the people that the contribution was made and returned at my instance because, he said, I believed there would be an inquiry, and it was done for party expediency and not public good. Sir, the person alleged to have made the contribution, without my knowledge, wrote a letter to the public press and denied that any such contribution was made, a few days after that speech. Then why did the right hon. gentleman make that statement in London? Why did he speak of the sums of money having been received and returned, unless for one purpose? Being in the valley of humiliation and unable to extricate himself, he tries to drag down other men to keep him company.

I knew the time would come and the opportunity would arise when I might say to this house that that statement was untrue. The motion of the hon. member for East Hamilton affords that opportunity. Not only that, but with my knowledge or at my instance there was never any money received from Beauharnois. Hon. members will recall that I stated last session that I felt possibly it should have been my duty to go before that committee and make a statement in view of what was said.

It is an unpleasant sort of thing to inquire into this matter further, but I did so, and the language that was used when the offer of a contribution was made, according to the person who received that offer, was, "Not a damned cent." That was the answer; I hesitate to put it to the house in that way, but that is what was said. I do greatly deprecate an unfair statement being made for nothing but a sinister purpose, but I accept the statement of the right hon. gentleman. The only difficulty is that my right hon. friend made the statement in London and was content that it should be published broadcast. It does not do much good now to stand in this house, when he had the knowledge before him at the time he made his speech only a few months ago, and say, "I did not intend that" or "I am sorry, and I accept the hon. gentleman's word." It is not my word; it is what the record shows, what is written there and what he referred to during the progress of his speech. Then why misrepresent it? That is what I want to know, and that is what many people want to know. I knew the time would come when, before a jury of his peers, he would have to face that statement, untrue, highly improper, and calculated to mislead people merely for his own personal advantage.

I point these things out, sir, because the hon. member for East Hamilton has said that during the course of his election much attention was paid to this particular matter, and that it became of considerable importance that he should propose the resolution he now brings forward. In fact, I think he promised his electors he would do so, and as I have said, he has discharged that duty fairly and, for a new member, with very great credit and distinction to himself. But I ask him to consider whether or not any progress will be made by sending this resolution to the committee on privileges and elections. Would it not be advisable to have this matter dealt with when redistribution is dealt with, and when this parliament will frame, as it must frame, a new election act to provide for the forthcoming election, with new lists in new constituencies?

If it is the sense of this house that the motion should pass and that the matter should be sent to the committee certainly I will not, nor will the government, bring forward any objection to that being done. I have discharged my duty when I point out to the hon. gentleman the conditions to which I have referred and the desirability of considering this matter when perhaps party feelings and passions are less strong and when the members of the committee may be better able to take a dispassionate view of a situation which must be remedied if democracy is to survive, and which must be frankly met if we are to maintain our institutions in their vigour and strength. I have merely put the matter before the hon. member in this way; I leave it to the house to determine whether or not a good purpose would be served by having the resolution go to the committee on privileges and elections at this time. I repeat frankly that no opposition will be offered by the government to this being done, but I say with equal frankness that I do not think any good purpose will be served by following that course at this time.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) has covered a pretty wide field, more or less directly related to the matter under consideration, but on one point especially I beg respectfully to disagree with his view. He states that the proper time and occasion for the committee to deal with this phase of the electoral system, that is, contribution to party funds, will be when the same committee will have to deal with redistribution.

I was a member of this house, Mr. Speaker, when one redistribution took place, and I kept in close touch with proceedings on a couple of other occasions. My impression is that during those times the committee had its hands full, the whole time being taken up with the question of redistribution only. Surely the right hon. gentleman cannot expect that at the next session the committee will be able to deal with redistribution, with campaign funds, with amendments to the elections act and so on. It would take at least two or three sessions. It seems to me all those things have to be taken seriatim.

I was interested and pleased to hear the hon. gentleman refer to old times both in England and in this country. There is no doubt that the evil of which the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) spoke is an old one. At this moment I take the opportunity to congratulate the hon. member, both upon his successful campaign and his maiden speech. No doubt this evil will last for ever, but the same thing can be said of anything connected with human affairs. One of the objects of parliament is to deal with evils as they occur and to correct them as far as possible, with the expectation not of eradicating them altogether but rather of minimizing their effects. The argument advanced by the right hon. gentleman in connection with that aspect of the question is similar to the sceptical criticisms made of the League of Nations because that body has not been able to prevent the present trouble between China and Japan. I do not take that view. We are not all-powerful—not even the right hon. gentleman is all-powerful—but with the cooperation of men of good will in all parties we can accomplish something from time to time.

The question dealt with by this resolution is one that might be better taken up separately. The operation of the elections act, the redistribution and qualification of voters, compulsory voting and so on are all different aspects; they have nothing to do with this matter. This is outside of the electoral law, so to speak.

The question of campaign funds is a very complicated one, and I am not unmindful of the statement made by the Prime Minister that campaign funds in themselves are not wrong. They may be necessary, but I do not believe they are necessary to the extent to which they are functioning in our present system. My firm belief is and my experience has been that a very large proportion of the campaign funds are not used either in corrupting the people or in helping the candidate; they are pocketed by the so-called local leaders. These men come to the committee and say, "You know, in such and such a district I command so many votes; if I had five hundred or a thousand dollars at my disposal I could assure you a majority." Nine times out of ten the money remains in their pockets; they are benefited to that extent but neither the electors, the candidate nor the party have received any good therefrom.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How does the hon. gentleman know that?

Mr. BOURASSA: I know it from experience. As the hon. gentleman has raised the issue, I will give him an example. When I was chosen as a candidate some thirty-eight years ago the first condition which I imposed was that I would not seek any campaign funds from any electoral committee. That was the condition I laid down to my electors and to my late revered leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He gladly accepted that condition, because in those days the Liberal party was mighty poor and Sir Wilfrid had a peculiar tenderness for any candidate who did not ask for any financial assistance from his party. My second election was more of a contest and two of my friends, both good fellows and very honest, thought fit to go to the committee to Montreal and ask for a subscription. They got that subscription and they returned to a certain corner in my constituency where one of them spent all of his share while the other one kept a little reward for himself. When I found out what had happened I borrowed money from the bank and I reimbursed the treasurer of the Liberal party. I was thus enabled to continue to speak and vote just as freely in that parliament as I had during the previous parliament. At the next election I decided to make an experiment. I visited this same corner of my constituency and the local leaders came to me and in a mysterious manner asked if Mr. So-and-So would be there. I told them that he would not, and they then wanted to know who would come. I told them no one would come, and then they inquired as to what they would do for an organization. I have no scruples in admitting that I have usually spent a little money here and there. There might be a poor devil of a settler living twenty miles from the polling booth and having no rig in which to come to the village, and I have helped him out and given the man who brought him to vote two or three dollars. It may have been against the letter of the law, but I do not deny having done it. These poor fellows have no other pleasure in life than to come in and vote once in five years. However, there was no committee, no place where the wiseacres of the village could get together and get drunk on whiskey and beer and then cry out, "Hurrah for the Liberal party." On this particular occasion, in carrying out my experiment, I spent not one single cent in that particular district, and I obtained the same number of votes as I had received at the previous election. This convinced me that the so-called necessity for campaign funds is to a large extent caused by the exactions of canvassers of local leaders who pocket most of the money they receive. So much for that aspect of the case.

There is still a broader aspect, the source of these subscriptions. The right hon. gentleman has mentioned various amendments to the law, so I will not refer to any detail. It seems to me a distinction should be drawn between corporations and individuals who have no direct dealings with the government but who may have a personal or a public interest in supporting one party or the other, or one candidate or the other, and those who are directly interested in getting favours from the state. What I have always objected to is the contribution which is made, generally to both parties, such as the contributions made in the past by the railroad companies or by the Canadian Manufacturers Association, which has always had a permanent and enormous interest at stake.

I have previously referred to the elections of 1896 which were carried on by the Liberal party in the name of free trade. The curse of protection was to be eradicated for all time; but everyone knows what happened later on—the Hon. Mr. Fielding brought in a moderately protective tariff. I regarded myself as a moderate protectionist. In spite of the great convention of 1893, in spite of the program initiated by my party, I could not believe that free trade could be established in this country, and I so stated in my constituency, to the great scandal of some of my Liberal friends. Afterwards, and upon inquiry, I was informed by one of the most influential ministers that they had engagements. I asked what those engagements were and he replied, "You know, when election time came we needed money, as elections are not won with prayers; we received a subscription from the manufacturers association and we promised them the tariff would not be dealt with too harshly." That shows the effect of campaign funds when contributed by certain corporations. To my mind the contributions which have been made by the manufacturers association from year to year since 1879 have been far more detrimental to the morals of this country and to the independence of this parliament than have the contributions made by Mr. Sweezey and his associates. My feeling is that too much noise has been made over the Beauharnois affair. Of course it is a scandal, but no more than many other things. The right hon. gentleman has properly said: if you look up the records of parliament at the time of the Pacific scandal, you will be amazed to see that things which were considered abominable in those days would probably be accepted as—well, unimportant in these days. What was important in the Pacific scandal? It was not the amount of money contributed. It was the direct connection between Sir George Etienne Cartier and Sir John A. Macdonald as party leaders, and Sir Hugh Allan on the other side. It was the direct, shall I say, conspiracy between the two leaders of the government, two most eminent men, and the man who was interested in procuring the charter and privileges of the company. When you read those letters of Sir George Etienne Cartier to this and that man saying—well, I translate it in popular language—put the screw on you for a little more money, that was the scandalous part of it. It was not the amount of money; it was not the secret understandings; it was the brutal fact that the leaders of the government, the leaders of the country, got into direct connection with the organizers of a big railway company which was after privileges from parliament, and secured money from that company on the eve of the session which was to give them their privileges. That was the scandalous part of it.

I quite agree with the hon. member for East Hamilton that the traffic in titles which has been going on in England for a number of years in order to fatten the subscription fund of the Liberal party especially is not so scandalous as some may consider it. My point of view—and I suppose it is the point of view of the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton)—is that it has been very helpful in one way; it has shown the baseness of many things that were considered very respectable in England some years ago. It has shown what lordships amount to.

Reference has been made at various times to traffic in Senate seats. I well remember one day when Sir Wilfrid Laurier told me his propaganda fund was empty, but that before long perhaps two or three seats could be disposed of in the Senate, and therefore the flow might come again. Of course all those things are known. We might just as well make no bones about them, and not be hypocritical. I believe no reform can be accomplished by cant and hypocrisy. Let us put situations as they are. Human beings being what they are, you cannot cure all those things at once, but I think from time to time efforts could be made to prevent the evils from becoming too great. You have a certain piece of machinery. It gets dirty. You clean it, although you know it will be dirty again five years hence. But you do not say: the chief officer is busy elsewhere, or the chief mechanical engineer is busy; let us wait for a few years from now when there will be a general review of the whole management of the firm and we shall take up the question of the reorganization of the whole machine, therefore let this piece of machinery continue clogging. No; we might just as well cure evils as they come. Supposing the committee should accomplish no great object, I believe it would advance parliament; it would give satisfaction to public opinion if, the motion of the hon. member being accepted, the committee on privileges and elections modestly and effectively would deal with some of these matters and report to the house.

The right hon. gentleman is afraid of some extraordinary bill being introduced that might make the remedy worse than the evil. The right hon. gentleman will still be in power. I do not believe at the end of the session he will be less powerful or more timid than he has shown himself heretofore, and if there be in what is proposed by the committee anything which the right hon. gentleman in his capacity as Prime Minister and his responsibility as leader of the house thinks improper, it will be open to him to tell us that the proposals of the committee are inacceptable or impracticable. But I really think something could be done on those two things. First, is it possible to control to a certain extent the source of campaign funds? I shall not talk of shutting it out altogether. That is like prohibition. I do not want to draw a red herring across the trail, but we know what prohibition has shown itself to be in practice in all the provinces of Canada that have adopted and tried it, as well as in the United States, in Scandinavia and in Russia. I know, however, something can be and has been done to enhance the cause of temperance and diminish the evil of the liquor traffic. Likewise this country could and should do something in this matter.

I quite agree with the Prime Minister that there is some risk of the Beauharnois affair again cropping up and of party feeling existing in the committee. But party feeling will always exist in the house; party feeling will always exist in every committee of the house. The moment you touch on some question which is directly or indirectly connected with the election of members of parliament, willy-nilly party feeling will run amuck. Next year the question of redistribution will come up. Surely the right hon. gentleman is not so naive as to think that either his friends or the friends of the leader of the opposition will have no thought of party success when they come to the question of redistribution of seats. Therefore, if you connect this matter up with the redistribution of seats next year, you will have a double dose of party feeling; whereas, at the present time, the right hon. gentleman to my right being where he is, the right hon. gentleman opposite being where he is, his friends in Toronto being where they are, and the friends of the Liberal party in Quebec being where they are, I believe there is some chance, not of party feeling not arising in the committee, but of the politicians in that committee not showing their party spirit so much this year as next.

So far as that is concerned, I agree with the leader of the Liberal party that going down into the valley of humiliation is good for parties at times. It gives them strength. First, it purifies them. It did good to the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side to go into opposition once in a while. I have known times when the Conservative party at the height of power has not been exactly a model of public or private virtue. I have known occasions when it would have been rather difficult for the leaders of the Conservative party to pose —well, they could have posed as the Pharisee did, but they could not have made the speech of the Pharisee because the Pharisee was a pretty detestable individual, although nothing appears in the gospel that what he said was not true except that he was a little too proud. But I have known times when the Conservative party could not have boasted of their virtues or been proud of their vices. Therefore, going into the valley of humiliation at times is good for all parties and all public men. I really believe this session is the one at which we should deal with this aspect of the question. So I think the house should accept the resolution in the good spirit in which it has been presented by the hon. member for East Hamilton and for which on my part I thank him heartily.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, speaking personally I object strongly to this resolution, simply because the evil of which it complains, that of campaign funds, is one of the lesser evils in connection with our elections, and the proper administration of our elections act. I have run five elections in the island of Montreal and at each of those elections I put the most expert accountant I could obtain in charge of the examination of the vouchers and accounts of election expenses. People may not believe it, but I do not believe that one hundred dollars in the whole five elections was spent for any improper purpose even under the elections act, stringent as it is. But campaign funds are necessary. I defy any man to run an election in St. Lawrence-St. George, and give due attention to the election publicity, examine carefully the registration of the voters and look after the honest holding of the poll on election day, unless he spends about $25,000. At the last election, if my memory is correct, that was the amount, and I did not receive one dollar or one cent from any campaign fund. Now that is too heavy a charge to put on any candidate for election to this House of Commons. If I hire a hall and advertise a public meeting in the newspapers in a city such as Montreal, the meeting costs me from $500 to $750. If I hold ten meetings in the constituency, which is not undue publicity for my campaign in a city of that size, it costs me at least from $5,000 to $6,000 for public meetings. If I wish to examine the registration of the voters—for instance at the last election when I saw the lists coming in I found one hundred names listed at one place of residence that I knew in the city where one hundred people could not possibly be domiciled. It was the Salvation Army, and I found that every man who went in there day and night had his name taken down and put on the list of voters at that point. One of the most eminent institutions established in the city in order that young men coming in from outside districts might have a home and place of residence during the university year was filled up with at least one hundred names of alleged voters who were not constituents and not even residents. In one of my elections I know that my opponent spent from $100,000 to $125,000. But it does not worry me though they can spend twice that amount; for you cannot really buy voters in this day and generation. They will not stay bought. The man who attempts to buy voters at so much a vote is wasting his money.

In my election before the last one I had occasion to look into the matter of impersonations. Many men going down town in the morning were telephoning me at my office that someone had improperly voted in their names, and we found that there were one thousand impersonations, largely of business men and of women of the middle and what you might call the richer classes, polled against me before eleven or twelve o'clock in the morning. To have vigilant oversight of impersonations requires funds, whether they are called campaign funds or not, and unless you have vigilant oversight there is no possibility of being elected in any constituency in the island of Montreal, and certainly not in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George.

Another thing. When you run an election in St. Lawrence-St. George under the regime we have had in the city and under the regime we have had in the province, one has to guard his election against both civic and provincial police. On my election committee, not at the last election, I had some of the most eminent ladies of the city at work and some of the most honest, reliable and representative men whom I could select. We were met in the morning at the door of the central committee room by alleged constables and police who had blank warrants into which they could fill the names of those whom they found in my committee room, and who attempted to force their way into that committee room and arrest some of the most representative people of the city and take them to the police station so that they could not conduct the ordinary administration of the election act on my behalf. I myself stood at one of the doors and I told the constables of the city, "If you enter with those warrants which I know are false"—they were signed in blank by an alleged judge of the court of sessions—"I will shoot and take the responsibility." That is the way in which I saved my committee from arrest on that occasion. On one occasion I found that three hundred blank warrants had been issued on the day before the election for the arrest of honest men and women who were acting or proposed to act as agents in order that I as a candidate might have proper representation at the polls of that city. I could get no help from the city police. The city police were against me, under instructions, I believe. They were lending themselves to my political opponents to carry out false arrests.

Mr. St-PERE: From whom did they get those instructions?

Mr. CAHAN: I was speaking of the civic police. Certainly they were under instructions from the mayor or some other authority in that city; I do not know from whom.

Mr. St-PERE: Oh!

An hon. MEMBER: Was it Mr. Houde?

Mr. CAHAN: It was not in Mr. Houde's regime. Then what right has the government of the province of Quebec to send its provincial police into the city of Montreal in a federal election to stand around the polls of St. Lawrence-St. George for purposes of intimidation? Those are evils which to me are far greater than the evil of contributing to alleged campaign funds. Funds are necessary, as I have shown, in order that you may have proper and vigilant oversight of the registration and of the polling, and yet the elections act is so precise that I have to go outside my district in order to get polling agents. I cannot under the present state of things obtain sufficient volunteers to man the polls without paying for their day's service, and as the voters in my constituency would be deprived of their vote by accepting five dollars for the day's service of representing me at the polls, I have to go into other districts to secure men to represent me at the polls on election day.

Mr. St-PERE: A very bad move.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, it is pretty bad all over that city.

Mr. St-PERE: I cannot see why you cannot get some public-spirited men to act as your representatives.

Mr. CAHAN: You cannot get business men to give their time for a day.

Mr. St-PERE: Have they no civic spirit?

Mr. CAHAN: That sort of civic spirit does not exist, and if my hon. friend tells me the truth he will tell me that he or his committee has to pay the men who represent him at the polls in the various districts of that great constituency which he represents.

Mr. St-PERE: Maybe we are doing the same thing everybody else does. Let us be frank about it.

Mr. CAHAN: Why have all this hypocrisy? If we are to pay the services of representatives at the poll, why make that an infringement of the election act?

Mr. St-PERE: I stood with you last year.

Mr. CAHAN: I know you did, and I appreciated your support in the committee on elections. For once we stood shoulder to shoulder, but I think we had not sufficient weight to have our ideas carried into effect.

If there is to be a revision of the elections act this resolution is not sufficiently broad. It deals simply with campaign funds, and to "draft such amendments to the elections act as may be considered necessary" to avoid the use of campaign funds. The resolution is not sufficiently broad. Campaign funds and their contribution is one of the lesser evils in connection with elections. If there is to be a revision of that act it should be placed before a committee of the most competent members in order that there may be a thorough revision in respects other than those mentioned in this resolution. As I said to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken when we were fighting to secure some amendments to this act, "To me it does not matter very much." The condition of affairs is such, however, that the absolutely necessary expenditures by candidates in large cities is far beyond the financial resources of any young man, unless he has inherited great wealth. Elections should be open so that young men with distinguished records in the universities or elsewhere may have an opportunity to enter into political life and establish a parliamentary career. To do that campaign funds are necessary for legitimate expenses. Certain amendments could be made to the act to ensure straight and clean registration, fair voting, the prevention of impersonation, and provision to bring before the courts for condemnation officials of the highest possible standing, if need be, who for party purposes lend their high offices to the perpetration of fraudulent acts.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sure we all admire the frankness of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). May I state that he has given us the very best argument as to why this committee proceed at once with its work. It is evident that a great many changes must be made to the election act. The Secretary of State has said that the matter of campaign funds is one of the lesser evils. That may be so, but I submit that they are one of the evils, and to draw up legislation which will remedy such an evil is sufficient work for a committee at this session. In fact, I think the Secretary of State has answered very well the argument put forward by the Prime Minister. If we are to bulk redistribution and election funds and all these other evils into the work of one committee, at one session, it will be absolutely impossible to deal with them all efficiently and fully. Surely we might make a beginning this year by tackling the one question of election funds, which has so recently come before the general public, and upon which the public would like to feel some assurance that the evil will not persist in the future. The Secretary of State has informed us very frankly that in his judgment to carry on an election in his constituency requires at least a minimum of $25,000, and that upon one occasion his opponent spent $125,000. I ask: What chance has an ordinary labour man to obtain a seat in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George? To me that seems to be the best evidence of the iniquity of our present system. If $25,000 is the absolute minimum necessary to enable the electors of that constituency to select a man, in my view that $25,000 should be put up by the state so that everybody would start on an even level. I can imagine, however, that if certain amendments were put into the election act which would make it a crime to overcharge for a hall during the time of an election, and which would make it a crime for a newspaper to overcharge for space during an election, we might considerably cut down that $25,000. The Prime Minister suggested this evening that it was quite all right for a friend to make a donation of $100. He went farther and said that it would be all very well for another friend to give $1,000. The inference was that if a friend made a contribution in a personal way it was a proper gift, no matter what the amount might be. I think that the statement and inference are not correct.

We all know the influence of money. If a large amount of money is necessary to run an election, as the Secretary of State suggests, then surely the man with the money is the only man who can run successfully. The man with $125,000 is in a great deal better position to be successful than is the man with $25,000, even though the money may be spent in a perfectly legitimate way. I submit that under modern methods of manipulating mass psychology by means of big advertisements in the newspaper, big bill boards, radio and all that sort of thing that the man with $10,000, $25,000 or $100,000 is in an infinitely better position to run a successful election than a man with only $500 or $1,000. So in my judgment an amendment is necessary which will definitely limit the amount of campaign funds, no matter from what source those funds may come. As I said last year, I would go farther and not only limit the amount but if necessary provide a minimum from public funds. That would have to be safeguarded, but it has been done elsewhere and could be done in this country.

I am sure some of us sympathize greatly with the Secretary of State in his troubles with the police. I have sought to bring before this house some of the arbitrary measures adopted by the Toronto and Montreal police, but I do not think I could have ventured to take the strong stand taken by the Secretary of State, and advised my friends to stand off the police with arms. I am very glad he has come out frankly and told us that that was his position.

Mr. CAHAN: I was referring to constables who were acting under illegal warrants, and without legal authority.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In this connection I wish to call the attention of hon. members to an editorial which appeared in the last issue of the Weekly Witness of the city of Montreal. Attention was called to the outrageous conduct of the Montreal police in clearing Victoria square at a time when there was supposed to be a Communistic meeting at that place. People, whether they were Communists or not, were brutally attacked by men in plain clothes who used their fists and riding whips. It is not in keeping with the freedom of British subjects that that sort of thing should go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What has that to do with it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I mention this situation in passing because it arises from the statement of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). He gave his own experiences in connection with the police of the city of Montreal.

Mr. CASSELMAN: His life was threatened.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Citizens of Montreal who happened to be passing the square at that time also had their lives threatened.

An hon. MEMBER: We are talking of elections.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but this matter was introduced by the Secretary of State, and I am just adding another incident in connection with it.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to express the satisfaction of those of us in this corner at the attitude of the Prime Minister in stating that his government would raise no objection to the passing of this motion. I know he has advanced certain arguments in favour of delay. He has said that redistribution could not take place until the results of the census are known, and therefore there should be delay in dealing with this matter. Well, I am always afraid of delays of this kind. Two sessions ago we were told that we should not go on with unemployment legislation until the results of the census were known. Now, I feel quite confident that the statistics of unemployment have been tabulated by this time, and yet we have not available so far the data secured at the time of the last census with regard to unemployment. I can see no good reason why in this matter there should be delay for another year.

The Prime Minister also made reference to the fact that I had moved for the elimination of the clause forbidding the donation of campaign funds.

Mr. CHAPLIN: By corporations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did that, and most of the older members of the house will recall the circumstances. We in this corner had on several occasions tried to get the act so amended that it would permit the contribution to campaign funds by trade unions. The act was worded in such a way that it forbade such contributions. We felt trades unions had the right to make contributions to campaign funds if it was done openly, but it was impossible to get the amending bill passed. Consequently when the amended elections act was going through it occurred to me that by repealing the section we might secure the purpose we had in view. I would not have taken that course except for the fact that the act as it stood was ineffective; there were no penalty clauses, there were no teeth in the act, and so really nothing was lost by the repeal. I should be very glad indeed to see a new section added containing penalty clauses of such a character as to render the statute really effective.

I am sure the Prime Minister did not by his review of the situation intend to imply that because we had not yet prevented all corrupt election practices we should not now make an effort to prevent at least some of the most glaring evils; that we have failed in the past is, it seems to me, all the more reason why we should attempt something along this line in the future. We in this corner feel that it would be very desirable indeed that this motion should pass and that the matter should be referred to the committee this session. While this matter is fresh in the public mind I think it would be in the public interest that this should be done.

Motion agreed to.

ALBERTA-BRITISH COLUMBIA BOUNDARY

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, respecting the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on the first reading I gave an outline of the purpose of the bill and the circumstances under which its introduction became necessary. It is only necessary now to say that the commission which was appointed by the government of Alberta, the government of British Columbia and the government of Canada, from 1913 to 1924, continuously carried on a survey of the boundary between those provinces, and completed the Rocky mountain section of the boundary together with 252 miles of the 120th medidian survey to a point in latitude 57° 25′ 40″. There are 174 miles of the boundary yet to be surveyed and determined, but this is through an uninhabited and unproductive country, and the provincial governments interested desire that the boundary which has been so far surveyed should be determined, leaving to a future date the survey of that great waste district.

Under the terms of the British North America Act, 1871, it is competent for this parliament to pass an act confirming the interprovincial boundary survey after the two provinces interested have given their statutory approval of the boundary which has been ascertained. For this purpose the legislature of British Columbia has passed an act, chapter 8 of the statutes of British Columbia, 1931, and the legislature of Alberta has passed an act, chapter 6 of the statutes of Alberta, 1931. The British North America Act, 1871, provides in section 3 as follows:

> The parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province of the said dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any province affected thereby.

The boundary of the province of British Columbia was originally determined by the Imperial Act, 29 and 30 Victoria, chapter 67. That was a topographical boundary. The two provinces now desire the boundary as surveyed to be confirmed by the parliament of Canada, because monuments have been set up and a complete survey made over the area covered by the proposed bill, although there may be a little increase of territory here, or a slight diminution there. Therefore I move the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Geary in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did I understand my hon. friend to say there remain 170 miles to be surveyed in the north?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, 174 miles.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That would be between the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BOARDS OF TRADE ACT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Boards of Trade Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill amending the Boards of Trade Act has in view preventing persons or organizations from using the names "board of trade" or "chamber of commerce" in a district where there is a duly constituted board of trade or chamber of commerce, without giving the existing board of trade an opportunity to present reasons against the incorporation of the second organization in that district, if it is desired so to do.

The first request made to the department of the Secretary of State for this change came from the Toronto Board of Trade, which has been organized as such and has carried on as a board of trade since 1845. An organization advertising itself as the Bloor-Bathurst Board of Trade assumed the functions of a regular board of trade in the district in which the Toronto Board of Trade was operating. The Toronto Board of Trade objected to the operation of this organization on three grounds: First, that it had no authority for styling itself a board of trade; second, that it was not a representative institution, and third, that its existence created confusion in the public mind, and was misleading.

This request of the Toronto Board of Trade for an amendment to the statute was supported by the Ontario Associated Boards of Trade, by chambers of commerce throughout Canada, and also by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and came before the department of the Secretary of State for the first time more than a year ago. Finally the following resolution was adopted by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce at its last general convention:

> Resolved that: The Canadian Chamber of Commerce petition the Dominion government to amend the Boards of Trade Act, chapter 19, R.S.C., 1927, to provide that no person or persons shall use the name "Board of Trade" or "Chamber of Commerce" unless incorporated as such under the provisions of the Boards of Trade Act or of any special act of parliament; and that before granting an application for incorporation, the Secretary of State shall afford any existing boards or chambers in the district affected, an opportunity of showing cause why such incorporation should not be allowed, and providing a suitable penalty for the unauthorized use of such name.

It seemed to me that this request was reasonable, that before a second board of trade in the same district should be incorporated by any statute under the supervision of the Secretary of State, the minister should necessarily give the existing board of trade an opportunity to make representations as to whether a second board of trade or chamber of commerce should be incorporated. This bill has that purpose in view, so that if the bill is enacted, in cases where a district is already occupied by an incorporated board of trade, no part of that district could be occupied by any other board of trade which might apply for incorporation without an opportunity being afforded to the existing board to show cause why the proposed change should not be made.

The Boards of Trade Act also mentions the Dominion Board of Trade, which was incorporated in 1873 and which, for a number of years, functioned as a dominion board of trade. For many years, however, the Dominion Board of Trade has ceased to exist, and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which was incorporated in 1929, has been fulfilling the same functions. Various boards of trade throughout Canada have asked that the act be so amended that any board of trade may become affiliated with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce for the same purposes for which, in times past, they became affiliated with the Dominion Board of Trade, which is no longer in existence.

Another section of the act provides for certain returns to be filed with the Secretary of State, containing certain details. At the present time the act requires that this return shall be signed by the president and secretary, duly verified by their affidavits. That is a provision of the statute of very long standing, and it is sometimes difficult to have these details verified properly. I suggest that hereafter the signature of the secretary of the board of trade to these returns, without an affidavit, is quite sufficient to satisfy all public purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not rise particularly to object to the bill, except that it is just another case of corporations endeavouring to secure complete control of communities. If the city of Montreal or the city of Toronto desires to establish a second board of trade, why should not they have that privilege?

Mr. CAHAN: They may.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Under this bill they have not that privilege.

Mr. CAHAN: Should this bill pass, the existing board of trade would be afforded an opportunity to show cause against the proposed change and the certificate for the new board would be recorded only with the sanction and authority of the governor in council.

Mr. POWER: Do I understand that under the provisions of this bill the new board would have to ask for the sanction of parliament whereas under the old legislation it was sufficient to obtain a certificate from the governor in council?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that the house is not now in committe.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Geary in the chair.

On section 1—Use of names restricted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I notice that subsection 3 of this section provides for penalties. Why the necessity for penalties? Have abuses grown up under the provisions of the act governing boards of trade whereby unauthorized bodies are using the name?

Mr. CAHAN: I understand that in the city of Toronto the name "board of trade" has been used for the carrying on of transactions in foreign countries. For their own personal advantage, individuals have been implying that they are the board of trade of a district when in fact they have no authority so to do.

Mr. POWER: The bill reads:

> No person shall within any district in which there is a duly constituted board, use the words "Board of Trade," or "Chamber of Commerce."

In the city of Montreal there is a board of trade as well as a chamber of commerce, and I assume that under this bill the body which was first constituted would be the one entitled to use the term "Board of Trade", while the other body would be liable to a fine of $500.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think the hon. gentleman is correct. The chamber of commerce is constituted under a special act while the board of trade comes under this act. I do not think subsection 2 is properly drafted, and I shall ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to move an amendment to make the subsection read "under a general or special act of the parliament of Canada."

Mr. POWER: The point I am trying to make is that there are two boards in Montreal, one the chamber of commerce and the other the board of trade. One of them would be the junior body and under this bill would be precluded from using that name.

Mr. CAHAN: I think not. The subsection reads:

> —unless they are incorporated as a body corporate and politic under this act or under a special act of the parliament of Canada.

I intended to insert "under a general or special act of the parliament of Canada." I am advised that the chamber of commerce and the board of trade in Montreal both are constituted under dominion acts.

Mr. POWER: I was under the impression that the chamber of commerce was incorporated under a provincial act.

Mr. CAHAN: I am advised also that the chamber of commerce is one of the bodies which approve of this proposed legislation.

Mr. POWER: They might approve of it without knowing what it was all about. I do not object on their behalf; I was objecting to the way the bill is drafted.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman thinks there is any doubt I will move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. POWER: Oh, no.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister advise the committee as to how boards of trade in small villages will be affected? Most of these organizations are unincorporated.

Mr. CAHAN: If an organization in any village desires to assume the functions of a board of trade it should be incorporated under the Boards of Trade Act.

Mr. POWER: As I understand it, if there was such an organization as the Eastern Townships Board of Trade, the town of Stanstead could not incorporate its board of trade without first consulting the other body and then obtaining a certificate from the governor in council.

Mr. CAHAN: The Boards of Trade Act is administered by the Secretary of State, and if a second board of trade in a particular district desired to be incorporated and applied for incorporation, the officials of the department would notify the existing board which would be afforded an opportunity to show cause against recording the proposed certificate. After having shown cause, the certificate instead of being recorded at the option of the Secretary of State, as under the existing law, would be recorded only with the sanction and authority of the governor in council. Those are the provisions of section 6 of the act which are incorporated into section 2 of this bill. The bill provides that the words "board of trade" or "chamber of commerce" shall not be used by another body which has not had such a certificate recorded. Chambers of commerce throughout the country object to other chambers being organized in their respective districts.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is it not a fact that boards of trade in the small villages now will have to be incorporated under the act?

Mr. CAHAN: It has always been so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. CAHAN: That is true. At the present time any group of thirty individuals can form themselves into a board of trade.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They will now have to register or be liable to be fined.

Mr. CAHAN: Subsection (2) of section 1 says:

> No person shall within any district in which there is a duly constituted board, use the words "board of trade," or "chamber of commerce," as part of the name under which they are incorporated or doing business, or any other words so similar as to be liable to be confused therewith, unless they are incorporated as a body corporate and politic under this act or under a special act of the parliament of Canada.

That means that hereafter they cannot simply call themselves the board of trade. They must be incorporated under the Boards of Trade Act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In every small village where there are half a dozen business men who wish to set up a board of trade, they will now have to register.

Mr. CAHAN: Why should they not? There is no expense to it. It is purely a matter of form in sending in a certificate and becoming registered, after which they are under some supervision, very slight, and they have to make returns from time to time. This is to prevent people from using the name "Board of Trade" for Montreal or for some other town or village for purposes other than those for which boards of trade are constituted; for instance, using the name "Board of Trade" for the purpose of smuggling liquor or entering into other illegal practices.

Mr. RALSTON: With deference, I submit to the Secretary of State that the amendment suggested does not meet the evil that he is trying to remedy. What is suggested by the amendment is that provided there is what is called a duly constituted board within a district, then another body of persons cannot use the name without being incorporated.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the second section.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the section we are at now. Subsection 2 which it is proposed to add to section 3 of the Boards of Trade Act reads:

> No person shall—

It does not say: "shall use the words 'board of trade' or 'chamber of commerce' without being duly incorporated under this act," but shall use those words if there is some other duly constituted board within the district, which is quite a different thing.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend is not quoting the section. In section 1 of this bill, subsection 2 reads:

No person shall within any district in which there is a duly constituted board, use the words "Board of Trade" or "Chamber of Commerce" as part of the name under which they are incorporated or doing business or any other words so similar as to be liable to be confused therewith, unless they are incorporated—

And so forth. My first provision is that they must be incorporated.

Mr. RALSTON: No. That brings up the point, if my hon. friend will permit me: they must be incorporated before they can use the term, provided there is another duly constituted board within the district. The section does not say "shall not use the words 'board of trade' or 'chamber of commerce' if there is no other board there," so that the evil which the Secretary of State is endeavouring to eliminate is not quite met by this amendment. I can imagine a judicial district in which there is no board of trade at all, and a group of persons being formed for the purposes which my hon. friend suggests, who are not hit in any way by this amendment. That is my point.

Mr. CAHAN: As I have already informed the hon. member for West Edmonton, I have not gone so far as to say that no persons shall call themselves by the name of "Board of Trade" unless incorporated. I am going simply this far, that where there is an incorporated board of trade, no other body shall set itself up and call itself a board of trade unless it is incorporated; and second, that when an application is made for incorporation, it will be the duty of the Secretary of State or the officials of his department to notify the existing board of that application, allow them to show cause against the granting of the certificate, and then, if the certificate is granted, it can be granted only with the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. RALSTON: I am submitting to my hon. friend that there is a real evil in the practice here suggested of people using the term "board of trade" for improper purposes, but I am saying that evil has not been eliminated by providing that nobody at all shall use the term "board of trade" without being registered. I suggest that difficulty has not been met by this section.

That brings me to the second point. If my hon. friend is endeavouring, as I agree he is, to prevent competition, let us say between an incorporated board of trade and an unincorporated body, then I think my hon. friend, on looking at the drafting of the section, will agree that it ought to be changed. In the first place the use of the term "duly constituted board" does not mean anything under the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: Does not the Boards of Trade Act define it?

Mr. RALSTON: The act defines "board of trade" but does not define "board," and a duly constituted board I feel quite satisfied would be regarded as a body of people who had met together. I am thinking of my own constituency or province. In the town of Amherst or Truro or Lockeport or Wedgeport if a number of people gather together and form themselves into a board of trade, I think they are entitled to say that they are a duly constituted board. The Secretary of State will admit there is no law to prevent men from associating themselves in that way. Therefore I submit he ought to go further and say "duly constituted board of trade incorporated under this act," or perhaps "duly constituted board of trade" would be enough.

The second point is this: I suggest to my hon. friend that the word "district" ought to be done away with. As the matter stands now, "district" is defined as a judicial district. I think this section would mean that if there were a board of trade in a district, you could not have another board of trade in that district without its being incorporated. My hon. friend knows judicial districts cover a pretty large territory.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend has just stated that all boards of trade should be incorporated.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend wishes to accomplish that object, he has not gone that far, I did not say that all boards of trade should be incorporated. What has been said with regard to the smaller boards of trade ought to be considered by my hon. friend and they ought not to be asked to go through the formality of sending an application to Ottawa and receiving incorporation. The minister could insert a clause which would render punishable with a fine persons who are using the name for wrongful purposes. There are very few men who would know the provisions in regard to incorporation and it is imposing a little too much hardship on people to require them to go through this formality. I am thinking of a judicial district in which there are two, three or four towns, where if you had a board of trade in one town, there could be no board of trade in any other.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Geary): Did the hon. member look at the section with regard to interpretation?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. It means any judicial district or any town or village. The moment you use the word "district," if you have a board of trade in a judicial district, then you have that district preempted by that one board of trade. I think the Secretary of State will agree with me that the words "town or village" in the interpretation section do not mean very much.

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has put forward the views that I wish to express. I should like, however, to make certain that boards of trade which now exist in large numbers in parts of Quebec and which are not incorporated are not outlawed by any amendment to this act, because incorporation, unless there be some special provision in the act, is an expense which many of those small communities, especially in these days, can ill afford.

Mr. BENNETT: But the words "board of trade" should not be used except for a commercial purpose, as the hon. member has stated.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no desire to crowd this bill through, Mr. Chairman. It is nearly eleven o'clock, and there is no prospect of passing the bill through committee to-night. It will be necessary for me to refer to several other sections. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, in order that the objections which have been made may be further examined.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Mr. RHODES moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the select standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

PEACE RIVER OUTLET

On the orders of the day.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) advise the house if he will be prepared during the present session to table the report made last year by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways and the province of British Columbia regarding the Peace river outlet to the Pacific ocean.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the report is in my office and I will be very glad to table it at an early opportunity.

FARM RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a copy of the form of application for relief which the farmers in the west are required to make to the Saskatchewan Relief Commission before any relief is granted. Upon that form appears a blank note which every farmer is required to sign promising to pay for all relief which he may receive either immediately or at any future time, such payment to be made on November 1, 1933. Will the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) advise if it is the intention of the government to collect interest on these notes either before or after they are due?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the form to which the hon. gentleman refers. This was prepared by a relief commission appointed by the government of Saskatchewan and I was not aware that the note thereon was made payable to the federal government. I do not think it is but if I am mistaken this is the first intimation I have received to that effect. If the hon. gentleman will allow his question to remain on Hansard I shall endeavour to ascertain these facts and answer him as soon as possible.

AUSTRALIAN TREATY RATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) asked me a question regarding the differential rates to apply on canned salmon and crustaceans being imported into Australia. The general tariff on both is four pence per pound. The British preferential tariff on canned salmon is one penny per pound, and there is a preference on this commodity of three pence. The British preferential rate on crustaceans is two and one-half pence per pound, and the preference thereon is one and one-half pence per pound.

I might say that subsequent to the ratification of the treaty there was a general election held in Australia and this made difficult any discussion on this matter. There are a number of points still under consideration of which this is one. I want to make it clear that all the discussions with the government of Australia have been carried on most amicably. At the present moment I cannot give my hon. friend any information as to what the final result will be.

IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) advise the house, if he is in position so to do, as to the agenda of the Imperial economic conference. We would like to know when we may expect to have the agenda, either in part or in whole.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no agenda has as yet been prepared. The matter is under consideration but I cannot promise at what time the information sought may be available.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I say to my right hon. friend that we are most anxious to do all we can to expedite the work of the session and to cooperate with him in so far as it is possible in the work of the Imperial conference. If we could have the agenda at as early a date as possible it would I believe further both ends.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know that the agenda will be available at all before the conference meets. Such an agenda has never been brought down by any government in Great Britain except in a most general way. It is obvious that should this session conclude within a reasonable time, having regard to the business to be submitted, the agenda will not be completed before the close. We are constantly in communication with the governments in all parts of the empire and it is practically impossible to make more than the general statement that matters will be considered.

I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to express my appreciation of the sentiments which have been uttered by the right hon. gentleman. I can only hope that the attitude of mind which he has expressed will continue to the conclusion of the conference. Thus far any cooperation has consisted of speeches attacking the government in connection with the conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that is most uncalled for.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman is in a position to judge that; we know that it is so.

Mr. EULER: The right hon. gentleman is inviting it.

Mr. BENNETT: That has been the cooperation up to the present time, and that being so I am glad to have my right hon. friend's assurance that he will do what is possible to promote the success of the conference which we believe will be very important to this country as well as to other parts of the empire.

GRIEVANCES OF VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I understand the Dominion president and officers of each of the following ex-service men's associations quite recently made representations to the government in connection with certain grievances:

The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.
The Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League.
The Amputations' Association of the Great War.
Canadian Pensioners' Association of the Great War, and The Sir Arthur Pearson's Club of Blind Sailors and Soldiers.

May I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Pensions whether it is the intention of the government during the present session to appoint a special committee of this house to investigate the grievances contained in this memorandum and to bring down ameliorative legislation in connection therewith?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The intention of the government will be made known in connection with the matter when the appropriate action is taken.

Mr. McINTOSH: Not a very constructive answer.

Mr. BENNETT: The question does not demand it.

Mr. McINTOSH: There are two sides to that.

NORTH BATTLEFORD RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) had an order for return passed yesterday and while I have no objection to the order for return, I am informed by the Board of Railway Commissioners it will take three or four weeks of a clerk's time to copy all the correspondence. The return was brought into my office this morning and it is a very large one. The hon. member has had access to the file. While I understand he is insisting on the whole of it, I do not think unless there is very good reason, we should ask the board to pay a stenographer for two or three or four weeks to copy this return. If the hon. member would look it over and suggest certain portions that he would wish, I shall endeavour to have it brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I shall endeavour to meet the request of the Minister of Railways as far as possible.

BOARDS OF TRADE ACT

The house resumed from February 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 3, to amend the Boards of Trade Act—Mr. Cahan—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

On section 1—Use of names restricted.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): When the bill was before the committee last evening I undertook to make certain inquiries so that I might be in a better position to inform the house. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) wished to know whether the chamber of commerce of Montreal was a provincial or a federal incorporation. I told him I was advised it was a federal incorporation, but to-day I have ascertained definitely that it is organized and carries on its business under federal incorporation.

The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) also raised a question with regard to certain boards of trade in the west which are carrying on operations and suggested, as did the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), that this amendment should not interfere with their business and operations. I find, upon examination that the present Boards of Trade Act, chapter 19 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, contains, first, part I under which one class of boards of trade operate. Those incorporated under part I by a certificate issued by the Secretary of State or his officials may perform certain duties in connection with forming an arbitration board for commercial purposes. They have power to appoint boards of examiners as inspectors, weighers, examiners and so on. But in 1920 the late Hon. Senator Lougheed in the Senate introduced an amendment now appearing as part II of the act by virtue of which I am instructed by the officials of the State department, those boards of trade which exist in the west are not interfered with. Section 45 of the act provides:

> Any number of persons, not less than thirty, who are directly or indirectly interested in trade, commerce or the economic and social welfare of any district, whether residents of such a district or not, may associate themselves—

I am told that the boards of trade outside the cities of the west are formed under part II and incorporated by a certificate usually issued by the Department of the Secretary of State, and the legal advisers and officials of the State department assure me that those existing boards of trade are not interfered with by this bill. This legislation would mean that in certain districts where boards are already organized, any new board of trade that sought to organize and obtain incorporation could not do so until the others had been so informed and made their representations in that regard. I may say that the incorporation of boards of trade is a very simple operation and the uniform fee of only five dollars is exacted, so that these smaller boards of trade in the west, in view of the advantages which they obtain by being registered under this act, usually pay the sum of five dollars for that purpose, which fee is simply a nominal one. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth suggested that it might be an onerous fee that was being charged, but it is simply a registration fee.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) made a suggestion in regard to which I think it is expedient that we should have an amendment to make the text perfectly clear. The hon. member suggested that the words "duly constituted board" which appear in subsection 2 of section 1 of the bill, might not be sufficiently definite. The bill was drawn not by me but by the officials of the department and the law officers of this house. I am going to ask my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue to move to strike out the words "duly constituted board" and to substitute therefor "board of trade which is registered under the provisions of this act," which I think will meet the objection raised by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, and also in the same section, in order to obviate all possibility of doubt, to insert after the word "special" in the next to the last line, the words "or general" so that that line will read:

Under a special or general act of the parliament of Canada.

This is because it has been represented to me that certain boards of trade in times past have secured incorporation under the Companies Act, which is a general act and which permits of the incorporation of such companies.

Mr. RYCKMAN moved:

That the words "duly constituted board" in the second line of subsection (2) of section 1 of the bill be struck out and the words "board of trade which is registered under the provisions of this act" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Also:

That the words "or general" be inserted in the thirteenth line of the bill between the words "special" and "act."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: I am advised by my law officers that by these amendments we have obviated the objections which were raised last night.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Objections to other boards being formed where there are existing boards.

Mr. CAHAN: In order to conform with the suggestions made last evening the word "act" in the third line of this section should be struck out and the words "or general act of the parliament of Canada" be substituted in lieu thereof.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Patent Act.

He said: I did not have an opportunity to explain this bill on the first reading. A year ago, Mr. Speaker, in view of certain complaints which I received relating to the patent office from those holding Canadian patents and those applying for Canadian patents I hoped that we might have a thorough revision of the Patent Act prepared ready for this session, but I found amongst the lawyers and those interested in patents such great differences of opinion as to whether in consolidating and amending that act we should follow the British practice or the American practice, between which there are very material divergencies, that it has seemed to be impossible to secure the general assent of those interested to an entire revision of the Patent Act. The bill in its present form has been approved by the leading patent lawyers throughout Canada and by many others who are interested in the matter of patents. I also took the liberty of having the bill considered by the president of the Exchequer Court of Canada, who has had a very considerable experience in administering the Patent Act, and I understand that he approves the bill to this extent, that these are amendments which should receive the very serious consideration of parliament and of those interested in patents.

This bill proposes to confer jurisdiction upon the Exchequer Court of Canada when any conflict arises before such court to determine at the instance of any party to the proceedings whether the invention which each of them claims that he was the first to make is one for which any of them is entitled to obtain a patent under this act. The object is to avoid multiplicity of actions and to save the heavy costs which arise out of such multiplicity of actions as are now in vogue. It is a question of procedure largely, and this amendment enables the court to deal with all questions arising in the suit without relegating any part of the suit for a new action before the court.

Another provision of the bill is drafted with a similar object in view. It provides that where the claimant for a patent prefers two or more claims with respect to the same invention in one action or proceeding, the exchequer court, if it holds that one or more of such claims is valid and another or other claims are invalid, may give effect to the patent in respect of the claim or claims held by the court to be valid. At present the court has and exercises this jurisdiction in an action for infringement of the patent, but it is denied this jurisdiction if the action is one which seeks to impeach the validity of the patent. It is now proposed to extend the jurisdiction of the court and to abolish the existing distinction between the two forms of action, namely, an action for infringement of the patent and an action to impeach the validity of the patent.

The bill also provides that a patent or any claim in a patent may be declared invalid or void by the exchequer court at the instance of the Attorney General of Canada or of any interested person, and that if any person has a reasonable cause to believe that any article made or sold by him might be alleged to be an infringement of an existing patent he may bring an action in the exchequer court for a declaration that such process or article does not constitute an infringement. The fact is that in our patent office here at Ottawa we have not been able to provide the means whereby a claimant for a patent may ascertain by a search of our office whether any other patent exists in other countries for that same invention. The result has been that many patents have been granted in Canada on applications made by private parties which are alleged to cover processes which have been in use throughout Canada for many years, and with respect to which a patent should not have been granted and would not have been granted if all the means of information were available at the patent office. In such matters it seems advisable, as a matter of public interest, that in certain cases where the question arises as to whether or not an existing patent is valid it should be tested in the courts, and the private individual should not be bound to come forward and contest such a patent. Therefore it is suggested and, in fact, provided in this bill, that a patent or claim in a patent may be declared by the exchequer court to be invalid or void at the instance of the Attorney General of Canada, and also at the instance of any interested person. Then, further, if any person has any reasonable cause to believe that any article made, used or sold by him does not constitute an infringement of an existing patent, he will not be bound under the provisions of this bill, to wait for an action by the patentee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not true that under regulation 28 of the Patent Act the examiners of patents are prevented from doing anything but investigating as to whether the article in question has been previously patented, and does not that regulation nullify section 15 of the Patent Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Wait for the committee.

Mr. CAHAN: I shall discuss it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Order.

Mr. CAHAN: I admit that at the present time provision for proper search is not made by the statute, by the regulations thereunder, or by the equipment of the patent office. Therefore I now make provision for an amendment of the law which undoubtedly will be carried into effect by amending the regulations to be made under the Patent Act. This bill, as I say, provides that if any person in Canada has reasonable cause to believe that any article made, used or sold by him is not an infringement of an existing patent he may come before the exchequer court and, after due notice to all persons interested, obtain a declaration to that effect, rather than have his business suffer while waiting for an action by the holder of the alleged patent.

Then, there is another provision which I think will meet with the general approval of the house. Under the present state of the patent law of Canada any inventor domiciled in Canada or in a foreign country may not disclose his invention in such a manner as to have it become known or available to the public. And yet, nevertheless, he may subsequently take proceedings in the Exchequer Court of Canada, and that court may be obliged to set aside a patent which has been granted and used in Canada for many years without the Canadian patentee having knowledge or means of knowledge that any other person in any other part of the world had made a similar invention. This condition of the Canadian law enables an inventor at home or abroad deliberately to conceal and to refrain from exploiting his patent until some other person, probably many years after, has made the same invention, secured patent rights therefor and made use of his invention throughout Canada. This policy of the existing law, as defined by the recent decisions of the courts, appears to be in direct contradiction of the basic principles of patent legislation prevailing in any other country from which it has been possible to obtain exact information. Such a condition of the law works a grave injustice to those in Canada using certain inventions and processes which were patented in Canada before the inventor, foreign or domestic, disclosed the fact that he claimed an invention with respect to that subject matter.

Those are the amendments which I am proposing in this bill. As I suggested when the bill was introduced I think it should be referred to a select special committee in order that those who are interested in patents may be given an opportunity to appear, state their objections and make any relevant criticisms of the proposed changes. If the bill receives its second reading I shall be pleased to make a motion to that effect.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. CAHAN moved:

That Bill No. 4, intituled an act to amend the Patent Act, be referred to a special committee of seven members, consisting of Messrs. Anderson (High Park), Bury, Cahan, Chevrier, Ilsley, Irvine and MacDonald (Cape Breton), with power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY

BILL RESPECTING UNFAIR COMPETITION IN TRADE AND COMMERCE

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5 Respecting Unfair Competition in Trade and Commerce.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a motion for the second reading of Bill No. 5 entitled an Act Respecting Unfair Competition in Trade and Commerce and providing means for the enforcement of the convention to which I called attention the other day, and also means for the enforcement of the co-called Geneva convention which was laid upon the table at a recent date entitled, an international convention for the amelioration of the condition of the wounded and sick armies in the field and which prohibits the use of the Geneva cross for certain commercial purposes. This bill I believe has been very carefully prepared and has been reviewed by a number of lawyers thoroughly versed in the Trades Mark Act. I should like to have it referred to the same special committee to which the previous bill was sent. The only objection is that the bill is very technical and is expressed in English and the full French translation will not be available for at least a fortnight. I would ask therefore, with the consent of the house, that the bill receive its second reading and be referred to the special committee with the clear understanding that when it again comes before a committee of this house the bill, together with any amendments which have been suggested by the special committee, will be presented to this house in both the English and French languages.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN moved:

That Bill No. 5, intituled an act respecting unfair competition in trade and commerce, be referred to a special committee consisting of Messrs. Anderson (High Park), Bury, Cahan, Chevrier, Ilsley, Irvine and MacDonald (Cape Breton), with power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Mr. EULER: Are the provisions of the bill the result of some conference between various bodies; and if so, what were the matters discussed?

Mr. CAHAN: On introducing the bill I called attention to the fact that it is the result of a convention which was signed on Canada's behalf at the Hague on November 6, 1925, making very considerable amendments to an existing convention. By some inadvertence that convention was not laid upon the table of the house until this session. The omission was called to my attention by the fact that others were stating that we had not amended our law to enforce the convention. This bill is to carry out that purpose and also to enforce certain provisions of the Geneva convention to which I have just referred.

Mr. EULER: If the bill is the result of an international agreement, is there any particular purpose to be served in sending it to a committee; in other words, can they make any changes without violating the international agreement already arrived at?

Mr. CAHAN: It is obvious that we will not endeavour to make any changes which may conflict with the convention, but under it we are entitled to preserve certain common law rights. I recall the late hon. Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe, and I had some controversy in the house with regard to this point. He thought there were certain common law rights in the province of Quebec under the code which should be preserved. In addition to carrying into effect the provisions of this international convention, which I think the draft bill does very completely and very fully, we preserve certain common law rights that may have been enjoyed since before confederation.

Mr. EULER: Are the two very distinct in the bill?

Mr. CAHAN: They are dealt with on distinct grounds, and those common law rights are preserved. The object of the bill is to enforce the terms of the international convention while preserving, as we have the right to preserve, existing common law rights. Therefore I think the bill should go before the special committee that I have named.

Motion agreed to.

FISH INSPECTION ACT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6 to amend the Fish Inspection Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Speaker, the Fish Inspection Act, chapter 72 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, requires that barrels or other containers of such fish as come under the provisions of the act, be made in accordance with defined standards, that the fish be cured, graded and packed as prescribed in the regulations, and that the marks placed on the containers by the packer correctly represent the kind, grade and weight of the contents. Inspectors appointed under the act are not at present required to inspect and mark every barrel or container of fish packed within their respective districts. They are authorized, however, to inspect as many of such as they find it possible to do. This necessarily leaves much room for a great number of barrels of fish of poor quality to slip through to market without inspection. The purpose of this bill, is to make it obligatory for inspectors to inspect all fish and barrels which come under the provisions of the act, by prohibiting their sale or shipment until they have been inspected and officially marked.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the minister referring this bill to a special committee?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, we are very much interested in the explanation of the purpose of this bill which the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has given us. I have read very carefully the proposed amendments and also the clauses in the 1927 act. While of course I do not pretend to have any particular knowledge of legal phraseology, I can see very little difference between this bill and the old act. I may say that this is a hardy annual; the very same bill has been before the house several times. The minister last session, and his predecessor the previous session, saw there was nothing in the bill and they did not go on with it. Why the minister's officials asked him to bring down the bill this session I cannot understand, because if he will read the present act and compare it with the notes on the bill itself he will see that there is very little difference between the two.

The minister said the purpose of these amendments was to ensure that all fish should be inspected; he did not, however, tell the house how he was going to have the inspection done. I say to him without the slightest hesitation that the inspection he has in mind cannot be carried out. If his officials tell him that it can be done, then they do not know anything about the matter. It would require 300 inspectors in Nova Scotia alone to inspect herring, alewives, mackerel and other pickled fish. Under present conditions I think the minister is not going to appoint 300 officials for that purpose. What have the department done so far with regard to the inspection of pickled fish? Several years ago—and I am not taking the late government's part at all, because God knows, they made enough blunders so far as the Fisheries department was concerned—several years ago the late government did appoint special inspectors for pickled fish, but within the last two years every one of those inspectors has been discharged. Of course, neither the late minister nor his successor is to be blamed for it, but the department officials carried out the recommendations of the deputy minister in order to give increased salaries to the overseers. As I say, they dismissed all the pickled fish inspectors and appointed the overseers of fisheries inspectors of pickled fish. If the minister will consult those overseers in the province of Nova Scotia he will find that nine out of ten of them will tell him that they do not know the first thing about inspecting pickled fish. Yet the deputy minister has appointed men of this class to inspect pickled fish in the maritimes. Now, in the first place it is impossible for these overseers to inspect pickled fish. For instance, for the last three years I have had to inspect all the pickled fish that I have bought. The overseer of fisheries told me he did not know anything about the inspection of pickled fish, and there was no regular inspector anywhere near. As I say, I had to inspect the pickled fish myself —and the government did not pay me for it.

An hon. MEMBER: The inspector was not qualified to inspect anyway.

Mr. DUFF: The fishery overseers admit that they are not qualified, but the department, on the advice of the deputy minister, dismissed the few pickled fish inspectors who were doing their work satisfactorily and appointed the fishery overseers to attend to the inspection. But what does this bill say? Let me refer the minister to the section with regard to packages:

> Such containers shall not be used, sold, bought or shipped . . .

I ask the minister, is that good English? How can they be used until they are sold or bought? That should read: "Such containers shall not be sold or bought, used or shipped." I do not know who drafted the amendment but I submit that the minister would be wise if he did not proceed with the bill any further. Let him send it back to the proper officials to be correctly drafted. Further, the bill provides:

> Containers used for marketing such fish oils as may hereafter come under the provisions of this act shall be as defined in the regulations and be inspected and marked in accordance therewith.

Is it the policy of the department that fish oils shall have to be put into containers made specially for that purpose? I admit that he must take the advice of his officials but I submit that the officials are not competent to give him advice. The fishermen, in the maritime provinces particularly, use certain containers for cod oil. What are those containers? They are gasoline or kerosene oil casks or any other kind of casks used on their vessels for other purposes. How can they be expected to go to an inspector to have such casks marked particularly for the purpose stated in this bill? I submit again that the officials are not giving the minister good advice and consequently the bill should not be referred to the committee. I suggest that it remain on the order paper or else be deleted. The same applies with equal force to the inspection of fish. It is impossible, unless the government is going to appoint three or four hundred inspectors, to have fish inspected. Where will they be inspected? Are you going to inspect them where they are caught or where they are shipped or where the fishermen will sell them to the merchants? I really do think that the minister should give us a little more information before proceeding any further with this matter.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUFF: I would ask that the bill be allowed to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister, on the second reading, has the right to reply.

[Mr. Duff.]

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Before the minister replies may I ask whether this bill will be applicable to the province of Quebec? We have a peculiar situation in that province. With certain exceptions the fisheries are under the control of the province.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must direct the attention of the house to the fact that when the minister speaks on this occasion he will close the debate.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I join with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) in requesting that the bill be allowed to stand and that we do not now proceed with the second reading.

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): I shall not take up very much time. I have listened to what the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has had to say with reference to containers. I believe that this provision as drafted arose out of a legal situation which occurred some time ago. A man might make bad pickled-fish barrels and ship them to the packer, and under the act as formerly drafted he could not be convicted on any charge of turning out an inferior article unless it could be proved that he intended such barrels to be used for pickled fish. That is the difficulty with which we are faced. This section may not be perfect; I have not studied it; but it is one which I submit should be referred to the committee. The objection which has been raised is so purely technical and trivial that I am really amazed that my hon. friend should have brought it forward. With reference to fish oil I agree with what the hon. gentleman says. The fishermen all along the coast use any container they happen to have—the half end of a molasses puncheon or a barrel—and they allow the fish to stand in the sun until the oil is dried out of the cod liver. But this refers to marketing. It does not mean the sale of the fisherman's product to, let us say, Lunenburg Sea Products, Lunenburg; it has reference to the sale by such a concern of the article which they put on the market. The object is to have it sold in a stamped and marked container.

Mr. DUFF: They ship it in the containers they receive from the fishermen. My hon. friend does not know more about it than the minister.

Mr. ERNST: In this instance I happen to know more about the subject than my hon. friend does. My hon. friend has shipped a good deal of salt cod but he has never been in the fish oil business.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, I have; that shows how little you know.

Mr. ERNST: I cannot see one single objection in principle to this bill, and after all the second reading has to do with the principle of the measure. I repeat, there is not a single objection to it on principle. Why not send the bill to the committee and have them go into the subject thoroughly? There hon. gentlemen will have the fullest opportunity to state their views and to raise any objections which suggest themselves. Before the committee the matter could be dealt with more fully and to greater advantage than it can be in this debate.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend wants some work, evidently.

Mr. ERNST: I would not object.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I am without the advantage of having heard the previous portion of this debate, but had I been in charge of the bill it was my intention to have taken the ground that the bill was for the purpose of improving inspection and therefore quality and, it follows, the price of fish commodities. I think the object of the bill is sound. It may be that it will not accomplish the purpose for which it was designed, but we are all in agreement that it is highly desirable that we should have proper inspection with a view to securing the very finest quality, because, more and more, quality counts in all commodities, and in no instance does it count to a greater extent than in the case of fish products, which are highly perishable. I would therefore suggest that the proper place to discuss the details of the bill, and more particularly the technical details, as well as the object which is aimed at, is in the committee. The technical officers of the department would be available to give all information that might be desired with respect to what is contemplated. I submit that our best course would be to give the bill its second reading and have the discussion as to its merits take place in committee. That, I believe, would be agreeable even to hon. members who may not be in favour of the principle of the bill.

Mr. DUFF: May I point out that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) had the bill placed on the order paper last year and did not proceed with it. It was exactly the same bill.

Mr. RHODES: That is true. But we have had a year's experience and there are other phases of the subject which were not apparent at that time. I submit however that, even if my hon. friend does not agree with the principle of the bill, there can be no objection to having it pass the second reading, with the reservation that he does not endorse the principle. Let us have it sent to the committee on fisheries where it can be quite fully gone into.

Mr. DUFF: It is only a waste of time.

Mr. RHODES: If we are to waste any time at all I submit that it would be better to do so in the committee on fisheries. That would be preferable to detaining the whole house at this stage.

Mr. RALSTON: When the minister speaks of the committee I presume he refers to the standing committee.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspé): I should be glad if the minister would inform the house just how this bill will affect the province of Quebec. Apart from the Magdalen islands, the fisheries in Quebec are under the control of the province. We have our own inspectors there and I am anxious to know how they will be affected.

Mr. DURANLEAU: All sections of the act which were considered ultra vires in the light of the 1929 decision of the privy council giving jurisdiction to the provinces in the matter of civil rights were deleted from the legislation on this subject. As regards the principle of the amendments with reference to inspection which we are asking the house to adopt now, I cannot say that that principle will not interfere with inspection in Quebec. If inspection in the province of Quebec is carried on under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities this bill will not interfere with that jurisdiction. I thank my hon. friends from the maritimes for having come to my rescue on this occasion. I quite agree with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) when he states that I am not an expert on this matter—I am not a fisherman. I am told that this amendment has been requested by interested parties in the maritimes, even from those in my hon. friend's constituency.

Mr. DUFF: Who are they?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the names before me.

Mr. DUFF: I would like to have them.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They will be given to the committee. These different associations will appear before the committee to explain the whole situation. As has been stated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), no change is being made in the principle of the bill. The details and phraseology of the different sections will be placed before the committee and if they are not suitable they can be altered.

Mr. DUFF: The principle was accepted years ago; there is practically no change.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am informed there is a change. Up to the present time inspection was not made of every barrel or container and the result was that second class fish from the maritimes has appeared on the market with a harmful effect to the trade. Every one will be permitted to make their objections before the committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DURANLEAU moved that the bill be referred to the select standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would ask the minister not to hurry this matter along as some of us may desire to have representatives from our province appear before the committee.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will not do that.

Motion agreed to.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize the Minister of Public Works, on behalf of His Majesty, to enter into an agreement with the corporation of the city of Ottawa to extend the period of the existing agreement with the corporation for one year from 1st July, 1931.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (South Cape Breton) in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Leeds) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10 to amend the Fisheries Act.

Mr. NEILL: Explain.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is not much to be added to what was stated on the first reading. I intend to move that this bill be referred to the committee on marine and fisheries at which time full explanation can be given.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DURANLEAU moved that Bill No. 10 be referred to the select standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, while the object of the bill is stated as being to bring the legislation into line with the recent decisions of the privy council, it seems to me that there are a great many substantive amendments, many of which cover a serious change in the principle of the act. I desire to reserve my right to object to these amendments should they bring about a fundamental change in the law.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

REPORT ON MARITIME FISHERIES

Mr. DUFF:

What amount did or will the government of Canada pay to Messrs. Cockfield, Brown & Company, of Montreal, for investigating certain phases of the fishery question, including (1) remuneration and (2) expenses?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

Twelve thousand dollars to cover the investigation and report.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING RELIEF EXPENDITURE IN NEW WESTMINSTER, BURNABY AND RICHMOND

On the motion of Mr. Reid:

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it was agreed that the six resolutions standing in the name of the hon. member should stand until the return is made to the house by the Department of Labour in accordance with the act. Is that correct?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): When will that return be made? We are very anxious to obtain this information with regard to the general unemployment situation in British Columbia. If the return could be expedited, we would appreciate it very much.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As a matter of fact the statute provides that the return must be furnished to the house by March 15, but I may say an endeavour is being made to secure a large part of the information now sought for, so that it may be presented for the use of the members at as early a date as possible; that is particularly the projects and programs of unemployment relief and the orders in council authorizing the various projects and the expenditures of the sums that were applied to those particular projects. I fancy that is what the hon. gentlemen most desire. That information has been prepared and, I think, if it might be taken as a part of the report, we might present it before the report in its details would be presented.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is not in his place, but some of these motions for returns are for specific information regarding certain conditions and communications that have passed between the two governments. I was just afraid that in the papers that might come down to the house these specific questions would not be answered. I should be glad to have the assurance that these questions will be answered as they are asked. If I might explain to the Prime Minister, the city of New Westminster submitted a program of $200,000 which was cut to $100,000 and they were told it was on account of some Grits turning out there that the program was cut. The information was that the dominion did that.

Mr. BENNETT: It is of course recognized by the government as a fundamental principle that any assistance given to provincial governments must be given through the governments of the respective provinces; otherwise the dominion would be interfering in what is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the several provinces or municipalities. The arrangement was that the various projects should be determined between the municipalities and the provincial government and that the federal administration would give assistance to the various projects that were thus approved, the federal administration of course exercising its discretion in the granting of approval. I think the orders in council to which I refer and copies of which I shall endeavour—I cannot say positively—to have for Monday, will indicate the various projects that were from time to time approved, agreements being made between the province of British Columbia and the dominion, there being of course no agreement between the municipalities and the Dominion government, the municipalities and the federal government having no contact, the contact being of course through the provincial administration and not otherwise. The only exception to that is with regard to the direct relief given to the drought-stricken areas in Saskatchewan in which a relief commission was set up to which the federal government made a contribution of the funds necessary for the purpose of enabling it to carry on. I think I can say that that commission has functioned extremely well and that the men who have given their time and attention to it without reward have done a particularly good piece of public service; at least I am so informed by many people who have taken the trouble to examine it carefully, and my own observations and investigations lead me to support that view very strongly. The orders in council with respect to British Columbia, I shall endeavour, if it is at all possible, to have available for the house on Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and the indulgence of the house, may I submit to the right hon. gentleman that he has not answered the point raised by the hon. member from New Westminster, namely: will the return include the detailed inquiries made in these notices of motions for returns?

Mr. BENNETT: If they do not, supplementary questions can easily be asked. But there is a general standard first of all, the agreement between the federal and provincial authorities, the approval of the provincial authorities being antecedently given to the completion of this agreement, then an order in council by which the Dominion government assumes responsibility for a particular share of the expenditure. Of course we cannot deprive the provinces of their autonomous rights. All we can do as a dominion is to do as we have suggested and as we have done. If there are any questions not answered and they are proper questions, supplementary inquiries can be made and they will be answered.

Mr. REID: I am satisfied with that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Notices of motion Nos. 1 to 6 inclusive will stand on the understanding set forth.

BRITISH POTATO EMBARGO

Mr. B. F. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house it is expedient that the government of Canada take all possible means and continue to use every effort to have the embargo, presently existing in Great Britain, against the entry of Canadian potatoes, removed by the British Department of Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in submitting this resolution for the consideration of the house, I desire to make a few observations in reference to the situation that exists in the province of New Brunswick and, I might say, throughout the whole of Canada.

The embargo placed by Great Britain against the entry into that country of Canadian potatoes became effective in the year 1925 and has continued ever since. During the last few months the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce have made representations to the British government and the British Department of Agriculture for the removal of the embargo, but so far have been unsuccessful. The federal Department of Agriculture has sent a Dominion employee to Great Britain and he has conferred with the authorities there. The New Brunswick government sent its Minister of Agriculture as well; the government of Prince Edward Island sent its Deputy Minister of Agriculture, and they are now in Great Britain attempting to have the embargo removed.

This embargo was placed against us by reason, I understand, of what is known as the Colorado beetle, an insect which plays upon the vine of the potato while the potato is growing, but never follows the potato after it has matured and during the time it is being shipped. It is prevalent only during the months of June and July, the hot summer months. It is difficult, however, for us to understand why the British Department of Agriculture should take such a decided and firm stand with regard to this matter when at the same time they are importing potatoes from foreign countries which are infested with this insect the same as Canada is. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that this embargo on our potatoes is an injustice, and it is hard for us to understand why we should be discriminated against, especially when we are suffering so very much for a market for one of the most important products of the maritime provinces. It is the only product, you might say, upon which the farmers of New Brunswick might be able to realize money. When I tell this house that during the last four or five months, in fact ever since the crop of 1931 was harvested, the farmers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have been receiving an average of only eight cents a bushel for their potatoes, while it costs them forty cents a bushel to produce, the house will readily understand how vitally interested we are in this question and how important a matter it is to the farmers down by the sea. I could enlarge upon that statement and say that the same serious condition exists not only in New Brunswick but in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, in the province of Quebec and clear through to the Pacific coast. There is not a province in Canada to-day where the farmers are receiving more than one-quarter of the cost of production of potatoes. If this same condition were true of many other products, I am quite sure the matter would be deemed serious and important enough to engage the attention of this house in such a way that every possible means of remedying the situation would be taken.

I want to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) for their efforts, as well as the Prime Minister for the efforts he made about this embargo during his recent visit to England. Apparently every effort that could be made has been made. Nevertheless we feel that the unanimous voice of this House of Commons, as I believe it will be unanimous, reaching the ears of the mother country will have the effect at least of making it realize the seriousness of this question.

As I said a moment ago, it is really difficult to understand the situation. Let me give the house a few figures to show the quantities of potatoes that Great Britain has been importing from non-empire countries in the last six years. Here are the figures:

Non-Empire Potato Importations

	Barrels
1925	5,542,981
1926	3,418,375
1927	2,980,557
1928	5,135,030
1929	2,868,460
1930	3,091,200

The average for the six years is 4,935,466 barrels, or 7,271,000 hundredweight.

If we had that market in Great Britain open to us; if Great Britain were not importing from foreign countries and were willing to take our potatoes, in two months, I would say the surplus potatoes which we have in this country would be cleaned up.

Mr. MARCIL: Does Great Britain import any potatoes from the United States?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): No, for the very same reason that they are not taking our potatoes.

Mr. BROWN: From what countries does she import potatoes?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Great Britain has been taking her potatoes from the Irish Free State, the Channel Islands, Malta and Gozo. In 1925 she imported from Canada only 105,000 hundredweight, and none since. The other countries from which Great Britain has been importing potatoes are Esthonia, Norway, Poland, Germany, Netherlands, Belgium, France, Algeria, Spain, Canary Islands, Italy and other countries. If the embargo against our potatoes were raised, it would do a great deal towards alleviating the very distressed conditions in which we find ourselves in Canada so far as this important product is concerned.

I came to Ottawa in the month of October last and personally interviewed the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture. As I said before, they have been putting forth every effort to have the embargo removed, but for some reason the British government and the Department of Agriculture there have decided against raising the embargo. I am sure we all want to encourage inter-empire trade as much as we can at this particular time. It is a matter of importance not only to Canada but to Great Britain as well. We should like to see a last effort made to have the embargo removed in order to help relieve the distressed condition which exists to-day in the maritime provinces and other parts of Canada. In that connection let me remind the house that our potatoes from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island compete with those of Quebec and Ontario in the cities of those two provinces, because our potatoes go into those provinces. We make the price in New Brunswick to-day for potatoes in the markets of Montreal and Toronto and other cities in Quebec and Ontario. But if we were able to ship our potatoes to the old country, that competition would be at once removed from the two provinces I have mentioned, and the situation throughout the whole of Canada would be alleviated. I want to emphasize just as strongly as I can the necessity of doing everything possible along this line. Our farmers in New Brunswick will not be able to plant another crop. They find themselves confronted with bills for fertilizer for which they contracted last year. These bills they cannot possibly pay; for as I told the house a moment ago they are receiving only eight cents a bushel on the average for their potatoes, and they have never received more than that average price since the potatoes were placed on the market last fall. The price is so ridiculous that it is almost impossible for this house to comprehend it.

Mr. VALLANCE: What was the price in the British market during the time the farmers of New Brunswick were receiving eight cents a bushel?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): The price which has been obtained in the old country has ranged from $12 to $14 a ton, which would net our farmers a return of not less than five times what we have been receiving in New Brunswick.

Mr. MARCIL: How long has the embargo been in force against our potatoes?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Since 1925.

Mr. VALLANCE: Did I understand the member to say that these foreign countries exporting potatoes into Great Britain are subjected to the activities of the same beetle as you are in the province of New Brunswick?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have no bugs down there.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): In answer to that may I say that France, a large exporter of potatoes into the British market, is infested with the Colorado beetle. Hon. members may have noticed a press despatch wherein the statement was made that France claimed she had lost $90,000,000 because of the Colorado beetle. Peculiarly, France is the home of paris green, the very product we use to combat the beetle. For the information of hon. members may I say that so far as the farmers of New Brunswick are concerned, and those farmers in Canada who have been troubled by this insect, it has been learned that a cure may be effected by spraying. When we spray our potatoes in an effort to clear the plants from the early and late blights we simply use a certain amount of poison, either paris green or some other type, and a couple of applications will take care of the Colorado beetle. To the farmers of New Brunswick this is not a serious obstacle. My friends from that province and from the province of Prince Edward Island will readily realize that we do not consider the Colorado beetle a serious obstacle to the growth of our crop. Strange to say this particular beetle hibernates during the winter months; one of them could not be found to-day in New Brunswick or any other portion of Canada more quickly than it could be found along the streets of old London. In the winter time they go out of sight and we do not see them again until the month of June when the warm summer weather sets in. For these reasons it is difficult for us to understand why the embargo should still remain against our potatoes when we are in such sad need of a market.

I have submitted this resolution to the house and trust that it will receive the hearty approval of all hon. members. I am sure those hon. members coming from the maritime provinces, Quebec, Ontario and the west will heartily agree that to-day we are in a very serious condition, so far as this particular product is concerned.

I have sometimes thought that there is no portion of Canada whose loyalty has been more severely tested than that portion known as the maritime provinces. We are close beside the New England markets with their millions of people, and from time to time they have sent alluring offers to us which might have diverted our attention from the spirit of confederation. But the maritime provinces have stood nobly by the mother country, and we have always been pleased to refer to her as such. In this moment of dire distress we cannot quite appreciate the stand taken in reference to this important product, and our feelings have sometimes run along the lines of those divine biblical words, "Can a mother forget her sucking child?" I shall not say more because other hon. members undoubtedly would like to address themselves to the resolution.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): In rising, Mr. Speaker, to second the resolution now before the house I feel that I cannot add much to what has already been said by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Smith, Victoria-Carleton). I might however explain to a certain extent the condition in which the farmers of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick find themselves.

Prior to the last eight or nine years we did not have a very great potato problem in Prince Edward Island because until then we were known as mixed farmers and nobody had specialized in the growing of seed potatoes. Since the year 1921, however, we have profited from the services of a gentleman who was sent from the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa. Mr. Murphy—not a bad name—came to our part of the country as an expert on potatoes and proceeded to educate the farmers of Prince Edward Island in respect to the growing, selection of seed, and grading of certified seed potatoes. Since that time may I say that wonderful strides have been made in the growing and care of the crop throughout the growing season, the digging, marketing and grading of our certified seed potatoes. However while we were receiving those instructions and making advances in connection with our potato crop, other provinces and countries were doing likewise, so that at the present time we find there is keen competition from the provinces of New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec, and especially from the state of Maine. Farmers in those places are beginning to grow potatoes in quantities as large as they can, but I do not think they will ever reach us in quality.

This year there has been an immense crop of potatoes throughout the dominion. Reading a report only a short time ago published by the Bureau of Statistics I learned that the increase in this year's potato crop over that of last year amounted to 12,000,000 bushels. We had plenty of potatoes in Canada last year and there was no necessity to import any for our own consumption. Undoubtedly however small quantities came in on some occasions. But if one adds 12,000,000 bushels to a normal crop of potatoes he can readily see the position in which the farmers find themselves. The market for our certified seed potatoes has always been in the southern states, along the Atlantic seaboard, and for the information of hon. members may I say that the Potato Growers' Association of Prince Edward Island has upwards of half a million bushels of potatoes stored in warehouses at New York harbour. We have no guarantee whatever that these potatoes will find a market, because the state of Maine, which is able to ship her potatoes to the southern states without the addition of the duty to which we are subjected, has been able to compete successfully for our market. As a result they are shipping immense quantities. Another factor is that the farmers in the southern states are so badly in need of funds that they are not in a position to buy first class, certified seed for their next year's crop.

Our table stock market was usually in Cuba and the West Indies, but we have been practically shut out of the Cuban market because the tariff against our potatoes entering that country is almost prohibitive. We used to ship vast quantities of potatoes to the cities of Montreal, Quebec, Toronto and other central Canadian cities, but we cannot reach those cities this year because they have more potatoes than they can use. Since coming here for the session I have been told that the farmers of central Canada are selling their potatoes in the cities at prices away below the cost of production. Down in Prince Edward Island this is a very serious matter, especially for those farmers who have gone into the potato growing business on an extensive scale. They had to buy expensive machinery and their annual fertilizer bills are very heavy. I am sorry to say that a great many of last year's bills are not yet paid, and with potatoes selling at 8, 10 or 12 cents a bushel, hon. members will appreciate that those farmers are in a very bad way financially.

As has been pointed out by the mover of the resolution, England imports millions of barrels of potatoes every year. Under normal conditions when potato prices in Canada and the United States are satisfactory the English market is not very attractive to us by reason of the very long ocean transportation. But under present conditions when there is an actual shortage of potatoes in England with resultant very high prices, and when we have an immense surplus of potatoes and our prices are extremely low, we should like, for a time at least, to get into the British market. Hon. gentlemen from central and western Canada can have no conception whatever of just what it would mean to our farmers in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island if the British market were open to them for the next two months at a price of 30, 40 or 50 cents a bushel, which is a low price.

There is one peculiar thing about potatoes. If the price of wheat is low our western farmers can hold it over for another year, but, sir, our potatoes will have to be marketed in one way or another before the first day of June; if we do not find a market our only recourse is to cart them out to our fields. Our wheat farmers never have to sacrifice their crop in that way. That is why we are so extremely anxious for the next two or three months to get into the British market.

As has been explained by the mover of the resolution, the reason the British authorities assign for maintaining the embargo against Canadian potatoes is to guard against the introduction of the Colorado beetle into Great Britain. I notice that some hon. members from western Canada do not appear to be very well acquainted with this gentleman known as the Colorado beetle.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Potato bug.

Mr. MYERS: That is his ordinary name. The appearance of the potato bug in my province is a very interesting story. The first potato bug I ever saw was some twenty-five years ago. It was brought ashore one day from the lobster fishing grounds by a fisherman who found it floating seven or eight miles out at sea. It was such a curiosity that he kept it for several weeks in a bottle and showed it to people. That was the beginning of our trouble. After that when the farmers went to the shore for a load of seaweed, they would find hundreds of thousands of these bugs in the seaweed strewn along the shore. I do not know what brought the potato bug to our shores, but certainly he was a navigator.

Now, we cannot blame the English authorities for trying to keep clear of this pest, but apparently they misunderstand the real situation. I have been growing potatoes practically all my life. We dig our potatoes in the fall and store them in potato houses and potato cellars, and never in my experience have I seen a potato bug in any of those storage places. The Colorado beetle simply does not follow the potato crop. Even before we dig our potatoes those lads are very wise, for at the very first appearance of a white frost they burrow into the ground or conceal themselves in the grass and leaves along the fences, and we see nothing more of them until next summer when our crop is three or four inches above ground; then they come out of their hiding places. I repeat, I do not blame the people of Great Britain for trying to keep clear of such a pest. But to fear that potato bugs would be transported to England in sacks or barrels of potatoes is simply to fear something that will never happen. I am positive, sir, that there is not a man in this house who ever saw a potato bug in a barrel or a bag of potatoes. It simply does not happen. This has been very clearly pointed out by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and his officials who for the last six weeks have been endeavouring to get the embargo removed. But for some reason or another the British authorities appear to have decided to maintain the embargo. Let me explain to the house that we in our turn have an embargo against potatoes imported from England.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I had suspected as much.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have an embargo on many English commodities besides potatoes.

Mr. MYERS: We have an embargo against English potatoes, and rightly so. You could not get a farmer throughout the whole length and breadth of Canada to consent to its removal. The reason for the embargo is that British potatoes are infected with a disease known as potato canker—the very worst disease that can affect a potato crop. Our potatoes are free from that disease.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MYERS: We are practically clear of that disease, especially in eastern Canada; it is not known there, and we do not wish to run the risk of importing the disease. This is what would happen if we admitted potatoes from the old country: The United States would immediately put an embargo against our potatoes because they do not wish to run the risk of potato canker affecting their potatoes, and rightly so. But it is one thing to maintain an embargo for a cause that exists, it is entirely another thing to maintain an embargo for a cause that does not exist. My understanding of the case is that in those European countries from which England imports her potatoes the potato beetle does not exist; but they have the potato beetle in France, and I understand that no French potatoes are imported into England at the present time.

For the last six weeks efforts have been made by the Minister of Agriculture and his department to have the question brought to a head. Experts from the department are over in England at the present time trying to secure the removal of the embargo, and New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have sent delegates to London to support those departmental officials. The object of this resolution, sir, is to have the House of Commons go on record as requesting that the embargo be removed, or at least suspended for the time being. We from the maritimes have always backed up our hon. friends from western Canada in their efforts to secure better conditions in their section of the dominion, and as a special favour we now ask those hon. members on both sides of the house to support this resolution and so help to bring about the removal of the British embargo against our potatoes.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): It is with great pleasure that I rise to support the resolution of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Smith). It is not often that we agree, but on this point we are heartily in accord. The hon. member who spoke a moment ago (Mr. Myers) referred to the embargo placed by Canada on potatoes imported from the other side; I am not quite clear whether he said from the British Isles or from Europe as a whole. However, I think the embargo is directed against the British Isles. Now the reason for the Canadian embargo on potatoes imported from the British Isles is the disease known as blackwart. If that is one of the reasons why Great Britain is holding out against us in the request we have made to raise the embargo on Canadian potatoes is there not some way of meeting that objection? Could we not, by the issuance of a certificate from the board of health or other health authority, or from the Department of Agriculture of Great Britain, to the effect that potatoes exported from Great Britain to Canada are clear of this disease, meet the present situation? Could we not by that means meet the opposition that we now find in the British Isles to the importation of Canadian potatoes? I can understand why the embargo was placed, and rightly so, against the importation of potatoes from the British Isles; but having to look at both sides of the question, have we not perhaps taken rather an extreme view? The embargo was placed direct. If perhaps a regulation had been adopted whereby any potatoes from the British Isles could be imported into Canada if accompanied by a certificate showing that they were clear of the disease of blackwart, I do not think we should be up against the present situation, whereby we are prevented from exporting Canadian potatoes to the British Isles. I merely throw this out as a suggestion. I am wholeheartedly in favour of this resolution as it has been presented.

May I call the attention of the house to the fact that some seven or eight days ago I submitted a question with reference to this matter. It stands on the order paper to-day as question No. 2. I desired to ascertain, by the submission of that question, whether the Dominion government had been officially notified that the British government would not raise the embargo. I asked further in that question whether, if the British government had officially notified the Canadian government to that effect, this government would make it a subject of discussion at the forthcoming economic conference. Up to the present time that question has not been answered. There is nothing before the house now to show that the British government has officially refused to raise the embargo against Canadian potatoes.

An hon. MEMBER: They have.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps they have; that may be quite true. But if so why have we not an official notice to that effect? Why have not these questions of mine been answered? They have been on the order paper seven or eight days now. If the government felt that, as regards the third question, it was imprudent at the present time to express an opinion as to what their policy might be, I should be perfectly satisfied to have No. 3 stand. But surely we should have an answer to Nos. 1 and 2. If those questions were answered we should be in a better position to-day, knowing officially that the British government had refused to raise the embargo, to fight the battle which we should fight and are going to fight in our endeavour to have the embargo removed.

I understand that a large delegation from New Brunswick is coming to interview the government. They will be here, I am told, Sunday or Monday. That delegation will most likely have a great deal more data and more details to lay before the government than any of us can at this moment submit to the house. For that reason it is not my intention to discuss the matter at greater length. I merely express the hope that this resolution will be adopted by the house. If it is, it certainly will be a strong arm in support of the agitation which is going on to-day to raise the embargo against Canadian potatoes going into England.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I represent a constituency which produces a substantial quantity of high grade seed and table potatoes I take this opportunity to support this resolution. For ten years I have sat in this house and listened to a good many hard stories from our friends from the west. Except in an odd case I have never questioned the truth of some of the allegations that have been made by hon. gentlemen representing wheat growing constituencies. Now I should like to match with some of those stories something in regard to the condition at the present time of the potato farmers of New Brunswick. With three successive crops out of which they realized little or nothing in the shape of ready money, and with potatoes to-day, when they can be sold at all, selling at a carload rate of ten cents a bushel, which does not represent twenty-five per cent of the cost of production, you can imagine the plight of the potato farmers in New Brunswick. If therefore anything can be done by this government or by this house in the way of united action, such as this resolution affords, or by any other governmental action that might be taken, then I would implore the house and the members of the government to take that action; because I am afraid the potato farmer in New Brunswick is just in as bad a condition financially as any wheat farmer in the west, save possibly that man who has had no crop at all.

I am not going into the details of the embargo or the history of the potato bug, interesting as it may be, but I have always had the impression that the embargo against the importation of our potatoes into Great Britain is merely another form of protection, and very similar in its reason to the embargo which prevailed for so many years against our cattle going into the old country. I recall, as I am sure every hon. member recalls, the battle that had to be fought by Canada and Canadians to get that embargo removed. While this is not so important—and I grant you that—nevertheless at the moment it is of very great importance to the farmers of the maritime provinces who are engaged in the raising of potatoes. At this moment when other markets are more or less closed to them or more or less useless —because to-day, I may tell the house, the United States market, even if it were open, would not yield to the farmers of New Brunswick the cost of production, although it is lower there than it is in the neighbouring state of Maine—I congratulate the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) upon his support of this resolution. I thought he was a little bit peeved at the conclusion of his remarks by the fact that the resolution had been moved while his question was still on the order paper. I wonder what good it would do the farmers of New Brunswick to have their case considered at the next Imperial conference in July when immediate action is required. Under ordinary circumstances we never think of exporting potatoes to England, but there is a shortage in that country, the first for a number of years, and with other outlets being closed this is the first time in my recollection that it becomes important that this question be decided with the least possible delay.

Mr. VENIOT: This is not the first time England has had a shortage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said it was the first time in my recollection which is, of course, very limited. No doubt the hon. gentleman's information is much superior to mine and his recollection much better. At all events this is the first time in my recollection that there has been a market in Great Britain for our potatoes. Ordinarily that country is supplied by Ireland and the continent, but to-day that is not possible. The price is still low, but it would afford an outlet to our potato farmers; and I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and even the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to renew their efforts to have this embargo removed.

I realize that the question is not without difficulty. I believe that the underlying reason for the embargo is not so much a matter of protection as it is an effort to keep out the Colorado beetle. Potato men have discussed this matter with me, both before coming here and after, and they tell me that the movement of the beetle does not occur in the bag or the barrel. It is just possible that some system of inspection could be arranged whereby a certificate could be issued that the potatoes were free from the beetle.

I have much pleasure in supporting this resolution and I hope that such action will be taken as will bring about the removal of the embargo, but I would hate to have that action delayed until the next Imperial conference.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I desire to thank the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Smith) for having brought this matter before the house. As the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has just said, this is an important matter to the people of the maritimes. We have had a large crop of potatoes but there is no market available. The farmers have been compelled to sell potatoes at as low as ten cents per bushel, and everyone will realize the difficulties under which our farmers are operating.

As has been pointed out, a delegation from the maritime provinces, supplemented by a man from the Department of Agriculture, was sent to Great Britain in an endeavour to have this embargo removed. Our information up to the present time is that they have not been successful in their mission. It is very hard for the people of the maritimes and of Canada as a whole to understand why our friends in Great Britain have not seen their way clear to lift this embargo. It is too bad that something has not been done, even of a temporary character, because it would have relieved the situation. This relief must come quickly in order to be beneficial, because the distance being so great it is impossible to ship our potatoes to Great Britain in the summer time and have them arrive in good condition. No doubt the delegation has done everything possible, but I agree with the hon. member who moved the resolution that this house should take strong and definite action on this matter. I understand that the delegation is about to return, and if a cablegram could be sent, possibly this evening, to the ministry in Great Britain asking them to reconsider their stand, I think it would be money well spent.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury has stated that we were not in the habit of shipping potatoes to England. I cannot agree with that statement, because in the past when there has been a shortage in Great Britain and a surplus here, shipments have been made. Last year Great Britain was short some 360 tons and large quantities were brought in from other countries.

The suggestion that the potato beetle is the reason for the embargo can hardly be supported. I have received information from large potato dealers in Great Britain to the effect that they import every year large quantities of Spanish potatoes. Spain is one of the countries infested with the beetle, even more so than Canada. If potatoes can be imported from Spain there is no reason why our potatoes should not be allowed into the British market.

Early in the session of last year I put a question on the order paper asking that the Department of Agriculture take up with Great Britain the matter of this embargo. I have no doubt that all hon. members from the maritimes who were interested in this matter noticed that question. I felt that we were being shut out of every market and that the time had arrived when we had to find some other outlet for our products. As our good friends the Englishmen were not any too quick to respond to any request made, I thought it well to endeavour to get the government to take up this question at an early date. However, I did not make much progress with my question nor with the correspondence exchanged between myself and the department. I have before me a letter which I received last year from a firm in Liverpool, J. Johnson & Son, Limited. At that time they stated they were very anxious to import Canadian potatoes as there was a shortage and there would be a good market for our product. The letter reads as follows:

> We are pleased to have your letter of the 16th March, and we have already taken this matter up with the British government, and we are endeavouring to get them to allow us to import a certain quantity of potatoes during the next two months, as we think we will need them in this country if the price is reasonable, as our crops in this country are now getting cleared up, and it looks as if another month would see us depending on the German or Dutch suppliers, and we maintain if we are to import any potatoes at all, why not give the opportunity to Canada.

That is the attitude adopted by this firm. The letter continues:

As there is no embargo on the Spanish potatoes which are imported into this country and which are grown on land which is affected by the Colorado beetle, we suggest that you take this up with some responsible officers of your government that they put the argument forward to this side.

They then asked for quotations on Canadian potatoes. That letter was written to me last March while the house was in session. Upon its receipt I wrote to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) enclosing a copy. In his reply he pointed out that this matter had been brought to the attention of the British government at different times, and that Doctor Grisdale had gone to Great Britain in 1927 at which time he had used every effort to have the embargo lifted, but without success. The minister thought that possibly it might not be an opportune time to take this matter up again, but I cannot agree with that view. I feel that if we had started this agitation twelve months ago, Canada to-day would be in a great deal better position than she is regarding the question.

I have under my hand a number of letters from different firms who are all of the same opinion, namely, that we should press strongly from this side and that we should have asked the consumers in Great Britain to use their influence with the British Minister of Agriculture in an endeavour to have the embargo lifted. If we are going to get any relief this year, as I said in my opening remarks, we must act very quickly, definitely and strongly.

The excuse of the Colorado beetle can no longer be advanced by the British authorities because they are importing from other countries which are infested by that insect. I have in proof of that letters which I have read from large importers there. I am afraid there is another reason and I almost hesitate to advance it; but if I understand the matter correctly, it is this, that the embargo was placed against United States potatoes and that we were allowed to export our potatoes to the British market. Then the United States, seeing that we were given this privilege, and knowing that Canada had the Colorado beetle the same as they had, got busy with the Minister of Agriculture in Great Britain, and succeeded in persuading Great Britain to have the embargo apply to Canada as well as to the United States. I do not know whether there is any difficulty on that account, whether Great Britain feels it cannot lift that embargo and allow our potatoes in without giving the United States the same privilege, or whether there is some other reason, but I am strongly convinced that there is some stronger reason than the potato beetle and I should like to know whether the government can find out what that reason is. Apparently the United States were not satisfied with shutting us out of their own market by a prohibitive tariff, but they tried to use their influence with the British government in an endeavour to have this embargo placed. I think in all fairness now, when we are looking to closer relations within the empire, to bigger trade within the different dominions, Great Britain should be approached very strongly and definitely on this question and asked for immediate action. I wish to compliment the hon. member on bringing this matter before the house and I can assure him of my most hearty support.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): As a representative of western Canada I may be permitted to assure the house and our friends from the maritime provinces that we are heartily behind them on a matter such as this. I agreed with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) when he said that this situation was somewhat analogous to that in regard to our beef cattle. Our beef cattle were excluded from the British market for many years under the pretext that they were subject to a certain disease. We from the west knew that was not the case, but yet, in order that the British cattle raiser might be protected, our cattle were excluded from the British market. So in regard to the embargo on potatoes there is not the slightest doubt in my mind the Colorado beetle is only a pretext. I have been acquainted with the beetle since I was a boy. I suppose it is not less than at least sixty years since the Colorado beetle made its appearance in Ontario, and twenty or twenty-five years ago we had it in Manitoba, where we have it to-day. Any person who has the slightest acquaintance with the potato beetle knows it is simply absurd to say that there is any danger through shipping the mature crop to Great Britain. The habits of the beetle have already been well and accurately described. The beetle does not follow the mature potato at all; it simply feeds on the vine. Almost before the potato crop is harvested, the beetle goes down into the ground.

I think this parliament should assert itself very strongly upon that point so that the British people will not have the slightest pretext for excluding our potatoes on that ground. We wish to assure the members from the maritime provinces that we are heartily with them in this matter. We realize, as everyone does, that when they are compelled to sell potatoes at eight or ten cents a bushel, that is only a fraction of the cost of production.

Mr. A. E. THOMPSON (East Simcoe): I should like to say a word in favour of this resolution. This is a matter in which the whole of Canada is concerned. The maritimes may be more directly concerned, but it affects the welfare of the whole dominion. We grow a large quantity of potatoes in Ontario and if this export trade can be regained for the maritime provinces, it must follow that the producers of potatoes in Ontario will receive a better price for their product. I am particularly interested in this matter because I have in my riding of East Simcoe the farmer who won the first prize at the Royal Winter Fair at Toronto for the best sample of potatoes there from the whole of Canada. Notwithstanding, however, the splendid type of potatoes we are producing in the county of Simcoe, last week the farmers were loading on the trains not a bushel but a bag of potatoes weighing 90 pounds and they were receiving only sixteen cents per bag.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Might I also hasten to assure the members from the maritime provinces of the hearty co-operation that will be extended to them by the western members in regard to this resolution. But coming as I do from the British Isles, I feel quite confident, with the knowledge that those people have of agriculture, that they are not so much concerned with the activities of the Colorado beetle, and, as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) this is a mere excuse to keep out Canadian potatoes. Let us look a little further back. I was very much astounded to hear the statement made by the seconder of the resolution that because of the blackwart or canker as he called it he hoped the time would never come when British potatoes would be allowed to enter Canada. I should like to ask the mover or the seconder of the resolution just when it was that the embargo was placed on Canadian potatoes going into the British Isles. Was it subsequently to the embargo placed upon British potatoes coming into Canada? I believe that has more to do with the matter than the Colorado beetle. It may not sound nice to say this, but it may be a retaliation. If it is, after listening to the statements made by the seconder of the motion, all I have to say is that you cannot expect much better treatment from the British people regarding the importation of Canadian potatoes into Great Britain if the attitude is adopted which has been taken by the hon. member. I have no doubt he was quite frank and he means what he said.

I agree with the hon. member for Lisgar that the Colorado beetle is not the reason why Canadian potatoes are not permitted to enter the British Isles. I rise, however, merely to associate myself, as one coming from Saskatchewan, with the hon. member for Lisgar in saying that we are prepared to give them, and, indeed, the government, our hearty co-operation in making it easier and, in fact, possible not only for the maritime provinces, but for all the provinces in Canada, to deliver not only their potatoes, but anything into the British markets.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski): As we have heard from western Canada as well as the maritime provinces, and as conditions that apply in the lower St. Lawrence valley and in Rimouski are similar to those that apply in New Brunswick and Saskatchewan, as one coming from the lower part of the province of Quebec, I desire to associate myself with those who have spoken in support of this resolution and to thank the mover for bringing this matter before the house. In the county of Rimouski our main crop is potatoes. We have tried to follow the example of New Brunswick of raising only the best kinds of potatoes, and great strides have been made within the last few years in the quality of the crop that we have been able to raise. I am also not unmindful of the kindly help that the members from the maritime provinces gave to the representatives from the province of Quebec when a deputation from that province waited upon the Board of Railway Commissioners with a view to securing a reduction in the freight rate on potatoes in order that we might obtain a market in western Canada. We succeeded at that time in obtaining a special rate for the transportation of potatoes. A special zone was created from a point east of Riviere du Loup embracing the whole of the lower St. Lawrence as well as the whole of New Brunswick and the maritime provinces, and it was due to the help that we received from the members from the maritime provinces that we succeeded in obtaining a freight rate which has been of great benefit to our population. Therefore in the name of the province of Quebec and on behalf of my constituents I am delighted to associate myself with the mover and the seconder of the resolution and to give it my hearty support.

Mr. G. M. McDADE (Northumberland): I wish to thank the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugène Fiset) for his kind words, and to express also my appreciation of the remarks of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). It is a pleasure on this important question that is now before the house to be associated in support of the resolution also with my good friend the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot).

This is not in any sense a political question, Mr. Speaker. It is a matter far above politics. An embargo was placed against our potatoes by the British government through its Department of Agriculture in 1925. In answer to my hon. friend from South Battleford my understanding is that the embargo against British potatoes existed prior to that date. At the present time there is in the province of New Brunswick a surplus of 100,000 tons of potatoes, while I am advised that in the old country there is a shortage of some 400,000 tons.

I also wish to take advantage of the opportunity now afforded me of acknowledging publicly my appreciation of the efforts of my colleague the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Smith), for his activity in connection with this important matter. He has been active in it for several months, almost since the prorogation of parliament. He has taken up the matter in the old country through Canadian influences there, and likewise has brought it up at Ottawa, urging on my good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) the distress that obtains and the need for every effort being made to remove the embargo. As the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) has said, we have on the north shore a large potato-growing section, particularly in the counties of Restigouche and Gloucester, and to a smaller extent in the county of Northumberland in the parish of Rogersville. I have the greatest pleasure in supporting this step and I thank hon. gentlemen from other parts of Canada for expressing their approval of this resolution.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to assure hon. gentlemen that we have not been lacking in a full appreciation of the importance of making every possible effort to secure the removal of the British embargo on our potatoes.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry that I cannot hear the hon. gentleman because of the noise that is being made by the Clerk, who speaks so loudly.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I turn first to the suggestion of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), that by obtaining a certificate that our potatoes were free from disease it might be possible to make some reciprocal agreement with the British authorities under which our embargo against their potatoes would be removed if they would remove their embargo against Canadian potatoes. I am advised by the officers of my department that even if potatoes are free from the disease of blackwart, the disease can still be carried by soil or other material attached to or conveyed with the potato. It is a virile germ and can live in the ground under severe conditions for at least twenty-five years. The officers of the department are of the opinion, therefore, that on account of the disease of blackwart we could not afford to remove the embargo against British potatoes. I also understood that Great Britain does not import potatoes from any country in which the Colorado beetle infests the soil to any extent whatever.

Now for a short review of the steps that have been taken previous to my taking this portfolio and since. The officers of the department have made very close observations over a period of years to determine whether potatoes shipped in barrels and other containers carried the beetle. There has been no evidence of that up to the present time. One of the arguments made by our Dominion entomologist in presenting his case before the British ministry was this: These Colorado beetles hibernate for quite a while before the potatoes are harvested, and our officers have found no evidence of the presence of the Colorado beetle after the potatoes have been handled and shipped. That argument was advanced very strongly by our Dominion entomologist in presenting his case to the British ministry. And we went further. Even granting that there might be a slight possibility of some of these beetles being transported with the potatoes, we carried out spraying experiments upon potatoes with which the Colorado beetle had come in contact, and so that there would be no objection from the authorities on the other side that there was a danger from the use of this chemical spray, the potatoes themselves were carefully tested after spraying and it was found that the spray could be used with perfect safety. In addition to that, other experiments were made; taking large quantities of potatoes and making sure that the Colorado beetles were in contact with them, the potatoes were passed over the grading machine and the beetles became separated and dropped through the grids. So that there was no danger in that respect, even if there were beetles with the potatoes when they left the farm. We felt that as far as the danger from the Colorado beetle was concerned, our case was fully proved, but the British authorities felt there is still a slight danger—very slight, they admit, but nevertheless a danger that the beetles might be carried into the old country if they imported our potatoes.

Our entomologists are not all of one mind regarding the danger from the Colorado beetle. One of our best entomologists would not make a definite statement that there is absolutely no danger of infestation by the Colorado beetle in the shipment of potatoes. He said he felt there was very slight danger of it, but he would not go so far as to say there was absolutely no danger.

We are still in touch with the British ministry, and I do not know that we have left out any arguments. Up to the present time we have had no full report as to the reason why the British ministry has refused the importation of our potatoes, but we have had a cablegram from the High Commissioner to the effect that they still feel there is a reason. I am anxiously awaiting the return of the dominion entomologist who sails to-morrow so that I may learn if there are any further steps we can take, and whether they feel that the danger of infestation is still a good reason for keeping on the embargo.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: As I explained, some of the opposition members desired to be present when bills were read the second time, and they have stood. We expect to submit the estimates on Monday, and are prepared to go forward with private members' day on Monday, and take up the business of the house after that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Earlier in the day I mentioned the opposition would like to expedite the business of the house and to cooperate to as great a degree as possible. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister replied in, what seemed to me, to use a very mild expression, a very petulant manner, to the effect that most of the cooperation up to the present time had been in the nature of talk.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. BENNETT: That was in connection with the Imperial conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my right hon. friend realizes that the reason for the early adjournment to-day is that there is nothing left to talk about even by the Prime Minister himself. If we adjourn at this hour it is because we have no further business to go on with.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish to express my displeasure at the government's lack of readiness, having come a matter of 3,000 miles to attend this parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Those who are acquainted with my hon. friend's record know that he usually runs.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.40 p.m.

Monday, February 15, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

REQUEST BY SENATE FOR EVIDENCE ADDUCED BEFORE COMMONS SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication from the Clerk of the Senate:

Resolved, that a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that house to grant leave to their Clerk to appear and produce before a special committee of the Senate a copy of the evidence adduced before a special committee of the Commons appointed during the second session of the present parliament, to investigate the Beauharnois power project.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I move that the request contained in the message that has just been received from the Senate be granted, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

MAIN ESTIMATES FOR 1932-33

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the year ending March 31, 1933, was presented by Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

VALIDATION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13 relating to the submission to parliament of certain regulations and orders in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. MURPHY: The Dominion Lands Act of 1906 contained provision for the tabling of orders in council. When the act was revised in 1908 provision was included that these orders in council tabled should be approved by resolution by both houses. The Forest Reserves and Parks Act, which was passed in 1911, contained similar provision. Orders in council under these acts are valid only for one day after the session closes unless they have previously been approved by each house of parliament. For several years the orders in council, although tabled, were not confirmed by resolution, and in 1928 action was taken by special act of parliament, chap. 44, Geo. V. 18-19, assented to 11th June, 1928, validating the orders in council passed up to that time. The present bill is to validate the orders in council passed between the 7th December, 1929, and the 31st January, 1931, which have been tabled in both houses.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14 to amend the Civil Service Act (Vacancies, outside service).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the bill which I am, to-day, introducing is a reprint of bill No. 132 which I had the privilege of introducing on July 20, last. I do not deem it necessary to repeat what I then stated and which will be found in last session's Hansard, Volume IV, page 3926, English version, and at page 3884, French version.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

41761—12½

*BRITISH POTATO EMBARGO

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Has the government received any official notice to the effect that the British government has refused to raise the embargo on Canadian potatoes?

2. If so, will the report be presented to the house?

3. If the British government refuse to raise the embargo on Canadian potatoes, will the Canadian government have the matter further dealt with during the meeting of the Imperial Economic Conference which is to sit at Ottawa in July next?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. The question is so framed that it might imply giving a meaning to the words "official notice." I can only say that the government has received a cable from the High Commissioner stating that the British government had decided not to lift the embargo, and that might be considered as an official notice. It is the only notice that might be designated as official that has been received.

2. There is no report, in the sense in which that word is used, in the possession of the government at the present time. When the entomologist returns, we may be able to give more complete technical information than is now available.

3. I may say that the matter necessarily is under consideration. There has been nothing in the cables to indicate that representations on behalf of the Canadian position have ceased, and in view of what took place in the house a few days ago, it will be our duty, I believe, to forward the resolution of this house through the proper channel to the British authorities.

VANCOUVER ISLAND NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. NEILL:

1. Has the government received the report of chief engineer, Mr. J. M. Wardle, of his inspection in the summer of 1930, of proposed sites for national parks on Vancouver island, British Columbia?

2. Will the minister lay it on the table?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. A preliminary partial inspection of certain areas was made by the chief engineer of the Parks branch, Mr. J. M. Wardle, in the summer of 1930 merely for the purpose of advising the minister and to enable him to discuss the subject with the government.

2. No.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Has any financial assistance been rendered by government funds to the Canadian Pacific Railway during the last six months?
2. If so, for what purpose and amounts?

Mr. RHODES:

1. None, apart from payments due in the ordinary course of business for services rendered, e.g., the carrying of mails and steamship subsidies as voted under the Department of Trade and Commerce, with the exception of $172,710 being amount paid under the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, for interest on expenditures undertaken as relief measures in advance of corporate requirements, under agreement authorized by P.C. 2292 of September 30, 1930.
2. Answered by No. 1.

ALFRED PEAT PLANT

Mr. BERTRAND:

1. Is the Dominion government still the owner of the peat fields and the machinery connected therewith, in the township of Alfred, Ontario?
2. If so, does the government intend to work these peat fields in the near future?
3. If the government is not the owner: (a) to whom were these peat fields and machinery transferred or sold; (b) What was the sale price, or on what conditions were they transferred?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Under agreement approved by order in council of July 21, 1931, (P.C. 1662) provision was made for the transfer of the Alfred peat plant to Peat Fuels, Limited, Montreal. Possession was taken by Peat Fuels, Limited on July 26, 1931.
2. No.
3. (a) Answered by No. 1. (b) $8,000.

PERLEY BRIDGE

Mr. BERTRAND:

1. On what date was the work on the Farley & Grant contract, in connection with the Perley bridge, finished?
2. What was the total amount paid to Farley & Grant on said contract?
3. Have the contractors been paid in full?
4. If so, on what date was the last payment made?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. November 6, 1931.
2. $191,059.26.
3. Yes.
4. December 30, 1931.

[Mr. Murphy.]

LAKE ST. JOHN SETTLERS

Mr. DUGUAY:

1. Does the Dominion government contribute in the help given to the settlers of the county of Lake St. John, if so, in what proportion?
2. Must the contribution be made in money or script?
3. Do the settlers receive this money for work done on their land?
4. Is the amount of money received by them deducted from the $60 bonus which was promised to them?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Under the agreement with the province of Quebec, under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, it is provided that the Dominion government shall pay to the province 50 per cent of the expenditures made by the province for direct relief in provincial territory where no municipalities are established and where suitable work cannot be provided for the unemployed.

2. The regulations governing the administration of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, provide that "direct relief" means food, clothing, fuel and shelter, or payment in lieu thereof, but makes no reference as to whether payments shall be made in money or script.

3. In addition to the provisions for direct relief as mentioned in answer to question No. 1 above, the Dominion government has agreed to contribute to works undertaken by the Department of Colonization of the province in the county of Lake St. John to the extent of $12,600 to which the Dominion government contributes $6,300. This work consists of ditching, grubbing, draining land, blasting, cutting and preparing lumber, building bridges. For the work referred to the regulations prescribe that the federal government requires that a maximum work day of eight hours shall prevail and that the provincial or municipal authorities may fix rates of wages to be paid provided that such rates be fair and reasonable.

4. The agreement between the province and the Dominion makes no references to any bonus to be paid to the settlers.

* CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—STATISTICS

Mr. BLAIR:

1. How many employees have been dismissed from the Canadian National Railways during the past year?
2. How many employees have had their hours or wages lessened during the last year?
3. How many branches of the Canadian National Railways have been cut off during the last year?

4. What are the branches of the Canadian National Railways that have been cut off during the last year?

5. What provisions have been made for those men that have been thrown out of employment when they were dismissed from the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. BENNETT: I think I am within the judgment of the house when I say that this is a question which cannot and should not be answered. The usual formula in cases of this kind reads somewhat as follows: The management of Canadian National Railways feel that it is not in the interest of the railway, nor in the general public interest, that information of this kind should be brought down. It is objectionable, also, in that it subjects the Canadian National management to inquiry which is not directed to the operation of privately-owned railways. In addition, it is information more properly subject to production before the select standing committee on railways and shipping, where the officers of the railway may make what representations they may deem necessary in the production of information as to operations. There is the further objection that, at the present time, a royal commission is investigating the entire problem of transportation in Canada.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. VENIOT:

If any correspondence has taken place between the government of New Brunswick and the federal government with relation to aid for technical education, will copy of same be produced?

Mr. GORDON: It would seem that this is not a specific question, but if the hon. gentleman will make it specific and is willing to allow the question to stand until to-morrow we shall be glad to give the information.

CLERK OF THE HOUSE

Mr. POULIOT:

1. When and on whose recommendation did Mr. Arthur Beauchesne become a civil servant and in what capacity?
2. When and on whose recommendation was he appointed Assistant Clerk of the House of Commons?
3. When, on whose recommendation and on the approval of whom was he appointed Clerk of the House of Commons?
4. What was then his salary?
5. Since then, did he get an increase in salary?
6. If so, when, on whose recommendation and why did he get it and what was the amount of such increase in salary?
7. Since Mr. Beauchesne has been appointed Clerk of the House, did he receive any sum of money besides his salary as Clerk of the House of Commons?
8. If so, what was the amount of any such item and why and when and on whose authority was each one of said items paid to him?
9. Who was Speaker of the House of Commons when the said Mr. Beauchesne was appointed Clerk of the House, when his salary was increased, if such is the case, and when other payments, if any, were made to him?

Mr. SPEAKER: As to questions numbered 23 to 41, both inclusive, with the exception of question No. 35, they were not submitted to me before being placed on the order paper. Had they been so submitted they would not have been put on the order paper. In my opinion they are improperly on the order paper and I direct that they be struck off. I have instructed the Clerk to furnish the hon. member who asks the questions with the information sought, and it is available to him. Information will always be furnished to any member concerning the conduct of the affairs of the house should it be desired. My authority for so ruling regarding such questions is May, who in his Parliamentary Practice at page 240 says:

> No written or public notice of questions addressed to the Speaker is permissible.

These questions relate exclusively to matters within the department of the Speaker.

Further authority for my ruling will be found in Campion's Procedure of the House of Commons, pages 128 and 129, from which I quote:

> A question should be directed to a minister officially responsible for the subject matter with which it deals. Without detracting from the generality of this rule, the following types of question are out of order on this ground, viz:—
> . . . . questions dealing with matters within the jurisdiction of the Speaker.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING RELIEF EXPENDITURE IN NEW WESTMINSTER, BURNABY AND RICHMOND

On the motion of Mr. Reid:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence, and other documents, passing between the Department of Labour, any cabinet minister or any official and the Government of British Columbia, and any minister or official of that government, regarding all or any matters affecting or touching upon unemployment, direct relief or unemployment relief in the city of New Westminster and the municipalities of New Westminster, of Burnaby and Richmond.

Mr. GORDON: With reference to this motion and the following motions in the hon. gentleman's name up to and including No. 6, while as I have already stated the statute does not contemplate this information being ready until fifteen days after the act becomes operative, yet in order to get the information into the hands of the hon. member earlier I have had the officials of the Labour department prepare a copy of the agreement with British Columbia, together with the orders in council passed having to do with the agreement, and I shall be very glad to table this part of the information. If there is any other information the hon. member desires with which we can supply him at an earlier date, if he will be good enough to let me know, I shall be glad to have that information tabled. In the meantime I presume the hon. member will agree to drop the notices from the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that motions Nos. 1 to 6 are to be dropped?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. REID: Yes, Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that the information will be accorded to me.

Mr. GORDON: The information will be accorded just as soon as we can prepare it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Notices of motion numbered 1 to 6 inclusive dropped.

SASKATCHEWAN ASSOCIATION OF RURAL MUNICIPALITIES

On the motion of Mr. Vallance:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence, petitions (not including signatures), memoranda and other documents passing between the secretary of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities and the Dominion government or any department or cabinet minister thereof since August 1, 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: The resolution as prepared does not indicate the business to which the petitions or correspondence refer, but if, as I take it, the hon. gentleman refers to the petition that was delivered to the Minister of Finance by a representative of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, there will be no difficulty in providing him with a copy of that petition without the signatures.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the Prime Minister will read motion No. 18, I think he will realize the information I am seeking.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—EXPENDITURE

On the motion of Mr. Pouliot:

For a copy of the last annual estimate prepared in accordance with Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 145, section 17, by the Clerk of the House of Commons of the sums which will be probably required to be provided by parliament for the payment of the indemnity and the actual moving or transportation expenses of members, and of salaries, allowances and contingent expenses of the house, and of several officers and clerks thereof under his direction, during the fiscal year.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of the opinion that the estimate as submitted under the statutes to the government is not a public document, and is not to be disclosed in the manner requested. I rule the motion out of order and that it be struck off the order paper.

Motion dropped.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—MEMBERS' STENOGRAPHERS STAFF

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all recommendations signed by each member of parliament for any stenographer being employed on the members' stenographers staff this session.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, that cannot possibly, I submit, be a proper matter for an order for return. The government must accept responsibility for any action involving, as in this instance, the expenditure of public moneys. If the discretion is exercised improperly such may be the subject matter of an inquiry in the proper place. It does not seem to me however that a recommendation by an hon. member for the employment of a given individual constitutes a public document, within the terms of the rules of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: This motion does not indicate any reflection upon anyone.

Mr. SPEAKER: The objection taken by the Prime Minister is sustained, and the motion is struck off the order paper.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

REDUCTION IN HOURS OF LABOUR TO PROVIDE WORK FOR UNEMPLOYED AND INCREASE PURCHASING POWER

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg) moved:

Whereas there are large and increasing numbers of our citizens at present unable to obtain employment and thereby the means of existence.

And whereas during recent years production has increased enormously.

And whereas real wages have not increased in proportion and thus consumption has not kept pace with production,

Be it resolved: that, in the opinion of this house, in order to absorb the unemployed into industry, thus eliminating the enormous waste of enforced idleness, the hours of labour be materially reduced and the purchasing power of the masses increased, and further to this end, that the government be requested to submit the necessary measures to the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that during the course of the present session there will be submitted to this house legislation of a very important character. We will have before us matters concerning the railway situation and probably the great waterways of Canada, but to my mind there is at the present time no question of such vast importance to the people of this dominion as is that of unemployment. The other matters referred to sink into insignificance when compared with this great problem, this great tragedy, which is now stalking throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion of Canada. In my opinion it is time this parliament tackled most earnestly the problem of unemployment. So far there has been no inkling or no indication whatsoever as to what steps the government may take to meet existing conditions.

In 1930 the matter of unemployment became a vital issue in this house, and many times during the session the problem was discussed. At that time the party in opposition accepted the challenge, if they were returned to power, to deal with unemployment, and having accepted the challenge the electors of the Dominion of Canada sent them back to this house with a very large majority. The party now in power will ultimately be judged by its action in this connection. In 1930 when the Liberal party went to the country unemployment was a vital factor, and I do not think I am exaggerating in the slightest degree when I say it was one of the chief contributing factors in putting them where they are at the present time. If the Conservative party accepted the challenge in 1930—and I give them credit for having done so—I do not think I am asking for more than my just rights when in 1932 I ask them what they are going to do about this great problem of unemployment.

I realize fully the attempts they have made to deal with the matter; I realize that they have jacked up the tariff as high as possible; to a very large extent they have spent public moneys to provide public works; they have been giving relief on a vast scale to thousands and thousands of Canadians throughout the length and breadth of the dominion. On the one hand we find they have been giving concessions or doles to the manufacturers and on the other hand they have been giving doles to the people who are being deprived of the opportunity to work. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that doles, whether they be given to those at the top or those at the bottom, are not going to solve the problem of unemployment.

During the past year or so the problem has become considerably aggravated, and instead of conditions improving the opposite has been the case. For the last eighteen months the Conservative party has been in power, and those who are in close touch with the situation will realize the conditions existing to-day in many of our large industrial centres; at this time I shall not discuss what is happening in our rural areas. May I quote to hon. members just a few figures concerning the cities of Winnipeg and Montreal. On January 20 last, just a few brief weeks ago, in the city of Winnipeg there were 5,079 married men, heads of families, who were in receipt of public relief. At the same time there were 5,388 single men and 493 single women receiving similar aid. The best figure I have been able to obtain from authoritative sources in regard to the city of Winnipeg indicates that at the present time there are 20,000 men and women out of work.

This figure, may I add, does not include very large numbers of people who are at present engaged on relief work. If these people were taken into consideration the figure I have already given would be greatly increased.

Yesterday while in the city of Montreal I heard an alderman of that city discuss their unemployment situation. He stated that for a long time very little had been done to relieve conditions, and very little in the way of obtaining accurate data was being attempted. The situation became so acute that they decided to take a registration, and within a period of ten days over 19,000 heads of families registered as being willing to work with pick and shovel for approximately forty cents per hour. This figure does not include single men and thousands of others who would have registered had there been any prospects of employment for them. If we accept those figures as correct—and there is no doubt they are—then it means that there are in some of our large industrial centres from one-quarter to one-third of the workers actually either on relief or demanding measures to take care of them.

Undoubtedly we will be told that in Canada we are suffering from world conditions. I have no doubt that to a certain extent conditions prevailing in certain other parts of the world are reflected in Canada, but we as a Labour party are not going to accept the excuse that because there are bad conditions throughout the world the same are bound to exist here. If we in this dominion were short of the essentials or necessities of life I could quite understand there being some excuse on the part of the powers that be for the prevailing conditions. But we are not suffering from any famine condition, any shortage of the necessities of life; we are suffering, if anything, from a "famine of plenty."

Now, so far this session the only indication we have had of what the government propose to do to deal with the problem is the announcement made by the Prime Minister a few days ago that the salaries of civil servants would be reduced by 10 per cent. I want to take this first opportunity of protesting on the floor of the house against this action. I would not have objected so much if the government had accepted the cost of living figures as submitted by the Department of Labour or the Bureau of Statistics, and then decided to make some minor reduction in the salaries of those in the civil service receiving the higher scales of pay; but the government simply announce that all civil servants will have to submit to a reduction of 10 per cent in their salaries.

I suppose this is one of the remedies the government are taking to cope with the present situation. Well, as representing a labour constituency and the ideals and aspirations of labour in parliament, I desire to contrast that action with another action the government took only a few short weeks ago. The government wanted money, and naturally they had to go to the capitalists to obtain it. What did they do? Did they say to our financiers: "You have got to accept a lower rate of interest for the money that we want you to loan to the government"? Oh, no. They went to our moneyed people and said: "If you will let us have your money we will give you a higher rate of interest than you have ever had in the history of this dominion." Had the government insisted on a lower rate of interest, the saving to the country would have been sufficient to have rendered unnecessary the 10 per cent salary reduction. In other words, the government are reducing the salaries of the workers in order that they may pay increased interest to the wealthy people of the dominion. In my view, this shows a complete lack of knowledge as to what the great masses of the people are thinking at the present time.

I propose to give a few figures as to interest charges, because they undoubtedly have a certain vital bearing upon the whole question of national economics. I am bringing these figures to the attention of the house because apparently so far the only government policy for dealing with the situation is the policy of "rigid economy", and I want to show where that policy might be applied. In 1914, prior to the war, the total fixed interest charges of the dominion were $12,893,505; the total revenue receipts were $163,174,000. In other words, our interest charges were a little over 8½ per cent of our total revenue receipts. But in 1931 those respective figures had increased to $121,289,844 and $356,209,358; that is, our percentage of interest charges to receipts had gone up from 8·6 to 32 per cent. Putting it another way, while our revenue had increased about 150 per cent, our interest charges had increased over 1,000 per cent. I submit that if the government were determined upon a policy of rigid economy that is where the saving might have been started.

The last part of my motion reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in order to absorb the unemployed into industry, thus eliminating the enormous waste of enforced idleness, the hours of labour be materially reduced and the purchasing power of the masses increased—

With the vast number of people that we have out of work, I think the first question I ought to submit to this house is: How are those people going to be absorbed into industry? The fact is that to-day they cannot be so absorbed, otherwise they would be working. That being so, I think I ought to submit to the house some concrete proposals as to the measures that should be taken to that end. It has been stated, and I think, correctly so, that there is only one cure for unemployment, that is to provide work. If to-day the panaceas offered to parliament for the cure of unemployment have proven ineffective, then I think it is only right and proper that we should turn to other measures for dealing with this very serious problem.

During the past few years production in Canada has increased by leaps and bounds. I do not think there is any doubt about that, and I do not think it is necessary for me to quote statistics in support of my statement. It will be sufficient for my purpose to state that according to the figures submitted by the Bureau of Statistics, during the period from 1917 to 1929 there was an increase in production of over 70 per cent. During approximately the same period, between 1917 and 1928, real wages, that is, wages as measured in terms of purchasing power, have increased by 16·4 per cent. In other words, productivity has increased beyond all proportion to the increase in wages. So long as we have this tremendous spread between the wages received and the value produced, I submit there is no hope of solving the problem of unemployment. During that same period of about eleven years, according to the Bureau of Statistics, the number of wage earners in Canada increased from 552,968 to 566,780—an increase of only 13,812; or to put it another way, individual production increased by an enormous ratio, while wages increased by a very small ratio. In 1928 the average amount of production per person employed in industry in Canada was $5,729; in other words, every man and woman in the dominion working in industry produced this value in commodities; but the amount received back in the form of wages was only $1,024 per person. This figure, however, does not tell the whole story in regard to labour costs; I think there should be other items added to the $1,024, because I am confident there are some missing. But at the same time there is another aspect of this question that in my opinion will compensate for any omissions from $1,024, because it should be borne in mind that the figure of $5,729 as the amount produced by every person working in industry represents the value of the goods when they leave the gates of the manufacturers. By the time those goods reach the consumer their price perhaps has doubled, so if there is anything lacking in the computation of labour costs probably it would be compensated for by the increase in price of the commodities which the worker has to buy back from the retail stores.

From this it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that those who come in between the man who produces and the consumer are taking far too large a toll of the goods or the wealth of this country. We in the Labour party claim, as I believe many of those belonging to other groups in this house also claim, that unless that spread is decreased there is no hope of dealing with the problems of poverty and unemployment with which we are now faced.

If we are to deal with this question at all I think first we must see that the people have access to the commodities which they produce. At the present time they have not that access, because in the first place they have not the purchasing power, and they have not that purchasing power because they do not receive sufficient in the form of wages. So we claim that one thing we must do is see that the people get more in the form of wages than they receive at the present time. But, as I said a moment ago, if we are to absorb more people into industry, how can that be accomplished? To-day we can produce far more rapidly than we are allowed to consume, and in fact I believe I am correct when I say that we can produce far more rapidly than we could consume even if we were allowed to consume a reasonable amount. If that is the case there is no problem of production; we have more or less solved that problem. So it comes down to a question of distribution, and I think the problem facing parliament at present is how to bring about a more equitable distribution of the wealth produced.

If we are to absorb more people into industry I think that can only be done in one way. There is no use talking of markets in other parts of the world; every other country is attempting to find those markets, and all the nations of the world cannot be on an export basis. So if we are to provide work for all those who want work I think that can be done only by reducing the hours of labour so that more people may be employed, and a matter of this kind can be dealt with only through the federal parliament; it cannot be done by provincial legislation. That is why I am asking the federal government to take the initiative in legislation of that nature.

Then we come to the question of the distribution of the commodities and the wealth produced. I submit that this question of distribution can be solved only in part by increasing the purchasing power of the masses of the people, and that can be brought about only by giving those who are performing useful service a greater return in the form of real wages than they are receiving at the present time. The figures I have submitted to the house show that at present approximately one-fifth of the value of an article is paid to the persons engaged in its production in the form of wages, and perhaps if other charges are taken into consideration that proportion might increase to one-quarter. The man engaged in industry can repurchase only one-quarter of the commodities which he produces, and the rest must wait until an export market is found or until it is consumed in one way or another.

I believe an increasing number of people favour the idea of shorter hours. This is not prevalent only among those who belong to the Labour party; we find that opinion held by many belonging to other parties, and I was very much interested a short time ago in the statement of a gentleman who is well known to members of this house. Speaking in Toronto he said:

> Unless inventive genius can devise new services or industries to absorb the present machine created surplus of workers, the nations of the world must unite in a pact to reduce working hours. . . .

That statement was made by the present leader of the Senate, and I am wondering whether the leader of the Conservative party in this house will accept that dictum. I thought the leader of the Senate was getting to the stage where he might soon join the Labour party, but when I learned that he had been made leader of the Senate I felt that my party had lost a possible recruit.

I think I have quoted enough figures to show that at present too large a proportion is going to sources that neither toil nor spin. I find, Mr. Speaker, that during 1931 the amount paid in the Dominion of Canada in the form of dividends totalled a large sum. The year 1931 was disastrous for millions of people in Canada; in that year hundreds of thousands of our fellow-Canadians lived on relief; farmers were on the verge of poverty, unable to meet their obligations; thousands of workers in our cities were going to relief offices in the hope of being able to obtain something in the way of assistance. But what do we find? In 1929 the total amount paid in dividends, according to the Montreal Star of December 16, 1931, was $215,097,291, while in the poor year of 1931 the amount paid in dividends and profits was $210,221,919, or a difference of approximately $5,000,000.

From this I think it must be obvious that to-day profits are levying too great a toll upon industry, and it must be apparent that instead of going to the few these profits should go to the many. It may be asked how this is to be brought about, and I must say frankly that in my opinion the only way to make the changes I have briefly enumerated this afternoon is to bring in state regulation to a greater extent than is the case at present. I know some hon. members shudder at the idea of state regulation, but there is no need to be afraid of the term. To-day the state interferes in practically everything we do. Every time there is a tariff change in this house it means some form of state interference with business, and if we can interfere with business for the purpose of putting it on a stable foundation I think in these times there is no reason why we should not interfere in order to put the living conditions of the masses of the people on a firm foundation as well.

When I bring this question to the attention of parliament my mind goes back to the scenes I witnessed in my own city of Winnipeg a few weeks ago before I left for Ottawa. There I saw thousands of single men being fed. They were trooping into buildings and warehouses where hundreds at a time sat down to a rather skimpy meal which they received from the city through the fund provided for the purpose by the three public authorities. There they sat down, and amongst those men we can find some of the flower of our manhood. These men, when wanted during the year 1914, became the nation's heroes, and in 1932 they have become the nation's hoboes. They come from all walks of life: you will find among them the ordinary labourer as well as mechanics skilled and unskilled, yes, and even lawyers and doctors, all receiving relief. When in the city of Winnipeg at the present time between one-quarter and one-third of the population are in receipt of some form of public assistance, I ask this House of Commons: How long can a condition of that kind continue? Here we have come to parliament and so far we find not a word said about this serious problem of unemployment. I know it is still early in the session, but not a thing has been foreshadowed to meet the situation. The workers, the great masses of the people in the country, are to-day looking to parliament to do something to deal in a fundamental way with this great and very important problem.

Right at this moment while this matter is being discussed in the House of Commons there are doubtless hundreds of thousands of workers, affected by the problem, who are wondering what steps the government will take to cope with the situation. I trust this afternoon that the government will take the present opportunity to tell the house and the country what they have in mind in this regard. When we realize that to-day in our midst there are hundreds of thousands who month after month have been living on some form of dole we can well believe that the people are looking to parliament to give them a lead. They want some assurance. These people are being driven deeper and deeper into the mire, with the result that they are beginning to lose their manhood and womanhood, to-day we ought to give them a message not merely of hope and encouragement but of something practical in the way of an assurance that the government and parliament are going to tackle in a real and earnest manner this greatest of all problems that we have had to face.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): I will not take up the time of the house trying to make it clear that there is a great unemployment problem in Canada to-day. The question of the reduction of working hours is a very old one, but to-day, owing to changed economic conditions, it must be viewed in rather a new light. In past years, before factories reached their present state of productive efficiency, the effect of overstrain, through long hours, upon the health of the individual and the question as to how the hours of leisure would be spent were all important. These problems have been largely dealt with and to-day the whole subject must be approached from the point of view of trying to some extent to solve the great problem of unemployment which is so much in evidence.

Stephen Leacock said in 1921 that the power of workers to produce had increased forty-fold in the past 150 years. Since that time inventors have developed many other labour-saving devices: We have combines displacing labour in the harvest field; we have powerful engines pulling long freight trains and so displacing the number of crews previously employed; and we have in the factory labour-saving devices through the operation of which only a small fraction of the number of men previously employed can now obtain work. It has happened before, when this problem became serious, that a war or something of that kind would occur and thousands of men were absorbed into armies, navies and other services. We do hope that such a thing will not be needed to relieve the present situation; we hope that instead of more armaments we shall have less as time goes on. In the past also more work has been available during periods of construction when branch railways were being built to open up new territories, and when building materials to construct homes, stores and elevators were required, and when there was at least a temporary market for machinery and requisite material of every kind. Then much work was available.

We heard a few days ago about one country that is trying a new experiment and we find that there they have no unemployment problem, probably because they are going through a period of construction. But in our country our plant has already been overbuilt; production has probably been overdone, and we find that thousands of men are laid off. This seems to work in a vicious circle. Men are laid off; there is no purchasing power; factories cannot sell their products, and more men are laid off. And so the vicious circle goes round and round. We also have boys and girls who are growing up in the country and there is little prospect of their obtaining work under present conditions. Can anything be more unfortunate than to see an aged, infirm man having to go out and work with pick and shovel while some of his grown-up boys, unmarried, are out of work and unable to give him any help. During recent years hours of labour have been shortened. The figures show that from 1913 to 1926 hours of labour dropped 20 per cent and it was predicted at that time that disaster would follow. But that prediction has not been justified. Shorter hours of labour, it is true, would increase factory costs, but can that be avoided? Has not the cost of unemployment to be met in any case? If, therefore, factory costs might be slightly increased it would probably in the end result in a saving to the taxpayers of Canada.

I am in favour of this resolution. I believe it would work in the interests of the Canadian people. It would make for contentment because it would give a wider distribution of the available amount of work and a wider distribution of the wealth available in the country; and if the economic interests of the few clash with the wellbeing of the many, then surely the latter must have the preference. I believe that by shortening the hours of work some progress would be made in solving the great unemployment problem.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): I desire to pass a few comments on this resolution but I hope that the mover (Mr. Heaps) will not gather from anything that I say that I contemplate associating myself with the Labour party. The remarks I make I make from the point of view of one who has been inside the walls of industry for approximately a quarter of a century, looking out on the world from that aspect, not looking in through the windows and telling those inside what to do and the men in there how they are to conduct themselves. I propose to confine myself largely to the resolution.

In connection with production, if we take the index in Canada as of 1913—and I believe they use 1913 in both Canada and the United States as the basis of their index figures—but if we bring the index figure down to 1926 and accept 100 as the index for that year, we find that production in Canada advanced from 1926 to the peak in January, 1929, when it reached 43 points higher than normal, or the index rose to 143. From 1929 to December, 1931, the index lowered and lowered as far as productivity in Canada is concerned, until in December, 1931, it stood at 82. Therefore the statement in the resolution as far as increased production is concerned, must refer to 1929, the high-water mark, because since that time, as I have said, there has been a consistent contraction of business.

With reference to wages, if we take the real wages also as of the period of 1926, what do we find? Using the figures which have been assembled by the Department of Labour in Canada—I do not know whether they are issued yet—we shall first take actual wages as of 1926 at 100, the cost of living at 100, and real wages at 100. There is a wide distinction between real wages and actual wages. Real wages means the amount that can be purchased by the actual money received in proportion to the prices of the commodities. In 1931, actual wages had risen from the index of 100 in 1926, to 106. The cost of living on the other hand, starting with 100 as the index in 1926, had decreased until in December, 1931, it stood at 89, or eleven points below normal. Actual wages, as I said a moment ago, stood in December, 1931, at six points above normal, if we assume 1926 as normal. Real wages figured on that basis in December, 1931, stood at 119. I merely leave those figures with the members, and I shall pass on to the next item.

The resolution refers to the reduction in the hours of labour. At the present time many thousands of men and women are out of work, and we cannot reduce their hours of labour. Many more thousands are working on part time, and their hours of labour should not be reduced. Even those who are working full time are compelled to make voluntary contributions from their incomes and this is equivalent to shortening their hours also. The application of the principle of shorter hours is not new. It commenced in 1840 when President Van Buren of the United States adopted the ten-hour day principle for all government services in that republic. The next move was in 1879 by the state legislature of Massachusetts when it adopted regulations pertaining to the hours of labour of women and shortened the period of work for women. Then in 1886 the movement commenced in Canada to have shorter hours of work; thus from 1840 to 1886 the period of hours of work was reduced. I am not a prophet, but I do not hesitate to say that in the future the hours of labour will be reduced still further than they are to-day.

There has been a tremendous advance in production. The leaders of industry and likewise the leaders of the different labour organizations have taken careful note of that. How could there be anything but an advance in industry when we consider there has been a tremendous advance in chemistry, physics and the science of mathematics? If we take into consideration the application to industry of the advances in those educational fields, naturally production did increase and by 1929 the productivity of the plants in America exceeded the productivity in 1919 by approximately fifty per cent. That is, the productivity of every man engaged in industry in 1929, owing to the improvement in the machines in the industry in which he worked, and applying this generally to industries, increased fifty per cent.

The very fact that machines have improved so that the productivity has increased, has resulted in numerous surveys, at all times encouraged by those engaged in industry, both the employers and the workmen. The first survey was made in 1908 by the National Industrial Congress Board of New York. They endeavoured to ascertain if the number of days per week for work had been reduced in a number of United States plants, and they found in 1908 that eight plants in that country had reduced the work per week from six to five days. In 1931, last year, the United States Labour department made a much wider and more extended investigation. Their questionnaire covered 37,587 companies and they ascertained that those companies employed approximately 4,000,000 men or women as the case might be. They learned in reply to the questionnaire that 892 of those companies had adopted the five-day week as a permanent principle in their plants. If we apply the percentage to the numbers engaged, we find that approximately 225,000 of the 4,000,000 were permanently on the five-day week.

Later on, just last year, I believe, the Industrial Standards Board of New York sent out a questionnaire to 2,000 firms in the United States. This questionnaire was replied to by 266 firms. The questions were:

1. Are you in favour of a shorter week?
2. Are you in favour of fewer hours per day?

In reply to the first question, "Are you in favour of a shorter work week?" fifty-three per cent of the firms replied no, and forty-six per cent firms replied yes. I am leaving out the decimals. In reply to the second question, "Are you in favour of fewer hours per day?" Thirty-six per cent of the firms replied yes, and sixty-three per cent of the firms replied no.

The experience of the Kellogg Company of Battle Creek, Michigan, I believe will be of interest in this connection. The Kellogg Company in December, 1930, went on a shorter shift schedule. They operate twenty-four hours per day and they divided the work into four shifts of six hours each. That resulted in their adding to their staff three hundred more operators. I should just like to quote a few sentences from what they say as to the results as printed in the October issue of Factory and Industrial Management. These were the advantages for the employees:

More leisure time for recreation.
Opportunity to cultivate gardens.
Time to pursue educational courses.
Increased incentive to prepare for managerial jobs.
Less fatigue, resulting in a more healthy, ambitious, alert and aggressive working force.
Opportunity for mothers who must support children to earn a living and yet have ample time at home to care for their families.
Less waste time, due to concentration of work in a single period.
Decreased cost of living—all meals at home.

Now as to the company itself. The advantages according to this article have been as follows:

Increased daily production from the plants as an operating unit, due to increased production at every station or task, slight in itself, but considerable in the aggregate.
Elimination of meal periods, with their waste and the expense of a large cafeteria.

As most hon. gentlemen know, nearly all the larger industries maintain cafeterias which supply meals for their employees. I continue to quote:

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Increased return from the capital invested in plant and machinery, owing to the increased rate of plant operation.
Decreased overhead due to the fact that the factory produces more packages of cereals per dollar of overhead than under the eight-hour shifts.

I should also like to quote from a book published by the National Industrial Conference Board, New York, entitled The Five-Day Week in Manufacturing Industries. A very close study was made of this question of the shorter working week in the state of New York, and I should like to quote a few sentences from the conclusions of these investigators. They say:

The conclusion that any or all industrial establishments could advantageously adopt the five-day week schedule does not follow from the evidence offered in its favour by a majority of the companies that are qualified from experience to appraise its advantages and drawbacks. This evidence does, however, remove the five-day week from the status of a radical and impractical administrative experiment.
Whether or not the application of the five-day week will be extended to industry generally, and whether such extension would be economically sound and socially desirable, are questions that lie in the field of conjecture and opinion and are outside the scope of this study.
In the end, the question of the length and arrangement of the working week is likely to be settled, not on the basis of theoretical principles, but by the practical experience of employers and workers, individually and in groups.

In this connection I would say that there are many lines of industry which cannot perhaps have a shorter working week, either shorter hours per day or fewer days per week. On the other hand I am told that in certain industries men are working seven days per week. So far as I am concerned, I would like to see that practice entirely eliminated if at all possible. I do not think anyone should work seven days a week if it can be avoided.

Next, if industry is to progress it is bound to take advantage of the benefits of invention, particularly along the lines to which I referred some moments ago in connection with chemistry, mathematics, physics and so forth, and of course these inventions may increase the difficulty in connection with employment.

I for one am convinced that a study such as is suggested in the resolution is worth while, and I was pleased to see the motion on the order paper because it directs public attention to the matter. While I do not think that anything can be done now, perhaps when the depression lifts and we get into good times again and industry bounds along, regulations may be made which will prove advantageous. I am convinced that it will never do to allow machinery to develop and continue to displace labour to a greater extent than it does to-day without some provision being made for the future. It will never do to deny to men the opportunity to work through machinery displacing labour. I can remember well when I was a boy many I knew worked twelve hours per day in industry. I have seen in my time the number of working hours per day reduced from twelve to ten, and from ten to nine. I believe that Canada along with other signatories to the Treaty of Versailles has agreed to place in operation at the earliest convenient time the eight-hour day. So there is no reason to think that a shorter working day will not come. Whether the time is ripe now, I do not know. Whether it is economically sound at the present time, I cannot say. I rise merely to give my support to whatever will increase the demand for the services of workingmen, whatever will increase the opportunity for men to serve and increase the numbers that may be employed. The subject of employment in industry has been one of profound interest to me for many, many years, and I am happy at all times to do what I can in any way I can to provide men with the opportunity to work. If, when times get better, it is found necessary to reduce the hours of work and if such action increases the opportunity to serve, I think I will be in a position to advocate along that line.

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask the hon. member if the same wages were paid for five days' work as for six?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am pleased the hon. member has asked the question. In Canada so far as I know at the present time no firms are operating on a five-day week basis. The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company of Canada, Limited, operating in Toronto is on a six-hour shift, four shifts per day. The Kellogg Company, to which I referred, operating on a six-hour shift, raised the wages of the men in the plant 33 1-3 per cent thereby making the wages from the six-hour day equivalent to those from the eight-hour day. In that plant the wages of the office staff were raised only 12½ per cent because that staff was receiving higher salaries. I read a moment ago from Factory and Industrial Management in connection with the Kellogg Company. They were satisfied that even operating on the six-hour day costs were cut down and the production was as great.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, rising to second the resolution of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) I wish to say I am pleased the resolution has come before the house so early in the session. During the session of last year hon. members in this corner of the house made every effort to promote a discussion of the unemployment situation throughout this dominion, and to have something done early in the session so that every opportunity would be given for discussion. However, we failed in that, and not until the closing day of the session was anything said concerning unemployment or remedies proposed by the government in regard thereto.

As the mover of the resolution has pointed out, in 1930 unemployment became a matter of national importance and an issue in the election of that year. I took the position at that time that the government of the day was not responsible for the prevailing economic conditions, and took the further position that the government which would succeed them, if there were a change, would not be able to deal effectively with unemployment because our economic system, as everyone knows who has given it any thought, is not carried out according to plan. It runs here and there where it will, according to the time and circumstances in which it finds itself, and for that reason I realize that the present government, regardless of their pre-election promises, cannot effectively deal with the problem. They made the promises, however, in 1930 and at the special session, with a great deal of confidence, they sought to work out a remedy. In the session of 1931 however they realized that their efforts were not going to be effective, and although they tried to do something further they began to draw attention to the fact that hon. members on this side of the house were not making any constructive suggestions toward a solution. What a constructive suggestion is or means depends on the definition of the term. If they mean a suggestion which would cure unemployment and improve industrial and social relations as between the various classes in this country, we say we cannot make such constructive suggestions because unemployment arises out of the relations existing between the different classes in Canada.

However I pointed out about a week after the session opened last year that one of the few ways in which the government could deal with unemployment was to reduce the hours of work and increase the wages of workers in industry. Unfortunately however that suggestion was not accepted; undoubtedly the government considered it was not constructive and, in the same manner, they may feel that the present resolution is of the same nature. Several points are made in the resolution now before us. First, there is the statement, in effect, that the condition of unemployment is becoming worse. I quote from the resolution as follows:

Whereas there are large and increasing numbers of our citizens at present unable to obtain employment and thereby the means of existence.

I do not think anyone denies that statement. If we turn to the Labour Gazette of January, 1932, however we will find therein ample proof of the statement made in this resolution. On page 56 I find the following:

The curtailment in industrial activity, which first appeared towards the latter part of 1929 and continued throughout 1930, became more pronounced during the year just passed, with the result that employment in Canada was generally at a lower level during 1931 than in any other year since 1926.

Then, if we turn to page 57 we find a chart describing the state of employment in Canada from the year 1921 to 1931, indicating that the peak of employment was reached about the middle of the year 1929. At that time, comparing with the figure 100 which is given for the year 1926, the peak is indicated at 127·8. From that time to the end of 1931, when the index figure is 98, we find a continuous decline in employment. When I say, "continuous" may I add that the term is interpreted in only one way, because there was an up trend in 1930 and a lesser up trend in 1931. Taking the main curve however there is shown to be a continuous decline since the middle of 1929. If we take the index figures of employment supplied to the Bureau of Statistics by the various employers in the dominion, taking the year 1926 as the average of 100, in 1930 the index reached its maximum of 118·9 on July 1, while the highest point reached in 1929 was 127·8 at the beginning of August. During the year under review the index averaged 102·5, compared with the average for the preceding years, 1930, of 113·4, and 119 for 1929. The report continues:

In connection with these indexes it might be mentioned that the present depression has been characterized by a very general movement to retain in so far as possible the usual working force by reducing the hours worked.

The earnings of the persons included in the monthly reports of employment, if available, would, in this way, probably show in many cases a greater decline than the numbers on the payrolls.

So even accepting these figures, if we take into consideration that many are working on short time, purchasing power as represented by wages has declined much more than would be suggested by the figures given in the indexes.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

The preamble of the resolution reads:

And whereas during recent years production has increased enormously.

The mover of the resolution gave ample proof of that recital, and I think it was substantiated by the member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) who preceded me. But perhaps a few further figures along the same lines would not be amiss. In a report made to the international conference of the International Labour Office in May, 1930, there is contained a report from the director, Mr. Albert Thomas, on unemployment and its causes, its extent, and so on. In a lengthy review of the various causes for unemployment, the final point—the ninth point discussed in making out the report was:

9. The disorganization of the labour market caused by the extra-rapid development of labour-saving machinery and of the process of rationalization.

He contended that an inquiry carried out in the United States into the output of workers per working hour showed that this output had increased in 1927 as compared with 1914 as follows:

In slaughterhouses and preserving factories, by 26 per cent.
Cane sugar refining works, by 33 per cent.
Paper factories, by 40 per cent.
Tanneries, by 41 per cent.
Steel works and rolling mills, by 46 per cent.
Cement works, by 54 per cent.
Mills, by 59 per cent.
Petroleum refining works, by 82 per cent.
Blast furnaces, by 103 per cent.
Automobile factories, by 178 per cent.
Tire factories, by 292 per cent.

These figures show a very substantial increase in production per worker in the United States. What is true of that country is largely true of this dominion.

The value of production per individual also increased. In the Monthly Labour Review of the United States for December, 1930, in the period between 1919 and 1929 the value of production per individual worker in the manufacturing industries of the United States increased from 220·5 to 256·2, or 16 per cent. During the same period the index of prices fell by 30 per cent. This means that the actual output really increased by nearly 50 per cent.

Not only has that increase taken place in industry, but in recent years there has been a similar increase in agriculture. The effects of mechanization were not felt in agriculture until within comparatively recent years, but now the effect of machinery is apparent. The deputy director of the International Labour

Office, Mr. H. B. Butler, reporting on the increased use of agricultural machinery in the United States said:

To take one single case: the combine (reaper-thresher) wherever adopted deprives five agricultural workers of employment. And the use of these machines has made immense strides in some countries: in Kansas, for example, there were 14 in 1918, 20,000 in 1928 and 25,000 in 1929, while the figures for Canada are 2 in 1922, 18 in 1925, 4,341 in 1928 and 7,215 in 1929.

A rather peculiar thing in this connection is that while a great number of people were deploring the trend of population from the country to the cities, agricultural production was increasing so fast that it could not be disposed of. In the Canadian Congress Journal for May, 1931, there is an article by Mr. Andrew Stewart, of the University of Manitoba. This article won the prize offered by the Royal Bank of Canada for the best paper on the economy of machine production in agriculture. Mr. Stewart states:

A tractor operator with a five-bottom 14" plough can turn more land in one hour than the same man with a walking plough could cover in a day. Ten days of one man's time are required with a one-horse outfit to cultivate the same acreage that the four-row outfit can cultivate in one day. In 1930, with hand production methods, 32 hours of man labour were required to produce 10 bushels of wheat. In Montana an acre of land has been summer-fallowed and a crop of wheat removed the following year with 2·5 hours of man labour. . .

This reduction in labour has resulted in a larger acreage operated per worker. Since 1850 the average acres of improved land per worker in the United States has increased steadily from 30 acres to 49 acres in 1925, and the figures for Canada show that between 1881 and 1891, acres of farm land per worker increased 95 per cent, improved land per worker 105 per cent and crop acres per worker 109 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: If, as my hon. friend says, the combined reaper harvester enables one man to do the work of five, what reduction would be necessary in the hours of labour of harvesters in order to keep those five men employed in the field?

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), representing a country district, perhaps would be better able than I to answer that question. I have not gone into the matter sufficiently to say, but I think I have plainly shown that with present unemployment conditions among the people of Canada, the farmers and the workers, as primary producers, have not received any benefit from the great increase in productive machinery in this country. As a matter of fact we are worse off than we were when production was carried on in a much more primitive way, because at present we are altogether divorced from a means of livelihood, while in former days we were close to the means of getting a living.

Of course, as the hon. member for Toronto Northwest pointed out, the question of shorter hours is nothing new, but at this time, with unemployment being felt so severely, the matter is being discussed in many places. Last year the question was brought up in the Ontario legislature by Mr. S. C. Tweed, member of the provincial house for North Waterloo. In bringing forward the question Mr. Tweed said:

If we are to depend for a return to prosperity upon an increase in the price of wheat we may have to wait a long time. There is no lack of buying power, rather there is concentration of buying power in too few hands.

That is the position we take in bringing forward this resolution. We consider that there is sufficient wealth produced in the country, and all that we need is some means of distributing that wealth. That can be done only through an increase in the purchasing power of those engaged in industry. In my own province of British Columbia the question was brought forward by Colonel Nelson Spencer, a member of the government party in that province. Mr. Spencer is a lumber operator; he employs a great many men, and he has come to the conclusion that there is no way out of our present difficulties except by shortening the hours of labour without a corresponding reduction in pay. In that connection I believe he was instrumental in having a resolution passed asking the Dominion government to call a conference of the provincial legislatures in order to discuss this problem.

I wish to point out these facts because undoubtedly if the government speak at all on this matter they will take the stand that they have no jurisdiction over hours of labour. The question of unemployment is so important, and the government of the day must take part in so many phases of provincial legislation and provincial administration which only a few years ago never would have been thought of, that I know the provinces would be pleased and relieved if the federal government would take up this whole question of unemployment purely as a federal measure.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) pointed out that the leader of the Senate has given his benediction to the six-hour day. I know also that Senator A. C. Hardy, speaking before a Rotary club in Brockville in the fall of 1930, said he was convinced of the wisdom of the labour movement in its request for a shorter work day. When the Trades and Labour Congress interviewed the government just before the opening of this session the same question was brought up. I should like to read from the memorandum presented by the Trades and Labour Congress to the government, which states:

There has been noticeable, throughout Canada during the past several months a determination on the part of employers to take advantage of the present conditions to reduce wages, notwithstanding there is ample proof that such a policy only results in decreased purchasing power and further aggravation of the unemployment situation.

I may say here that I am sorry the federal government has taken the position adopted by many short-sighted employers of labour, and reduced the salaries paid civil servants. Undoubtedly this will further aggravate the unemployment situation, in that it will reduce purchasing power.

Mr. MORAND: Would the hon. gentleman say in what way this will reduce purchasing power, if that money remains in the country and is not taken up by taxation?

Mr. MacINNIS: It means that the less purchasing power possessed by workers in industry, the less they can buy. If this money stays in the country that does not mean it is going to be used to purchase commodities. If I have a million dollars I cannot spend all that money in purchasing the things I need, but if I have a thousand dollars I can use that amount and more in the purchase of things I require. When you take ten per cent of that $1,000 you are curtailing my purchasing power, while if you take ten per cent off the million dollars quite possibly it will not affect my purchasing power at all. It may reduce the amount available for savings or for investment in six per cent government bonds, the proceeds of which will be used in meeting the unemployment situation.

The memorandum goes on to say:

We believe that by a liberal administration of the Fair Wages Act the government could assist materially to offset this by maintaining wage rates on works undertaken or assisted by the government, even though employers may in some districts have succeeded, temporarily, in reducing wages below what would be considered in ordinary times as "fair and reasonable."

The existing fair wages policy up to the time of enactment of the Fair Wages Act had been based on the existing conditions in respect to hours of labour which often resulted in unreasonably long work days. We believe that present conditions warrant a policy of still further reduction of hours in order to give a larger number of workers opportunity for employment. We would therefore urge the government both in respect to contracts coming within the scope of the fair wage policy and its own works, to, wherever practical, put into effect the six hour day and five day week and by this means give a lead to private industry in a matter that cannot help but reflect itself in a reduction of the number of unemployed workers. In doing this, however, due consideration should be given to the payment of wages high enough to maintain established standards of living, as otherwise no real relief would result. Wage reductions have not been accompanied by any reduction in interest rates on loans, but on the contrary there has been a tendency to pay higher interest rates presumably to ensure the successful flotation of government bonds. This again we believe leads to a decrease in the amount of money available for purchases and a reduction of a demand for goods on the part of the masses.

In connection with their request for an extension of the six-hour day, they also made a further case for the ratification of the eight-hour day convention, pointing out that the government in its own employ at the present time has men working as many as twelve hours a day. I refer to guards in penitentiaries where men are still working twelve hours a day, despite the fact that the government is paying direct relief to able-bodied men who would be able to do this work.

I have two more quotations to make. In this connection I think it is well to observe that the seriousness of the unemployment situation is making it possible to discuss this question in a better spirit than was possible some years ago. It is not so very long ago since, if you mentioned the matter of unemployment, you were reminded that people who were unemployed were unemployed because of their own shortcomings. To-day no one makes that statement. I noticed, in a report which appeared in the Toronto Globe, a speech made in Windsor, Ontario, by the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) on October 16, 1931. I do not know at the moment what particular organization he was addressing, but I would give this brief quotation from his remarks. He said:

We are spending $50,000,000 this year to give temporary relief to the families affected by the depression.

That is quite an item for a government to be spending—a government that was going to deal with the unemployment situation without having recourse to doles. The minister continued:

We cannot continue to spend this amount every year for this purpose. There must be an end to the peak of prosperity and the depth of depression.

And now comes a very important point which the minister made:

The human element is thrown out when the factories close down. This has been going on for years. Industrial leaders, instead of inventing new machinery that means less work for the workmen, should evolve and devise some social machine that will forever put an end to such situations as now confront this country.

The Minister of Railways puts his finger on the vital point in capitalistic production when he states that the human element, that is, the workers in industry, are thrown out when the factories close down. The factories close down when profit cannot be made from operating them, for profit is the motive underlying production. He says that industrial leaders, instead of inventing new machinery that means less work for the workmen, should evolve some social machine that will forever put an end to such situations as now confront this country. But may I point out that industrial leaders are not interested in the human factor in industry; they are interested only in profits, and they install machinery in factories, not to ease the burdens on the backs of workers but to increase their own profits. How, therefore, can the minister expect such men to use their time in trying to evolve and devise some social machine that will forever put an end to such situations as now confront the country? If such a scheme is evolved that scheme will have to be put into effect, even, in my opinion, against the opposition of such leaders of industry, because it will take away from them their prerogative of making a profit out of the needs of the workers of the country. I submit that the present government should take the case up now, for if they do not do so some other government will have to do it later on.

Now I wish to quote an item from an address given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). He was speaking to The Advertising and Sales Roundtable in the convention hall of the Royal York Hotel on October 28, 1931, and in the course of his remarks he said:

> We are unworthy of our marvellous heritage if we cannot take it and transmute it into something of which we can be increasingly proud.

We certainly cannot be increasingly proud of what we have to-day.

> If we have learned the lessons of the past few years, and if we can bring distribution into equitable alignment with the growth of our production, then 1932 may well be the opening year in the new era of Canadian contact with the economic world.

This is rather a strange statement coming from a gentleman who in May last, when the motion which was passed in this house a few days ago was being discussed, said that there was nothing particularly wrong in the alignment between distribution and production. Possibly we should be glad that what we have been saying here, along, of course, with economic conditions, is having some effect on the point of view of members of the government.

I do not think I need say anything further on this subject, but I hope that some member of the government will discuss the question. The question of unemployment is becoming increasingly serious and some steps should be taken to deal with it. I am just as firmly convinced as the Minister of Railways that this country cannot go on spending money year after year in trying to promote public works and in giving doles and direct relief to unemployed people, thereby piling up a debt, the carrying charges of which must be met. Something must be done. The wealth of the country must in some way be produced and distributed to those who need it, and in my opinion, under present conditions, there is only one way of doing this and that is by increasing the purchasing power of the workers in industry. That can be done, if both the product of industry and its production are fairly shared. I trust that the government will receive this resolution favourably and that we shall hear from them to that effect.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I wish to direct a question to some hon. member who will follow the last speaker (Mr. MacInnis), and I base my question on the wording of the resolution:

> Be it resolved: That, in the opinion of this house, in order to absorb the unemployed into industry, thus eliminating the enormous waste of enforced idleness, the hours of labour be materially reduced and the purchasing power of the masses increased, and further to this end, that the government be requested to submit the necessary measures to the house.

Coming from the prairies and representing as I do a rural constituency, I should like to ask this question: Is there any individual in this house who will show me whereby, by a reduction in the hours of labour on the farm, under present conditions, it is even possible to apply this proposal to the farm? I was amazed at the hon. member for Northwest Toronto (Mr. MacNicol) when he stated that hours of labour, he hoped, would never be reduced so as to deny men the right to labour. I would conclude from his statement that man's chief end, in his opinion, is to labour. In mine, it is not.

Mr. MacNICOL: I did not quite understand what the hon. member said about my advocating reducing the hours of labour so as to do something. What was it?

Mr. VALLANCE: The point that I was attempting to make was from the hon. member's own statement. My hon. friend said, if I understood him aright, that he hoped the hours of labour would never be reduced to such an extent as to deny men the right to labour. I naturally concluded from that statement that my hon. friend's interpretation of man's chief end is that it is to labour.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member must have misunderstood what I said. The reduction of the hours of labour would offer an opportunity for a greater number to work. That is what I said.

Mr. VALLANCE: I merely wrote down the statement of the hon. member and if he says he did not make it, the statement that he makes now comes finally to the same thing. In my opinion the trouble with capital is that the capitalists are demanding too much of the benefit that has been derived from the machine age. There are only four sources of wealth in any country: the four natural resources, namely, the forests, fisheries, agriculture, and mines. Without the application of labour those things are of no value, but labour to-day does not receive back its share of the cost of the fabrication and we find stacked up in the shelves what we propose to call too great overproduction. The trouble is that labour has not been getting that amount which will enable labour to buy back that which it has created. The last speaker has pointed out that under the profit system you can extract profit from only one source, and that is from the production of the goods, a certain percentage of the goods. According to the percentage that capital demands as a profit, just so long will it take to pile those goods up because of labour's inability to buy back that which it has created.

Coming from the prairies as I do, farming as I do, using all the modern machinery as I do, I should like to point out that in spite of the labour reductions that I can show, in the turnover of my business every year, to me, to the labourer still on that farm—talking of myself—I own no more at the end of the year than I did when we used the sickle and the walking plough. Why? Because labour and capital—I am talking of industrialists now—are demanding from me more than I am able to pay. Until that condition is rectified, how can we take two men to produce forty cent wheat where one is doing it to-day, and at the same time say that you can maintain the standard of living to those two? It cannot be done. I have laboured and I can tell labour this, that until the primary producer finds himself in a position to buy those goods which the industrialists create, we shall find ourselves always in the same situation.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Hon. R. D. MORAND (East Essex): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate, but one or two statements have been made that I feel should be taken up. Coming as I do from an industrial centre, the question of finding some method of giving more work is certainly of real interest to me. The question, however, of shorter hours or shorter weeks or shorter months has not been the trouble in our part of the country; it has been a question of no hours and no weeks and no months. But I do not want to let this opportunity pass after the statements of the hon. member (Mr. Heaps) who moved the resolution, and also of the hon. member (Mr. MacInnis) who said that nothing had been done by the government to alleviate conditions.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member is misquoting me, because I stated that the government had done a good deal in the way of alleviation.

Mr. MORAND: I am willing to take that back. I understood quite definitely that that had been said. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver South made that statement.

Mr. MacINNIS: I also did not make that statement. I have on several occasions said in the house that we appreciated what the government had done, but what they had done was quite futile in meeting the need.

Mr. MORAND: I am quite sure the government and the country will be pleased to know there is some appreciation of what has been done by the government. So far as we are concerned in our city, we fully appreciate the fact that the government, shortly after it took power, stopped labour from coming from other parts of the world where labour was certainly a drug on the market, where unemployment was much more severe than it is or was in Canada. Very shortly after the government came into power they stopped that labour from flooding this country. Conditions would undoubtedly be worse to-day if that had not been done. I wish to compliment and thank the government for having so arranged the tariff, despite the fact that they were confronted with tariff walls all over the world, with mass production and with a gradually increasing accumulation of goods, that they prevented the dumping of those goods into this country and throwing more men out of employment than there are at the present time. Surely that is something the government has a right to be proud of, and something the country will not forget.

Mr. YOUNG: We shall not.

Mr. MORAND: I am afraid the country generally will remember it in such a way that later hon. members on the other side will not forget it. The tariff as applied to many industries of my city has meant that at least what work there was left in Canada, what demand there was for the products of those industries, was for the purpose of giving employment to men within Canada, and that labour from outside the country was not employed instead of that of our own citizens.

There are a number of things that must be taken into consideration as regards industry. Not only has production increased very materially with the same number of men, but the quality of the goods produced is so high that they last possibly much longer than they did before, and until such time as the world itself is righted, until such time as a market can be opened in other parts of the world, until the currency of other countries becomes such that competition can be met, we are certainly overmanned in the way of production.

I wish to take this opportunity of bringing before the house the fact that we in our part of the country certainly are thankful for the very efficient and active manner in which this government has taken care of the situation, as regards not only helping those who are unemployed, but helping to continue in employment those who are working.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Inasmuch as this question of unemployment is one of great national importance I should like the house to get a clearer understanding of just what the resolution means. I do not rise to give that explanation myself because I am not clear on the point, but we ought to understand what it means before we vote upon it. I think the mover of the resolution (Mr. Heaps) has not taken the house entirely into his confidence in his exposition of the resolution.

Everyone will agree with the first statement of the resolution, that there are great numbers of our citizens at present unemployed and that through their unemployment their very existence is made precarious. We will also agree with the further statement that during recent years production has increased enormously. I was reading only this afternoon in the report of the Macmillan committee that production throughout the entire world had increased since 1913 by 25 per cent. So there cannot be much doubt about that. The next statement in the resolution is this:

> Whereas real wages have not increased in proportion and thus consumption has not kept pace with production.

Of course, it is simply another truth to say that consumption has not kept pace with production, for the reason that wages have not increased in proportion with the increase in production.

Now I come to the declaratory part of the resolution:

> Be it resolved: That, in the opinion of this house, in order to absorb the unemployed into industry, thus eliminating the enormous waste of enforced idleness, the hours of labour be materially reduced and the purchasing power of the masses increased, and further to this end that the government be requested to submit the necessary measures to the house.

Let us look at what that means. If it merely means what has been the policy of the organized Labour movement of Canada for many years, in respect to wages, then it means nothing. That policy has been and is that the wages of labourers can be and should be increased, in the vain hope that in doing so the standard of living and purchasing power will be increased. But here is the problem: We are operating under a profit system, and under a profit system an increase of wages must necessarily mean a corresponding increase in the price of commodities in the production of which wages are paid; so that ultimately an increase in wages must be balanced by an increase in prices, except in the case of overhead savings through improved organization or improved machinery, with such savings going to wages instead of to cheaper goods. To ask for wage increases or hour reduction under a profit system is to work around in a circle. That has been the weakness of the policy of labour ever since I knew anything about it. Even strikes never got labour anywhere, because it was not possible to have a real increase in wages under a profit system since wage increases were invariably offset by an increase in the price of commodities.

If it means that there must be a reduction of the hours of labour and an increase in pay under the present profit system, then it is impossible. If then the resolution means anything it means that we are asked to introduce a new system. That is what the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) must have in mind, and if so he is not following his usual frank way of dealing with things if he does not say so. He asks the house to introduce legislation as quickly as possible to implement this resolution. I would like to know what that means. Is it that the government should introduce by legislation a new economic system into Canada? That means, if it means anything, that the government must first nationalize the industrial system in this country. If the resolution means that, I will vote for it because I have always stood for that; I like it. If it does not mean that, it does not mean anything at all, and I would not be bothered voting for it. I would like somebody to explain just exactly what this resolution means. If it stands for a new system, which if it means anything it must mean, I would like to vote for it. If it stands for the old impossible system of increasing wages and shortening hours and increasing prices, the thing is ridiculous. Now will somebody explain?

Mr. J. H. STITT (Selkirk): I had not intended to express my opinion on this resolution. I agree with the preamble, but not with the conclusion at all. The hon. gentleman who just sat down (Mr. Irvine) asked what the resolution meant. It means, I believe, more pay and less work. It reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in order to absorb the unemployed into industry, thus eliminating the enormous waste of enforced idleness, the hours of labour be materially reduced and the purchasing power of the masses increased.

How can the hours of labour be materially reduced and the purchasing power of the masses increased? I believe the hon. gentleman is asking this house to vote for a resolution in the vain hope that we can make something out of nothing.

There is another matter that occurs to my mind while I am on my feet. It is the habit for the official members of the Labour party to move resolutions of this kind without ever looking at the question of jurisdiction. I know when I raise that question my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) will say: There is the lawyer again. Well, Mr. Speaker, in this house we are engaged in the making of law, and we have to be governed by our own constitution. I want to thank the hon. member for North Winnipeg for having made the first statement I believe that has been made in this house by any member of the Labour party that showed any sympathy at all with lawyers. I think he said that there were even some lawyers among the unemployed and receiving relief. I agree with that statement. In the city of Winnipeg, and in part of my constituency, there are lawyers and other professional men who are on relief.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is an increased estimate for the Department of Justice this year, so possibly it will help my hon. friend.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I hope that my hon. friend will get more justice. I think that is what his idea is. I am very glad to notice that.

This whole resolution loses sight of the fact that all society and industry is organized upon a profit basis. Even the poorest and most abject of us all want to get more profit or to improve our position in life. The members of the Labour party want to improve their position in life. Until we can eradicate from human nature that element of selfishness or that attitude towards self aggrandizement which every individual has, I believe we cannot bring into being a new Jerusalem and cannot arrive at a practical solution of our problem by introducing a resolution such as the one now before us. In my constituency there are many men without employment, and I recognize that fact as well as my hon. friend from North Winnipeg. I realize that most of these men who are out of work are not in that position voluntarily, but because there is no work for them to do.

If we were to put this resolution into effect what would it mean? Would it increase the work for the workless? No; it would divide up that work, which is now too little, among a greater number. Will the members of organized labour, those people my hon. friends in the corner opposite profess to represent, agree to cut down by, say, 25 per cent their hours of labour?

Mr. HEAPS: They have done it.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I have not noticed any of them doing it. I ask this question in all seriousness, and direct it to labour members in this house: Are those employed now willing to suffer to the extent of 25 per cent depreciation in their hours of labour and a similar depreciation in the remuneration they receive? I say they are not, and that the resolution does not contain any solution whatsoever for unemployment.

I am deeply interested in this problem and should certainly like to see some solution. Any man in Canada actuated by humanitarian motives recognizes that if this question is not solved society is doomed. We are approaching the problem however in a petty manner. How can we possibly reduce hours of labour and increase the pay of our workmen, thereby increasing the cost of our commodities, and enter into the competition of world trade? Would that not mean more unemployment in Canada? Would not the six hour day and an increase in pay mean a loss of our markets abroad? This resolution ought not to apply merely to Canada but to the whole world; it might be a fit subject for discussion by the League of Nations. It represents a pious hope but, I believe, the dream of every man who is a humanitarian.

I had not intended to speak at length on this resolution, but as I have said it simply asks for more pay and less work. It asks labour to divide that bit of employment which is already too little, and seeks to introduce into this country a policy which would drive another dagger into our commercial heart, and mean the loss of our markets abroad.

Mr. SANDERSON: They are lost now.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): No, our markets are not lost. I believe we are in the happy way of, in the very near future, recovering those markets.

Mr. SANDERSON: Well, my hon. friend cannot recover anything unless he has lost it.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): For the moment I am content to admit the force of my hon. friend's logic. He has not shown any real logic, however, but only word logic.

What about our wheat? We have disposed of more of our wheat abroad than we did last year—far more. We have not lost our markets, and are in a fair way to gain others. I should like to say to my hon. friend from North Winnipeg that I represent a large number of labour people, and if he hopes to continue to represent and to serve labour in this house he should introduce a resolution within our jurisdiction, and one whereby we could accomplish something of a practical nature. We do not want mere propaganda, but something which, in the interests of labour and the people of Canada generally, will help us to solve this problem.

I consider that the resolution is nothing more than mere verbiage. I therefore oppose it. Before taking my seat however I should like to say that I believe my hon. friends from Winnipeg North and Vancouver South are actuated by high and altruistic motives. But when we try to foist upon our industrial system an abstract scheme such as the one now before us we are not trying to solve the problems of Canada but are introducing merely a resolution which means nothing, will get us nowhere and, in my humble opinion, will work to the detriment of Canada.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I oppose this resolution.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, on one occasion when a barrister was appealing before an appellate court from a judgment issued by a lower court he said to the appellate judges, "I am appealing from the judgment of Mr. Justice So-and-So." Then the judges asked him, "Have you any other reason for appealing from this judgment?" The idea contained in the resolution is one brought in from the United States, and that is one of the reasons I am not prepared to accept it. There are other reasons however which I shall undertake to outline. If we reduce the number of working hours we will not solve the problem of unemployment but will only displace it.

I have only one further remark to make, namely, that since the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) declared that if he came into power he would end unemployment, I am very much surprised that no effective steps have been taken in that direction. At the special session the first action to relieve unemployment was to apply a plaster of $20,000,000, and following that to increase the tariff. Was that good or was it bad? Events have proved the lack of wisdom in these actions. During the war many people were wounded, but the same cure was not applied to all. Different diseases require different cures, and my suggestion would be that before we discuss further the great and difficult problem of unemployment an inventory be made of all our unemployed, setting out their previous occupations, reasons for unemployment and the concerns for whom they were working before they became unemployed. To my mind those facts should be known before any attempt is made to cure the evil. Undoubtedly such a survey would cost money, but having been done we would know, once and for all, exactly where we stand. I remember having read last year statements from the then Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) to the effect that within a few months we would hear no more about unemployment, that everyone would have work to do and would be employed at some work for which he was fitted. The statistics we have received are to the effect that while the minister was making such statements the figures from his own department told a different story. For that reason I suggest to the Prime Minister—who, I am happy to say, is with us for another few seconds—and to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), to consider my suggestion and make an inventory of the unemployed. Undoubtedly expenditures would be necessary, but as a result of their efforts they would be in a position to give to the house information to which we are entitled, and would be in a better position to find a remedy for this terrible disease.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, should the House be asked to sanction the motion under discussion, I shall be forced to vote against it. I therefore wish to give, briefly, the reasons which will compel me to do so. One of these is that this resolution will not serve the purpose sought.

The hon. member who has moved this resolution stated that he wishes to increase the purchasing power of the masses. I do not think that this purchasing power will be enhanced by decreasing the working hours or by paying the labourers more to do less work.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): In my opinion the only possible way to attain this end is to increase the purchasing power of the most numerous class in Canada: the farmers whom I have the honour of representing in this House.

While butter, eggs and other farm products sell at the present low prices and manufactured articles have not come down to the same low level, it is useless to discuss the raising of the purchasing power of the people. In order to increase such a power it would be necessary that the farmers found it possible to purchase these manufactured articles, and the latter will only be able to do so when their products fetch better prices. When farmers are given the means, when the agricultural class feels prosperous, there will be work for the manufacturers and workmen. The farming class must first be relieved because they are the most numerous in the community, they are the consumers, and it is the welfare of that class which is the foundation of the nation's prosperity.

I find that in the estimates brought down in the House, to-day, the grants to agriculture have been decreased by about one-third, while the estimates for National Defence show only a decrease of one-fifth. If the Government really intended to increase the purchasing power of the people, instead of decreasing the grants to agriculture this year, it should have increased them, it should have provided new markets for farm products and endeavoured to help the farmers to weather the present crisis.

While the whole world is discussing disarmament, it seems to me that the estimates of the National Defence could have been cut down by one-third, two-thirds or four-fifths, and that this amount could have been credited to agriculture. Thus the purchasing power of the Canadian people would have been enhanced, and to some extent the crisis would have been relieved. For these reasons briefly mentioned, I do not intend to support this resolution.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will engage the attention of the house only a few moments with respect to this resolution. I think it obvious that both inside and outside this chamber there are two distinct schools of thought with respect to labour. The followers of one school are content to toil and by their thrift to advance themselves, while those of the other school are probably drifting the opposite way. There is not any doubt in my mind that every member of this house is anxious to seek some means whereby those who depend upon their livelihood in industry, and consequently upon the activities of those who employ them, shall be employed and remunerated at such a rate that they will be able to take their place in the life of their country, support their families, and carrying on as good citizens, in the aggregate help to build up a strong and great nation. No one will deny that that is the right of every Canadian citizen. I am not at all in agreement with those who make the statement that leaders of industry direct their attention wholly to profits and do not concern themselves with the interests of their employees. During my lifetime I have been associated with leaders of industry, although I must confess that I have never reaped the fabulous rewards from that contact that I have heard referred to in this house. In fact, in the short time that I have been a member, I have heard more of the huge profits that leaders of industry make than I ever learned of when I was outside and had some contact with those same men. Undoubtedly there is truth in what those who claim to be the exponents of labour say, that from time to time as depression falls upon us, and even in prosperous times, a section of our workingmen do not receive adequate remuneration for their labour.

So far as the resolution is concerned, I am persuaded that this parliament can do but little to carry into effect what it proposes. I am sure hon. members realize that if we attempted to carry out what is proposed we would be immediately confronted with protests on the part of the provinces that we were infringing their rights, because while we are a federal union we are not a legislative union, and the provinces jealously guard the rights that were conferred upon them at confederation. It is quite true that the Treaty of Versailles did in terms suggest that all the nations of the world should get together in some way—it was not stated specifically how they should do it—and pass laws that would destroy the possibility of war and industrial conflict. In fact, it seemed to be the expectation that almost every ill that besets the human race would be entirely remedied by the passage of resolutions. Amongst others, this very subject was dealt with in that treaty. It has been discussed in this house before, and I presume it will be discussed again. In my view the federal parliament has not within its legislative power the right to do what the resolution proposes. True it is that by conference with the provinces and by a closer understanding between industry and labour great strides have been made in improving industrial conditions, and probably still greater strides will be made in the future. But when any hon. member stands up in this house and suggests that we can put the farmer on a five hour day, then I must confidently assert that he does not know very much about farming. Such a proposal is utterly impossible and cannot be worked out. With respect to the discussions that have taken place as to the reduction of the hours of labour, no one has suggested to what point they shall be reduced, or whether all industries shall be treated alike. On the other hand no one has suggested any solution to the problem of what to do with the resultant increase in the products of industry. Who is to buy them if prices go up? It seems to me that in past years I have heard the subject matter of this resolution discussed many times by economists, and I note that they found the same trouble in arriving at a solution that I have always found—the question whether it was going to be of any material help to the people concerned.

Just in passing let me say this: I was impressed by the suggestion made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt). If it means anything, this resolution is very comprehensive in its terms. It covers more than Canada; it is universal in its application if it can be applied at all, and I am at an utter loss to know what measures this house could bring down that would be effective. I think perhaps we have learned something from the discussion that has taken place, but I know of no measure that could be introduced in this house that would bring to fruition the idea contained in the resolution. The one burden, if you call it that, which is cast upon us at all times, and I think particularly at times like these, is to take care of the people within our boundaries and to see that their future is not imperilled by any conscious act of any government which is in power in this country. I wonder at times, however, if those who take the part of labour stop when their advocacy ceases, or if their concrete actions reflect the same ardour. In the last hour or two I have surveyed the records of the number of people brought into this country prior to that fateful July 28, 1930, in order to see to what extent those who take the part of labour really had labour at heart in the two or three years prior to that date. I find that one very ardent advocate of labour in this house, through his applications for permits for the admission of people into Canada, brought into this country 345 people, all of whom entered into some form of industry although each was supposed to take up agriculture. If every member and every defeated candidate had availed himself of a similar privilege our labour problem in this country would have been increased by 169,050 people. That is just a passing observation, but I think those who advocate the position of labour should be extremely careful to see that their interest does not cease with a verbal advocacy.

With respect to the resolution itself, in my view—and I think it is shared by those who have given this subject any considerable thought—this House of Commons has not the legislative power to bring in a measure that would carry into effect what is suggested in the resolution, and I seriously doubt if any committee of this house or any committee of economists could sit about a table and devise a scheme that would apply to all the different forms of industry and agriculture, giving effect to the idea contained in this resolution. I think at this time the house would be well advised to let the resolution drop, with the discussion that has taken place so far in connection with it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HEAPS: Before the debate is resumed, Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. When the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) spoke prior to the recess he referred to a large number of permits that had been obtained by someone to allow immigrants to come into Canada. The number he mentioned was, I believe, 369. He did not say who it was—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. HEAPS: At the moment I am speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the Minister of Labour was speaking the hon. member should then have raised the question of privilege; that was his opportunity. He has the right to close the debate, but he is not in order now in speaking to a question of privilege.

Mr. HEAPS: This is purely a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker. There may not be an opportunity of closing the debate if it goes on to eleven o'clock, and I thought I would take the first opportunity of referring to a statement which no doubt a great many hon. members thought was directed to myself.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order and I must ask him to take his seat.

Mr. HEAPS: This is the first time I have known a member to be out of order on a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is not the proper time for the hon. member to raise the question, which is not one of privilege.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): It will be agreed, I think, that the thanks of this house are due the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) for having brought this resolution before the house at this early date in the session, because, as has been said, if anything is to be done towards relieving the unemployed or bringing in measures to meet the present situation in a definite way, the sooner the house gets down to business the sooner we shall accomplish something.

I had not intended to speak on this subject to-night for the reason that I have a severe cold. Indeed, I purposely allowed my motion to stand, although it is at the head of the order paper, in order that the motion moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg might have precedence. Having, however, listened to a few of the speeches that have been made on this question to-day I thought that I ought at least to put myself on record with reference to some of the statements we have heard. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol), speaking to this resolution, fully reviewed the question from the industrialist side and he concluded his discourse by saying that he would be very favourable to this resolution or one of this kind, but at some time in the future when conditions are better. My only comment on that is usually, when times are better and people are prosperous, we are told that there is no need for such legislation. It seems to me, therefore, that now is the time, when the need is manifest, that we should do something towards relieving unemployment or, as the Prime Minister would say, ending unemployment.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt), who I am sorry is not in his place at the moment, very frankly said that he was absolutely against this resolution, and he gave as his reason that we had not the jurisdiction in this parliament, that it was a matter that should come within the provinces. Well, I remember making a similar statement on one occasion and I was not only laughed at but ridiculed, not merely from the opposition benches at that time but on the public platform. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), if I recall rightly, made a similar statement; he said in effect, whot can we do? He was at a loss to know what measures could be taken in this house to cope with the situation as presented in the resolution. The hon. member for Selkirk finished his speech by saying that if some member would introduce a resolution that came within the jurisdiction of this parliament he would be pleased to support it. I had the honour to introduce such a resolution at the last session, providing for the consummation of the treaty of Versailles with respect to hours of labour, and the Minister of Justice, then acting as leader of the house, very cordially agreed that the government could accept such a resolution. The resolution is being introduced again this session, and the reason is that the hon. member for Selkirk undertook at the last session to talk the matter out at eleven o'clock, thereby depriving parliament of the opportunity of putting its stamp of approval on the eight-hour day.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I object to that statement, Mr. Speaker. I was a new member of the house. Hon. gentlemen opposite had spoken for hours and hours; I had not spoken and I had only ten minutes in which to present my views. I think the hon. gentleman's remarks are a deliberate misinterpretation of the situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan), I take it, does not intend to imply that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) spoke as he did with the object of killing the resolution.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, I make that statement here and now, and I am not the only one—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not impute that motive to the hon. member for Selkirk. It may have been that speaking as he did on that occasion had the effect suggested, but the hon. member must not impute that motive.

Mr. HEENAN: It was drawn to his attention at one minute to eleven o'clock that if he spoke another minute the resolution would be killed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Even so, he might not have concluded his speech. I must ask the hon. member to withdraw the imputation.

Mr. HEENAN: I withdraw the imputation, Mr. Speaker. Now, I have in my hand the Canadian Unionist of October 1931, which gives the attitude of the government. My speech is reported in full, and the conclusion of the report is this:

> Although Mr. Heenan's motion had the support of all parties, it was deliberately talked out by J. H. Stitt, the Conservative member for Selkirk, self-styled friend of the workers.

So that we have this resolution before the house again because of the fact that the hon. member did talk out the previous one, whether or not he intended to.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has said over and over again, especially during the election time, that if the federal government did its duty no man or woman who was willing to work should do without work. The Minister of Labour now stands in his place, after the government has failed to end unemployment, and says that he doubts very much whether this house can do anything in the matter as regards providing measures to relieve unemployment, or providing for shorter hours, or assimilating workers in industry. If I remember rightly, the present Prime Minister once said that we had the power; he said that if this parliament wished to insert a provision in our tariff legislation to provide for shorter hours or for any other condition with regard to workers, it had the power to do so. It appears, therefore, that we have now what is known as governmental solidarity, the present Prime Minister taking the view that we have the power and the Minister of Labour declaring that he does not see anything within the four walls of parliament that could give us that power.

The Minister of Labour also made certain references to the farming community. If I remember rightly, he said: Show me where a shorter working day could be applied to agriculture. Well, I know that the present Minister of Labour has not been in his position very long and that is the excuse I would make for him; because he will find there is no labour delegation or labour platform that has ever suggested that a shorter working day should apply to agriculture. Indeed, the treaty of Versailles and the conventions arising out of it all exempted the agriculturists from the eight-hour day, so that there is no necessity for bringing up that bogey with respect to the eight-hour or the shorter working day as applied to agriculture.

The Minister of Labour concluded his observations by saying that he was at a loss to know what measures could be taken to reduce the hours of labour, which is really what the resolution calls for. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), when he was leader of the opposition, announced a policy, as I stated before, that we could take measures by way of providing in the tariff legislation that any industry that secured the protection afforded by such legislation should manifest to the government or some commission that it was maintaining the eight-hour day, or the six-hour day or any hour day that the government might wish to impose. They could do all that is possible to stop the reduction in wages that is taking place all over Canada, but so far there is in this country, generally speaking, a reduction in wages ranging anywhere from ten to twenty-five per cent, and the government, so far as I am aware, have not taken any measures whatever to stop or to try to stop it. It is true some members of the cabinet have asked publicly that employers should keep on as many employees as possible during this period of depression and that they should not take advantage of the depressed times to reduce wages; but notwithstanding that, reductions in wages have taken place all over Canada just the same. Indeed, the government itself is leading the way by dismissing many men from the public service, and by making a reduction in wages.

Our railroad men, who are just now suffering a reduction of ten per cent, had, when the Conservatives were in power in 1921, to take a reduction to the extent of 12 1-2 per cent in wages, or about $45,000,000 a year. That is what they contributed to the prosperity of the country. It is true that they got back upwards of six per cent of that between 1927 and 1930, but now they are again faced with the ten per cent reduction in wages, and I ask the Minister of Labour or any other member of the government: what have they done to prevent that reduction in wages?

The railroads of Canada are under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, and I have yet to hear of or see one iota of action the government have taken to stop that reduction in wages. Indeed, they have accepted the report of a board of conciliation and investigation which practically discards the announced policy and principle of the federal government with respect to wages as applied to railroad men. I have under my hand a copy of an order in council dated 16th July, 1918. I do not want to read it all because it is a very lengthy document, but in it there is this principle announced:

> And it further appears that the railroad companies are of the view that the wages paid railway employees in Canada ought to be the same as that adopted in corresponding territories in the United States, as the class of work is the same in both countries.

That is an announced principle which was adopted by the governor general in council. This year the government appoints a board of conciliation and investigation and we have this reference:

> As regards the employees' second point, we feel that railway basic wage rates in Canada must be based on conditions in Canada and not in the United States. We feel that the capacity to earn revenue must be an important element in the payment of wages, and in the United States railway earning conditions are substantially different from those of Canadian railways.

I have yet to hear some protest from either the Minister of Labour or any other member of the government with respect to that recommendation of the board of conciliation which discards the principle that they themselves enunciated in 1918. The Canadian railroad men are loyal to this country. As I said, they contributed $45,000,000 annually out of their wages by taking the reduction in 1921. They have accepted the reduction this year because of their loyalty to the country, because they have heard politicians tell them from every platform and in the House of Commons that prosperity is just around the corner and they are loath to be the ones that would attempt to put a drag on that prosperity from coming around that corner.

But, as I said, the government of Canada has jurisdiction over the railways. They could and the railway companies could have found on the railways many other avenues where they could have saved, but they started to reduce wages. If you read the newspapers of this country you will find that very few of the writers have much knowledge with respect to the earnings of railroad men or the conditions of their employment. They take one or two or a dozen of the highest paid men on the highest paid runs and they put down their earnings as an average for the railroad men. They forget there are between 25,000 and 30,000 railroad men who have worked ten and twenty years, many of whom work only three or at most four months a year, and who are laid off because of seasonal traffic. They also forget at the present time there is upwards of $200,000,000 worth of rolling stock that is tied up on the side tracks, not used, that has to be paid for with interest and that is charged up to the railroad companies, and yet the railroad men's wages are the first to be attacked. They forget the millions of dollars tied up in the terminals, in the shops, in equipment of all kinds, that have been paid for with interest out of the revenues of the railroad companies, and that is lying idle, and the only thing it seems that they can save on, is the railroad men's wages.

I want to point this out very clearly, because the board has taken the position that a railroad man's wages in Canada ought not to be on a par with those that are earned in the United States. The railroad men of this country are not only loyal but efficient. We have to compare the operation of our Canadian railroads with the operation of those of the United States, because they are the only ones that are comparable, the railroads of Canada and the United States being equipped to haul long trains long distances, whereas the European railroads are equipped to haul short trains short distances. It is on record to-day that the railway men of Canada handle about twelve thousand tons of freight per man per mile more than do the railroad men in the United States. Yet we have a board appointed by the government bringing in a recommendation that, notwithstanding this display of efficiency and loyalty, the wages of the railroad men of Canada are not entitled to be put on the same basis as those of the railroad men of the United States.

There is no necessity to read this resolution again. It simply asks the government to submit the necessary measures to the house. The Minister of Labour says that he does not agree with the resolution. I hope he does not speak for the whole government. I hope we are not going to have government solidarity on this occasion, because there are many things that could be done. The government has power to bring in measures reducing the hours of work in industry under its tariff legislation. They have power to initiate a program of public works to be gone on with to provide work for the unemployed. They have power to go on with the trans-Canada highway, which they promised the electors of this country. They have many opportunities. Having failed in their promise to end unemployment, having failed to live up to the principle which they enunciated that if the government of Canada did its duty every man and woman in this country willing to work would have the opportunity to work; having failed miserably in all these things we have the spectacle of the Minister of Labour standing in his place to-day—not speaking for the government—and saying: I am at a loss to know what we can do in the matter.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): I wish to make a few remarks in connection with this resolution. Let me say at the outset that I am in sympathy with labour in its effort to secure both high wages and shorter hours of labour. That has been the cry for years—less work and more pay. But I agree thoroughly with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) that this resolution is no solution whatever for the problem of unemployment. I was rather surprised, however, that the Minister of Labour when he spoke on this question did not speak with more assurance as to what was the proper remedy for unemployment. I know that before the election in 1930 the government had no doubt whatever as to what the cure for unemployment was. Then they told us that while the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) promised to consider the problem of unemployment, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett)—and he himself said so—would end unemployment; and the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said at Regina that if the Conservatives were returned to power they would end unemployment in three days.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, no.

Mr. DONNELLY: We do not find that same assurance now. They are not so certain about it. The Minister of Labour says that he does not know what can be done to cure this unemployment problem. Apparently it is a different proposition entirely from what it was before the election.

While I am in sympathy with labour in desiring to see this unemployment problem solved so that they can get more pay and less work, I have very little sympathy with this government which made such rash pre-election promises, for no other purpose, apparently, than to obtain office; because they must have known that they could not do the things they promised. While we hear different men speaking about this problem of unemployment throughout the country, the Minister of Labour tells us that he does not know anything about a solution for it. He says that he has listened to several economists speaking on it and that apparently the economists, one and all, were unable to lay their finger on the solution of the problem of unemployment. Well, Mr. Speaker, he must have been listening to the wrong kind of economists, because for the last twenty years economists have been telling us the very thing to cure unemployment. They have been preaching it through all these years, but they have been a voice crying in the wilderness. If you listen to economists to-day you will hear them say that there is a world-wide depression and that it has been brought about by fiscal policies that restrict trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DONNELLY: My hon. friends laugh. I will read something to them and probably they will laugh on the other side of their faces. This is from a bulletin published by the Chase National bank of the city of New York. It is an article on the tariff and the world depression by Mr. Benjamin M. Anderson, economist of that bank. He says:

> We are in the midst of a severe business depression which is world wide. The most serious obstacle in the way of early recovery is the state of our foreign trade. The most serious obstacle in the way of the revival of our foreign trade is our high protective tariffs. the quickest way to get out of the existing depression is to reduce our tariffs so that our foreign customers may sell more goods here and get more dollars with which to pay interest upon their debts to us and with which to buy our goods. If we do not buy we cannot sell. If we do not buy enough we cannot sell enough.

I do not hear my hon. friends laughing now. Then listen to this:

> Bankers and economists have been telling the country this ever since the world war, but the country has been slow in learning the lesson.

That lesson is being brought home to us to-day, and if we wish to cure unemployment and get out of the depression in which we find ourselves to-day there is only one way. If we want to sell more we must buy more. The Prime Minister said the other day that the only way to get a favourable balance of trade was to cut down our imports. Why, Mr. Speaker, any child knows that there is another way. Why not increase our exports? There are two ways of doing it. You can get a favourable balance of trade by increasing exports just as well as by cutting down our imports and throttling business. If we had more exports we would find our markets increasing all over the world and our labourers would be employed in our factories and in our means of transportation.

We hear a lot about the new factories that are coming to this country and of the improvement that has taken place under the higher tariff, but we had the spectacle of the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand) rising in the house this afternoon and saying: In my constituency it is not a case of a shorter day or a shorter week; it is a case of no work. Yet we are being told that the factories in the industrial centres are working overtime on account of this great tariff. When I listened to the speech of the Prime Minister before the last election I thought there was going to be no trouble whatever. He said that the country was in a terrible condition, that it was very sick. He reminded me of a physician who goes to see a patient suffering from fever, accompanied by a severe headache. He says to his patient: I will give you this pill for your headache and this bottle of medicine to cure your permanent disease. In the same way the Prime Minister in September 1930 called a special session. He was the great physician who was going to cure unemployment. He said to his patient: I am going to give you this temporary relief, this small pill of $20,000,000 which will ease your unemployment for a while, and then here is a bottle of dope which is the great cure that is going to make you young and well. Take that and everything will be all right again. This bottle of dope is labelled "higher tariffs." We have been taking the medicine steadily; we had more of it last session, and the public is still asking for more. We are still getting bigger and bigger doses of that permanent cure, and yet the patient is getting sicker and sicker every day, until at last the Prime Minister himself has thrown up his hands and has had to admit, as he did when speaking to a meeting of one of the United Churches lately: Nothing but the grace of God, he said, can save this country. He admits he is wrong. He said that he would cure unemployment or perish in the attempt. Well, he is perishing in the attempt. He is failing to cure unemployment. I say we are not going to have better times or any improvement in this country until we increase our export markets. When we increase our exports we will begin to buy more, and when we begin to buy more we will sell more. At a time when we begin to buy and sell more and begin to trade more with our neighbouring countries, conditions will improve. The Liberal policy as enunciated by Hon. Charles Dunning indicated that we were willing to trade with those who would trade with us; that is the Liberal policy, and that is the policy to which we are pledged to-day.

Mr. PORTEOUS: I should like to ask the hon. member a question: How much did the Liberal government increase the exports of agricultural products in nine years?

Mr. DONNELLY: My hon. friend may consult the Canada Year Book to get that information; I am sorry I have not the information under my hand. I wish to tell him however that between the years 1921 and 1929 there was an increase of about 50 per cent, and I will add that Canada never was more prosperous than during those years. I will say more than that; I will tell my hon. friend that we took power at a time of depression and brought conditions back to prosperity.

Let us survey the history of Canada for the last thirty-five years; for the benefit of my hon. friend I should be pleased to trace it. Back in the year 1895 we were suffering from a depression, and at that time we had a Conservative government. In 1896 the Liberal party came into power, and through Sir Wilfrid Laurier a Liberal policy was put into effect whereby we showed a willingness to trade with those who would trade with us. We put into effect a British preferential tariff; we lowered the duty; and prosperity in Canada extended to the year 1911. At that time we tried to put into effect the very same policy that the Liberal party has always preached, to trade with those who trade with us. We were willing to put through a measure of reciprocity to enable freer trade with the United States. Out in the west however a lack of patriotism was preached and as a result we were defeated. No greater calamity ever overtook this country than the rejection of reciprocity. The people realize that to-day, and our agriculturists sincerely believe it. From the years 1911 to 1914 Canada went through another period of depression, and conditions became worse and worse until war broke out. When the war was over and the Conservative party took over the reins of power we entered another period of depression which became worse and worse until the Liberal party again took office in 1921. They proceeded to put into effect the very same policy they had always believed in, that of trading with those who would trade with us. Conditions became better and better from year to year until the last election, when our Conservative friends obtained a majority, and as a result trade has been restricted and we are again in a period of depression. If my hon. friends will look back over the past thirty-five years they will find that not once has there been prosperity during the regime of a Conservative government. If any of my hon. friends dispute that fact I challenge them to tell me the years, during the last thirty-five years, when during the time of a Conservative government we have had prosperity.

May I say to my hon. friend who interrupted that he will have the opportunity to speak when I have resumed my seat, and I ask him to tell me the years when we have had prosperity. Any prosperity Canada has enjoyed has been under a Liberal government, and any prosperity we will ever have will be under a Liberal government. The economics of my hon. friends opposite are altogether wrong; their principles are wrong. They cannot restrict trade and have prosperity.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to have an improvement in this unfortunate condition of unemployment there is only one way to do it, namely to cut down our tariff wall and trade with those who will trade with us. If we do that we will give employment to our people and return the country to that state of prosperity it enjoyed before the last election.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word concerning this very important resolution. Whether we agree with the wording of the resolution or the theory advocated by its mover (Mr. Heaps) we must admit that the subject matter is of great importance. What could be more important at this time than the question of employment for the masses of our people? In my opinion parliament would be well advised to give more heed to and spend more time in discussing this subject.

One point has not been brought out in the various arguments advanced; I refer to the increasing numbers of our young men and women who upon reaching manhood and womanhood can find no useful employment, be they ever so eager to procure it. I have talked with many men and women who are almost distracted with the grave problem of unemployment which is affecting their grown up sons and daughters who find they have nothing to do and have to remain at home in idleness. I realize there are some hon. members in this house who believe that if we only wait a little while everything will turn out all right and matters will be adjusted. Perhaps they believe the tariff will solve our unemployment problem, if we but have the patience to wait. I am glad to say that I for one do not share those views; for I am of opinion that with our modern labour saving machinery, industry, as we know it, will never again be able to absorb and give employment to the millions of able-bodied men and women throughout the world who desire it. I believe that should be borne in mind by the heads of governments and should be the basis from which to begin in an endeavour to find employment for those who must have it.

I am not sure whether or not the proposed resolution, if put into practice, would solve the difficulty, because as yet no one has been able to determine either by mathematics or by statistics just how many hours workers would have to be employed so that everyone might be engaged. I am firmly convinced however that if no attempt is made to solve the difficulty it will not solve itself, and I am wondering how much worse conditions have to become in Canada before some action, different from that which has been taken, will be taken to cope with the problem of unemployment. Conditions would be much better in my opinion if fewer hours of labour were necessary, coupled with the control of wealth, which is now in the hands of only a few. In that way employment would be given to greater numbers. If conditions do not improve the lesser number of our people engaged in occupations and receiving wages will be taxed to support the great numbers who, through no fault of their own, cannot procure suitable or, in fact, any employment and are forced to partake of charity. The cry of the masses must be heard, and cannot much longer be ignored.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, considering this question of unemployment I think we would do well to carry our minds back to those primitive times when each family was a self-contained economic unit, cultivated a small piece of ground with implements of their own fashioning, built their own houses out of such material as could be readily found; when the furniture was made from blocks of wood chopped off the end of a log, when clothing was made from wool sheared from their own sheep, spun and woven into cloth, and fashioned into garments by the women of the household, and when everything was produced in the home. In those days there was no unemployment; there was plenty of work for everybody. If nature was kind and gave a fruitful harvest there was plenty to eat and plenty to wear. If nature was unkind and the crops in any particular locality failed, starvation stared them in the face; for there were no facilities to bring goods from a distance. I say there was no unemployment at that time; everybody had to work hard, long hours for a very meagre subsistence.

Compare the standard of living of an ordinary citizen in those days with the standard of living of an ordinary citizen to-day. Then he lived in a hovel with probably a thatched roof and a mud floor, with hardly any window, perhaps a sheepskin nailed over a hole in the wall, and a blanket for a door. He had no reading matter, no opportunities for education, no fine raiment, no musical instruments —something that we to-day consider necessary for a civilized being to enjoy life. Go into the home of an ordinary workingman to-day and you will find that it is a palace compared with what his predecessor lived in; you will find he has light, books to read, a telephone, a piano, a radio, opportunities for education—many things that even the richest could not enjoy in those days.

I ask you, what has brought about this change in the condition of the workingman? It resulted from the division of labour from improved methods of production. It was found that a man making his own tools, cultivating his own farm, shoeing his own horse, building his own house, making his own furniture, could not do much of anything in a given time. It was found that by a division of labour, by some men confining their attention to the production of those things which they could produce to the best advantage, while others confined their attention to the production of other things in which they excelled, it was possible to increase the total production of the human race manyfold. That process continued and was accelerated from time to time, until to-day men specialize in one branch of any particular industry. This has brought about a vast increase in the production of all kinds of wealth—much more wealth of every kind is now available for the consumption of the human race. The result is a much higher standard of living, and the world is able to sustain many times the population she could sustain in those days, and many times what she could sustain to-day were it not for these modern labour-saving devices.

I do not agree with those who say there is overproduction of wealth to-day; there is no overproduction of wealth. I do not agree with those who say we have solved the problem of production; we have not. We have not come anywhere near solving the problem of producing all the goods that the world can consume. Our capacity to consume food is limited by the capacity of our stomachs; but our capacity to consume other commodities is unlimited. Overproduction of all goods? A thousand million people in the world to-day are not getting enough to eat. If you could add one slice of bread at each meal for those people it would require an additional two thousand million bushels of wheat a year. Can there be any overproduction of wheat while a condition like that exists? Overproduction of clothing? There are ten million people in Canada, and nine million, nine hundred thousand of them would do well to have more clothes. The same is true of our houses, our furniture, everything. There is no overproduction of wealth in the world to-day, and any scheme that aims to curtail the production of wealth will aggravate unemployment and lower the standard of living.

Now, we have seen that this division of labour and improvement in methods of production by improved machinery and otherwise has made it possible to produce many times more wealth than before. But that presupposes that those who produce one kind of wealth must be in a position to exchange it with those who produce another kind of wealth. Bring about these conditions where those who produce a surplus of wealth can exchange their surplus with those who produce a surplus of other wealth, and you have solved the problem of unemployment. Why is it, then, that we have unemployment? Because something stops us from exchanging the goods which we produce in abundance for the goods that we require and that other people produce in abundance. We in Canada can produce the basic products in abundance—lumber, pulpwood, newsprint, fish, minerals, wheat and so on; other countries can produce other things in abundance; but so long as governments interfere and say, "We will not allow you to exchange the things that you have to sell for the things that other people have to sell," just so long will there be unemployment.

An hon. MEMBER: Tariffs.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, tariffs. I thank my hon. friend for the suggestion. Tariffs, I say, are the main cause of all our troubles. Let me give you an illustration. A certain farmer in a dried-out district of Saskatchewan last year planted a field of potatoes in the bed of a lake that had gone dry; he harvested a good crop; nobody else in the neighbourhood had any potatoes; that farmer has more potatoes than he can use, he has potatoes to sell, but he cannot sell a bushel of them.

Why? Overproduction of potatoes? No, there is an actual scarcity of potatoes in that district. Why cannot he sell them? Because his neighbours have nothing to give him in exchange. Do you expect a man who produces one thing to give it away to somebody else who has nothing to give him in return? No. Those who produce one commodity must be in a position to exchange with those who produce something else.

We in Canada produce certain things; other people in other countries produce other things. The unemployed in Canada are not in a position to give us anything for the goods that the employed people are producing. If those who are producing in Canada were permitted to exchange their products for the products of the people of other countries, they would be able to purchase more goods in Canada, they would be able to enlarge their operations, they would be able to employ more men, and unemployment would disappear. Any attempt to remedy unemployment by decreasing the amount of wealth produced would have the very opposite effect; but every step taken to remove the trade barriers which prevent those who have wealth from exchanging it for other forms of wealth that others have to sell is a step toward the removal of unemployment. Until these barriers are done away with, we will have unemployment, and we will have it in worse form as time goes on.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I was very glad to observe that those who have participated in this debate have expressed so much sympathy with the working people. We are thankful for those expressions, but we should like something more definite and concrete to help the unemployed—something more than sympathy. With the argument of the last speaker (Mr. Young) I do not altogether agree. I am of the opinion that if the whole world at the present time went entirely on a free trade basis there still would be unemployment. I have always held the view that in tariffs we shall not find a solution for the problem of unemployment. Also we have not merely to deal with the question of production. When speaking to my resolution I said that the question of production was solved to-day, I did not mean for one moment to imply that we have too much in the way of commodities. Let us assume that every human being able to work were harnessed to some form of industry and producing something of a useful nature. In a very limited time we could produce more than enough to satisfy all our requirements, and I think on that basis four hours of work a day would be more than sufficient to satisfy human requirements, including those of the farmers.

Mr. YOUNG: Where is your evidence?

Mr. HEAPS: I might as well ask my hon. friend what evidence he has that everyone would be happy if the world went on a free trade basis. I think the tremendous increase in production, our modern methods and machine equipment which is displacing labour, are sufficient proofs of the statement I am making to the house.

So the problem is not one of production or of exchange; it is a problem of distribution. If a man is working for wages and is getting only one-fifth or one-quarter of what he produces, it would be the same if he were living under protection or under free trade, and until we can break down that spread between what a man receives in wages and the value of what he produces, in my opinion, there is no hope of solving the problem of unemployment.

Something has been said during the course of this debate with regard to jurisdiction. I recognize the limitations imposed on this parliament; I recognize the difficulties connected with jurisdiction with which we are confronted, but if we are always to set up that question of jurisdiction I am afraid it will be very difficult for us to make much progress in this country. I remember that a few years ago, when the question of old age pensions was raised in the house, we were met with the plea of lack of jurisdiction, but when parliament determined to provide the aged people of this country with old age pensions, ways and means were found to overcome that difficulty. Just as we overcame the question of jurisdiction in regard to old age pensions, so I am satisfied we could overcome the difficulty of jurisdiction which faces us in connection with this problem, once the house is determined to do so.

Credit has been taken for what has been done by the government in order to assist the unemployment situation. I wish to say here that I greatly appreciate what has been done by the government during the past twelve or eighteen months in helping the municipalities and the provinces to deal with this unemployment problem, but when I make that statement that is as far as I can go. What they are doing is in no way a solution of the problem; it deals in no fundamental way with this great question. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that the continual giving of these doles and the increase in our national debt make it very difficult to cope with the problem or to get any permanent solution. I think we are simply aggravating the situation.

When we look at the estimates presented to the house this afternoon we find a tremendous decrease in all expenditures for the ensuing year. There are one or two cases where increases have been made, however. One case is the interest on the national debt, which has been increased by about $13,000,000. Another case of an increase is the estimates for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which have gone up approximately $500,000. That is where our money goes, and I want to say that when we start to economize on wages we are starting at the wrong end. We should do something about those tremendous interest charges, and I think if we did so we would be doing a good thing for Canada.

I was very much disappointed in the statement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). I had hoped that on an occasion such as this, when we are having our first discussion of this important problem of unemployment, at least the minister would have told this house and the hundreds of thousands of men and women out of work what the government intend to do, but in his remarks there was not one word or one syllable which would give a ray of hope in this connection. I am very sorry that this was so; I am sorry the government have taken that attitude. I was looking for some constructive proposal, some word as to what the government intend doing during the coming year in order to deal with this extremely difficult and, I might add, menacing situation.

We have been told of the great increase in the prosperity of the workers; we have heard of the homes they own, of the electric lights they possess, of the radios, the washing machines and other articles found in their homes. Most of these articles in the average homes are purchased on the instalment plan, and many of them are not paid for. When we talk of the working people owning their homes we forget that in most cases there are very big mortgages on them. But may I give a little information which came to me only a day or two ago in order to show the conditions which exist in some homes. This information was contained in a letter from a very authentic source. It is expected that in the city of Winnipeg in the near future 1,500 children will be born in homes where there is hardly a rag in the house with which to clothe them. That is an actual situation, yet our Minister of Labour speaks about building up a strong nation. There is no one in this house who more earnestly desires that end to be brought about than the members representing the Labour party, but when children are born under the conditions I have just described, I ask: what chance have they of growing up into decent, strong, vigorous Canadian men and women? Their chances are very slim indeed.

Some people were surprised that I should introduce a resolution of this kind; they asked what good it would do the farmer. I am free to admit that offhand I cannot say how this is going to affect the farmer; I do not know whether it will be a detriment or a help to him. But if the farmer to-day has nothing but a load of debt, as I am told by farmer members of this house, I do not see how this resolution could affect him in any harmful way at all. On the other hand, if it has the effect of increasing the purchasing power of the great masses of the people, it might be of some benefit to the farmer in this country as well.

I believe I am safe in saying that in introducing this resolution I am voicing the opinions of every shade of labour thought in Canada. There is hardly a labour organization in this country that has not gone on record as being in favour of a shorter working day, and at the same time requesting an increase in their purchasing power. Within the last few weeks a delegation from the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the largest body of organized labour in this country, waited on the government with a memorandum which included a request for a six hour day. That request has been made now for quite a number of years past. Under these circumstances, therefore, when, as I feel, I am speaking here to-night for practically the whole of organized and the great part of unorganized labour in the country, I regret that I cannot see my way to withdraw the resolution. I believe that within the confines of the resolution are contained the very things that are vital so far as the workers are concerned.

And now may I make one reference to a statement made by the Minister of Labour to-day. He stated something about a member of this house, interested in labour questions, having received 369 permits—I believe that was the number he gave—to enable persons to go on farms, those persons having ultimately found their way to the cities. I believe that was the statement he made, and the natural inference was left that I, having brought this question up to-day, was the member who had asked for these 369 permits. I need hardly assure the house that this is not the case, and therefore I take this opportunity of correcting that impression, if any hon. members may have had it.

For the reasons I have given, Mr. Speaker, I cannot withdraw the resolution.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask the Minister of Labour who the member was that obtained over 300 permits for the purpose stated?

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask a question of the mover of the resolution (Mr. Heaps) before he takes his seat?

Mr. McINTOSH: Let the minister answer my question first.

Mr. IRVINE: I am asking the mover of the resolution a question. What is the meaning of the resolution? Is it, as I presume, an entire change in the system which the hon. gentleman is asking for, or does he think it practicable to carry out his suggestion under the present economic system?

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member is practically asking me to make a speech—that is, if I am to reply to his question. I think I dealt with that aspect of the subject in the concluding part of my remarks this afternoon.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. McINTOSH: I asked one of the responsible ministers of the crown a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is entirely within the discretion of the minister to reply or not, as he pleases.

Mr. STEVENS: The debate is closed.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It was not a fair statement.

Motion negatived.

STABILIZATION OF CURRENCY

PROPOSAL FOR CONSIDERATION ON AGENDA OF IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, if the empire is to become an economic unit, the stabilization of currency within the empire is very important and should be one of the first questions for consideration on the agenda of the Imperial conference at its meeting in July next.

He said: I realize, in proposing this resolution, that I am not at all competent to discuss it adequately, but I regard it as so important to our country at the present time that at least it should receive some consideration in this house. I understand that some other hon. member desired to move a similar resolution, omitting the words, "if the empire is to become an economic unit." It is immaterial to me whether those words remain in the resolution or not, and with the consent of the house I am willing to leave them out, so that the resolution, revised, would read:

That, in the opinion of this house, the stabilization of currency within the empire. . . .

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the consent of the house to delete from the resolution the words "if the empire is to become an economic unit"?

Mr. BENNETT: No; let him go on with the resolution as it is.

Mr. MacLEAN: Very well; it is immaterial to me and I will discuss it as it stands. I move this resolution to-night because in my opinion the present rates of exchange are detrimental to our trade. High rates of exchange between countries have prevented us from trading both within and outside Canada, and if we are forced to trade within the empire then this can be done only by the stabilization of currency within the empire and the abolition of adverse rates of exchange. Personally I cannot see that there is anything new in our trading within the empire, nor in the empire becoming an economic unit. The policy of the Liberal party has always been to trade with the empire and the whole world, and we know that from 1921 up to 1930 Canada was trading with every nation. But even then we did not find that we had a great surplus of markets for our products and we were looking for wider markets with a view to expanding our trade. I am pleased to say, and I think every hon. member will agree with me in this, that during that time our trade went forward by leaps and bounds. Our friends opposite are now advancing the slogan about trading within the empire and making the British empire an economic unit, and I contend that if we are to be forced into the position of trading only within the empire, then the depreciation of the pound sterling, with its attendant disadvantages, makes it almost impossible for us to trade satisfactorily, especially with Great Britain, or with the empire as a whole.

I know that this is a very complicated question and one that has received the attention of leading economists and financial experts throughout the world, and if something can be done to improve the present very unsatisfactory situation every effort should be made in that direction. We are in fairly good company, it seems to me, when we propose this question in regard to empire currency. I believe that Lord Milner and Lord Beaverbrook were both in favour of empire currency, for in 1917 Lord Milner said:

> I believe it to be of the utmost importance to the future of the empire that there should be empire currency.

Some people, including members of this house, are of the opinion that this does not go far enough; they think that an effort should be made to stabilize the currency of the world and thus do away with unfavourable rates of exchange. I admit that this is quite desirable from every point of view, but at the same time the resolution now before the house is a large order for the time being, and if we could accomplish what is aimed at in this proposal we might then be in a position to say to the rest of the world, "Here is an example which you might well follow". Some people may contend that no hardship is imposed on anyone by present rates of exchange and that in the long run things equalize themselves, so that no one suffers very much from an adverse rate of exchange between one country and another. There may be some truth in that, taking the country as a whole, but that argument will not hold good in the case of the individual, because the individual is likely to be trading one way. He is selling his product to a country that has a depreciated currency, and there is no possibility of his getting any compensation in return. If he were able to sell part of his products in a country with a depreciated currency and the other part in a country like the United States, where their currency is at a premium at the present time, there might be something in the argument. He might then even things up in the long run. But we know our producers throughout Canada are forced to sell a great many of their products on the British market; they are selling them on a depreciated currency, and there is no way out; they have to take their loss.

Some will say that this currency question is altogether one that is connected with the gold standard, and that we must adhere to it, while, on the other hand, others claim that the gold standard must be discarded. It is not my purpose to-night to discuss the merits or the demerits of the gold standard as a basis of currency, nor do I advocate doing away with the present form of currency in each country. If Great Britain wants to retain her pounds, shillings and pence, I say: let her do so. If Canada, on the other hand, wishes to retain her Canadian dollar, I say: let her do so. But there must be some system under which the Canadian dollar or the pound sterling will have proportionately the same buying power in any country within the empire, and until we arrive at that point it is going to be pretty difficult for us to trade.

I do not know whether people realize how costly the present system is and how impossible under it it is for us to continue to do business, especially since the present government has adopted a policy of applying the dumping duty on the basis of the currency in the country from which the goods are imported. I have a case in point in a letter that I received from a gentleman the other day, pointing out that as regards the importation of goods from Great Britain, the depreciated currency is taken into account and the dumping duty applied, with the result that there is practically no more free entry of goods, even if they should happen to be on the free list, especially if they are of a class or kind manufactured in Canada. Under date of October 21st last, this gentleman writes:

> On September 1st, Joseph Gundry and Company of Bridport, Great Britain, invoiced and shipped to us a lot of smelt bag nets, used for fisheries. They arrived in Canada some time previous to September 24, as they were rebilled from St. John on that date. Unfortunately the documents did not arrive as soon as the shipment, and when we attempted to clear them from the customs, which was shortly after October 1, the Customs department insisted on collecting as a dumping duty the difference between the depreciated value of the pound, on that date, and its par value. We did not clear them from the customs. The shippers made a draft on us in Canadian currency for the total value of the shipment. Smelt bag nets have always been entered free without any sales tax or duty.
> You will notice that instead of getting any advantage by the depreciated value of the pound, we would be paying about $5.30 if we entered the nets to-day. Now the position is that if we are obliged to pay for British goods in Canadian currency and the customs demand a dump on free goods, the dump being the difference between the value of the pound at the time of entry, as compared to its par value, then the lower the pound goes the more the goods will cost us. This certainly would absolutely kill importations from Great Britain as we can easily get our supplies from the United States, and in addition, it does not affect any Canadian industry, as these goods are of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada.

I may say in connection with this matter that these gentlemen put up a deposit of $56 and, as a result, after a great deal of correspondence with the department, the goods were released. But if they were of a class or kind manufactured in Canada, although they were permitted to come in free of duty, still that dump would apply. As I said before, this depreciated currency has everything else trimmed, even the high tariff of our friends opposite, in keeping out goods and eliminating everything from the free list.

There is one commodity with regard to which this comes right home to the people in Prince Edward Island, namely silver fox pelts, of which we handle a large number through the different organizations in the province. We all know that in Great Britain, London is the big market where the world price for those pelts is set. The moment the English currency depreciated to the extent it did, the silver fox business in this country received the worst setback it ever experienced in its history, because it makes no difference who the gentleman is who is purchasing a silver fox pelt, whether he is from London, England, or New York or Montreal, the first thing he does is to figure off the depreciated currency, and that has to be borne by the producer of the pelt. The poor fox rancher who is raising those pelts for sale is the man who has to stand the loss. There is a debatable question there. It is the same as the tariff question. Some will say that the consumer pays the duty or the tariff, while others will say that the shipper pays it. This is largely a question of supply and demand. If there is a very strong demand on the market for a certain article, it is quite possible that the British buyer would pay the price and absorb the depreciated currency, but when you have a surplus of those products and you have to force them on the British market or on the auction sales in the city of London, it is impossible to think of compelling the buyer over there to pay for those in Canadian currency and absorb the depreciation in the English pound. These are some of the things that come home to us in our everyday business transactions and we feel that some effort should be made to overcome this great handicap under which we are labouring. I know there are some who will scoff at the idea and say that it is impossible, that it cannot be done. But if we read history aright and study the trend of affairs we will see that it has been done before. There has been for the past eighteen years an arrangement between Egypt and Great Britain under which the money of the two countries has been exchanged at par, and Mr. McGeer in an address at Vancouver last fall stated that this exchange of money between the two countries had taken place for a period of eighteen years on a par basis with profit to the governments of both countries. So if such an arrangement can be carried out successfully between Great Britain and Egypt I do not see what should prevent some similar arrangement being made between Great Britain and the other countries of the empire.

Our government claim that they have a favourable balance of trade at the present time. We have always been told that trade balances rule our exchange. Well, if Canada has a favourable trade balance at the present time, the question we would like to ask our friends opposite is this: Why is the Canadian dollar at such a discount to-day? I made inquiry at the Royal bank to-day and they told me that the discount on Canadian money was still 15 per cent. But that is almost aside from the question that we are discussing.

I have another letter under my hand which I think I should read to the house. Although perhaps aside from the question, the situation complained of seems so unfair that I can hardly believe it is true. As hon. gentlemen know, some of our soldier pensioners are living across the line, and one writes to me as follows:

> I wonder if you could help me. I have only earned thirty dollars in more than four years. At the present time I am living on eight dollars per week given by the state of Massachusetts. Two months ago I got $9.60 pension. This month I have a cheque for $14.70. Ottawa tells me it is adjustments. It costs 36 per cent loss to cash a cheque here. Banks will not take Canadian cheques.

This is a Dominion government cheque. You would hardly think that it is possible. He goes on:

> I have to get these cheques cashed through a store and it costs me $7.20 out of a $20 pension cheque, and I have to wait two weeks for the $12.80.

That throws a little light on the hardships that are imposed on our soldier pensioners across the line. As I said before, you can talk of restricting trade, but there is nothing in the world that will restrict trade to the same extent as a depreciated currency. It simply stifles trade, and the result is conditions such as we have to-day. I think that the unemployment situation which our friends have been discussing in the house this afternoon has in part been brought about by just such conditions. It means a loss of markets; it means a loss to the transportation systems; and if our transportation systems are crippled to-day it is because our trade has been stifled by a depreciated currency and high tariffs which will not allow commodities to move. It is no wonder that our business men will not venture out into the open and try to do business under such conditions.

There are many other angles to this subject which have been discussed from time to time, such as the reorganization of our banking institutions to conform to the central banking system. That suggestion has been advanced in this house. It has been discussed on many occasions here by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and other authorities on this subject. Then there is the question of the issue of dominion notes to one-fifth of the banks' deposits. Some advance that as a cure for our present ills. They claim that if we were allowed to issue dominion notes up to one-fifth of the banks' deposits, that would give us somewhere in the vicinity of $325,000,000 more notes in circulation. They claim that there were only $174,000,000 of dominion notes in circulation in 1930 and that this amount could be very well increased by $325,000,000, which would still be quite safe and within the recommendations as submitted by the Macmillan commission when they were investigating similar conditions in Great Britain. However, I am not here to advance any of these suggestions as they are no doubt reforms that our people would hesitate to try.

We are labouring under a severe handicap at the present time, and if we can adopt some more workable scheme without endangering or disturbing our present financial arrangements, which have been giving good service to the country, I think we should look into the question and endeavour to bring about some improvement. I have under my hand a work by Mr. J. F. Darling, C.B.E., entitled A New Money to Unify the Empire. If I may be permitted, I should like to read a short extract, as it will place before the country at least one way in which our present difficulty might be met. He says:

In suggesting a new money unit wherewith to unify the empire, it is not necessary to consider the creation of either a new coin or a currency note which would pass current throughout the empire. Britain, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and the Irish Free State would still retain their pounds each, as, at present, a separate monetary unit; Canada would retain its dollar and India its rupee. In short, with the exception of the gold sovereign where it still circulates, existing currencies in the empire would continue to function practically as they do now.

What is suggested is a new unit which would link up these various currencies by forming a common basis on which each would be issued. This new unit need not be composed of either gold or silver, nor yet of an amalgam of the two metals. It would be found to act more efficiently and economically simply as a "money of account," or, in other words, as the money in which a super-bank of the empire would keep its accounts.

This super-bank could be called the "Bank of the Empire." Its customers would be few, but tremendously important. They would comprise the Bank of England, the government of India, the Canadian government and the note-issuing banks of Canada, the Reserve bank of South Africa, the Commonwealth bank of Australia, the Bank of New Zealand and other note-issuing banks in that dominion, and the Currency Commission of the Irish Free State. These are the primary issuers of currency in the various parts of the empire. In each case—with the exception of India, where the reserve is largely silver—it is enacted by the respective governments that a given proportion of gold or gold assets should be held against the currency issued. Legislation would therefore require to be passed by each of the governments concerned permitting a balance with the Bank of the Empire to replace gold for all reserve requirements. That is to say, just as a London clearing bank regards its balance with the Bank of England as part of its cash reserve, so would the Bank of England itself regard its balance with the Bank of the Empire; and the same would apply to the other note-issuing banks and governments.

A most appropriate name for this new imperial money would be the "rex." The rex would be created for the exclusive use of the Bank of the Empire as the money in which it would keep its accounts.

The Bank of the Empire would be prepared to buy gold at a fixed minimum price, paying for it in rex by crediting one or other of its few but important customers with the proceeds. It is suggested that this minimum price should be one rex for 113 grains of the fine gold, which is the gold content of the sovereign. The sovereign—the symbol of the pre-war gold standard—would cease to be coined. In place of the right, in countries where such still exists, to take gold to the mint to be coined into sovereigns, there would be substituted the right, which would be extended to all parts of the empire, to take gold to the Bank of the Empire to be paid for in rex—that is to say, in a balance at the Bank of the Empire—at 113 grains of fine gold per rex. The currency-issuing banks and governments, being the only customers of the Bank of the Empire, would act as agents for the bank in the purchase of gold, just as in pre-war days the Bank of England acted for the Royal Mint.

It is important, however, to note that it is the rex, and not the gold, that would become the basis for the currencies of the empire, and that the rex would thus constitute a new standard of value. The full significance of these fundamental changes will be better appreciated at a later stage.

It appears that this gentleman has gone into the matter thoroughly and has submitted, in a very able work which he has published, the suggestion for one bank as a clearing house for the whole of the British Empire and this new money, the rex, to be used not in the different countries but just in connection with the clearings of this bank.

In the address given by Mr. McGeer at Vancouver on October 30, 1931, I find the following:

What the empire needs is the establishment of the money exchange system now in operation between Egypt and Great Britain for Canada and Great Britain and all other nations which comprise the British Empire (i.e.), a system that has maintained between Great Britain and Egypt, a perfect par exchange for over 18 years, at a profit to both governments.

Another splendid work on the stabilization of the dollar is one by Fisher, but I shall not take the time of the house to read it.

I should be the last one, Mr. Speaker, to suggest any move which would in any way disturb the present financial structure of our Canadian banking system or, for that matter, the banking system of Great Britain as a whole. Our Canadian banks have given wonderful service. They have stood the strain and stress of difficult times, and, generally speaking, the people's savings, with very few exceptions, have been safe in them. To-day, however, we see a different situation looming on the horizon, and it may be that some way will have to be found to meet the conditions with which we are confronted. As Mr. McGeer stated:

> Six months ago Canada was concerned about the man who was unemployed; those people who had property and business and interest bearing securities were not worrying. But to-day the saleability and negotiability and the shrinkage in market values of these securities have now changed the situation.

We do not know what the future has in store for us. I submit, however, that at the coming Imperial conference this question should be thoroughly discussed. I know we will hear from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) and other leading economists in this house, hon. gentlemen who have made a study of finance, and I believe if something could be arranged to remedy the present situation and do away with some of the disabilities under which we are labouring, a great good would be effected. To my mind the time is ripe for the consideration of this matter.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say a word rather than have the motion disposed of with only the remarks of the mover (Mr. MacLean) before us. Perhaps the very silence in the house following the speech of the hon. member who moved the resolution bears eloquent testimony to the fact that there are not very many who are prepared to jump into a consideration of the question put forward by my hon. friend from Prince. The fact that there appeared to be no desire on the part of any hon. member to speak would seem to bear witness to the truth of the statement my hon. friend made at the outset of his remarks, to the effect that the subject is highly complicated. With all respect to him may I say that I do not quarrel with his initial statement to the effect that he was dealing with a subject with respect to which he knew very little. In fact, Mr. Speaker, if I may say so again with respect, as he proceeded with his remarks I was reminded of the comment of Mark Twain that everybody complains about the weather but nobody seems to do anything about it. With all deference to my hon. friend I agree that he has propounded a very serious and important question, but, with further deference, I cannot say that he has contributed anything to the elucidation of it.

Having been Minister of Finance for some twelve days I bring to the subject all that wealth of wisdom, assurance and knowledge which is possessed only by extreme youth. Consequently I never expect to know so much about finance or subjects of exchange and empire currency as I do at the present time. Notwithstanding that wealth of knowledge which I now possess, as a youthful Minister of Finance may I say to my hon. friend that I find this subject almost as baffling as, apparently, he does. At the outset of my hon. friend's resolution I find the expression: "if the empire is to become an economic unit." In other words he predicates his resolution upon the assumption, I take it, that the empire should become an economic unit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. RHODES: I do not know the interpretation my hon. friend wishes to place upon that first paragraph. I submit that he said not one word with respect to that part of the resolution, which to my mind is a rather striking omission. If it bears the importance in the resolution which one might naturally expect, having been drafted with the care and deliberation my hon. friend must have given to it, one might have expected at least some mention of it.

The burden of my hon. friend's remarks consisted of a complaint as to the handicap under which we in this country labour as a result of our unfavourable exchange position as compared with the neighbouring republic, the United States. He instanced the fact that his worthy constituents in the province of Prince Edward Island have suffered because they have to sell their black fox pelts at a lower price than they would have received had there been parity of exchange between the United States and Canada. He also instanced the rather pathetic case—with which we could all sympathize—of the returned soldier who receives his pension in Canadian funds and has to cash his cheque in the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, those two cases have nothing whatever to do with the subject matter of the resolution of my hon. friend. Even if a parity of empire currency could be brought about, it would have no reference whatever to the exchange of countries other than those within the empire.

This subject is not new. As a matter of fact in the course of the afternoon I chanced to come across a pamphlet containing a report on Empire Monetary and Financial Policy by a joint committee of the Federation of British Industries and the Empire Economic Union. That committee consisted of some very eminent men indeed. For example the Empire Economic Union was represented by Right Hon. L. S. Amery, M.P., Right Hon. Sir Robert Horne, P.C., G.B.E., K.C., M.P., Sir Basil Blackett, K.C.B., K.C.S.I., and Mr. H. G. Williams, M.Sc., M.I.C.E.; the representatives of the Federation of British Industries were Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, that distinguished Canadian financier, now in England, for many years general manager of the Bank of Montreal, Sir William Larke, K.B.E., Sir Roland Nugent, and Mr. R. G. Glenday. If one cared to peruse this pamphlet he would find at page 20 two or three paragraphs dealing with the very subject brought forward by my honourable friend. But the significant feature is this, that these men whose lives have been largely concerned with finance, banking, exchange and world currency, while they raised the question they offered no solution. Therefore I am sure my hon. friend will not expect me to move too rapidly in offering a solution of this very important question that he has propounded tonight.

And this subject is not new so far as empire conferences are concerned. It was raised at the Imperial economic conference of 1923 at the instance of New Zealand, and certainly the financial wisdom represented on that occasion was unable to offer a solution of the problem other than to suggest that inasmuch as the various countries of the empire were rapidly approaching a gold standard the solution was to be found in that circumstance.

Now, sir, so far as we are concerned—and I think I can speak for the government in this respect—we find no fault with the concluding portion of the hon. gentleman's resolution, namely, that the stabilization of exchange would be of the utmost value in promoting and in continuing inter-empire trade, and I think we are also prepared to agree with him that the subject is of sufficient importance to be included in the agenda of the Imperial Economic conference. Looking at the resolution in that light, I think we can accept it. I can only assure him that this government, as I am confident would be the case if any other government were in office, is prepared at the Imperial economic conference to discuss this or any other subject with the purpose of pooling our ideas in order to arrive at a solution that will serve to promote inter-imperial trade.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I quite appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that I am entering on ground where angels may fear to tread, nevertheless I am pretty nearly an angel myself.

An hon. MEMBER: Question!

Mr. IRVINE: I did not say what kind of angel; perhaps my hon. friend would object were I too specific. I may say that I was instructed by my group to put on the order paper a resolution somewhat along these lines. I did so, but through a mistake on my part I lost my favourable position on the order paper, and so take this opportunity to discuss the present resolution.

I think the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) is to be congratulated on his splendid courage, and also for provoking a discussion which should be of very great importance and benefit to this house and even to the government. Although I have no doubt that the government is very wise and well versed in all the mysteries of finance, still I do not think it can ignore a suggestion from the house. So I think this is an opportunity we should embrace, in view of the coming Imperial economic conference, to deal with a subject that is of fundamental significance to the economic difficulties of empire.

So far as the resolution is concerned, I agree with the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in the exception which he took to the fact that stabilization is predicated upon the empire becoming an economic unit. Now, sir, it is rather astonishing that the hon. gentleman who last week indicated that the Colorado beetle had prevented the economic unity of the empire should be the one to bring in a resolution predicated on that very disunity. The mere fact that the Colorado potato bug can upset the unity of the empire is in itself a sufficient reason why the stabilization of currency should not be predicated upon anything of that sort.

I think we will all agree with the importance of the stabilization of currency within the empire, but in my opinion the resolution should have gone a little bit further and made some suggestion as to the probable basis upon which such stabilization should take place. It would be possible to stabilize the currency of an empire or the currency of a nation and make it worse because of its being stabilized.

We all appreciate at the moment the necessity for the stabilization of currency, but unless we have some assurance that the basis upon which the stabilization shall take place will be worth while and sound and sane, then we had better not have stabilization at all.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I intend to move an amendment to this resolution, seconded by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), which will set forth the principles on which we believe stabilization should take place. In dealing with this subject perhaps I might be pardoned if I remind the house that the very first speech I made some ten or eleven years ago was on the subject of finance. As the Minister of Finance has just said, sarcastically about himself, I knew more about the subject then than I do now; I am quite willing to admit that; nevertheless I was not entirely ignorant of some of the points in connection with it, although I probably was the only one in the house that believed so at that time. Perhaps I should point out that on that occasion I urged monetary reform, and I think I have urged it every year since I have been here. I urged that Canada should not return to the gold basis but should abandon it, and I predicted, if you please, very much what has come to pass in Canada and in the world since that time with regard to the economic situation. I might add that on that occasion I was laughed at, particularly by the front benchers of that day. One hon. gentleman went so far as to offer to make me king of Canada if I would settle some of the great financial questions with which I had been dealing. That was all very fine, but there is no one in this house who will laugh at what I am going to say to-night, because to do so would expose an ignorance which no hon. member would wish to own.

As I say, I was laughed at by the front benchers on that occasion prior to the last revision of the Bank Act. I had secured the sanction of this parliament to conduct an investigation into the basis, function, and control of financial credit prior to the amendment of the act; I thought it would be wise for us to have a review of the entire financial situation before we approached the revision of the act, and we got that resolution passed through parliament. However, while we spent a good deal of time in that investigation of credit, and while we had some very eminent men give evidence before that committee, the material we obtained was quietly buried. We never heard anything more about it, and the investigation went for practically nothing. But since that time great events have taken place; a tremendous body of opinion has gathered in favour of financial reform; economic upheavals have swept across the world as a direct result of weaknesses in the financial structure of the world; a tremendous literature on modern finance has piled up in libraries; influential committees throughout the empire have given their views, in no uncertain terms, as to the necessity of the abandonment of the gold standard, the organization of a financial system upon a strictly scientific basis, and the substitution of a managed currency for an unmanaged accident of stupidity known as the gold basis.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question, without desiring to interrupt him? What does he mean by a managed currency? Various financial men use that term in different ways. Could the hon. member tell me what he means without interrupting the course of his address?

Mr. IRVINE: If the right hon. gentleman will permit me to do so I will refer to that under another heading. Probably I will quote from the Macmillan report and also from the report referred to by the Minister of Finance dealing with that very point. But for the moment let me say that civilization itself is in imminent danger, largely as the result of a financial policy which I shall characterize as ignorantly conceived, blindly followed and wantonly applied. So we have the condition which is confronting us at present; it could not have been otherwise under the circumstances, and to-day I urge that something fundamentally constructive must be done quickly if disaster is to be averted.

A few years ago, Mr. Speaker, perhaps a generation ago, the governments of the world had a tendency more or less to ignore the economic unity of the world, the interdependence of the various nations in economic matters, but to-day I think there is a tendency to go in the other direction and to say that our problems cannot be solved because they are all international in character. The truth must be found somewhere in between those extremes. I think there can be little doubt that questions of tariff, of disarmament and of finance can be more adequately handled internationally than they can be handled nationally. I believe in respect to tariff that the free traders of to-morrow will have to make their appeal to an international court, because these questions cannot be finally settled by any one nation. An appeal to an international court must be made also in respect to disarmament, and ultimately some international body will have to settle the question of finance as well. But when that is admitted we have to admit also that the time is so short and the disaster so imminent that we cannot afford to wait until all the nations of the world come to an agreement on matters of finance. I may be wrong in this, but I am assuming that the attitude of mind to be found in the British commonwealth of nations is such as to make some practical advance possible in matters of finance. That being so, we ought to embrace the opportunity which will be afforded by the Imperial conference to discuss these matters and, if possible, make some headway in respect to them; because if we wait until all the other nations of the world, and especially those who have become gold minded, since the war, get ready to assist us, I am afraid we shall have to wait too long.

I have this conviction, Mr. Speaker: that there is sufficient intelligence and good will in the British empire to reconstruct our own financial system on a sound, proper basis. If other nations wish to drown themselves with golden millstones around their necks, let them do it. To find within the confines of the British empire all that is required to maintain the highest possible standard of living in modern times, yet lacking the financial genius to bring these things to the consuming public, would be a bad thing to be said about the statesmanship of the British empire. I hope it will not have to be said; I believe there is a way out, and I believe the Imperial conference will find that way. Canada has had a great deal to do with that Imperial conference; I think Canada will be given a good deal of the credit for it, and perhaps for a good many of the things that will be discussed. I hope Canada will take the lead in this matter also, and that this greatest of all modern questions, the question of finance, will be up for discussion.

I need not emphasize the advantage to Canada and Great Britain at the present time of the stabilization of currency. Briefly stating it, I think the rate of exchange on the pound in Montreal to-day is $3.97, while in New York it is $3.45. This means that on every carload of wheat and every shipment of live stock which the western farmer gets into the British market he loses 90 cents on the English pound. Under present world conditions, and with prices as they are to-day, to add 90 cents to that makes it a disastrous thing indeed, and no doubt our export trade with Great Britain would fall very considerably following the collapse of the pound sterling. So that there is not much use in the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce securing better markets in Great Britain for our goods by better tariff arrangements when we find that the difference in exchange nullifies all that they have been able to do. I think it will be admitted even by the government that if we could find any way of putting our money more nearly on a parity with that of Great Britain it would be of great advantage in our export trade. I would go so far as to say that we should be better off to-day if our money were stabilized at the value of the British pound.

But, I shall be asked at once, what would happen in the United States? Well, what would happen in the United States? I understand that Canada has been meeting her obligations there so far with gold; I presume that was what the Prime Minister, when he was Minister of Finance, meant when he said that Canada was still on the gold basis. It meant that we were honouring our obligations internationally by paying in gold. If that is so, the honour would be in no way impaired if our dollar were worth 25 cents less than it is. Moreover, our export trade to the United States would be increased because their money would buy more in Canada than it would anywhere else, and we could find a good market in Great Britain because our money would be on a parity with theirs. I will not spend any more time emphasizing the importance of stabilization of British currency on a parity. All will agree on the advantages, if it could possibly be brought about.

In this connection I want to refer to the report of the joint committee of the Federation of British Industries and the Empire Economic Union, dated October 14, 1931, and perhaps also, if I have time, it might be well for me to refer to the report of the committee on finance and industry usually called the Macmillan report. I shall quote this briefly on certain points which I intend to argue. The committee on economic union, I may observe in passing, was composed of the following:

Sir Basil Blackett, K.C.B., K.C.S.I.
Right Hon. L. S. Amery, M.P.
Right Hon. Sir Robert Horne, M.P.
Mr. H. G. Williams, M.Sc., M.I.C.E.

The members of the Federation of British Industries included Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor. I think that is the same gentleman who was president of the Bankers Association in Canada when there was being considered by a committee of this house a resolution dealing with credit matters. I can truly say, if he is the same gentleman, that he has given his O.K. to almost everything in this report which at that time he opposed in that committee. That is not a criticism; indeed, I am going out of my way to compliment him upon having, during the intervening years, come to a better frame of mind. And I might suggest that if Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor has changed his mind in that time there is no reason why any gentleman in this house should fail to change his in the same time and on the same subject. The other members for the Federation of British Industries are:

Sir William Larke, K.B.E.
Sir Roland Nugent.
Mr. R. G. Glenday.

The next thing I want to refer to is the finding of these economists that the chief cause of the crisis is the monetary system. The committee does not say it is the only cause, and neither do I. But the personnel I have mentioned do hold that the chief cause of the crisis to-day throughout the world is the breakdown of the monetary system. The report states:

The want of a proper standard of purchasing power is the chief cause of the survival of the monstrous fallacy that there can be too much produced of anything.

We agree with the conclusion of the Macmillan committee that the present world economic crisis is primarily a monetary crisis. And the report further says that the recent unparalleled fall in prices has been due in the main to a shortage of gold. The story of this disastrous deflation which has brought us to the present economic impasse began with the return to the gold basis after the war, Great Britain taking the lead. The Macmillan report mentions this fact as the main part of the explanation of the depression, or what is sometimes called the crisis.

Merely because a committee says that the monetary crisis is the chief cause of our difficulties does not, of course, prove it beyond any possible doubt, and I have no time, seeing that the clock is moving so fast, to argue all the details. I am glad, however, to have such an authority as this committee to quote in this respect, for it saves me much of the argument. Personally I have no doubt about the matter. I believe that in the British countries to-day, not to speak of others—and they are all the same—our monetary system, having up to this time been limited or controlled by the gold standard, in respect to both currency and credit, could not possibly have any real relation to the economic necessities of the case. If necessary I will demonstrate in a few moments just what I mean by that. Gold is not controllable—and this will answer in part what the Prime Minister asked me—because in the first place you do not know how much of it you can find next week or next year, and therefore it has no relation to the amount of goods which will be in readiness, waiting to be distributed by money, which can be issued only on gold so long as we maintain the gold basis. Next, you have no control of gold because even Great Britain could not prevent other countries from bleeding her white of a commodity of which the empire produces 70 per cent of the entire output of the world. That is what I mean when I say that it is not controllable.

If we can find a means of stabilizing British currency on a basis other than gold, then it will be in control of the nations of the empire concerned and they will not be subject to being bled to death by those who wish to drain them from outside. Furthermore, such a basis would always have an intelligent relation to the requirements of money which would be developed by the natural evolution of the industrial process. I believe that the end in view can be attained by the British commonwealth. I say frankly that I do not think it is possible to do it in any other way. I do not think we can look forward with any hope of such action being taken internationally in the near future. There exists no international body to-day with either the authority or the intention to handle the financial questions of the world. But there does exist an imperial body; or, if you wish to put it in more modern terms, the nations of the British commonwealth have found a way of getting together to cooperate for their own economic and sentimental interests. These nations have the good will and, I believe, the ability, and certainly they have the necessity, to take action on this matter, and while it is quite likely that the question cannot be settled by them completely, ignoring all the rest of the world, it can be settled sufficiently well to prevent disaster in the empire. In the hope of a satisfactory arrangement of the empire currency, I would urge that the government at least indicate that it is willing to give consideration to the matter with that hope in view and to assist its consideration before the Imperial conference.

In regard to the empire taking action in this matter, the committee's report to which I have just referred has this to say in respect to gold in a monetary sphere:

An imperial sterling currency, so adjusted as to maintain reasonable price stability for the British Commonwealth, and so powerful as to govern, through the external trade of that commonwealth, both the value of the metallic medium of exchange and, indirectly, the value of the currencies of the rest of the world,—a pax Britannica built up out of the present anarchy in the world's monetary affairs.

In another place the report says:

There is no insuperable difficulty in securing the desired end if once its importance is recognized by the governments concerned and the political will to achieve it becomes manifest.

I hold that view; I think the committee was right when it said that, and that is why I am urging to-night that our government should give consideration to this suggestion. Referring to the managed currency, the committee says:

Such management aimed at counteracting the serious economic, social and political effects of price instability, may be a difficult and delicate, but should not be an impossible task. Even if the ideal solution might be attainable only by a degree of international cooperation which is not yet in sight, much can be done by a great and wealthy community like the United Kingdom, and still more by so immensely powerful a group of communities as the British Empire, to shelter its own citizens from the worst effects of world monetary fluctuations and, indeed, to bring those fluctuations under some measure of control. Nor need such a policy of national and imperial monetary control interfere with the endeavours to improve international cooperation in this field.

My next point is that Canada should take the ground that the gold standard should be abandoned. This committee also has the following interesting statement:

The rigid linking up of gold and currency which compels the contraction of domestic credit because some quite fortuitous circumstance, like an American boom or a Paris panic, withdraws our gold, and only enables domestic expansion to take place when the foreign exchanges are favourable, are obvious objections to a system which is no longer required in order to maintain public confidence.

That is not the member for Wetaskiwin speaking; that is a committee of notables with numerous letters after their names, whose names I have just read to the house, gentlemen of unimpeachable integrity and of great economic knowledge. They go so far as to say that we do not require any longer to have a metallic basis of any kind to establish public confidence.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not deal with international balances.

Mr. IRVINE: No, this is internal. I thank the Prime Minister. I should have made it perfectly clear that in dealing with internal credit we do not need a metallic basis to support an internal note issue. In dealing with a stabilized British currency we are considering only internal stability. Gold could still be used to make up international balances, although I hold the view that goods could procure that quite as well.

With regard to the gold basis, I cannot help harking back to a few years ago when we were told by the advocates of the bankers of that day that the gold basis was a safe and a sane one. I want to say to-night that events have amply demonstrated that it is neither safe nor sane. It is not safe for the reasons I have just mentioned, namely, that other countries, by playing the gold game, can bleed a country white, just as Great Britain was bled white by those who became panicky in respect to gold and withdrew their investments from Great Britain. That is not safe. We cannot have a British Empire resting upon a basis of that sort, for if we ever develop enemies they will soon bleed us white. We must not entrust the destinies of empire to a financial basis as poor as that.

Let me look at another phase of it. I say that it is not sane. It is not sane obviously because there is no intelligent relationship whatsoever between the amount of gold which may now be in existence or the amount of gold which may be found at any time in the future, and the demand for currency which the expansion of trade in the natural order of events may make necessary. So there we have the real weakness of gold. When the gold basis was laid down by Sir Robert Peel it was laid down because it was a bright and shining thing that did not rust, and because it was scarce. Neither of these are economic reasons. Political economy was scarcely born in the days when that basis was laid down. What was the result of this? It was immediately followed by the "hungry forties" of history and Great Britain was saved only by the accidental discovery of gold in California and Australia. Since that time the expansion of industrial development has been so great as to leave gold far behind. That is to say, while gold has been found every year, the necessities of the economic situation every year demand a greater expansion of currency than is possible on the gold basis. If hon. members will look at the report of the economic committee of the League of Nations—I have not time to quote it to-night—they will find there the actual figures in respect to gold, how much we find each year, how much the arts demand extra each year for use, and how much extra currency is required every year because of the advancing production of the industrial system, all together making towards a time when even if the gold basis were a sensible basis, it is going to be an impossible one because of its scarcity.

So why should Canada worry about letting go of the gold basis? Why should the British Empire worry about it? They cannot make a worse one; they can make a better one and they can manage it intelligently. They can establish a proper relation between the economic requirements of the state and of the empire, and the currency in circulation at any given time. They can make it safe from the ravages of those outside who may desire to upset the empire, and they can make it function in an honest and stable way.

Another thing about the gold basis that I ought to mention at this point is that while it has been to some extent the basis, it has never been the standard. It has never stood long enough anywhere to be a standard. The value of gold has altered at times almost as drastically as the value of potatoes, and yet there are no bugs on gold. Therefore, as a standard, it never did function, but it probably tried to function and while, for all I know, it may have been a little more stable than potatoes, it has never been sufficiently stable to prevent a great deal of injustice. And Canada to-day is suffering from just that injustice; for when the government of that day, the last government in power in Canada, went back on the gold basis, then without any intention of so doing, they practically doubled the national debt and they practically doubled the debt of every farmer whose debt was contracted during the inflation period of the war. When after that they deflated so as to knock the bottom out of the values the farmers had to present in payment of their debts, they left the country absolutely paralyzed, and all debtors unable to meet their financial obligations. That is another good reason why the gold basis should be abandoned. As the committee says:

> An era of conscious and deliberate management must succeed the era of undirected natural evolution. . . . The monetary system of this country must be a managed system.

That was subscribed to by Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor.

I might mention that there is another proposal in connection with the stabilization of British currency and one which certainly deserves consideration, namely that silver be added to gold to make a bimetallic basis of sufficient substance to enable us to issue all the currency required. In that connection the report points out that during the last four hundred years the production of silver has not exceeded the proportion of 14½ of silver to one of gold. During the last one hundred years the production of silver fell to 11.8 to one of gold, and during the last thirty years to 10.9 to one of gold. I am certainly not arguing that we should have a bimetallic basis, for to my mind it is bad enough to worship the golden calf. If we worship a silver calf along with the golden one we shall not be a bit better off than before, with this exception, that undoubtedly if on the metaphysical assumption we could make gold out of silver 14 to one, it would give us a basis sufficient to enable us to keep the British Empire going with all its expansion for the next twenty years perhaps; but surely there would come a time when the same limits we have found with respect to gold would be reached with respect to the bimetallic system.

But there is a worse objection to accepting silver as a basis, and that is that unless the United States and other countries of the world joined with us in a matter of that kind it would be very difficult and probably impossible to carry on with the bimetallic system. I know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has made a special study of the bimetallic system, and what I am saying may not be true as I have not made a special study of it. But it is my opinion that unless the system were adopted internationally it would be very difficult to carry it out, although the committee from which I quoted a few moments ago does point out that silver could be adopted in a lesser degree in the British Empire. That is, once the central bank of empire was organized it might carry a certain percentage of its metal reserve in silver at the market price and thus help somewhat the situation.

I have not been able to develop this subject as I would have enjoyed doing, Mr. Speaker, had there been sufficient time. I have been compelled by the rush of time to cram into a small space a whole lot that should have been very carefully developed, but perhaps when the budget comes or some other free-for-all opportunity I may be able to answer some of the arguments that may follow my presentation to-night, and which I shall not be able to answer on this occasion. All I am urging, Mr. Speaker, is that the government will agree that this is an important question, that the stabilization of currency within the British Empire on a basis other than gold is a practical possibility, and that at the forthcoming Imperial economic conference it will be discussed and examined in all its ramifications. If after that we are told, and reasons are given, that the thing is not practicable, we shall have to be satisfied, but I do hope that the house will not allow this resolution either to be defeated or even to pass without considering it a great deal more than we have done so far. I therefore beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner):

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that" in the first line and substituting therefor the following:

in the opinion of this house the Canadian representatives at the coming Imperial economic conference should move for the stabilization of the currency of all British countries to be on a basis other than gold.

I need not point out that it is not the intention either of myself or of the seconder of the amendment to instruct the government how to approach the conference, but we are hoping that the suggestions of this house will be taken into consideration and that when the conference meets a question of this importance will be found on the agenda.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I have neither the wit nor the eloquence of my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), nor have I made the profound study of the monetary system that he has; therefore I feel at somewhat of a disadvantage in following him in this debate.

I rose particularly to draw the attention of the government to something of a paradox that exists to-day in the application of the duty on American and British goods as a consequence of the departure of Great Britain from the gold standard and from the fact that our dollar is at a discount in New York.

Last fall the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) issued a statement to the newspapers in which he defended the action of the government in applying the dumping duty to British goods, and with his usual logic and force he put a very good argument before the country. By way of example he cited to the newspapers, as near as I can remember, the importation of £100 worth of British goods. Before the departure of Great Britain from the gold standard, that £100 worth of British goods would cost in Canadian currency approximately $486. Adding 20 per cent duty, amounting to $96, the total cost to the Canadian consumer would be $582. When Great Britain went off the gold standard and the pound went down, we will suppose, to four dollars, the same £100 worth of goods would cost $400 in Canadian currency. The 20 per cent duty as it is applied on the par value of the goods would still be $96, and then in addition a dumping duty of $86 is applied, bringing the total to $582 as it was before. The argument of the Secretary of State was that nobody was hurt. He said that the British manufacturer still gets his £100 for the goods and the Canadian consumer still pays only $582. But the paradox is that in the latter case the Canadian treasury gets $182 in duty instead of $96. Certainly someone must lose in the process. I want to be fair and point out that the Secretary of State protected himself by saying that usually when the currency of a country goes down in value, the price of goods goes up correspondingly. But in this case the dumping duty was applied to British goods because the British government by a fiat had prevented a rise in the price levels. That might have been possible to do for a short time, but I maintain that even the British government cannot supersede and override the economic law. The British importer buying raw cotton, for instance, in New York would get for his pound $4.86 of raw cotton before England went off the gold standard. After England went off the gold standard the pound was worth, say, four dollars in New York, and the British importer would have to pay a great deal more for the same quantity of cotton. Ultimately the cost of the goods would rise; there is no doubt about that. It is only in so far as the goods on the shelves were concerned that the fiat of the British government would apply. I think later the government were convinced of this because they changed their policy and to-day they are taking for duty purposes a value of $4.40. That is better than it was before; but still when the pound is worth only about $4, there is still a difference, and I submit that that does mean a distinct increase in the duty against British goods, which is unfair not only to the British shipper but also to the Canadian importer. There is no doubt that through the operations of economic laws, to the extent to which the British pound goes down in value, to that extent the price of these goods must ultimately rise, and by applying the same duty as we always did we would reach the same result as before.

I submit again that in the application of the dumping duty we are actually increasing the duty against British goods. The paradox of the situation is that when we import goods from the United States we do not buy on the basis of Canadian currency. If I buy $100 worth of goods in the United States and pay for them in United States currency those goods are valued for duty purposes at the Canadian currency value, which I submit is correct. They may be valued, we will say, at $115, and the duty is taxed on that basis. My contention is that that is a perfectly correct procedure, because it takes into account the intrinsic value of the goods. I do not complain on that score, but I do complain of the way it is applied toward British goods, because it cannot be right in both places. If we apply a dumping duty against British goods because the pound is depreciated, then certainly we cannot apply the duty on the premium on United States funds. The government cannot be right both ways, and I think it should apply the proper tariff here. While continuing to charge United States goods on the basis of Canadian currency the government should tax British goods also on the basis of Canadian currency.

I am not going to deal at any great length with the monetary question. From my knowledge of it, however, I think I am safe in saying that the commodity price level is dependent upon the amount of money in circulation in the country. That is to say, if to-day we double the amount of money in circulation in Canada, the price of commodities will double, because the money is worth only half what it was before. I think that is reasonable logic, but in case this statement may be regarded as only my own opinion I shall take this opportunity to quote authorities.

Mr. C. E. Neill, who died recently, and who was before his death the vice-president of the Royal Bank of Canada, in a speech to the shareholders of the bank last year said this:

If the central banks of all the countries on a gold basis should deliberately adopt a common policy they could within a certain time lag, raise or lower the price level almost at will.

Then he goes on to say:

It is because the United States is in such a commanding position of wealth, with 40 per cent of the world's gold supply, that the main responsibility for the world price level rests with that country.

Then he outlines how an increase in the money circulation and reduction of wages, and so on, may bring about the desired effect. His remarks continue as follows:

A general reduction of wages will be resisted and it would therefore seem that the easiest way out is a restoration of the previous stabilized price level. To accomplish this, money must again flow freely through the financial arteries of the world.

At this point may I quote from the remarks of another distinguished financier, Mr. T. B. Macaulay, President of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada. In an article published in MacLean's magazine last year, referring to the reduction in the general price level, he said:

It has been the chief cause of the severity of this depression. Without going into technical details, there is a fairly general agreement among economists that this drop in the average price of commodities has been caused by a lessening of the purchasing power of the dollar, which in turn depends upon the amount of dollar currency and currency credits outstanding. If too many legal tender notes were issued, prices might be raised disastrously, as happened in Germany. If, on the other hand, the amount of the circulation be unwisely curtailed, exactly the opposite result happens, and we can have a disastrous reduction in prices, which is in fact what we are now suffering from.

Then he goes on to say:

It is admitted that in the United States the purchasing power of the dollar depends entirely on the amount of currency and currency credits which the federal reserve authorities may permit to be outstanding.

Here I wish to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the close study he has made of this whole situation. In an article from his pen which appeared in an issue of MacLean's magazine of last year he pointed out what many economists have said, but which is something new coming from a cabinet minister, that the problem facing society to-day was not one of production but one of distribution. In later speeches the minister has made throughout the country he has pointed out the advantage of the monetization of silver. Perhaps I may not altogether agree with my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) on this because, to take the minister's explanation—and I agree with him on this—the monetization of silver to-day would widen the basis of our credit. Of course I realize that my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin said that owing to the difference in the value of silver there would have to be some international arrangements made. If we monetized it at a rate higher than rates in the outside world, too much would flow into this country. I realize that danger. I think, however, what the minister had in mind, and in which connection I agree with him, is that the monetization of silver would supply the deficiency in those countries that are short of gold to-day. They would be enabled to issue more paper currency against their metal, and that after all is what we are suffering from at the present time.

Mr. GEARY: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Certainly.

Mr. GEARY: My hon. friend said that if the currency were raised to twice its present amount, the price of commodities would increase to an equal degree; therefore a farmer getting twice the amount of currency for the commodities he sells would have to pay twice the amount for what he buys. I ask my hon. friend how that would improve conditions, and how the farmer would profit thereby.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The principal problem in the world to-day is debts, not merely reparations and war debts but public and private debts as well. My hon. friend from Wetaskiwin explained that. The trouble is that those debts were contracted when currency was at a certain level. The currency has been deflated to a point where the dollar is worth twice as much, and the debt is doubled. A farmer who borrowed money on his farm in 1929 is called upon to-day to pay back two or three times the commodity value of what he borrowed at that time. What we want to do now is to devise some system which will bring us back to the normal price level, and a system whereby we can pay these debts.

Mr. GEARY: My hon. friend is arguing only in regard to debts, and not in regard to exchange values.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Not entirely. Debts affect the whole business structure. One of the great impediments to the normal condition of business in the world to-day is the burden of debts, and those debts have been increased tremendously. Debtors have found it impossible to pay because of this deflation.

Mr. GEARY: I am very much obliged for the opportunity of asking the question; I just wished to hear my hon. friend in that connection.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It might not have any effect as between commodities. But when Germany made the arrangements for payment under the Young plan the commodity level then perhaps justified the Germans in undertaking the obligation to pay those amounts. The committee that recently examined the question of those reparations reported that Germany under the changed price level would now be called upon to pay three times the amount she had become originally obligated to pay. That is what we are all suffering from to-day.

Now I wish to point out something that I think is going to have a profound effect upon the whole situation, not merely the stabilization of monetary value within the empire, but throughout the whole world. In the United States they have deflated the dollar until it is a long way below, or above—whichever way you want to look at it—the normal gold level. That is to say, in the United States normally they require 40 cents in gold behind every dollar in circulation; to-day they have 80 cents. In other words, they have doubled the amount of gold they actually need behind their circulating mediums. What has been the effect? It means that the standard of measurement of the gold basis has been changed altogether. That, I think, is the reason why Great Britain and many other countries had to go off the gold basis. Canada is really on the normal gold basis to-day, but because the United States have deflated their dollar until it is much more valuable than the normal gold basis, we have not been able to follow them and our dollar is at a discount in New York.

What has happened in the United States? There you have another case of King Midas. The United States with the greatest amount of gold of any nation in the world, their vaults full of gold, found they could not eat their gold, could not make clothes out of it, could not even turn it into useful tools. But coincident with this immense reserve of gold they have the greatest amount of agricultural distress and industrial unemployment that has ever prevailed in their history. Now President Hoover has come out with a scheme which I think will be a partial corrective. A recent newspaper despatch refers to it as one of the greatest inflations in history. A despatch from Washington of February is headed:

Permit Inflation of U.S. Currency

Sensational Rise in Commodity Prices is Forecast.

Then follows the despatch:

The United States government moved to-day to permit inflation of the American dollar. Senator Carter Glass, Democrat, Virginia, introducing a government measure permitting the Federal Reserve to "make advances to member banks on time, demand, or promissory notes," announced the bill was not for "excessive inflation of currency."

In fact, the bill would permit the federal reserve board to use its surplus stocks of gold —at present the dollar is backed by 80 per cent gold, whereas the legal limit is 40 per cent—to provide currency in exigency.

The first result of the government's move forecast in this morning's papers was a sensational rise in commodity and security prices.

Ogden L. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, and other government officials, strenuously contended to-day the step should not be called "inflation" but rather counter-deflation. It is the government theory that prices are too low and that recovery is prevented by the psychology of the country.

As I said a moment ago, I think before very long we are going to see the greatest inflation in the history of the United States. That means the United States dollar will go down in value, and probably by the middle of next summer, or before, our Canadian dollar will come back to par in New York. But I would warn any of our Canadian statesmen not to boast of that as a result of their own efforts; it would simply mean that the American dollar has come down to meet the Canadian dollar. I hope so. It will help to correct some of the evils here. It is more than possible that the American dollar will go down below our own, and in that case I would suggest to the government that they follow the line of the American administration and permit inflation to the same extent. The American dollar may go down to where the British pound will come back to par, in which case it will solve a good many of our international problems. I think the government should carefully watch this and not be too much afraid of what we call "inflation." Inflation, as one newspaper has said, is not the right word. The United States have "dehydrated" their dollar to the point where it is worth more than the normal gold dollar, and now they are only bringing it back to its former value. A few years ago some of us in western Canada were very much exercised over the fact that the terminal elevators were drying out our damp and tough wheat to such a degree that it became a concentrated wheat and more valuable than wheat which normally contains 12 or 13 per cent moisture, and the millers would pay a great deal more for it. We objected to that. The United States authorities have done precisely the same thing with the dollar—they have dried it out, they have dehydrated it to the point where it is more valuable than the normal gold standard value. I hope the government will watch the situation in the United States and try to keep in line with their policy.

On motion of Mr. Spencer the debate was adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: At this hour, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we had better adjourn rather than call the next motion.

It is proposed to-morrow to take government orders, and after that supply—public works, trade and commerce and justice. They will be taken up in this order.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Before the house adjourns, Mr. Speaker, may I direct the attention of my right hon. friend to what I think must be an error on his part, either a very simple one, or as he said a few days ago, one made with malice aforethought, though I do not for one moment indicate that such is the case. At the adjournment of the house Friday last my right hon. friend is reported in Hansard as having said:

> As I explained, some of the opposition members desired to be present when bills were read the second time, and they have stood.

I have been unable to find in Hansard any previous reference by my right hon. friend to bills standing, and I do not find that any member of the opposition asked for bills to stand.

Mr. BENNETT: "Some hon. members," without the "opposition" would be the correct statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very glad of that correction, because as Hansard reads it appears as if some opposition members were responsible for bills not having been proceeded with.

While on my feet, as a matter of privilege, and in order to clear up a misunderstanding, I may perhaps be allowed to refer to the incident that took place the other evening when my right hon. friend mentioned that in my speech at London I had made a statement which was not based on the evidence—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —in reference to his not having permitted a contribution to be accepted from Beauharnois. My right hon friend said that in the evidence it was never suggested by any person that a sum of money had been paid to the federal Conservative party by Beauharnois. I had not the evidence at hand at the time the Prime Minister spoke, but I felt perfectly sure that the statement I had made was based on the evidence. I have since looked up the evidence, and my right hon. friend will find it in the Journals of the House of Commons, Canada, volume LXIX, 1931, appendix No. 5, page 822. Mr. Sweezey was giving his evidence, and Mr. White was questioning him. These are the questions and answers:

> Q. And then who else if anybody?
> A. Well, still speaking of federal campaign funds, I do not recall of any specific—oh, yes, I contributed to General McCuaig, who, I understood, was the collector for the Conservative campaign fund in Montreal.

Q. How much?

A. $10,000.

Q. Anybody else?

Mr. Lennox: You did not treat us very generously.

Then a little later on the same day he said:

Q. Have you told us all of the federal contributions?

A. Yes, sir.

I submit that the reference there is to federal contributions, and that there is a direct statement made by Mr. Sweezey that he made contributions to the collector for the Conservative campaign fund in Montreal, indicating that he had in mind that he was the collector for the federal party.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no such reference. It says "in Montreal."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The reference is very clear.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my right hon. friend says, we are in the judgment of our peers. The answer is:

A. Well, still speaking of federal campaign funds. . . .

Those are Mr. Sweezey's words.

. . . I do not recall of any specific—oh, yes, I contributed to General McCuaig, who, I understood, was the collector for the Conservative campaign fund in Montreal.

Then a Conservative member on the committee, Mr. Lennox, speaking to Mr. Sweezey, is reported to have said:

You did not treat us very generously.

The word "us" must have meant the federal party. Those were the references I had before me when I made the statement that the contribution had been made to the federal fund. Certainly I was not trying to do the Prime Minister an injustice as to his having returned any contribution; I was making the point that he had returned it. My point was that the reason he did so was not that it was in the public interest so to do, but that he expected to have an investigation and therefore was not going to accept any funds in the interval, which did not seem to me too exalted a reason.

Now may I just say to my right hon. friend that I do not think I am any more inclined to do things with malice aforethought than he is, nor do I think I am given to making statements about other people with a view to doing them deliberate injury.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a question of privilege at the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend may stop me if he wishes to do so. I say that in view of the statement I have given to the house as to the basis of my remarks, his statement that I had made a statement which was false or which I should have known was false and was therefore wilfully negligent in the discharge of my duty, was wholly uncalled for and unworthy of him. I have just pointed out where, at the close of the session on Friday, he made the deliberate statement that the opposition had been responsible for certain bills not being gone on with. He now says he did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. If it is in Hansard I must have used the words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says he did not mean what he said, and I accept his word like a gentleman. I think my right hon. friend might be equally gentlemanly in accepting the word of those who speak from this side.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has raised a question of privilege with which I shall deal at once. His statement at London, Ontario, was with reference to $200,000; it was with reference to General McRae; it was with reference to the treasurer of the Conservative party. The observations just made bring to mind the words of a British statesman with respect to a similar matter. He said, "It is unworthy of any man who calls himself a statesman, and only of a pettifogging attorney." Those were the words used with respect to a similar matter. Every member of this house knows what was said last year; my right hon. friend knows what the evidence shows, and I will take occasion to read the statement he made at London and compare it with what he now says. Then I hope he will make the amende honorable to this house, the members of whom are his judges. Then he will not stand here and endeavour to divest himself of responsibility for what he said at London with reference to a matter which was not at all the subject matter of his address on that occasion.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Tuesday, February 16, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I desire to deal with one or two matters that were mentioned last evening as a question of privilege.

First, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that in my statement made in the chamber on Friday that there had been a delay in reading certain bills because of the desire of members of the opposition to speak to them, I could not have meant any member of the opposition, and not having spoken myself to any member of the opposition with respect to the matter I at once assumed that I must have been wrong in my memory because the right hon. gentleman was so certain. To my surprise I find that not only was a member of the opposition spoken to, but a member of the opposition spoke to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and asked that he do not proceed with one of the bills standing in his name until after his return on Wednesday next. That was spoken in the presence, or in the hearing at least, of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman). I, not remembering the source from which I had learned it, made the statement to the house, having first spoken to the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), who was then leading the opposition, the leader of the opposition not being in his place; but not desiring to assert my memory, with the many matters that have to engage its attention, as against the very positive statement of the right hon. gentleman, I accepted his statement last evening without question. But on investigation I find that not only did a leading member of the opposition make the suggestion and the request, but I find that it was my right hon. friend's own deskmate, the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who made the request of the present Minister of Justice. So I think I am within the judgment of this house when I say that what I said in the House of Commons on Friday last is abundantly supported by the evidence to which I have now alluded and which can be established not only from the word of the former Minister of Justice himself and the present Minister of Justice, but it was also stated in the hearing of the Minister of National Revenue. I think that disposes of point number one.

The second point raised by the right hon. leader of the opposition is one that I think must have arisen from some misunderstanding on his part of what was said or else a failure to appreciate the statement made by me in the house some few days ago.

I complained, and I think properly, of the language used by the right hon. gentleman in London, Ontario, when he was speaking with reference to the Beauharnois transaction, and at page 141 of Hansard I made this statement, after having read what he had said:

> That is what the right hon. gentleman said at London, not Winnipeg—that money had been paid to the representative of the Conservative party and at my instance returned.

My complaint was that the right hon. gentleman alleged that money had been received and returned at my instance. I then followed that up on the same page of Hansard by saying:

> I am now dealing with the evidence. I say that the right hon. leader of the opposition went to London and made a speech which he either knew was false or he should have known was false, and he therefore was wilfully negligent in the discharge of his duties, for he had the hardihood to say that this sum of money was received and returned at my instance. That was what he said.

Whereupon the right hon. leader of the opposition said:

> What I do say is this: what I am speaking of is the contribution—my right hon. friend has just referred to it—being made by Beauharnois, and all along my understanding has been that Beauharnois did make a contribution to a member of the Conservative party, which was to have gone into the funds of the Conservative party and would have gone there but for the fact that the present leader of the government indicated that it should not be done.

That, Mr. Speaker, is not the matter about which I was speaking. In the press report of the speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman at London, and as I understand it there is no question as to the accuracy of the report of his speech, the part about which I particularly complained was that portion in which he alleged in definite and positive terms that a contribution was made to the Conservative party by the Beauharnois company and at my instance returned. Now the evidence was considered in this house. I have the speech of that time of the right hon. gentleman himself, and it was not suggested at any time that any money had been returned at my instance. It was stated that I had declined to accept any contribution from Beauharnois for the general fund of the Conservative party, but no one for a moment who has read that evidence or heard it will say that there was any statement that money had been received and at my instance returned. I desire again to direct the attention of the right hon. gentleman to his own words. He said:

The next point to note is that contributions were made by those associated with Beauharnois to both political parties, to the Conservative party and members of the party in the federal field, as well as to the party or members of the party in Ontario and Quebec, and that the return of the contribution made to the general fund of the Conservative party was on grounds of party expediency and not of public policy.

"The return of the contribution made to the general fund"—that was the allegation of the right hon. leader of the opposition. He stated in London, Ontario, that that contribution made to the general fund was, at the instance of the now leader of the government, returned. That that is not borne out by the records, of course, it is not necessary for me to do more than mention. But last evening—I really find it difficult to understand the mental attitude of the right hon. gentleman—the right hon. leader of the opposition endeavoured to use illustrations of payments made to General McCuaig, treasurer in Montreal, it was said, as applying to the general fund as used by him in the language of his speech at London. I said that clearly that was not borne out by the evidence, and the proof of that is what was said in this chamber last evening. In my address the other day I referred to Mr. Sweezey, whose statement I had not seen until this morning, who, in an interview with the press, denied the correctness of the statement made by the leader of the opposition. Here are his words, taken from the newspaper, dated October 30:

Sweezey Denies
King Statement
Says Opposition Leader Wrong in Allegation About Tory Funds
(From Yesterday's Late Editions)

No contribution whatever was made by the Beauharnois Company to the funds of the federal Conservative party before or during the last election campaign and for this reason no money was returned by the Conservative organization on the grounds of party expediency. The emphatic denial was given to The Star this afternoon by R. O. Sweezey, President of the Beauharnois Company, in an exclusive interview.

"Absolutely and emphatically no such contribution was made," said President Sweezey. "You may deny it from me finally and completely. Whoever informed Mr. Mackenzie King that such payment was made and it was returned is in error either maliciously or through ignorance."

The article proceeds:

The suggestion was made by Mr. King at the recent Liberal convention at London that a contribution of $200,000 was handed to General McRae, accepted by him on behalf of the Conservative party organization and subsequently returned to the Beauharnois company. The statement made by Mr. King created some surprise and considerable interest and it was only on the return of General McRae to Ottawa that the matter was put clearly before him. General McRae intimated that Mr. Sweezey was the best source of information on such a point, and it is Mr. Sweezey's emphatic denial which is now published.

I should think, Mr. Speaker, that without in any sense entering into any discussion it would be sufficient for me to direct attention to the record itself, to the statement from which I read, and suggest to the right hon. gentleman that having assumed what he did he should now do as he did the other day, not endeavour to justify his position which is incorrect and unsound, but to say frankly that he built up his case at London upon a statement which is unwarranted by the evidence and untrue in fact. I suggest to him that would be a proper course to pursue in the matter. I think that summarizes the position in a nutshell, and I cannot yet believe that the right hon. gentleman would have taken the course he did take unless there had been some confusion of fact or failure to recall just what he had said at London. I have not taken up the time of the house to read at length his London speech and indicate the argument he made up from that false premise. I made up my mind when I read that report that I would do nothing until this house met, or ask anybody else to make any statement so that those who last year heard the speech from the right hon. gentleman with respect to Beauharnois would be able to recall, or would be in a position to look at Hansard and ascertain, what was then said, to place it in contrast with what was said at London and to realize the extent to which his memory had failed to respond to the demands made upon it or, in the alternative, to conclude that he had made the statement deliberately, knowing it to be untrue.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that hon. members of this house give the same attention to what I have to say as they have given to the remarks of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett).

At the outset my right hon. friend referred to the statement he made at the time of adjournment on Friday last to the effect that owing to requests of opposition members bills had not been proceeded with that day. I intimated yesterday that I had not in fact discovered wherein my right hon. friend had made any previous explanations on that point, as the record disclosed he said he had, or where any member of the opposition had requested that bills should stand that afternoon. My right hon. friend now says that he has since discovered that the opposition did make a request, and he says—to come to the point immediately—that it was the late Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) who asked the present Minister of Justice to let a bill stand. The late Minister of Justice was seated beside me in the afternoon as the house was going through the various bills. The bills on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Justice were passed over, every one of them. The late Minister of Justice said to me, "If on Tuesday next a bill having to do with the Quebec judges should be called, would you kindly ask that it stand, as I shall be away that afternoon, and I am interested in it." I said to Mr. Lapointe, that he had better cross over and make his own arrangements with the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who was in the house. Following my suggestion, the hon. member for Quebec east crossed the floor of the house, had a conversation with the Minister of Justice, came back and told me that if that particular bill were called on Tuesday afternoon it would not be proceeded with. Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker. The postponement had no reference to any measure that was before the house on Friday, because as I have said the ex-Minister of Justice was here hoping that those bills would be called last Friday afternoon so that they might be out of the way before he left for Quebec. Those are the facts and I leave it to hon. members of the house to judge for themselves the truth of the matter referred to.

In regard to the other matter to which my right hon. friend has just referred, namely what was said at London, may I first of all, read to the house the statement I was dealing with at London with respect to campaign funds. It was in reference to what the right hon. Prime Minister had said in this house at the last session of parliament, as set forth in the fourth volume of Hansard for July 31, 1931, at page 4399. After referring to the evidence taken before the select committee on the Beauharnois inquiry the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

> All that appears there—and it is correct—is that I did decline to have anything to do with contributions from the Beauharnois people, so far as my party was concerned. And it is not a matter for which any great credit is to be accorded to me. I never have claimed such credit. I merely took the view any man should take, that as the matter had been raised in parliament, and I had said that I thought a judicial investigation should be held, if I succeeded to power I was bound to provide that investigation. How could I do that if I had taken benefactions from them for the purpose of preventing my taking proper action? That is the question.

The point which I was making at London was that the motive of my right hon. friend in—I will not use the expression "returning contributions," I will say a further word on that later, but let me put it accurately now—in refusing to accept contributions—

Mr. BENNETT: Thanks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —was not one of the public interest but was, as therein stated by himself namely, that he expected if returned to power to have an investigation, and in the circumstances he felt it would not be wise for him to take any contributions.

May I direct the attention of hon. members to the statement my right hon. friend made—

> All that appears there—and it is correct—is that I did decline to have anything to do with contributions. . . .

He does not say "with offers of contributions" but he does say "I did decline to have anything to do with contributions from the Beauharnois people," and adds "so far as my party was concerned."—not "so far as I was concerned, alone," not so far as the Conservative fund, narrowly described, is concerned, but so far as my party was concerned. Those are his words. He said, "I did decline to have anything to do with contributions from the Beauharnois people, so far as my party was concerned." I certainly did not do my right hon. friend an injustice, but, rather, gave him credit for much more than I should have given him credit for. I assumed that his statement that no contributions to the Conservative fund, so far as his party was concerned, had been countenanced by himself, meant that where contributions had been made to the party fund they had been returned. I naturally gave credit to my right hon. friend for a full return when he said, as he stated in other words the other day in the house, that not a "damned cent" had been accepted, that he meant that his party had not received a cent from the Beauharnois people. What I should have said, I am quite free to admit at the moment, is that the Prime Minister had allowed $10,000 to be accepted by General McCuaig in Montreal, a contribution made to the Conservative party, a contribution made—in the terms of Mr. Sweezey who made it—to the Conservative organization and to what he understood was the Conservative fund, and that that was not returned; but that the Prime Minister had refused to allow to be accepted an additional contribution of $200,000 for the reason that was mentioned. If my right hon. friend derives any solace from the fact that I did not confine my remarks simply to one phase, namely, to his refusing to accept only something, and gave him credit for having returned everything, when I should have said that he had not returned the $10,000 and knew that the $10,000 had not been returned, when he said that he had not accepted a cent from Beauharnois or had not permitted his party to accept anything—he may get what solace he likes from that source.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The question, Mr. Speaker, now becomes one of very acute privilege in view of the observations made by the right hon. gentleman. At page 122 of the proceedings Mr. White put this question to Mr. Sweezey:

Q. And then who else if anybody?

To which Mr. Sweezey answered:

A. Well, still speaking of federal campaign funds, I do not recall of any specific—oh, yes, I contributed to General McCuaig, who, I understood, was the collector for the Conservative campaign fund in Montreal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman at London referred to the general campaign fund and said that money had been accepted and returned. I am not talking of the different funds, I am talking of the facts. I say further I knew nothing of General McCuaig's receipt of that contribution from Beauharnois, or anything about Beauharnois contributions to any fund, until after this matter came up here. That is the fact, as can be established by General McCuaig. There will be opportunity in another place to have this matter disposed of finally.

Let us go a step further—I said, and the right hon. gentleman still slips away from the question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that at London he charged me with having accepted $200,000 from Beauharnois through General McRae, and that at my instance it was directed to be returned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my right hon. friend read from my speech in London where I made any mention of $200,000? My right hon. friend did not do that when he read from my speech; he read those words in a communication from Mr. Sweezey which statement is not correct. I made no such statement at London with reference to $200,000. My right hon. friend has my London speech in his hand, and I ask him to read it to the house.

Mr. BENNETT: To show how the right hon. gentleman is now, as we say in law, hanging himself—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: —I will read from page 4385 of last year's Hansard what the right hon. gentleman said in his speech on the Beauharnois report:

The following statement is made in the report, as appears on page 634 of votes and proceedings. I read this to bring out the difference between my hon. friend and myself in the way in which I think it should be understood. The report reads:

"There was also a suggestion with reference to a proposed contribution to the Conservative federal campaign fund through its organizer, General McRae. This, however, was not made. Asked if the reason for its not having been made was that Mr. Bennett would not accept it, Mr. Sweezey in his reply said 'I do not know that but I presume that may be so.'"

The evidence upon which that statement in the report is based will be found at page 823. The following are questions asked of Mr. Sweezey:

"Q. Was there any proposal indicating a contribution to the federal campaign fund through its organizer, General McRae?—A. Yes, a proposal came to me at one time to make a contribution.

"Q. Of how much?—A. Of $200,000.

"Q. Was it made?—A. No.

"Q. Why?—A. I do not know what happened.

"Q. I understand that Mr. Bennett would not accept it?"

Those are the words read into the record of the proceedings of this chamber by the right hon. gentleman himself on the 30th day of July last. In the face of that knowledge this same gentleman goes up to London and makes a statement to the people of Ontario and to the people of Canada that a contribution was made to the general fund and at my instance returned. I called him to account for having made that misstatement, and this house and the country have heard his endeavour to slide out of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the same privilege as has been accorded to the Prime Minister in replying to this matter of privilege. So that there may be no mistake as to what I said in London, I ask the house to listen to what I did say; I will read the entire text of my speech in this particular. It is in these words:

The next point to note is that contributions were made by those associated with Beauharnois to both political parties, to the Conservative party and members of the party in the federal field, as well as to the party or members of the party in Ontario and Quebec, and that the return of the contribution made to the general fund of the Conservative party was on grounds of party expediency and not of public policy.

When the general elections came on, Mr. Sweezey made a contribution to the campaign funds of both the Liberal and Conservative parties. Later the contribution given to the treasurer of the Conservative party was returned,—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Allow me to continue:

—he, according to Mr. Sweezey's statement of what he had been told, having had instructions from Mr. Bennett to return the contribution. Now what was Mr. Bennett's reason for directing the return of the amount contributed? Was it that contributions would not be accepted from corporations or persons associated with corporations which might be seeking favours from governments? Was it that the Beauharnois company might be coming to whatever government might be in office after the elections —possibly Mr. Bennett's own—for wider rights and powers, and that it was therefore better not to accept a contribution? Perhaps the answer can best be given by Mr. Bennett himself.

Speaking in the House of Commons on July 31 he said that by his previous utterances in parliament he was committed to a judicial investigation into the affairs of the Beauharnois company, that if he were returned to power he was bound to provide that investigation. What does this mean? It means simply that had a contribution been accepted that fact would have been disclosed. It would have been shown in the investigation which Mr. Bennett said he was bound to provide, which, by the way, he did not provide as he said he would by a judicial inquiry, but by a committee composed mostly of members of his own party in parliament, that the Conservative party had, equally with their opponents, received contributions to their campaign funds from Mr. Sweezey. How differently the whole matter would look if upon investigation it were shown that the Liberal party was the only party to receive contributions from this source. Or even more, if it could be shown in addition that he, Mr. Bennett, had actually refused to allow the acceptance of any contribution from that source. If it could only be shown that the Liberals had received a contribution and that Mr. Bennett had caused to be returned the contribution his own organizer had accepted,—

Mr. BENNETT: Do you hear that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will continue:

—that would be not only a black eye for the Liberal party, but he, Mr. Bennett, would stand forth in shining armour as the one knight of the table round who had made war upon the dragons of greed and corruption which lay in the path of purity in the political life of Canada.

Far be it from me to deny to the present Prime Minister any such lofty motive, or to thwart him in any such heroic task. I would like the country to know that we had such a man in our midst. To this end, perhaps Mr. Bennett will tell us the amount of his own contributions to the party funds, whether campaign funds were solicited or accepted by his organizer-in-chief from other corporations or interests, and whether they were ordered by him to be returned. The refusal of one contribution in a campaign for fear of exposure is scarcely a sufficient title to knightly preferment in the order of political chivalry. I am anxious that our Prime Minister shall lose no honour to which he is entitled. Mr. Bennett's party is making very much of this act on the part of its leader, while I am being chastised and condemned for not having had full knowledge of all contributions that were being made to the campaign funds of the party, and not having acted as Mr. Bennett did with respect to any contribution from sources connected with Beauharnois. We are being told by the Conservative press that Mr. Bennett apparently took the trouble to find out who were contributing and offering to contribute to his party, and was particular about them. "Premier Bennett" it is said, "has been the exception among party leaders in turning the spotlight on the collection bag."

All that I ask of Mr. Bennett is, if the role he has chosen for himself is the one his party would have us believe it is, that he play it to the full. I ask him to come along with me and let us complete the job, by searching out, as respects the last three general elections, those who have made contributions to political parties. Let us show the public which the corporations were, what the interests were, who the individuals were that made contributions to the campaign funds of political parties, and what were the amounts of their contributions. Then the public will be in a position not only to judge between us, as to rights and wrongs of the respective political parties we have the honour to lead, but, what is of even much greater importance, they will be in a better position to know what is required in the way of remedying a situation with respect to campaign funds which has presented its problems to political parties at every election held in Canada since there was a dominion parliament.

That is the entire statement I made at London.

May I now come to the question as to whether I was justified in believing that moneys had been paid into the Conservative fund.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not it. The charge is that moneys were paid into the general fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not going to quibble over the use of the words "general fund" or "Conservative fund"; I am going to take the meaning of the words as they were understood by those who made the contribution. Whether that particular contribution of $10,000 was made in Montreal or in Ottawa is not significant in the mind of anyone in this country except those who are trying to conceal the fact that the contribution was made to Conservative funds. Whether I was justified in believing that the contribution made by Beauharnois to the Conservative party was made to the Conservative general fund I will leave to the house to judge from the following extracts which appear in the journals of the house. I quote from volume 69 of the Journals of the House of Commons, 1931, appendix No. 5, page 822. Mr. Sweezey was being examined by counsel, Mr. White:

Q. And then who else, if anybody?

This was with reference to contributions to the federal funds; that was the phase of the matter with which the committee was dealing at the time these questions were asked, and the right hon. Prime Minister had that information before him when he made his statement later in the house.

Q. And then who else, if anybody?
A. Well, still speaking of federal campaign funds, I do not recall of any specific,—oh, yes, I contributed to General McQuaig, who I understood was the collector for the Conservative campaign fund in Montreal.
Q. How much?
A. $10,000.
Q. Anybody else?

Then Mr. Lennox, who was a Conservative member of the committee, said:

You did not treat us very generously.

As I said last night the word "us" certainly means the federal Conservative party, and the $10,000 was a contribution to the funds of the Conservative party. Later I find the following:

By Mr. Lennox:
Q. Have you told us of all the federal contributions?
A. Yes, sir.

As I have said; that was in reference to federal contributions. Then Mr. Griffith was called and these are the questions that were put to him:

By Mr. Lennox:
Q. I am speaking of the federal Conservative party. Were there any contributions made by the company to the Conservative party at the last election, or at any other time?
A. There was a total, I think, of $25,000 which was given, as Mr. Sweezey has testified, to the Conservative organization.
The Chairman: No; he said to friends whom he had helped before, and he named one, Mr. Leslie Bell.
The witness: That is right. In our mind, I may say, they were regarded as a contribution to the Conservative organization.
By Hon. Mr. Mackenzie:
Q. Was not there anybody else outside of Mr. Bell?
A. General Eric McQuaig and Mr. Cartier.

General Eric McCuaig was acting for the Conservative party, to receive funds which he was transmitting to General McRae, or was distributing among members of the party.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no evidence of that. This is another instance of my right hon. friend not sticking to the record.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then are we to assume that General McCuaig was taking the money for himself. Now, Mr. Speaker, so that this thing may be put right once and for all, let me give the facts exactly as I now understand them in the light of the explanation which has been made by the Prime Minister. I will use the words I used at London, as nearly as possible, saying what I would have said if I had then possessed the information my right hon. friend has since brought forward, because certainly when my right hon. friend said, "I declined to have anything to do with contributions from the Beauharnois, as far as my party was concerned," I was under the impression that he was making it plain that if there had been contributions to the party to any extent those contributions certainly had been returned so that he was not under any obligation in any way. Let me make it clear; following the words of my London address, the position is this:

"Contributions were made by those associated with Beauharnois to both political parties, to the Conservative party and members of the party in the federal field, as well as to the party or members of the party in Ontario and Quebec, and the contribution made by Beauharnois to the fund of the Conservative party in Montreal, $10,000, was not returned, though the Prime Minister refused a further contribution, on the grounds—" I will not go into that; I have already stated the grounds.

Then: "When the general elections came on Mr. Sweezey made a contribution to the campaign funds of both the Liberal and Conservative parties. Later the contribution given to a treasurer of the Conservative party was not returned, but the contribution of a further amount of $200,000 which had been asked for was not made by Mr. Sweezey, he having understood that Mr. Bennett had given instructions that no contribution should be accepted. What was Mr. Bennett's reason for not permitting the acceptance of the further contribution? Was it that contributions would not be accepted from corporations or persons associated with corporations which might be seeking favours from governments?" and so on, as it appears in the London speech.

These are the facts, Mr. Speaker, in regard to that matter. I have no desire to take up the time of the house with differences between the Prime Minister and myself. During the years I was Prime Minister, when matters of relatively small import, and particularly those personal to myself, came up, I adopted the plan of quietly interviewing my opponent with regard to those matters so that the house might be spared the trouble of having to consider them. I would suggest to my right hon. friend that as he is Prime Minister at present he is the one who must take the initiative in matters of this kind. If he desires my cooperation in the work of this house, and if he follows the course in public life that is followed in private life, I shall be only too happy to cooperate with him to the best of my ability. But I will say, that as a member of parliament, I will claim the same rights in this House of Commons as in private life, I would claim in dealing with individuals.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman stopped at a very convenient place. At page 822 of the proceedings of the committee Mr. Sweezey was under examination, and he stated that these were personal contributions to General McCuaig and Mr. Bell. These were his words:

Q. Then who else, if anybody?
A. I do not recall anybody at the moment. As I pointed out before—I would like to add this, that those were personal contributions and they did not in any way come out of the company's $30,000,000 of financing.
Q. Which were?
A. I mean those contributions I have just spoken of.
Q. All of them?
A. They were personal contributions.
Q. Or are you speaking of the contributions to Mr. Bell and General McQuaig only?
A. Well, these are my own personal accounts. Now, some of these may be reported by Mr. Griffith; there is a little bit of confusion in my mind; but whatever difference there is as between what Mr. Griffith may report and I report is comparatively small, and I am not quite clear on which side some of these small amounts sit. What I want to say is, that all these contributions, like the contributions already referred to, made by certain members of the syndicate, came from friends entirely outside of the company. For instance, when I paid that money I paid for it with money of my own, which I had or acquired from friends.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question?

Mr. BENNETT: I think not; this is a question of privilege. I have just read the conclusion of Mr. Sweezey's evidence, and I come back to this: Presumably this house heard the speech made by the right hon. gentleman last year, and presumably hon. members read his speech delivered at London. In the first he read from the evidence and therefore knew that no money had been paid or returned. In the second he deliberately charged that a contribution had been made to the general fund and returned; $200,000 was the sum mentioned in the report. That is admittedly untrue and I ventured in this house to point out this falsity and say that one of two things must follow. The right hon. gentleman was either reckless and recreant to his duty in making the statement or he knew it to be false when he made it. I have proved the latter by proving that he had the information before him and read it in this chamber last year. Later, when the right hon. gentleman rose in his place and said, "I assure you that I did not do it knowingly," I accepted his statement. I will leave it to those who may read Hansard, and read that explanation, to determine whether or not there is that frank, unequivocal, fair meeting of a difficulty when confronted with it, involving as it does a serious misstatement of fact, or anything but an effort to try to vindicate his own position at the expense of those who are his opponents.

I have only one more word to say and it is this. The right hon. gentleman has spoken of meeting in private and making observations that would clear up seeming difficulties. But it was in London on the broadcast that that statement was made, and it is in the House of Commons, on the floor of parliament, that I meet it. I know of no other place in which it could be met unless I held another meeting to deny it. I pursued the only course that could be pursued in view of that improper, incorrect and untrue statement, which I regret very much was made, because it enabled the right hon. gentleman to draw a conclusion which he could not draw unless he made that improper and incorrect statement.

That is the question of privilege I have raised here to-day. It is a privilege that touches, in my judgment, very acutely the position which I think any public man should have in mind; and if there be any doubt about this, then as I have said I trust an ample opportunity will be afforded in another place to clear it up once for all and leave no doubt—that no such contribution was made to the general funds of the party which I had the honour then to lead and of which I am now the head. The contributions made by Mr. Sweezey to General McCuaig and Mr. Bell were, as he says, personal contributions which he made from funds that did not come out of the Beauharnois $30,000,000. I merely leave it at that. I regret very much that such heat has been shown with respect to this matter. What I desired to say I have said strongly. There is no reason why, because the conduct of party chiefs drags the leader of a party with his party into the valley of humiliation, he should not be willing to leave others without endeavouring to drag them in too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has referred to the Journals of the House with regard to a statement made by Mr. Sweezey to the effect that the contributions which he made to Mr. Bell and to General McCuaig were personal contributions and not from the funds of the corporation. He did not read to the house similar statements made by Mr. Sweezey in reference to the contributions made to Senator Raymond and Senator Haydon. Mr. Sweezey was careful to say—and the part to which my right hon. friend has made reference will show—that he was speaking of contributions generally and not merely—

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so; he was dealing with these contributions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, it will be found that the remarks that were read by my right hon. friend himself to-day had reference to contributions as a whole, as made to both parties. But certainly the Prime Minister should have made it clear that the contributions which were made to Liberal senators were, with equal emphasis, stated by Mr. Sweezey to have been made from his funds personally and in the same way as he had made them to General McCuaig.

Now I am not going to try to follow my right hon. friend in his determination to have the last word; I know he is incapable of a gracious act and I will not follow him further.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to ask the leader of my party—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —a question which—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —the leader of the government has refused to answer. My question is this—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in order in putting a question to the leader of the opposition. The rule is quite clear.

Mr. POULIOT: I am asking my leader to answer a question—

[Mr. Bennett.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member may not ask the question.

Mr. REID: Before the orders of the day are called, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has the floor.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES OF MUNICIPALITIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). In view of the information given to the house on Wednesday last, that the sum of $2,525,000 had been sent to the province of British Columbia in advance payment for unemployment relief purposes, will the Prime Minister consider the advisability of appointing a royal commission to inquire into the matter in British Columbia so as to find out why employment under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931 is not being proceeded with by that province, and to find out why the municipalities are experiencing great difficulty and untoward delay in obtaining financial assistance agreed upon by the dominion, such assistance having been sent by the dominion to that province. And further—

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member directing a question to the Prime Minister?

Mr. REID: It is a direct question.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not the time to make a speech on the subject.

Mr. REID: And further, if the moneys so sent have been used for purposes other than that for which they have been sent, where have such moneys been so used?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is not the time for the making of general speeches. I would quote to the house from Bourinot in this regard:

When the orders of the day are called by the Speaker and before they are read by the clerk assistant, it is the practice sanctioned by usage but not by any positive rule, for members to make personal explanations or ask questions of the government, in reference to an inaccurate report of their speeches in the official records, or in the newspapers; or in denial of certain charges made against them in the public prints; or in reference to certain remarks which had been misunderstood on a previous occasion, and which they had not before had an opportunity of explaining; or in respect to delay in obtaining returns or to the incompleteness of certain returns brought down under the order of the house; or relative to the state of public business, or other matters of public interest. But these remarks should be brief as they are only tolerated, there being no question before the Chair when they are made. . . .

May says, at page 285:

The indulgence of a personal explanation should be granted with caution; for, unless discreetly used, it is apt to lead to irregular debates.

I trust that hon. members will bear these authorities in mind.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was set a very bad example by previous speakers.

EXPENDITURE IN GLOUCESTER COUNTY, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, last Friday sessional paper No. 122 was laid on the table in response to a motion made by myself. My motion asked for a copy of the report of J. B. Carter, representative of the Department of Labour, in connection with the investigation made by him of complaints relating to the expenditure on unemployment relief work on roads and bridges in the county of Gloucester, as well as a copy of any evidence on which such report was made. The sessional paper does not contain the papers I have asked for; the only report produced by Mr. Carter is one which refers to work carried on in the province of New Brunswick by the provincial government and does not cover, as he states himself, any unemployment relief work. I asked for his report on the projects which he investigated in Gloucester county carried on as unemployment relief work, and I have not received it. Would the minister be good enough to call the attention of Mr. Carter to this matter in order that I may obtain his report on the East and South Bathurst roads, the roads at Mizzenette, Blue Cove and in the parish of Beresford. Mr. Carter investigated complaints made in this connection and I understand he has made a report.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member made a complaint about the method or manner of expending moneys in certain places in the province of New Brunswick, and that as a result of that complaint Mr. Carter was sent down to investigate. When he arrived in New Brunswick he found that the work complained about was provincial work with which we were not concerned. This is my recollection of the matter, but I will inquire further and endeavour to give more detailed information.

Mr. VENIOT: If I am not out of order I would direct the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) to the fact that Mr Carter mentions the detailed statement made by myself. If, as he says, the work which he investigated does not come under unemployment relief, why did he investigate?

Mr. GORDON: Because of the complaints made by the hon. member.

Mr. VENIOT: I made no complaints in connection with that work.

Mr. GORDON: Someone did.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is all out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: Surely I am entitled to put myself right in this matter. Mr. Carter has stated that his report is based on a newspaper item and not on any complaints made to the department. Why should he investigate a newspaper item when he had before him a detailed statement covering two pages of foolscap?

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, will the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) advise the house if it is the intention of the government to bring in a new relief measure before the expiration of the present act?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The matter is under consideration.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BELL (ST. ANTOINE)

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LESLIE G. BELL (St. Antoine): It was my intention, Mr. Speaker, to bring up to-day the matter which has received considerable attention this afternoon, particularly regarding myself. The hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) mentioned, when dealing with the Beauharnois scandal, as he termed it, that Leslie Bell, Montreal, Conservative member, had received a special contribution of $6,000 from Beauharnois; at least it was intimated that it was from the Beauharnois corporation. Let me state explicitly to the house at the outset that personally I have not received, directly or indirectly, from the Beauharnois corporation, one single cent. The contributions which I received in the campaigns of 1925, 1926 and 1930 have been personal contributions from Mr. R. O Sweezey, whom I have known since 1909, a period of twenty years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): It is all right for hon. members opposite to laugh about this matter but since it has taken on such a serious aspect let us be serious. The cheque which I received was signed by Mr. Sweezey personally. Mr. Sweezey, as hon. gentlemen must know, is the president not only of Beauharnois but perhaps of a dozen other companies. How can anyone except the person who receives the contribution, judge whether it is given by the contributor personally?

Mr. DUFF: We did not object to it.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): The hon. member for East Hamilton insinuated that I received a contribution of $6,000 from Beauharnois.

Mr. DUFF: You started this thing, we did not.

An hon. MEMBER: We are sorry the hon. member did not get more.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): I am satisfied, if the house is clear on that point, that this was a personal contribution from Mr. Sweezey. This was published in the report which I, as a member of parliament, am supposed to make. It is also abundantly clear from the evidence which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has read this afternoon that this was a personal contribution and I think the hon. member for East Hamilton should correct his statement as published.

RADIO BROADCASTING

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROBLEM OF CANADIAN SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Rgiht Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for some time I have been advised that the house has been waiting for a statement with respect to the radio decision given a few days ago, and I will therefore make a brief statement.

Since January 18, 1931, the question of the constitutional authority to control radio broadcasting has been before the courts and no effective parliamentary action has been possible pending the determination of the question. The judgment of the privy council, delivered on February 9, decides that the control of aeronautics rests with the Dominion parliament and not with the provincial legislatures. This government, therefore, is now free to take action leading to the establishment of such a scheme of radio broadcasting as may be deemed advisable in the national interests.

It must be agreed that the present system of radio broadcasting is unsatisfactory. Canadians have the right to a system of broadcasting from Canadian sources equal in all respects to that of any other country. Such a scheme can be established only after the most thorough inquiry and upon a program which will take several years to carry into effect. The enormous benefits of an adequate scheme of radio broadcasting controlled and operated by Canadians is abundantly plain. Properly employed, the radio can be made a most effective instrument in nation building, with an educational value difficult to estimate. Only this morning I received a communication from Doctor Fox, president of the Western university and of the Association of University Presidents indicating that in May next they propose to discuss the educational value of the radio.

The government has before it the report of the Aird commission which contains very helpful information upon many phases of the radio situation. It is proposed to institute further inquiry in the light of present conditions into other phases of the situation, and in particular into the possibilities of a scheme which will ensure unexcelled radio reception from Canadian stations. The agency through which such a scheme can most satisfactorily be operated and controlled also must be determined by a committee of the house which will be required to prepare a scheme of radio broadcasting. For this purpose it is proposed to set up a special committee of this house to deal with the situation. The terms of reference of the committee will be broad and may be phrased as follows:

(1) To advise and recommend a complete technical scheme of radio broadcasting for Canada, so designed as to ensure from Canadian sources as complete and satisfactory a service as the present development of radio science will permit.

(2) To investigate and report upon the most satisfactory agency for carrying out such a scheme.

The committee will afford representatives of private interests and advocates of public ownership the fullest opportunity to place before it their several views.

I need hardly say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not proposed to set up a large committee. It is hoped that among the members of the house there are those with sufficient general knowledge of the technical details of radio broadcasting to enable this committee to deal with the various problems with which it will be charged and to understand the technical evidence which will be presented. It is the intention to ask hon. gentlemen opposite to canvass their members for those most able to deal satisfactorily with this problem, and we will do the same. These problems will be referred to this committee which will decide, in the light of the evidence produced, the proper agency to be employed for broadcasting, whether it shall be publicly or privately owned. It is proposed that evidence may be submitted by memoranda from different bodies specifically interested, and so far as possible the widest latitude will be afforded to the communities generally to express their views with respect to this matter.

POLITICAL SUBSCRIPTIONS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, would the right hon. the Prime Minister advise the house as to the amount of a political subscription which would change a venial sin into a mortal sin?

CIVIL SERVICE

STATUTORY INCREASES TO BE WITHHELD IN FISCAL YEAR 1932-1933

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Will the statutory increases be paid to the civil service during the coming fiscal year?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman was good enough to advise me that he proposed to make the inquiry this afternoon. The answer is no.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO TIME OF PAYMENT BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) in answering a question of mine the other day relative to the time when the old age pension grant would be made said that it would not be made until the necessary new arrangements had been executed with the provinces. That is simply an answer in form. I know that some of the provinces are anxiously looking forward to having the agreements drawn up, and I wonder if the minister could throw any light as to when the grant will be made, and why the delay.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The form of the agreement and the regulations thereunder have been approved, and there should be no delay now in having the agreements with the provinces signed. I do not anticipate any.

REPRESENTATIVE IN CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In view of the conditions of war existing between China and Japan I would ask the Prime Minister if the government has taken under consideration the advisability of appointing a distinct and separate ambassador to China in order that the government will be represented there.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is no.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

TRIALS BEFORE STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES IN MANITOBA AND SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CONVEYANCE OF PROHIBITED ARTICLES BY FREIGHT, EXPRESS OR SHIP

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, to amend the criminal code.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement with city of Ottawa extended for one year.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I assume that this measure simply extends the present agreement in exactly the same form as it appeared last year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The hon. gentleman is quite correct. It does not in any way change the status quo, if I may so describe it, and permits payment for the current year on the same basis as that adopted for some years past.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The house in committee of supply.

Public Buildings—Ontario: Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $125,000.
Hamilton — public building — renovation of heating plant, $9,500.
London armouries — government's share of cost of local improvements, $960.
London—tractor for postal purposes, $1,700.
New Liskeard—public building—under contract, $9,000.
Parry Sound—public building—under contract, $49,000.
Penetanguishene—public building—under contract, $10,000.
Perth — public building — under contract, $47,000.
Toronto — custom house — under contract, $60,000.
Toronto—payment of instalment on purchase of armoury—under contract, $29,500.
Toronto — postal station "A" — mechanical equipment and improvements—under contract, $20,000.
Windsor—public building—under construction, $500,000.—Total, $861,660.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I presume that at this point I may make an observation concerning the public works estimates generally. They indicate that in comparison with the total of last year there has been a cut amounting to about $9,000,000, in all.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Approximately that.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is important that the house and country should understand that, while that deduction appears here, it is very largely, if not more than, offset by the amount of public expenditures made on public works under the Unemployment Relief Act. For example, under the relief act of 1930 some $14,000,000 has been spent, and of course the largest part of the $70,000,000 contracted for between the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities has been spent on public works, and the commitments under the relief act for 1931 show equally large expenditures to be made on public works. I hope as we go along that the minister will indicate where, here and there, out of the public relief moneys, expenditures have been made for work being done in the different provinces. We would then have a better idea as to the total expenditures from the federal treasury on public works. If he is in a position to do that, I am sure hon. members will find such information very helpful.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Replying to my right hon. friend, I can say only that during the year 1930 there was no direct appropriation for works or expenditures under the Public Works department, and any expenditures he has in mind were made in cooperation with the provinces. For the current year the appropriation, in round figures, was approximately $2,500,000, but I have not the details before me. Of that amount we have expended, or expect to expend before the first of March, in round figures, between $1,500,000 and $2,000,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Is that for the dominion as a whole?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, all the expenditures that are made under the direct control of the Department of Public Works, for which a return giving details will be tendered to the house.

Mr. GARDINER: Does that include amounts of money spent by the Department of Labour, or under the direction of that department? Are those expenditures only for the Department of Public Works?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The hon. gentleman is quite correct; those are expenditures entirely under the control of the Department of Public Works for which we are directly responsible.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it your intention, Mr. Chairman, to call the items as a whole or deal with them separately?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In my opinion they should be dealt with separately.

Mr. GARDINER: Are we dealing with the first section of item No. 115, or the whole item?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I have called the item as a whole, but we can deal with each individual section if hon. members so desire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that would be the better course to pursue.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the desire of the committee that each item be called separately?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The practice generally followed has been to allow considerable latitude on the discussion of the items as a whole. I do not see that there is any necessity to take up unnecessary time in discussions of individual items if we are permitted a full discussion on the general item. There ought to be an understanding, however, that very considerable latitude will be allowed for discussion on whole items, if that course be pursued.

The CHAIRMAN: That is fair.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And quite satisfactory to me.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings—Alberta: Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $15,000.
High River—public building—under contract, $7,000.

Mr. REID: Are the public buildings here mentioned under the direct control of the Department of Public Works, or are they included in expenditures under the Unemployment Relief Act?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): These are all under the control of the Public Works department; they form no part of any unemployment relief.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have been requested by the board of trade of Red Deer to pass on to the minister a petition which has already been sent to the engineer of his department asking that some attention be given to the improvement of the federal public building in Red Deer so that it may be in keeping with the other buildings surrounding the public square, these other buildings and the square itself having been very much improved by the city recently. Undoubtedly this request will come before the minister in due course, and I take this opportunity of bringing it to his attention and asking that it be given favourable consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can assure my hon. friend that to the extent funds are available the matter will be given consideration and attention.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings—British Columbia: Atlin public building—renovation of heating plant, $2,500.
Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $45,000.
Esquimalt—repairs and improvements at R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyard, $10,000.
Kamloops public building—renovation of heating plant, $1,000.
Vancouver armoury—payment of instalment on purchase of armoury, $14,000.
Vancouver—public building, repairs to roof, $7,500.
Vancouver public building—to meet one year's interest at 5 per cent on mortgage of $400,000, $20,000.

Mr. REID: What is the purpose of the $45,000 vote for improvements and repairs?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is the same amount as was available last year for making such improvements in and repairs to public buildings as may become necessary from time to time. The vote is not allocated to any particular building, or to any particular line of work.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the explanation of the vote for $20,000—to meet one year's interest at 5 per cent on mortgage of $400,000 on Vancouver public building?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is the mortgage interest on a building known as the Winch building, which was purchased some years ago by the department.

Mr. NEILL: What fuel is used in the Atlin and Kamloops public buildings?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The fuel used is coal.

Mr. McINTOSH: Considering that the votes this year for public works in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia total approximately a quarter of a million, while the vote for Ontario is $861,000, I should like to know if the cut has been proportionate throughout these respective votes?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend will notice that the public building at Windsor accounts for a large amount of the Ontario vote. I think the proportionate reductions are fair. They are based upon the actual requirements and are in accord with the practice followed in previous years.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was wondering whether the cut in the public works estimates for the western provinces and for Ontario was in proportion. The aggregate of the votes for the four western provinces is quite small, and as they are in the developing part of the dominion it is important that their public building requirements should be looked after.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): All that has been given consideration.

Item agreed to.

Generally—experimental farms—replacements, repairs and improvements, $22,500.
Flags for dominion public buildings, $2,500.
Military buildings — repairs and fittings, $25,000.
Military hospitals—repairs, improvements and alterations, $60,000.
Public buildings—generally, $35,000.
Ottawa departmental buildings, fittings, etc., $50,000.
Ottawa—payment of final instalment on purchase of building for government workshops, $10,550.
Ottawa—government's share of cost of local improvements, $18,250.

Mr. BRADETTE: Does the item of $22,500, for experimental farms, replacements, repairs and improvements, include an appropriation for replacing the buildings destroyed last fall at the Cascade experimental station?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is to provide for repairs and improvements at the central experimental farm.

Mr. BRADETTE: I hope that under this item it is possible for the hon. minister to advise me if it is the intention of the government to replace the buildings at the Cascade experimental farm which were destroyed last fall.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am of opinion that it would be taken care of in the Agriculture department estimates rather than in those of this department.

Sir EUGENE FISET: In regard to the two items of military buildings and military hospitals, has the Department of Public Works taken over the repairs of these buildings from the Department of National Defence?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, the same policy followed for years by my predecessor is still being followed.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is there also a vote in the National Defence estimates in conjunction with work of this kind, or is it wholly taken care of by the hon. minister's department?

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The work is not all done by the Public Works department; armouries and drill halls are cared for by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Will the minister kindly inform the house how he can consistently maintain the "Canada First" policy and at the same time reduce by half the appropriation for flags for dominion public buildings?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We think that for the present year the supply of flags on hand will be ample to enable us to keep the old flag flying.

Mr. McINTOSH: I presume the minister is referring to the empire flag, not to the Canadian flag, nor to the "Canada First" flag?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am referring to the good old Union Jack, which I am sure will be acceptable to my hon. friend.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is satisfactory.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings—Nova Scotia: Canso public building—improvements and repairs, $6,000.
Halifax—repairs to buildings and wharfs at R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyards, $25,000.
Inverness public building—extension of sewer, $2,000.
New Glasgow public building—addition—under contract, $9,000.
Sydney Mines public building—improvements and repairs, $5,000.—Total, $47,000.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Before this item carries, there are one or two observations I should like to direct to the Minister of Public Works. I think these estimates gave us all a bit of a shock, and that is particularly so in my case because, owing to my efforts when the previous government was in power, a vote was put through for a public building in the town of New Waterford. Last year the amount was revoted but not spent, and I had hoped that at least it would be in the estimates this year even if the government did not intend to spend it. May I hope it will be in the supplementaries?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can only say to my hon. friend that we had quite a number of buildings in the same position last year. As an old member of the house he knows that these buildings are paid for from revenue and not out of capital, so when the revenues shrink we generally contract our program to keep pace as far as possible. If I had thought my hon. friend would be so easily satisfied, with having the amount in the estimates without having the work done, possibly I might have put it in. However his request, together with others I have received since these rather limited estimates were brought down, will be filed and considered very carefully.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings — Quebec: Beebe — building for immigration and customs purposes, $16,000.
Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $120,000.
Grosse Isle quarantine station—improvements and repairs, $2,500.
Huntingdon—public building—under contract, $11,000.
Montreal armoury—payment of instalment on purchase of armoury, $15,140.
Montreal—Craig street drill hall—renewal of roof, $8,000.
Montreal—postal terminal building, $500,000.
Montreal — Stephens building — equipment — under contract, $7,500.
Quebec Citadel—improvements and maintenance, $15,000.
Ste. Anne de Bellevue—public building—under contract, $9,000.
Trout River—building for immigration and customs purposes, $26,000.
Westmount — armoury — payment of instalment on purchase of armoury, $13,000.—Total, $743,140.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): There is an item in this estimate covering the renewal of the roof of the Craig street drill hall. Is that to be a complete new roof, or is that for the repair of the present roof? This is a very large building and I do not see how you could put on a new roof for $8,000.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, this is only for the necessary repairs and renewals. The specifications are not prepared as yet; this is only an estimate of what will be required.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Have you had a complaint that the roof is leaking. I pass there every day and see the roof, and it seems to be in good condition.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If it is not leaking we will not repair it.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Will the work be done by tender or by the department?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We will follow the rule and call for tenders.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): What is the public building for Huntingdon?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A post office building.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Did Mayor Houde of Montreal make a request for the construction of this post office?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am not aware of it. Probably he has made many requests, but he has not asked me for it.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Is that the same post office the Liberal government intended to build two or three years ago?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friends have not honoured me with their confidence as to their intentions in the past.

Mr. HOWARD: In connection with the public building at Beebe, in the county of Stanstead, I should like to know if the work has commenced, if the site has been purchased, or if anything has been done.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. HOWARD: Nothing at all?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. HOWARD: And does the same thing apply in Huntingdon?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The building is under contract and pretty well under way.

Mr. HOWARD: I am interested in that district and I should like to congratulate the minister on providing for these two public buildings, the one in Beebe in the county of Stanstead, represented by my good friend John Hackett, and the other in Huntingdon, represented by Doctor Moore.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Since the minister seems to be so well disposed towards members on this side of the house, I wonder if he would give some consideration to the promise made by my opponent during the last election that a post office would be constructed at Mont Joli?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Do I understand that my hon. friend advocates the construction of the building?

Sir EUGENE FISET: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Then I shall consider it on its merits.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I notice an item of $15,000 included for maintenance and improvements to the Quebec citadel. This is a continuing item, $17,000 having been voted last year. What are the improvements to be made? Has this to do with the maintenance of the old walls or does it cover improvements to the more modern part, the Governor General's quarters?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is the regular annual charge for the upkeep of the Governor General's quarters.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Not for the upkeep of the old walls?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): We in Montreal are very much interested in the postal terminal, and I should like to know what this $500,000 included here is to be used for.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As my hon. friend probably knows, proceedings were taken by the late government for the expropriation of the site for this building, and the matter is now before the exchequer court. This amount will be used in part payment, at least, of the compensation that may be awarded for that site.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): About how much will that building cost?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This amount probably will not be sufficient to pay for the land. I should say the building will cost about $2,000,000; my recollection is $1,900,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Would the minister tell us where Trout river is?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is somewhere on the boundary between Canada and the United States in the constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Is there a building at Trout river used for customs purposes now?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This amount is to provide for the purchase of a site and the construction of a building at this point for immigration and customs purposes. It is being pressed for very strongly by the Department of National Revenue as being necessary to enable them to take care of the increasing tourist traffic at this point.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): But actually there is a very fine building there now?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We rent a building, which has been found unsuitable and inadequate for our requirements.

Mr. HOWARD: I am heartily in agreement with that policy. I travel back and forth across the line and I know that it makes quite an impression on tourist traffic to have respectable custom houses at the ports of entry. Up until lately the accommodation all along the boundary has been terrible. I congratulate those interested on bringing about this amelioration.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Ottawa—National Research Council laboratories and equipment, $415,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will this sum be sufficient to complete the construction of the laboratories? Can my hon. friend tell us when the administration expects the building to be opened?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is fully expected that this appropriation will be sufficient to complete the building and to equip it, and it is believed that the building will be opened some time in July, about the first part of the month.

Mr. McGIBBON: What has been accomplished in that building during the last year? I have always looked on that as one of the greatest organizations in the dominion and the one capable of the most good.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This department is responsible only for the construction and equipment of the building; its control and the activities carried on in the laboratories are under the Department of Trade and Commerce and the National Research Council. I do not know what their program is but I have great faith in the institution and I am sure it will prove of wonderful advantage to Canada in the future.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The grounds around the building are in pretty bad shape and I have frequently thought during the winter that if my hon. friend had been trying to help the unemployed they might have been put to work getting some of this ground into shape. Even now there may be an opportunity for unemployed to work there.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The matter has given us some concern in the department. We have entered into a contract for the filling material which is being placed but which is now more or less frozen. I can assure my hon. friend that at the earliest possible moment men will be put to work levelling it and we hope to have the grounds present an attractive appearance as early in the year as we can.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia, $430,000.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Is the item of $3,000 for Bay St. Lawrence merely for the breakwater extension?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am sorry I have not the information at hand; I have sent for it. I believe, however, it is for what it says, Bay St. Lawrence breakwater extension.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: There is no item for Dingwall?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers — New Brunswick, $254,300.

Mr. VENIOT: Is there anything in the estimates that will permit the minister to carry on dredging at Tracadie harbour this year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We have a general vote from which we can probably do some work, although possibly we cannot carry on at that point as extensively as we have done in the past.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Quebec, Rimouski river, wharf improvements, $2,800.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is this for the breakwater or the wharf itself?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is for the breakwater and to improve accommodation for the turning of trucks on the wharf.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Has the work which was undertaken last year at Father Point been completed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Has that part of the wharf which was carried away by the tide been repaired under this vote or under a special contract?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is under a separate contract.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Has that also been completed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Has the dredging, so far as the harbour is concerned, been completed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The only item this year for Rimouski is $2,800 for the breakwater.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Out of the general vote it may be possible to make some needed repairs.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Have any other requests been received by the Conservative organization in Rimouski over and above this special request?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can safely say yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I notice that there is a list of what are called essential undertakings, a number of which are revotes and a good many new items. Are these new undertakings which are to be commenced this year as a result of a survey which has been made since this government came into power? The minister will notice there are a number of votes which are not accompanied with comparative votes for previous years, and they would appear to be new undertakings.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): These projects have been before the department, some of them for years. We are endeavouring to overtake them as quickly as we can.

Mr. BOUCHARD: The wharf at Riviere Ouelle was damaged last year—I am unable to state whether the damage is the result of the provincial elections or of a storm—and I am sorry to say that no provision has been made for its repair. Perhaps a change in foremen may have been responsible for the accident, because it is the first of its kind which has ever happened. There would seem to be something abnormal in connection with this wharf, and I wish the minister would inquire into the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is nothing abnormal in wharves in this part of the country being destroyed by storms. The damage to this particular wharf occurred in December and it has not been possible to have it repaired. It may be possible to take care of it out of the general vote.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Apropos of what I said in connection with these new items, I assure the hon. minister that I was not referring to a political survey but rather to an engineering survey.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and Rivers—Ontario: under contract—Byng inlet—dredging, $6,000.
Collingwood—harbour improvements, $30,000.
Goderich—harbour improvements, $24,000.
Haileybury—breakwater, $45,000.
Key harbour—dredging, $40,000.
Kingston—dredging Little Cataraqui bay, $24,500.
Kingston (Little Cataraqui bay) breakwater, $73,000.
Kingston—wharf reconstruction, $15,000.
Michipicoten—dredging, $44,000.
Moose Factory—to assist in construction of wharf, $15,000.
Parry Sound—wharf reconstruction, $65,000.
Rockport—wharf—to complete, $3,500.

Silver creek and Castor river—balance of contribution towards dredging, the provincial government having contributed a like amount—revote from 1930-31, $2,500.

Essential undertakings—Blind river—dredging, $20,000.

Leamington—harbour improvements, $75,000.

Midland—harbour improvements, $40,000.

Oshawa—harbour improvements, $12,500.

Penetanguishene—dredging, $9,300.

Port Hope—harbour improvements, $21,400.

Saugeen river—harbour improvements, $5,100.

Sault Ste. Marie—harbour improvements, $20,000.

Harbours and rivers generally for maintenance of services; no new works to be undertaken, $200,000.—Total, $790,800.

Mr. HEENAN: No doubt the hon. minister has received an application from the town council and the board of trade of Kenora in connection with the construction of a wharf at Norman, Ontario. The increased activities in mining in this part of the country have made a wharf at this point absolutely necessary, but I fail to see the item. It would cost only about $8,000, and I was wondering if the minister would not give consideration to this matter when bringing down the supplementary estimates.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I assure my hon. friend this matter will be given consideration, particularly as it is not a large expenditure.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): What was the expenditure last year on the maintenance of the wharf at Bayfield?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The hon. member made a previous request for this information and it is going through the mail to-day. I understand the expenditure was approximately $300 or $400.

Mr. GRAY: Last year the minister was good enough to include in the estimates a sum for the completion of a warehouse on the public wharf at Sarnia. During the fall of 1931 representations were made to the minister that this work should be proceeded with as a part of the unemployment relief. The minister will remember that he called for tenders and I am informed that those tenders were within the estimates. Why was not the contract awarded for this work?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This work was not proceeded with under the Unemployment Relief Act because of the position taken by the right hon. the leader of the opposition, that anything contained in the regular estimates must be carried on in that way. The hon. member has stated that tenders were called for and that those received were within the estimates. That is so, and had the revenue permitted there is no reason whatever why this work should not have been completed. I was not able to convince the council that it should be undertaken.

Mr. GRAY: In view of the representations which must have been made to the minister by the steamship companies, and the fact that we have a fine public wharf with all facilities, will he not endeavour to have an amount included to give at least temporary warehouse accommodation? I do not ask for an amount as large as that voted last year, but I urge upon the minister the necessity of action before the shipping season opens in order that this wharf may be utilized to the fullest. Will the minister undertake to investigate this matter and endeavour to grant some temporary relief until the conditions warrant a greater expenditure?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have been deeply impressed with the representations made by my hon. friend with respect to the need of additional accommodation at Sarnia. The circumstances certainly warrant the expenditure of some money and I shall endeavour to meet his wishes. Similar conditions exist at Windsor where wharf improvements and the construction of a warehouse were under contemplation but were not proceeded with because of the reasons already given.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is the item covering a breakwater at Haileybury an entirely new one?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is new in this sense; the work was commenced under the Unemployment Relief Act and this amount is required for completion.

Mr. SANDERSON: What was the original amount to be expended?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think the wharf cost approximately $25,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: That would make a total expenditure of about $70,000?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): About $67,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: In what constituency is this work being carried on?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The constituency of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon).

Mr. DUFF: What is the necessity for that work at Haileybury?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is to afford transportation accommodation into the mining district up there, which is developing very rapidly. This accommodation is very much needed.

Mr. DUFF: Transportation from where?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): From the older parts of Ontario.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Falling revenue does not apply, apparently, when it is a question of expenditure in a minister's constituency.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would not say that.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is this work at Haileybury considered of national importance, or is the work being done purely to give relief to the unemployed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The work was started as an unemployment relief measure and is being completed by this appropriation.

Mr. SANDERSON: About how many hands are employed on the work?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am sorry I cannot give that information because I have not the particulars as to the unemployment relief, but I am going to let some items stand and I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend that information later.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is the work being done by tender and contract?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Up to the present this work is being carried on, as is most of our unemployment relief work, by day labour.

Mr. SANDERSON: None of it is by tender at all?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): None that has been done. I cannot say how we shall carry on this work.

Mr. McINTOSH: I notice under essential undertakings Saugeen river harbour improvements. Where is this work?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is at the mouth of the Saugeen river, to give harbour protection to the fishermen.

Mr. McINTOSH: In what constituency?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In North Bruce, represented by the Hon. Mr. Malcolm.

Mr. HEENAN: With respect to the Haileybury vote, do I understand the minister to say that this work was first started to provide employment on a fifty-fifty basis with the province?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, it is being done entirely under this department.

Mr. HEENAN: I am very glad that the federal government have seen fit to start some work on their own account somewhere in northern Ontario, because you can look all through the estimates last year and find very little work that was initiated or proceeded with in northern Ontario by the federal government. If the minister will recall my words when his estimates were up last year he will see the importance of the federal government looking after purely federal affairs. We have in these estimates a curtailment of expenditure on public works of over $43,000,000 as compared with last year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Not on public works alone. That is the total curtailment. There is a reduction of about $9,000,000 on purely Dominion public works.

Mr. HEENAN: I should have said the $43,000,000 was the total curtailment, and it is necessitated chiefly by the fact that the federal government had to assist the provinces. In other words, the federal government is contributing to the province on the one hand and curtailing public works expenditure on the other hand. That is not wholeheartedly giving out work to provide employment. I appreciate, of course, that it is a good thing to contribute to the provinces during this depression, but when the Liberals were in power we started to provide federal public works with federal money and left the provinces to follow suit and spend whatever money they could themselves. Because of the fact that we have had to assist the provinces we are now faced with this curtailment in the estimates of $43,000,000. I rose to say that I am glad the federal government have initiated some public work on their own account in northern Ontario for the purpose of relieving unemployment.

Mr. SANDERSON: With reference to the work at Haileybury, will this $45,000 complete the undertaking?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Will tenders be called for the balance of this work?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That has not yet been decided.

Mr. DUFF: I understand that under the statute in connection with any work involving an expenditure of over $5,000 tenders must be called for, and I was therefore rather surprised to hear the minister say in connection with work that has already been done that tenders were not called for. It seems to me it is absolutely necessary when the work involves expenditure of $5,000 or over that tenders be called for in every case and the law be complied with, whether it is in this department or any other.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Under the Unemployment Relief Act there is no such provision or limitation. In fact, the very foundation of the appropriation under that act was that it was to be administered in the way best calculated to relieve unemployment locally, and we find that the contract way is not the best way for that purpose. But generally speaking my hon. friend is quite right regarding the provision of the Public Works Act, and we have followed it strictly. As my hon. friend will recall, however, there is a provision in the act that where the officers of the department certify that the work can be done more advantageously in the public interest by day labour than by contract, it may be done in that way.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Not if it is over $5,000.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Oh yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: No.

Mr. SANDERSON: What representations were made and by whom for this work to be done at Haileybury? Was it petitioned for locally?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The representation was made, I do not recall by whom, that there was unemployment in that area and that this work would grant a substantial measure of relief.

Mr. SANDERSON: May I suggest that it may have been a case of one colleague simply conferring with another colleague for the benefit of his constituency?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would always welcome representations that are in the public interest from any colleague or from my hon. friend.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. POULIOT: We must give credit to the minister for that.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is this the only work that is being undertaken solely by the federal government to relieve unemployment in Canada? I thought that most of the work that was done to relieve unemployment was done by the provinces with the federal government contributing its share. In this case the whole contribution is from the federal treasury. Has that been done in any other instance?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Perhaps my hon. friend was not in at the outset when I made my explanation that following the passing of the act the Public Works department submitted a program of work to be carried on in the different provinces entirely by the Public Works department. The total of that was $2,500,000, allocated among the provinces in different amounts. About $1,500,000 has been expended up to the present time in the carrying out of these works, which number approximately four or five hundred—buildings, harbour works, and other works undertaken wherever it was thought that it would substantially help to relieve unemployment in that area. As I have already said, the full returns of the expenditure on these works will be brought down in the near future.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was the money provided out of the votes for the Department of Public Works last year or out of the unemployment relief appropriation under the act passed last year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is not in the estimates at all. It is provided out of the unemployment relief appropriation. It is supplementary to the estimates.

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand from the minister that in the ordinary course of business in his department the law allowed him, on the advice of his officials, to do work by day's work instead of by tender when the amount exceeded $5,000, or was he referring only to works under the Unemployment Relief Act?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I referred first to the Unemployment Relief Act. I do say, however, that the act still permits, on the recommendation of responsible officials, where because of the nature of the work it is difficult to ascertain the condition of a structure—as in the reconstruction of a wharf where it is difficult to tell the extent of the damage and practically impossible to procure accurate specification—the undertaking of works of that kind by day labour, even though they exceed $5,000. In the department, however, we prefer to follow the practice of asking for tenders, and do so in every case where it is at all possible.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to follow up the question asked by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) regarding the Haileybury breakwater. Did I understand the minister to say that this was being built as a relief measure?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It was started as that.

Mr. VALLANCE: And is this vote to supplement the moneys expended under the relief act?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This will complete the work which was undertaken as an unemployment relief measure. As the act expires on March 1, we provide this vote so that we may be able to carry on and complete the work.

Mr. VALLANCE: I understood from the minister that a considerable amount of the moneys voted for unemployment relief is still unspent. Why could not such moneys be appropriated to cover expenditures in connection with that work?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Because the unemployment relief measure expires on March 1 and we cannot make further expenditures without authority from parliament.

Mr. VALLANCE: A large undertaking has been started in the city of Saskatoon, and I have not been able to find any vote of a like nature to take care of that work. I refer to the bridge crossing the Saskatchewan river. How does the minister propose to deal with expenditures in connection with that bridge? Certainly there is no provision in the estimates to deal with it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is no undertaking in the province of Saskatchewan such as my hon. friend has referred to, under the auspices of the Public Works department. The work referred to by him must be carried on jointly by the dominion and the province.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this entirely a dominion affair?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. HEENAN: The discussion which has taken place leads to another point. Inasmuch as the Unemployment Relief Act will expire on March 1, and inasmuch as this $45,000 is to be used at Haileybury to complete the work now under way up there, may I ask what the minister purposes to do with respect to promoting works to help the unemployed in the various districts of northern Ontario? Can he say that any unemployment relief measure will be brought down before March 1 to take the place of the one about to expire? Otherwise the only people I know who will be working in northern Ontario will be the people around Haileybury. Of course I appreciate that fact, and admire the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) for having work done in his own constituency; I congratulate also the government for acceding to his wishes in the matter. Had I been in his place I should have tried to do the same thing for my own riding. I am not in that position, however, and as a member from northern Ontario I should like to know if the Minister of Labour, and the government of which he is a part, intend to do anything for the unemployed in other constituencies of northern Ontario, in view of the fact that the Unemployment Relief Act expires on March 1 and no public works have been provided for in that northern district, with the exception of those in Haileybury.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What will be done is a matter of policy, announcement of which must come either from the Minister of Labour or from the Prime Minister. I am not in a position to state what the policy will be, but it is under consideration.

Mr. POULIOT: I have noticed that the Minister of Public Works is one of the cabinet ministers most familiar with the affairs of his own department. When I make that statement I refer only to what happened in my own constituency, and am not attempting to take part in the discussion of what occurred at Haileybury.

Last year expenditures were made for public works from the unemployment relief fund, so that people who had no work to do were given employment without any consideration of party affiliations. Such action was surely right, because in times of stress all people in need should be helped. I notice now that the appropriations for the Department of Public Works have been considerably reduced, and I am wondering whether the moneys expended by that department will be given only to those of one party affiliation, and if people who belong to other parties—Liberal, Labour or any others—will have any work to do under the present scheme. I am wondering if the foreman on public works will have to follow the strict patronage rules followed in times of prosperity. I ask my good friend the Minister of Public Works if he will be kind enough to throw a little light on this point.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can say only that we will follow the usual custom of asking for tenders for public works, and on that score the acquaintances of my hon. friend will have just as good a chance as any other body of people.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not speaking for myself, but for the people in need.

Mr. HEENAN: Will the minister tell us what wages are being paid on the work at Haileybury, and whether or not the eight hour day is being enforced?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I cannot give the exact schedule of wages, but they have been fixed by the Department of Labour and we are following their schedule.

Mr. HEENAN: The Department of Labour might set a scale of wages which, I have no doubt, would be correct, but surely the minister should know the wages being paid on works undertaken by his own department.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I shall be pleased to get the information asked for by my hon. friend, and give it to him.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and Rivers—Manitoba: essential undertaking — Kississing river — improvements, $4,500.

Harbours and rivers generally for maintenance of services; no new works to be undertaken, $50,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Will all these works be let by tender, and will the foreman receive instructions to employ only those in distress?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I cannot say they will all be given by tender, but certainly the larger ones will.

Mr. POULIOT: Over what amount are tenders asked for?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): On any work involving an expenditure of over $5,000 the act contemplates that, save in exceptional cases, there will be tenders. We have often asked for tenders where amounts have been lower than $5,000, if the work could be better carried out by so doing.

Item agreed to.

Saskatchewan and Alberta—harbours and rivers generally for maintenance of services; no new works to be undertaken, $15,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that this would be an opportune time to put a particular question to the minister and to the government. Representations have been made to the government from a portion of the constituency of the member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks), regarding the possibilities of the government giving consideration to the construction of a bridge across the Saskatchewan river at Outlook. Rosetown lies immediately southeast of my seat. Through that seat runs the Saskatchewan river. From the town of Outlook and district similar representations have been made to the government, and I think, also to the Minister of Agriculture, who is the minister from that province. I would ask the hon. minister or any other member of the government if he can say publicly to the people of Saskatchewan whether it is the intention of the government to build this bridge. I know that the minister will probably tell me that this is a provincial public work; but bridges are being built in other parts of Saskatchewan that we think are not as vitally important to the great masses of the people of the province as is this bridge. All the people of my constituency travelling that way naturally have to cross on the ferry, and the accommodation it provides is simply awful. If the minister has not the information, I should like some other member of the government to tell the people in general, not the followers of the Tory party, what is to be hoped for in this regard.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Where the proposed bridge is wholly within a province it is not usual for the dominion to make a contribution towards its erection; we do in some cases contribute to interprovincial and international bridges. I have not the facts before me in connection with this particular proposal, but, in any event the matter should be taken up in the first instance by the provincial authorities, and if they can make out a proper case for contribution by the federal government, it certainly will be considered. As to the other bridges in Saskatchewan now under construction, to which my hon. friend refers, I presume they are being built under the Unemployment Relief Act, in which case there is a joint contribution purely for the relief of unemployment.

Mr. VALLANCE: Have any representations been made to build a bridge on the North Saskatchewan river at Outlook under the unemployment relief measure, the same as has been done at Saskatoon?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Those representations would first go to the province, and if the province approved of the work it would send those representations on to the federal labour department for approval under the Unemployment Relief Act.

Mr. VALLANCE: Last year it was stated by the Prime Minister that immediately after the session each member, irrespective of where he sat in the house, would be asked to make suggestions to the government regarding relief measures. I do not doubt each member suggested to the government what in his opinion was necessary. I feel quite sure that the government must have been pressed, not only by the member for Rosetown, but by other members whose constituents would use that bridge, to undertake its construction, but so far the matter has received no consideration. Why did not this proposed bridge receive the same consideration as was accorded to other similar proposals? I will be quite frank in saying that no recommendation that I made received any consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Recommendations for purely dominion works came to the Public Works department; other representations came to the Minister of Labour on the written invitation sent to each member to suggest works which he thought might be undertaken to relieve unemployment. I do not know about the particular bridge that my hon. friend has in mind, because any recommendation with respect to it did not come to the Public Works department.

Mr. LOUCKS: As Outlook is in my constituency I may say for the benefit of my hon. friend that I have had some correspondence with reference to the proposed bridge. I think my hon. friend is aware that this is a matter for the provincial government to deal with, and I am corresponding with the Minister of Highways in Saskatchewan with reference to it. I am glad to say he is giving the proposal his consideration at the present time. I might add that the bridge was recommended.

Mr. McINTOSH: With respect to what the minister has said in connection with the proposed bridge at Outlook, it comes to my mind that I recommended that another important bridge be built. I regret to say that the project has not yet been undertaken, and I do not know when it will be. As the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) has said, the Prime Minister stated in the house last session that hon. members after they went back to their ridings would be asked to make suggestions with regard to necessary public works that would help to a solution of the unemployment problem. In due course I received such a letter. I took up with the members in the provincial house the question of building a very important bridge at Ceepee over the North Saskatchewan river. This is one of the most pressing public necessities in the province. As a result of that conference I made a recommendation to the Labour department at Ottawa, but the recommendation was turned down, although the proposal for a bridge at Saskatoon was approved by the government. I do not find fault with the building of the bridge that is now under construction at Saskatoon, but I would impress upon the house that the bridge that I asked for had behind it the solid public opinion of my riding. Naturally the people of my riding want to know why the Saskatoon bridge was undertaken at a cost of about $1,000,000, while the proposed bridge at Ceepee, which is so urgently needed was turned down.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): When the report on unemployment relief is brought down I would suggest that my hon. friend put his question to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). The proposal to build the bridge in question did not come before my department, and therefore I am not in a position to give any information in relation to it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Are there any items in the public works estimates to-day that were recommended by any member of parliament? For instance, I noticed the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) drew the attention of the minister to the fact that the member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) has got a substantial appropriation, as has also the member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Moore). Were those public works recommended at the time the invitation was sent out by the Minister of Labour, or were they under the control of the Public Works department? Are there any items in the public works appropriations that we have considered to-day that were suggested to the department following the invitation sent out by the Prime Minister through the Minister of Labour?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The works to which my hon. friend refers are not new to the department; some of the recommendations to which he has referred were made years ago. The customs accommodation at the border in Stanstead was asked for by the Department of National Revenue, and they have been pressing for it for several years.

Mr. VALLANCE: They are not suggested by the members, then, as relief measures?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I want to say just a word before this passes. While it is true that the government is contributing to the cost of a bridge at Saskatoon, the city is contributing a very large percentage of the cost of that undertaking. We are giving $360,000 towards the cost of that structure, and it is very important indeed that it be completed. The bridge to which my hon. friend referred would carry more traffic than this bridge, but he knows as well as I do that the province of Saskatchewan is not in a position financially to build that bridge, even with a contribution from this government. The cost of the Saskatoon bridge is split three ways, with the province contributing only $140,000.

Mr. GERSHAW: The minister said a few moments ago that where a bridge was built across a river on the boundary between two provinces the dominion sometimes contributed. I should like to ask if the province of Alberta or the province of Saskatchewan has made representations with regard to a bridge across the South Saskatchewan river at a point called Empress. This is on a very important highway, and there is a ferry in operation at the present time which is unsuited to the needs of those travellers. If a bridge were built it would be a great help to those in need of relief in that district. I should like to know first if representations have been made and, in case the government would consider giving a contribution, what proportion of the cost that contribution would cover?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can only say that no representations have been made by the provinces since this government came into office. I do not know whether any were made before that time, but the impression of the chief engineer and the deputy is that no representations have been made by the province. The contribution is a matter of agreement; sometimes it is one-third and sometimes a smaller amount.

Mr. GERSHAW: Have representations been made to the Department of Labour?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would not be able to speak about that.

Mr. McINTOSH: A part of the argument of the hon. member for Saskatoon, in connection with the Ceepee bridge to which I referred, was that the province of Saskatchewan, under its present government, is not in a position to put up the necessary money, in conjunction with the dominion government, to have this structure built. If that is so, and the provincial government cannot put up a dollar towards the cost of that bridge, why not make it a special improvement measure sponsored by the dominion government in order to aid unemployment in that part of the province?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: When I received that letter from the Department of Labour asking me to suggest to the government what I thought should be done by way of public improvements in order to aid unemployment, I went to a great deal of trouble in going around my riding to get that information. I prepared the best report I thought could be prepared under the circumstances, and now I should like to ask the minister to get that report and keep it in the archives of the Department of Public Works, so that when times get better, or when world conditions are more stable, as the speech from the throne says, they may receive first consideration.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of the statement made by the hon. member for Saskatoon, I should like to direct a further question to the government. If the province of Saskatchewan is in such a financial position that it is not able to put up its share of the cost of that bridge, how does the government propose to take care of the unemployment situation in that province from now on?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I would point out to the committee that we are getting very far away from the item under discussion.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, we are not.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson York-Sunbury): I think we are; that is the ruling of the chair. We are discussing harbours and rivers.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Would the minister tell us what services are covered by this item?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This money is used to keep the wharves in repair, perhaps to do some little dredging, and to keep in efficient operation the services which are being rendered the public.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): It does not include the payment of the men on ferries, or anything like that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would the minister tell us where the harbours are in the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is a term we use in case there happen to be any.

Mr. VALLANCE: We have an item here of $15,000 for the maintenance of harbours and rivers in Saskatchewan and Alberta. I should like to know where the harbours are. I know where some of the rivers are; I have been suggesting some ways of spending a portion of this amount in the rivers and over the rivers, but the minister does not agree with me. So I would like to know where the harbours are.

Mr. McINTOSH: I asked the minister what I thought was a legitimate question. It was this: Would it not have been as justifiable to build the bridge at Ceepee as it was to spend $80,000 at Haileybury, in the constituency of the Minister of Labour?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am sorry I cannot answer that question, because I have not the facts before me.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps the desk-mate of the minister, the Minister of Marine, could tell us where the harbours are.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to ask the minister how much of this amount will be spent in providing a very necessary breakwater on the Red Deer river at Drumheller.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not think you would get much of a breakwater for $15,000. This is the amount we had last year, and it is used for ordinary repairs. There are no new undertakings under this item; we could not apply any portion of it to a new undertaking.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have a great admiration for the minister, and I hope that will stand me in good stead when he comes to make up the supplementary estimates. I assure him definitely, as I have already assured Mr. Hereford of the Department of Labour, that this work on the river bank is absolutely needed if the property of the city of Drumheller is to be protected from floods which occur every spring. I hope the minister will look into this matter and make the necessary provision in the supplementary estimates this year.

Mr. VALLANCE: I might make one other observation. I see this amount is divided between Alberta and Saskatchewan, and I am even more disappointed. The item being so small and the territory so large, surely the minister can tell us where the harbours are and how he proposes to spend the money.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the constituency of Prince Albert, in Prince Albert park, there are extensive harbours and there are also rivers. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy) is present and he will bear me out that the navigation from that locality is most important. It is the route out to Hudson bay from the northern part of Saskatchewan. The amount, I think, is wholly inadequate.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I can tell the hon. gentleman who asked the minister a question which he could not answer that in one part of Alberta, the part I have the honour to represent, we not only have navigable waters but we actually have wharves and breakwaters as well. If he doubts my word he can ask the Prime Minister of Canada, who comes from that province and who will tell him that he and I spent a very happy day on Silver lake opening a wharf which was also a breakwater.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the leader of the government also comes from this territory it seems to me the amount of this vote is an insult both to the leader of the opposition and to the government.

Mr. HOWARD: Before we leave this department, I understand that a contract was let for the Moncton public building but I do not see anything in the estimates. Does the minister know what stage this matter has reached?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is not correct to say that a contract was let. We called for tenders but did not proceed with the work.

Mr. HOWARD: You are not putting anything in the estimates for it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No; it is going the way of the others.

Mr. ILSLEY: When item 122 was under discussion I happened to be called out of the chamber. What provision is being made for the completion of the work at Hantsport, Nova Scotia? There was a vote last year of $10,000 and an additional vote under the Unemployment Relief Act of $4,000 or $5,000, and only a small part of the money has been spent. The work is not finished; it has just begun and I cannot find any provision in these estimates for its completion.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The wharf itself has been finished but the railway siding requires some additional work. That is to be arranged through the railway commission, and unless we succeed in getting it completed out of the unemployment relief vote before the first of March we shall have to consider whether some provision should be made in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. ILSLEY: The total cost of the work was to be about $15,000 and only about $4,500 has been spent. Are these figures correct?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A considerably larger sum than that has been spent out of the unemployment relief vote. The work is finished except for the siding.

Item agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Civil government—salaries, $554,310; contingencies, $40,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not rise at the moment to take exception to the calling of an item in Trade and Commerce, but I just wish to direct the attention of the minister to the fact that we understand why he is so suddenly passing from Public Works to Trade and Commerce. No doubt there will be an equally sudden transition from Trade and Commerce to Justice to-night,—

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —the object being to get as many departments into the arena for future discussion as possible. I see no reason to take exception to this but I want the minister to know that we understand what he is doing.

Mr. STEVENS: I suspect so.

Mr. VENIOT: Can the minister give the details of the reduction?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is due to a reduction in the number of employees. In some instances we are not replacing where vacancies have occurred, and as far as possible we are curtailing expenditures.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand that the object of the government is to reduce expenditures wherever they are controllable. Contingencies are controllable; why is there no reduction there?

Mr. STEVENS: We are keeping that down as low as possible. No department knows precisely what may arise. The expenditures for the last few years have been: 1928, $29,899.15; 1929, $33,810.94; 1930, $39,351.06; 1931-32, $17,136.46. We purpose keeping these expenditures down.

Mr. VENIOT: Until last year it had never reached $40,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Not last year, the year before.

Mr. VENIOT: What has brought it up to $40,000 now?

Mr. STEVENS: That has been the amount voted for some time.

Mr. VENIOT: My objection is that it is a controllable expenditure; the minister will admit that. If you are bringing about a practical retrenchment why not retrench where expenditures are controllable? We should cut down the controllable expenditures rather than the salaries of civil servants.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEVENS: I have already given the explanation. No one can anticipate precisely what will be spent under contingencies. I can give the details of expenditures in years gone by but I cannot give it for the current year. It is quite possible there may be some unforeseen demand on this vote. We are asking for the usual vote but we promise that as far as possible we will keep it down, and this is evidenced by the actual expenditures of the current year.

Mr. VENIOT: That does not satisfy me, because there must be a method of meeting unforeseen expenditures. If the government is so anxious to curtail expenditures why not begin at this point? If you voted $30,000 this year and found towards the end of the fiscal year that something unforeseen had arisen there would be a way of meeting that expenditure. Why not make a reduction now and take your chances?

Mr. VALLANCE: Does the item for salaries include travelling expenses of the grain commission?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is it under contingencies?

Mr. STEVENS: The grain commission vote is separate.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry to disagree with my hon. friend from Gloucester. I think we should congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce upon his decision not to reduce contingencies.

Mr. EULER: An item of $3,420 for chief, census of manufactures, which was voted last year, is cut out entirely this year. Does that mean that the service is discontinued?

Mr. STEVENS: There will be some variations in the department and the one referred to is probably a movement in the staff requested by the chief statistician.

Mr. EULER: Will the census of manufactures throughout the country still be continued?

Mr. STEVENS: That has been carried on.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The details are shown on page 99. An item of $12,000 is allowed for clerical assistance and $14,000 for printing and stationery. What is covered by the latter amount.

Mr. STEVENS: That is to cover unusual printing which does not come under the general vote. There is a possibility this year that the department will be called upon to do considerable work in connection with the Imperial economic conference and we may have to call upon this vote.

Mr. EULER: What is the nature of the work carried on in connection with the census of manufactures? Are the manufacturers asked to make returns at specific intervals as to the amount and nature of their manufactures?

Mr. STEVENS: I have received many letters during the past year highly commending the work being carried on by this particular branch. Questionnaires or forms are sent out to the various industries; the information received is segregated by the department and distributed to those interested or to those who may request it.

Mr. EULER: Does the minister find that the manufacturers respond readily and completely to these questionnaires?

Mr. STEVENS: I have been surprised during the past year to note not only the willingness with which they respond but the praise which they give to the efforts of the bureau in compiling this information.

Mr. EULER: Do they respond in all cases?

Mr. STEVENS: Not in all cases; occasionally we find someone who demurs.

Mr. VENIOT: In the details of the contingencies which appear on page 99, I note that $3,000 was allowed last year for telegrams and telephones, while the vote for this year shows an increase of $500.

Mr. STEVENS: My department has asked for the allocation of $3,500 for telegrams and telephones. The department has considerable cabling to do keeping in touch with the trade commissioners in all parts of the world.

Item stands.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

Trade and Commerce — salaries, $554,310; contingencies, $40,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are there any statutory increases?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice in looking through the details that there are a number of increases. Evidently they are not statutory. Perhaps my hon. friend could tell us on what basis they are made.

Mr. STEVENS: There were a few readjustments within the staff during the year. I cannot say exactly from memory what they were, but there were not many.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that it is quite proper that these changes should be made, but what strikes one in looking at the list is that certain individuals have received an increase while the great majority have not. For example, the secretary of the commercial intelligence service has been increased, also the chief of the mining, metallurgical and chemical division. There has been an increase also with respect to statisticians. One head translator has been increased, also a sound projectionist and a publicity agent; one or two principal clerks, a senior photographer, the secretary to the executive, one draftsman, a stenographer and some other photographer have been increased. There has also been an increase for the electricity and gas laboratory assistant, for an assistant photographer, for some stenographer, messengers and office boys. These may not be a very large number, but they would seem to constitute a favoured few and I wish the minister would indicate on what special grounds all these individuals have received increases while the rest of the staff have been left just where they were.

Mr. STEVENS: There were a few reclassifications, purely departmental and without design, I might say to the right hon. gentleman, within the department during the year. I presume I could give an explanation in each individual case if the right hon. gentleman desires that.

Mr. VENIOT: Have these increases been approved by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, in every case.

Mr. DUFF: Why has the deputy minister's salary been decreased from $10,000 to $8,000?

Mr. STEVENS: There was a change in the deputy head during the year and the new deputy comes in at the minimum rate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice an item under contingencies for printing and stationery. May I ask whether any of that is for the printing of the creed the minister published last year?

Mr. STEVENS: Constantly we are receiving requests for copies of the creed, and I am very sorry that parliament has not been asked to vote an additional sum for that purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask if any part of this amount is to be used for propaganda purposes in connection either with the Canada First or the Empire First movements?

Mr. STEVENS: I can assure my right hon. friend that there will be no propaganda.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There will be nothing in the nature of advertising paid for by the department relating to Canada first, or made-in-Canada goods, or the like?

Mr. STEVENS: Speaking for myself, and I think I can speak for my colleagues as well, we are strongly in favour of every effort that will promote Canada's interests industrially and in every other way. What I assume the right hon. gentleman is referring to is whether there will be carried on any advertising campaign of a general character under this vote. I think I can assure him that there will not be, not because we are opposed to such a publicity campaign, but we are curbing our expenditure to the limit this year and have not in contemplation such a campaign.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend that all parties in this house are as much interested in promoting Canada's interests as are the members of the government. My hon. friend knows to what I refer, and that is the use of public moneys for political propaganda purposes, furthering the trade policies of the government in office. The Canada First campaign was a purely political campaign, and public moneys were used for that purpose in connection with the publication of the illuminated creed and in connection with advertisements inserted in innumerable papers. We do not want to have that story repeated in terms of Empire First while the economic conference is on, or before or after the conference, with hon. friends opposite seeking to make political headway by that method. I take it from the minister that none of the moneys from this vote will be used for purposes of the kind.

Mr. VALLANCE: Might I ask the minister if the object of advertising the Canada first policy and printing the creed have been worthy of such expenditures. Is the minister in a position to assure the house that the results have been satisfactory?

Mr. STEVENS: Quite, quite.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If they have been worth while, can the minister tell us why the administration is throwing over its old doctrine of Canada first and adopting the new doctrine of empire first?

Mr. STEVENS: Did I understand my right hon. friend to refer to a decrease in the expenditures? In that regard, as I said a moment ago, we are merely economizing to the limit. We believe that to best serve the country we must as far as possible reduce expenditures.

Mr. JACOBS: And I suppose the least useful is cut off first.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I see under the heading of contingencies an amount of $12,000 for clerical assistance, a sum over and above all the salaries paid to the various officials in the department. I should like to have the details of this amount.

Mr. STEVENS: That is an item which has been voted for many years. Part of it is spent in respect of clerical staff in the minister's office, and part of it is for clerical assistance where, under emergent conditions, extra help is required temporarily. In recent years the expenditures have been as follows:

Year	Expenditure
1928-29..	$ 9,583 84
1929-30..	10,088 76
1930-31..	13,716 22

For the current year expenditures up to the present time have been about $9,000. Hon. members must bear in mind, however, that the year has not yet expired.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are those amounts paid to persons employed by the department who were appointed by the Civil Service Commission? If not, how were they chosen?

Mr. STEVENS: Some of them, of course, were chosen by the Civil Service Commission. However there are a few appointees as my hon. friend no doubt knows, within the right of the minister; I refer particularly to a private secretary or an assistant private secretary.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to ask a question, and if it indicates that I am labouring under a misapprehension I hope the minister will correct me. I find an expenditure for a "sound projectionist," and note that the salary of this official has been increased. I am wondering if the term "projectionist" should not be "protectionist"?

Mr. STEVENS: The sound projectionist is connected with the moving picture branch of the department. Strange to say in these days the motion picture bureau must use a sound projector, and of course a person is required for its manipulation.

Mr. DONNELLY: Some of these salaries are reduced; on the other hand some seem to be increased. For instance, the following officials are to receive increased remuneration: chief of the mining, metallurgical and chemical division; head translator; sound projectionist; senior photographer; secretary to the executive; draftsman; electricity and gas laboratory assistant, and library assistant. Why have these salaries been increased? Do the increases arise through seniority, or what is the reason?

Mr. STEVENS: I have already explained the reason. There are a few—comparatively few—increases in the department due to a reclassification by the Civil Service Commission during the past year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What are the duties of the publicity agent?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chisholm, the publicity agent, was appointed some years ago. His duty is to direct the publicity of the department. Perhaps one of his most valuable services is the dissemination of ordinary news to which the public is entitled, emanating very largely from the researches of the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. HEENAN: Has the minister any idea what effects the reduction of 10 per cent in civil servants salaries will have, and has he estimated how Canadian industries will be affected if every other employer of labour in Canada follows the lead set by the federal government and reduces salaries and wages? How and to what extent will industries in Canada be affected?

Mr. STEVENS: I certainly have no information sufficient to satisfy the sweeping inquiry of my hon. friend. Due to general economic conditions there have been decreases in salaries and wages throughout the country. We do not think that a reduction of 10 per cent in civil service salaries for this year is an unfair contribution to the balancing of the country's budget, and to assistance to the country in meeting this period of depression. Our contention, however, is of course open to argument and discussion. Whether or not a general decrease in wages throughout the country will reflect itself in a decrease in activity is a debatable point. This country, however, in common with all other countries is faced with imminent problems and we are endeavouring to meet them in a manner we think most fair and equitable to all under the circumstances. I do not think I can add more than what I have said to the general query of my hon. friend.

Mr. HEENAN: Evidently the minister has not estimated what effect the reduction of 10 per cent in salaries and wages will have upon the country as a whole. Although the minister claims the authorship of the creed urging Canadians to purchase in Canada and to make Canada prosperous, the government of which he is a member now undertakes to take 10 per cent of the people's earnings from them so that they will be able to purchase 10 per cent less in Canada. The government, above all employees of labour, should set an example by maintaining the standard of wages and salaries.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the item "editor, grade 1" refer to the editor of the Commercial Intelligence Journal?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If I ask a number of questions I hope I may be pardoned because, sitting in this privileged corner of the house I have been deprived of the benefit of hearing the discussion carried on in these academic terms. I should like to ask the minister whether in relation to his department the cut of 10 per cent as set out on page 98 of the estimates is final?

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid I have not clearly understood my hon. friend's reference to the cut as "final." What does he mean?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is the cut of 10 per cent to be considered a horizontal cut applying to the salaries of all employees and at the rate of 10 per cent, or is it to be graded?

Mr. STEVENS: I think I can say definitely the final understanding is that there should be, as my hon. friend describes it, a horizontal cut of 10 per cent. I may add one further observation, because I apprehend it will be in the mind of my hon. friend: there does arise the question of contribution, and so forth, to the retirement fund. The whole matter is under the consideration of the government and a pronouncement in regard to it will be made in due course by the Prime Minister.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it right, Mr. Chairman, that we should pass these items involving decreases when the general principle has not been stated by the government? I think the government should have presented a bill with regard to the 10 per cent cut and then we would have had a chance to discuss the question; otherwise we have to take it up on each individual item. If it is to be understood that in passing these items we are sanctioning the proposed cut, I think some of us will have something to say at this stage.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no question so far as the government is concerned that the estimates show precisely what it is proposed to do, that is, to make a 10 per cent cut. It will be noticed that at the bottom of each total appear the words "less 10 per cent" in regard to each department. There will be no restriction regarding discussion of the whole question when later on the necessary legislation is introduced.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But are we not definitely fixing the salaries of these particullar men now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: Not quite. Of course my hon. friend fully understands that these estimates after they have been adopted by this committee must pass through the usual procedure of legislation; but undoubtedly so far as committee of the whole is concerned, passing each item means adoption of the resolution covering it.

Mr. HEAPS: How will the bill be introduced?

Mr. STEVENS: There will be the ordinary supply bill. Maybe special legislation will be required to cover certain features, but as to that I am not able to make any pronouncement at the moment. Unquestionably the main supply bill must cover the subject.

Mr. HEAPS: Of course, the supply bill covers all the estimates; but if the salary reductions are made in the estimates, those reductions do not need to be implemented by a bill.

Mr. STEVENS: All we do by passing the estimates is to supply the money necessary to pay these salaries, and if we supply the money, less 10 per cent, obviously that is all that can be paid. Whatever is necessary to regularize that in regard to the statutory feature will be dealt with later.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point raised is a very important one. As the estimates stand, the committee is being invited to vote, for salaries of the trade and commerce department, a total of $554,310. As a matter of fact, if the salaries were to be what they are at present, plus the increases that are being made for the purposes of readjustment, as the minister says, we would be asked to vote $615,900. I would suggest to the minister —this is done by way of trying to meet the difficulty—that he amend his estimates by moving to strike out for the present the words "less 10 per cent" and the figure that appears thereafter, and let us vote the estimates as they stand, up to the amount of $615,900. That will be voting for each individual or group of individuals the sum set out opposite the classification in the detailed statement. I must say that when I looked at the estimates last night I took it that the 10 per cent reduction was inserted as a guide to the house of what the total ultimate expenditure would be. Until the house has decided that it is going to cut down the salaries by 10 per cent, I think the minister had better adopt the course I have suggested or take up some other part of the estimates.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly, if the house desires to prolong the discussion on this particular resolution I would ask that it stand. But the facts are very clear. We are voting now the supply necessary to pay the salaries for this year at the regular rates, less 10 per cent; that is precisely what we are doing. Of course, if the right hon. gentleman and others object to the adoption of this resolution, we can let it stand and proceed with other items.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point is that the minister at the moment assumes that every hon. member on his side of the house is going to agree with the government, and that no matter what discussion there may be on the floor of the house the 10 per cent cut will go through. I hope the house has enough independence for a sufficient number of its members to assert their own minds in a matter of this kind, regardless of what the government may say in advance.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Like they did when you were here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I always sought to get the view of the house, and I took good care not to move in advance into a position which I was not perfectly sure the house was going to take. I certainly think until this house has decided that the salary of every person, irrespective of the particular grade he may be in or what he may be receiving, is to be cut 10 per cent, we had better not vote any estimates on the basis of a horizontal ten per cent reduction.

Mr. FACTOR: So far as this cut of 10 per cent is concerned, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the members on this side of the house are prepared to vote such a reduction in a salary, say, of $1,380. The general principle of the 10 per cent reduction should be considered first before we are asked to vote a 10 per cent reduction in all salaries ranging from $8,000 down to $1,380. I think the item should stand until the general principle has been discussed.

Mr. DUFF: It seems to me before deciding the matter the government should take into consideration that there is a contract between the officials of this department and the government—a feature, of course, that applies to the officials of all other departments of the service. The officials accepted those positions on the distinct understanding that they were to get a certain rate of salary, and it seems to me that before we vote to make a reduction of 10 per cent in salaries the people interested should be consulted and their views placed before the government.

Mr. VALLANCE: I would conclude from the statement of the minister that the matter has been discussed by the government and its supporters, and that the latter are in favour of this procedure, that is, the 10 per cent cut is to go through in spite of anything the opposition may say.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I must repeat that I have not had the benefit of this discussion; in this corner of the chamber I cannot hear anything that is going on. So far as I am concerned I would rather that the whole matter be left over so that those who are primarily concerned should be given the opportunity of themselves making to the proper authorities in their own way the representations which they may deem expedient. I believe that under our democratic system of government those who are to be mulct to this extent should have an opportunity of presenting their case to the proper authorities. If it is the consensus of opinion that we should proceed with this matter I am quite prepared to do so, but I would rather have the discussion stand over until those who have representations to make can bring them before those to whom they should be made.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no desire to interfere with the most extensive discussion of the subject, and if any hon. gentleman feels that to pass this estimate to-night would be unduly committing the opposition to the principle, I would ask that the item stand, Mr. Chairman, and we can proceed with other items in my estimates.

Item stands.

The Hemp Bounties Act, 1923, administration of, $500.

Mr. SANDERSON: This is the same amount as was voted last year. I wish the minister would tell the committee just how that bounty worked out last year, the amounts that were paid, and who were the recipients.

Mr. STEVENS: This is a small item for travelling expenses and incidentals in connection with the administration of the Hemp Bounties Act. The bounty paid during the calendar year 1931 was $2,189.95.

Mr. SANDERSON: Paid to whom?

Mr. STEVENS: The only claimant for 1930 was the Manitoba Cordage Company.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: How much did they get?

Mr. STEVENS: They got $3,167.44.

Mr. DONNELLY: How was this paid, by the hundredweight?

Mr. STEVENS: Last year the rate was seven-eighths of a cent per pound.

Mr. SANDERSON: I think this matter of bounties does not work in the right way. As I understand it, the manufacturer is paid the bounty instead of the grower. Is it correct that there is no bounty paid to the grower?

Mr. STEVENS: There is nothing paid to the grower.

Mr. SANDERSON: I could understand that it might be of some use to the agricultural sections if a bounty were paid for the growing of hemp, but when you pay it to the manufacturer it simply means a bonus to the manufacturer from which no one else gets any benefit. I think this is a time when such an item should be struck out. I would not reduce it by ten per cent; I would reduce it by one hundred per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: I must confess that I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend, but I find that we are bound by the act which was passed in 1923, and which expires in 1933. We are simply carrying out the provisions of the statute. I should like my hon. friend to note that the ratio of the bounty drops year by year. In 1926, the first year it was paid, the bounty was 1½ cents. Then it became 1⅜, 1¼, 1⅛, 1; last year it was seven-eighths and for the current year it will be three-quarters of a cent. In 1933 it will be ½ cent, and then the statute will expire and the bounty will cease.

Mr. SANDERSON: It makes no difference to me, as a member of this house, that the act was passed under a Liberal government. At the time I was convinced that it was wrong.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You did not say so.

Mr. SANDERSON: You do not know whether I said so or not. Sometimes my hon. friend from Lincoln has a long memory, and sometimes his memory is short. I am still convinced, Mr. Chairman, that it would be a good thing to wipe out this bounty completely, and I am inclined to think the minister agrees with me. This parliament, and especially this government, is all powerful. The matter of a mere act should not embarrass a government such as we have in power now, so I will move that this item be struck out.

Mr. STEVENS: Before my hon. friend secures a seconder for that motion I should like to indicate to him that this is contractual. We may not agree with all that was done previously or all that is being done at present by statute, but where a contract has been entered into, the country is duty bound to carry it out. Unquestionably certain industries were induced to carry on the work of manufacturing this hemp by reason of the bounty, and it would not be fair or equitable for parliament to pass an act authorizing the payment of a bounty for a period of ten years, secure the establishment of an industry under that act, and then, at some period during the existence of the bounty cancel it. Certainly parliament can do as it likes; but I submit to my hon. friend that the gesture he now makes is not one that will carry the judgment of the house, whatever may be his or my opinion with regard to the payment of bounties of this character.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is this bounty paid on the hemp before it is retted or after? Do we keep a man in the factory to weigh it or do we take the word of the manufacturer? How is the amount of hemp brought in estimated?

Mr. STEVENS: The act is administered under a contract, which I have before me. For the moment I speak subject to correction because I have not the exact details in my mind, but I believe payment is made on the hemp which enters into the manufacture of whatever is being manufactured by the concern, presumably after retting. I say I speak subject to correction, but I am quite certain that is right. The hemp that goes into the manufacture of the finished product is the hemp that carries the bounty.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the minister think that if the $21,000 paid to this industry were cut off now the effect would be to put the industry out of business?

Mr. STEVENS: I would not say that, but it would be a violation of a contract between the country and the concern.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the manufacture of hemp on the increase in Manitoba? Has this bounty helped the industry?

Mr. STEVENS: From the information before me I would say there is a substantial increase in Manitoba. In 1926 there was none. In 1927 the output was 162,004 pounds; 1928, 631,388; 1929, 632,654; 1930, 316,744; 1931, 250,280 pounds.

Mr. YOUNG: This hemp is all grown in Manitoba?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: And I suppose the acreage devoted to that prior to this act was devoted to something else?

Mr. STEVENS: I have no doubt of that, even if it was only prairie grass. I was very much interested some years ago in visiting one of the farms producing hemp. It was not a ministerial visit; I went there as a private member. I was told by those who were growing the hemp that one of the advantages from its production was its usefulness in cleaning up land that had been fouled by sow thistle and other noxious weeds. Hemp has an excellent effect in that respect. I understand that it is usually sown on land that has lost its chief virtue as wheat-growing land, but I speak with reservation on that point.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister is not quite right when he says that all the hemp is grown in Manitoba; there is some in Ontario.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that.

Mr. SANDERSON: I beg the minister's pardon; I thought he did.

Mr. STEVENS: I was asked what hemp was grown in Manitoba and I answered that question.

Mr. SANDERSON: Hemp is grown in Ontario also.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have much pleasure in supporting this vote, and not alone because the previous government introduced it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know where the applause comes in. Anyhow, I have always endeavoured consistently to support what was right even on the part of this government. I have not that opportunity very often and I always embrace it when I have it. It was found during the war that owing to the great difficulty in securing raw material for binder twine we were in danger on the prairies of not having sufficient twine for our crops. Around Portage la Prairie the farmers conceived the idea of growing their own raw material—hemp—and this was strongly supported by the then member for Portage la Prairie, now leader of the Senate. When the government that preceded this came into power we took up the question where our predecessors had left off, with the result that this bounty was introduced for the first time. It applies to parts of Quebec and Ontario and to the western provinces, and the object was primarily to encourage the growing of raw material that goes into binder twine. In a country that had attained the importance we had of being the greatest exporter of hard wheat in the world, it was logical to aspire to the manufacture of binder twine with which to bind our crops, and that was the major purpose of this small bounty. It did not succeed as far as we had hoped, because the bounty was small; nevertheless something has been done. I have no qualms of conscience in supporting the minister in this small vote.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): Shall the item carry?

Mr. SANDERSON: No; I move that the item be struck out.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I second the motion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The hon. member cannot move to strike out the item. He has his recourse in voting against it.

Mr. DUFF: He can move to reduce it.

Mr. SANDERSON: I move that it be reduced to $1.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. DONNELLY: Before the item carries—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The item was carried.

Mr. DONNELLY: I did not hear that the motion was carried.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The item was pronounced carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion was that the item be reduced to $1. That motion was lost but there was not a subsequent motion put that the item be carried.

The CHAIRMAN: I had just asked the question, "Shall the item carry?"

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not hear it.

Mr. DUFF: Even when items have been declared carried, the custom in the past has been to allow an hon. member who wished to speak to go on.

Mr. DONNELLY: I want to ask the minister this question. This bounty applies only to home-grown hemp, does it not?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is there any way of checking up on the amount of home grown hemp that goes into the manufacture of binder twine used in the different factories?

Mr. STEVENS: An official of the government checks every pound, not at the moment of weighing it but through the records, books and so forth of the company. He checks every pound that goes into the manufacture of goods.

Mr. VALLANCE: Can the minister say how much binder twine is made from Canadian hemp?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not those figures.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is not made.

Item agreed to.

An act to place Canadian coal used in the manufacture of iron or steel on a basis of equality with imported coal, administration of, $1,000.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to call the minister's attention to an item which appeared in the Gazette of February 13, in which the Shipping World, a trade magazine in England, was quoted with regard to a suggested exchange of trade between Great Britain and Canada whereby timber would be exchanged for coal. The item closes with this statement:

Timber importers and coal exporters can open negotiations through the Canadian government's representatives at London for placing a contract for wood and securing an undertaking from Canada to purchase an increased quantity of anthracite and bituminous coal.

Has the minister heard anything of these representations, or have any representations been made either to his department or to his representative in London?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: The matter of the taking of British coal has come up frequently in the past and I presume it will be referred to frequently in the future. I desire at this moment to reiterate the stand I have always taken, that before British coal is admitted every possible effort should be made to use Canadian coal.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite agree with that statement.

Mr. RALSTON: We should not consider that we have done everything when we take British coal instead of American coal; every effort should be made to replace American with Canadian coal. I am particularly fearful of this item when I notice that it suggests the taking not only of British anthracite but of British bituminous coal, and I hope the minister will give appropriate consideration to this matter.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend's anxiety for the stimulation of the use of Canadian coal is heartily reciprocated by myself and by the government. Everything has been done and will be done to stimulate the use of Canadian coal. As far as I know there are no grounds, either officially or semi-officially, for the statement which has appeared in the press. We have no hesitancy in saying that we have encouraged the importation of British anthracite to replace American anthracite, but no steps have been taken, as far as I know with regard to the importation of bituminous coal.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the operation of this act tended to increase the use of Canadian coal?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot answer that question offhand. However, I can say that every possible effort has been made to increase the use of Canadian coal. During the past year or two the consumption of coal has fallen and I would imagine that the data would show a decrease over that period.

Mr. YOUNG: What would it cost per ton to put Canadian coal on a basis of equality with American coal, say, at Hamilton, Ontario?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not that information immediately before me.

Mr. YOUNG: Could the minister give the committee an approximate figure?

Mr. STEVENS: To indulge in speculation of that kind would not be helpful. I should like to be accurate, and I regret that I have not the precise figures before me.

Mr. REID: How is this vote being disbursed to put Canadian coal used in the manufacture of iron and steel on a basis of equality with imported coal?

Mr. STEVENS: This vote covers the incidentals in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. SPENCER: Is any coal being brought in from Germany?

Mr. STEVENS: I have no recollection of any being brought in from Germany.

Mr. RALSTON: In connection with the question asked by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) as to the amount of coal covered by the administration of this act—

Mr. STEVENS: I can give that information, but that was not the question.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I asked if there had been an increase.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister the amounts paid in bounties, and the tonnages? I believe there was a change in the bounty.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not believe there was a change. I have the figures for two years, which are as follows:

	Tonnage	Rate	Amount
1930-31	273,148	at 49½ cents per ton	$135,209 23
1931-32	125,798	at 49½ cents per ton	62,269 98

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it the act has been in force only two years.

Mr. YOUNG: I think the committee should know what this equalization process is costing at the different points in Canada where there are large steel plants, as at Sydney, Hamilton and Sault Ste. Marie. It may be possible that there would be discrimination against certain plants, and I suggest that this item should stand until my question is answered.

Mr. STEVENS: The only tonnage on which bounty has been paid is that which I have indicated, and that was paid to the Dominion Iron and Steel Company.

Item agreed to.

British and foreign news service, $32,000.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. EULER: I note this item shows no decrease over last year. I was one of many objectors last year to this item. At that time it was claimed that full value was not being received for the money spent, and I am still of that opinion. I believe the reason given last year was that this was a contractual obligation; is that still the case?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. EULER: I hope that when the contract expires it will not be renewed; how long has it to run?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I add my protest to that of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I recall on one occasion when the late Mr. Robb was Minister of Trade and Commerce that he withdrew this item but subsequently it had to be reinserted because it was a matter of contract. I do not think this country should be tied up over any long period with a contract of this character as I do not believe we are getting value for the money spent.

Mr. STEVENS: This contract was entered into on March 31, 1930; it was to run three years, so that it will expire on April 1, 1933.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Cut it off.

Mr. CANTLEY: At a time when we are cutting all services I submit that this contract ought to be revised, if not cancelled altogether.

Item agreed to.

Electricity and gas inspection service, $211,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Does this include salaries?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Why does not the 10 per cent cut appear there?

Mr. STEVENS: There is a cut there.

Mr. VENIOT: Where does it appear? At the bottom of the details of all the other departments appear the words "less 10 per cent." But that does not appear here. It is not following out the practice that has been adopted with respect to the other items. There is nothing here to indicate that there is to be a cut in salaries. There is a cut in the amount of the vote, but it may be for anything else but salaries. Let us have the details of the vote.

Mr. STEVENS: There will be a cut in the salaries just the same as in connection with the other items.

Mr. VENIOT: Why is it not mentioned? The amount last year was $236,000, and this year it is $211,000. Let us have the details.

Mr. STEVENS: The reduction will consist of a 10 per cent reduction in salaries. The estimate for salaries this year is $202,250, and there will be a cut of 10 per cent in that.

Mr. VENIOT: What I would like to know is why it does not say at the bottom of the page "less 10 per cent." That is done in all the other cases, and I am a little suspicious about it. It is not carrying out the same practice throughout.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend need have no suspicions about it. The communication at the foot of the civil government list is merely an indication of the cut, but it will be observed that these votes include other things besides salaries.

Mr. VALLANCE: If this item includes salaries, why cannot we allow it to stand the same as we did the others until the principle of the reduction has been adopted?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will understand that in practically every item that has been passed this afternoon there was a certain amount for salaries for the outside service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This afternoon we were dealing with the estimates of the Public Works department and I do not think they had any reference to salaries. There was no civil government vote for public works. The minister has rather surprised the house in the statement he has made to-night. If all these estimates have been made up on the basis of a 10 per cent reduction in salaries before this house has approved of the principle of a 10 per cent reduction, it simply means to all intents and purposes the disappearance of parliament and government by the ministry at its will. That is the significance of it. I do not believe it would be possible to have a more glaring example of the complete indifference of a ministry to the House of Commons than we have in these estimates as printed. Parliament is presented with a statement in bound form of the moneys that will be required to carry on the business of the country and these estimates are given in figures which assume and take for granted, before parliament has been asked to express its opinion at all on the matter, that there is to be a horizontal 10 per cent reduction in salaries in the public service of Canada, regardless of length of service of those affected, regardless of their grade, and regardless of whether the salaries are very large, whether they are medium or very small. We should not allow another item of these estimates to pass, Mr. Chairman, until this house has settled the question whether there is to be a reduction in salaries, and if so, to what extent the salaries are to be reduced. Otherwise we are simply abandoning the House of Commons as an instrument of control over public expenditure which is its primary function. We are leaving it entirely to the ministry to do what it pleases with regard to public moneys to be paid out for salaries in the public service regardless altogether of its own following, to say nothing of the House of Commons as a whole. That is a principle far too important to allow to pass unrecognized. I would ask the minister not to proceed with further items which involve reductions in salaries until it has been determined whether a reduction in salary is to be made, and if so, to what extent. If the minister attempts to do so, it will be our obligation on this side to see that the salaries of the public service are protected by the House of Commons as a whole before it is permitted to the ministry to decide for the house what is to be done with regard to them.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the right hon. gentleman has done neither the house nor the government justice in his remarks. The Prime Minister came before parliament some days before the estimates were presented, and publicly stated that it was the intention of the government to place before parliament estimates which would contain a 10 per cent reduction in the salaries of the civil service as well, of course, as other reductions. In a perfectly constitutional manner the government presents the estimates to parliament. There is nothing here that seeks to delude the house in any way, shape or form. The house is told very frankly what these estimates contain. We are here prepared to explain any matter in connection with these estimates that is brought before the house. My right hon. friend says that we are depriving parliament of its functions. We are doing precisely the opposite. We bring to parliament the estimates, and no other power could bring the estimates before parliament—they could not reach parliament unless they reached it in this way—and we tell parliament precisely what we propose to do. It is within the power of the house to reject the estimates and reject the government; there is no question about that. The government is now before the house with its proposals, and we invite the house to give them consideration and to adopt them. There is no justification either in the actions of the government or in the procedure followed to support the right hon. gentleman in the statements that he has made.

The question whether salaries shall be voted at the rate decided upon is now before the committee and we invite discussion and consideration of that matter—the widest possible discussion. I may add that in these estimates, as in nearly all our estimates, there is bound to be a certain amount of salary included in many items. The civil list, of course, is a different matter, being a separate salary list for the civil service in Ottawa. But frequently in the case of estimates for the Public Works department a certain amount of the item is made up of salaries for engineers, clerks of works, and so forth, provided out of these votes. The estimate before us for electricity and gas inspection service provides for service throughout Canada, and we are prepared to give all information desired in regard to it. Throughout the list we are providing for salaries as well as other expenditures, and we are not quarrelling with hon. gentlemen opposite; we are happy to hear their views and invite the fullest discussion. I do however resent the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman that we are acting in the slightest degree unconstitutionally or improperly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been no decision by this House of Commons to reduce salaries. True, the Prime Minister said that was the intention of the government, and that the government was going to reduce salaries by the amount of 10 per cent. Before he can have his way, however, he is obliged by the constitution to come to this House of Commons and get from it authority for his actions.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, we are here now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And that authority has not been given.

Mr. STEVENS: We are asking for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If you are asking for it in this way, you are not asking properly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, this is not the way to ask for it. If there is to be a 10 per cent all-around reduction, the proper way to proceed is to pass a resolution in this house to the effect that in its opinion the salaries of the civil servants should be reduced 10 per cent. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), or some other hon. member—I am not sure just who it was—had a motion on the order paper which, in so many words, took exception to the government's policy of a straight 10 per cent cut. The motion was to the effect that there should be a graded reduction in salaries.

An hon. MEMBER: That motion has been withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hear someone say the motion was withdrawn. It was on the order paper however, after the Prime Minister had made his statement that there was to be a 10 per cent reduction. When I looked at the motion I felt that to all intents and purposes it constituted a want of confidence motion in the administration because it set out a policy entirely different from and to my mind infinitely more sane than the policy outlined by the Prime Minister. This House of Commons has not yet decided upon any policy in connection with a reduction of salaries, and until one is decided upon the ministry is not justified in asking this House of Commons, by implication, to enact legislation which, after a full discussion here, may not be enacted at all.

The Prime Minister, and the ministry as a whole—if, as they do, my hon. friends the ministers of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and Justice (Mr. Guthrie) support him—have acted, it seems to me, in a very arbitrary manner towards the public service in respect to the 10 per cent reduction. The public servants have asked to be given an opportunity to present their case through representatives, a method of procedure which in this day and generation is eminently proper. Surely civil servants, who are to have their livelihood affected at a time when throughout the country there is general hardship, should be entitled to some hearing before this arbitrary cut is made. It appears however that the Prime Minister has stated they are not to be heard. A question was asked as to whether or not there might be a committee of parliament to consider the matter, and if I remember rightly the answer of the prime minister was "No"; that is all there was to it. I think we had better discover whether or not parliament has disappeared entirely and whether or not this country is being run by the will of a single individual surrounded by ministers who support him in anything and everything he does, regardless of how successful or unsuccessful they may be.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, is that not a fact?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish some member of the ministry would tell us one measure in connection with which he has opposed the Prime Minister.

Mr. STEVENS: That is just nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I say, the time has come when the country should find out whether, apart from this little ministerial group, those who are assembled here as members, whether they sit on one side of the house, or the other, are entitled to have their voices heard in the shaping of policies and in carrying on the work of the government, generally.

I do not think I am expressing myself too strongly when I say that the form in which the estimates have been presented constitutes an insult to the membership of this house. The ministry have presented to parliament estimates in a form which takes for granted that regardless of whom a majority of hon. members may represent in this parliament they will without any discussion agree to the will and wish of the ministry.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I recall the actual words used by the Prime Minister when he made his announcement to parliament concerning the reduction in salaries. I quote from Hansard the following:

> We have concluded that we will ask this parliament to pass a statute to reduce by 10 per cent the indemnities alike of the Senate and of the Commons, and of the compensation paid to ministers and to every branch of the public service.

In my opinion that was a proper procedure, so far as policy was concerned. To-night however they place estimates before us in which 10 per cent reductions have already been made without the pledge given by the Prime Minister being carried out. We are, in other words, asked to vote upon estimates and to allow the 10 per cent decrease without having the opportunity of agreeing or disagreeing with the pledge given by the Prime Minister himself when, the other day, he announced the policy to parliament.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have been told that legislation would be introduced providing for a 10 per cent reduction all along the line. I can understand that. We may be voting for a 10 per cent reduction in salaries of the outside service. To-night the minister is asking us to vote these estimates containing the reduction of 10 per cent.

do not know what the intention of the government is; we have not been taken into their confidence. I was assuming that the 10 per cent reduction was merely for the year 1932, but it is possible that the outside service will be placed in a position which legislation will not cure, and in that way the reduction may remain permanent so far as the outside service is concerned. If I am not right I should like the minister to make a statement.

Mr. RHODES: I feel that some observations of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition cannot go unchallenged. I do not purpose to enter into the discussion as to whether a reduction of 10 per cent or any reduction is right or wrong. I leave the merits of the question aside for the moment, and direct my remarks to the constitutional phases of the matter elucidated by my right hon. friend. He has said that the house ought to have proceeded by resolution. As a matter of fact he knows the procedure of this house and knows also that a resolution would mean nothing. Under the rules it would not be competent for hon. members to deal with a resolution involving an expenditure of money except to the extent of giving an expression of opinion. My right hon. friend knows furthermore that were it not for the action of the government in bringing down these estimates the civil servants would not receive one cent of salary. That is a fact. He has said that in bringing down the estimates the government is insulting parliament. If that be so let me say to him that he and his government insulted parliament every year they were in office, because we are pursuing the same method he pursued. There is no other way by which in a British parliament a money vote can be submitted to the house except through the government, and then only upon message of His Excellency the Governor General. In bringing these estimates before the house we have acted properly and have followed the strict constitutional method; there is no other course open to us. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) suggests that an opportunity should be given to vote upon the question as to whether there ought or ought not to be a reduction of the salaries of the civil service. He has his opportunity now.

Mr. VENIOT: When the Prime Minister promised to bring down a bill?

Mr. RHODES: There will have to be a supplementary bill dealing with certain phases, I have no doubt; for instance, the question of statutory increases this year and of the incidence of the superannuation fund having regard to this 10 per cent reduction. But that does not alter the circumstance that the only method whereby money can be voted for salaries is by a supply bill, precisely in the same manner in which we are doing it now, and precisely as my right hon. friend did it, and precisely as any succeeding government will have to do it unless the constitutional practice that has obtained since we have enjoyed British parliamentary institutions is departed from.

Mr. VENIOT: Can the hon. minister give any instance where a government brought down a supply bill of this nature reducing salaries?

Mr. RHODES: There has not been a year since the establishment of our parliamentary institutions when there has not been submitted by the government of the day estimates involving in some cases decreases and in other cases increases. In other words, the arbitrament as to whether there should be an increase or a decrease rests with the government upon the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General, and then it remains for parliament to deal with the bill. In that respect we are following precisely the same procedure as did my right hon. friend and as has been followed in all British parliaments. As a matter of fact the procedure must be followed under our constitution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my hon. friend that the only way to have supply voted is to present estimates to the house and have the house pass on them. That is not what I was complaining of. I did not say it was any insult to the house to bring down estimates and present them. What I did say was this: to present your estimates in a form which assumes that the house is going to carry out a particular policy before that policy has been approved by resolution or in any other way, is equivalent to saying that the members of the house are so many automatons, that they are going to act just as the Prime Minister wishes them to act.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, with the permission of my right hon. friend, I should like to ask him a question: will he name one instance during the whole tenure of his government, or during the whole history of the parliament of Canada, where the government of the day has asked for a resolution of the house with respect to the procedure it should follow on a money vote submitted to parliament by way of estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But this is something broader than the question of a mere money vote for salaries; it is the important question of policy as to whether the public service of Canada shall at this time be required to accept, regardless of the grade in which the individual may be, and all other considerations, a 10 per cent reduction in salary. Now the Prime Minister, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, did state at the opening of the house that the question would be settled by a statute. There was a definite pledge made. No notice has been given of any bill for the purpose, nor has there been introduced into this house any motion which would permit discussion of the broad question of policy. When I spoke of a resolution I had in mind something of the character which appeared on the order paper whereby it was declared to be the policy of this house that there should be a reduction. The only resolution to which I have referred spoke of a graded reduction. If the ministry introduced a resolution that there should be a 10 per cent reduction in the salaries of the public service this year, and the house had passed upon the resolution, it would be perfectly proper procedure to bring in estimates based upon the 10 per cent reduction. But no such resolution has been passed, no bill has been passed. We now discover that not only in this instance where it is obvious salaries are being cut 10 per cent regardless of grade, but that there are concealed throughout these estimates from beginning to close cuts in the public service of which we had no knowledge whatever. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that this afternoon we reduced a large number of salaries in the public service. I venture to say that there is not an hon. gentleman outside of himself and possibly other members of the ministry who had the slightest conception that we were doing anything of the kind. I venture to say that outside the ministers there is not an hon. member on the other side of the house or on this side who had any idea while we were voting supply for public buildings, that at the same time we were cutting down the salaries of persons in different parts of the country by 10 per cent. That is not a correct procedure, but that apparently is what we have done, according to the minister. If that is what we are now doing, I say let us stop it and regularize our procedure at once. I am not in any sense trying to embarrass the government, nor am I anxious to be overcritical. And while I am speaking, I wish to withdraw what I said a moment ago of the other members of the ministry. I spoke hastily when I stated that I feared none of them had given the Prime Minister as much of their advice as they should have. Perhaps I should have said their advice is not as much heeded as it should be.

Mr. GORDON: You would be surprised.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But I do wish to make it very clear that this dominion is beginning to be resentful of its legislation being formed so exclusively according to the whim and the will and the caprice of the Prime Minister, and that the time has come now for those in parliament who believe in parliament as an institution and in the rights of the people's representatives to have some say in policy, some say in legislation and some say in matters of administration to stand up for those fundamental rights.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce will forgive me for taking a moment or two of his time—I would suggest that my right hon. friend did not answer the question I submitted to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What question?

Mr. RHODES: I put the question to him as to whether he could point to an instance either during the lifetime of his own government or that of any other government since confederation where the ministry had submitted a resolution to the house to take its sense as to what it ought to do with respect to a money vote, the responsibility for the bringing down of which rested entirely with itself. That is the question I submitted to my right hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would answer the question by saying that I think never since confederation has a ministry cut civil service salaries by 10 per cent. Let me add that I believe he will find that in any case where a ministry has attempted to take a course which was radical or exceptional, it has proceeded by statute or by a resolution governing the situation.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, so far as the principle is concerned, and so far as the constitutional practice is concerned, it matters not whether the estimate be reduced or increased, the responsibility in each case rests entirely upon the government of the day. That is the practice and has always been so. But my right hon. friend spoke of taking an expression of opinion of the house. If he was as keen to pursue the course he suggests as he is keen to make some capital against the ministry—and with respect to that I find no fault whatsoever—the opportunity was open to him this very day, because when we moved to go into committee of supply it was competent for my right hon. friend to have moved an amendment to the motion raising the whole question of the reduction of salaries by 10 per cent and debating it to his heart's content.

Mr. VENIOT: On a bill.

Mr. RHODES: On a motion to go into supply it is competent to debate anything; there is absolutely no limit imposed on the opposition in that respect. So I say my right hon. friend has let go one opportunity. But there will be opportunities on other occasions when we move to go into committee of supply, and my right hon friend can then take the sense of the house in precisely the same manner as if discussing a substantive motion.

There is one other word I might say before my right hon. friend rises, and it is this: My right hon. friend has referred to the arbitrary methods of the right hon. Prime Minister and to his exercising his will and caprice upon his colleagues and upon the house and so forth. Let me say to my right hon. friend that he is taking entirely too much upon himself in assuming anything of the kind. My right hon. friend knows what ministerial responsibility means; he understands what the cohesiveness of the ministry is, and I say to him that the colleagues of the Prime Minister stand behind him one hundred per cent. When the Prime Minister speaks he speaks for the ministry as a whole, and we are very proud to have him for our spokesman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Whatever may be the views of my hon. friend and his colleagues in regard to constitutional questions they are evidently as one on the old maxim, "United we stand; divided we fall." They are going to stand as long as they can, I have no doubt.

My hon friend has just said I might have taken the opportunity before going into supply to move a motion of want of confidence in the government. If I had done that I believe he would have been about the first to say that I need not have resorted to that extreme method. I purposely avoided anything of the kind so that hon. gentlemen opposite, who feel that the civil servants in their own constituencies and the civil service of Canada generally, should not be treated in the manner in which they are being treated at present, by the decision of the government, would have a chance to voice their views and opinions without being told by the minister that in so doing they were voting against their own party. I did not purpose to move on going into supply any want of confidence motion to enable the government in that way to get out of its difficulties. I think the government is entitled to give its own supporters as well as the opposition a hearing on this question.

My right hon. friend says I could do it to-morrow. In view of what he has said I am not going to wait until to-morrow; I am going to do it now. We will stay right with this matter as long as hon. gentlemen opposite try to put through these votes in this way.

Mr. POULIOT: This discussion reminds me of a means taken during the war to divert the thoughts of soldiers on leave from the realities of the conflict. In the Paris restaurants they began inventing new dances—the fox trot, the hesitation waltz, and finally the Wilson dance, which consisted of one step forward, one step backward and one step aside. Last year the government increased the salaries of the ministers by $2,000, though they called it a special allowance instead of an increase in salary. I know the leader of the opposition was included, but he has the rank of a minister, and in any case the suggestion came not from him but from the government. In those times of stress, when the unemployed were becoming more and more numerous, each cabinet minister received an additional $2,000 a year. That was done in view of the decrease that was to come this year. Last year hon. gentlemen opposite, who had figures showing that unemployment was continually increasing, said, "We must have foresight," but that was the only way they showed that foresight. They had foresight for their own interests; they increased their salaries by $2,000. They had that in view; they saw these hard times ahead, and that was the reason for the increase, made under the guise of a special allowance, in order to induce the people to think the prices of cars were still very high. You can buy a new Ford car for about $500, and you can buy four street car tickets for 25 cents. Any man can attend to his parliamentary duties on six street car tickets a day, and that would not amount to much. For $100 a year any member of parliament or any cabinet minister can provide himself with the local transportation necessary to enable him to attend to all his duties. He can go to his office in the morning, go home for lunch, come back for the afternoon session, go home for dinner, come back for the evening session, and then go home to rest peacefully.

Last year the salary of a minister, including the indemnity, was $14,000. This year it is still $14,000, plus a special allowance of $2,000, which, if my arithmetic is correct, makes $16,000. If we take 10 per cent from that, he is still left with $400 more than he received last year. Members of the house lose 10 per cent of their indemnity, or $400, and in this way we pay for the increase received by the cabinet ministers. I do not complain about the cut, but I think everything should be fair and that we should be all on the same footing. I should be on the same footing as a civil servant whose salary is reduced, and the ministers should be on the same footing as myself. They have larger salaries; that is only fair, but I am strongly against that special allowance. I am ready to accept a cut in my indemnity provided the government understands that throughout the country there is a general feeling of indignation because the special allowance remains while all salaries are cut.

That is not the only point I wish to make. In the estimates for 1930 very few increases were made, while last year there were increases amounting to thousands of dollars. Look at the estimates of last year and the estimates of 1930. There were discriminatory exceptions, and those discriminations should disappear before any cut is made. Everyone should be on the same basis, the Tories and the Grits, the poor and the rich. Then no one can complain; but if those who receive the most still get more than others and are left untouched by the cut, there will be a strong feeling of indignation throughout this country from ocean to ocean. People will ask, "Where is the fairness of a government which serves itself and does not give the poor labourers a chance?"

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to ask the minister whether or not there has been any recommendation from the Civil Service Commission covering the 10 per cent reduction which is suggested by this and other items?

Mr. STEVENS: Speaking for my own department, I should say no.

Mr. RALSTON: Has there been any order in council passed reducing the salaries and the classification referred to in this item?

Mr. STEVENS: So far as I know there has not been any such order in council.

Mr. RALSTON: Then, Mr. Chairman, the situation is this: We have the government taking no action whatever up to the present to change the salaries of the civil servants. Salaries of civil servants are fixed by statute, as I understand it, first as provided in the Civil Service Act, and secondly on a recommendation of the Civil Service Commission approved by the governor in council. When the Civil Service Act was passed it provided that the civil service, so far as practicable, should be "classified and compensated in accordance with the classification of such service dated October 10, 1919, signed by the commission and confirmed by chapter 10 of the statutes of 1919, second session, with any amendments or additions thereto thereafter made." Then any new classifications and any new rates of compensation were governed by section 12, which provided that from time to time, as might be necessary, "the commission should recommend rates of compensation for new classes that might be established, or might propose changes in the rates of compensation for existing classes."

The answer of the minister is that, notwithstanding the fact that there is a statute which says these civil servants shall be paid in accordance with the classification of 1919, notwithstanding the promise of the Prime Minister that a statute would be brought down in order to make a change and reduce salaries by 10 per cent; notwithstanding that the Civil Service Commission have themselves made recommendations and fixed the rate for each classification, and notwithstanding that these are the rates in force to-night throughout the Dominion of Canada, no action has been taken by the government, no action has been taken by the Civil Service Commission. These are the salaries to which the civil servants of the country are entitled at the present time; yet the government proposes to put upon parliament, in this left-handed manner, the onus of cutting these salaries by voting 10 per cent less than the amount required to fulfil the obligation which exists in pursuance of these statutes and orders in council. In other words, they are just putting the cart before the horse. If they want to take the responsibility of reducing salaries let them do as the Prime Minister suggested—bring in a statute to change the Civil Service Act, which prescribes that civil servants shall receive the salary provided by the classification of 1919. If they want to change this, in view of that statute, let them pass an order in council accordingly and get the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, if they can, and then come to this house and say: The salary of this particular civil servant is so much and we want the money to pay it. In that way we can have an opportunity of discussing the principle. But at the present time the onus is put on the house, in a clandestine vote, to cut down salaries, to make it possible for the government to say to the civil service, "We are sorry we cannot pay you because the house has not voted the money," notwithstanding the fact that they are not taking the responsibility for changing the salary rate as provided by the act.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) who is not in his seat at the moment, suggested that if this house realized anything about the matter it would know that unless the government brought down these estimates the civil service could not get a cent. Well, no one will listen to such a threat. The civil service understands that it is not likely the government will hold up this vote or their pay because there is some discussion of a 10 per cent reduction. That is no answer to our contention that the government should first give an opportunity to discuss the principle in reference to the general cut. That is quite beside the question. The question is not a constitutional question as to whether a money vote can be submitted to the house in any other way than through the government. The question is a plain one whether you can change a statute by simply refusing to vote supply to the full amount which the statute requires, instead of the government going at it man fashion, reducing salaries, and coming to parliament with the statement, "That is all the salary we will pay and that is all the money we ask you to vote." The procedure is absolutely wrong in the face of the Civil Service Act and of the practice that has been followed. The government are employing these public servants and they are the ones to take the responsibility for bringing into the house a statute regarding the salaries so that it may be discussed and then asking for the vote that is necessary to pay them.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend (Mr. Ralston) says that we are putting the cart before the horse; I submit that in his remarks he has placed himself in precisely that position. The resolution before the committee at the present time asks for the provision of a certain sum of money for the electricity and gas inspection service of the dominion. In presenting this vote to the committee I am simply asking the committee to vote that sum of money for that particular service. Incidentally I was asked whether it was the intention of the government, in the payment of the staff comprehended in this service, to reduce salaries to the extent of 10 per cent. I replied that in harmony with the announcement made by the Prime Minister some days ago it was so intended. Now the question whether or not the whole civil service should be reduced 10 per cent in their salaries is not immediately before the committee. If my hon. friends choose in connection with this vote to combat the principle, very well; I am not objecting to that. But I do submit to hon. gentlemen opposite that what we are doing at the moment is presenting an estimate of the cost of running this particular department, this particular branch, for the year 1932-33.

As regards the alleged clandestine nature of this presentation, my hon. friend is neither fair nor accurate. The Prime Minister, as I have already intimated, stated plainly in his place as leader of the government that it was the intention of the government to present to the house the necessary legislation, whatever that might be, to give effect to the cut of 10 per cent. Unquestionably there will have to be certain legislation. So far as this resolution is concerned, it will be followed by the customary supply bill. This resolution, providing for supply for this particular branch of the public service, will be followed by a government bill in its proper course. In addition to that, regarding such things as statutory increases, retirement contributions, and the degree to which the Civil Service Act is interfered with, all these matters will be taken care of in the legislation referred to by the Prime Minister.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not what the Prime Minister said. He was not talking about superannuation and matters incidental to the Civil Service Act. He said:

> . . . a statute to reduce by ten per cent the indemnities alike of the Senate and of the Commons, and of the compensation paid to ministers and to every branch of the public service.

That has nothing to do with superannuation.

Mr. STEVENS: It includes all that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely; there is no question about it. Whatever is necessary—those are the words I used a moment ago. Whatever is necessary to give effect to that decision will be brought down in the form of legislation. Now, if no estimates are to be granted until the question of the civil service cut referred to by the Prime Minister, the reduction in the cost of public service, is fully debated, then we shall simply have to address ourselves to the situation. We are inviting consideration of a special vote for a special purpose. There is nothing underhand about it, and it was not worthy of my hon. friend to suggest that.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, you did.

Mr. RALSTON: Lefthanded, I said.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member used the words clandestine and lefthanded; if there were other ways of describing it he would no doubt have used them. The announcement of the Prime Minister was a perfectly frank one and it has been before parliament for over a week. These estimates were laid on the table yesterday, and printed on the face of the estimates is the intimation, following the announcement of the Prime Minister, of what it was proposed to do. We moved the house into supply to-day, and notwithstanding what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) said a moment ago about not wishing to take the opportunity, the fact is that we moved ourselves into supply to-day with these estimates before the house, full notice being given of just what the intention of the government was in the matter. I am not blaming the opposition for allowing the opportunity to pass, but it was there. The whole question could have been raised. I invite the consideration of the resolution now before the committee. This sum of $211,000 covers the gas and electricity inspection service of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And which contains a ten per cent reduction.

Mr. STEVENS: The question which was asked me an hour ago was as to whether or not there were salaries included in this vote and if so, would they be cut ten per cent. I replied that in harmony with the policy adopted they, in common with all other salaries, would be cut.

Mr. VENIOT: The ten per cent cut was there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. minister has just stated that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) was incorrect when he stated that the ministry, in pursuing the course it was, was putting the cart before the horse. Immediately following that statement he made reference to the fact that in order to put this 10 per cent reduction into effect there would have to be an amendment to certain statutes. If my hon. friend will look at page 15 of the estimates, he will find under the heading of "Legislation" items covering the salary of the Speaker of the Senate, indemnity to senators, salary of the Speaker of the House of Commons, salary of the deputy speaker and indemnity to members, including additional indemnity to the Leader of the Opposition; all these items are preceded by an asterisk, and the explanatory note opposite the asterisk at the foot of the page is that these reductions will be authorized by legislation. What does that mean? That means that the government now is telling us and the country that not only with regard to this House of Commons, but with regard to the Senate, everything is settled and decided finally, that there might just as well not be a second chamber as far as the settling of the question of the indemnities of its members is concerned or the salary of its Speaker. In so far as the indemnity of members of that chamber and the indemnity of members of the House of Commons is concerned, everything is settled already before any hon. member has had a chance to say a word with regard to his own indemnity. If that is not putting the cart before the horse, I do not know what is.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the correct way to put it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the correct way. I ask my hon. friend: who can say these reductions will be authorized by legislation until they are authorized? I say that the instant a ministry asserts that anything will be done by legislation before His Excellency the Governor General has put his signature to a bill passed by both houses, that ministry is usurping the powers of parliament. Yet that is what appears in a document laid by the present ministry on the table of this house. We have here the declaration that in so far as His Excellency the Governor General is concerned, in so far as the Senate is concerned, in so far as the House of Commons is concerned, not one of these three branches of parliament count for anything with respect to what is to be done in regard to this 10 per cent reduction. A more glaring example of the usurpation by implication of the rights of parliament by a ministry has never been presented before.

Mr. STEVENS: A more glaring example of persistence in refusing to recognize cold facts has never been exhibited. The right hon. gentleman says that we are defying parliament,—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Ignoring parliament.

Mr. STEVENS: —that we are disregarding the Senate and disregarding the rights of His Excellency the Governor General. The resolution before the committee at this moment is but a forerunner of a statute which will not be law until it passes this house, passes the Senate and is signed by His Excellency the Governor General. That which is now resting in the hands of the chairman is simply a resolution offered to parliament to be passed before any statute can be enacted.

The right hon. gentleman is merely seeking to inflame public opinion and to turn the minds of the public against this government. The right hon. gentleman is indulging in the cheapest kind of claptrap. He knows that to cut salaries is an unpopular move at any time; he knows that that is not a pleasant thing for any government to do and he thinks he can appeal to the civil service because their interests in this instance have been immediately touched. However, I have greater confidence in the civil service; I feel that they will respond more readily to the appeal made the other day by the right hon. the Prime Minister when he said that among other efforts being made by the government to balance the budget in the coming fiscal year was an appeal to the civil service that they should forego for this year the statutory increase and submit to a reduction of their salaries. That was the appeal made the other day by the right hon. the Prime Minister; that is the appeal which this government confidently makes to the civil service of Canada. The right hon. gentleman has but one object in making the statements he has, that of trying to annoy and embarrass the government. I venture this statement, that his interest in the civil service, as far as this cut in salary is concerned, has not caused him one moment of sleeplessness; his one desire and object is to stir up a spirit of resentment against the government. All this talk and nonsense about the unconstitutionality of this and that and the statement that we are flaunting the Senate and disregarding His Excellency is the merest piffle. I repeat that what we have done is to present to this house a resolution as has been done from time immemorial; we are asking the house to consider a resolution for the granting of certain sums of supply for specific purposes, and we state frankly what those purposes are. This resolution will be followed by a statute which will not not be effective until it has been passed by both branches of parliament and signed by His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to make every allowance for my hon. friend's excited frame of mind, but I would point out that I am speaking of something much larger and more important than the civil service salary cut, I am speaking of the rights of this House of Commons, the rights of the Senate and the rights of parliament as a whole with respect to all legislation.

An hon. MEMBER: Another constitutional question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. gentlemen opposite are going to be so rude as not to permit me to have a hearing, they might just as well take the floor themselves because I am not anxious to pursue this matter any further. I have been doing so as much in their own interest as in the interest of hon. members on this side. Hon. gentlemen opposite will find out very shortly just where they stand on some of these questions.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not worry.

Mr. GOTT: We are going to be here a long time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has said that the government has come forward in a perfectly straightforward manner, and, so to speak, has put all its cards on the table. What was done when the announcement was sent out with respect to these estimates? Look at the press of Canada and what do we see featured in the headlines? It is stated that as a result of these estimates presented to parliament there has been a saving to the country of something like $43,000,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite applaud that sentiment as the country has applauded it, but do they believe the country understood that that saving included a 10 per cent cut in the salaries of the public service?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister says "certainly."

Mr. STEVENS: It was stated the other day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not believe one person in a hundred assumed that for one moment—

Mr. STEVENS: Everybody knew it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —that the total reduction in the estimates included this 10 per cent cut which was to go into effect after some statute had been passed by this parliament. It was an effort to make the reduction which the government is seeking to effect appear very much larger than it actually is. That is what it was so far as the government's presentation of the matter is concerned.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolute nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the truth.

Mr. STEVENS: Utter nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the minister has got into such a petulant frame of mind that he cannot permit others to have the same hearing as was accorded to himself, he must take the consequences. I repeat to the minister that at the present time he is endeavouring to have this house commit itself to a flat all round reduction in the salaries of the civil service regardless altogether, as I have said, of the grade, tenure of service and everything else pertaining to the position of the civil servants. We are not prepared to meet him in any action of that kind.

With regard to the cut in salaries, may I say that personally I would have been prepared to support the government to a certain extent so far as taking something off the higher salaries for a period of time is concerned. I would have been quite prepared to support the government in that. But I would not have been prepared to go right down the line in applying a 10 per cent cut, regardless of the grade or remuneration of employees, in fixing the amount to be taken from them. Far from seeking to make any capital out of the matter, I have simply been endeavouring to see that justice is done, so far as it is possible still to have justice done to those who have not yet been heard in regard to what affects the means of their livelihood.

Mr. CHEVRIER: With what has been said by speakers on this side with reference to the manner in which this vote is now before the house I fully agree. I thought that we had reached a point about an hour ago when after asking a question of the hon. minister it had been agreed that this matter would stand over in order to afford an opportunity to those primarily concerned with the proposed reduction in civil service salaries to interview the proper authorities and express their views for the purpose of obtaining some satisfaction. I had understood that that was the understanding. I would like to know now from the minister whether that is so or not. If not I am quite prepared to go ahead with my remarks.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend made no such presentation that I heard. The point raised in connection with vote No. 29 for civil government salaries was whether or not that vote should be discussed before the general question of a salary reduction was discussed in the house, and I said that so far as I was concerned I was quite prepared to let that vote stand until the question had been discussed, and the vote did stand.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Do I understand then that there is no hope that the parties primarily concerned may themselves, not through any other medium, but by themselves, in any way appeal to the government in an endeavour to obtain some redress? Am I to understand that the door is closed in their face, that they are without the right of appeal?

Mr. STEVENS: No. The hon. gentleman is not stating the case fairly at all. As far as I am concerned I shall never refuse to receive any representatives of the civil service —never; and my hon. friend has no right or foundation for insinuating that any such refusal was made.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I made no such insinuation. The minister has no right to make the statement that I have insinuated anything. I did not. I want to ask the question now, whether on the behalf of the government the minister will say that those primarily concerned will be heard. If the minister will say that those primarily concerned will be heard before the final step is taken, I am quite prepared to take my seat now and leave the whole matter in the hands of the civil servants themselves. Will the minister give me the assurance that they will be heard?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not speaking for the whole government in regard to this vote. I am speaking for myself. The hon. gentleman should direct his question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then I direct my question to the hon. gentleman who is now leading the house. So that there may be no misunderstanding I ask the Minister of Justice, who I presume is now leading the house, whether he will say that an opportunity will be given to those primarily concerned to place their representations before the government in an endeavour to obtain some measure of what they think they ought to get in the way of redress.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I personally think that the request is a very reasonable one, and I know of no refusal. Certainly it has not been made by any civil servant in my department. If a request is made I shall be very glad to consider it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not going to be satisfied with promises of the kind made before August, 1930. This is no time for election promises. I want a straight answer to my question whether the government will receive and hear a delegation from the people primarily concerned. It is not satisfactory to say that they probably will be heard. I ask the leader of the house now if he is prepared to say that the government will receive a delegation from the people primarily concerned and give them an opportunity to present their case. I have asked a straight question; I expect an answer, and I think under the rules of the house I am entitled to it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My answer to the hon. member would be that the government is at all times prepared to hear any representations made to it by any responsible body of people.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the government, if a demand is made upon them by the civil servants themselves, if plans are made tomorrow or the day after to present their case to the government, receive a delegation from the civil servants with respect to this matter?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would not as a member of the government be prepared to listen to demands. I said requests, and if a request is made by any responsible body of people to be heard in regard to any public matter, the government will hear them. If the civil servants of Canada want to be heard the government will hear them.

Mr. YOUNG: We are being asked to vote money to pay 90 per cent of the salaries of the civil servants. When at the end of the month they receive cheques for only 90 per cent of their salaries they will be able to argue that they are getting the reduced amount, not because their salaries have been decreased by 10 per cent, but because parliament has not voted any more money, and that the other 10 per cent will still be due to them until such time as a statute passes this parliament reducing their salaries. The government say they intend to introduce such a bill, and all we are asking is that we be given an opportunity to see the bill and discuss it before we pass these estimates. Surely that is not an unreasonable request.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can tell my hon. friend what will be in the bill. It will merely legalize whatever we do in the estimates. It will authorize the reduction of 10 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: Perhaps it will. From what the minister has said we do not know exactly what the bill will contain. It might be that when the bill comes down we could agree with every clause in it. In any case, surely the government does not ask us to pledge ourselves to support a measure until we know what is in it. I think our request is reasonable. Tell us what you are going to do, and then if we arrive at a favourable decision we will be able to support the estimates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not wish to interfere with the discussion any more than is absolutely necessary. If the manner in which these estimates have been presented to the committee has created inconvenience or embarrassment I agree that time should be taken to consider the whole question. I submit however that no embarrassment or inconvenience has been occasioned. This interesting document, this bluebook, sets forth the estimated amounts which the government purposes to expend in the ensuing year. Estimates embodied in a series of resolutions are brought down at every session of parliament. The resolutions come before a committee of the whole House of Commons and are passed or rejected. Now is the time to discuss them. If we pass them here, however, we do not by any means effect a final disposition; our action is not conclusive. Before they are incorporated into a bill, they have to be read a first time, and if hon. members wish to discuss, modify or reject them they are afforded an opportunity. Upon second reading the same opportunity is open to hon. members in any quarter of the house. Then there has to be concurrence, following which they have to be incorporated in a bill the terms of which must not conflict with any other act of parliament. If there is conflict it must be made clear that the bill which we have passed is the predominant measure and that there is nothing repugnant or inconsistent in it. That may be declared in the supply bill or in the act passed by this house and by the Senate of Canada.

Speaking to this question a few days ago the Prime Minister stated very definitely that legislation would be introduced to meet whatever emergency there may be. I can see myself that there may be a necessity to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act. There may be necessity for several amendments and the overriding of the Civil Service Act as has occurred time and again in connection with estimates presented in this house. Every year hon. members know we override the Civil Service Act, notwithstanding anything in it, and the supply bill when it becomes law supersedes it. Procedure which has been followed for the last ten or twenty years may be followed this year so far as the Civil Service Act is concerned.

If hon. members are prejudiced or inconvenienced in any way I should like to have them so state. The question of the uniform 10 per cent reduction can be discussed now, if hon. members so desire, or it may be brought up any day upon going into committee of supply, when a full discussion may take place and the sense of the house may be taken. There may be further discussion when any of these resolutions are brought up for first or second reading or for concurrence. In short, innumerable opportunities will be offered for discussion. If now is the most convenient time, let us do it now; if some other time would be more convenient, let us postpone our discussion until that time. It is unfair to say however, that the government, by its manner of proceeding, has sought any advantage. Here are the estimates, page after page of them, which will have to be confirmed by legislation. These reductions will have to be confirmed by legislation. Hon. members may criticize them now or when the legislation is brought in. The time is immaterial, except to the extent that it is a matter of convenience; that is the only question which now arises.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not receive an answer to my former question.

Mr. STEVENS: What was that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The civil government vote as set out in these estimates provides the same sums for each individual as they were drawing last year. Then, there is a footnote providing for a 10 per cent reduction on the total, which leaves the salary of that class intact, subject only to the legislation which will be passed, and the length of time the legislation will enforce the reduction. That aspect of the matter provides no difficulty, but I do find difficulty in the procedure by which the government through a vote of the committee seeks to validate a straight 10 per cent reduction of the salaries of the civil servants affected by these votes in connection with which there is no footnote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is only provisional validation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I wish to consider carefully whether or not I am prepared to vote for a 10 per cent reduction in salaries of $1,000 or $1,100. If I acquiesce in this I am agreeing to a cut in that very salary which will be contained in the vote before this committee. I am not putting myself in that position with regard to civil government, but I take that stand with respect to the votes now under discussion and votes by which civil servants are paid out of a general expenditure such as that being asked for in item 288. I hope I have made myself clear. If I am correct, the government can avoid some embarrassment. By providing for the full salaries as they do under the items of civil government, they would obviate the difficulty, and we would be subjected to the legislation which is to be considered later in the form of a bill.

Mr. STEVENS: I may be able to satisfy my hon. friend on that point. As a matter of fact in this particular resolution there is no specific mention of a cut of 10 per cent in civil servants' salaries.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, I understood there was.

Mr. STEVENS: No, there is not. But when I was asked whether it was the intention of the government that a cut of 10 per cent should apply to such employees as are paid out of this vote, I replied that it was. If this vote of $211,000 is passed to-night, assuming that no legislation is passed and nothing in addition to this is done, it provides for the payment of the salaries current to-day.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not what I understood. I asked the minister to give details, and he said the cut included the $211,000.

Mr. STEVENS: The item as a whole is reduced by $37,600, which includes all that is in the item. To be fair and frank about the matter I stated that it was the intention to cut salaries 10 per cent, and I would not have been fair to the house had I intimated anything else.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That makes it so.

Mr. STEVENS: No, speaking technically it does not make it so. Unless there is some other statute passed the salaries would remain the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the minister has overlooked the fact that we are discussing item 29.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh no, we are not talking about that; we are discussing item 288.

Mr. VENIOT: In order to settle the matter will the minister give us the details of the reductions in this item.

Mr. STEVENS: The item is made up of several factors. Estimates for salaries are $202,050.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What were the salaries last year?

Mr. STEVENS: $194,535. Travelling expenses of the director, assistant director, inspectors and other officers amount to $35,000; purchase of equipment, $6,000; general contingencies $5,550, making a total of $248,600.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What is the amount for salaries?

Mr. STEVENS: $202,050. From that has been deducted the flat sum of $37,600, in anticipation of the reduction to which we have referred.

Mr. VENIOT: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: There is nothing inherent in the resolution which cuts the salaries. I was perfectly frank with the committee, I told them what the intention was as to making this reduction. Undoubtedly we intend that the reduction shall apply.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to delay the work of the committee, or speak about the so-called constitutional aspects of the question. My purpose in rising is merely to make a suggestion that seems to be the most reasonable and logical course of procedure in the matter. The question of this 10 per cent reduction is a very important one, and I think members of the house, as well as members of the civil service, would like some opportunity of considering it, and, perhaps on the part of the latter, of making some representations to the ministry thereon. That is one reason why possibly there might be a little delay before we finally settle the question. While I might be inclined to favour in the interests of economy—which I think is needed—some sort of reduction, I think the percentage should be graded in relation to salary—that a man receiving, say, $1,200 cannot be expected to stand a cut of 10 per cent, or perhaps even 5 per cent, as well as can a man getting a salary of $4,000 or $5,000. I mention that to emphasize the importance of giving the question further consideration. Although I am quite sure that my hon. friend the minister, who is usually very reasonable, did not anticipate to-night that the question of the principle involved in the 10 per cent cut would be discussed on his estimates, yet I submit, despite what he said, that if we accept some of these items as well as the totals, we are in effect recognizing the principle of the 10 per cent horizontal cut.

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily.

Mr. EULER: I think I am correct in that. Not only that, but if we accept it in some of these single items in which reductions of salary are involved, we are recognizing the principle generally. Later on when we come to other departments there will be again discussions along the same lines. I think the suggestion made is a good one, that if the minister and his colleagues would let their estimates go through without involving any 10 per cent cut at all, any individual items involving the cut being allowed to stand until such time as the bill which the Prime Minister has promised is introduced, then the whole question could be threshed out at one time, instead of the discussion being scattered over the estimates of each department. I make the suggestion with a view to saving time, and having the question settled in one general, full dress debate, if I may so describe it, instead of having it recur on every estimate.

Mr. STEVENS: May I point out to the hon. gentleman that such a course is not now practicable. These are estimates of the requirements of expenditure for the public service during the coming year. When the treasury board and the government as a whole finally formulated these estimates they took into consideration the reductions, the total amounting, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has said, to some $40,000,000. Included in those reductions was the anticipated reduction of 10 per cent in the salary. Now, then, the whole of the estimates are based upon that expectation, and they are presented to parliament accordingly. The only way in which we could now make a change would be to introduce by resolution an additional estimate covering the amounts that are left out of the present estimates affecting the salaries of the civil service. In other words, it would require a supplementary estimate. I would suggest to my hon. friend so far as the resolution that is now before us is concerned—and the same argument will apply to many others—that its adoption does not in itself affect the salary of anyone. But when I am asked: Is it the intention of the government out of the vote to pay the same salary as that paid last year? I am bound to say: No, what the government intends to do is to make a cut, subject of course to parliament approving of such a procedure. The adoption of this resolution, I repeat, does not make a cut in anybody's salary at all.

Mr. EULER: We accept the principle of it.

Mr. STEVENS: The adoption of the resolution certainly does not accept the principle in the face of the discussion we have had. Everybody now knows there is a sharp cleavage of opinion regarding that principle.

Mr. RALSTON: It means the ministry will not have enough money except to pay reduced salaries.

Mr. STEVENS: We would have to cut out travelling expenses for instance. Let me make it quite clear that the adoption of this resolution would not in any way affect the salary of a single person; we have enough money in the vote to pay the salaries of those employed on administration of gas and electricity.

Mr. EULER: With 10 per cent off.

Mr. STEVENS: With 10 per cent on. If parliament does not by statute approve of what the Prime Minister has announced, then the only way in which proper effect could be given to these estimates as they are would be to bring in supplementary estimates to make up whatever reductions are contained in these estimates, because otherwise so far as this vote is concerned other parts of the service would be short of funds.

Mr. EULER: Could it not be corrected by passing the estimates under the old salary schedule, without the statutory increases, and then let the Prime Minister bring in his bill to provide for the 10 per cent cut?

Mr. STEVENS: I have already tried to make clear that so far as this resolution is concerned its acceptance does not affect anybody's salary.

Mr. EULER: But it is going to put them on that basis.

Mr. STEVENS: The appropriation for salaries, travelling expenses, purchase of equipment and contingencies would raise the vote to what we think is necessary. To run the whole branch would mean a supplementary estimate. We could not run it on this vote.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): To pay the same salaries as last year?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, to carry out the whole thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Having regard to what the minister has just said about it not being practicable to meet this involved situation in the way suggested, and having regard also to what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) stated a moment ago, might I now ask the ministry if the shortest as well as the proper course would not be to bring in at once the bill which the Prime Minister has promised authorizing the 10 per cent reduction? The Minister of Justice said the bill would be a short one—that he could tell us at once what it would be; it would be in two clauses.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I said it would validate whatever it was necessary to validate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understood it there would be two main provisions, one, to use his exact words, to legalize what we do in the estimates, and the other to authorize the 10 per cent reduction. Those phrases are enlightening as well as interesting. "To legalize what we do in the estimates"—in other words, it is recognized that certain things we are being asked to do will later have to be legalized. I do not think we ought to be asked to do anything in the interim which is not strictly legal.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The estimates state that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Whether or not it is so stated, I do not think it is the correct way for parliament to proceed. In time of war many things were done which were illegal. They were legalized later in time of peace, when parliament was asked to pass measures to that effect, but there is no need to resort to war measures in times of peace, and at a time like this, I think we would do well to make a special effort to hold to the constitutional method of procedure. Why should not the government bring in that bill immediately? It will be short, and will provide an immediate means of settling this question.

The Minister of Justice suggested again what the Minister of Finance suggested a while ago, that the opposition might bring in a motion on going into supply and have the matter discussed at that time. I made it clear a short time ago that we did not intend to proceed in that way, for the reason that any motion brought forward on going into supply would be construed by the ministry as a want of confidence motion and, as such, would offer to the followers of the ministry an excuse for not asserting their point of view in regard to this matter. We do not intend to afford them that means of escape.

The simplest way is for the ministry to introduce at once the bill authorizing the ten per cent reduction. Let us discuss that bill and when it is passed, if it is passed, the ministry will have authority to do what they are now proposing to do in the estimates. If it is not passed, or if it is modified, the estimates will have to be altered in accordance with the will of parliament. That would be the quickest way and, I think, the only regular way of proceeding.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I had some rather extensive remarks to make on this subject. As the house has rightly assumed I am opposed to these cuts, but in view of the remarks of the Minister of Justice I will defer my statement until a later date. I suppose I shall have an opportunity on some of the other items. I am doing this because of the statement of the Minister of Justice, who at present is leading the house, that no requests have been received by the government for an opportunity for associations of civil servants to present their point of view. I desire to afford an opportunity to those vitally concerned in this matter to consider whether or not they desire to be heard by the government and to decide whether they will ask to be heard. When these items come up, if that opportunity has not been afforded them after they have asked for it, I will avail myself of the opportunity of saying what I desire to say in this regard.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I do not propose to enter into a constitutional debate at this hour of the night. So far as I am concerned I believe the Minister of Finance, speaking for the government, stated the fact when he said they had proceeded in the constitutional manner, the manner which has been established as the regular procedure year by year. But it was also stated by the Minister of Justice that his object was to provide the most convenient method of disposing of this question, the method following the line of common sense and creating the least disturbance to the house.

I would suggest as a matter of convenience, Mr. Chairman, and in order to save as much time as possible, that we should decide upon this principle first. The principle of the cut is an unusual one, and while we are following ordinary rules of procedure at present we must admit that this is not a usual situation. Every item is predicated upon this 10 per cent cut, and we cannot discuss any item without also discussing this question, upon which obviously there is some difference of opinion as to the extent of the cut and as to the question of a graduated reduction in the lower salaries.

It does seem to me that it would save a great deal of time and avoid perhaps a hundred disjointed and sectional debates if we could decide first upon the principle upon which these items are predicated and then, in the light of that discussion, consider the estimates with some degree of intelligence and coolness. The Minister of Finance stated that it would be a matter of some difficulty to provide a method by which this might be done, and he said this was the only method. I think he was not doing justice to the ingenuity, if not the wisdom, of the government itself. I am under the impression that if the government is desirous of ascertaining the opinion of the house upon this matter, and doing it before we enter upon the discussion of these items affected by the 10 per cent cut, it could be done very well either by adopting the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the opposition and introducing at once the bill which is to legalize the whole matter, or by way of a resolution asking the house for a free expression of opinion as to the principle upon which all the estimates are based, before the estimates themselves are considered item by item. I think that would be the fairest method, and in the end it would not only save time but also would save a great many tempers which had better be kept for some more useful purpose.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: There is one point I should like the minister to clear up. The Prime Minister stated that the 10 per cent reduction would apply to all civil servants except the judges, who he said were in a somewhat different position. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are required to pay our judges, who get fair salaries and receive pensions and so on. If I vote in favour of a resolution which cuts by 10 per cent the salary of a civil servant receiving $1,000 or $1,200, and then speak and vote against the bill if it does not include the judges, in what position would that leave me?

Mr. STEVENS: In adopting this resolution my hon. friend is not voting for a cut in the salary of any employee. As I said on two or three previous occasions to-night, the amount provided here is in expectation of a cut, but by the act of voting this resolution no cut is made, and no cut can be made without further action or further measures.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: But the item is predicated upon the cut.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so; I have stated to the committee that the provision of the amount is predicated upon the expectation that there will be a cut.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said quite often that by adopting these estimates we are not admitting the principle of a 10 per cent cut. Early in the evening he decided to allow the civil government estimates to stand because they had to do entirely with salaries. Looking through all the estimates I find the words "less 10 per cent" more frequently than I find anything else. If this discussion had not taken place I could imagine what the Prime Minister would have said when he presented his bill. He would have said, "Why, you admitted the principle when you passed the estimates that have gone through committee." I could hear him say that, and deny us the right even to discuss the question because we admitted the 10 per cent reduction in salaries in connection with some of the public works estimates this afternoon, as the minister has said. Following the suggestion of my leader, I think we had better discuss the subject, and the government would be well advised to do so right now.

Mr. HEENAN: I think the minister himself is now convinced that he has approached this question in the wrong way. Hon. gentlemen sitting to your left, Mr. Chairman, went about the country a couple of years ago and told about the prosperous times they were going to usher in, but they are not standing up now for the working man; instead they are reducing salaries. The minister will agree that those of us who oppose this reduction in salaries and wages will have to scrutinize every item. We shall have to ascertain certain things before we can tell just what we are voting. We shall have to ask how many employees are affected under every item, how many years of service they have put in, how many of them are denied statutory increases, whether some are being affected to the extent of 10 or 15 per cent, and so on. I submit that this is an occasion on which the Minister of Labour ought to be in his place to suggest a board of conciliation and investigation into the question. But there is one thing I want to ask the minister and the leader of the government. It is quite evident to me that the senior member for Ottawa has not the full purport of the answers given both by the Minister of Justice and by the minister in charge of the estimates. In effect, he asked whether time would be given for the representatives of the civil service as a whole to make their representations to the government before the reduction went into force. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he would never close his door to any in his department. Is that an answer to the senior member for Ottawa? The Minister of Justice also tried to evade that particular question. Where, I ask, is the national council of the civil service which was established in 1929? When we passed an order in council establishing the civil service council it was for the purpose of enabling them to discuss with the government precisely such questions as the one now before us. We provided in the estimates to bring representatives of the civil service from all over Canada, and this government has ignored that provision entirely. So that there is no civil service council in this country to-day, or else it is entirely ignored. What would you say of a private employer of labour who would attempt a reduction of from 10 to 15 per cent in the wages of his employees—because that is what it amounts to in many instances—without giving the representatives of the working men an opportunity of discussing the question with him? Yet that is what this government is doing. It is no wonder the Minister of Trade and Commerce rose with some heat a little while ago. I remember how solicitous he was, when on this side of the house, for the poor underpaid civil servants, charging the present leader of the opposition with an attempt to stir up heat and discontent in the country. One of the gentlemen who went through the country in July, 1930, stirring up strife and trouble everywhere made a laughing stock of the old age pensions legislation, misrepresenting the whole thing. Indeed, the party supporting him organized unemployed gangs throughout the country and put white labels upon them so that they would give an inkling to the people of how many unemployed there were in the country. They got them to attend meetings and cheer government candidates. Now the hon. gentleman gets up and tells the leader of the opposition that he is trying to stir up trouble, and when anyone tries to make a sensible suggestion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: —he sits snarling. Hon. gentlemen laugh; no one will suppose that those on the other side are competent to judge what is a sensible suggestion. When a sensible suggestion is offered to the other side or to the minister he snarls in his seat and yells, "nonsense." I should say, judging by the number of times that he has emitted that word "nonsense," he is not the best judge of what is sense. What I want to know is this: Is this government going to reduce the salaries of civil servants in Canada without giving the representatives of these people, men, women and girls, an opportunity to present their views? That is what I want to know. Personally I am prepared to stay here until the snow flies next year rather than pass these estimates under these conditions.

Mr. DUFF: The Minister of Trade and Commerce made the statement at least two or three times that if the committee passed this vote of $211,000 and if afterwards, when the government brought down legislation providing for the reduction of 10 per cent, that legislation was not endorsed by the house, it would not affect the salaries included in this vote. The minister was asked to give the details of this $211,000, and Hansard tomorrow morning will show that he itemized the different amounts necessary to make the total of this vote, less $37,600. In other words, the minister's total for the different detailed items, if I remember correctly, was $247,000, or $248,000, which included, in addition to the $202,000 in salaries, certain other items. Now the minister comes along and says that if this legislation does not pass when it is introduced it will not affect the salaries included in this item. But he told us that in this $211,000 we are voting there are certain other amounts. Surely that $37,600 of a reduction means something, and the other items outside of salaries which we vote now in this item cannot be touched to pay salaries if the legislation is not passed. I would ask the minister for a detailed account of that $37,600, and I have no hesitation in saying before he replies that part of that $37,600 is the 10 per cent deduction from the $240,000 odd.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend perhaps forgot or did not hear me say that unquestionably, if such legislation as I have intimated were not passed in statutory form, making the cut of 10 per cent, it would be necessary for us to bring in a supplementary to make up the difference. What I was trying to impress upon the committee was this. I do not say for one moment that this vote provides for the present range of salaries and all other requirements of the branch. What I did say was that by the passing of this resolution you were not cutting salaries. I told the committee at the very outset on introducing the vote that it was intended that the vote should be sufficient, with the cut in salary. I made that statement frankly and clearly. We are providing in this vote for a certain sum of money which contemplates the cut of 10 per cent in salary. There is no question that by the passing of the resolution we do not actually make the cut.

Mr. DUFF: I cannot understand the hon. minister's argument, because when we asked for an itemized statement he told us that this vote included other items besides salaries.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. DUFF: The minister agrees. He then comes along and tells the committee that if the legislation to implement the cut does not pass the salaries will not be affected, that he will ask for an extra vote in the supplementary estimates. The minister forgets that he is asking the committee not only to pass this item of $202,000 for salaries, less $37,600, but also to pass several other items which go to make up that total. For instance, at the end of March not only will the salaries have to be paid but one-twelfth of the other amounts will have to be paid. Does the minister mean to say that he is going to pay the salaries and leave unpaid the other amounts should this committee defeat this item? The minister is not on solid ground. It is plain to everyone that the salaries included in this item will be reduced to the tune of 10 per cent.

Mr. VENIOT: The Auditor General would not permit the conversion of one amount to the benefit of another.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend must understand that before this vote becomes effective, which will not be until the end of March, the necessary legislation will have been introduced and passed.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend said in his argument that it might not pass.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I did not.

Mr. DUFF: If it should not pass.

Mr. STEVENS: If it should not pass. It has been stated by the Prime Minister and was stated to-night by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice that unquestionably it is contemplated that legislation will be introduced. We recognize the objection of hon. gentlemen opposite to dealing with these votes until that legislation has been disposed of. That is a position which they are entitled to take and we do not quarrel with it. But what we have tried to do is to explain to the committee the precise grounds upon which these estimates have been prepared. They state clearly and frankly what should be and should not be provided for, and they have been offered to the house in that way. What has occurred in connection with this vote will occur in connection with many others. Perhaps I could pick out one or two votes in which no salaries are involved, but there would not be very many. These estimates have been prepared in contemplation of the cut in salaries, and it is intended that legislation supplementing that intention or, as the Minister of Justice has said, making provision to legalize the cut, will be introduced.

Mr. DUFF: Were the officials who come under this vote appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STEVENS: There may be some who commenced their duties before the Civil Service Act was passed.

Mr. DUFF: They have been blanketed in since?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Whatever may be the view of others, I do not think the evening has been wasted. I believe that the suggestions made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) are worthy of consideration. If a discussion of the 10 per cent cut is to take place on every item, the debate would be interminable. The only object of the government has been to meet the convenience of the house, not to prejudice the position of any hon. member who is entitled to express his views and record his vote as he sees fit.

Mr. STEVENS: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree with what the minister has said, but I would point out that it was the Minister of Finance who said that this matter must be discussed right now.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Wednesday, February 17, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

*CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD EMPLOYEES

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What were the names and addresses of the lawyers in the various provinces of Canada who were employed professionally by the Canadian Farm Loan Board during June, 1930?
2. Have any changes been made since that date, if so, in what way?
3. If so, what was the reason for the change in each case?

Mr. RHODES: With respect to question No. 9 on the order paper I find that under the terms and regulations of the act the Farm Loan Board has full control of the appointment and dismissal of its employees. They take the ground which has been sustained I believe since the commencement of the act, that the answer to the question of my hon. friend is not one which ought properly to be submitted to parliament. I am advised, however, by the director of the board that there is no objection to furnishing information to any hon. member who may desire it. I would suggest therefore that the question be dropped and that the hon. member who has asked it would communicate with the Farm Loan Board and I am sure in that case he will receive the information he seeks.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question dropped.

*PURCHASE OF LABRADOR

Mr. BENNETT: Before we proceed with the next order of business may I say that the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier) allowed his question to stand the other day upon my giving a verbal answer and promising I would produce copies of letters which passed between the government of Newfoundland and the government of Canada with respect to Labrador. I now produce those letters.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BELLA COOLA POST OFFICE

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What was the revenue of the post office at Bella Coola, British Columbia, for the years 1929-30-31?
2. How much rental is paid per month for this office?
3. How much rental is paid per month for the telegraph booth at Bella Coola?
4. To whom is the rent paid in each instance?

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF ACT EXPENDITURES—SHELBURNE-YARMOUTH

Mr. RALSTON:

1. What federal public works in Shelburne-Yarmouth were constructed or undertaken by the government to be paid for out of the money voted last session under the moneys authorized to be expended under the Unemployment Relief Act of the last session?
2. What amounts were authorized in respect of each work?
3. What are the names of the foremen employed in respect of each work?
4. On whose recommendation was the selection made of men to be given employment in connection with each of these respective works?
5. What was the approximate expenditure actually incurred in respect of each of such works?
6. Are any such works as yet unfinished, if so, which of such works?
7. On whose recommendation did the government decide on the authorization of each of the works referred to?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. RALSTON:

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure authorized in the province of Nova Scotia for federal public works to be paid for under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized; (b) the amount expended.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act provides that within fifteen days after the first of March a return must be tabled containing the information for which my hon. friend asks. I suggest he allow the matter to remain.

Mr. RALSTON: While the Unemployment Relief Act provides for a return I do not think it provides for the details asked for in my motion. I suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works that matters would be expedited if the information asked could be furnished. I do not think what I have requested would be very voluminous.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it is voluminous, and it would take a long time to prepare it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If my hon. friend would allow me to amplify my statement I might say that in undertaking the work in the province of Nova Scotia as in other provinces, an effort was made to adopt a program which would relieve unemployment to the greatest possible extent. In that province we have before us 150 undertakings. To comply with my hon. friend's request would involve the copying of practically 150 files. I speak with regard to this and succeeding motions. Those motions would involve copying probably 500 pay lists. If there is any particular work my hon. friend has in mind or upon which he desires information I suggest he limit his motion to those works. The work involved in his motions would materially increase the staff of the department and involve a great deal of work.

Mr. RALSTON: I suggest to my hon. friend that if the house will permit me to refer to the matter at a later time and if my hon. friend will bring down now the details of two items mentioned in each of the resolutions, namely the amount authorized and the amount expended, and will permit the resolutions to stand on the order paper I will consider further whether I have to ask the house to proceed with the resolutions themselves.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is quite satisfactory and I adopt my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does that apply to the next two resolutions?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, so far as I am concerned the same understanding applies to the next two.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 for papers moved by Mr. Ralston will stand on terms agreed upon.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CLIFTON MAIL ROUTE

Mr. DUFF (for Mr. Veniot):

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents relating to the awarding of a contract for mail route R.R. No. 1, Clifton, Gloucester county, New Brunswick.

LOURDES POSTMASTER, DISMISSAL

Mr. ROBERGE:

For a copy of all documents in connection with the dismissal of Mr. Joseph Mailhot as postmaster of Lourdes, county of Megantic, and the appointment of his successor; also a copy of the evidence in connection with the inquiry which was held.

HOURS OF LABOUR

OBLIGATIONS AND CONVENTIONS ARISING OUT OF PEACE TREATY

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River) moved:

Whereas, the Dominion of Canada is a signatory to the articles of peace of the treaties of Versailles, thereby subscribing to the principle of a maximum working day of eight hours. Therefore be it resolved that this house is of opinion that the government of Canada should take appropriate steps to ensure, throughout Canada, the fulfilment of our treaty obligations and conventions arising out of the Peace treaty, relating to hours of work.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of introducing this motion at the last session of parliament, and if hon. members will refer to Hansard they will not find any remarks of mine in relation thereto which are of a partisan character. I did not try to excuse the government of which I was a member, neither did I try to blame my hon. friends on the opposite side for any delay. I simply asked that the government should take appropriate steps to try to get the eight-hour day observed all over Canada. After considerable discussion the government, through the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), accepted the resolution in these words:

As I view this motion in the form in which it is moved, I see no objection whatever to its adoption.

That is, the government very cordially accepted the resolution. Unfortunately, however, some hon. members wished to discuss the matter further, the motion was talked out, and thus the parliament of Canada was deprived of the opportunity of putting its stamp of approval thereon.

Now, in view of the attitude of the government last session, I am assuming that they have not changed their minds, and therefore I do not see any necessity to present any extended argument on this occasion. The motion reads:

Whereas, the Dominion of Canada is a signatory to the articles of peace of the treaties of Versailles, thereby subscribing to the principle of a maximum working day of eight hours; therefore be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that the government of Canada should take appropriate steps to ensure, throughout Canada, the fulfilment of our treaty obligations and conventions arising out of the Peace treaty, relating to hours of work.

Briefly, this is a statement of the situation. In 1919 the treaty of Versailles was signed by the then Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Robert Borden, on behalf of the government of Canada. That treaty contained article 13, known as the labour section. Arising out of the treaty an international conference was held in Washington in October, 1919, when the principle of the eight-hour day was reaffirmed and recommended to the countries which were signatories to the Peace treaty. When the adoption of the principle of the eight-hour day came before this house the question of jurisdiction arose, some contending that as Sir Robert Borden had signed the Peace treaty on behalf of the government of Canada, the federal government should take the necessary steps to bring about the observance of the eight-hour day throughout the dominion by appropriate legislation; while others took the view that under the British North America Act this would be usurping the jurisdiction of the provinces. In 1925 the government of Canada submitted the question to the Supreme Court of Canada and the court decided in effect that the parliament of Canada had jurisdiction over its own employees, but that the provinces had jurisdiction with respect to hours of work.

In 1930, in order to carry out our treaty obligations, an order in council was passed, P.C. 670, putting all federal government employees who were working in excess of eight hours on an eight-hour day basis. On May 30 of the same year legislation was enacted, now known as chapter 20-21 of George V, placing all employees on government contracts or working at day labour on government work on the eight-hour day basis.

My position in the matter is simply this, Mr. Speaker. I submit that the federal parliament having taken the mote out of its own eye, the federal government is now in a better position to approach the provincial governments with a view to having them enact legislation to carry out our treaty obligations. It will be seen, therefore, that this resolution simply calls upon the government of Canada to take appropriate steps to ensure throughout Canada the fulfilment of our treaty obligations with respect to hours of work. And I have no fear but that this house will unanimously adopt the resolution.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, this resolution may be divided into two parts. The first part recites that the Dominion of Canada is a signatory to the articles of peace of the treaties of Versailles, thereby subscribing to the principle of a maximum working day of eight hours; the second part asks this house to express the opinion that the government of Canada should take appropriate steps to ensure the fulfilment of our treaty obligations and conventions arising out of the peace treaty relating to hours of work.

Although I represent an agricultural riding, yet I think this resolution is of sufficient importance to claim my attention. Naturally the larger part of the population of the riding of North Battleford are engaged in agriculture, but all the varied activities of our national life are also engaged in, for besides lumbering, dairying, stock raising, and fishing, we have a certain amount of industrial development.

I think the historical background of this resolution is important. Prior to 1900 there was international action to a certain extent in connection with the protection of labour standards throughout the world. That action was taken on more than one occasion, and finally a certain number of nations came together in connection with the regulation and legalization of labour problems and labour conditions. Subsequently, Switzerland took the lead in dealing with this question, and as a result the International Association for Labour Legislation was organized, in 1900, with headquarters at Basle, Switzerland. Later, another international convention was arranged in Switzerland and action was taken in connection with the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches, and still later another international convention was held in Italy, when further action was taken. So from 1900 to 1919, when the Peace treaty was signed, we may say that international action was gradually being taken throughout the world in connection with the problems of labour.

When the Peace treaty was being negotiated in 1919 it was only natural that international action should receive a great stimulus. As a result a commission on labour legislation was appointed to which was committed the important work of drawing up legislation which would affect labour throughout the world in connection with this Peace treaty. The recommendations of that commission dealt with such important labour questions as the establishment of a maximum working day and working week; the regulation of labour supplies throughout the world; the prevention of unemployment; the provision of an adequate living wage; the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of employment; the protection of children, and the protection of the interests of workers when living in a country other than their own.

These questions, together with the organization of vocational and technical education, constituted certain landmarks in respect of the consideration of labour problems generally. That commission drew up Article XIII of the Peace treaty, which is the foundation for the resolution before the house to-day, with regard to which the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) has just spoken.

Article XIII recommends the adoption of an eight-hour day or a forty-eight-hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not been already attained. So far as this resolution is concerned, I understand that it deals with government undertakings or public works sponsored by the Dominion government, and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) has dealt with the question of the right of the Dominion government to take action.

In conclusion, all I would say is that I think the time has arrived when the industrial workers of Canada ought to have the support not only of the Prime Minister but of every member of this government, and that support can be best shown by the government of the day taking action to call an interprovincial conference, at which will be represented the government of Canada, the governments of the provinces, all labour interests and the interests of employers, at which the question of jurisdiction could be discussed and probably overcome, so that throughout Canada, from one ocean to another, from one industrial area to another, from one province to another, the request contained in this resolution will be complied with.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Last session, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) brought forward a motion in terms similar to the motion he has just moved in this house, and in the few remarks I made at that time I said that in my opinion there was no objection to the house accepting the motion as drawn. I am still of the same opinion. The motion merely asks that it be resolved that this house is of the opinion that the government of Canada should take appropriate steps to ensure throughout Canada the fulfilment of our treaty obligations and conventions arising out of the peace treaty relating to hours of work.

The gist of the motion is that the government should take appropriate steps. As the motion was not carried during the last session of the house there were no steps to be taken, as a result of it. In fact the only steps that suggest themselves to my mind at the moment are those which were taken by the preceding government on four or five occasions, when the question was brought to the attention of the various provincial governments with the idea of enlisting their sympathies and having them pass the necessary provincial legislation to bring into force the provisions of the treaty of Versailles with respect to labour.

In my judgment this parliament has done about all it can do in respect of that treaty. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has given a brief résumé of some of the steps which have been taken by this parliament to bring our national labour service into conformity with the requirements of that treaty, but fortunately or unfortunately the dominion powers are limited by our constitutional act; there are some matters which do not lie within our legislative jurisdiction and in connection with which we have no right whatever to legislate. One of these matters is the question of hours of labour, which is largely a provincial matter, and the most this government can do in regard to the general subject is to bring that question directly to the attention of the various provincial governments and request them to cooperate.

This has been done time and time again. It was not done directly after last session because the motion was not adopted by the house last session, but if this present motion is adopted the government will take steps without delay definitely to draw this matter to the attention of the various provincial governments. I remember that last session, in discussing either this or another kindred subject, I expressed the opinion that the time had come when a provincial conference should be summoned to meet at Ottawa. The House of Commons sat until after August first of last year, and immediately thereafter I was summoned to attend an important meeting at Geneva, from which I did not return until about November first.

Following my return I had an opportunity of discussing the question of a provincial conference with members of the governments of several of the provinces. I remember discussing it with the members of the governments of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Saskatchewan and, I think also, British Columbia. There was a general idea among them all that a conference should be held, but there was also a feeling which was very general that last autumn or this winter would not be the best time to hold such a conference. Conditions throughout Canada and throughout the world had become acute and it was felt that until they had become more settled the conference should not be called. Therefore I did not pursue the matter further. But I still am of the opinion that a conference between the dominion and the provinces should be called as soon as conditions warrant such a conference being satisfactorily held. It is not only in regard to this question of the hours of labour that we desire to consult the provinces; there are many questions which more or less involve a dispute as to jurisdiction. These questions are not in a satisfactory condition now, and much good might be accomplished if a conference were held, and I trust that in the not-distant future a more satisfactory basis may be arrived at.

There is this further to be said in regard to Canada and the treaty of Versailles, and particularly with respect to the question of labour. While in Geneva last fall I had occasion to discuss the question with some of those who are better informed in regard to these matters than I am myself, and I was glad to learn that Canada was not lagging behind in regard to the provisions of that treaty. We were well in the forefront. I do not think any nation in the world has carried out all the provisions of that treaty. Some have done so to a much greater extent than others, but Canada's position is a very happy one in that respect. We have gone a much greater distance than many other nations perhaps more important in one aspect than Canada, and I felt very proud of the work that this dominion had accomplished.

As I said at the opening of my remarks, I think the house might well adopt this resolution. If there is anything more that this government can do to bring the matter directly to the attention of the various provincial governments I should like to hear suggestions along that line. The government is entirely sympathetic and would like to aid the cause as much as possible.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): The same conditions of labour do not exist in the country as in the cities. In my part of the country it has been the custom from time immemorial for workmen to put in ten hours a day. In the government works now the working day is only eight hours, and pay is given for that number of hours. In the unemployment relief works carried on by the provinces and the dominion, men are working eight hours a day and are paid for eight hours only. This represents a decrease in their wages. On the work in my constituency in which men are repairing the highway they are paid 25 cents an hour for eight hours a day and these men consider it a hardship. They have asked me as their representative to request that they be allowed to work ten hours a day, which would give them $2.50 a day. This is only a reasonable living wage. So that before we go much further this question should be looked into. If the men can be paid for ten hours a day while working only eight hours, so much the better; but if their wages are to be reduced in accordance with the number of hours they work, then I do not see much advantage in the change. That is the view of the people whom I have the honour to represent.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I could not catch distinctly what the last speaker (Mr. Marcil) said, but I believe it was to the effect that there was a danger, if the hours of labour were cut down to eight instead of ten, that it might mean a reduction in wages with consequent hardship. Arguments of that kind are always put forward in opposition to any reform being made. In normal circumstances, if the universal day were eight hours employers would sooner or later come through with the wages and give a living wage for an eight-hour day. I can quite understand that with the depression which exists at the present time there are in our midst certain employers who would take advantage of the large number of unemployed and force down wages if at all possible. It seems to me, however, that it would be comparatively easy for a government really sincere in the matter not only to put into force an eight-hour day but, more than that, to put into force a minimum wage act which would guarantee the workers a sufficient return for an eight-hour day to enable them to keep themselves and their families in decency.

I hope the house will adopt the suggestion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and accept the resolution, though on his own statement the passing of the resolution will really mean very little. All that he suggests it could possibly mean would be an incentive to the government to refer the matter once more to the provinces. I regret that it should be necessary to have the matter brought up in this way in order that it might be referred to the provinces. It seems to me that if we had a Labour department worth its salt that department would see to it that such matters were kept continuously before the provinces.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There have been communications with the provinces in regard to this matter for five or six years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know; but our department might have been a great deal more active. I suggest that if we continue to cut down the estimates of the Labour department we might as well abolish it altogether. There is a possibility of a Labour department taking itself seriously, but I do not think our Labour department has been given sufficient backing in the last few years to make its activities worth very much. The Minister of Justice said he thought that the provinces were of the opinion that a conference should not be called until conditions were more settled. I submit that it is because of the unsettled conditions that now prevail that the conference ought to be called at once. With unemployment as it is in almost every province in this dominion, it is highly desirable that the provinces should get together on a united program, and one thing that might be done is the reduction of hours. If there are hundreds of thousands of men absolutely unemployed and others working ten or more hours a day, I submit that it is only reasonable to cut down the hours of those who are employed in order that a larger number of men might be given work. I should think, therefore, that the very fact that conditions are unsettled makes it all the more necessary to have a conference in the very near future.

The Minister of Justice referred to the fact that last year a motion passed this house calling for a dominion-provincial conference. I hope that conference will not be very much longer delayed. It is just a question how long the dominion can hold together if we permit an antiquated constitution to hamper us in carrying on our everyday affairs. We ought to have sufficient common sense to recognize the vast changes that have taken place in the last sixty years since confederation and make proper adjustments.

There is one other thing I have to say, and I have advanced this argument before in this house. I cannot for a moment concede the position taken by the Minister of Justice that the dominion has no responsibilities in matters of this kind because of our constitution. There is another way of looking at it and it is this. If the Dominion government has the right to sign a treaty it has the duty to see that the terms of the treaty are observed. Under certain powers granted to the dominion, including our relationship with foreign nations, we have certain very definite responsibilities and rights. After the great war Canada along with other nations signed the treaty of Versailles, and merely because we are a federal body, merely because our constitution makes it a bit difficult to effect the necessary arrangements, I do not believe we should do nothing. In other matters the difficulties have been overcome. For instance, in connection with the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, it was found possible to have the enabling legislation passed by the provinces. On many occasions the Dominion government has passed legislation and found the provinces quite willing to cooperate.

Certain provinces have expressed their willingness to put this eight-hour day on the statute book providing they are assured that the other provinces will do likewise. In other matters dominion legislation has been passed contingent on certain action being taken by the provinces, but nothing of that kind has been attempted in this instance. A few years ago it was urged that the granting of tariff favours to certain enterprises and industries should be contingent upon those industries adopting the eight-hour day; such action was within the competence of this government, but no action was taken. To my mind the real difficulty is not that of the constitution; this government along with other governments has not taken the matter seriously enough. As soon as that is done I am quite confident that ways and means can be found to give effect to the solemn obligation undertaken by the signing of the treaty of Versailles.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in his frank and I think sincere statement, has said that he intends to call a conference of the provinces to discuss this matter. Can he give the house the approximate date of this conference?

Mr. GUTHRIE: At the present moment, I cannot.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member speaks now it will close the debate.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I hope the hon. member will not blame me this time for talking out the resolution.

Mr. HEENAN: I am closing the debate and the hon. member will not be given an opportunity to talk it out this time. It seems to me the hon. member is smarting under some grievance. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), speaking on behalf of the government, has shown quite clearly that this resolution was not carried at the last session because of certain things which had occurred. The hon. member for Selkirk may have the consolation that he prevented the government from accepting this resolution, and yet he pretends to be a friend of labour.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I object to the statement of my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member speaking on a question of privilege?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has stated that last year I obstructed this debate. This is the very statement in respect to which you called the hon. member to order yesterday, and he took it back. He now repeats it; he claims that I obstructed this resolution. Last year I spoke for ten minutes while my hon. friend read and spoke for hours at a time when the house was ready to adopt the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: The incident referred to was satisfactorily adjusted a few days ago. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) withdrew the inference he had made that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) had wilfully obstructed the passage of the resolution. This is all a matter of record.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): The hon. member has just repeated his statement that I obstructed the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy-River took the right course, and I do not think the point raised by the hon. member for Selkirk is well taken.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why the hon. member for Selkirk should appear to be smarting under such a terrible grievance. The result of his tactics last year was to block the passage of the resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: After the hon. member for Selkirk had spoken for some considerable time, I rose in my place and made the following statement, as appears on page 1730 of Hansard of 1931:

I was wondering if the hon. member heard the acting leader of the government say that he was willing the motion should carry. I would remind the hon. member that it is now just one minute to eleven o'clock.

The hon. member continued to speak, and at eleven o'clock Mr. Speaker made the following statement:

It being eleven o'clock the house will stand adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

We need not discuss the matter further, until we are on the platform of my hon. friend during the next election.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): The hon. member did not worry me much last year.

Mr. HEENAN: I appreciate the remarks of the Minister of Justice and I realize that it is an honour to have a resolution of this description passed in my name. I do not regard the remarks of the minister in the same light as does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I understood the hon. minister to state that he would call a conference of the provinces and that he would ask them in the name of Canada to pass this legislation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This would be only one of many questions to be brought before the conference.

Mr. HEENAN: I quite understand that, but I consider that this is one of the most important, as it is now before this house. I did not go into the details as to how the object sought could be accomplished, but there are many ways in which it could be done. If the provinces are not united it may be necessary for the government of Canada to take drastic measures to discipline some of the provinces. I recall moving a similar resolution in the Ontario legislature in 1924, and the premier asked that the resolution be carried with a slight amendment to the effect that it would come into force when the other provinces had enacted similar legislation. This was an easy way of disposing of the subject. I believe the province of Nova Scotia had been ready for some time to adopt this measure. When I was acting as Minister of Labour I discussed this matter with the representatives of many of the provinces and I found they were coming more and more to our way of thinking. I think the time is ripe to call a conference with the object of having this legislation adopted through the various provinces during the coming year.

As regards the statement of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that some of the men in his constituency would like to work longer than eight hours a day in order to make more money, such a condition would be unnecessary if the provinces and the capitalists of this country would follow the lead given by the federal parliament when it put into operation the eight hour day for government employees; and we did not reduce their salaries one cent. Consequently there is no need for alarm so far as that is concerned.

In conclusion I would say I appreciate the honour of having the government accept this resolution.

Motion agreed to.

FARM RELIEF

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN FEDERAL ASSISTANCE ON BUSHEL RATHER THAN ACREAGE BASIS

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia) moved:

Whereas the policy of extending federal assistance to western farmers on a bushel basis rather than on an acreage basis has worked out most unfairly and unjustly to the residents of those districts suffering from failure or near failure of crop,

And whereas a largely signed petition and memorandum has been presented to the government by the secretary of Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, praying for additional legislation to partially remedy the situation that exists,

Therefore be it resolved: that, in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to a more equitable and less discriminatory solution of this problem.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the resolution which stands in my name on the order paper, I can say that to those of us who are conversant with the measure that was passed during the last days of the last session, an Act respecting Wheat, this resolution will be practically self-explanatory and will not require much further elucidation on my part. The resolution is really the result of the legislation that was passed last session. That measure, an Act respecting Wheat, provided:

1. The governor in council may authorize the payment, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of the sum of five cents for every bushel of wheat grown in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in the year 1931, and delivered to any licensed elevator in the western inspection division, commission merchant, track buyer or grain dealer, as defined by The Canada Grain Act.

It was provided that the act was to be administered through the machinery of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and it has been so administered during the past year. The payment as provided in the preamble of the act was thought advisable because of the emergency that existed in the prairie provinces and the distress that was felt by the farmers in those producing areas.

Those of us who come from the three wheat-producing provinces of the west did not have much faith in the act. We did not, it is true, rise in our places and criticize it, but there was more than one reason for that. We realized that in the southern parts of the provinces little or no benefit would accrue to our farmers from the provisions of the act, but at the same time we knew in the parts of the country where there was a crop it would be of no inconsiderable benefit to them. Therefore we did not criticize it. I might in passing mention another reason. I refer to page 3158 of Hansard of last year under date of June 29, 1931, where the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) is reported as saying:

I defy any hon. member on that side from the prairie provinces to rise in his place and disown or oppose this five cents per bushel assistance to the wheat farmers of the west.

I do not know just what was in the mind of the Minister of Railways when he said that. We know that when the resolution was first mooted the bonus was to be absorbed in the way of freight. Later on the bill was brought in, in the form in which it was subsequently passed. Whether the Minister of Railways or the government were desirous of withdrawing the resolution and then trying to lay the blame on members on this side of the house from the prairie provinces because we took up his challenge, I do not know, but probably he will make an explanation.

We have now had time to look back over the workings of this legislation. In some respects it has worked satisfactorily, and we are not going to criticize the act particularly at this stage. It has, as I said, been of a certain amount of benefit to the farmers in those parts of the prairies where they had a crop. It made the production of wheat less unprofitable, by the amount of the bonus, than it otherwise would have been. In other words, it has diminished, by the amount of the bonus, the loss that otherwise would have occurred to the farmers who were, shall I say, so unfortunate as to produce a crop—because under the conditions which prevailed it was not really fortunate for a farmer to have a crop last year.

I noticed in one of the weekly papers in the reading room a day or two ago, that a report had come out from the Board of Grain Commissioners in Winnipeg, stating that the bonus paid under the act to the farmers amounted to about $9,300,000. That is a very considerable sum of money, and no doubt it has been of considerable assistance to those parts of the country where they had a crop. But that is poor consolation to the farmers of a good portion of my constituency, and a greater portion of the southern part of the three prairie provinces where they got little or no benefit from the provisions of this act, especially when we remember that it is their money that is being paid out by way of bonus while they are receiving no benefit from it whatever. Many of them, I may say, seeded and reseeded their land, in some cases two or three times, and harvested no crop.

When I arrived home after the session of last year I realized more clearly than I did when I was in Ottawa that the provisions of this act would be of very little benefit to my constituency; that in fact the greater part of my constituency would receive no benefit whatever, although in some places where they had a ten or twelve bushel crop they would benefit to a certain extent. After my return home I received a letter from the Director of Unemployment Relief, as I believe all the other members did. After driving through the constituency and trying to ascertain what conditions actually were, I replied recommending certain improvements that I believed would be of benefit. In a rural constituency there is very little that one can recommend by way of buildings, but I did recommend some improvements in the matter of buildings and other activities in the towns and villages throughout the riding. Moreover, in this letter, of which I am going to read a portion, I stated what I thought was the greatest benefit that could accrue to our farming districts under the conditions then prevailing. The letter in part is as follows:

Now, I believe these are all worthy of careful consideration but I believe the greatest need in this part is some assistance to farmers who are desirous of properly working their land and find it difficult to pay their running expenses such as repairs to machinery, blacksmith and grocery accounts. I find in driving through the country that farms which were formerly well farmed are being neglected and weeds and thistles are not being kept down and in some cases the summer-fallowing is not being done, mostly because they are not in a position to meet the expenses. I believe if some scheme were evolved whereby these accounts could be guaranteed, and, even in some cases a man might be provided to a farmer, that these will, in my opinion, do more good that almost any other form of relief which can be granted here for I am convinced that prosperity will not return to Canada until the farms again become productive and the produce of the farms bring a profitable return.

That was my recommendation to the director of unemployment relief in the letter I wrote to him in August last year. Any relief which was forthcoming from that direction should have come immediately, because the time for summer-fallowing was passing, and other summer work should have been done. However it seems that it was not considered necessary to do anything.

A good many recommendations were made to the effect that work be done on the roads, and that the farmers should go out with their teams and do a day's work here and there. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that the better farmers in my constituency—and this statement applies to prairie farmers generally—do not desire to take four horses, go out on the road and spend eight hours to earn a few dollars. They have plenty of work to do on their own farms. The better farmers desire to stay at home and do their own work rather than go out and do a little road work.

I thought the bonus could have been better expended in my constituency by giving it to those who had no crop, to enable them to stay at home, do their own work and pay the expenses incurred in a proper manner and at the proper time. Seeing that there was nothing coming from the recommendation I made to the director of unemployment, and through him to the government, there was but one other solution to the problem, and that course was taken through the activities of rural municipal associations of the province of Saskatchewan. At a gathering which was held in one of the towns of my constituency, realizing that the administration of this act was working out very unfairly particularly to those farmers who had no crop, a resolution was passed asking the government to extend on an acreage basis the relief provided under the act to those who had no crop. The resolution proposed that the farmers be given one dollar per acre on the lands seeded in the spring of 1931, such moneys to be paid out of the general revenues of the country. I might draw attention to the fact that although a great many meetings were held, particularly throughout the southern part of the province of Saskatchewan, this problem was not at any time made a matter of political controversy. The welfare of the farmers was being promoted principally by the officials of the rural municipal associations. The speakers at the meetings which were held were officials of the rural municipal associations, and the other speakers consisted of one Liberal member of the Saskatchewan legislature, and one Conservative member from the said body. Those two men who sat on opposite sides of the local legislature, held meetings throughout the various parts of Saskatchewan, and through their efforts a resolution was drafted and sent to the government at Ottawa. I do not know what the attitude of the government was in regard to their suggestions. On one occasion I wrote to the Prime Minister; it happened that at that time he was away and I received no reply directly from him. I did however receive one from his secretary. We consider it is nothing more than fair that the people who are receiving as high as $2.80 per acre under the bonus which amount I am informed was paid in one instance, should not derive all the benefits, and that our farmers who in some cases seeded their land three times and received no crop should receive at least a dollar per acre. We consider our proposal is fair and reasonable, and for that reason I desire to move, seconded by Mr. Young of Weyburn.

That in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to a more equitable and less discriminatory solution of this problem.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the principle of taking money out of the public treasury and giving it either to individuals or to corporations. I am opposed because such action is unsound in principle, and because when once that practice is started it is almost impossible to treat everybody alike. When the government has chosen to take that course however I suggest to them that the only thing to do is as nearly as possible to treat everybody alike.

Last year when the proposal to grant a bonus of 5 cents a bushel on all wheat grown in the western provinces was before the house, I attempted to point out to the government that the scheme was bound to work out inequitably, that those who had a large crop would receive a large bonus while those who had no crop would receive no bonus but would have to help to pay the bonus to their more fortunate neighbours. The request for a bonus of one dollar per acre seeded last year has arisen as a direct result of the policy of paying 5 cents per bushel on all wheat grown in the western provinces. Those farmers in the dried-out districts are saying, "We are helping to pay the 5 cent per bushel bonus to all those in the north who have had good crops, whereas we are deriving nothing, and have had no crops." The farmers of the dried-out districts in southern Saskatchewan are to-day suffering more from the depression than any other class of people in Canada. Not only do they suffer, but they are in the unfortunate position of having reaped no harvests for one, two or in some cases three years. For the work they have done during that time they have received no wages. They are practically all on relief. In spite of the fact however that they are the chief sufferers and those who stand in greatest need of relief, they constitute the only class in the Dominion of Canada on relief to-day who are required to sign a note for everything they receive. Every other class receives relief as a gift, but the farmers in the dried-out areas, the chief sufferers, get nothing as a gift but must sign a note in blank and in advance for everything they have received or expect to receive. I have the note here; I will read it:

I, ..., the above named applicant hereby faithfully promise and agree to pay to The Saskatchewan Relief Commission on behalf of His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada, on or before the first day of November, A.D. 1933, the full value of all relief now or subsequently obtained by me from The Saskatchewan Relief Commission at the values or prices stated by the said commission.

This form has to be signed and witnessed by every man when he makes application for relief. All the relief that he receives will be charged against that note at prices to be fixed by the commission.

An hon. MEMBER: Will any interest be charged?

Mr. YOUNG: I do not know. I asked the Prime Minister the other day if he intended to charge interest, but he could not answer me at the time. Probably he will let the house know later on.

Before coming to Ottawa I was summoned to a gathering of farmers, and the first question they asked me was "Where do you stand on this proposal of $1 an acre bonus?" I said, "Tell me exactly what you want: do you want $1 an acre in addition to the relief that you are now receiving, or do you want $1 an acre in lieu of the relief you are now receiving? If you want the $1 an acre cash in addition to all the relief you are receiving, do you think you will get it?" They said, no, they did not think they would. Then I said: "Do you want $1 an acre in lieu of the relief? If so, let us try and figure it out." We took the case of a farmer working a half-section of land last year; he would have probably 200 acres in crop; at $1 an acre the bonus he would receive would be $200. At present, if he is on full relief, he will be receiving from the relief commission food, fuel, feed for his stock, and he expects to receive seed for his land. Would that amount to more than $200 in the year? Yes, it would. They did not feel that they could accept $1 an acre in lieu of the relief; and they did not feel that they would be able to get that in addition to the relief. The matter was thoroughly discussed and finally they thought that this would be a fair proposal: Give us against our notes that you are holding and which we will have to pay, a credit equal to $1 an acre on all the acreage seeded last year, and we will be satisfied. I think hon. members will all agree that that is a very fair proposal on the part of the farmers. It was not submitted to the farmers all over the country. I am speaking of the farmers in one community who discussed the matter thoroughly in my presence, and that is what they agreed on. That, of course, would leave out some odd farmers throughout that dried-up district who had saved a surplus and were not on relief, although they have reaped no crop for the last two or three years. Perhaps in their particular case a grant would have to be made in cash; but for those farmers who are obtaining relief I think it is not unreasonable to ask the government to grant them credit equal to $1 an acre on their seeded acreage against the notes held by the relief commission.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before the house says that the act passed last year has worked out most unfairly and unjustly. I rather agree with that statement. In fact I heard the opinion expressed in different parts of my own constituency that the act was a very good fulfilment of the Scripture: "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he seemeth to have." It did seem to work most unfairly in the case of those farmers who had very little crop. So far as my own immediate district goes, we did have a fair crop of wheat and the five cents per bushel bonus worked fairly satisfactorily; but when I got into the southern part of my constituency, not over fifty or sixty miles away, the farmers there and within a distance of one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty miles had practically nothing; in one large area down towards the Empress district they had an average of about two bushels an acre. Well, at five cents per bushel it will be seen that the bonus would amount to about ten cents an acre relief, which did not help them to any great extent.

As a result there has been a strong demand among the farmers for some different form of relief. That is expressed in the last part of this resolution, which asks for a more equitable and less discriminatory solution of this problem. I agree with that principle also. I have received a number of resolutions from farmers' organizations, and this one is typical of the many:

> Whereas the farmers in the dried out areas are not receiving any of the five cent bonus, and
> Whereas the seed wheat provided by the government will cost the said farmers five cents above market price,
> Be it resolved that we petition the government to grant one dollar per acre on all acreage seeded in 1931, less the bonus already paid.

The secretary adds:

> There was a large attendance at this meeting and the resolution was carried unanimously.

Now, this is not the first time that the proposal of $1 per acre bonus has been mooted in my own section of the province. I do not know whether my particular district can take credit for originating this thought or not, but I do know that back in December, 1930, a large representative meeting in the town of Kindersley, attended by between four and five hundred farmers and business men, discussed a resolution put forward by a farmers' local from north of Kindersley, asking for this very thing, namely, a bonus on the seeded acreage of crop, not only on wheat, but on flax, oats and barley as well. This meeting endorsed the idea as being fairer and more equitable than the five cent per bushel bonus. At the request of this same farmers' local I journeyed to Regina and interviewed our premier when he was there on December 30, 1930, in the hope that the government would see fit to adopt it. Well, the proposal was not adopted, and, as we know, the legislation that is now in effect was brought down and finally passed this house on August 3, 1931.

There are many advantages in that legislation. It placed between nine and ten million dollars in the hands of the farmers of the three prairie provinces. That is quite a help to the people of the west. The principle of giving a bonus may not be sound, but as the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) has stated, if special considerations are to be given to other industries, if they are to be kept from getting into the valley of humiliation because of government legislation, well, why should not the farming industry be similarly treated? So going on that basis, I would not raise any objection to the five cents per bushel being paid as it was paid. Many individual farmers were helped considerably through the payment of that five cent bonus. I know farmers in my own immediate district who on the average had 20, 25 and 30 bushels of wheat to the acre, and of course the bonus helped them. It helped, as was stated when the legislation was being considered, to give some relief for high freight rates and tariff adjustments; it also partly made up for loss on the production of crops. But the disadvantages have been named by those who preceded me in this debate. The chief disadvantage is that those farmers who have nothing are compelled to make up, in part, by way of taxation upon them, the ten million dollars or thereabouts which goes to the farmers through the five cent per bushel bonus. That is most unfair and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that no person can justify that inequitable application of the legislation of last year. In addition, there are many farmers who do not grow wheat; there are sections of the country not suited to the growing of wheat. Oats can be grown quite satisfactorily; other sections grow barley very well, while still others grow flax. Indeed, there are some types of soil where some of these other grains must be grown before wheat can be put in. In my own district the land first must be seeded with flax, or the likely result is no crop, because of a wire worm which works in the new land.

Looking at those different viewpoints the inequality of this legislation of last year will be seen, and I may add that considerable dissatisfaction was brought to my attention because of the way the legislation affected tenant farmers. There were cases in my own district where the owner of the land put up the seed, the feed, the necessary power either by way of horses or tractor and the implements necessary to till the soil. He owned the land, yet if the tenant happened to get a small share of the crop for his wages the tenant collected the five cent bonus on all the grain grown on that property. This led to a great deal of dissatisfaction; several cases were brought to my attention in this connection.

I can see considerable difficulty, Mr. Speaker, in applying the bonus of a dollar per acre to the crop of 1931, although of course if the government do not see any difficulties and are willing to apply it I will not object. But I do not see that there would be any insuperable difficulty to it being worked out for the crop of 1932. The legislation passed last year expires on July 31 of this year. Either that legislation will be dropped and nothing further will be done, or some other scheme will be worked out by the government. Personally I feel that in view of present conditions on the prairies it would be very helpful to agriculture if some scheme could be worked out by the government that would be fair and equitable, and for that reason I give my hearty support to this resolution.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in presenting another side of the question under debate I hope hon. members will not take it that I am lacking in sympathy for the farmers of those districts affected by drought last year. During the recess I spent almost all my time in helping to the best of my ability the farmers from the dried-out areas who have moved into the bush district in my constituency. I know something of their problems; my heart goes out in sympathy to them, not only those who have moved to the north and are pioneering again there, but those left in the dried out districts. So I want to make it clear that while I am presenting an entirely different side of this question my sympathies are very much with the people of those districts.

The first part of the resolution reads:

> Whereas the policy of extending federal assistance to western farmers on a bushel basis rather than on an acreage basis has worked out most unfairly and unjustly to the residents of those districts suffering from failure or near failure of crop . . .

My contention, sir, is that this is not a correct or fair statement, and I hope I shall be able to convince at least some members of the house of that fact. With regard to the five cent bonus, I believe this is the first time any Canadian government has done such a thing for western farmers. There has been direct cash assistance from the federal treasury to aid the farmers of western Canada through their difficulties. Let us consider the farmer who had a crop. In my constituency, where there was a fairly good crop, the farmers were selling their wheat for about 30 cents a bushel at the elevator. After a man paid his threshing bill that meant he had left 23 or 24 cents, certainly not more than 25 cents net per bushel. Everyone knows that this return would not provide a living for the farmer, to say nothing about his ability to pay debts or anything else. Therefore the bonus came at an opportune time; as far as my district was concerned it was very acceptable and greatly appreciated by the great majority of the farmers.

Perhaps I misunderstood the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he introduced this measure last year, but I took his meaning to be that while this was not a permanent measure it was something that we could expect to be applied during the low price period. That being so, the application has not been so inequitable as might appear. I have lived in the north, in the bush districts, for twenty-five years. Year after year I recall our farmers envying the farmers in the prairie districts which have now been so affected by drought. Those were the districts where they were having abundant crops, big yields and fine qualities of grain; our farmers were the ones who were having the difficulties. In the natural order of things conditions might be reversed next year. If this five cent bonus is given for another year—and I believe that was the intention of the Prime Minister last year, whatever he thinks about it now—those southern districts may be the very ones having fine crops, and when they have crops in the south they have a far greater acreage than we have in the north. In my constituency the average farmer will have only half his land under cultivation; the balance will be bush, but in the southern country the whole farm is under cultivation, so naturally when there is a crop the production is very much greater. So it seems to me that the attacks on this measure are not quite fair.

When the legislation was brought in last year it was met with an onslaught from opposition members, particularly from the province of Quebec but also to some extent from Ontario and the maritime provinces. In his provincial campaign last year Premier Taschereau made this one of the main issues. So it seems to me that the least the government should expect is unanimity among the farmers of western Canada, for whose benefit the measure was brought down. The legislation should have met with the approbation and support of leaders of thought among western farmers generally.

I cannot say that there has been any agitation against this measure in Manitoba; if there has been I have not heard anything of it. But the policy was hardly announced before a movement was started in Saskatchewan against the five cent bonus and in favour of the dollar per acre. It was claimed by some of the advocates of the latter policy that it is not in direct opposition to the five cent bonus, but the effect of this whole campaign has been to create dissension among the farmers and to develop a lack of appreciation of the measure passed last session.

What are the arguments in favour of this bonus of a dollar per acre, and against the bonus of five cents per bushel? It is urged that it goes only to the farmer who has a crop while the farmer who has no crop gets nothing. On the face of it that seems an unanswerable argument, but there is another and entirely different side to the question. The farmers in my constituency, most of whom have crops, are not getting any relief and yet the very crops they have are in most cases not paying expenses. But in the southern parts of the drought-stricken districts millions of dollars of federal as well as provincial money are being handed out in road work and direct relief. It may be true, as the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) has said, that the farmers are signing notes for the relief they get. I would not discuss that question very much until we are able to see how many of these notes will be paid. The great bulk of the farmers are destitute, and if we looked ahead ten years I would predict that the great majority of them will never be paid. I hope the notes will be paid; I hope the farmers will have crops that will enable them to pay these notes. But I know that the ordinary debts, mortgages, interest and so forth that are piling up against the farms in the south, in the dry districts, are so great that when the farmers do get some crops the money will be used in that direction, and I am afraid that the Saskatchewan Relief Commission will come in last when it comes to collecting the notes. So far as that angle of the question is concerned, therefore, I think it is scarcely worth consideration.

As regards my own district, we had on the whole a good crop, but there are farmers there who had no crop; and there are many other farmers again who, because of the nature of the soil, as well as frost and other local difficulties, are unable to grow wheat successfully, so that they are compelled to grow only oats and barley. These farmers get nothing from the bonus but I have heard no particular complaints from them. A few of them mildly suggested that the bonus should have been applied to oats and barley, but even these farmers appreciate the fact that something has been done for their brother farmers, and I do not know of one single instance, by meeting or in any other way, of any attack on the five cent bonus in my constituency. Of course, in these dry districts there are farmers who will have no crop and who will have to maintain themselves although they are not getting relief. It makes no difference, however, what measure you bring down, there is bound to be some inequality. It is utterly impossible to bring in any measure that will apply with absolute equity. The reasons brought forward by the hon. member for Weyburn supporting this, although he objects to the principle, are not very valid and sound, because there is inequality in any measure that is introduced. There is inequality even in free trade, which my hon. friend is so fond of putting forward. I do not, therefore, expect that even this five cent bonus will be found to apply with absolute equity.

So far as my constituency is concerned, the five cent bonus has been universally appreciated by both farmers and business men. May I assure the house that I am not discussing this question from any party angle, because in the province of Saskatchewan there were outstanding men among the Progressives, members of the legislature, Liberals and Conservatives, who got out and took part in the campaign; and a recent convention of the United Farmers of Alberta placed themselves on record as condemning the principle of the bonus. So that there is no party angle to the question. But in view of the difficulties which the government had in bringing down the measure, and in view of the attacks made upon the government in this house and in the country when they attempted to do something for the western farmers, I did expect something better from the leaders of thought among the western farmers themselves. I hope the government will not be influenced by this in their attitude towards the policy for the coming year. I hope they will bring it down as they did last year, but if they do not then the farmers have only their own leaders to blame for losing one of the efforts made to meet their difficulties.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): As a western farmer, I wish to endorse what the last speaker (Mr. Campbell) has said. I do not want to see anything done that will be detrimental to the farmers of western Canada, and I know well the situation that exists there. Certain things have been mentioned with reference to the distribution of the bonus, and I would refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael). I might say in that connection that the greater number of the landlords in my constituency are professional men who have other means of livelihood besides farming, and if there is one thing above another which calls for comment it is the fact that this relief went to the actual farmer, whether tenant or not. As pointed out by the last speaker, with the price of wheat at 30 cents a bushel, when the farmer cuts that in half there is not much left. Most of the land in Saskatchewan is rented, and if the farmer had to divide the bonus with the landlord you can readily see that it would not be of much advantage to him.

In my constituency I found that there was great appreciation of the bonus on the part of the tenants, and many landlords have said that had it not been for the bonus they did not think that the tenants would have been able to carry on during the coming year. I wish to make it clear to the house why I did not endorse the petition when it was presented to me by those agitating for the dollar an acre. In view of the fact that a second relief measure was brought into the house at the last session, and realizing that a dollar an acre would not begin to cover the needs in the dried out areas, I felt that I could not endorse the petition.

The hon. member for Weyburn has referred to the signing of notes. In this regard, I agree with what has been said by my hon. friend across the way; I doubt whether very many of these notes will be paid. We trust that the farmers will be in a position to meet these notes, but if things continue as they are it is doubtful.

Mr. VALLANCE: Are you speaking for the government now?

Mr. LOUCKS: I am stating my own views to the house. The motion refers to the presentation by the representatives of the municipalities of a resolution asking for a dollar an acre. I take it that this applies to the whole province of Saskatchewan, and it means that they are asking for a bonus of a dollar an acre to cover the acreage of the province. I estimate, therefore, that the request is for $20,000,000, which would represent 20,000,000 acres. Now, considering that we have had relief in the bonus that has been paid, and in view of the fact that we are looking to the government for further relief which is estimated to be about $15,000,000 for seed this spring, I for one do not feel like asking the eastern members to subsidize us further to the extent of $20,000,000.

Let me assure members on both sides of the house of the cheerful spirit in which the farmers in my constituency received the relief that was given. They felt grateful to the representatives of the other provinces of the dominion for the generous way in which they had come forward and supported the relief measure upon which the farmers in Saskatchewan are so dependent. I can only convey the appreciation of some of the electors in my constituency for the relief granted. Hon. members showed that their hearts were in the right place when they granted this answer to the plea that something be done for the relief of the farmers of Saskatchewan. I have before me a letter which illustrates the working out of this relief. This letter is dated February 5, and is written by George E. Tracy, of Alsask, which is on the border of Saskatchewan and Alberta. It is addressed to the premier of Saskatchewan and reads as follows:

> I would like to take this opportunity also of congratulating you and your government on the splendid, fair and impartial way relief work has been carried out among the people of this province and this district in particular. During this past very cold weather thousands will bless you in their prayers that they have coal in their cellar and the necessities of life which could not have been supplied by the municipalities or local merchants. As head of the cooperative government you have refused to "play politics." In Saskatchewan in the hour of need you stepped into the breach in a truly great way and you have more supporters than a noisy opposition would lead you to believe.

That illustrates the appreciation felt in my own constituency. There has been no discrimination in the granting of this relief. I am informed that in the city of Regina similar notes had to be signed. I know that this spring it would be impossible for many in the province to carry on had not this relief been granted. But still further relief will be required in the way of seed. One dollar an acre would be only a drop in the bucket, if I might be permitted to use that term. The appreciation voiced by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) for the five cent bonus is echoed by the farmers in my constituency.

Those farmers in Saskatchewan who have not received any direct relief up to the present time will find it practically impossible to purchase seed this coming spring. Something in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000 will be needed. This government have been so generous that I cannot see my way clear to ask them to subsidize further the farmers to the extent of one dollar per acre.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LOUCKS: That is what is being suggested. The resolution does not discriminate, it states merely that the representatives of the municipalities have asked for a bonus of one dollar per acre. I do not see how we can come back to the government and ask for a further dollar per acre to be paid to those farmers who have already received the bonus of five cents per bushel.

Mr. YOUNG: No one is asking for that.

Mr. LOUCKS: This petition was forwarded to me and I replied that I would endorse it if I could be assured that they would be able to get by with a bonus of one dollar per acre in lieu of the relief already voted. I received no reply, but had one been forwarded to me I know it would have stated that that would be nothing at all in comparison with what some farmers would require. I think we would be well advised to continue with the present system of relief.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before the house rises out of the legislation passed at the last session granting the bonus of five cents per bushel on wheat delivered to the elevators. I had the privilege last year of travelling over most of Alberta and I can assure the government and the house that wherever there was a crop, the bonus of five cents per bushel was appreciated. Unfortunately, the crop was not well distributed; in the dry areas there was very little crop, while in the more prosperous areas the crop was quite heavy. Because of the weather conditions which had prevailed the difference in the yield was considerable. The five cent bonus would permit a farmer who had a crop averaging from 35 to 40 bushels per acre, grading not less than No. 2, to pay expenses. However, it must be remembered that that would be a very good crop. Should the crop be even larger than that the farmer was enabled to pay his taxes, and in some cases pay a little interest on his indebtedness. I understand that the average crop in the districts where there were crops was about 22 bushels per acre. Large portions of the province of Alberta were dried or hailed out, while in other portions the crop was quite heavy. In those districts where there was a crop at all the farmers expressed appreciation of the bonus because it helped them considerably. As I said before, large districts were dried out or hailed out and I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that the premium on hail insurance is so high at the present time that no farmer can afford to insure against hail.

Mr. BENNETT: It is hardly as bad as that.

Mr. GARDINER: The average premium runs from 15 to 20 per cent. These districts received no benefit from this bonus. The farmers in the dried out areas were not opposed to the payment of the bonus but they did think that in view of the fact that they had cultivated and summer-fallowed their land, gone to the extent of seeding and doing all work necessary, they were entitled to some consideration. It has been suggested that in order to be fair to the farmers in those districts which have been dried out or hailed out, a minimum bonus of one dollar per acre should be paid. If a man had a crop running only ten bushels per acre, he would receive a bonus amounting to 50 cents per acre, but these farmers feel that they are entitled to further consideration up to at least $1 per acre.

The relief measures being carried on in Alberta differ from what is being done in Saskatchewan. When speaking in the debate on the address in reply I mentioned that the relief measures being carried on in the dried out areas of Alberta were totally inadequate to meet the situation, and I still maintain that as a fact. The farmers of those areas, however, feel that if they receive at least a minimum of one dollar per acre they will be satisfied to try to carry on under the circumstances.

Some discussion has taken place with regard to the attitude of farmer leaders in different provinces in the west. Some criticism has been levelled by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) against those farmer leaders. I do not know where he gets his information. I can quite understand that inasmuch as in his particular district the farmers had a uniformly good crop, the people would be fairly well satisfied. My hon. friend ought to have an opportunity of visiting some of the dried-out areas in either Saskatchewan or Alberta and then he would probably be in a different frame of mind; that is, if he is capable of understanding the feelings of those people in those areas. I say that in all fairness because of the fact that one has to get into the environment where those conditions exist in order to understand how the people feel in those particular areas.

At the annual convention of the United Farmers of Alberta held in January of this year at Edmonton, a resolution was passed which dealt with this particular subject. I am going to place this resolution on Hansard primarily because there has been some press criticism which has not been altogether accurate and therefore not altogether fair. This resolution reads:

> Whereas, the five cent bonus on wheat was not intended as a means of increasing the production of wheat but solely as a relief measure to meet the present crisis facing the farmers of western Canada, and

Whereas, a very large proportion of our farmers are not benefiting by this payment through hail, drought, wind and other causes beyond their own control, and

Whereas, we have noted in the press statements by the Prime Minister of Canada that this omission would be taken care of, and

Whereas, the present relief schemes are inadequate as for obvious reasons they fail to meet the necessities of a great number of our farmers besides failing to make provision for the necessary finance to seed the crop of 1932;

Therefore be it resolved, that we ask the Dominion government, through our board of directors, to change the bonus payment to the effect that all grain growers be recompensed to a minimum of at least one dollar an acre seeded, so that all those who have received no bonus and all those who would not otherwise receive this amount should be treated fairly, and to those whose crop production exceeds this amount the bonus to be as it is at the present time.

That shows, I think very clearly, the state of mind in so far as the farmers of Alberta are concerned.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Was that resolution not rescinded? I am sure I read in the press that that was done.

Mr. GARDINER: No, this resolution was not rescinded. It was passed and it will be submitted to the government in due course as being one of the resolutions which were passed by the convention and which will be called to the attention of the government. This resolution shows conclusively that as regards those portions of the province of Alberta where they had good crops, even those farmers who were well satisfied with the bonus as it is at the present time, still feel that in the dried-out and hailed-out areas adequate provision has not been made to take care of the distress.

I merely wish to say again I hope the government will be able to give some attention to this matter. It is a serious question; as a matter of fact, in the dried-out areas the agricultural population to-day is up against what one might term a calamity, and so far as present indications go, the relief that is being handed out is inadequate even to take care of the bare necessities of life, let alone to place those farmers in a position next year to secure seed and to carry on their farming operations. Therefore I trust the government will realize that, as regards Alberta, farmers there who had a crop appreciate the bonus and those who are in distress on account of there being no crop, hope the government will give further consideration to their needs.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I ask the hon. member whether it is not a fact that the convention of the United Farmers of Alberta passed a resolution expressing approval of the bonus and later repudiated it?

Mr. GARDINIER: No; this resolution that I have read was passed by the United Farmers of Alberta in convention assembled. It has been sent down to the United Farmer members in the house and it will be presented to the government as one of the resolutions passed by that convention, anticipating and hoping the government will be able to take some action upon it when it is presented.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, before discussing the resolution in a general way, I should like to take this, my first opportunity of expressing to the government the appreciation of my constituents for its having passed the measure which gave the five cent subvention on wheat. While in my constituency there were very few farmers who shared in that, they generally approve and appreciate it from a realization of the fact that the government was endeavouring to do something to help the farmers. I was surprised to note that the mover of the resolution, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie), did not give some credit or commendation to the government for what it had done. I suppose it is hard for some hon. gentlemen opposite to give this government credit for anything, no matter what it has done.

Every hon. member knows the principle behind the passing of the act granting the five cent bonus. It was agreed upon early in the session; it was embodied in the budget brought down on the first day of June and therefore it must have been considered by the government before that, at a time when there was no suggestion or thought of a complete failure of crop in a great portion of the western provinces, and particularly Saskatchewan. The principle behind the five cent subvention was that of bonusing the product of an industry similar to that of bonusing the product of the mining industry by giving them a bonus per ton of coal on a basis of the mile haulage. It was a straight bonus to the product of an industry. I supported the principle as adopted by the government, and I believe I was the first member to suggest that some bonus of this kind should be granted, when on the 13th April, 1931, I made this suggestion to the house. When the measure was brought down, we realized we had secured something that would prove to be of great benefit to the farmers of the west, for, as the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) has stated, when before did any government of this dominion do such a splendid thing for the farmers of any part of Canada? As has already been stated, this subvention was earmarked so that it went directly into the hands of the producer. The house will remember some of the discussions that took place last year when the measure was being debated, and some of the objections that were taken to it. I think it was the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) who suggested it was only a gesture to help out the railway companies, but it was so earmarked there was no doubt about that, and it went into the hands of the producers, direct. But, Mr. Speaker, owing to the climatic conditions prevailing in the west the people in the southern part of Saskatchewan have not to any extent shared in the $10,000,000 which has already been paid to the producers of the west. When the budget was under discussion last year some of us from the west, when it became evident about the middle of July that there was likely to be a complete crop failure throughout a considerable portion of the province of Saskatchewan, made the suggestion that there might be a change to an acreage basis. At that time, however, it was so evident that a calamity was imminent out there that the government considered the method they adopted to give relief would be more effective than that of placing relief on an acreage basis.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I was associated with the petition which was presented to the government, and the delegation which came to Ottawa. I played only a very small part in getting signers to that petition, and in fact attended only one meeting at which it was discussed. Right here and now, Mr. Speaker, may I take exception to the remark made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) to the effect that there was no playing of politics. At the one meeting I attended I had to take the platform and defend the attitude of the government, because the man who was speaking in favour of the dollar-per-acre bonus—the member for the constituency of Estevan in the legislature of Saskatchewan—was certainly making a political speech. I think however that a great many of the people out there realized the exact situation.

In the western provinces, particularly in Saskatchewan, we will be interested for many years in the production of wheat, and any action to encourage the farmers and assist them to stay on their lands will be a step in the right direction. Think what it would mean to the whole of Canada if for the next two years or so there was a normal crop in western Canada. It is quite possible if we have normal climatic conditions next year in the three prairie provinces, there should be a production for export of about 500,000,000 bushels of wheat. Furthermore, there might be 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of coarse grain. What would that mean in the matter of relief from the present condition? What would it mean with respect to a solution of our unemployment problem? In the province of Saskatchewan at the present time there are some 50,000 farmers receiving relief. If normal conditions prevailed, each of them would employ at least one extra man, and in that way we would take care of 50,000 men. From the standpoint of business for the railways, what would it mean? A crop yield of 500,000,000 bushels for export might easily mean an earning of between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 for our railways. What about the increased purchasing power of our western people, who with a good crop could purchase from the producers in eastern Canada? The government is thoroughly familiar with the situation, and understands what it means to Canada to keep the west intact and the morale of the people at such a plane that they will carry on and produce to the limit. Undoubtedly the morale of the western farmers has been put to a very severe test during the last two or three years, but our flag is not at half mast and the people out there are prepared to carry on and do their best. They are facing the coming season with a spirit of confidence, optimism, courage and fortitude, and after the experience of the last three years I am sure they are prepared to go forward and do better. Certainly they will profit by their experience. There is no way in which a government could invest a few million dollars to better advantage than by assisting the farmers in some way either through a bonus or by whatever means may be adopted. I am sure these farmers in the dried-out area would be only too willing to have any bonus or further assistance that might be given by the government applied on the debt that they have shouldered in respect of the relief they have received. At least 90 per cent of the people intend to repay their debt; I know that most of these farmers would not accept the relief they are getting to-day without the desire to give something in return. They do not consider themselves paupers and are not accepting charity; they intend to pay.

I should like to tender on behalf of the farmers in the constituency I represent an expression of appreciation of the gift cars of fruits and vegetables which came from eastern Canada. Two hundred or more relief cars came to our assistance, some of them to my constituency. I want the house and the country to realize that those people in western Canada appreciate the splendid spirit which was shown, there is no doubt that the action of our friends in the east has done much to create a more friendly relationship between the two sections of our country.

I am willing to leave the matter with the government in the belief that they will do what they think best. No doubt some consideration of western problems is necessary. I believe the Prime Minister knows just as much as or more than any other hon. member in this house about western conditions. He realizes, as I fully realize, the important position the western provinces hold and the outstanding part they will play in bringing back to normal the state of Canadian economic conditions. We all realize the part the western provinces will play in balancing our trade and furnishing exports. With those thoughts in mind I am sure the Prime Minister wants and intends to do the right thing, and I am prepared to leave the matter with the government and to support whatever measures they may consider right and proper. I trust the great majority of the people of Canada, and in the west particularly, are prepared to leave the matter there.

Hon. members to your right, Mr. Speaker, all realize, and I believe hon. gentlemen opposite who speak their minds will admit, that Canada is indeed fortunate to-day in having such a man as our present Prime Minister at the head of affairs. I am willing to leave the matter there, merely suggesting to the member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and to his Alberta friends that since they opposed the principle of government assistance by way of bonus, if any of their people prefer to give back any of this ten million dollars that they received probably the treasury would be only too pleased to accept it at the present time. As I said before, I am prepared to leave the matter to the due, right and proper consideration which I know the government will give to it.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express appreciation of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and his colleagues are sufficiently disengaged to remain in the chamber while this matter is under discussion. When it came up last session I expressed the opinion that the Prime Minister was desirous of assisting two classes in the west who in his estimation required assistance, and it is because of my belief that he and his new Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) still have an open mind that I am confident they will be prepared to consider any practical method that may be suggested to redress the discrimination between those farmers who had a crop and those who had none, incident to the measure of relief which they formulated last session. The Prime Minister's remarks on this question contained in his budget speech are so excellent that I do not think I can do better than read them to the house:

> First, provision should be made to assist those who have a crop, because they have considerable obligations, taxes, etc., which must be discharged. Other methods will be taken to deal with the situation of the provinces which are not in a position to assist those who with their reserves exhausted and their crops a failure for the third time are practically ruined. We therefore propose to provide that the freight rates shall be adjusted by this country absorbing five cents per bushel on all wheat that is exported of the crop of this year.

So the Prime Minister was reasonably well aware that there were two classes of people that he proposed to assist, and I think the whole house was ready to support him, namely, those farmers who had a large crop or any crop that they had to deliver but were losing money on every bushel produced; these were to be compensated by a straight cash bonus of five cents a bushel instead of what was called a pegged price. No complaint has been made with respect to that, so far as I know, since it was adjusted to apply to the farmer. But we did take exception to these words of the Prime Minister:

> We therefore propose to provide that the freight rates shall be adjusted by this country absorbing five cents per bushel on all wheat that is exported of the crop of this year.

We took the ground that you could not possibly get that five cents a bushel to the exporter back to the farmer. When a farmer is delivering his wheat at the initial elevator he does not know whether it is going to be exported or whether it will be consumed in Canada. It took us nearly two months to convince my right hon. friend that that was not a practical way of carrying out his own wishes. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) suggested that I claimed that it was only a handout to the railways. It could not be anything of the kind, because the railways would get their freight rates no matter who paid it; but it was as first proposed a handout to the exporter, and could not be anything else, because the exporter was the only man in the country who had the necessary documents to prove that the wheat was going to be exported. I think all men familiar with delivering wheat at initial elevators will endorse this statement. We criticized the proposal to bonus the exporter for about two months, and then the Prime Minister brought down a bill indicating that the bonus was to go straight to the farmer, based on delivery to certain initial elevators throughout the country, on which the Board of Grain Commissioners could keep correct tab. So I think the ministry ought to feel—and I am going to say it as smilingly as I know how—very appreciative of the opposition for putting them on the right track to get the benefit of the five cents bonus to the farmers, whom I believe at the time and still believe the government was desirous of assisting.

We have two classes of farmers, those who had good crops running up to as high as 40 and 50 bushels an acre, on which they would earn $2 an acre. We take no exception to that. We did not object that they were getting too much, but rather that the others with a very light or no crop were getting too little. In other words the farmers who needed assistance the least got the most; those who needed assistance the most got the least. Surely the government does not want to solve the problem on that basis. I know that they do not. All they are asking us to do, I expect, is to show them some practical way of adjusting and correcting that unjust condition, and I believe they are ready to accept such suggestions as I have already indicated.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer—the promissory notes which were given for the relief. As pointed out by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) farmers in the distressed areas who have lost three consecutive crops are the only people we know of who have been asked to give a promissory note in return for the relief granted to them. Mark the difference, Mr. Speaker; men who have had abundance of crops and seed get relief running all the way from a few dollars up to a thousand dollars—a straight cash bonus. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle should not complain that we are not boosting the government with respect to this matter. We are giving due publicity to the magnanimity of the government to those who need it least, for they are getting assistance, running up as high as eight hundred and in some cases a thousand dollars each. We are not complaining of that, but we are complaining of the ghastly contrast between that magnanimity to those who need relief least and the treatment of those who have very little or no crop. The latter on their application for relief have to sign a promissory note to repay this fall for the goods advanced.

Mr. YOUNG: No, 1933.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, that will come around very soon. Imagine how many years it will take these distressed farmers to catch up on their obligations. The government is going to pile in on the second crop. That will be an invitation to everybody else who has prior claims, dating back perhaps several years, to go in and collect from their debtors until the latter's homes will be as bare as the palm of your hand. That in itself is a mistake, and if that or any similar part of the country is ever to get on its feet again, I would point out to the government that some different kind of treatment will have to be given to all such. The southwest part of Saskatchewan, three years ago was looked upon as one of the best wheat areas in the whole west. I know from 1901 on to 1908 and to some extent during 1909, that homestead settlement rushed over that territory like a prairie fire, and it was settled up almost overnight because of the magnificent crop that it produced. I believe that country will come back again, but the farmers there are destitute now, and I plead with the government to find some better way of helping them than by exacting a promissory note for the relief granted. They are the only people I know of that are so treated. Surely the government do not want to discriminate against those distressed farmers. The member for Weyburn has suggested a practical way of relieving their distress, and I submit that plan to the Prime Minister with some confidence. From the fact that he is listening to this debate I take it that he is ready to weigh any evidence on the question that we can bring before him.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I say to the hon. gentleman that the promissory notes were given at the request of the beneficiaries; that was what started it. They did not desire to take relief as charity and thought that some day their position would be improved, so they asked that the notes be given. That is the story as I have it from the commission.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can understand that, but will not those same farmers be satisfied if they are given a dollar an acre to be applied to their relief account? A man may have $300 of a relief account for food, fuel, fodder and so on, and he may have two hundred acres of crop. This would give him $200 to be credited on his relief account, which the government would be some time in collecting in any other way. Those men do not want to feel that they are accepting charity; we appreciate that spirit in our people, but they will have the satisfaction of earning this money on an acreage basis and having it applied to their account. That would be quite satisfactory; it would be easy on the treasury; it would be meeting the wishes of those farmers who feel independent --and all honour to them—but I do not think they represent as large a number as those others who are so loaded with indebtedness, that they shrink from further debt when it is a question of relief. But this relief has been turned into a loan policy, the only case of the kind in Canada.

In order to meet the needs and wishes of all classes of the community let us give this bonus to the cropless on an acreage basis. This is the only year we could carry out that proposal, because this is the only year during the next ten years when we will have an accurate computation of the acreage. This has been obtained through the census; it is right there in black and white, taken at a time when it was not known that anything of this nature would be suggested, so the figures are probably as accurate as we could expect any such figures to be. There are many further claims we might still bring forward; this is really the minimum. There is still the injustice to the men who do not grow wheat at all. Some farmers grow oats because their land is adapted to it; some grow rye, some barley where others grow flax and yet get nothing by way of bonus.

Mr. BENNETT: I might tell my hon. friend something. Ever since this government has been in power, at every meeting of the treasury board there have been presented on an average from 50 to 100 recommendations, under the adjustment arrangement, by which the provinces and the dominion have had to cancel debts owing for sums of money advanced for seed grain, fodder and relief for which liens were registered. If I should put them on the table they would amount to many thousands, and this was done under the act passed some years ago, when my hon. friend was in power. I say that to him so that he may know just what has been the result of past dealings of that kind. I do not know what influence it might have upon his mind, but I want him to have the facts.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am quite well aware of that. We are dealing with a country where there are intermittent droughts and good crops. When the crop is good it is marvellous, but when it is poor it is horrible, so what are you to do under these circumstances? There is a saying that you cannot take the breeks off a Highlander and that you cannot draw blood from a stone; in this case there is nothing to do but write off these debts, and large amounts have been written off. In the spring of 1915, when my hon. friends were in power, a vast amount of seed and fodder and so on was distributed to farmers in very much the same area, and it had a very beneficial result. At that time the cry was for greater and greater production; every possible acre was sown, and we had the largest crop yield in our history. If the government will follow the same policy this year we may possibly hope for the same result.

I do not think the remarks of my right hon. friend have very much to do with the case in point, though they may have some bearing on the question of collection. During the fall following the distribution of seed grain in 1915 the government sent out very active collectors, because they thought that was perhaps the only chance they would have of getting back what they had spent. As soon as the government collectors went around, collectors representing every private interest went abroad also, with the result that the farmer was in danger of being worse off than before. So I would implore the right hon. gentleman not to go after those poor but worthy farmers too soon after this disaster. Give them an opportunity of getting on their feet, so that they may carry on.

Let us not forget the other point. If my right hon. friend could chat for half an hour with the mover and seconder of the resolution and try to arrive at an equitable solution, I think a great deal could be accomplished. Something could be done for those men who had no crop, and if my invocation does not sway my right hon. friend on behalf of those farmers let me appeal to him on behalf of himself personally not to let the impression go abroad in the west that either he is careless with regard to the fate of these cropless farmers or he does not understand the question with which he is dealing.

Mr. BENNETT: The advances which have been made answer that observation. If my hon. friend knew just what this government has done in the last six months, and the load we have carried for the three prairie provinces, perhaps he would not be so glib.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know, but I am not going to answer my right hon. friend in the spirit in which he made his reply. I think if he knew the dissatisfaction, the discontent, and I was going to say the hate which has been aroused by the rank injustice of the present arrangement it might make him pause to think. I suppose I could let my right hon. friend go on blundering. Why did we not let the government go on with their proposal about the income tax last year? That was another blunder. Some say we should let them go on now but I have too much regard for my constituents to let the government keep on making these blunders. I would rather come to the rescue of my constituents, even though it helps my right hon. friend out of a hole. If the government insist on remaining just where they are on this question at least I will have done my best to set them aright once more.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): I do not want to speak for any length of time, but I think I should say a few words on the question whether or not the United Farmers of Alberta were opposed to the five cent bonus on wheat. Before I come to that, however, I wish to refer to the terms of the resolution, and the proposal that the bonus be paid on an acreage basis. On the whole I believe it would be fairer if something of that kind could be worked out, but I would add this proviso, that only land in fit shape for putting in a crop should be considered, and that would be one of the difficulties in administering a plan of that kind.

I do not think I need argue that the five cent bonus on wheat was generally acceptable to the farmers of western Canada, because I have not heard of one farmer who turned it down. I think that should be answer enough to anyone who considers that the five cent bonus was not acceptable on grounds of principle or on any other grounds whatsoever. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) read the resolution that was passed at the convention of the United Farmers of Alberta. That resolution reads:

> Therefore be it resolved, that we ask the Dominion government, through our board of directors, to change the bonus payment to the effect that all grain growers be recompensed to a minimum of at least one dollar an acre seeded, so that all those who have received no bonus and all those who would not otherwise receive this amount should be treated fairly, and to those whose crop production exceeds this amount the bonus to be as it is at the present time. . . .

A resolution was introduced at the convention after that. It came from my own constituency, but I do not think I am to blame for its having come to the convention. However, it came from Grande Prairie, and here it is:

> Whereas we appreciate the bonus on wheat by the Dominion government being a step in the right direction; and whereas there is no bonus on other agricultural products:
> Therefore be it resolved that we demand that the Dominion government bonus agricultural production and that the amount of bonus be in proportion to the benefits enjoyed by the manufacturers through the tariff.

Some of the delegates at the convention of the United Farmers of Alberta thought that we were going just a little too far in asking for that, and they voted it down, and some of the people who were behind this resolution thought that they were treated unfairly and requested a reconsideration of the first one passed, but they could not get that one reconsidered or rescinded. That explains the newspaper stories that have come to eastern Canada to the effect that the convention was opposed to the bonus on wheat.

I should like to point out to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that the average price received for wheat by the farmers in western Canada is around 38 or 40 cents. A lot of them sold their wheat for 30 cents a bushel last fall.

Mr. BENNETT: At the elevator?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): At the elevator. Wheat went up to 50 cents or a little better, but a good many of them did not have sense enough to sell at that price. Possibly somewhere between 35 and 40 cents is the average price received for No. 1 northern but it is not all No. 1. Now that is not the cost of producing wheat; you cannot produce wheat for that. If, therefore, as I believe, the general economic conditions in Canada are largely determined by the volume of wheat purchasing power of the western farmers, it is necessary to continue, until the price of wheat rises, to bonus wheat considerably, and I hope that the government will seriously consider carrying on even though it may have considerable difficulty in doing so.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): I had not intended to take part in this debate had it not been for the statement by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) that the only people in Canada who were asked to give notes in return for relief were the farmers of the west. That statement was corrected by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks), but I find it repeated with even greater emphasis by the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) in his address. The fact is that the citizens of my city are being asked to repay any moneys they get during this winter by way of relief.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. TURNBULL: It is not a shame, because the people of my own city are asking for it. They are not asking for charity. They are asking authorities to assist them temporarily over a period of strain, and those gentlemen who say shame do not know the people of the city of Regina, because those people wish to stand on their own feet. They who say shame represent those who are not ashamed to take money that is not coming to them.

As regards the giving of notes in Saskatchewan, I am strongly of the impression that those notes are not given as a result of pressure brought to bear upon the people either by the federal or by the provincial authorities. There are hundreds and thousands of men in Saskatchewan who have said that they would not take any money by way of relief but would starve first unless they got the opportunity of repaying the money advanced them. There are citizens of that type all through Saskatchewan and I am sorry that my hon. friends opposite, apparently, have not met more of them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask whether the manufacturers helped out in this crisis are promising to give back afterwards the favours given them?

Mr. TURNBULL: I am not concerned at all with any of your friends the manufacturers. I am particularly concerned with my own people in Saskatchewan and I say that notes have been given by the farmers of that province largely because those farmers are used to standing as far as possible on their own feet and want to continue to do so. For that reason representations were made by many farmers to members of this house and of the government that they be allowed to repay the moneys advanced to them. There has appeared in the public press of the country within the last week, from those in charge of relief work in Saskatchewan, a report that already some of those who have received assistance in that province are making arrangements for the return of the money they have been given and are asking for statements of account so that they may begin their repayment. I know there are some who do not wish to sign notes. I had the privilege of addressing a meeting in the constituency of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) last fall, and at the close of the meeting one of the hon. gentleman's constituents came to me and asked whether the government was going to request the repayment of the money. I said I thought the Saskatchewan Relief Commission would, and he said, "If they are going to, I don't want it." I said, "Well, my friend, if that is the way you feel about it I shall be glad to see that you don't get it."

Mr. VALLANCE: Were you in a position to prevent him from getting relief?

Mr. TURNBULL: I used what influence I had to see that he did not get it without signing a note for it, and I did so on representations from a great many respectable citizens of Saskatchewan who did not wish to take relief without signing notes. The relief commission in Saskatchewan which is administering relief in the southern part of the province, in whose favour the notes are drawn, and whose recommendations are largely followed in the policy laid down in that province, is a non-political body including representatives of the farmers and of the Labour party. It is quite true that the majority are Conservatives, but it is equally true that those who represent the Liberal party and the farmers' party in that province are not, so far as the administration of relief is concerned, at variance with other members of the commission.

I think that possibly one of the troubles about the resolution brought before the house is the fact that the resolution itself recognizes the absolute impossibility of providing for all classes of people on an equitable basis, because neither the resolution itself nor those supporting it suggest any solution that would be absolutely equitable. It is quite true that the hon. member for Weyburn and the hon. member for Melville suggest that the men who have given promissory notes be given credit at some time or other for a certain amount of money on those notes. That does not apply to many people who did not ask for relief, to those who went out on their own scheme rather than apply to the government for relief. It is impossible to have an absolutely equitable system. If the representations of the Saskatchewan Rural Municipalities Association had been made in May or June of 1931 they might have been considered more favourably but, as I understand it, those resolutions were formally presented to the government in December, 1931, when the relief commission had been launched and when it was impossible to make the necessary changes.

The situation which has arisen to-day apparently arises from a confusion of ideas. The five cent bonus was applied for a certain purpose, and hon. members are complaining because it did not happen to fit another purpose. This bonus was to be a cure for a certain condition and because it did not cure a totally different condition, hon. members are complaining. The five cent bonus was granted to meet the complaint made by the farmers of western Canada and by hon. members opposite, among others, that agriculture in western Canada was losing money on every bushel of wheat produced. It was contended that the farmer was not able to raise wheat, not only at a profit but at a price to cover the cost of production. It was to meet that condition that the bonus of five cents was granted. It was a bonus on the production of wheat, not a bonus to those who did not produce, no matter whose fault it may have been.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Was not that measure in a sense a relief measure?

Mr. TURNBULL: In my judgment it was not a relief measure, it was a bonus to industry. It was no more a relief measure than was the bonus given a few years ago to the steel industry. That bonus was granted to enable them to produce steel at a price to compete in the markets of the world.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is not a bonus given under those circumstances a form of relief?

Mr. TURNBULL: Not the form of relief we are talking about. That is my judgment but the hon. member may have his own conviction. The bonus was granted to enable farmers to produce wheat at a price which would enable them to sell it in the markets of the world.

Another condition arose; a large number of farmers had no wheat, either because of crop failure or from the effects of hail or something of that kind.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Does the hon. member realize that the act was passed on August 3?

Mr. TURNBULL: I realize that.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): The hon member said the condition arose later.

Mr. TURNBULL: Did I say "later"?

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Yes.

Mr. TURNBULL: I do not think I did. As my hon. friend well knows, the budget which contained this provision was brought down on June 1. As I see it, that provision was not intended to apply to crop failures, whether or not it was known at that time such crop failures did exist; it was intended as a bonus on the production of wheat.

Mr. VALLANCE: At that time it was an export bonus.

Mr. TURNBULL: The interruption of my hon. friend has nothing whatever to do with the argument.

Mr. VALLANCE: Oh, yes, it has.

Mr. TURNBULL: Not a thing. Another condition arose in western Canada, a complete crop failure, in some districts extending back for two years and in others for three years. When this bonus was introduced the government said that this condition would have to be taken care of by other means, and it has been taken care of fairly well. The Saskatchewan Relief Commission has provided the things necessary to maintain these people and their cattle through the present winter. I do not know of one person in Saskatchewan who has starved, everyone who needed it has been supplied with fuel, food, clothing and shelter.

Mr. POWER: Do I understand that those who produced the wheat received a five cent bonus while those who unfortunately had none will be obliged to pay for the relief granted by way of bonus?

Mr. TURNBULL: Those who produced wheat received the bonus.

Mr. POWER: Those who did not, pay for the relief.

Mr. TURNBULL: Those who did not produce wheat did not receive the bonus.

Mr. POWER: But they paid for the relief—

Mr. TURNBULL: Not yet.

Mr. POWER: —by way of the bonus.

Mr. TURNBULL: At the request of a great many people in Saskatchewan, those who received relief were given the privilege of repayment. This had a deterrent effect upon some people—

Mr. POWER: The people who were worse off actually paid by means of the notes.

Mr. TURNBULL: —I am happy to say the number is few—who had the intention to hold out both hands for relief when, in fact, they did not need it. Other measures were taken to provide for those who did not have a crop. There were measures taken to supply them with the necessities to carry on through the winter, and other measures were adopted to supply seed and feed for the spring and to grant the necessary assistance to put the crop in the ground. The suggestion has been made that those who buy this seed and feed will have to pay the five cent bonus. Wheat was quoted yesterday on the Winnipeg exchange at 66 cents per bushel, but I venture to say the farmer in Saskatchewan will receive his feed and seed for considerably less than 66 cents per bushel.

Two conditions existed; the bonus was applied to one and the relief was applied to the other. The policy of taking back notes may be right or wrong but I do not intend to argue that matter. All I am trying to point out is that it is not right to apply to one disease the cure for another. It may be said that the second cure was not the proper one, but I am not concerned with that; it can be argued at another time. It is owing to this confusion that the present resolution has been introduced.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the constituency which I have the honour to represent adjoins the constituency of Acadia, and the description of the difficulties faced by the farmers in that constituency as given by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) applies to the farmers in my constituency. During the last few months I attended a large number of gatherings of farmers, and at each a resolution was passed, usually unanimously, in favour of having the bonus paid in some other way or upon some other basis, the acreage basis being the one usually chosen. The farmers realized the difficulties in checking up, but felt that under present conditions the amount of money paid was not applied in such a way as to give the most relief.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, a notice of motion which stood in my name asked for the production of certain communications which had passed between the government and different organizations in the province of Saskatchewan. I mentioned this matter this afternoon to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and he said he would telephone immediately and endeavour to get these communications to me. Just this minute I am in receipt of one of the documents asked for, but I would like to have all the documents asked for in my motion, so that when this debate is resumed I will be able to deal more intelligently with this matter. At this time, I would like to have it called six o'clock. The Prime Minister very kindly told me he would get them and that if he was not able to get them, he would have the debate adjourned so that I might have an opportunity of discussing the matter. There are also some others who wish to speak.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 18, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to ask the administration whether it is their intention to renew the general program for relief work after March 31, when the present act, I understand, lapses.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): All I can say in answer to my hon. friend at the present moment is that the matter is under consideration.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

REPRESENTATIONS OF THE CIVIL SERVICE ASSOCIATION ON TEN PER CENT SALARY DEDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I notice he is not in his place, so I will put it to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who is now leading the house. In view of the debate that took place on Tuesday evening regarding the proposed 10 per cent cut, and of the statement of the Minister of Justice that a bill would be drafted dealing with the matter, will the Prime Minister accede to the request made to him some days ago by the Civil Service Association to allow a deputation to wait upon him to lay the case of the civil service before him; and will this deputation be received before the bill is actually drafted?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I may state that the government has in contemplation such a bill. I think it will be introduced within the next two or three days. But I may tell my hon. friend that if the civil service desires to place their views before the government they are entirely free to do so at as early a date as possible. It is the intention of the government in the very near future to introduce a bill.

REPORT OF BANK MERGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) whether he has received an application from one of our chartered banks for his consent to its absorption or merger with another bank, or have any representations been made to him with regard to the matter?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer that the question be placed upon the order paper in the regular course.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to address a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland). I am sorry I had no opportunity to give him notice of it. I have a wire before me to the effect that eighty non-permanent officers, mostly married and returned men, are discharged from the air force with two weeks' pay. I need not give the remainder of the telegram. Is it the intention of the government to confine the remuneration of these men to two weeks pay?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): I regret that I cannot give my hon. friend a specific answer at the moment. I will look into the matter and let him know during the day.

Mr. EULER: It seems very short notice.

GRIEVANCES OF VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I asked the Prime Minister or the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) a question in regard to the appointment of a special committee of the House of Commons to deal with the grievances of veterans throughout Canada. The Prime Minister answered my question, but it was a noncommittal answer.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I have nothing further to add at the present time.

FARM RELIEF

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN FEDERAL ASSISTANCE ON BUSHEL RATHER THAN ACREAGE BASIS

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. McKenzie (Assiniboia):

Whereas the policy of extending federal assistance to western farmers on a bushel basis rather than on an acreage basis has worked out most unfairly and unjustly to the residents of those districts suffering from failure or near failure of crop,

And whereas a largely signed petition and memorandum has been presented to the government by the secretary of Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, praying for additional legislation to partially remedy the situation that exists,

Therefore be it resolved: that, in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to a more equitable and less discriminatory solution of this problem.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the house on the resolution presented by the member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) I should like at the outset to make a few comments on what was brought out in the debate yesterday. For once I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) on his interpretation of the legislation in question. It seems to me that there is a misunderstanding throughout the country as to its intent. The purpose of the legislation was to grant a bonus to the farmer on each bushel of wheat that he had grown. So the man who had no wheat certainly could not participate in this bonus. I was rather amazed by the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks). Yesterday he said:

I am stating my own views to the house. The motion refers to the presentation by the representatives of the municipalities of a resolution asking for a dollar an acre. I take it that this applies to the whole province of Saskatchewan;

Now, that is not the intention of the memorandum presented to the government. I hold in my hand a copy of that memorandum, and it states very definitely what the associated rural municipalities were seeking. With the indulgence of the house I should like to read the five requests:

1. That the Dominion government provide for a bonus in the drought areas on the seeded acreage—

Mark you, "in the drought areas."

—for the year 1931, the basis for payment to be one dollar per acre where the crop was a total failure, and where a partial crop has been harvested and the bonus of five cents per bushel has not resulted in the farmer receiving a bonus equal to one dollar per acre, that an additional bonus be paid so that a minimum of one dollar per acre may be established regardless of the yield per acre.

I hope my hon. friend from Rosetown will observe that statement.

Mr. LOUCKS: Did not the representatives of the municipalities ask for a dollar an acre, to be applied province wide? In other words, they did not stipulate the "dried out areas."

Mr. VALLANCE: I hold in my hand a copy of the memorandum presented to the government. The Prime Minister was kind enough yesterday to telephone the department and have this copy sent to me. Therefore, I must assume that it is an accurate copy of the presentation of the rural municipalities. Number 2 is this:

2. That the payment of this bonus be made at the earliest possible date in order that it may be utilized for the purpose of purchasing seed and feed for 1931 spring seeding purposes and for taking care of the human necessities for the winter months, thereby relieving the Saskatchewan Relief Commission of the necessity of advancing relief to those who from the one dollar per acre bonus would be enabled to take care of their own requirements.

3. That such payment be made only to the grower, and be subject to the same restrictions as to exemption from garnishee, assignment, etc. as is provided for under the regulations governing payment of the bonus under an act respecting wheat.

4. That the information necessary to enable the government to make such payment be secured through the offices of the various rural municipalities in the affected area.

5. That the parliament of the Dominion of Canada, at the next session, give careful consideration to the urgent necessity for an extension of the bonus system for the year 1932 and to the advisability of having the bonus paid on the acreage basis instead of on the bushel basis.

I will be quite frank, Mr. Speaker, in saying that this memorandum was the basis of this resolution, and it was because of the advances made by the rural municipalities, and because of the lack of interest, or at least the dearth of information given by the government to the public that we deemed it necessary to bring in the present motion.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) suggested that only land in fit shape for putting in a crop should be considered, and he thought that would be one of the difficulties in administering a plan of this kind. That has been taken care of in the memorandum, which states:

In connection with suggestion No. 4 we would suggest that each grower might submit to the secretary of the municipality in which he resides a sworn statement of his seeded acreage for the year, this statement to be reviewed by the council of the municipality and the relief officer of the Saskatchewan relief commission in their district, and that a certificate of their approval be endorsed on the application before payment is recommended.

So the objection raised by the hon. member for Peace River is met in that memorandum.

As a member coming from the northern part of Saskatchewan I wish to tell the government that as far as the northern parts of the provinces are concerned, they were indebted to the government and were grateful for what was done in this regard, but I believe, and it is also stated in the memorandum, that had the government adopted the suggestion of the rural municipalities it would not have cost a great deal more than the five cent per bushel bonus cost. It was pointed out very definitely yesterday, and it has not been denied, that the bonus was a straight gift to the farmer who had wheat. We are all agreed on that. It is true also that through the interpretation placed on the word "grower" by the grain commission, many of us felt that an injustice was done. When I make that statement I have in mind individuals in all three prairie provinces, and in fact I think probably in every province of Canada, who are operating their farms on a one-third crop lease. Under the interpretation placed on the word "grower" by the grain commission the owner of the land received no part of the bonus. I might cite my own case as an instance. I operate a farm; I own and control everything on that farm. I pay the taxes; I pay for all repairs; I own the equipment; I own the land, and all that the other fellow supplies is the labour. He did not receive five cents per bushel; he received 15 cents per bushel, though I got two-thirds of the crop for my share because of the investment I had in the farm. I am not kicking, but that is what happened, and that injustice, or apparent injustice, was brought about in many cases by that legislation.

Now I wish to turn to the farmer in the southern part of the province, from whom this petition comes. I would urge on the government with all the force at my command the absolute necessity, if we are to save that huge country from going down and out, of either adopting this policy or suggesting something that will be better for that part of the country. I have pointed out that the bonus was a straight gift to the farmer in the north. The individual in the south, who was not so favourably situated, had to fill out this paper before he could get any relief, and as the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) pointed out yesterday, after the farmer gave all this information and sold his birthright, as it were, he had to sign a note by means of which at some future date the government might collect this money.

Yesterday the suggestion was made that probably these men never would be asked to pay these notes. Probably it would not have been a good thing to broadcast that information, because undoubtedly the western farmer is like the average individual; probably he would have asked for more relief than otherwise might have been the case if he had to sign a note, but if it is the intention of the government not to press for the collection of these notes, I think now, when the financial year is about ended and we will have either to renew this policy or bring in a new one, the time is appropriate for the government to announce to those individuals affected that these notes will not be collected.

I might deal extensively with this memorandum, but I do not think it would do much good. Some days ago I asked for copies of all correspondence that had passed between the government and this organization, but so far I have not received those details. I should have liked them before making these remarks, because I would have been glad to find there some reason for complimenting the government on the action they had taken or had promised to take with regard to this memorandum, but at the moment I am not in a position to say what has been done.

I would ask the indulgence of this house to have this memorandum placed on Hansard, so that each member may read and study it. Then when the government bring down whatever relief bill is to be brought down, we will be in a better position to discuss the question from the point of view of those most vitally interested.

The memorandum is as follows:

Re: Dollar Per Acre Bonus

Hon. R. B. Bennett, Premier of Canada, and Hon. Members of the Government of Canada:

The request we are making to the federal cabinet to-day is not alone for the farmers of Saskatchewan or for the people of that province, but is, we believe, for the Dominion of Canada as a whole and for the welfare of all our population. Few people appreciate that it is the great prairie sections of western Canada with their limited rainfall that has produced and will continue to produce that high protein content wheat which has made Canada famous and contributed largely to the prosperity of the whole dominion. It is also this territory that can compete with any country in the world in the growing of wheat both in low costs of production and in high quality product.

There is nothing radically wrong with western Canada or with the people who have settled in those provinces. Our present situation is the result of extreme and unusual climatic conditions for the past three years and the reduced prices which we have been compelled to accept for the produce which we have for sale and which we were forced to market at a time when the price did not meet the cost of production.

The position of the farmers in the drought area of Saskatchewan is reflected in the manner in which they have applied to municipal councils and to the relief commission for necessary relief. In 1929 only a very small percentage asked for assistance from their municipal council, and in many instances these applications were made by farmers who had suffered a severe crop loss the previous year due to hail or frost damage. In 1930, when the second crop failure occurred, the number asking for relief was greatly increased, while in 1931 we are informed that in some localities over ninety per cent of the residents have found it necessary to seek assistance. Relief to the value of over five million dollars was advanced by the rural municipalities in Saskatchewan up to the date on which the responsibility was taken over by the Saskatchewan relief commission. These advances consisted of food, fuel, clothing, fodder for live stock, gasoline and machinery repairs. The greater portion of the amounts borrowed from the banks by municipalities to enable them to grant these advances is guaranteed by the provincial government. It is a direct charge against the recipient and where he is the registered owner of the land which he operates, or where the consent of the registered owner has been secured, the amount of the relief advance is a direct charge against the land. Consequently these advances will require to be repaid at some future date. The experience of municipalities in previous years indicates that the greater proportion has been repaid.

An official of the Saskatchewan farm loan board is authority for the statement that about twenty per cent of the farmers of the province own their own land and are free from debt. He further states that another thirty-five per cent have no debts except a mortgage with the interest paid and principal reduced. Under ordinary economic conditions these people would not ask for relief from public bodies but would borrow money from loan companies, giving a first mortgage on their land as security for repayment or they would arrange for a temporary loan from the bank to tide them over the period of depression. This procedure is now almost impossible, as mortgage companies are not loaning money on this form of security and banks are consistently refusing loans to farmers, regardless of the financial position of the applicant, or the satisfactory manner in which his obligations to the bank have been retired in previous years. The funds of the municipalities are exhausted and the provincial government has gone as far as they can reasonably be expected to go in assisting their people. Consequently, the only assistance they can now secure is from the federal government through the agency of the relief commission. The value of relief extended in this form is expected to be repaid and the applicant signs an undertaking to that effect. No doubt the larger proportion of people will make an honest effort to pay these advances when conditions return to normal. There may be a small percentage of the residents who will secure goods from the commission and who will have little or no intention of repayment of the amount involved if that responsibility can be easily evaded. There are always a few of this class in every community, but it is not with them that we are chiefly concerned at the present time. Our interest is centred in those farmers who have been the backbone of the province, who have carried on through good years and bad, and who have made such a wonderful contribution to the building up of the great Dominion of Canada.

These people are now at the parting of the ways. Their problem is to consider whether or not further effort is worth while. Are they going to undertake the labour and expense of seeding another crop in the hope that conditions will improve and that they may regain their former position of being able to pay their debts and provide for their families the standard of living to which their labours would appear to entitle them? We submit that the morale of these people is in danger of being seriously impaired by the adversities through which they are passing, and it is the solemn duty of the government of this dominion to carefully consider the best means of assisting them at this time in order that they may retain their self-respect and be prepared to face the future with courage and determination, in order to overcome the obstacles now confronting them.

It is for this purpose that we appear before you to-day as representatives of the farmers of Saskatchewan, and respectfully request that the assistance now being given be further extended in the form of a direct cash payment to compensate these farmers for a small portion of their very heavy losses. There has been a heavy loss on their part as represented in their labour, wear and tear on machinery, depreciation of capital involved, and taxes where the same have been paid or allowed to accumulate, all of which have been a dead loss to the farmer.

We wish at this time to extend our appreciation to the government for the assistance which has been given to Saskatchewan through the payment of a bonus of five cents per bushel on wheat as provided for in the act respecting wheat passed at the last session of parliament. This bonus is of material assistance to those farmers in the province who are fortunate enough to have a crop to market, although we are of the opinion that a bonus on the acreage basis would have been more acceptable to a greater number of people under present conditions. We realize at the same time that certain difficulties would arise in arranging for payment on this basis, but believe these difficulties were not insurmountable and that they could have been overcome. As an example of how the present bonus applies to producers of wheat in Saskatchewan we might cite an imaginary case of two brothers, one living in the Melfort district in the north, and one living in the district surrounding Avonlea in the south. We will assume that the brother living at Melfort had two hundred acres in crop on which he had an average yield of thirty bushels to the acre. He receives from the federal treasury by way of bonus the sum of three hundred dollars, in addition to having for sale approximately six thousand bushels of wheat. The other brother has cropped a similar acreage but has had no return by reason of a crop failure and is entitled to no bonus under the regulations as they exist at the present time. This is inequitable if the purpose of the said legislation is to foster and encourage the agricultural portion of our population to continue farming their land. If it is a question of assisting only one of these two parties we submit that the one party under the present arrangement has been assisted and the brother most entitled to encouragement and assistance receives nothing.

We are not losing sight of the fact that the payments now being made are a bonus on wheat production. In might be submitted that under ordinary circumstances and with the return of normal economic conditions both in Canada and in the world at large, no bonus is necessary to encourage the farming industry, that the necessity for such a bonus only arises in times of economic disturbance such as those through which we are passing and that the bonus was proposed to encourage and assist those whose whole earnings were invested in this particular undertaking. Such being the purpose of the act, we submit that it is not functioning towards that end—that farmers who should be encouraged and assisted at the present time, and those who during the past two or three years have, owing to conditions over which they had no control, operated at a loss, in many cases a very serious one. The remedy which we claim to have discovered is to be found in the proposition which we lay before the cabinet to-day.

The 1931 seeded wheat acreage of Saskatchewan is placed at 13,881,000 acres. Statistics of the provincial department of agriculture indicate that the average wheat yield for the past ten years' period in the province is 16½ bushels per acre. Under normal conditions we would have a probable wheat crop of 222,076,500 bushels and after deducting 21 million bushels to take care of our 1932 seed requirements, we would have an aggregate of approximately 200 million bushels for sale, and Saskatchewan farmers would have received from the five cent bonus an amount approximating $10,400,000. No doubt when the bonus question was first considered by the government, the finance department were aware that such an amount would be required for the purpose mentioned. As a result of climatic conditions we find that our yield has been greatly reduced and our present estimated wheat yield for 1931 is set at 101,000,000 bushels, so that after deducting seed requirements we have 80 million bushels for market, and four million dollars will be the amount paid under the five cent bonus. Or, in other words, the amount payable under the scheme will be $6,400,000 less than it would have been had crop conditions been normal.

It was the intention of parliament that it was in the national interest of Canada that assistance in the form of a cash bonus to western farmers should be granted, and it was stated in the debate on the bill that such assistance would have an admirable effect on the morale of the people and that it would greatly lessen the amount which the government would be called upon to contribute in the form of direct relief. We submit that any money which may be paid out in the form of a cash bonus per acre will relieve to almost an equal extent the direct relief contribution of the federal government in Saskatchewan. The bonus on the bushel basis has resulted in payments to those who in many instances do not require relief in that they have a crop to market and are not under the necessity of purchasing large supplies of fodder and seed grain, while those who have had a crop failure and most urgently need assistance have not received aid except in the form of relief roadwork and direct relief through advances of fodder, fuel, food, clothing, etc. all of which is expected to be repaid. It might further be pointed out that the roadwork program carried out resulted in a number of farmers leaving their homes for the purpose of working on roads to secure funds sufficient to take care of their families, while at the same time their farms suffered as a consequence through lack of cultivation, and additional labour would be entailed in preparing the land for seed in 1932, which will more than offset the amount which they have been able to earn from roadwork.

Believing that a measure of relief other than that at present provided for is desirable to enable the farmers in the drought area to continue in residence and operate their farms, we are requesting assistance from the federal government in the following manner.

1. That the dominion government provide for a bonus in the drought areas on the seeded acreage for the year 1931, the basis for payment to be one dollar per acre where the crop was a total failure, and where a partial crop has been harvested and the bonus of five cents per bushel has not resulted in the farmer receiving a bonus equal to one dollar per acre, that an additional bonus be paid so that a minimum of one dollar per acre may be established regardless of the yield per acre.

2. That the payment of this bonus be made at the earliest possible date in order that it may be utilized for the purpose of purchasing seed and feed for 1931 spring seeding purposes and for taking care of the human necessities for the winter months, thereby relieving the Saskatchewan relief commission of the necessity of advancing relief to those who from the one dollar per acre bonus would be enabled to take care of their own requirements.

3. That such payment be made only to the grower, and be subject to the same restrictions as to exemption from garnishee, assignment, etc., as is provided for under the regulations governing payment of the bonus under an act respecting wheat.

4. That the information necessary to enable the government to make such payment be secured through the offices of the various rural municipalities in the affected area.

5. That the parliament of the Dominion of Canada, at the next session, give careful consideration to the urgent necessity for an extension of the bonus system for the year 1932, and to the advisability of having the bonus paid on the acreage basis instead of on the bushel basis.

In connection with suggestion number four, we would suggest that each grower might submit to the secretary of the municipality in which he resides a sworn statement of his seeded acreage for the year, this statement to be reviewed by the council of the municipality and the relief officer of the Saskatchewan relief commission in their district, and that a certificate of their approval be endorsed on the application before payment is recommended. It might be pointed out that the greater portion of the municipalities in the area affected are under the operation of the Saskatchewan municipal hail insurance scheme, and the municipality has a record of the seeded acreage of all parcels of land which have not been withdrawn from the operations of the municipal hail insurance act. These acreages are authentic in that they were reported before June 10, and it is on the owner's statement of acreage in crop that the municipal hail rates are levied. Consequently it would not be to the farmer's advantage to report an acreage in excess of that actually sown. Further confirmation, if necessary, could be secured from the census returns. There would be no cost to the government in so far as the securing of information on this basis is concerned, as we have the assurance of municipal officials that they will take care of any necessary cash outlay for securing the required statistical information to enable payment to be made.

From the figures quoted it is evident that our wheat production in Saskatchewan this year is about forty-four per cent of normal, and if the same percentage applies to the acreage basis our proposal would call for payment of fifty-six per cent of 13,881,000 acres or a total outlay on the wheat acreage of $7,773,360. The total seeded acreage of other grains is as follows:

	Acres
Oats	4,660,000
Barley	1,459,000
Fall Rye	562,000
Spring Rye	107,000
Flax	458,000
Total coarse grain acreage	7,246,000

The percentage of loss of the coarse grains crop is not so great as wheat for the reason that seeding of same was later in the season and the rainfall during the latter part of July in some districts materially assisted growth. A reasonable estimate of the crop loss in coarse grains would be forty per cent, or approximately three million acres. This amount, added to our above estimate of the amount which would be payable in respect of the seeded wheat acreage gives a total of $10,773,360.

When our proposal was submitted to Honourable R. B. Bennett and Honourable Robert Weir at Regina in the month of August and was later refused by the premier, we undertook to secure an expression of opinion from the farmers of the province regarding the matter. For this purpose a series of meetings were held at various strategic points throughout the province at which the proposal was placed before the people for discussion and consideration. In every instance unanimous approval was given and we were strongly urged to again take the matter up with the federal cabinet and to press for reconsideration of their previous unfavourable decision. We further have in our office and present to you to-day resolutions and petitions from various public bodies throughout the province of Saskatchewan supporting our application. Approximately two hundred rural municipal councils have by resolution given their approval and the petitions submitted herewith contain the names of upwards of five thousand farmers. In addition, many resolutions have been received from individual ratepayers' meetings of the municipalities. Resolutions and petitions have also been received from various other organizations such as ratepayers' associations, cooperative trading associations, boards of trade, and councils of urban municipalities.

In presenting this request to the government we are confident that our application for a bonus on the acreage basis has the support of practically one hundred per cent of the people of the province of Saskatchewan, regardless of whether they are resident in the drought areas or not. Other areas of the province fortunate enough to have a crop to market this year also support our request. We therefore respectfully urge that this matter again be carefully considered by your cabinet, and assure you that a decision to grant our request would be most favourably received by the people of the province we represent.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): The greater part of the problem facing the government in connection with agriculture to-day is chiefly due, in my opinion, to the extraordinary decline in the prices of farm commodities as compared with those of manufactured and other products. The last report of the Bank of Nova Scotia clearly pointed out this fact, and it was also made evident in the report of a year ago. An examination of the statistics in this connection will indicate that prices of farm products have declined from 35 per cent to 40 per cent, and in some cases even more, while wholesale prices have declined from 20 per cent to 25 per cent at the most, and retail prices from 11 per cent to 15 per cent. Undoubtedly it was a recognition of this extraordinary disparity between the price level of agricultural commodities and that of the goods the farmers must buy that was an influence in inducing the administration a year ago to institute this so-called five cent bonus. The question was discussed in this house, and at that time some speakers on the government side described it as an alleviation by way of reduction in freight rates, that is, that it was supposed to pay a part of the cost of freight. Others said it was a measure of direct relief; others described it as a bonus, while many people throughout the country have looked upon it as a straight gift. It was also explained as compensation for the tariff, but no one with any sanity could ever regard a five cent bonus on wheat as a compensating adjustment for the tariff. There is no doubt in my mind on that point. It would require many times that amount per bushel, under present price levels, to recompense the farmers for the enormous costs in connection with tariff adjustments of this and previous years.

The point I want to make is that the government cannot solve the present problem of agricultural conditions by mere miserable bonuses or bounties. If applied on a sufficiently large scale to one branch of industry such a scheme might afford temporary relief, but that could be done only at the expense of the taxpayers of the whole country. This bonus in the long run falls on the backs of the taxpayers and comes ultimately out of those classes that are the least organized and the most unprotected in regard to their own price levels. We have no power over the price levels of our own commodities. It has been alleged that at one time we attempted to secure this by organization of the wheat pools, but no effort was made—and I have the word of every officer of the wheat pools—to try unnecessarily or unduly to increase the price level. The whole object of wheat pooling was to try to eliminate many of the intervening costs in the actual handling and marketing of grain and so to improve the position of the grain grower. But so long as the farmers of this country must depend on export markets for the principal bulk of their commodities, and so long as export market prices govern prices in this country, nothing in the way of bonuses is any answer to the problem facing us.

I have just received one or two letters in connection with this matter. It is true that in certain districts that had very large or reasonably large crops there was an expression of appreciation of this five cents a bushel cheque that came along. Undoubtedly it may have helped some of these men to pay their threshing bills. But the fact of the matter is that even with the bonus the price received by the farmer was far below the actual cost of production, and this gave no recognition whatever to general agricultural conditions. The result is that to-day agriculture as a whole is in a worse position than it was a year ago. I have a letter dated January 12, from Redland, Alberta, in which the following statement is made:

> I will cite the case of one farmer which will illustrate that of many others. This man threshed enough wheat for his spring seeding and has been compelled to sell this wheat in order to merely live through the winter. He said they had been going to bed at dark to save the price of kerosene. Of course there are other farmers who didn't thresh any wheat.
>
> Now I am aware that you understand this impossible situation as well as I. You see the man who sells his wheat is not permitted to get seed from the government even though he has nothing left. Surely this situation can be righted. Comparing him with the man who raised a bumper crop and received a bonus besides should be sufficient.
> Another matter freely discussed was the fact that people in this drought area are being pressed to the limit for collections by oil and machinery companies, and even the banks. The method of compounding interest by some of these collectors would make Shylock look like a philanthropist.

That last statement touches one crucial aspect of the problem in which undoubtedly the government could be of material assistance to us. I urge upon the administration the calling of a federal conference of all the mortgage companies, loan companies and banks in order to find out whether or not the private financial interests in Canada are willing to undertake to carry their share of this load of depression. It is utterly unfair to ask the primary producer, whether he be farmer or fisherman, to carry this gigantic load of increasing interest rates—not decreasing rates—in the face of existing conditions. I have another letter which comes from the acute drought district. And may I at this stage suggest to the government that we in Alberta feel that there has not been fair treatment of the drought area in that province as compared with the treatment meted out, poor though it may have been, to the farmers in Saskatchewan. Our province has not had any share of that 100 per cent relief granted by the federal government. An hon. gentleman suggests that we are not Tory enough. Well, I am rather proud of that; I hope we shall never be Tory enough in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. But I have this to say. In common with my hon. friend from Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and my hon. friend from Medicine Hat

(Mr. Gershaw), I represent a constituency which is almost entirely within the drought area. Last year and the year before there were very small crops and very low prices, and this year we were almost completely wiped out. Practically the entire area is a total failure. These men have nothing to sell for which they will receive a profit, and how they will finance this year's operations, without any cash in their pockets, is a problem which they cannot solve. Now if agriculture is to be regarded in the future as the principal industry of this country, it is vitally necessary that this government should undertake a definite scheme now, and not later, to see that these men have, by some means or other, sufficient resources to secure the necessities for seeding and harvesting operations for this year. They have no resources whatever, but that is not because they have not gone into mixed farming. To the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) let me say that I have long held the view that those who attempted to explain conditions in western Canada by saying that we had no diversified farming but were putting all our eggs in one basket were speaking exceedingly stupidly or without a sufficient consideration of the facts. The fact is that per head of population we produce more diversified products in western Canada than are produced in any other part of the dominion. But what of it? Suppose we embraced wholeheartedly the suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture with regard to diversified farming.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Will the hon. member inform the house when I have ever made any statement with regard to diversified farming in western Canada, either in this house or anywhere else?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have not the statement at the moment but my impression was that the hon. gentleman has on many occasions advocated diversified farming.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At no time, as far as I am aware, have I ever advocated diversified farming as the cure-all for the ills of western Canada or of any other part of the country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am glad to hear the minister say that, and I sincerely trust that the newspapers will interpret his statement correctly this time. He is quite right; it is not a cure-all and will not even modify conditions at the present time. The only effect of diversified farming at the present time is that the farmer may be able to live a little longer under this rotten system of injustice than he otherwise might. That is all; he can drag out a miserable existence on the products he is raising at a loss. Under date February 11, 1932, the following letter has come to hand:

> This district on the whole in 1931 did not thresh as many bushels of wheat as was sown, and the complete failure of oats, barley and rye forced a great number of farmers to drive a portion of their live stock great distances to irrigated districts and trade or exchange them, usually at a sacrifice, for feed to keep the remainder of their stock alive.
> The 1931 crop failure, following as it did the light crop and poor prices of 1929 and 1930 which reduced the farmer to a point financially where he had to put forth every effort to finance seeding of the 1931 crop, places him in a position where his hardships can hardly be exaggerated.

I know they cannot be.

> The prices of the farm produce at the present time are:
> Eggs: 10 cents per dozen.
> Butter: 8 cents per pound.
> Cattle: 2 cents per pound.
> Hogs: 2½ cents per pound.

With the price levels as given in this letter, and which I know prevail in the district spoken of in the southern part of my constituency, it is utterly hopeless for these unfortunate farmers to expect to carry on during this year. They have not been able to obtain a sufficient revenue from the small herds of stock or flocks of poultry to keep body and soul together, much less to buy the necessary clothing for themselves and their children.

Under these circumstances, I submit that an entirely new agricultural policy involving a change in other directions is also required. So long as this government continues, as have preceding governments, to press down upon the primary producer who is carrying the load of the development of industrialism, just so long will agriculture be placed under a handicap and sooner or later it will vanish. This government through the imposition of unfair customs duties has increased unnecessarily our difficulties; it has succeeded in pegging the prices of manufactured products while we have had to take what we can get in the foreign markets. So convinced of this fact was the annual convention of the United Farmers of Alberta, that this year it passed the following resolution:

> Whereas, the fiscal policy known as protection or a protective tariff which has been on trial in Canada for over fifty years since its inauguration in 1879, has belied every promise of its promoters, both then and since, and has utterly failed to promote the general well-being of the people of Canada and has developed instead a most pernicious maldistribution of our wealth, and is on this account immediately responsible for that disparity in market values as expressed in present day prices, which exists between what the farmer sells and what he buys, which disparity is one of the principal causes of the present industrial debacle and the general economic depression;

Be it therefore resolved, that the time has come for an immediate all round reduction in our custom duties to the intent that within a period of not less than five years every feature and constituent of this barbaric economic superstition be eliminated from the fiscal policy of our country.

Mr. ARTHURS: Does the hon. gentleman endorse that?

An hon. MEMBER: Who wrote it?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am informed that it was written by a well known Presbyterian minister in the constituency of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). In itself, it is a tribute not only to the intelligence but to the penmanship of the people of that constituency.

There are many other factors which affect agriculture, but at the present time the two principal ones are, first, the enormous load of debt and interest charges and, second, the unfair position in which agriculture is placed in relation to other producers of manufactured goods. Unless there is a modification downwards of our capital obligations plus an elimination if possible, or at least a considerable reduction in interest rates, I venture to predict that it will be difficult to bring about a recovery of agriculture in western Canada. This prediction may be pessimistic and gloomy, but it is the fact.

No new markets have been discovered to extend the sale of our products. Foreign markets are rapidly narrowing due to the stupid nationalism of certain European countries, in which stupidity we are now the supreme participator. How this country expects to continue to keep alive an industrial expansion which has been the result of available foreign markets by a policy of restriction, by continuing a stupid fiscal policy which does not operate, is beyond my understanding. Until this administration about faces with its fiscal policy and either by international agreement or by frank action on its own part attempts to break down the barriers between nations or to open up new markets for our products, there is but little hope for the future of agriculture in Canada.

I grant that the modification of our policy in regard to banking and credit and the creation of national control and planned distribution of our whole monetary machine will have a healthy and salutary effect upon the internal consumption of manufactured goods, but unfortunately agriculture is not in the same position. We must continue to sell abroad the great bulk of our commodities. Take wheat alone; in a normal year we can expect a crop of 450,000,000 to 500,000,000 bushels. Of that crop we sell abroad all but 150,000,000 bushels. It might be possible to increase internal consumption by 25,000,000 or 50,000,000 bushels, but that still leaves an enormous surplus to be shipped overseas and for which surplus we must take a price determined by international competition in the limited foreign markets available. Even a financial reform along the lines advocated by those of us in this corner of the house can have but little real effect upon market conditions. Unless this government undertakes a drastic alteration in its policy with regard to international trade it will be deliberately damning agriculture to a steady decline.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Long Lake): Mr. Speaker, this debate seems to be an attempt to discover whether or not the farmers of western Canada are satisfied with the relief which has been granted, first, in the form of the five cent bonus on wheat grown last year, and, second, by means of the measures adopted to apply in those territories where the bonus was not paid. As I understand it, some $10,000,000 has been paid out to the farmers of western Canada through this bonus. I have yet to meet or hear of a farmer who refused to accept that five cent bonus. I never knew of a system to be put into force which gave greater satisfaction than this. No one has made any money out of the administration of this bonus; it is not a rich man's job at all. Hundreds of thousands of farmers have benefited, and I have yet to hear of a single instance where the money was misapplied, misappropriated or misdirected. The government is deserving of congratulation upon the business methods pursued in the handling of this bonus.

During the early part of last session this five cent bonus was discussed, by many Saskatchewan members and others. At that time none of us had any intimation of the calamity which was to occur because of the drought which affected many portions of the west. We were very glad to be granted this bonus and at that time it was understood that it would apply to the whole province of Saskatchewan. As far as the intentions of the government were concerned, there was no thought of discrimination. Later on a very large area covering some 200 municipalities become badly drought-stricken, and it was evident that the five cent bonus would not apply to them, because there was nothing on which that five cent bonus could be paid. What was to be done? Were we to ask the government or was the government to ask parliament to abandon the whole proposition because some 200 municipalities out of probably 1,000 would be unable to secure any benefits under this plan?

The only course for the government to pursue was to carry on along the lines already adopted. In spite of criticism we decided what we were going to do and we did it. Then, when this new drought condition arose, it became the duty of the government and of parliament to devise new methods to meet that new condition. That was done. It was decided that a relief commission should be appointed to administer relief affairs in those areas. That has been carried out. The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) has presented a new proposal, namely, that this dollar per acre scheme should be handled by two different bodies, by the municipalities and the relief commission. It is impossible for one and the same thing to be handled by two different bodies.

Mr. VALLANCE: My hon. friend must have misunderstood me. My whole argument was based on the memorandum presented to the government by the Rural Municipalities Associations, so I could not make any such statement as he suggests.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): But you wanted to get a finger in the pie and you tried to get it in. The man who suggested that, I do not care who he is, is a ranker Grit than you are, if you know what that is. You want two different bodies to handle one affair and that cannot be done successfully.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to address the chair.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, I should have been addressing you at the time except that I was answering the hon. member's question.

You cannot have two different bodies handle the same affair, so the government was well advised when it instructed the commission to proceed to carry out the relief measures in those areas. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) said that the relief measures were not adequate. That depends upon one's interpretation of the word "adequate." I might think I was well paid if I received $3,600 a year while some other member might think he was not. But there are occasions when one has to be satisfied. The people in those districts will be satisfied to be carried through this winter until springtime so that they can again get busy and restore things to their normal condition. Has the government carried out this policy?

[Mr. W. D. Cowan.]

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): My hon. friend thinks he knows more about the matter than I do. I say they have done it. To-day the relief commission is operating with entire satisfaction and I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to correct that statement. Never before in the west has there been a business organization which has handled things better than this one has done. It is the cleanest administration I ever saw in my life. I see it working every day.

Mr. VALLANCE: Do you want to enter into a discussion of that?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then put a motion on the order paper so that we may have an opportunity. You are issuing a challenge.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Address the chair. My hon. friend does not like me to address him directly. I do not wonder at it.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member is absolutely right.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): The relief commission operating in those areas is the most complete relief organization I ever saw. They have disbursed millions of dollars. We must remember the extent of the country. There were more than 200 municipalities to be covered and a new organization had to be created. There were 250,000 people, who were scattered over hundreds of miles, thrown into a state of destitution and they had to be provided for. The facts had to be ascertained; men had to be appointed and committees had to be formed in those different areas. This took time and at the beginning hon. gentlemen had their opportunity, but they were not equal to their job. While this preliminary work was being done, the people were in a state of dismay; they did not know what was ahead of them; so far as they could see, nothing was being done. But the committee set to work and created their organization. First they laid down their plans, and then, having laid down their plans, they proceeded slowly, surely and in a most conservative way to carry them out.

Mr. VALLANCE: I rise to a point of order. What has this to do with the dollar-an-acre scheme?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Long Lake is in order.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): When my hon. friends bring this up as a substitute for the plan that we now have, I do not wonder they are in a quandary; they have no argument. Let them keep quiet and we shall finish the job.

I have described the situation as it is and, as I say, the operations of the relief commission have been carried out successfully. I think it is well the people should know this, because the money is coming out of the public treasury. It was decided that the outlying posts should be the first places covered in order that there would be no trouble in such areas should a blizzard suddenly come up and catch them unawares. After the outlying parts were covered, they gradually crept in and covered the areas closer in according to their drought-stricken condition.

This is the result. Three weeks ago a gentleman in Regina who travels constantly throughout southern Saskatchewan, who knows conditions there and who has no personal interest in the matter, said to me: "Cowan, if a single child had died of starvation in the province of Saskatchewan, wouldn't the Grits have raised a deuce of a holler?" There has not been a single death through starvation or neglect. The administration has been excellent. Not very long ago a big farmer accosted me in a village in my constituency. He said: "There is my farm; I have put $30,000 into that farm and it is not worth anything now to me. I have not a dollar and I cannot get one, but the relief commission is supplying me and my family with what I require and I am taking everything from them with thankfulness." That is the spirit in which the people out there are receiving the commission. They know that the commission is doing the best they can. I would also point this out to my hon. friends across the way. I know that they can never see a day ahead. The Liberals never can and never could. They want all the money spent right now.

There is one thing more we know, Mr. Speaker. We know that these people are being carried now. We know also that if we spend millions and millions now, they will all be wasted unless something else happens. These people must be provided with the means of carrying on their operations next summer. Seed has to be provided. With my hon. friends across the way knowing all that which is yet before us, staring us in the face, and it will cost at the very least $15,000,000, would they have us spend all our money now, and if so, where are the farmers going to get their seed? All these things have to be taken into consideration, and we have to reserve a sufficient amount in our treasuries to carry our people. But a year from now our hon. friends opposite will look back and will then admit that we, the Conservative party, have dealt with the people out there very generously and have done our work, and have done it mighty well.

Mr. W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw): I had not intended to speak on this resolution and would not have done so but for some of the remarks made on the other side of the house. The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) stated that there had been some inequity owing to the fact that the owners of the land who were perhaps getting two-thirds of the crop got none of the five cent a bushel bonus. That provision of the act I think was one of its wisest. The situation is simply this: In western Canada perhaps 75 per cent of the farms are mortgaged, and in a great many cases the original owner who mortgaged the land to a mortgage company is now operating the land on a lease from the mortgage company, and had it not been for the provision in the act that the actual producer of the grain shall get that five cent a bushel bonus a large part of the bonus would have gone to the mortgage companies.

Mr. VALLANCE: We argued that to the government last year.

Mr. BEYNON: Then why does the hon. gentleman try to show that there is inequity because the owner does not always get the bonus?

Mr. VALLANCE: If the hon. gentleman will read what I said, I think he will agree that he is wrong in the statement he is now making. I was not making any criticism, but I was placing before the house the standpoint that was placed before me.

Mr. BEYNON: But the hon. member gave his own case as an example.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, but I was not complaining in my own case.

Mr. BEYNON: Then why criticize at all?

Mr. VALLANCE: I was not criticizing at all.

Mr. BEYNON: Then why mention it at all? The hon. member for South Battleford also referred to the document that had to be signed before the people in south Saskatchewan could get relief. He waved this document before the house and said: This is what the man had to sign, virtually sign away his birthright before he could get relief. But he made no criticism of that document, and I do not think any member of this house can read it and say that the commission or the government could have done anything less and protected the funds which this house voted to the government to carry on that work. There is no question in the document that should not be answered by a man who is seeking relief. There is no information asked for which the government should not have before granting relief. Why then wave this document before the house and say: This is what the man had to sign, practically sign away his birthright before he could get relief?

A good deal has also been made of the fact that these people had to sign notes for the return of the money before they could get relief. Let me say that as soon as this question of relief was mooted in the house I began to receive from the constituency of Moose Jaw telegrams urging me to represent to the government that some provision for repayment should be made. Otherwise the farmers of that community would not accept this relief at the hands of the government. That is the spirit of the people in that district, and that is why that provision was made in the act.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) made a statement which gave a very wrong impression to this house. His statement was to the effect that the province of Alberta had not received from this government the same consideration in respect to relief as had the province of Saskatchewan. He stated that Alberta had not received any of this 100 per cent relief. There are certain portions of Saskatchewan, the greater portion, in fact, which did not receive any of this 100 per cent relief. Saskatchewan received precisely the same consideration as the province of Alberta. One section of the province of Saskatchewan did receive 100 per cent relief from this government, and not from the local government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask a question? Is there any portion of Alberta that received 100 per cent relief for agriculture?

Mr. BEYNON: I am just going to explain why they did not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That was all I said.

Mr. BEYNON: The hon. member said that they had not received fair treatment as compared with Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Exactly.

Mr. BEYNON: I am going to show how they received equal treatment. The basis of relief was this: Saskatchewan was divided into three parts. Part A comprised those portions of the province of Saskatchewan which had had three successive crop failures; part B, where there had been two successive crop failures, and part C, where there had been one crop failure. There was no part of the province of Alberta which had had three successive total crop failures, and only in that respect and for that reason was Alberta treated differently from the province of Saskatchewan. The basis was precisely the same in each province, but no part of the province of Alberta had suffered from three successive crop failures as had many parts of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member is not well informed on Alberta. There are several districts there which have had three successive crop failures.

Mr. BEYNON: The relief was granted on the reports received from the province of Alberta, from the government of the province and from the municipalities of the province. Every effort was made to deal absolutely fairly with all parts of all three western provinces. The only difference that was made was that in Saskatchewan where there had been three successive crop failures 100 per cent relief was granted. I rose simply to correct those few points which have been raised on the other side of the house.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I doubt very much, Mr. Speaker, if agriculture can tax itself into prosperity. Looking at the estimates we find that one of the big increases this year is an increase in interest of $30,000,000, which looks as if we could not tax ourselves into prosperity.

On general principle I am opposed to the idea of a bonus, but speaking for Ontario farmers, if the five cents a bushel bonus on wheat will keep the western wheat farmer growing wheat I think it would be worth while to the farmer of Ontario in order to keep the western farmer out of mixed farming, which is ruining the Ontario farmer. So looking at it from that point of view, not that it makes any difference because the government does what it likes, I suppose for the time being we had better support the bonus because if any more mixed farming products come upon the markets of Ontario from the west things are going to be even worse for the farmers of Ontario. I had never believed that mixed farming was the solution of western conditions. True, it would give the western farmer more to eat, since that is all he has at the moment, but it would also give him more lines on which he could lose money. Mixed farming suits Ontario, and if the prairie provinces go into mixed farming it will be very disastrous for this province. So, speaking for my agricultural constituency, for the present I support the bonus on wheat. I do not believe in it, but it may for the time being keep the western wheat farmer running after the five cents and not encourage him to do the thing that we do not want him to do.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): It had not been my intention, Mr. Speaker, to participate in this debate, but when I hear so many hon. members on the other side making a political handle of the resolution I have to take a hand in it too. I represent a purely agricultural constituency in western Canada; it has not got a single smokestack in any part of it. When I am speaking of conditions in that constituency I do so from personal experience. My life has been forged on the anvil of experience, and not in a university as was my friend's from Bow River (Mr. Garland); I never had the opportunity of even scratching my back up against a college wall; but when it comes to practical experience on the prairies, probably I have had as much as any one of my hon. friends opposite.

To substantiate what I am going to say I want to read this little clipping which I cut from the Manitoba Free Press a few days ago:

Forty Years Ago To-day

H. A. Mullins, well known live stock exporter—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MULLINS: That is all right.

—had taken hold of the well known Binscarth stock farm at Binscarth, Manitoba.

That was forty years ago. For forty years I have been farming on the prairies of western Canada, and probably what I shall say will have some little weight to keep up the spirits of some of those whining Jerusalem demigods. I remember well in the old days on the prairies when produce was much cheaper than it is to-day. I remember coming to the city of Toronto with a trainload of hogs. I came under the pressure of that multimillionaire that my hon. friends opposite talk about and I sold the shipment for four cents a pound. What happened? The following year hogs were worth eight to eight and a half cents a pound. I say in an advisory way to the men on the prairies: don't go out of hog raising; don't listen to these whiners from the other side; and don't go out of live stock raising; keep in; the best opportunity in the world can be taken advantage of at the present time. Our friends opposite say that we on this side of the house did not do anything for the west last session. There are men in the constituency of Marquette who are offering thanks to the government for that five cent bonus. It helped them out. Then you will find another man with political leanings not favourable to this side who will say: "Oh, yes, the five cents was quite all right, but you didn't give Smith the five cents. Why didn't you"? I said, "How many bushels did you have"? He said, "I had four thousand bushels of wheat." I said: "Why didn't you divide up with Smith"? No, there was nothing doing along that line. He would not divide up with Smith, no; he took the two hundred dollar bonus that the government gave him, but because of his political leanings he had to whine about the five cents subvention in order to find fault with the government. If the angel Gabriel came down he would not satisfy some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side! That is a well known fact. But I do know some hon. members on that side who are big enough men to acknowledge that the five cent bonus was all right—but they don't say much about it.

Our friends opposite say that we on this side of the house did nothing for the west. Let me tell something for your information—and this is from personal experience, not from mere hearsay. I advise the western farmer to keep in the live stock industry. There is a twelve dollar rate out of Montreal to England. Did you from Bow River say anything about it? Why not? There is a $10.85 rate out of Montreal for stockers, and if it was not for the depreciation of the British pound sterling and their clamouring in Scotland—but I don't want to talk about the Celt, I want to deal with these wheat growers. They have been troublesome all the way down from the days of Cain and Abel. You know that men came to the prairies and wanted to make their wheat farming a steam plough proposition. They would not look at a hand plough, they would not look at a team of oxen.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have used a team of oxen many a time.

Mr. MULLINS: The member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) knows the situation very well, he has had experience, and if he is broadminded enough he will be prepared to give credit to this side of the house for the five cent subvention. They wanted a steam plough proposition, and they tore the bunch grass all to pieces until the land is of no use.

Mr. VALLANCE: Might I suggest to the member for Marquette that if we go into live stock we will not get the five cent bonus?

Miss MACPHAIL: Keep to wheat growing.

Mr. MULLINS: I ask my friends opposite to read Mr. John W. Dafoe's book on the Life and Times of Clifford Sifton. Sir Clifford Sifton was one of the cleverest men who sat in this house. He tells us that when they took from the rancher the land south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway they were wrong. The member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) knows that. They are working now on the weaknesses of the poor farmers. I think of the Weyburn district in the early days. I think of the day when the horse I was riding went into the cracks and nearly turned somersaults two or three times on my way to Weyburn and Yellow Grass. Take the country south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway all the way from Swift Current to Medicine Hat, where I used to ranch. The settlers came in. God help them. I felt sorry for them. I told them "You cannot grow wheat in this country." But they went at it and ruined the land. I say to the Prime Minister "If you would use good judgment, move the poor settlers from that country to the country north of the main line, to the Peace River country." You may work your politics on the weaknesses of the poor fellow who is suffering on the land south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but you cannot get much support if you come up to Marquette where the farmers are all engaged in diversified farming. Yes, I should like to read this letter that I received to-day.

> We have great cause to thank kind Providence for the blessings we have received during the year. We had a fair crop of wheat, but oats and barley were poor. We have confidence in the country—we have prepared lots of good land for next year. We had to draw on what we had saved during the prosperous years,—

Now, get this:

> We had to draw on what we had saved during the prosperous years. It is hard times on a great number of farmers around here, they are so much in debt.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MULLINS: That is quite correct. If the gold were all around their feet they could not pick it up.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Read the rest of the letter.

Mr. MULLINS: Why do you laugh at these conditions? I know the conditions of the farmers on the prairies; I motored all over my constituency to observe them. The gentleman who sat here representing Marquette, Mr. Glen, sent up a whine and got behind a lady to send a challenge. He did not challenge me; he got a lady to write me a letter asking for a debate on better policies for western Canada. I will not get any woman to write—I will stay right out in the open. I will not ask any woman to write a letter, at a time like this, challenging anyone to a debate on better policies for western Canada. Now I want to finish this letter, which states:

> They never will be able to redeem themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: They put in their crop on the stubble; they are too lazy to plough it. They grow a mass of weeds, so how can they redeem themselves? I ask hon. members, will they ever get out of trouble? We have sow thistle and weeds all over the country because of poor farming, and then hon. gentlemen opposite try to make capital of it for the sake of party politics. I do not care if I never sit in the House of Commons again, but I came here to represent agriculture and I am going to do it fairly in spite of the man who got a country newspaper to write an article saying I travelled over Marquette at the end of a leash.

I did travel over the constituency of Marquette, and while doing so I stopped in to see one of my best Liberal friends in the town of Hamiota, the town in which my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) lived. He knows the man very well. I sat with him one day interviewing farmers and finding out their problems in order to come to this house prepared to tell hon. members of the difficulties confronting the western farmers at the present time. While I was sitting there a farmer drove up in his car and said: "I want ten gallons of gasoline." My friend said: "Go out and help yourself." In how many other places could that have happened? The farmer went out and filled his car, and later came in and sat down to discuss his problems with me. I found out the true situation in western Canada, and then one of the newspapers in that district published an article saying there were men in one town in my constituency who could get only $1 a load for wood, which they had to draw seven or eight miles, and wondered if I understood the situation. Why, I sat on the corner of the sleigh with the man who had the load of wood, and discussed the problem with him. I sat there with him for one hour. That is the situation, and hon. gentlemen opposite want to make capital out of it for the sake of politics.

Now let me speak on the question of relief. I have men in my constituency, though not a great many of them, who need relief. Let me tell you that Marquette is in fair shape financially, and Marquette thanks the government for what it has done with the five cent subvention. The government has come to the help of the farmers in that constituency. I have a list of the works the government are carrying on at the present time. I was surprised when I saw that list; I had no idea that all this was going on. The government have been fair to the people in that constituency in helping public works, and they thank the government.

Before I sit down I want to say that we shipped three cars of produce from Marquette to this area in southern Saskatchewan, the country that is supposed to be in such bad shape. Those goods were loaded in Marquette by horses. Understand me; horses drew this produce to the cars when it was being loaded, but at the other end it was unloaded by motor trucks. That is one of the things that is wrong. We make too much of motor trucks and motor cars, we need to go back to horses, and go a little slower. Some hon. member on this side of the house said that in 1925 Saskatchewan had 90 per cent of the mules in Canada in that district.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: I am referring to four-legged mules. If the farmers will go back to mules and horses they will be better off. There is too much gasoline being used; there are too many tractors. There is too much exploitation of the soil, with the farmers ripping the fibre out of it. I listened to the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) say, "We must have more fibre in the soil." That is right, but you drove out the men who were putting fibre in the soil; you drove out the real money-making industry of live stock, and it gave way to the farmers.

I am sorry for the farmers to-day; my sympathy goes out to them. I know of the hardships through which the farmer is going at the present time, but you cannot expect to rob the top six inches of rich, fertile soil, and then grow anything but weeds. Any man who has had practical experience, who has stood behind the plough and worked on the prairie, knows the truth of what I am saying. I ask the hon. member for South Battleford if that is not a fact. The fibre has been taken out all the way from Moosejaw to the Rocky Mountains. The land never should have been taken away from the ranchers; the leases never should have been cancelled. If you read the book written by John Dafoe you will find that Hon. Clifford Sifton made that prediction thirty years ago, and I made the same statement on the floor of this house in 1925.

I have taken up quite some time, and in concluding I wish to place one or two further statements on Hansard. To the farmers of the west I say, "Keep in the live stock and do not listen to these grain growers. Do not be carried away with the idea of growing wheat alone. You cannot live by bread alone, and you cannot live by growing wheat alone. Keep in the live stock, because the day will come when the markets will be opened and you will be able to ship to the British market. Prices will go up. It may be hard just now; you may be suffering from low prices, but from my years of experience I tell you to stay with the hog industry and the cattle industry. Feed cattle. If you read the old Bible you will find that the very best men in those days were in the cattle business."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: Is that not true? When Joseph was introducing his brethren to Pharaoh, did he not say, "These are men of flocks and herds"? I do not know what to call those gentlemen who are trading on the misfortune of the farmers, but I cannot sit here and see that sort of thing going on without a protest. Some of these gentlemen will not learn a lesson no matter how much you preach, but they are all wrong, and my advice to the people of western Canada is to go in for mixed farming. That is my advice; I impress upon them, not to get a professional man at the head of affairs. I do not want to say a word against my lawyer friends, but I say this: Do not get a professional man behind your endeavours but get a man whose life has been forged on the anvil of experience; otherwise your efforts will end in failure. I say that to the head of this government, to Mr. Beatty and to everyone else.

What about the cow scheme in Alberta? Let me ask hon. gentlemen who come from that province—What about the Duncan Marshall cow scheme which cost Alberta so much? In Saskatchewan you have the same condition, and in Manitoba, a lot of agricultural students directing affairs. What did they do in connection with the Winckler cow scheme? That enterprise cost Manitoba many dollars, and what happened? I suggest that hon.

gentlemen go to Quebec and study the old traditions there. In Quebec, when the old father was passing away, he gave to his daughter—

An hon. MEMBER: A cow.

Mr. MULLINS: Yes, an immortal cow that never died. If you followed the old traditions of that province you might get somewhere in western Canada, but you will do no good by going around the country and talking about the weakness of the poor grain grower in southern Saskatchewan and Alberta. I have here some verses that appeared in the Manitoba Free Press, and perhaps it might be well for me to read them. I asked the editor of that paper why he published an article like that. I told him that I had devoted the best part of my life to the improvement of live stock and farming generally in an endeavour to get away from exclusive grain growing, and I could not understand why he would write an article like this. This is what he wrote:

Now comes a new Moses, whose vision is strong,
To tell me the growing of wheat was all wrong.
That only in bacon, eggs, butter, or meat
Will I find the rich fortune I lost growing wheat.

Dear Colonel, pray pardon us if we refuse
To take your advice, but just do as we choose.
We prefer to grow wheat, even if we "go bust,"
Than be swineherds, or chore-boys, as you say we must.

Those are the kind of people who are ruining the country. For the forty years I have lived in that country, since the days of the buffalo, and after that experience I can assure the house that the best offering to-day is the good half-section in western Canada or the 200 acre farm in Ontario. To the mortgage companies, I say, "Keep your hands off the poor man." Some farmers have been inclined to be extravagant and have speculated in the stock market, and a number of them have gambled in grain. The result is that they are now in a very difficult position and some of them have given me stock certificates, which I have brought with me. They are not worth the paper they are written on. These unfortunate people have handed me these stock certificates and asked me to try to get them out of their trouble. Why do they find themselves in this position to-day? They have no credit reserve. I met one of my French Canadian friends and I asked him, "How are you getting on, Napoleon?" He said, "I am doing fine." I asked him how it was that so many people were not doing as well as he was. He replied: "A good father came here from Quebec and told me to get a reserve right away in '25, and I make a reserve and I have it right now." I say to the farmers of western Canada: Create a reserve now and when conditions improve you will be ready to face the next depression if a depression should ever come again. I can remember, Mr. Speaker, when as a boy I threw a bag of silver into my grandfather-in-law's buggy. He was buying cattle. At that time he was buying American silver for 50 cents on the dollar, and buying live stock with that silver. To-day our dollar has depreciated to such an extent that when we sell a shipment of cattle we receive, owing to the present rate of exchange, from $7 to $8 per head less than we did formerly. That, of course, is a very serious condition, but we have passed through worse times than we are now experiencing. In the years from 1890 to 1895 we experienced conditions that were far more serious, and it exasperates me to see men sitting back in silence and refusing to speak the truth as they know it. I do sympathize with the man that lives around Weyburn and Yellow Grass; as regard that steam plough proposition, I can only say I am sorry for them.

I do not want to take up the time of the house any longer, but I could not help speaking out on behalf of western Canada, the land I love and which I have lived in since the buffalo days. I have seen prosperous times there and I have no doubt that prosperity will return; and in order that this may come about I say to the people there: Create a reserve so that you will be able to meet bad times if ever they should come again.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I rise to take but a small part in the discussion of this resolution. Before I refer to the resolution itself I feel I must say something in reply to the speech which we have just heard from the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins). It ill becomes him or any other member in this house to cast a slur as he did on the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) on the score of that hon. gentleman's having seen the inside of a university. The hon. member for Marquette makes a boast of the fact that he has never been inside a university but was brought up in the hard school of experience. I need not say that anyone can see that the hon. gentleman was never inside a university. I take exception also to his insinuation with reference to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I have not the slightest doubt that what both the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Southeast Grey have said with regard to their constituencies is absolutely true. The hon. member for Bow River happens to come from a part of Alberta where probably the people are going through harder times than are being experienced in any other part of the province, and in what he stated to the house he was giving the absolute facts. I say, therefore, that it ill becomes any hon. member from any part of the country to doubt another member's word when giving his views with regard to the constituency he represents. The hon. member for Marquette boasts that he has been in that country for forty years, but he forgets that many of us have been there twenty-five and thirty years and have as great a right as he has to speak for western Canada. I have got rather tired now of hearing the hon. member professing to speak solely for the farmers of the west. The speech he has just delivered was filled with contradictions. He claims that conditions are so good in his particular constituency that the people there are well on the way to prosperity.

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. gentleman is making an incorrect statement, I said nothing of the kind. I stated that the people were not in a good position. The hon. member is making that statement for his own purposes.

Mr. SPENCER: I have no desire to misquote the hon. member, but I will throw back to him the remark he made to the hon. member who sits behind me, that he was making his speech for political purposes. We all know the condition which prevails in Manitoba. We do not blame this or any other government but state simply that the conditions in that province are as bad as prevail in any other western province.

Mr. MULLINS: I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member did not say that.

Mr. MULLINS: I did say that.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member did not lay stress upon the actual facts. Will he contradict the statement that in certain parts of Manitoba the price of barley last year was so low that it was burned in furnaces for heating purposes?

Mr. MULLINS: What part of Manitoba does the hon. member allude to?

Mr. SPENCER: I obtained that information from the daily press.

Mr. MULLINS: They used no barley for fuel purposes in Marquette.

Mr. SPENCER: Marquette must be in a better position than the rest of Manitoba. The hon. member speaks of the grain farmer as though he has no right to exist, as though he should not go into that type of business. I would remind him that more people in western Canada are carrying on diversified farming than those confining themselves solely to grain. The farmers who carry on straight grain farming do so because it pays. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) will not publicly advocate mixed farming as a panacea for all our ills. The farmer has just as much gray matter in his head as has any other man.

Mr. MULLINS: Absolutely.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The question under discussion was diversified farming; do not confuse the so-called diversified and mixed farming with balanced farming.

Mr. SPENCER: I do not quite follow the hon. minister. Those farmers in the prairie provinces who can go in for diversified farming are doing so. No man in his senses will destroy his farm for the fun of it, and it ill behooves any hon. member to increase the misunderstanding which exists unfortunately between eastern and western Canada by furthering the belief that farms are being destroyed through carelessness. When one considers that hogs fetch from 2 1-2 to 3 cents per pound, that cattle bring half the price they did two years ago, that butter is as low as 15 to 17 cents per pound as it was when I left Alberta, that eggs were selling at from 8 to 10 cents per dozen in the middle of this winter, he will recognize that there is not very much in mixed farming. I have spent sufficient of my time in replying to the speech of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins), but I felt I could not let his statements go unanswered as I considered he was very unfair, not only to hon. members on this side of the house but to the general farming communities of western Canada.

Statements have been made by hon. members who come from drought stricken areas. I happen to be fortunate enough to come from an area which was not stricken but which had an average crop of from 23 to 25 bushels per acre. However, certain areas were destroyed by hail, and it is in this connection that remarks apply directly to the resolution now before us. As everyone knows, grain this year is being produced at a loss. Some farmers had their harvest ready to cut when they were visited by hail; they had gone to the expense of producing the crop and just before they put their binder in the field or just after they had started cutting the hail swept down upon them. These farmers were left in the position of having gone to all the expense of raising a crop and then having practically nothing to take off. Having had their crops destroyed, they could not take advantage of the five cent bonus granted last year. A petition signed by a large number of farmers in the hail-swept areas was sent to the Department of Agriculture requesting action similar to that mentioned in the resolution. There is no doubt that something should be done in cases where all the expenses have been incurred and the crop destroyed just at maturity either by hail or other causes. No farming community which at any time finds great difficulty in making both ends meet can withstand this added difficulty.

Taxes have been coming in very slowly the last few years, but still less will be collected this coming year in such hailed areas. I do not think it is necessary for me to go into the details of this situation as they have been covered very fully by the hon. members for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and Bow River (Mr. Garland).

In reply to the contention put forward by the hon. member for Marquette and others that stockraising is the one thing which will bring prosperity to the farmers, I would state that I know of one association shipping cattle to Great Britain which has lost no less than $19,000 during the past few months because of the difference in exchange. Whenever the hon. member for Marquette rises to speak I always think of a certain type of man often referred to in western Canada, not a farmer but one who farms the farmer. I venture to state that if the hon. member is well off in this world's goods, and I believe he is, he has not been brought to that position because of what he actually made off the farm, but rather because of what he made off the farmer, possibly through selling large tracts of land to new Canadians. I mention this simply because it is time the condition of western Canada was recognized for what it is; Canada cannot afford to allow the great industry of agriculture to go down as it surely will do if something is not done to rectify the conditions under which we are living to-day.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) objected to this corner of the house because of the way they scratched their backs and howled; and out of the corner of his eye he looked at the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and, I think, referred to him as the howling demagogue from Jerusalem. I understand the hon. member for Bow River was born in Dublin, Ireland, and if that be so, he is the first Irishman who ever came out of Jerusalem. I believe, however, the hon. member for Marquette arose in his place to deal with this matter in a humorous vein rather than in the vein that has been suggested by this resolution, which is a specific one dealing with a specific subject. Most of the hon. members who have spoken during the past hour and a half have spoken about everything but that which is contained in the resolution.

The resolution refers simply to those farmers who were hailed out or who, through some other act of God, were unable to secure any advantage out of this five cent bonus that was legislated here last year. I do not rise to discuss the principle of the bonus or to support that principle; what I do wish to speak of is the inequitable manner in which the farmers of the west have been treated with respect to this legislation. Yesterday I asked an hon. member who, I believe, is a very brilliant lawyer, the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) what he thought about the bonus. He said that the bonus is nothing but a subvention to the farmer. I asked him whether he thought the bonus was a relief measure and he said that the bonus under no circumstances was legislated in this house as a relief measure. I cannot understand the difference between a bonus and a relief measure. If an industry in this country is in bad straits and needs help, the government gives it a bonus. Why give it a bonus if that industry is not in bad straits? On the same grounds if agriculture were not in bad straits, why should we legislate to give five cents for every bushel of wheat raised on the western prairies last year? In that respect I consider this five-cent piece was a relief measure to the farmers in the west. It was a relief measure to the extent that there was a great disparity between the price the farmer was getting for his products and the price he had to pay for other goods and services. It was an aid to the farmers of the west and in my estimation it certainly was a relief measure to aid those farmers who were not receiving an adequate price for their wheat.

The hon. gentleman referred to some hon. members as university graduates, or as men who scratched their backs on the walls of a university. If scratching one's back is necessary, I do not see any difference between scratching one's back on a university, or a church or a hall, or on the gatepost of some farm.

I have under my hand a resolution which was passed in my own district and which reads:

Whereas, all the hailed-out farmers are in the poorest financial position of any other Canadian farmer; and

Whereas, we will ultimately have to pay to the dominion treasury our share of the bonus now paid per bushel of wheat; and

Whereas, the bonus does not relieve the farmer who was hailed out and went to nearly as much expense in growing a crop; and

Whereas, this bonus had incurred an added burden on such farmers in that they have to pay five cents extra for all feed and seed; and

Whereas, the purchasing power of said farmers has been reduced to worse than nothing by reason of said disaster; therefore be it

Resolved, that the federal government make arrangements to pay a bonus of one dollar per acre on the hailed-out acreage of wheat and that such acreage be determined from the 1931 census returns.

I repeat that the question is not so much on the principle of the bonus as on the application of it. If the hailed-out farmer is not going to receive any benefit from this five-cent piece, I should like to know what alternative there is for those farmers who have been hailed out? In my district, to the south of me, there is a stretch of territory about 100 miles long and ten miles wide that has been hailed out; in the north there is another stretch of territory 100 miles long and ten miles wide that has also been hailed out. The people in those areas are receiving absolutely no benefit from the legislation parliament passed last year. I do not think this is fair to those farmers who, through no fault of their own, have no crops to take to the elevator and therefore do not receive the five-cent piece for each bushel haled there. I believe, in lieu of this five-cent piece, in lieu of this aid, the people who have been hailed out are entitled to some alternative to the legislation which was passed last year.

Mr. V. C. PORTEOUS (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the previous speaker, that much of the discussion has centred, not on the bonus but on other points that have arisen in the debate on the resolution which is at present before the house. The reason why last year legislation was enacted providing a bonus of five cents on wheat was that there were several complaints as to the price of wheat. I should like to direct the attention of the house to the fact that the price of wheat has materially increased in the last year, and I believe that average increase is in the neighbourhood of fifteen cents a bushel. I should like to point out also that during that period other agricultural products have decreased in price. Therefore if the wheat grower is to be bonused, other producers of agricultural products should also be bonused. We have heard complaints from northern Saskatchewan because they were not in relief districts; we have heard complaints from southern Saskatchewan because they did not receive a bonus, but so far as the debate has proceeded on this resolution, we have not heard complaints from the vast majority of the farmers in the rest of the dominion.

The question of relief has been spoken of in connection with this resolution. I am not in a position to comment upon that except that I believe that relief should be given in any area where there is no crop and where the farmer of necessity needs relief. As regards bonuses, I am not in favour of them, but if we are to bonus one branch of agriculture, we should bonus all branches of agriculture which are suffering just as much as the wheat grower. We should not single out the wheat grower and give him a bonus while the man who grows oats or other grain is not bonused. If the government is contemplating any further legislation in that regard the bonus should apply to all branches of agriculture and to all parts of the dominion.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): I am very sorry that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) has left the chamber. I hope he will avail himself of the first opportunity to make in his own constituency the same address that he made here this afternoon. Might I add that I am sure the opportunity will be afforded him almost any time at his convenience, and if there is any hiding to be done, I think it will be my hon. friend who will do it. In his discourse this afternoon he quite conveniently left out that part of his speech he usually makes where he takes around with him his cream can. I must confess that I cannot see that his speech had anything to do with the matter that is really under discussion this afternoon, namely, the application of the five cents a bushel bonus on wheat.

I listened yesterday to the very fine distinction made by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) with respect to the application of the five cents a bushel bonus on wheat and the giving of direct relief. If I understood him correctly, he placed the five cents a bushel bonus on one side, as applying to one particular need, and direct relief on the other, for another purpose. I have no objection whatever to that division. In fact, I think that is exactly how it has worked out. So far as the farmers of my own constituency are concerned they were mighty glad to receive the five cents a bushel bonus cheque with the signature of the Prime Minister upon it—that is, those who got it. But the problem is in taking care of the class of farmers who had some crop on which they could receive some money by way of the five cents a bushel bonus, as contrasted with the class of farmers dependent on direct relief. I could name a large number of farmers in my constituency who this year did not thresh as much grain as they sowed last spring. I could name other farmers who got less than 1,000 bushels of all kinds of grain from a half-section of land. This class of farmers could not participate in the five cents a bushel bonus on wheat simply because they had to keep all their grain for feeding purposes; nor on the other hand can they claim that they had a complete crop failure. I doubt very much if a crop that yields 1,000 bushels from a half-section is of any benefit at all. It might just as well be regarded as a complete crop failure. At the present time I know of several farmers in my constituency who are hauling two year old wheat straw for feeding purposes a distance of eight to twelve miles. I am told that along a certain highway running about twenty-five miles, thirty dead horses can be seen from the road. The local veterinary tells me that he has never before had as many calls to attend sick horses as he has this winter; and he attributes the sickness to lack of feed.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, we had an invasion of grasshoppers in our district last year. They covered quite a large area and did considerable damage. I am not sure that we really know how much damage they did to our grain. Whether or not these grasshoppers damaged our feed, such as we have, particularly roughage, to any great extent I do not know. The fact of the matter is that such feed as our district has does not seem to have substance, with the result that we are not getting results from the feeding it.

I have in mind also another district which previous to two years ago had really three successive crop failures, not from drought, not from drifting, but, as hon. members may be surprised to learn, from flooding. Here is the situation in that area. They had a fair crop last year and again this year, and on this year's crop they secured the five cents a bushel bonus, but having had two or three successive crop failures previous to that, and with the low price of grain prevailing, they are hardly in any better position than if they had had no crop at all this year. If these farmers had had a complete crop failure they would have been able to participate in direct relief, but as they had some crop, they must simply carry on as best they can, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that they are not carrying on very well. The farmers I speak of are between the divisions which the hon. member for Regina has described. They had a little crop, so it cannot be said they had a complete crop failure, but they did not have sufficient crop on which they could sell any appreciable amount of grain from which they could get the benefit of the five cents a bushel bonus. They have no money, they cannot borrow any. The municipalities in which they live are not in a position to assist them, and are certainly unable to meet the situation. More than that, the provincial government is not in a position to materially assist them. The particular municipalities that I have in mind—and I hesitate to refer to this—a year ago only collected something over 50 per cent of their taxes, and last year only in the neighbourhood of 30 per cent. It is very easy to see therefore that they are quite unable to meet the situation.

I have been in touch with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) on this matter, and I am satisfied that he realizes the situation that prevails. I know it is a very large problem, one with far-reaching effects, but I do want the house to appreciate the disadvantage suffered by the man who is in between the one who can qualify to receive some benefit from the five cents a bushel bonus and the man who has had a complete crop failure. He is in a very difficult position, and I know of my own knowledge that in many cases he is not able to carry on and put in a crop, let alone maintain his live stock until the grass grows, unless he receives some form of assistance. It is necessary to have feed shipped in from a distance, carload lots of hay and grain, and the freight charge increases the price about 30 per cent. Surely there is some opportunity for relief in that direction.

I hope before this debate closes the Minister of Agriculture or some member of the government will be able to tell the house of some policy which the government is prepared to adopt to relieve the situation which I have described. It is essential that something be done, and if we can look forward to some definite policy to meet the situation I for one will certainly give it my wholehearted support.

There is another matter in connection with the five cents a bushel bonus on wheat to which I might refer. We in the province of Manitoba produce ordinarily about 50 per cent, roughly speaking, of the barley grown in western Canada. That is an important item with us. Barley is one of our main cash crops, yet we are not in a position to receive anything in the way of a bonus on barley when we come to ship it to other parts of Canada. We also find that the freight rate is such that we cannot ship it locally without being subjected to excessive freight costs. It is more to our advantage to ship it for export rather than for domestic use. That is the situation, and I think it is only fair to say, although I do not want to draw any distinction, this five cent per bushel bonus on wheat in reality acts more to the advantage of Saskatchewan and Alberta than it does to Manitoba.

Mr. Speaker, I think the federal assistance to our western farmers would have worked out much more equitably if it had been applied on the basis as suggested in this resolution, and for that reason I shall lend it my support.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I agree with what the member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) has said, that very much of this discussion has been entirely outside of the matters referred to in the resolution itself. It is not my intention at this time to enter into a discussion of the general situation that confronts agriculture. I hope that we shall have an opportunity of doing so before the close of the session.

So far as the five cent bonus is concerned, I do not think there was any particular need for members on the other side to come to the defence of the government in regard to it. It was not opposed by any member on this side of the house, and so far as those who received the bonus were concerned, I am certain they received it gladly. So far as I know the question was not discussed by any bodies of organized farmers in Manitoba. True, at the annual convention of the United Farmers of Manitoba we did make a very clear declaration that we did not accept the five cent bonus as a "compensating adjustment," as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) referred to it a year ago, for certain other disabilities under which we labour. I tried to make that point clear in the house a year ago. We accepted the five cent bonus as an earnest of the willingness of the government to help the western farmers to bear the very serious losses that they had incurred during the last two or three years.

I do not think it was worth while making any fine distinctions—such, for instance, as the member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) made —between the five cent bonus subvention to the growers of wheat and the relief measures that were necessitated in other parts of the province. I hope at some future time the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) will develop his argument and tell us what the distinction is between mixed farming, balanced farming and diversified farming. I shall listen with a good deal of interest when he expounds his views on the matter. Foolishly I had thought those were three different terms for the same thing. However, perhaps my mind is not capable of grasping those very fine distinctions.

I am sorry that the member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) is not in the chamber, for I received a message from a friend of mine the other day that I should like to deliver to him in the hearing of the house.

I think we should turn our thoughts definitely to the resolution before the house. It seems to me that if we keep our minds fixed upon it we need not carry on the discussion at very great length. Undoubtedly the particular measures of relief that the government adopted last session have not worked out equitably. I do not think it needs any argument to prove that. There are farmers in the northern part of the prairie provinces who reaped large harvests, and they got their five cents per bushel bonus. It is not at all to the point for the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) to say that even that bonus did not put farming on a profitable basis. To carry out his argument logically, it would be better if the farmers had small crops instead of large. The district I represent is in the same condition as the district represented by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir). It is an open question whether a crop that barely pays the cost of harvesting places the farmer in any better position than if he had a complete crop failure. I have seen crops hailed out, and the farmer in grave doubt as to whether it would pay the cost of harvesting. Everybody who has farmed and who has had experience of hail damage knows that. In very many cases when the farmer has harvested his hailed crop he has found he would have been very much better off had he not touched it at all. This is true of the situation that prevails in many sections of Manitoba—not a complete crop failure, but so close to it that the crop itself did not pay the cost of harvesting.

The situation that confronts us, as the member for Macdonald has pointed out, is that a very large number of farmers find themselves short of feed, their horses and cattle are dying, and up to the present, wherever the fault lies, they have not been able to get any measure of relief. As a result in the coming spring many of those farmers will be unable to provide themselves with the necessary feed and seed in order to put in their crops. I visited the centre of my constituency a short time ago, and there met forty or fifty farmers at an afternoon meeting. They laid their case before me very fully. It is a comparatively small district, but they told me that they would need in the neighbourhood of twenty-five hundred bushels of wheat, oats and barley for seed, and about six thousand bushels of oats in order to feed their horses while they were putting in their crop. As has been pointed out, the municipalities are not in a position to give that assistance. Before I left for Ottawa I made it a point to get in contact with the secretaries of the municipalities, and I would judge that even the best of them had not up to the first of January been able to collect more than forty per cent of their taxes. One municipal secretary wrote to me that they had $75,000 of unpaid taxes on their books, and owed the schools $50,000. So it is no use looking to the municipalities to provide relief. Neither is it any use to look to the provincial governments, for they are now at their wit's end so far as finances are concerned. I fully realize that even the Dominion government could not borrow enough money to recoup the farmers for the losses they have sustained during the last two or three years. Still the Dominion government, more than any other governing body, is in a position to afford some measure of relief, and this is a situation we must face. It is true that it will be a measure of relief to the individual farmer, but it is also a great national question which this parliament should consider. As far as possible we should give such help as will ensure that the land which properly should be seeded in grain will be so seeded. At the moment it may seem that the raising of wheat is being carried on at a loss, nevertheless it is true and will continue to be true in the future that the wheat crop is the one thing above all others on which we must depend for the prosperity not only of the western farmer but of all lines of industry east and west, since the sale of the wheat crop in late years has been our one source of new wealth.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think I shall content myself at the moment with emphasizing these points and lending my support to the resolution which has been presented to the house, the effect of which I think is perfectly well understood. The giving of the five cent bonus has not worked out equitably with regard to all classes of agriculture, while the granting of relief on an acreage basis, though more difficult to administer, would work out in a more equitable way. I have no criticism to offer of the way in which the five cent bonus was administered; I do not object because the landlords were not able to get the advantage of that bonus. Indeed I think that was a very wise provision. The suggestion was made from this side of the house last year that care should be taken to see that none of that money went into the hands of the mortgage companies or banks; I think the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) particularly emphasized that point. It may be true—and in fact I know there were individual cases—that certain landlords should have received a part of the bonus, but to have carried out that plan would have meant the investigation of every individual lease, which in the very nature of things was impossible. So I freely admit that nothing else could have been done in that respect than was done.

That is all I desire to say at the moment, Mr. Speaker. At some future time I will avail myself of the opportunity to discuss in a more general way the conditions of agriculture and the means of affording relief.

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, until a moment ago I had not intended to say anything with respect to the resolution now before the house, but the concluding remarks of the two previous speakers seem to have indicated the attitude of the house with respect to this question. After all, the giving of this bonus is a matter of business administration, and if the house is to adopt a different method of giving assistance to the farmers of the west, that method must be based upon some scheme which can be administered by the government.

At the outset I must say that I am quite in accord with much that has been said by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I am quite free to admit that the five cent bonus is not perfect. The government did not expect that it would be a perfect measure of relief to the farmers of western Canada. When the bonus was put through it was felt that it would meet, as well as any other method which had been suggested, the need it was intended to meet.

I agree with the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich), who said that the discussion this afternoon had taken in matters far beyond the scope of the resolution. But he went on to say that the resolution before the house was specific in character, and with that statement I entirely disagree. I cannot imagine a more vague or indefinite resolution being submitted to any legislative body. There is absolutely no suggestion in the resolution as to how this particular bonus is to be substituted for the five cent bonus. The hon. member for Macdonald closed his remarks by suggesting that the Minister of Agriculture should see that something was done. The hon. member for Lisgar, in concluding his remarks, stated that such help should be given as would ensure that the land which should be seeded to grain next year would be seeded, and throughout the different speeches that have been made on this subject we find this vagueness which I should think would make the resolution unacceptable to the government of the day.

After all, if the government is to pay out a large sum of money it must be done on some definite and distinct basis. In the resolution there is no suggestion that the new bonus, subvention or measure of relief, whatever you call it, should be based on the wheat crop. It is left very indefinite; the bonus is to be given to those farmers suffering from failure or near failure of crop. I am quite in accord with what the hon. member for Lisgar said this afternoon, that it cost those who harvested their crop more than it would if they had never cut it but simply left it in the field.

How, I would ask, is the government to estimate the difference between failure and near failure? Again, if the government is to change its plan and adopt another method of bonusing, what particular sort of failure is to be taken into consideration? Is it intended to cover the farmer who has sown his land to wheat only, or is it to cover the farmer who has sown his land to oats and barley? In the province of Manitoba the barley crop is most important. For the past year it has not been a successful crop, and the farmers have suffered a great loss. Is this resolution intended to apply to such a farmer? I submit that if the resolution is passed, it will apply to him. More than that, it opens up this whole tremendous problem, so that the farmer, no matter what branch of the industry he may be in, will be coming along asking for relief.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. BOWMAN: That is quite proper, but mind you we are dealing with the 1931 crop. Take an individual farmer who has had a partial crop failure: How are you going to indicate what the percentage of his failure is? Or what portion of the dollar an acre or any other scheme which may be decided upon is that farmer to get? How are you going to figure it out at this late date? It seems to me that if the government adopted a scheme such as is here suggested it would cost millions of dollars to put it into operation, to get the necessary information, and to make payment on the basis of any scheme suggested by the resolution.

So far as Saskatchewan is concerned, I have nothing to say but this, that whatever relief may be given to the southern part of that province I am sure the rest of the dominion will be only too glad to pay its share. To any other part of western Canada which may have suffered from drought or hail large sums of money will have to be paid in direct relief. Large sums will have to be paid to provide seed, and it does seem to me that while the five cent bonus has not reached those farmers, nevertheless the direct relief which it will be necessary to pay will compensate, and in a great many cases more than compensate, for the five cents a bushel. I believe it was the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), who said, speaking of that area, that all the farmers in the district were on relief, and the figure he gave was 50,000 farmers. I understand it has been estimated that some six or seven million dollars will be required to provide seed. Perhaps I omitted, in the proper sequence of my remarks, to refer to the statement made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) that only land in fit shape for putting in crop should be considered. If we take that statement, how is the government at this date to decide, with respect to 1931, just what land in fit shape for crop is to be taken into consideration? I am sure that all hon. members on either side of the house representing rural western constituencies would be only too glad to get together and if possible devise some different bonus which would perhaps be made acceptable than the five cent bonus. Personally I should be glad to support anything of the kind, but up to the present time no better method has been suggested. The five cent bonus policy has been acted upon and at this late date I do not see that the government could adopt an entirely different policy, and one upon which no two members of the house seem to be agreed. The adoption of this resolution by the house would do nothing more than throw the matter open again; that is the only effect it would have.

There is absolutely nothing definite in the resolution. No definite proposition was suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia

(Mr. McKenzie) when he made his speech. He filed a resolution which had been passed by one of the farmer parties in Saskatchewan, and in view of the fact that this immense problem would be thrown open once more, it seems to me an absolute impossibility for the government to adopt the scheme proposed if in fact one is suggested. For that reason and that reason only I cannot see my way clear to support the resolution, much as I should like to support any resolution which would deal more equitably with this question or with the problem of the western farmer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it the hon. gentleman's interpretation of the resolution that it refers only to the 1931 crop?

Mr. BOWMAN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I took it that it applied to the future.

Mr. BOWMAN: No. I was not clear on that point myself and I sent a note across to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) who replied that it referred to the 1931 crop. Consequently my argument is along that line.

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): As one opposed to the application of a bonus of any kind so far as it applies to basic production, I want to say a word or two before voting on this resolution. To-day we are suffering from world wide overproduction due to the application of just such policies as the one here proposed. As a matter of fact, I should like to vote for the abolition of the five cent bonus entirely. We are suffering from overproduction because of acts like this one which we are asked to pass upon. Some people will say we have underconsumption, but we have overproduction so far as the basic producer is concerned so long as he is not getting cost of production. Take any basic commodity and trace the history of its marketing for the last few years and you will find that the low price is attributable to interference by meddling politicians with the law of supply and demand.

Some time ago I spoke with regard to the abrogation of the New Zealand trade treaty and I referred to what was happening in connection with the sugar industry. There, I pointed out, was an industry which had the advantage of every possible protective tariff and bonus; but to-day the price of sugar is about 1⅜ cents per pound so far as the basic producer is concerned, and that is due to the application of an unsound economic policy. What is wrong with wheat to-day? What is the reason for this low commodity price? It is due—and I say this in all kindness—to the action of some of our western friends with respect to the western wheat pool. That pool was formed primarily for the purpose of maintaining an orderly system of marketing, but instead of that the whole pool went off on a tangent and endeavoured to take out more than it put in. It disregarded the law of supply and demand and bolstered up a false price for wheat. The price was maintained as long as the pool held the wheat off the market; but unfortunately for the pool, simultaneously across the line a similar effort was made to disregard the law of supply and demand, although by a different method. President Hoover, who made promises similar to those made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) during his campaign, promised the wheat farmer a higher price for his commodity, and in an endeavour to fulfil his promise he permitted a large quantity of wheat to be kept off the market. The upshot was that between Canada and the United States we held something like four or five hundred million bushels of wheat which should have been put on the market in an orderly way, with the natural result that there was a world increase in the price of wheat. But the price was maintained only so long as we adhered to an uneconomic policy of holding marketable wheat off the open market. Other countries took advantage of the high price created by our action and sold their wheat. We held back and finally had to dump our wheat on the market, and this simply brought about chaos. It was our own fault entirely. With this condition of overproduction, does any reasonable man think that the solution is to bonus production and further aggravate the situation?

My hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Porteous) mentioned the dairy farmer. In my district the dairy farmer gets 16 cents a pound for his butter, which is below cost of production. He is therefore as much entitled to a bonus out of the public treasury as the western wheat farmer, but I do not advocate any such unsound economic policy. If we have an overproduction in dairy produce, and obviously we have, the cure is not to stimulate production and thus probably aggravate the situation.

Let us look at the situation from another angle. Governments only have one source of revenue, they must tax from the pockets of the people. Admittedly we have an overproduction, but that condition is world wide and the struggle for markets is becoming fiercer. The countries which will be put out of competition in this process of elimination—we must have a process of elimination to get back on sound economic ground—will be the countries with the highest cost of production. When we dip into the treasury to the extent of $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 and distribute that amount in an effort falsely to bolster up the production of a commodity with which the markets of the world are now glutted, we are doing an injury to the country as a whole and to the wheat producer in particular.

I do not know just how I can vote on this measure. I am sorry it emanates from this side of the house because I had hoped that we would get back once again to good, sound economic grounds. The meddling politicians who have interfered with the law of supply and demand have created this condition of chaos. I believe the only thing left for me to do is to vote against my hon. friend's motion, and, should the opportunity present itself, I intend to vote against the principle of granting a bonus to any basic commodity.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I desire to express a word of appreciation of the extension of the bonus on wheat to the Peace river block in British Columbia. I assure the house that the people in that district appreciate the payments which have been made to them. The crop there has been quite abundant, but because of the distance from export markets a substantial amount of the value must be paid in transportation charges, and the five cent bonus has been of considerable help. The people there have asked me to express to the government their appreciation of this bonus.

Mr. J. B. SWANSTON (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the resolution under discussion reads in part as follows:

> Therefore be it resolved: that in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to a more equitable and less discriminatory solution of this problem.

The resolution does not suggest any new method of meeting the difficulty. Certain portions of the constituency of Maple Creek were able to produce small amounts of wheat, and naturally those farmers who were able to grow some wheat are very appreciative of the bonus. However, along with others, I was unfortunate enough not to be able to produce any wheat; therefore I received no benefit from the bonus. At the time the budget was brought down on June 1 we had no idea that there would be a crop failure. Later on in the session, when we found that a crop failure would occur, the western Conservative members interviewed the government to see if the bonus could be put on an acreage basis. We were told that there were difficulties which could not be surmounted and that it would have to continue as a five cent per bushel bonus.

With reference to the suggestion that a dollar per acre be paid, I know that the people in the territories which were dried out and where there was no crop will be quite willing to accept anything. If, after carrying the burden of relief and supplying seed for this year, the government can see its way clear to give us one dollar or more per acre, I am sure it will be greatly appreciated.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, in continuing for a brief time the debate on the resolution moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) I intend to refer to the remarks of a number of the previous speakers.

I could not hear the remarks of the speaker who immediately preceded me, but I did hear, and with considerable satisfaction, the short speech of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn). He stated that the wheat pools of the west interfered with the economic law of supply and demand. That is the usual argument against the wheat pools of western Canada; but as one who has given consistent support to these pools, both on the platform and in my own press, I feel it necessary to point out that the leading men in the pools, especially in Saskatchewan, state that as far as they were concerned they never held wheat off the market. When there was a market for wheat, they were on the market, and the one outstanding principle of the wheat pools is to keep the market from being flooded and thus placing the farmer in the position of receiving nothing of value for his wheat crop. The pools operate to regulate the market, not to interfere with the economic law of supply and demand. Although the wheat pool of Saskatchewan is still in difficulties, as far as the elevator end of it is concerned it will repay every dollar owed to the provincial treasury.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) has asked: why open up the question? That would seem to indicate fear on his part; he is afraid to open up the question in order to solve it. I do not think that is statesmanship. Statesmanship has very little fear in it; it generally has an objective, as far as the nation is concerned, and it goes forward to work out that objective. If this legislation is inequitable, if it is unfair and unjust, the government should come to the rescue and make it fair and just. There should not be any dread about opening up this question; the man who dreads opening up a question or facing the serious problems of life does not amount to much. If that is the conclusion arrived at by hon. members of this house, that we will not touch this thing because we are afraid of it, then we really do not amount to much as law makers—we are scarcely fulfilling our duty as fearless representatives of the people.

May I say I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Porteous), my native county. He said he did not believe in the bonus system, and neither do I. I believe that to be a false principle in government. But the reason we have bonuses and other such artificial adjustments is because of the national policy which is and has been supported by my hon. friend. Because of the restrictive, high protectionist policy of hon. members opposite, we have arrived at such a condition of affairs in this country that we have to tell the world that it is necessary to bolster up the dominion and the different provinces by bounties and bonuses, in order to hold the nation, Canada, together. We have to resort to subvention after subvention in order to try to unify Canada. That is the Canada first policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. The thing is preposterous; it is not a product of simple common sense. We shall get nowhere with that. The only thing to do is to lower the extreme tariffs of the world, modify the extremist tariff policy of Canada, get away from these bounties, bonuses and subventions, get down to hardtack, face the situation as we have it to-day in the dominion and rectify what has been done wrong.

The hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) has given us a dissertation upon financing. He tells us that in Saskatchewan the financing of this relief measure is well done. Fancy a Conservative standing up to-day in the House of Commons and discussing financing! What is the situation? While the Liberals were in power for eight or nine years, they reduced the national debt by around $300,000,000 and cut down the national interest bill by $10,000,000 or $15,000,000. What have the Conservatives done in the last two years? They have put us back where we were ten years ago. They have gone into debt to the extent of over $300,000,000. That cannot be denied, because they have borrowed more than $300,000,000 in the last two years and have increased the interest bill of this country by millions of dollars. Yet we have the spectacle of an hon. member from Saskatchewan standing up and voicing financial defence of what is being done in that province in the way of relief. As regard this measure of relief in Saskatchewan, the general opinion is that it is political from A to Z.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: Just a minute. I know my hon. friends opposite are trying to defend their policy in Saskatchewan because there is one Liberal on the relief commission, but the man, if he be a Liberal, who is on that relief commission, does not represent the Liberals of Saskatchewan; he represents the banks. That is all he does. Even if the government has one Liberal on that commission, that is no argument that everything is satisfactory about it. I believe, as regards the administration of relief in Saskatchewan, the commission to a large extent is really trying to do its best, but when you consider that every relief agent appointed by that commission has been appointed by an out-and-out Conservative, you can have an idea immediately how the outside work in the way of administering that relief in Saskatchewan is handled.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member suggest that every relief officer in Saskatchewan is a Conservative?

Mr. McINTOSH: I did not say that. What I said was that the man who appointed them was a Conservative. You can draw your own conclusions. It is not necessary to go into his history. If you need it, it may come at some future time.

Mr. BEYNON: It was the commission who appointed these men.

Mr. VALLANCE: The government lent him to the commission.

Mr. BEYNON: No. One of them I know was nominated by the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, ex-Premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. McINTOSH: I notice my hon. friend does not know very much about the matter.

Mr. BEYNON: I know more than my hon. friend does.

Mr. McINTOSH: Well, if you do you have not given expression to it. Coming to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins), he talked eloquently this afternoon about mixed farming or balanced farming, if you like to call it that. I am not in balanced farming, but I have worked on a farm. I earned on a farm money that helped to put me through school. My father was a farmer, a pioneer in eastern and western Canada. From both sides of the family I am of agricultural stock and I am not ashamed of it. So far as defending the farmers and fighting their battles is concerned, it is not necessary to be a dirt farmer to be able to do that. A university man like the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), for instance, can defend the farmers just as well as if he never saw a farm. It is true he is a practical farmer too, and that does not do him any harm. But the hon. member for Marquette goes out of his way to put before the house practically the idea that it is unnecessary to have an education. There is the interpretation of Toryism at its worst. There is a representative conception of what the Tory party stands for—darkness, not light. When you get a man representing a western riding telling parliament and the people of Canada it is not necessary to have a college education, it is not necessary to have any education to defend the farmers—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, I know hon. members laugh, but let them laugh at the man who made the statement. I am simply stating his argument; I am not making the statement; I am laughing at it. I always thought education was power; that education meant the development of mental power. It would appear that as yet the hon. member for Marquette does not understand that. If a man has not some mental power, how is he going to adjust himself to mixed farming, live stock raising, producing pigs, horses, mules, jack asses or anything else? It cannot be done. We shall have to leave it to the hon. member for Marquette to make a success of these various activities.

Perhaps I had better get down to saying something about the resolution. After the theatrical performance we have had from Long Lake and Marquette this afternoon on making the production of mules, asses, other live stock and so forth, attractive or profitable, it might be well to tell the house that so far as the constituency which I have the honour to represent is concerned, we grow wheat, we grow practically every other cereal product; we are in the live stock business; we are in dairying; we have lumbering and fishing and we have every requirement in the way of building up a district that is possessed by any other part of Canada.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do you produce any mules?

Mr. McINTOSH: Not yet. We are going to import the hon. member for Marquette to show us how.

May I say this: any setback to mixed farming in northern Saskatchewan or in northern Canada, east or west, came about at what time? The biggest setback that the production of live stock has ever had in this country was given in 1911 when hon. gentlemen defeated reciprocity. There is no question about that. That movement on the part of the Conservative party in Canada practically ruined or wiped out live stock raising in that part of Saskatchewan which I represent in the House of Commons. It is only now beginning to come back. We had the spectacle in 1930 of hon. members of the party opposite going to the country and giving a pledge that if returned to power they would support the live stock industry—the very thing which they destroyed in 1911. In North Battleford today we are organizing stock yards, and we are going to take care of our own production. We are going to return to the farmers every cent possible in connection with live stock production—that's diversified farming for you.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the resolution?

Mr. McINTOSH: I have been speaking on it indirectly dealing with hon. members across the floor. Coming now to the resolution—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McINTOSH: No, on second thought I do not think I will. I wish to refer to a statement or two made by my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Turnbull). I always like to hear him. He and I work on the same committee of the house, and I was delighted to hear him speak yesterday. In trying to make out that the relief legislation was well rounded out, as it were, that it should apply to the northern part of the province but that it did not need to apply to the south, he went into the derivation of the word "relief", and his argument was that it would be all right to have the five cents a bushel bonus apply in the north and the government measure of relief apply in the south. That may be all right to a certain degree; I admit that, but I believe that if this resolution were worked out properly and the acreage bonus applied to all Saskatchewan, it would be very much better.

My hon. friend in carrying forward his argument said that there was a distinct difference between "assistance" and "relief." I was a little curious and I looked up the etymology of the words. You know, Mr. Speaker, that words, like our hon. friends opposite, have a history. There is a certain evolution about them. They have a primitive meaning, which reminds me of the national policy of our friends opposite—it is very primitive. It does not appear to apply at all to civilization as we have it now. It is absolutely unworkable. It is too primitive, like some of the methods used to prolong its existence.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Speaker, by way of recapitulation of my remarks before recess, it is evident that the Liberal party would not pursue a policy of fear in dealing with a resolution of this kind. The Liberal party would broaden it out in order to build on it sound legislation. Fear is always dissociated from any policy of the Liberal party. It is a tradition of the Liberal party to deal with a problem courageously and go through with it to the end. Consequently the policy I am advocating is not a policy of fear, neither is it a policy to be applied to one branch of agriculture and not to another branch. The Conservative party are ready to apply the bonus or bounty principle to one branch of our industrial life, but they are afraid to apply it to the other. That to my mind is not sound policy; it is an unstable foundation upon which to build a great dominion. Since, this policy is applicable only to wheat growing and not to the other divisions of agriculture, perhaps, as I said before, it grows out of the national policy of my hon. friends opposite, and as such it is false and should not be supported.

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. McINTOSH: As my hon. friend opposite says, "sure," obviously he shares my view that we cannot build up Canada into a great manufacturing and agricultural country by trying to bind all parts of the dominion together by bonuses and other similar means.

Moreover, if a policy is nothing but practical, what good is it? Why should we approach a question of this kind as an elephant or a buffalo might charge an express train, relying wholly on physical strength, and not attempting to bring to our aid logic and common sense? The approach to this problem should not be merely practical, we should combine practice and theory in the right proportions; in a word, our approach should be scientific. If we were to pursue the policy of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins), a policy formulated outside of our universities or parliament, we would ignore all intellectuality and not get very far.

Mr. MULLINS: When I referred to education I had in mind a man with brains; I did not mean the man who has no brains, but has education. If the hon. gentleman wishes to take that to himself he can do so.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was not referring in a personal way to my hon. friend, but if it comes down to a discussion of not having any brains, I know he might be accepted as an authority on the question, so I shall not waste time discussing that with him. I am merely pointing out what the approach of the Liberal party would be to a question of this kind,—how it requires brains, not simply noise. Neither should this question be approached in the light of what an hon. member described this afternoon as the "sound financing of the Conservative party." He was telling us what the Conservatives had done for Canada in a financial way. I have read some history, and I find that since confederation all the Conservative party has done for the benefit of Canada financially speaking, over a period of beyond a quarter of a century, was to cut the national debt by $27,000,000. What is the history of the Liberal party in this respect? They put the nation on a sound financial basis, and then the nation went forward to victory in the sphere of home and foreign trade.

An hon. MEMBER: Beauharnois!

Mr. McINTOSH: Never mind blowing off steam about Beauharnois. A little order, please.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McINTOSH: What is the financial record of the Conservative party in the province of Saskatchewan? They have been in power now for three years. When they came into office the debt of the province stood at $65,000,000; to-day it is $122,000,000. When the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) interrupted this afternoon I did not mean to say that he was connected with anything in the province in any but an honourable way. I speak of a man as I find him, and I must say that anything I have taken up with the hon. minister he has always dealt with it in a very satisfactory manner.

When dealing with the argument of my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Turnbull) before six o'clock I characterized it as being at best a hairsplitting argument, in that he was trying to make out that there was a difference between the two terms "assistance" and "relief." During recess I have taken the trouble to look up the dictionary meaning of the word "assistance." Webster defines it as:

The act of assisting, help—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, that is the significance. But we will proceed. Other meanings are:

—help, aid, succour, support.

Murray's New English Dictionary gives this definition:

The action of helping or aiding in an undertaking or necessity; furtherance, succour, the help afforded, aid, support, relief.

Now, let us take the dictionary meaning of relief:

Relief: payment varying in value or kind, aid, help, assistance in money towards saving something.

In other words the term "assistance" means "relief;" and the term "relief" means "assistance." Now, things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another; therefore the term assistance simply means relief; and the term relief simply means assistance. That is all there is to it. So there is no use wasting any more time about that.

I want to prove in another way that the term assistance means relief, and I propose to do so out of the mouth of the Prime Minister himself. When he introduced this measure on July 24, 1931, he advanced three arguments in support of it. The first argument was the low price of wheat; the next, this low price of wheat in relation to the cost of production up to that time; and the last argument was expressed in these words:

The third reason is the necessity of a measure of relief for western Canadian producers.

According to the statement made by the Prime Minister on the floor of this House of Commons, this bonus legislation was at best a relief measure. I want to make that plain in order that the people of western Canada may be put right in connection with it.

Now before concluding, let me say that we may divide the resolution into three parts. The first statement is that the legislation of last year was unjust and unfair. I do not think there is any doubt about that. The next point is that it was so unjust and so unfair that the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities took up that unfairness and unjustness and, as a result, petitioned the government. That association covers Saskatchewan from one end to the other; it represents the rural municipal life of the whole province, and consequently it means something. In that connection we say that since the legislation was unjust, unfair and inequitable, and since it did not appeal to the province of Saskatchewan or to western Canada the cabinet should come forward courageously and reshape this legislation into something that will have more appeal to the farmers of the prairie provinces.

In that connection may I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am only too glad to commend the Prime Minister and his cabinet for going as far as they have gone in this direction. I do not think it is sound, but there may be the argument of emergency in its favour. I know from where it comes; I know what is back of it, but in the present emergency in western Canada I would be the last to say that the farmers in my riding who received the five cents per bushel should not be thankful for it. But throughout my riding I made it plain that although many of the farmers in the constituency of North Battleford received five cents a bushel for the wheat they produced, in accepting that bonus they should be very careful not to allow the government or the Conservative party of Canada at the same time to sell them the principle of protection, because after all is said and done a five cent sop is not enough to sell agriculture in this country into protective bondage for all time.

Might I say further, Mr. Speaker, that in the riding of North Battleford the average wheat production would be perhaps 30 bushels to the acre which, at 5 cents a bushel, would mean $1.50 per acre. Therefore, as far as the constituency of North Battleford is concerned, I do not see that any great benefit will come from this proposed legislation. There are some parts of the riding down towards Saskatoon where the average production would be only from eight to ten bushels to the acre, and in those districts a limited number of farmers might receive 50 cents, 40 cents, or 25 cents more per acre. That would be helpful. Beyond that they would not benefit by this legislation at all. I am speaking for the rest of the province and for the farmers throughout western Canada. If the $1 per seeded acre bonus could be applied generally all over the west, the money paid in the areas where relief has been necessary could be applied on the amount spent for all such relief.

While I am on this point let me say that I think this note business is wrong. I do not know who initiated it, whether it was planned by the Prime Minister or by his cabinet, but some person is responsible for it. They tell us legislation is initiated in the House of Commons, by the cabinet and sometimes in the office of the Prime Minister. Well, some person initiated this giving of a note in each case of relief, and what I fear in connection with it is that each of these notes may be held as a political club at election time. If that is the case that is enough for me; I would go out and fight my own party on a principle of that kind. Why take the note at all? There are thousands of merchants in Canada carrying accounts ranging from $100 to $1,000 without notes. They have trusted their customers and they are likely to get more money in that way than the government may ever receive through these notes. So I say these notes should be discontinued, and a policy adopted which will be more just to the farmers of western Canada.

In closing may I say, Mr. Speaker, that I support this resolution. I do not think it is sound from the point of view of my constituency, my province or this dominion, but I am supporting it because for the time being we cannot get rid of the national policy out of which it has grown. Therefore, in order to help the farmers in an emergency I am only too willing to stand in my place in parliament and say that if the government in its wisdom could go further and grant a bonus of $1 for every acre seeded, I believe in the long run we would be further ahead. I say this although I am opposed to the principle of the resolution, because I believe public money would not be wasted, as much of it is now, by so doing.

Let me make one further observation. Had the Liberal principle of unemployment insurance been adopted fifteen or twenty years ago in this country we could have had built up by now a sum of money sufficient to take care of our industrial workers for several years. We could have had millions of dollars in a fund of that kind, which would be available for individual unemployment relief purposes. The money we are spending to-day, in many ways uselessly, in trying to help the industrially unemployed, could be used in behalf of agriculture, for the benefit of those who have had no crops, those who are destitute and others who could be put on a better basis by spending national funds in a legitimate way to help them through a trying emergency until they would be able to care for themselves.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by endorsing the resolution and hoping the house may take favourable action upon it.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary): We have had a fairly wide discussion of the motion itself, as well as of almost every other subject which, directly or indirectly, could be related to the motion. As I understand it, this resolution has brought about a discussion on the granting of a bonus on the wheat raised in western Canada as opposed to the granting of a bonus, on an acreage basis, to those who may undertake to raise wheat. The question which naturally suggests itself is whether it is a wiser plan to extend the bonus to those who have produced wheat in western Canada or, on the other hand, to extend it to those who prepare acreage, actually producing or not producing wheat as the case may be.

The principle of the bonus, judging from the attitude of the mover of the resolution, is not condemned; it seems to be accepted as a good thing. When we come to the purpose of the government in regard to this matter, I take it that they propose to advance to the producers of wheat certain assistance, and they have some reasons for so doing. Turning to Hansard of 1931 I find at page 2171 the following announcements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett):

> The third matter to which attention might be directed is that touching the movement of wheat. There has been a succession of bad harvests in some parts of western Canada, and during the last few weeks lack of moisture—I speak subject to correction, I hope—has caused a loss of this year's prospective crop in a great deal of that area. My advices by telephone were that very few days would determine the fate of a considerable portion of the crop. In some parts of the country this is the third crop failure and the reserves of the people are entirely exhausted. Two things must happen: First, provision should be made to assist those who have a crop, because they have considerable obligations, taxes, etc., which must be discharged. Other methods will be taken to deal with the situation of the provinces which are not in a position to assist those who with their reserves exhausted and their crops a failure for the third time are practically ruined.

I think the statement there sets out fairly that relief is to be given and the purpose of the government with respect to the matter.

Why did the government extend assistance to the wheat growers in western Canada, particularly to the prairie provinces? That I think is also explained in the statement made by the Prime Minister. Let us go back and consider the circumstances that obtained for many years leading up to the crop of last year. We know that the farmers of western Canada, as in no other part of the dominion, were encouraged to concentrate to a very considerable degree on the growing of wheat. They were so encouraged not only by governmental agencies and by their own organizations but also by transportation, financial and banking institutions, as well as by other organizations in the country. They all encouraged the farmer to concentrate on the growing of wheat in western Canada.

Now, coming to the situation that existed at the time this statement was made, the house will recall that wheat had gone down very rapidly. There was a crash and it meant that economic conditions in western Canada would be very serious indeed. As a result the government undertook to give a bonus upon the wheat which was to be produced. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) in the course of his speech made the statement that in a large measure the crash in the price of wheat was due to the attitude taken by the wheat pool of western Canada. That statement of course is not substantiated by the facts; indeed, it is ridiculous to those of us in western Canada who know something about the proceedings of the wheat pool. While I am not here to defend the actions of the wheat pool—they can take care of themselves—I must point out that they had very little to do with any change in the price of wheat or with the determination of the world price of grain on the British market. The fact is that we found ourselves in such a position that we simply had to take for our grain on the British market precisely what the rest of the world was taking. The amount of wheat held by the wheat pool in Canada, even granting that they purposely held as large a quantity as some people say that they held, did not have a great deal to do with the crash that came in the price of this commodity. We all know now what has happened during the many months that have succeeded. The world wide financial crash and the financial conditions which have obtained ever since were to a very considerable extent the factor which brought down the price of wheat and which has kept it down to the very low level it has since maintained. This I say in justification of the salesmanship of the organizations in western Canada and not in justification of the local attitude taken by the grain organization out in those provinces.

Coming to the justification of the bonus, I am not going to take up very much time discussing the principle of it. The fact is that we have long since passed the point in this country—and the same is true of any other civilized country in the world to-day—where we are left with much choice as to what we are going to do in regard to duties, subventions, bonuses and so forth. Free trade countries no longer exist. The restrictions of trade, if you want to put it that way, that are found necessary in the various countries of the world, exist largely as a matter of self defence, and we are in exactly the same position in western Canada. I can say, speaking as one who comes from the west and who has had very much to do with the farmers of western Canada, that it does not hurt my conscience one bit, and I am quite satisfied that it does not hurt the conscience of many a western farmer, to take the bonus which is given through this five cents a bushel on wheat. When, in common with all other countries, we are extending duties, subventions, bonuses and so forth, we are simply giving a portion of one of these forms of assistance to the farmers of the west by way of a five cent bonus on wheat. One justification for the five cent bonus has been given, and another justification for it has been intimated in the statement of the Prime Minister. Taxes have to be paid, business has to be carried on as usual, and municipal and provincial obligations have to be met. Who are going to meet them? Well, to a large extent out in our province they are going to be met by the farmers who have to pay their taxes. The farmer who produced the grain and who suffered from this drop in price will be the one who will meet this obligation, not the farmer who has had no crop for the past three seasons. If the province is to carry on, if the school districts are to be kept intact, if different municipal undertakings are to be carried out, these are the people who must meet the obligation. The help granted to them by the bonus of five cents per bushel has not made them plutocrats, although it has helped them out a little.

The suggestion has been made that the bonus should be paid on an acreage basis. In my opinion that would be impracticable. This government has no organization in the west whereby it could determine the number of acres upon which payment should be made. It would require an army of inspectors to offset the many attempts which would be made at deception. The administration of such legislation would be impossible with the present organization.

The payment of a bonus on a bushel basis is an altogether different proposition. As the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) has pointed out, the bonus is one thing, but there is also the granting of relief in the broadest sense of the word. If relief is to be given by the different governments and municipalities, it would have to be upon an entirely different basis. It must be granted to those who need it, and that could not be done on an acreage basis. To do that would not be to extend relief in the real acceptation of the term. It would be granting a bonus only to those engaged in the grain business, but there are others who should receive assistance according to their actual needs.

I agree with the argument made by hon. members on both sides of the house as to the need of relief in various parts of the western provinces. The southern part of Saskatchewan and certain parts of Alberta require relief on a rather extensive scale, but it should be granted without any relation to a bonus on the production of wheat.

The next question is as to how this relief should be granted, and here the matter of jurisdiction of the various governments comes in. As I understand it, it would be impossible for the federal government to undertake a relief program in a municipality in Alberta without consulting both the provincial and the municipal authorities. To grant relief on an acreage basis would necessitate a complete understanding as to the respective jurisdictions of the federal, provincial and municipal authorities.

The hon. members in the United Farmers of Alberta section of the house appear to me to be in one breath praising the government for having spent approximately $5,000,000, and in the next saying exactly the opposite. This they have done not only in this house but in the convention recently held. There seems to be a certain degree of duplicity in their actions, and one cannot help but think that when they utter their commendation they do so with their tongues in their cheeks. This is borne out by the fact that they were ready to pass a resolution which commends the government for what it has done, and then goes on to demand something else. I have no objection to the United Farmers of Alberta or any other organization demanding an extension of this bonus, but I want it distinctly understood that when the suggestion goes abroad that the farmers of Alberta are not grateful to the government which gave that assistance from the public treasury, those who make the suggestion are expressing a sentiment which does not exist among the rank and file of the farmers of that province. Nor do I feel that farmer representatives or even the United Farmers in their convention have the right to speak for the great bulk of the farmers of that province, particularly when they approach the subject with the attitude which has been manifested in their discussion of this question, notably in their discussion of it on the floor of their convention.

[Mr. Stanley.]

Just as was said yesterday by another hon. member in the discussion of this matter, I want the eastern representatives in this house to feel that the people of the west, and certainly the farmers of our province, are thankful for the assistance they have received. When we require more assistance by way of seed grain and of aid to those who are destitute, having regard to the financial condition of the government of our province, in all probability we shall have to come back to this government and parliament to ask for further assistance for the men and their families who are suffering. Without entering into the party politics of our province, I am sorry to say that what has occurred in our provincial legislature during the last two years makes it evident that we shall certainly have to look to the federal government to provide us with the funds to carry on the necessary work of our province. This being so, I want to be able to feel as a representative from that province that when we approach this parliament and this administration, they will realize that we are grateful for the assistance they are giving.

In conclusion, very often I think an entirely wrong interpretation of the conditions prevailing is given to the house and to the eastern part of Canada by our representatives from the west. The position of our farmers and of the residents of our cities, towns and villages is not as desperate as it is represented to be. That spirit of optimism, of determination, of courageousness that enabled them in years gone by to overcome the obstacles which presented themselves on every hand, still exists, and they are still going ahead. While we shall have to assist many farmers as well as many residents of our towns and cities, and continue to assist them for a time, there is that spirit of determination to make good which has always prevailed in the west. I bring it as a final word in this discussion, that while at times we may appear to criticize unduly, we still have left a spirit of thankfulness and optimism, and the courage to make good.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I could not let this opportunity pass without registering my disapproval of the motion which is before the house. I cannot understand how the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) could maintain that the farmers' organizations can approve of this. It seems to me it is against the principle of all farmers' organizations or any Liberal organization and is opposed to the principle of many Conservatives, that is the idea of subsidizing or bonusing anything that is not standing on its own feet. So long as it is a matter of charity, we cannot disapprove of it when it is necessary, but to uphold some industry that cannot stand on its own feet is quite a different problem and has to be considered very seriously.

The farmers of Ontario have assisted and nobly assisted the western provinces. In the first place they assisted them to develop their natural resources, and when the time came, those natural resources were handed over to the western provinces to be controlled by them. If the western provinces have difficulties, then those difficulties should be looked after largely by the west, except in the case of extreme necessity when they cannot cope with the situation and then the federal government should be asked to assist. But we must realize that many Ontario farmers are also growing wheat and many of them have crop failures. A winter like the present one almost ensures a crop failure for the coming season. No one is subsidizing the Ontario farmers. I do not see why the farmers of Ontario, having assisted the people of the west in their early years, having given them all the natural resources which belonged to them, should be expected to subsidize those who are their competitors. The farmer of the west can grow grain much more easily than the Ontario farmer can; he can raise sheep much cheaper than the Ontario farmer can, and I do not see why the Ontario farmer should be asked to subsidize the farmer of the west. As a matter of charity it might be all right, but I object to the principle of subsidizing when the necessity for charity does not exist.

Mr. FRANK BOYES (East Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations in connection with the resolution before the house. Last year when this matter was under discussion I heartily concurred in the action which was taken by the government. At that time I fully realized that the producers of wheat in the west had their difficulties. The price was low and surely some assistance was required. We from the most westerly part of eastern Canada felt it our duty, when any other portion of the dominion was in distress, to render assistance in order that the situation might be relieved. I heartily concurred in the granting of five cents a bushel on the wheat for the prairie provinces. I am more than surprised to-day to hear a number of hon. members opposite expressing themselves as they are. They are disagreeing with the principle that was adopted last year; they are saying that they wish it carried out in a different manner this year, and in fact a number of them have gone almost so far as to say that they disapprove of the five cent bonus. I am very glad to know that the speakers on this side of the house who come from the west express a different view. They know that the farmers of the west who are raising wheat have certainly been very thankful for the bonus of five cents a bushel.

I should like to express the view of one who comes from the western part of the province of Ontario, from the riding of East Middlesex. In western Ontario we do produce some wheat, but we also raise a great many other farm products. We are engaged to a great extent in the dairying business. We manufacture butter and produce milk for many purposes, the chief of which is the manufacture of cheese. We have not heard very much in this house regarding the manufacture of cheese, which is carried on to quite an extent in western Ontario, and more so in eastern Ontario, very nice revenue having until recently been received from this source. Last year when this five cents a bushel bonus was granted, the price of wheat was low, but to-day it is considerably higher. On the other hand, cheese was higher in price a year ago than it is to-day, and the same applies to other dairy products. As I say, we granted the bonus of five cents a bushel on wheat because wheat was low in price at that time and we wished to relieve the distress in the west. It is quite true that we did that and did it cheerfully. But for the coming year things do look somewhat different from last year. As I said before, I am very willing to help the west. We did so last year. We carried out the program which we had in mind. But so far as the coming year is concerned, a demand is arising from certain parts of the province of Ontario that other agricultural products besides wheat be bonused. My own view is this, that in view of the financial condition of the country to-day it is possibly a little away from the mark to expect that we may continue to do as was done last year, and hon. gentlemen opposite who are trying to increase the bonus by putting it on an acreage basis are possibly defeating their own ends by not favouring the scheme which the government put into effect last year. So far as I am concerned I feel that for the coming year, in order to give satisfaction to our farmers in the east who are having their own troubles—the price of their cheese is depressed due to the fact that to a great extent it is exported to England where the depression is being felt, resulting in a lower price than we got before, for cheese as well as for other dairy products—we should discontinue the bonus on wheat.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I think the majority of the hon. members who have spoken have found themselves more or less at a loss due to the unfortunate circumstances that this resolution was not much more definitely worded. Had it been worded as definitely as it exists in the mind of the hon. member who moved the resolution, it would naturally have fallen into three parts. First, what was the intention of this five cent bonus? What elements went to make up the five cents? If it were granted as a solution of some particular problem, and if later another different problem arose, should the same remedy be applied, or should there be another solution of the new problem? Next, would it be compatible with the financial obligations resting upon the government to do what has been suggested by many of the speakers? I had not intended to take up more than five minutes in what I have to say on this resolution, but I think hon. members will agree that I am forced into the position of deviating to a certain extent from the resolution itself to reply to some of the statements that have been made. I shall however be as brief as possible, having regard to what I have suggested.

First, what led to this bonus of five cents a bushel on wheat? Speaking for myself, before entering this so-called realm of politics I found that many farmers in western Canada had followed very closely the policies of the different political parties in Canada and had come to the conclusion that in one respect the two major parties seemed to be at one, namely that they were both protectionist. Whether or not it was due to a more astute political leadership, I think the average person in the west will agree that there was created in western Canada a feeling on the part of a certain section of the public that the Conservatives were protectionist and that the Liberals were against protection, although, as I have stated, the majority of the people felt that both parties were protectionist. The result of this public opinion which had been created, whether wittingly or not for the purpose, was that there arose in the west a certain division of feeling, a certain resentment, against the so-called financial interests and the manufacturers, including the implement manufacturers, in the east. That was the regrettable thing in connection with this policy, presented as it was. When therefore I accepted the office I have been called upon to occupy I felt that whatever in my humble way I could do to break down that division that had been set up would be some slight contribution to this country of which we are all so proud. Accordingly I took the first available opportunity at the short session of discussing the problem with members on this side of the house, and particularly with some of the members of the United Farmers group from Alberta and Saskatchewan. They agreed with me that if it was possible, in addition to protection, to make some arrangement by which this division could be overcome, something would be accomplished.

There were many varying elements and circumstances to take into consideration. I think we all agree that the one class of agriculturist that receives less protection from the tariff than any other is the wheat farmer of the west, chiefly because the great preponderance of his production is forced into export. Therefore I set out to find in the most generous way I could what these straight wheat farmers did pay on account of the tariff for their machinery and equipment more than they would have had to pay had there been no tariff. I was very much surprised at the estimate I arrived at, because I must admit that I myself felt that the effects of the tariff were much more considerable than the conclusion to which I was forced to come.

I went with this proposition to my chief, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). It appealed to him. The problem was: how to provide some compensating adjustment for this particular class of people. The matter was brought before the cabinet, and in the discussion that arose as to what could be done of a compensating nature, it was found to be so small per bushel that finally another item came up that is very near to those of us who are western farmers, and produce wheat—the price of wheat had sunk so low that the proportion of the freight to its price was much greater than it had been when prices were what we had been pleased to consider more normal. It was finally agreed that some assistance should be given in the nature of a bonus to help decrease the disadvantages proportionately to the price of wheat at that time. I think that this is as direct and clear a statement as I can give with reference to the five cent bonus. It was, as I have stated, for the solution, to a certain extent, of more than one particular problem in western Canada.

At the conclusion of the session we found in western Canada a problem of a different nature—the greatest problem that has arisen in this country so far as agriculture is concerned—the calamity arising from the drought condition in the prairie provinces, particularly in Saskatchewan. It was decided that I should go to Saskatchewan on account of the nature of this difficulty, and devote a great part of my time in cooperation with the provincial government and with the farmers of that province to seeing what could be done for the alleviation of this calamity. I did so, with the result that since last session I have spent practically seven weeks in Saskatchewan with the exception of some short time in Alberta and Manitoba. The nature of the work was such, and the demand on one's time so great, that although I own a farm in the province I have been able to spend only two days on it since the election in 1930. So my time was devoted to this work, and to this work solely during those seven weeks.

What condition did I find in western Canada? I realize that it has not a direct bearing on the resolution, yet it has been referred to in so many different ways during this debate that I feel it is only fair to the house that having made a personal survey I should give in the simplest form some idea of what I found. There was an area of seventy-six municipalities that had practically no crop of any kind for three years. Hon. members in this house who have not been west and who have read certain misrepresentations in the eastern press, due to lack of correct information, and those who have heard from other sources various presentations of the case, will, I am sure, be surprised to realize —at least those who have thought that a great deal of that area should not have been devoted to farming—that most of the land in those seventy-six municipalities has produced more agricultural wealth per capita than perhaps any other area in this dominion. The farmers there never knew anything in the nature of a crop failure. Year after year until three years ago in the Regina plains between Regina and Moose Jaw and in the area south the land yielded 25, 30 and 35 bushels per acre of the best wheat produced in the west. Their farm homes were unexcelled anywhere. Not only that, but their live stock was of a very high quality. Many people have the idea that in that part of the country there are nothing but cayuses and scrub live stock, and on many farms no live stock at all. The best indication that I can give hon. members of the quality of that live stock is that the greatest percentage of the live stock from Saskatchewan that came year after year to compete with the best live stock from the different parts of this country and from the republic to the south carried off much more than their share of honours on the basis of numbers. The wheat production in that area alone for the fifteen years before the first crop failure averaged over 83,000,000 bushels. That will help the house, I hope, to realize the problem that we had to deal with. It was not a question of moving the people away after the successive good crops that they had had for so many years, but of holding them there and assisting them financially and otherwise as far as was in our power, until a cessation of the present difficulties. There was another area consisting of ninety-six municipalities in which there had been two practically complete crop failures; a third area of sixty-four municipalities in which there was a crop failure last year for the first time in the past three years. Practically two-thirds, if not more, of the cultivated land in this great province of Saskatchewan had been dealt this unprecedented staggering blow, and this was the problem we had to face.

Some of you, perhaps, within sound of my voice have been inclined to ask: If the farmers there have produced that great amount of wealth within ten years, then why was it not possible for them to withstand the difficulties in which they have found themselves? Let me say that the extent of the area is something like old eastern Ontario from Toronto to the Quebec border, but larger in extent, where for years we have had some of the thriftiest and most scientific farmers in the country. They have practised diversified, balanced farming with a skill perhaps unexcelled by any other people in this country. Yet how many of those farmers, if for three years in succession they did not have anything in the nature of a crop, not even sufficient to feed their live stock, and were therefore forced to dispose of it, except so much as would provide the very necessities of life, and with respect to which the government have to assist them—how many, I say, of those farmers could stand a blow like that without some help? The only way in which they could have done it was perhaps to have hoarded their wealth somewhere. But the average man, I think, in the east as well as in the west, after making a reasonable allowance for the future invested his money in stocks and other investments that even to the best financiers seemed absolutely sound but proved far otherwise.

That you may have a picture not only of the extent of this calamity but of the difficulty of handling the situation, may I say that there is in that area approximately 250,000 people. It is one thing to handle that number of people in a city, or in an area where they are closely placed together, but in that wide area, scattered away in their homesteads in isolated districts, and with the approach of winter in a climate like we have in western Canada, we had to be prepared to act before the danger of early winter came, and I can assure the house that only those who were charged with the responsibility of meeting that difficulty could fully appreciate its gravity. We felt that if ever there was a time when the question should be handled in a manner absolutely free from prejudice, this question should be handled in that way. Therefore it was decided that it should be handled absolutely free from political interference of any kind, and a relief commission was appointed. The personnel of that commission I shall describe to hon. members, and I will leave them to be the judges as to whether or not those gentlemen would be likely to be influenced by political partisanship.

We selected five commissioners, with Henry Black as chairman, after interviewing some of the most successful business and professional men in Regina and Moose Jaw. These men agreed to work without remuneration of any kind, without receiving even living expenses. One of them, when I approached him, asked how many hours he would have to work. We discussed the problem for a few moments and pictured those people who have had no money for three years, with practically no clothing and no reserve strength. They represented a problem that had to be met in a very short time, and my answer was that the members of the commission would be fortunate if they got off with the longest hours they ever had to work at anything else. Since then they have realized that even that estimate was very conservative.

So then we had three of the best business and professional men in Saskatchewan working day and night, without recompense of any kind except the satisfaction of doing a public service. Yet to-day the members of that relief commission were charged with carrying on this work for political reasons. I leave it to the judgment of this house if men who are giving their lives without payment, as these men are doing at present, are the type of men whom we associate with modern day politics. Personally I think not.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

We were also particularly fortunate in being able to secure the services of Mr. George Yuill, of the Royal Bank, whose services have been invaluable. Then it was felt that because perhaps the greatest sufferers from this calamity would be the women and children, it was essential that a woman should be placed on this commission. After going over the field of women whom we felt could give us the greatest service, it was decided that we could not do better than ask Mrs. Johnston, who happened to be president of the Saskatchewan branch of the United Farmers of Canada, to serve on the commission especially to give its members the benefit of her advice with regard to the women and children in that area. I doubt if any better selection could have been made, not only because of Mrs. Johnston's long contact with farm life and farm women in western Canada, but because of the fact that she had previously exemplified her great ideals in public service. I think we were particularly fortunate to secure the commission that was finally appointed.

I happened to be present when the appointment of the man to be in charge of the relief officers was discussed. This man was appointed by the relief commission. I remember that names were submitted, and after a discussion —in which I may say I took no part because I had never met the gentleman who was appointed before he came in—it was decided that at least he should be given a trial. I believe he was taken on for a month so that if his work was not satisfactory he could be relieved of his position. Care was also taken —great care, as far as I was concerned, in any advice I gave—in connection with the appointment of the relief officers in the various municipalities and sub-areas of the district. They were appointed by the week, at a weekly salary of $18, so that if their work was not satisfactory they could be immediately replaced.

I say again that great care was exercised in the selection of these relief officers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Hon. gentlemen say " hear, hear". The impression given here this afternoon was that these appointments were purely political. I know very little about them, but I will say that one of the officers whom I appointed to give me first hand information with regard to the working out of the relief scheme said that the relief officer who seemed more anxious than any other to cause difficulty in the carrying out of his work was a man who had been recommended by a gentleman who might be described as the leading Liberal in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to ask the minister a question. I really expected the minister to do just what he has done now. Would he mind telling us—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. VALLANCE: Have I permission to ask a question? I should like to ask the minister who appointed Mr. Kendal, the organizer, and on whose recommendation he was appointed, since the minister has dragged the political side into it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): So far as I am concerned I do not know whether or not the man appointed to select the relief officers was named Kendal. He was appointed by the relief commission, after discussion.

Mr. VALLANCE: Borrowed from the liquor commission, from the government.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not say; I did not remember his name, because that was the only time I heard his name under discussion. I want to follow this matter further; I do feel very strongly that you people in eastern Canada who have so generously contributed to the relief of our people should not be given a wrong picture of how that relief work is being administered, because it would only lead you to feel that the very praiseworthy efforts you have put forward have not been given their full value in the west. I doubt if any commission has ever had the record this commission will have when its work is completed. The latest figures show that out of every dollar expended for relief 96½ cents goes right into the hands of the people who receive the relief, and that it only cost 3½ cents out of every dollar for administration.

The insinuation has been made that this talk of mine would be of a political nature, therefore I feel duty bound to make one further remark. It was only natural, I suppose, for a farmer like myself, especially interested in the difficulties of the farmers, to want to stay there, to see the whole picture and keep in contact with these people. I could not do so. Demands were made upon me from different parts of the country; I had to come to Ottawa to join in cabinet meetings, and I felt that the only way I could get that picture, and be sure I was getting the right picture, would be by appointing three men whom I felt personally were thoroughly qualified to understand the farm problem, to advise farmers where necessary, and to give practical advice to the relief commission with regard to feed, care of animals and so on. Therefore I selected three men whose duty it was as expert farmers to keep in very close touch with this whole situation; to advise me personally if the relief commission was falling down in its work; to advise if there were any particular difficulties they thought should be dealt with immediately, and so on. I doubt if there could have been chosen in western Canada, and especially in the time available to us, three men better qualified.

Until the question of politics came up I did not know the political leanings of two of those three men. One of them is a personal friend of mine living near my own farm; I understand that in later years especially he has been a Progressive, and before that I believe he was a Liberal. Of the other two I understand one has been a life-long Liberal, and the other is a Progressive. Personally I do not understand how any normal person who appreciated as I did the calamity in the midst of which I stood could have done other than I did, and therefore I take no credit for it. I did not intend to touch on this question, but I have taken pains to make it clear, so that you in the east who contributed so generously may know that as far as was physically and humanly possible this work has been carried out so that every bit of assistance given has been used to the fullest extent in the relief of those who needed it.

We have divided Saskatchewan into three areas, and the only payment that we as a federal government have made has been in that seventy-six municipality area, the three crop failure area in which we felt we should bear the cost 100 per cent on food, clothing and fuel. In the ninety-six municipality area we have no agreement; in the sixty-four municipality area we have no agreement. After our meeting with the provincial government of Saskatchewan, and it was understood that we were giving 100 per cent relief to the seventy-six municipality area, the authorities in Alberta got in touch with me in Regina and represented that they had areas equally bad as those in Saskatchewan. I went to Edmonton and interviewed the Alberta government and it was decided—I felt it was the fairest thing to do—that we would use the services of the three federal seed inspectors in western Canada, one of them situated in Manitoba, one in Saskatchewan and another in Alberta, and that they should not work just in their own respective provinces but in groups so that they would have a complete picture of the whole situation. It was considered advisable that they should work in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture of each provincial government and obtain from them the facts regarding those areas which it was felt were in the same situation as the Saskatchewan areas. They would get the average crop, the average yield per year each year for the last three years, in order to determine in which class they should come. They would also get the average collection of taxes, the average immediate indebtedness of each municipality, and with that picture before us we felt that we should then be in a position, when the matter had been fully dealt with, to give the fairest treatment possible to each of the three western provinces. I shall pursue this phase of the matter before dealing with the question that seems to arise naturally out of it because of the information that has been asked for by members both from Alberta and from Manitoba.

So far as I know, our treatment has been satisfactory in Alberta; the provinces have been treated equally. It is the duty of the provinces, if they cannot finance the problems that face them, to come to the federal government and present their case, indicating what they need financially, and it then becomes the duty of the federal government to decide whether or not the provinces will be given further financial assistance. No province has been given everything it has asked for; the demands have been carefully gone into. When I was last in Regina in January I was informed that there was a critical situation in the southwestern part of Manitoba. I got off the train in Brandon and drove ninety miles across the country in a car, in January, having arranged beforehand to meet the officials of those municipalities that felt they had not been cared for as they should have been. I made that journey in order to ascertain what their criticism was and to learn what suggestions they had to offer by way of remedy. In taking part in the discussion of the matter, both before and at the meeting, I came to the conclusion that there was some misunderstanding, to put it mildly, between the province of Manitoba and our government regarding the question as to how the matter was to be dealt with. My idea had always been that the provincial governments should receive from the federal government whatever money was absolutely necessary and be responsible for looking after their own people; but I realized that to leave the matter there, in a more or less theoretical state, would not get us anywhere. There were farmers who were in need and I made the only practical suggestion which I thought I could offer: I invited them to appoint two or three delegates and I agreed to take them with me to Winnipeg, there to meet the Minister of Municipal Affairs, the Premier of Manitoba, and also the Minister of Agriculture, to see whether, without further delay, or quibbling, or press notoriety, we could agree as to what action was necessary. I leave it to anyone here whether I could have taken more definite action or have done anything more practical. The whole question was fully and frankly discussed. Premier Bracken was not able to attend the meeting, and in order that no opportunity which could be taken advantage of might be lost, so far as I was concerned, of clearing up the matter, I went to see him at his own house before leaving to come east. All I can say regarding the difficulty in Manitoba is that the duty of the authorities there is to put their case before the government, indicating what money they require; and in the meantime I should hope that they would strain every effort to look after their own people with the money received.

One of the first problems I encountered when I went to Saskatchewan was this. There met me a delegation of farmers who had clear titles to their land. This is one of the points that came up for discussion this afternoon. I was surprised at the number of people in that district who had clear titles to land; yet they could not borrow money from either the mortgage companies or the banks. I asked the manager of the Saskatchewan farm loan board what percentage of the people in that area had clear titles to their land, and his estimate was 25 per cent, which was very much higher than I thought it would be. After discussion with these people as to the amount of money they thought they should borrow as a minimum to enable them to carry on, and realizing that new conditions were arising of which we had had no idea, and that the drain on finance was so much greater than we had ever contemplated, much as I wished to do it, and fair as their request seemed, I decided that I could not recommend to the federal government that we should loan money to the extent asked for even on those lands with clear titles. I do not think any demand could have been fairer than that which they made, had we considered it was possible for us to meet it. These men took this attitude: Surely with a clear title, with no encumbrance in the way of mortgages, we who have contributed so much to the country are not going to be reduced to the condition of receiving charity. That was their position and they insisted that they be given the privilege of repaying. That was the first time that question came up. I will leave it to any hon. member of this house to say, had he been in my position at that time, with this problem immediately before him, whether he would have taken any other action than that which I took, namely, to recommend that these people be given permission to repay the assistance they received.

The question before us is this: What are we to do with people who have been hit as they have been hit in Saskatchewan? What are we to do that will be just to them in view of the whole picture as we have it? Outside of the seventy-six municipality area our obligations are in conjunction with those of the provincial government; and in the drought area in Alberta and Manitoba, as in Saskatchewan, the percentage that we bear, if we bear any percentage of the loss, has yet to be determined. We have before us all the information which we shall require. We have before us the information regarding the acreage seeded and also the indebtedness of each municipality, and we shall have to take into consideration the financial position of the provinces in determining what assistance will have to be given.

I omitted to mention one point in connection with this first visit of mine to the west. I was met by the reeves of the various municipalities, who waited upon me in delegation to present a case something like that set out in the petition. It is said that more consideration was given to those farmers who had crops than to those who had not, and that we should consider the giving of a bonus of one dollar per acre. I explained the whole proposition to these men and they seemed to be satisfied. They realized the problem we were facing; they knew that we had to make certain that every man, woman and child in that area should be clothed warmly enough to meet the winter, that fuel should be provided before the first blizzard came along, that potatoes should be in the cellars before the winter came on, as it does sometimes with very little warning. They realized that large sums of money would be required to provide feed for their stock, and that on top of that additional sums would be required—amounting to $5,000,000 in Saskatchewan alone—to seed the land this spring. Gasoline, fuel oil and so forth to the amount of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 would be necessary to put in the crop.

There are many difficulties in the way of a bonus paid on an acreage basis. It is suggested that we are to pay one dollar per acre and to take into consideration the bonus of five cents per bushel paid on the wheat produced. That information will not be available until July 1 when this present bonus legislation runs out. If this bonus is to cover the cost of seeding, would it be equitable to pay to the man who has seeded his land three times without a crop the same amount received by the man who has missed only one crop? Even though a census be taken with the greatest care I think that those of us who are farmers will agree that it would not be very accurate. It has been the rage of late in western Canada to try to obtain all kinds of statistics, and I know in connection with my own farm that information has been given when I was absent which was not at all accurate. The best example of this is the attempt to collect information in connection with our program of restricted areas. Animals should be easy to count and yet it has been found that the number of cattle given in applications for restricted tubercular areas has sometimes been only half the actual number.

This is the greatest problem that agriculture has ever faced, and it must be met directly. As I see it, a final adjustment will be made towards the end of the present fiscal year. At that time the provinces will be in a position to give this government their true financial positions and state the commitments which they can undertake in the carrying on of this work. Serious consideration will be given to this problem; this government will do everything possible to give the most generous treatment. The farmers of western Canada have assurance in the treatment they have received up to the present time.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The information which the minister has given to the house is of tremendous importance and I, for one, would have liked him to proceed further. I would like to see the house give the hon. minister its unanimous consent to complete his presentation.

Mr. THOMAS F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this resolution, I am sure I express the view of all hon. members when I say that everyone regrets that it was necessary last year to pass a measure of relief for the farmers of western Canada; and we regret also that it is now necessary to refer to this matter again. The condition prevailing in western Canada, especially in my own constituency, is calamitous. There has been no crop there for three years, yet the people still believe they will have a crop this year. Some of these people have lived in this district for the last twenty years; some went up into the northern part of the province to look over the country but they returned and are satisfied to stay in the south, believing that they will again have crops. The question of crops is not their greatest concern; they are wondering what price they will get, and how, with the prices as they are to-day, they are going to be able to pay their past debts as well as those which are to-day piling up on them because of the relief which they are receiving. That is the problem which faces the west. I have found that some of the sturdiest hearts and strongest wills are beginning to break down. Men are beginning to be discouraged; they wonder if they will ever get out from under this burden of debt.

Neither the government nor anyone else can be blamed for the climatic conditions, but it is another matter when we consider the general conditions which prevail. I would like to read what the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) said, speaking last year on the address in reply. I am willing to accept the opinion he then expressed, as follows:

> After all, the question is not exactly what are conditions in western Canada but, to some extent, whose responsibility is it that conditions in the west are as they are.

He then laid the blame on the Liberal government. I suppose in view of the fact that conditions have been growing worse during the past two years, he will now shoulder this responsibility and place the blame upon the present government.

Relief may be divided into three classes. First, there is charity; and in this connection I desire to express the gratitude felt by those in the drought-stricken areas to the people from one end of Canada to the other for the wholehearted and magnificent manner in which they responded. Carload after carload of vegetables, fruit and clothing came into the districts affected and were distributed fairly and evenly. In my journeys from one part of the country to another I never heard a complaint; it was nothing but gratitude for the splendid response to the need of the people in those areas. It is a wonderful thing to see such a spirit shown to those in dire need.

The next item that we come to is this bonus of five cents a bushel. I quote from the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself: Speaking on July 24 of last year, he is reported at page 4149 of Hansard as saying:

> The third reason is the necessity of a measure of relief for western Canadian producers.

I agree with him that it was a measure of relief handed out to the farmers of western Canada. I am sorry to say I must disagree with the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) and the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) when they say this was not a measure of relief. The Prime Minister, on another occasion said, that this was not only a measure of relief but was being passed as a compensation for the payment of duties. As reported on page 3766 of Hansard of last year, he said:

> May I say to the hon. member for Macleod that for the first time in the history of the country an earnest effort has been made to make an adjustment between the farmer's production and what he may pay with respect to duties and tariffs. . . . The farmer is being given a compensating adjustment which more than meets the sum which on the average he will pay in duties with respect to motor cars or other items of this nature with respect to the tariff.

He says that it is a compensating adjustment for the tariff. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) just a little while ago, referring to the tariff, said that in the west they considered both policies high tariff. We heard that for years and years, but at the present time in western Canada there is no doubt at all as to which is the high tariff policy.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Did I make the statement that they considered them both high tariff?

Mr. DONNELLY: Both protection.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My hon. friend is very much at fault.

Mr. DONNELLY: That there is very little difference between them. We had the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) writing a letter saying to the people before the last election that there was no difference between the policies as regards high tariff. The farmers of western Canada know now who are the high tariff people. The Minister of Agriculture went on to say he had figured out how much extra the farmer would have to pay for machinery. When did he do that? Was it before he raised the tariff in the fall of 1930? If he did it before, there would not be very much extra, but if he did it after, I can tell him it would be a very large amount on our average importations. In western Canada from year to year we have been importing from the east somewhere in the neighbourhood of $200,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, the average protection on which would be 25 per cent. In other words, there has been taken out of the pockets of the farmers of western Canada either directly or indirectly the sum of about $50,000,000 a year. We do not believe the bonus actually adjusts this, by any manner of means. It may be a small amount; it may be a bite.

As regards this bonus of five cents a bushel, we do not regret that the people in the north have got it. I have not heard anybody in the house object to the people in the north getting it; the only thing I am sorry for is that they did not get more. I am glad to see them get it. I wish we were getting it in the south too. The point is that we are not getting any, and it costs us five cents a bushel more when we go to buy seed wheat. We have no crop—none whatever; no grain, no grass, no feed of any kind for the chickens or pigs, and yet we have to pay five cents a bushel more for the wheat we buy from the people of the north.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. DONNELLY: Because they are giving five cents more to the people of the north, and every farmer, realizing that if he sells his wheat through the ordinary channels he will get five cents a bushel more, will demand that much more if you are buying from him.

As regards the inequality of handling this five cents per bushel, one member said that he defied anybody to show where this had not been handled justly and fairly. Let me give an illustration. I know many men in the west who own their horses, machinery and seed and who rent their land. The renter gets one-third of the crop and the man who owns the land takes two-thirds because he pays the threshing bill, pays for the twine and does everything but the labour. In other words, the labourer gets one-third and the man who owns the land gets two-thirds. But when the wheat is hauled into the elevator, the man who owns the farm and who has to pay the taxes and pay for the twine and seed, gets no five cents a bushel. The man who rents the land gets fifteen cents a bushel for his share and the man who owns the land gets nothing. You may call that fair or just, but that is not justice as I understand it. That is the way it works out. It will not help the man in paying his mortgage or his taxes, and probably the next year the man who rented the land has gone to some other district.

Mr. BOYES: Does that not depend on the deal between the farmer and the man who works the land?

Mr. DONNELLY: Not unless the lease was made afterwards, because the lease is to give the man who owns the land two-thirds and the other man one-third. The Board of Grain Commissioners, who are administering this legislation, have decided that the man who rents the farm or does the actual labour gets all the bonus.

Let me come to the next point, the question of direct relief. In my constituency we are receiving direct relief. The Minister of Agriculture came out west and travelled through my constituency one day, then returning to Regina. Shortly after that we saw some reports in the press saying that the people of western Canada who were taking direct relief were too proud to take charity; that they wanted to pay for it. Everyone I saw out there said he did not want charity, but that he expected just what the Prime Minister promised when he spoke in Regina, and that is work. The Prime Minister had promised them work; he had said that those people wanted work and he was going to give them work, not charity. They expected work and they did not get it. But every dollar they got out there they signed a note for. If they get groceries or coal or anything else, they sign a note for it; they sign on the dotted line. I understand in many of the cities in both the east and the west, if a man is a bachelor and wants a lodging for the night or a meal, he does not sign any note; he does not sign on any dotted line. If any householder in Ottawa or some other eastern city is up against it financially for groceries or fuel, I do not believe he signs on any dotted line. The only people I know who are signing for everything they get are the western farmers. Why should it be so? The western farmer in the drought stricken area looks around and sees the unemployed in the cities in the east and other parts of Canada getting relief for nothing, people in the north getting a bonus of five cents a bushel and others getting $1.25 and $2 an acre. The result is the farmer needing relief is there with both hands out saying: If this relief is going for nothing, give me as much as I can get; I do not want to sign any note. He is willing to take just as much charity as the other fellow. They believed in the first place that they were going to be given work, but they did not get it. I remember hearing the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) say in this house last year that conditions were not so bad in western Canada, and when we from the west on this side of the house began to speak of the actual conditions out there the Prime Minister called us wailing Jeremiahs and so forth. He told us we had lots of money in the bank; but when the people in Regina found that other people were getting relief they asked for all the relief they could get. People in other parts of Canada got work, but in our section of the country we did not have any lakes to dig or islands to build or bridges to construct over a dry stream at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, as they had in Regina; and we did not get any relief work. Speaking in the house last year on this very question of unemployment relief I urged that the work be started early enough, but they waited until the ground was frozen before they started it. I said at that time, get it going early, so that you can get a start on the work, but though the legislation was passed in August, they did not appoint the relief commission until the middle of October. By the time the commission got to work the ground was frozen up and there was nothing our people could do but take direct charity or starve during the winter.

There are other matters. I came down here last fall and saw the Minister of Agriculture. I said to him, "My constituency is all underlain with coal. The people out there must have coal. Send an engineer from here or Regina, let him locate a few veins of coal and then let the people out there go in and dig their own coal. What you are doing at the present time is getting coal from Estevan at $4.50 a ton or from Alberta at $7.50 a ton." I said that the minister should let the people dig their own coal right near home, as they could do if they had someone to tell them how to go about it. I told him that these people needed the work, that they would be better physically and mentally for having something to do. "Well," said the minister, "we have a grant of $20,000 for farmers' timber for the mines." Anybody who knows anything about conditions out there knows that this $20,000 for timbers for the mines is just a dream. The farmers do not timber their mines. They do not know anything about it anyway. It is a surface proposition and there is no timber needed at all. But the minister said that he would look into it, and he is still looking into it as far as I know. Fifteen or twenty farmers did go out with scrapers and ploughs and dig their own coal. That was the hardworking, thrifty farmer who wanted to get out of debt, not the ne'er-do-well; and some of these men got fifteen or twenty tons of coal for the winter. That was fine, but no sooner had they got the coal in than the secretary of the municipality received a letter asking who had been digging coal around there. He wrote back that he did not know anything about it, and then the government officials sent circulars throughout all that district accusing these people of digging coal. Some fellows who were weak-kneed and thought there was no harm in digging the coal anyway told them: "Yes, I dug so much coal." "Ah," they said, "we have caught you now. You owe us 25 cents a ton royalty." That is the way they were going to help the man who was trying to help himself—by charging him 25 cents a ton royalty; but the fellow who did not care how he got his coal and was willing to sign a note which he was not going to pay got his coal supplied by the government and it cost the government $4.50 to $7.50 a ton. Not only that, but the men who are digging that coal to merchandise it have to pay only 5 cents a ton royalty, while the farmer who was trying to help himself was charged 25 cents a ton royalty. Oh, this is a wonderful government with great executive ability! Is it a matter of surprise that the people in those areas are wondering what kind of government we have down here?

With regard to the officers who are handling this relief, the minister has told us how careful they were. They picked out three relief commissioners, he said, two men and a woman, and he contended that there was absolutely no politics in the matter. I do not know anything about these commissioners and their political faith, but I do know this, that the relief commissioners were mighty careful to see that the men they picked out were strong Tories, because in every town and every village that I know every one of them is a Tory heeler, nothing more nor less. Down in one of the little villages in my constituency we have five good Tories and over every little thing that is going to take place they go into a huddle just like a football team and discuss their next line of attack. These five are known as the Hungry Five. That is how much politics there is in it. The Hungry Five are always getting together to decide who is going to take the next bite. We know for certain that from one end of the country to the other there is politics, and nothing but politics, pure and simple, in this matter.

One thing that has been in the minds of westerners is the way in which this scheme has been dealt with. When the matter was before the house last session I spoke with reference to it and my remarks will be found at page 4431:

This relief work should be handled by non-partisan bodies. Let the municipal officers handle it, and in the local improvement districts, let it be handed over to the overseers.

This is the one thing that the people in my district cannot understand. For two years our municipal officers had been handling relief fairly and squarely, and everybody was satisfied. When this year our municipal officers offered to take charge of all the relief work for nothing, why was it necessary for the government to hire an officer in each municipality at a cost something in the neighbourhood of $75 a month, plus expenses amounting to about $200? We find these men, who as I have said, are nothing but partisans, taking the place of the municipal officers. It is my opinion and the opinion of everybody in the west that the cost of handling this relief would be much lower had it been left to our municipal officers.

Referring to the resolution, I find that the people in the southern districts are not getting any of this five cents a bushel. It is very strange to us that when the Minister of Agriculture saw conditions in the southern part of the province he did not come back and say: "The people in the south are too proud to take charity, and my people in the north are too proud to take charity. They do not want the five cents a bushel. They would rather take a dollar an acre on their land sown to wheat." What he practically said was: "My people will take all the charity they can get, and ask for more." Not only that, but almost $300,000 worth of relief work has been done right in the constituency of Melfort, where there has been a bountiful harvest running from 25 to 50 bushels an acre.

We believe that the amount of wheat grown on each quarter section is known to the grain commissioners, because they have the data before them, and we believe that the number of acres sowed in wheat can also be ascertained. Nothing remains, therefore, but the matter of adjustment. If the southern part of the province had been given a dollar an acre for all the land sown to wheat, very little relief would have been needed during the past year.

I do not wish to prolong the debate. I am supporting the resolution because I believe it will bring to all the farmers in western Canada a measure of relief on a fairer and a juster basis.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I might say, Mr. Speaker, that in introducing this resolution I made it very clear that so far as I am concerned and those who were responsible for the beginning of this "agitation", as some one called it, for a dollar an acre on the seeded acreage throughout the drought areas of the prairie provinces, it was not in any respect a political matter. I am sorry indeed that this resolution has been debated not only as a relief measure but as a political manoeuvre. It was not my intention to have politics enter into this proposal in any shape or form. We have a real problem in those dried-out areas. Our people are in earnest in regard to this matter, believing that they have a just cause which deserves the favourable consideration of this house. I think the relief measure could very well have been debated at some later date.

I was rather disappointed at the address of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), because he talked of practically every other thing except getting right down to the basis of the resolution, and he resumed his seat without saying what consideration the government were going to give to it. He spent a good deal of time in explaining to the house just what led to the introduction of the legislation last session relating to a bonus on wheat. He stated that it was on his initiative that the bill was first mooted as a government measure, and that the relief was offered as a compensating adjustment on account of the incidence of the tariff on the farmers of western Canada. If it was intended as a compensating adjustment, why should not those farmers who did not reap any crop last year receive something in the way of compensation, as well as those who reaped a good crop? We are quite satisfied to give credit to the government for all that has been done in the way of relief, and we appreciate what has been done. We know they have had a big problem on their hands. One or two members on this side of the house opposed the application of a bonus under any consideration. I am not in favour of the bonus principle any more than they are, I do not think it is right. But if it is necessary to grant a bonus by way of compensation for the high tariff, then I say our farmers are entitled to such compensation as much as any other industry.

It is unfortunate that our farmers are compelled to sign notes for the relief granted to them. I do not think that the explanation given by the Minister of Agriculture will in any way satisfy the farmers who have been obliged to give those notes. Just because he met a few farmers in a fairly prosperous district in Manitoba who insisted on giving notes for the relief they received is no reason why all farmers should be obliged to sign notes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I said in Saskatchewan.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I thought the minister said in Manitoba. In some parts of the country that may be so. I have not any reason to doubt his word. But if there were some farmers who wanted to sign notes, why was it necessary to compel all the other farmers to do so? Later on they could have paid back any money advanced without the necessity of signing notes at this time. If they are desirous of repaying the money they will do so in any case.

I leave the resolution in the judgment of the house.

Motion negatived on division.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

OUTSIDE APPOINTMENTS TO BE MADE ON RECOMMENDATION OF THE MINISTER

On the order to resume the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. McGibbon:

That, in the opinion of this house, all outside appointments should be taken away from the Civil Service Commission and made upon the recommendation of the minister.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I ask that this motion stand for the present in order that when the next order on the paper is proceeded with, I may, with the consent of the house, bring forward a resolution dealing with both these orders as I previously suggested in this debate.

Motion stands.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

EXCLUSION OF OUTSIDE SERVICE FROM OPERATION OF ACT

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I have an amendment to propose to the house in connection with the second reading of this bill. I think it is well known to members of the house that throughout this capital city, and in fact throughout Canada, sinister reflections have been circulated concerning members of the Civil Service Commission which tend, if they are not answered, to discredit the competency, efficiency and reliability of that commission. The matter of appointments to the civil service, especially appointments to what is known as the outside service, also on several occasions has been under discussion in this chamber, but in such discussions neither members of the Civil Service Commission nor officials or employees of the civil service of Canada have been able to participate.

Therefore it has appeared advisable that members of the Civil Service Commission and representatives of the civil service of Canada should have an opportunity to be heard before this house should adopt the pending resolution moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) and before second reading is given Bill No. 14, which second reading has been moved this evening by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon).

It has seemed to me, as the nominal representative in this house of the Civil Service Commission, that such hearing could be best afforded by the appointment of a special committee of seven members of the house, representing all political parties in this house. It also has appeared advisable that the widest possible authority should be given such committee to inquire into and report generally upon the administration and operation of the Civil Service Act, with power to advise this house as such committee may deem advisable concerning the repeal or amendment of any of the existing provisions of the Civil Service Act, or the substitution therefor or addition thereto of other provisions which will tend to ensure the efficient administration of that act.

It is within the memory of older members of the house that a royal commission on the civil service was appointed in 1908 which made a very voluminous report. In 1919 a special committee of this house made an inquiry and report concerning the inside service. Subsequently, in 1923, a special committee of this house was appointed to inquire into and report upon the operation of the Civil Service Act, of which committee Hon. James Malcolm was chairman. This committee also made a very extensive inquiry and report. Again in 1924 a special committee of the Senate made an inquiry and report on the civil service. All these reports were printed and published, and I think are now available for the consideration of members of this house. Nevertheless, the committee which I am about to propose will necessarily undertake very onerous duties and responsibilities. Although I am to be a member of that committee, I certainly accept that duty with very great reluctance indeed.

With consent, I move, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that all the words in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

That Bill No. 14 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that the further consideration of said bill and of the motion standing on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr.

McGibbon) be deferred until after a report thereon is received from the special committee of the house which is hereinafter named; and

That the said bill and motion be referred to a special committee of this house, consisting of Messrs. Cahan, Chevrier, Laurin, Sterling, Stinson, Vallance and Woodsworth, with power to the said committee to inquire into and report upon the said bill and motion, and also with power to said committee to inquire into and report upon appointments to and the control and direction of the civil service of Canada, and, generally, upon the administration and operation of the Civil Service Act, and also to report concerning the repeal or amendment of any of the provisions of said act or the substitution therefor or addition thereto of other provisions, as the committee may deem advisable, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I thought I heard the name of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Parent) mentioned as a member of that committee. I think the names I gave were those of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) and the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance).

Mr. CAHAN: Those were the names included.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid in view of standing order 45 the proposed amendment is not in order. Forty-eight hours' notice is required of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, and this amendment includes the appointment of a committee.

Mr. CAHAN: I realized that difficulty, but I intended to ask for unanimous consent. I communicated with the leader of the official opposition and the leader of the third party in this house, and members of the committee were named by them. I understood that unanimous consent would be given to a motion of this kind. Of course if that is not the case my resolution will stand as a notice of motion. Do I have consent?

Mr. LAPOINTE: So far as we are concerned there is no objection.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have no objection to the minister having the consent of the house to move this amendment, but I want to assure him that I have some objection to the amendment being adopted, and I propose to discuss the matter when the question is put.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I have no objection, either, to giving unanimous consent to the appointment of a committee, but it seems to me that the usual procedure in this house has not been followed this evening. In the first place the order was called for the resumption of the adjourned debate on the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) and I understood you, Mr. Speaker, to say the motion would stand. The next order was for the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Civil Service Act. You were about to put the motion, and I understood that the proposer was about to speak to it. I do not wish to accuse the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) of lack of courtesy towards one of the members on his own side of the house, but it seemed to me that he rose somewhat suddenly and cut off the debate.

Mr. CAHAN: The debate is not cut off; the moving of the amendment does not prevent a debate upon the original motion as well as upon the amendment itself. There is no endeavour to cut off any debate. So far as the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) is concerned, he informed me that he had already discussed this bill and did not intend to make a speech on the motion for second reading.

Mr. POWER: In any case I am sure there are a number of members who would have been very glad to make certain observations.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) raising a point of order?

Mr. POWER: The first point I wish to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, is that we have not followed the usual procedure in combining two motions or two orders and dealing with them by one motion. The second point is that even if that were allowed I doubt very much whether it is the custom and in accordance with the practice of this house to move, when the second reading of a bill has been proposed, that the bill be referred to a committee before any debate has taken place thereon.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has correctly stated what has taken place. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) moved the second reading of the bill and was about to speak when the hon. the Secretary of State intervened.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. May I be allowed to make a personal explanation? The hon. member for Dorchester told me that he did not intend to do more than move the motion, and therefore I was misled.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I have already pointed out, the resolution is not in order in that no notice has been given. It seeks to appoint a committee and, I take it, it could be regarded as in order only by the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. POWER: So far as that is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to consent; but I am pointing out that there has been an irregularity in procedure.

Mr. SPEAKER: So far as the resolution refers to order No. 2 on the order paper, namely, the resuming of the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. McGibbon, that motion not being before the house, it is not open to amendment, and in that respect this resolution is also out of order.

Mr. CAHAN: All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is this. When the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) came up, I said to the house that I should like to have it stand until I could make a motion dealing with it and with the bill. That, I understood, was consented to by the house; I asked consent. And again, in giving notice of this motion, I asked the leaders of the parties in the house to consent to this. I asked that they appoint their own members to the committee, and if the right hon. the leader of the opposition were in the house I think he would say that it was understood that, so far as he was concerned—and, I was under the impression, so far as the other party was concerned—I should have the consent of the house to this course.

Mr. POWER: Again, on a point of order, and with all due respect to the Secretary of State, to the leader of the opposition and to the leader of the other party, I submit that they cannot give consent to an irregular proceeding in this house. We have certain rules by which we must be governed. We can give consent when it is a matter of courtesy that such consent be given; but I contend that we cannot combine these two orders unless there has been a special proceeding in relation thereto. The first order was allowed to stand. If, after this first order had been moved, the Secretary of State had referred the matter to a committee, he could, when the second order was called and the second reading of the bill was moved, have also referred it to a committee. But to combine the two in one motion and still remain within the rules of the house is not possible and we cannot give consent thereto.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I was under the impression that my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) and my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) were disposed to give consent—

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. POWER: Absolutely; we are.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —but desired an opportunity to discuss the bill on the second reading. The motion for the second reading is now before the house.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Second reading of what?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Of the bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I understood the bill was to stand.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; the motion is made that the bill be now read the second time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No one has supported it yet.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The question has not been put. But in amendment to that motion the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) moved that the bill be not now read the second time but be referred. At this moment, therefore, both the motion for the second reading and the amendment are before the house and any hon. member who desires to discuss them has the fullest opportunity to do so. My hon. friend from Quebec South knows that we can override any rule by unanimous consent. If we have that consent, let us go on with the motion for second reading, and both the motion and the amendment can be discussed to the fullest extent. If we have not that consent, and under his honour's ruling, the motion will have to stand. I understood, however, that it had been arranged in all quarters of the house that the matter should be proceeded with as proposed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. POWER: I am willing to give consent, but I am pointing out that there has been an irregularity in procedure.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We admit that, and that is why consent is asked.

Mr. POWER: Yes; but it is an irregularity which requires not only consent but a special arrangement before we can proceed. I doubt very much whether, even with consent, we can combine the two orders and deal with them in one motion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have always been under the impression that by unanimous consent the house could do anything.

Mr. POWER: We can, but it is bad practice; let me put it that way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: One member can refuse his consent, but with unanimous consent this house is all-powerful.

Mr. POWER: I am willing to give consent if that is all that is required, but I suggest that for our own sakes and for the sake of precedent the Secretary of State ought to proceed properly.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I rise to a question of privilege. From the remarks of the Secretary of State the house might be led to believe that the leaders of the parties on this side had given consent to these two questions being referred to a special committee. Personally I have not been consulted in that regard. A few days ago the Secretary of State did ask me whether our group would select one of our members to be a member of the special committee of seven which would go into questions with reference to the Civil Service Commission, but he did not at that time say anything to me about referring this bill and the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario to the special committee. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to giving consent on the understanding that, as regards Bill No. 14, it goes to the committee without having received second reading, and therefore the principle of the bill is not accepted by the house, so that when the bill comes back we shall proceed with the second reading in the ordinary course.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is right.

Mr. ROWE: May I ask a question. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Bow River spoke for his party, I should like to know, for my own information, who is the official leader of that party.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Let me say to the hon. gentleman that either of us would probably make a better leader of any party than he would.

Mr. MANION: That is very doubtful.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of the house to standing order 75, which reads:

> Every public bill shall be read twice in the house before committal or amendment.

This is a motion for committal, and until the second reading has passed, the bill cannot be committed. I must rule that the amendment, so far, is out of order. The motion is for the second reading of the bill. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Explain.

Mr. GAGNON: The hon. Secretary of State was right in saying that I had told him it was not my intention to speak at great length on the bill. Last year I had the honour to move a bill similar to Bill No. 14 which is now before the house, and I thought it was unnecessary for me to discuss the subject at any length or to repeat what I then stated. At that time a number of hon. members gave their views on the bill which was then under consideration. Certain doubt which has existed as to the attitude of the government towards this bill has been removed. I welcome the inquiry which is to be held into the administration of the Civil Service Act, and I trust that it will be thorough and efficient. When the report of the committee is presented to the house I hope that such action will be taken as will satisfy public opinion.

When this bill was first introduced the trial of Bouchard and Chartrand was still in progress, and it would not have been proper to pass an opinion upon the matter at that time. The trial has disclosed many scandalous practices, and I contend that the Civil Service Commission stands now at the bar of public opinion. Not only in the province of Quebec but in other provinces a strong feeling exists that there ought to be an inquiry into the actions of this commission. When I spoke last year on this matter many important newspapers in Quebec such as the Montreal Gazette, the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph and others agreed with the stand which I took at that time. A series of articles appeared some time ago in the Mail and Empire by Doctor Grant, principal of Upper Canada College, Toronto. During the debate on this bill in 1931 I referred to the opinion expressed by Doctor Grant in his articles. The first one appeared on December 25, 1930, and I would like to quote from a subsequent article in order to show that Doctor Grant believed that a strong feeling against the commission existed not only in Quebec but in other provinces as well. Doctor Grant said:

> The whole idea of having three men to do such an executive job was wrong from the first. A commission is an admirable body to investigate and report; in an executive, unity of command is necessary. If the Canadian Pacific Railway ever wishes to go into bankruptcy, it could hardly find a better way than to put its general managership into commission and to give any two commissioners power to overrule the third. Any old-timer who remembers Sir William Van Horne will think with joy of the language that artist in profanity would have used to describe such a suggestion.

Not only did this eminent educationalist criticize the administration of the act but he considered as ridiculous and impracticable a commission where two members have the power to overrule the third.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I happen to be familiar with the views held by Doctor Grant in this matter. I am sure the hon. member has no desire to mislead the house, but does he say that Doctor Grant at any time expressed an adverse opinion regarding the principles of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. GAGNON: To make a proper reply to the hon. member I would have to read these three articles. I do not intend to take up the time of the house in doing that, but immediately after the debate is ended I will let my hon. friend have these extracts so that he can see for himself.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My hon. friend has not caught my point; I asked him if Doctor Grant had in a single line in his articles expressed an adverse opinion regarding the merit system, the principle underlying the Civil Service Act?

Mr. GAGNON: In order that my hon. friend and the house may not be misled, I am prepared to put these articles in Hansard. I have no desire to misinterpret what Doctor Grant has said, but his articles speak for themselves. The first is entitled, "Would abolish commission in control of civil service." That cannot be misinterpreted. Another article is entitled, "Drastic reduction advocated in civil service of Canada." I am quite prepared to put these articles on Hansard.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member should have them stencilled and send a copy to all hon. members.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Does not the hon. member read his Hansard?

Mr. POULIOT: I read only the hon. member's speeches.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): In English?

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member has not made any this year.

Mr. GAGNON: This discussion probably will tend to revive the question placed on the order paper by the hon. member (Mr. Pouliot) with reference to stenographers.

Mr. POULIOT: That will come in due course.

Mr. GAGNON: The placing of these articles on Hansard would serve the same purpose as sending a letter dictated to my own stenographer.

Mr. POULIOT: I object to their being placed on Hansard.

Mr. GAGNON: I do not intend to repeat what I said last year. Many hon. members in this house expressed the view that a change should take place. I think the best change which could be adopted would be one recommended by a non-partisan body, and the findings of the committee of this house appointed to investigate this act will receive my humble support.

I do not pose as a reformer. I did not draft the amendments which appear in this bill; I embodied the recommendations of the Senate committee of 1924 and some of the recommendations of the Malcolm committee of 1923. Should my bill be amended, I will not object; I am striving only to arrive at the best method of remedying a situation.

I am not against the merit system, but I do contend that the Civil Service Commission in its administration of the act does not recognize that system. Only a few weeks ago applications were requested for the position of chief page in this house. I have been informed that the examination embodied an essay on the League of Nations. Last year the position of expert mechanic in the marine signal branch of the Department of Marine at Quebec was vacant. There was a large number of applicants for the job. Two or three young men took lessons from a professor of chemistry at Laval university in order to learn the different problems involved, because they felt that to be good mechanics in the signal department, they must be acquainted with the action of salt water on buoys and similar matters. The successful candidate was the janitor of St. Patrick's church in the city of Quebec, and I am told by some of the applicants who submitted to the examination that they were asked only three questions. First they were asked if they were married or single; second, "What salary do you want?" Third, "When will you be ready to take the job?" One man after having passed the written examination got 95 points, but after answering these three questions successfully he received only ninety points. Why should a man be deprived of five points after having answered successfully the three ridiculous questions that I have already quoted? I could cite numbers of examples like the above.

Let me point out another aspect of the matter. I have already complained that neither the three commissioners nor the inspector or examiner inquire into the qualifications and characters of the candidates. After they have sat for the written examination, all the papers are sent by the inspector to an employee in the department and this employee, after making certain ratings and gradings, sends a report to the Civil Service Commission to the effect that candidate A should be first and candidate B should be second. Why, according to that so-called merit system, should the minister or the head of the department be deprived of the right of making an appointment, when the Civil Service Commission gives the power to a second-rate employee, who receives a salary of perhaps only $1,500 a year, to make an appointment in lieu of the minister?

The other day we read in the press that Mr. Renaud, who was an appointee from the province of Quebec in the Department of Justice and who has always been a good and efficient servant, died. The question arises as to who is to fill his place. Of course applications will be asked for throughout Canada and any lawyer who has practised his profession will be entitled to be a candidate. As regards Dr. Roche, who is a physician, Mr. Tremblay, who is a journalist, and Dr. MacTavish, who is also a journalist, what are the qualifications of those three gentlemen to judge as to the respective merits of the lawyers who will be applicants for the position which Mr. Renaud formerly held in the Department of Justice? The civil service commissioners will do as they have done in the past; they will ask a lawyer from Ottawa or somewhere else to act for them; they will delegate their powers to him to find out who is the best lawyer to fill that vacant position in the Department of Justice. I consider legislation which deprives a minister of the right to make an appointment and empowers a lawyer who is not even an employee of the Department of Justice to fill a position in that department, is unwise, unsound and ought to be amended.

I could speak for hours and days giving examples like the one I have already mentioned, showing that this so-called merit system is not based on true merit. I assure hon. members opposite that I am not approaching this question in any partisan spirit, because while some bad nominations have been made under Liberal administrations, some bad nominations have also been made under Conservative administrations. I want to approach the question in a broad spirit. It is all very well to say: We do not want to return to the patronage system. We want the nominations to be aboveboard, but while we are desirous of having the merit system, let us find a scheme which will be based on true merit and let the true merit system prevail. Let us do away with that camouflage system which has produced such bad results and has given birth to complaints all over Canada. I do not want to dwell at length on this question; I think I have made my point sufficiently clear, and I ask that this bill be now read a second time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the hon. member concludes his address on this particular bill, would he be good enough to explain to the house the reasons for the major change urged in the bill, namely, the exclusion of the outside service? That is an aspect of the bill he has not yet discussed.

Mr. GAGNON: I shall be pleased to answer briefly the question put by the hon. member for Bow River. I have already stated that the three commissioners sitting at Ottawa cannot really be the best judges of the qualifications of all the different employees living outside the city. I have already pointed out that these three men cannot be an encyclopaedia of science. They are not properly qualified to ascertain the qualifications of a man who wants to be appointed caretaker of a customs house in Vancouver, or a postmaster in the Yukon or a customs officer in the port of Gaspe. Therefore I think in the best interests of the civil service itself, it is better that the three commissioners sitting in Ottawa should devote themselves to applications and nominations for positions in the inside service alone. They will find that a hard enough job, because in the inside service there are at least 18,000 employees. The appointment of a postmaster, for instance, in any part of Canada could be better made by the minister of the department than by the Civil Service Commission. I might point out to the hon. member for Bow River that on the twenty-fourth of June of last year the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself stated that in the legislation of 1918 they had gone too far in putting the postmasters throughout Canada under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. It is not necessary for me to speak any longer, but I think the public interest will be best served by taking the outside service out of the jurisdiction of the commission; or, if the committee which is to be formed prefers, by devising other ways and means of appointing candidates to the outside service.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How does the hon. gentleman propose to appoint such outside candidates?

Mr. GAGNON: I do not think that at this stage of the proceedings it would be proper for me to answer all these questions, especially in view of the fact that there will be ample opportunity to answer them in committee. I am pleased to see that my hon. friend is a member of the committee because I am sure he will have some very good suggestions to offer.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I am astonished, but at the same time I am not surprised, that this evening we should have a proposal from the ranks of the Conservative party of a character that is calculated almost entirely to destroy the Civil Service Act which that party is responsible for putting on the statute book of this country.

Mr. MALONEY: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that the previous speaker closed the debate?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Bow River is quite in order in addressing the house.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is also interesting to note that until I asked him the question after he had sat down the first time, the mover of the motion (Mr. Gagnon) did not give any explanation whatever of the most sinister proposal in the bill, that of turning over to the greediest of hordes the patronage of the various constituencies throughout this dominion. The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), when he spoke a few moments ago on an amendment that was ruled out of order, proposed that this bill and the resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) should be referred to a special committee, and he gave two chief reasons for that. The first was that there were certain sinister reflections upon the present Civil Service Commission which in the public interest should be examined into and cleared up.

Mr. CAHAN: And concerning which they should be heard.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes. He said that neither the representatives of the Civil Service Commission nor those of the rank and file of the civil service had had an opportunity to defend themselves in connection with these allegations. The other reason he gave was that we might devise ways and means of improving on the Civil Service Act and its administration.

In regard to all these proposals of the Secretary of State, I, and I believe my colleagues are in complete accord. We think it advisable that there should be an examination into the actual conditions under which the administration of the civil service is being conducted to-day by the Civil Service Commission, and I will go so far as to agree with my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) and join hands with him in a dismissal of the present civil service commissioners. I have no hesitation in saying that, from what meagre knowledge I have of what has been going on for some years and is now beginning to come out in the public press; but to destroy the merit principle—never. This country cannot afford to do that at this stage.

It is within a few minutes of eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and as I wish to discuss the principle of this bill at some length, I ask you to call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member wishes to bring the debate to a close he should move to adjourn the debate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We can call it eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, if the house agrees.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As I was saying a moment ago when the opposition with its usual courtesy declined me the privilege of having it called eleven o'clock—

An hon. MEMBER: Not the opposition, the government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, not the opposition. Strangely enough I think I have had more courtesy at the hands of the late government than I have had at the hands of this one.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know what my hon. friend is talking about. I asked the Speaker to call it eleven o'clock and he declined.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I did not hear my hon. friend. Will he please accept my sincere regrets.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand the Minister of Justice. If it is the desire of the house to call it eleven o'clock, it is eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 19, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

LIMITATION OF RATE OF INTEREST CHARGED BY BANKS

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, to amend the Bank Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. SPENCER: My object in introducing this bill, Mr. Speaker, is similar to that I had a year ago when I introduced a bill with regard to the limitation of interest that may be charged by a bank. The main difference in this bill, as compared with the one of a year ago, is that the penalty clauses are somewhat milder. This has been done because of the criticism made in this house a year ago that the penalties then suggested were too severe.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS

AMELIORATION OF THE CONDITION OF WOUNDED AND SICK IN ARMIES IN THE FIELD

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the international convention for the amelioration of the condition of the wounded and sick in armies in the field, Geneva, July 27, 1929, signed on behalf of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, on January 29, 1930, subject to the following reservation:—

"That the government of the Dominion of Canada will interpret article 28 of the convention in the sense that the legislative measures contemplated by that article may provide that private individuals, associations, firms or companies who have used the arms of the Swiss confederation, or marks constituting an imitation thereof, for any lawful purpose before the coming into force of the present convention shall not be prevented from continuing to use such arms or marks for the same purpose," and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the said reservation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has been standing on the order paper for some few days asks this house to ratify and confirm, with the reservation indicated, the convention signed at Geneva on the 27th July, 1929, and finally executed as far as this country is concerned on the 29th January, 1930, by Doctor Riddell on behalf of Canada.

I suppose there are few instances in history of the influence of one man having such far-reaching consequences as is the case of Henri Dunant who, after the battle of Solferino, viewing the results of war close at hand, seeing wounded left to die in pain and under conditions almost indescribable, concluded that some action should be taken by which agreements would be arrived at by those at war to prevent a recurrence of conditions such as those he saw. The result was that on the 22nd day of August, 1864, at Geneva, a convention was signed whereby practically all the nations of the world agreed that in the event of war the wounded would be cared for under conditions that to some extent at least would ensure the possibility of their recovery.

That convention was subsequently amended on July 6, 1906, but the experience of the great war made it desirable that further amendments should be made, and conferences of the International Red Cross Association and of the parent Red Cross organization established by Dunant made it essential that those changes should be considered by all the nations of the world who were signatories to the covenant of the League of Nations, and indeed those who were not. The result is the international convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armies in the Field, which was laid upon the table of this house a few days ago. I may say that the convention has been signed by the following states: Germany; the United States of America; Australia; Belgium; Bolivia; Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and all parts of the British Empire which are not separate members of the League of Nations; France; Greece; Hungary; Italy; Japan; Latvia; Luxemburg; Mexico; Nicaragua; Norway; Netherlands; Persia; Poland; Portugal; Roumania; the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes; Siams; Switzerland; Czechoslovakia; Turkey; Uruguay and Venezuela. The order in which I have read the names of these countries is the order in which the convention was signed.

I do not think it desirable to take up the time of the house in referring to the particular provisions of the convention, for I assume that members of the house have availed themselves of their opportunity to read the convention as a whole. I may say shortly, however, that this convention provides for care and attention being given to the wounded and sick and their removal from the field of hostilities, under the protection of the Red Cross flag, and the establishment as far as may be possible of a neutral zone during the period in which those who are sick and wounded are being so removed, at least to some safe portion of the battlefield. I will not do further than read the heads of the chapters. After providing for the care of the wounded and sick officers and soldiers, it is provided that the occupant of the field of battle shall take measures to search for the wounded and dead and protect them against pillage and maltreatment and that wherever circumstances permit a local armistice or a suspension of fire shall be arranged to permit the removal of the wounded remaining between the lines. It provides for medical formations and establishments which are intended to accompany armies in the field, and that the fixed establishments of the medical service shall be respected and protected by the belligerents. Then there are provisions as to personnel, as to buildings and materials, mobile medical formations, buildings of aid societies, which shall be regarded as private property; the provision of medical transport, and then this provision which gives to the operations of the Red Cross organization its peculiar effectiveness. Chapter 6, article 19, deals with the distinctive emblem:

As a compliment to Switzerland, the heraldic emblem of the red cross on a white ground, formed by reversing the federal colours, is retained as the emblem and distinctive sign of the medical service of armed forces.

Nevertheless, in the case of countries which already use, in place of the red cross, the red crescent or the red lion and sun on a white ground as a distinctive sign, these emblems are also recognized by the terms of the present convention.

Article 20

The emblem shall figure on the flags, armlets, and on all material belonging to the medical service, with the permission of the competent military authority.

The application and execution of the convention are provided for, as well as the suppression of abuses and infractions, to which I shall make reference. When Great Britain signed the convention a limitation or restriction was placed upon its operation, and the same may be said with respect to the signature by Canada. I shall read article 28:

The governments of the high contracting parties whose legislation is not at present adequate for the purpose, shall adopt or propose to their legislatures the measures necessary to prevent at all times:—

(a) the use of the emblem or designation "Red Cross" or "Geneva Cross" by private individuals or associations, firms or companies, other than those entitled thereto under the present convention, as well as the use of any sign or designation constituting an imitation, for commercial or any other purposes;

(b) by reason of the compliment paid to Switzerland by the adoption of the reversed federal colours, the use by private individuals or associations, firms or companies of the arms of the Swiss confederation, or marks constituting an imitation, whether as trade marks or as parts of such marks, for a purpose contrary to commercial honesty, or in circumstances capable of wounding Swiss national sentiment.

The prohibition indicated in (a) of the use of marks or designations constituting an imitation of the emblem or designation of "Red Cross" or "Geneva Cross," as well as the prohibition in (b) of the use of the arms of the Swiss confederation or marks constituting an imitation, shall take effect as from the date fixed by each legislature, and not later than five years after the coming into force of the present convention. From the date of such coming into force, it shall no longer be lawful to adopt a trade mark in contravention of these rules.

It will be observed that the signature of the British representative, Sir Horace Rumbold, at page 15 of the convention, follows these words:

I declare that my signature of this convention in respect of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and all parts of the British Empire which are not separate members of the League of Nations is subject to the understanding that His Britannic Majesty will interpret article 28 of the convention in the sense that the legislative measures contemplated by that article may provide that private individuals, associations, firms or companies who have used the arms of the Swiss confederation, or marks constituting an imitation thereof, for any lawful purpose before the coming into force of the present convention shall not be prevented from continuing to use such arms or marks for the same purpose.

And when Canada signed, the following declaration was made by Doctor Riddell:

I declare that my signature of this convention in respect of Canada is subject to the understanding that the government of the Dominion of Canada will interpret article 28 of the convention in the sense that the legislative measures contemplated by that article may provide that private individuals, associations, firms or companies who have used the arms of the Swiss confederation, or marks constituting an imitation thereof, for any lawful purpose before the coming into force of the present convention shall not be prevented from continuing to use such arms or marks for the same purpose.

The same reservation was made for Australia, New Zealand, the Irish Free State and India. The legislative provision contemplated by article 28 is contained in the bill which was introduced a few days ago by the Secretary of State in connection with unfair competition. So that the use of the heraldic device, to which reference is made in the convention, and from which as a matter of fact it derives its ordinary name, Red Cross convention, will now be prohibited except with respect to those who have used it prior to the date of the convention.

I do not think it is necessary to make a more lengthy explanation with respect to this convention, for I take it that all those who contributed to the activities of the Red Cross during the great war realize the tremendous amount of work that was done in Canada for the sick and wounded; and there are many in this house, medical men, who participated in the medical services that are protected by the convention. Under the circumstances it is not necessary that I should do more than move the adoption of the resolution standing in my name.

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS OF WAR

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the international convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war, Geneva, July 27, 1929, signed on behalf of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, on January 29, 1930, and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: It may be said that the history of the convention relating to the treatment of prisoners of war has to some extent followed, and been parallel with, the history of the measures that have been taken for the alleviation of the condition of the sick and wounded in war; but there are perhaps some principles to which reference might be made dealing with the treatment of prisoners of war, which the experience of the great war made it essential should be adopted in the convention that was signed on July 27, 1929, and to which Canada became a party on the 29th day of January, 1930. I will not read the names of the signatories who signified their approval and acceptance of the provisions of the convention. It is sufficient for my purpose to indicate that the same nations that signed the Red Cross convention, so-called, also executed the convention which I am now asking the house to ratify. A few observations might be made, however, of a historic character, with respect to this convention.

The principles which now govern the treatment of prisoners of war were laid down in the second convention of the Hague conference in 1899 and were entitled, "Rules respecting the laws and customs of war on land." They were revised in 1907 at the second conference, being the fourth of such conventions. These conventions and the regulations annexed thereto cover the subject matter very extensively. They were adhered to by nearly all the nations and may be considered to some extent the basis of the international convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war now before the house. After the war, however, it became apparent, in the light of the experience of the combatants and the knowledge that was gained by neutral countries, particularly Switzerland, that some improvement should be made, and accordingly inquiries were instituted and matters were discussed very carefully at the tenth international conference of Red Cross societies held at Geneva in 1921. This undertook the preparation of an international code relating to prisoners of war. Regulations were prepared by an international committee under the chairmanship of Lord Justice Younger, the present Lord Blanesburgh which sat at the Hague in 1921, and at the eleventh convention of the International Red Cross Society at Geneva in 1923 the Red Cross societies put forward an elaborate draft convention on this subject. In 1924 the International Red Cross committee proposed that the question of preparing an international code relating to prisoners of war should be laid before a diplomatic conference, and in the meantime the proper authorities of the British and Canadian governments were giving attention to the report of the Younger committee to which I have just referred. In August, 1925, the Swiss government inquired whether the governments concerned would be willing to take part in a conference for the ratification of the Geneva convention of July 6, 1906, and whether they would agree to entrust to a diplomatic conference for the ratification of the Geneva convention the task of preparing a code for prisoners of war. In 1929, the year in which this convention was executed, the proposals of the Swiss government were accepted. The diplomatic conference to which I have referred was held at Geneva for the purpose of revising the Red Cross convention of 1906 and preparing a code relating to prisoners of war. As I have indicated, this convention was signed by the Canadian representative in January, 1930.

The convention with which we are now dealing covers the efforts to be made to take care of those who may become prisoners by capture or otherwise during the progress of hostilities. I do not know that any good purpose will be served by taking up further the time of the house except to say that no legislation will be necessary at the present time. Practically all the countries have ratified the convention.

I hope the time may be long distant when we Canadians will be again called upon to deal with the complex problems which arise out of our nationals becoming prisoners of war. The exchange of prisoners, the care of prisoners, the providing of food and comforts, the inspection as far as it may be possible through the aid of neutrals of the facilities provided for their care, all these are matters of which I think every hon. member of this house has some knowledge. I do not think there is any hon. member who during the period from 1914 to 1918 had not to deal with some phase of the question arising out of Canadians becoming prisoners of war, or who through the Red Cross societies did not give some support or succour to prisoners.

In this regard all countries owe a great debt to Switzerland. The Swiss republic has taken the lead in connection with matters of this kind and since the first convention at Geneva held in 1864, to which the experience of the British gained in the Crimean war was very important, this republic has continued to make a great contribution to these subjects. The organized efforts which have been made by the head of the Red Cross organization, very frequently a Swiss citizen, and the work which has been done at the Hague in connection with prisoners of war, merit the thanks of every country in the world. I bear gladly this testimony to the zeal with which the Swiss statesmen and public men and women have devoted themselves to this matter.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this convention would appear to be somewhat of an anachronism. There may have been the necessity of caring for the sick in the field and the proper care of prisoners during the last war, but I understood that nearly all the civilized nations of the world had signed a solemn pact that they would abandon war as a means of settling international disputes. It would seem to me that the putting forward of conventions of this kind is evidence that we, together with other nations, do not take our obligations very seriously. I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if he does not consider that there is a very decided danger in introducing conventions of this kind, that it might weaken our confidence in the obligations which we have undertaken under the Kellogg and other pacts.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact that nations have taken this precaution to care for the sick, wounded and prisoners in the event of war must be considered along with their declarations that there will be no wars as acts of national policy. It is well to remember that even in the covenant of the League of Nations there were certain, shall I say, punitive provisions which indicated the possibility at least of a police force finding it necessary to maintain the position taken by the league. In any event, in the two conventions to which I have alluded in the event of human nature not being perfect and the imperfections of mankind being manifested by war in the manner indicated, that antecedent provision has been made to ensure that the calls of humanity shall be observed to the greatest possible extent as against the weaknesses of frail mankind.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of the house to move the adjournment to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance in connection with the dismissal of between two and three hundred officers and men of the Royal Canadian Air Force without regard to their families, their overseas service or period of enlistment, and the embarrassing situation which may arise if they are forced by the necessity of employment to accept service with another nation. I submit that the matter is one of urgent public importance because of the lack of notice given and the necessity with which this great body of young Canadians is faced in order to make arrangements for employment.

Mr. BENNETT: The leave should precede the speech.

Mr. RALSTON: I am making only a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule requires an hon. member making such a request to state the matter, not to argue it, and the time has arrived when a written statement should be handed to the Speaker. The house knows that I allow as much latitude as possible in debate but I cannot find that this application is in order nor that it is of urgent public importance. May provides for this procedure as follows:

> Though the responsibility of bringing forward a subject as a definite matter of urgent public importance rests with the member who desires to exercise the right given by the standing order, there must be a prima facie case of urgency.

I do not think a prima facie case of urgency exists. I quote again from May at page 248, as follows:

> Motions for adjournment regarding matters for the discussion of which the committee of supply or other appointed business would afford an early opportunity or a matter which is under the consideration of a select committee have been ruled to be out of order.

Last evening upon the adjournment of the house the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) gave notice that to-day the house would go into supply, and this matter could be discussed when that motion is made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not true that on Fridays Your Honour leaves the chair without motion being put?

Mr. SPEAKER: The next time it will be necessary for a motion to be made for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply is not so far distant, and at that time this matter can be discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Am I not right in saying that to-day the house will go into supply without an opportunity being afforded for discussion?

Mr. SPEAKER: It will be necessary some day early next week to move that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply, and that will provide an opportune time to discuss this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I point out that Monday of next week is private members' day and in all probability there will be no opportunity of moving to go into supply on that day. It is for the government to determine what day they will move to go into supply. On Tuesday they may decide to bring up other measures. Wednesday and Thursday of next week are again private members' days, and it is very difficult to know how long it will be before an opportunity will be afforded for bringing up this matter on going into supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of what the leader of the opposition has said, I still adhere to my first ruling.

Mr. RALSTON: With all deference, Mr. Speaker—and I am accustomed to bow to your ruling—I feel that the matter is one of urgent public importance from the point of view of Canada and of this large body of citizens. Therefore I am going to take this opportunity of respectfully appealing from your ruling.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have always had some doubt as to whether there is an appeal from a ruling on this phase of our procedure. I am putting this to my hon. friend not at all as a conviction but merely as a suggestion by way of question as to whether there should be or not. In order that leave may be granted to a member to move to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, two factors must be considered. First, the Speaker must make a decision. Then the house, by a number of the members standing in their places, indicates, that the matter shall be proceeded with. I do not think the first, touches a question of order; it is a question of discretion pure and simple, and I should say under ordinary circumstances it is not appealable. That is the view that I entertained when I was on the opposite side of the house. Whether or not it is sound, I cannot say, because apparently, as far as I have been able to ascertain there are no authorities respecting the matter. But to determine whether or not it is appealable, first the Speaker is charged with the exercise of the discretion which he must exercise as a condition precedent to the house saying it will proceed. Then, instead of a majority of the house saying: We shall proceed, it is merely essential that a limited number stand in their places, and when they do that, the two factors combine to bring the motion before the house. If we apply the ordinary rule touching similar cases, it does not seem there should be an appeal from the exercise of that discretion, because that would appear to be intended at least to give to the presiding officer of the chamber a power to say that in his opinion a matter is of urgent public importance, but it does not ask the majority so to decide. Once the presiding officer has exercised his discretion in that way, then as I have said, a limited number, I think twenty, exercising their right, permit the debate to proceed. If twenty do not stand up, then of course there is no motion and the debate does not proceed. In other words, it is not a question of procedure with respect to the conduct of the business of the house, but rather a matter of another character entirely.

I am raising the question only in order that it may be indicated in the records of the house as to that being the correct procedure. So far as the rest of it is concerned, if it is a matter on which an appeal can be taken as regards that phase, it follows that if the appeal succeeds—and that is the point I am making now—the debate will not proceed, because twenty would have to stand up even after the Speaker had been overruled and that would negative the necessity of the two factors combined to make it possible, for the house has acted in both cases. In other words, a majority of the house has decided that the Speaker shall decide that the matter is of urgent public importance. Therefore you have substituted for the discretion of the Speaker under the rule, that of the majority of the House of Commons, but that majority cannot carry it alone, for after that there must still be the motion put to the house and twenty, not a majority, signify their approval. It therefore follows that it makes it nonsensical to say there should be an appeal from the Speaker, because otherwise all that would be necessary in the rule would be to say: If the majority of the house so decide in the first instance, the debate shall be proceeded with. I am putting the matter only as it appears to me now and as it has done on several occasions when I have been discussing whether the rule does not contemplate first of all the exercise of a judicial discretion by the presiding officer of the chamber, from which discretion there is no appeal in deciding that it is a matter of urgent public importance; after which the house, not by a majority, but by twenty of its members standing in their places, say that the debate may proceed.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I was a member of the committee that drafted that rule. The purpose was that the question should first be brought to the attention of the Speaker and if the Speaker had any doubt in the matter he could ask whether the hon. member making the motion or asking for that leave had the permission of the house. Then if twenty members rose in their places, that was sufficient for the debate to proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would respectfully refer hon. members to standing order 31, and particularly to subsections (2) and (3):

(2) The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

That has been done.

(3) He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

If the Speaker does not think it in order or does not think it of urgent public importance, then he does not read it out nor ask the house whether the member has the leave of the house. I think that ends the matter If the Speaker felt it was of urgent public importance and in order, and read it to the house; then if an objection were taken, notwithstanding the Speaker's opinion, it would be put to the vote of the house.

Mr. POWER: May I point out that no objection has been taken.

Mr. SPEAKER: I quite agree with that. The matter has not come to the stage where an objection can be taken. The Speaker has dealt with it himself.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the ruling from which I am respectfully appealing.

Mr. SPEAKER: I submit there is no appeal from that ruling.

Mr. RALSTON: May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the point of order? I understand the Prime Minister has indicated that for one purpose at least there is vested in you some power that is not subject to the control of the house at all. I submit fundamentally—and it is almost an elementary principle—that that view cannot prevail. Speaking with all deference, I submit that you, Mr. Speaker, in making that prima facie decision, because that is what it is, are substituting yourself, for the time being, for the house, but subject always to the house deciding by a majority whether or not they shall overrule your decision in that respect. The situation cannot be otherwise. I do not think you will find in the rules anywhere a place where Mr. Speaker is given a discretion which is not subject to the direction of the house by majority vote. The only thing one would have to do would be to appeal from the last ruling which you, Mr. Speaker, have made, to the effect that you will not permit this appeal. This of course leads to exactly the situation which the Prime Minister mentioned, namely, an absolutely nonsensical position, because, after all, the second ruling that you have made is that you will not submit this to the house. There is no suggestion anywhere that there is no appeal from that ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member indicate the rule providing for such an appeal?

Mr. RALSTON: I am referring to the general rule which provides for appeals from decisions of the Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: On points of order.

Mr. RALSTON: This is only a point of order. The question is whether this motion shall be discussed now. Surely that is a point of order as regards the procedure in the house. There is something which has to be decided in connection with that, and that is a question of fact or of opinion whether the matter is of urgent public importance. You, Mr. Speaker, think not. If a majority of the house think otherwise, then it seems to me that the matter is perfectly in order and should be discussed. I can find nowhere in the rules that you, Mr. Speaker, are vested with authority to substitute your judgment for the judgment of a majority of the house if they choose to exercise their right in that respect. I submit with all deference that this is a very important ruling which is being sought, Mr. Speaker, and I ask that you reconsider in order that the house may exercise its usual right in connection with an appeal.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): There are one or two points which should be kept in mind in regard to this ruling. Rule 12 is the one that applies to Mr. Speaker's rulings on questions of order, and it is in this language:

Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate.

Rule 31 is in the nature of an extraordinary proceeding. Subsection 3 of that rule provides:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order—

That is the first consideration:

—and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

I understand that in this case the Speaker does not think it is a matter of urgent public importance, and that, I submit, is hardly a question of order. When a question of order is involved, there is no doubt that there is an appeal from any ruling of the Speaker. But here is discretion vested in the Speaker to say whether or not the matter is of urgent public importance. I contend that there is no appeal in that respect because it is upon that point that I understand the Speaker has ruled.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I beg to call attention, Mr. Speaker, to page 74, a few paragraphs beyond that quoted by you in dealing with this subject. Paragraph 249 reads as follows:

In doubtful cases—

This is a doubtful case:

—the question of urgency and of importance are left for the house to decide by giving or withholding its support.

Mr. BENNETT: The Speaker has to say whether it is doubtful or not.

Mr. NEILL: It is doubtful because the Speaker is of one opinion and the members are of another.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not make it doubtful.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the contention of the Prime Minister is right I submit with all deference and respect that there would be an appeal now from your ruling on the point of order raised by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: I only put the matter to the house. I say that I have no conviction about it one way or the other. I want to be perfectly frank about it.

Mr. NEILL: Then it is doutful.

Mr. EULER: If it is doubtful it comes under this rule.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I share the views of my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) that there is an appeal to the house from any ruling or decision of the chair. Otherwise it would place Your Honour in the position of a dictatorship over the majority in the house, which has never been contemplated. I do not think there is any difference as regards a point of order and a point of procedure. I will quote from Bourinot, page 366. After saying that the Speaker shall preserve order and decorum and shall decide questions of order subject to an appeal to the house, Bourinot proceeds:

Instances have occurred in both the English and the Canadian houses of the Speaker's decisions on points of procedure or order having been overruled.

Even if there might be some contention that this is not a question of order as contemplated by rule 12, it is at least a question of procedure, and from your decision and ruling I respectfully submit that there is the right of appeal.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must abide by the rules. It is very distasteful to me to have to give this ruling. However, the rules as they are were framed by the House of Commons, and it seems to me that the house had in contemplation placing a matter of this kind entirely in the discretion of the Speaker, or otherwise the rule would have been worded differently. I cannot see it in any other way. I would prefer to leave it to the house, but I take it that under the rules I have no discretion in the matter.

Mr. RALSTON: I appreciate and I take in all sincerity Your Honour's assurance in that respect. I feel that you would rather leave it to the house and that you consider this ruling is one which ought to have been made. But I can relieve Your Honour in that respect because I can now respectfully appeal to the house from your ruling that there is no appeal from the ruling which you have just made to the effect that this is a matter entirely within the discretion of Your Honour. That certainly is a question of order which the Speaker has now decided.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member put that in writing?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I with all deference and every respect offer this suggestion? Inasmuch as there would appear to be some doubt what the proper procedure is in the circumstances, would it not be wise in order to give Your Honour ample time in which to make a thorough survey of the authorities to permit an appeal without prejudice to your decision and without prejudice to the rights in the matter, thus disposing of the situation for the time being, and when Your Honour has had ample time to study the authorities a final decision on the point might be given.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the wish of the house I am prepared to disregard the rule on that understanding, but I have not altered my opinion as to the meaning of the rule.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has addressed himself to me more or less in connection with the matter of taking the vote on the appeal "without prejudice".

Mr. RHODES: I was addressing myself strictly to the chair.

Mr. RALSTON: Addressing me through Mr. Speaker. I would not want to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend if it were not effective in this respect: Supposing the appeal were sustained, I would not want it said by any member of this house that the appeal was asserted without prejudice and therefore it is not binding and I have not the right to discuss the matter. The decision of the house must be binding for the purposes of this resolution, I submit, and I think my hon. friend so intended.

Mr. BENNETT: If the appeal succeeds, the discussion goes on.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, following the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), that when you are studying this question you also study the broader question as to whether or not there are any decisions of the Speaker which cannot be appealed. After all, that question transcends in importance anything which has transpired here today. The contention of a great many of us is that the Speaker is an officer of the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member speaking on a point of order or just giving advice?

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, I expected a little better treatment than that.

Mr. SPEAKER: I submit that the house and the Speaker are entitled to better treatment from the hon. member. If the hon. member wishes to speak on a point of order and does so, in order, I shall be very glad indeed to hear him, but for him to get up and suggest that the Speaker should study this and study that is out of order.

Mr. POWER: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I was simply following on the suggestion of the Minister of Finance to the effect that you might take some little time for consideration of the points that have been put before you this afternoon, and I wish to suggest with all deference and respect that the important point put before Your Honour—

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to know upon what the hon. member is basing his remarks. There is nothing before the house for discussion.

Mr. VALLANCE: There was the suggestion by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. SPEAKER: That does not put the hon. member in order. The Speaker having decided that the question submitted by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) for leave to adjourn the house is not in order, and the question proposed to be discussed is not one of urgent public importance, Mr. Ralston appeals from that decision. Is it the pleasure of the house that the Speaker's decision be sustained? Those in favour will please say "aye".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those against?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The house divided on the question: "Shall the ruling of the Speaker be sustained?" And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

Mr. McINTOSH: I was paired with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy). Had I voted I would have voted against Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was paired with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins). Had I voted I would have voted against Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. GERSHAW: I was paired with the hon. member for London (Mr. White). Had I voted I would have voted against Your Honour's ruling.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I respectfully ask whether the suggestion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has been accepted, that this vote be taken without prejudice and not considered as an authority guiding Your Honour or the house in the future, until Your Honour has looked into the matter further?

Mr. SPEAKER: My understanding of the situation is that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) appealed from the decision of the Speaker that his ruling under subsection 3 of standing order 31 was not subject to appeal. The appeal of the hon. member has not been sustained and therefore the decision of the Speaker that his ruling under that standing order is not subject to appeal, stands.

ENLISTMENT OF CANADIANS IN NAVAL OR MILITARY FORCES OF FOREIGN POWER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Apropos of the subject to which I referred a few moments ago, I noticed in the Toronto Globe a despatch dated February 18, in which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is quoted as giving the law with regard to what is known as foreign enlistments. I feel satisfied that the Prime Minister has not seen the article because I am sure he would have corrected it. The statement is this:

> The Globe sought comment from the Prime Minister, who revealed his profound knowledge of the law. Mr. Bennett said that enlistment of Canadians in the Chinese army or the army of any other foreign country at peace with Britain was forbidden by the Foreign Enlistment Act.

I would call the attention of my right hon. friend to the fact that there is evidently an omission of some very important words, and these words are contained in section 4 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, which forbids the enlistment of Canadians in the military or naval service of any foreign state "at war" with any foreign state at peace with Her Majesty, and not, as is purported to have been stated by the Prime Minister, the enlistment of Canadians in the naval or military forces of any country at peace with this country.

Mr. BENNETT: I think, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is entitled to my thanks for directing attention to the article in the Globe. As I was going out the door the other evening a correspondent asked me whether or not there was objection and I recalled the Foreign Enlistment Act and made a statement with respect to it. This morning I looked at the act which, as the hon. gentleman knows, was passed in 1870 by the imperial parliament, extending "to all the dominions of Her Majesty, including the adjacent territorial waters". Section 4 reads:

> Penalty on enlistment in service of foreign state
> If any person, without the licence of Her Majesty, being a British subject, within or without Her Majesty's dominions, accepts or agrees to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any foreign state at peace with Her Majesty, and in this act referred to as a friendly state, or whether a British subject or not within Her Majesty's dominions, induces any other person to accept or agree to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any such foreign state as aforesaid,—He shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour.

Then there is in section 5, "Penalty on leaving Her Majesty's dominions with intent to serve a foreign state."

Mr. RALSTON: Again, foreign state "at war."

Mr. BENNETT: That is as it appears in the section; that is the rubric. The section reads:

> Penalty on leaving Her Majesty's dominions with intent to serve a foreign state
> If any person, without the licence of Her Majesty, being a British subject, quits or goes on board any ship with a view of quitting Her Majesty's dominions, with intent to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with a friendly state, or, whether a British subject or not, within Her Majesty's dominions, induces any other person to quit or to go on board any ship with a view of quitting Her Majesty's dominions with the like intent,—He shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour.

As I have said to my hon. friend, I was just leaving the building and I merely made reference to the Foreign Enlistment Act without intending in any sense to speak with respect to the definite provisions of any particular section. I observe further that there has been a despatch published indicating that a number of Canadians were contemplating employment with the Chinese forces. A cablegram has just been received from the trade commissioner in Shanghai directed to the ministry of trade and commerce, reading:

Reference Reuters Ottawa despatches which state airmen offering to come to China absolutely no chance of employment. Five who came to Shanghai stranded.

I think perhaps the house is entitled to the information just received.

Mr. DUFF: Those five must have gone on a ship that got stranded.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my right hon. friend permit me one question further arising out of this. I may say that the Globe's report is also inaccurate in this respect, that it purports to quote the section after it has quoted the statement of the Prime Minister, but again leaves out the words "at war". My question to the Prime Minister as Minister of External Affairs is this: Is the Chinese nation at war with the Japanese nation within the terms of the act to which reference has been made?

Mr. BENNETT: I know the hon. gentleman is not serious in asking that question of me. It is a question which is being discussed in many quarters and doubtless the Hague tribunal might be able to offer an opinion that might be authoritative. At least I am expressing none.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows there is no question about it.

Mr. BENNETT: There is not?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the hon. gentleman is of that view.

Mr. RALSTON: I am asking the Prime Minister, because he is quoting the section. I am asking him for his opinion as Minister of External Affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not propose to endeavour to answer the question. That is the short and simple way of putting it.

Mr. RALSTON: I suggest that this section be not quoted.

Mr. BENNETT: I quoted the Foreign Enlistment Act; the section was not quoted by me. I have just read it for the information of the house and if the hon. gentleman has any difficulty in the matter he will settle it with the Globe.

Mr. RALSTON: I have none.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES OF MUNICIPALITIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), and to ask the indulgence of the house while I read a short telegram which I received at 12.30 today. It reads:

No action as yet by Victoria. Phoned them fifteenth and eighteenth instant, answers just the same waiting action by Ottawa. Situation daily growing worse now spending more than one thousand dollars daily on direct relief. No direct relief accounts paid by us for January. Tradesmen seriously affected. No payment from Victoria for direct relief accounts for latter part of December. Some action must come from Ottawa. Preparing further statement for you. Please take immediate action, situation desperate.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The hon. member was kind enough to send me a few moments ago a note signifying his intention to ask this question. I find that all the accounts from Burnaby for direct relief, owing by the Dominion government and submitted to us, have been paid. The Dominion proportion of direct relief for Burnaby paid under the 1931 act to date is $11,766.51. Expenditures were made between August 16 and December 12, 1931, and all direct relief accounts received to date from Burnaby have been paid. The following accounts were included and the cheques mailed on the dates I will mention: December 15, $1,451.68; January 28, $2,336.29; February 18, $3,067.83; November 30, 1931, $3,713.88; February 15, 1932, $1,196.83. There are accounts now in the hands of the Department of Labour received on February 13, the checking of which has been just concluded, and for which cheques will be forwarded immediately, so the hon. member will see that so far as the government is concerned, as soon as the accounts are received they are attended to and cheques are mailed out.

SITUATION IN FAR EAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of our obligations under the covenant of the League of Nations, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what is Canada's policy with regard to the present situation in China.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member sent me a note yesterday indicating that he proposed to ask the question he has asked, and in view of the importance of the matter I thought it well to submit the following statement.

The Canadian government has followed with grave concern the situation in China, of which it has been kept fully informed by cablegrams. Our friendly relations of long standing with both parties to the dispute, and our position on the Pacific, give an especial interest in the success of the efforts for the preservation of peace which the council of the league has undertaken. These efforts have not yet succeeded but they will not likely be given up. The Canadian government is hopeful that ultimately they will result in the restoration of that good understanding between the peoples, upon which the peace of the world depends. In view of the fact that the council of the league is still continuing its efforts at mediation, and the possibility that a special session of the assembly may be called to deal with the situation, in which Canada would be represented, I think I am within the judgment of the house when I suggest that it would be premature to attempt to make a statement now as to what would be the policy of the Canadian government in the event of failure of these efforts for settlement. If a special meeting of the assembly is called it will be the duty of the Canadian government to instruct its representatives as to the position to be taken in the light of the situation as it will have developed at that time. I need hardly add that every step that His Majesty's government in Canada can take for the maintenance and preservation of peace will be taken.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

REPRESENTATION OF THE CIVIL SERVICE ASSOCIATION OF MONTREAL ON TEN PER CENT SALARY DEDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) a question in connection with a telegram which I have just received from the Civil Service Association of Montreal, and which reads as follows:

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Dr. J. A. Denis, M.P., Ottawa, Ont.

At a huge meeting held last night, February 18, the civil service employees of Montreal were unanimous in stating that the Dominion government was not justified in their proposed cut of the salaries by 10 per cent during this period of depression through which they are bound to subsist by means of their present salaries. There was an unanimous vote of protest.

(Signed) Owen Finn,
Vice-President, Quebec,
The Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada.

I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether this telegram will be favourably considered by the government.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman's reading of the telegram will be taken as an inquiry and the question will be treated accordingly on Monday.

FARM RELIEF

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN FEDERAL ASSISTANCE ON BUSHEL RATHER THAN ACREAGE BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): For the information of the house I have been asked to communicate the following telegram which has been received from Mr. J. J. McGurran, secretary of the Saskatchewan Association of Municipalities, addressed to me from Regina.

Press reports of debate in parliament on wheat bonus indicate certain western members creating inference that government action in paying five cent bonus criticized by those sponsoring bonus payment on acreage basis. Campaign for acreage bonus payment carried on almost wholly by Saskatchewan association rural municipalities. At no time was any such criticism made from platform or through public press. Those conducting campaign at all times endorsed the excellent motives which prompted parliament to pay bonus and merely asked for extension of system to include those who had lost crop through drought conditions. Respectfully suggest this information be conveyed to parliament.

J. J. McGurran,
Secretary,
Saskatchewan Association
Municipalities.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would point out that every western member on this side has said only what Mr. McGurran, in this telegram, says he wants.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the record indicates clearly what was said.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I object.

Mr. BENNETT: I think so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Turn to the records.

PRESENTATIONS OF PAINTINGS

LONGSTAFF'S VIMY RIDGE—GIFT OF CAPTAIN JOHN ARTHUR DEWAR

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have now a much more pleasant duty to discharge. When I was in Great Britain in 1930 Captain John Arthur Dewar intimated his willingness to acquire the painting of Vimy Ridge by William Longstaff of Australia, who had given valiant service during the war, and to present it to the government of Canada. In December last Captain Dewar presented this painting, excellently framed, in the artist's presence in the High Commissioner's office in Canada House, Trafalgar Square, and asked me to accept it on behalf of the government of Canada. The painting has arrived and is now in the railway committee room, where I trust it will be inspected by every hon. member of the house. I propose at a later date to place upon the records of this house an expression of thanks for the magnificent gift presented by Captain Dewar.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when my right hon. friend makes the motion to which he has referred, it will then be time to speak to it. In the meantime I wish to ask him if there is any policy on the part of the administration which governs the acceptance of gifts for the houses of parliament? Is there a committee of the cabinet which has laid down any rules as to what will and what will not be accepted, and also governing from whom presentations may be received?

Mr. BENNETT: Answering my right hon. friend I can only say, (1) no committee of the cabinet has been appointed; (2) no rule has been laid down; (3) His Majesty's government in Canada has been pleased to exercise its best discretion in accepting gifts offered to the Canadian people which may prove to be of historical interest.

PORTRAIT OF THE LATE RIGHT HON. SIR GEORGE FOSTER

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, during the closing days of his life, the late Right Hon. Sir George Foster, who for so many years was a member of this house, intimated his very strong desire that his portrait, which is a very excellent likeness and painted by an eminent artist, should find a resting place in this house of parliament and that it should be conveyed there as soon after his demise as was possible. The portrait has now been placed near the office of the Minister of Finance in the lobby of the House of Commons. Inasmuch as Sir George Foster had spent the major part of his public career as a member of this house, it was thought that his wishes would be best served by placing his portrait upon this side of parliament, although at his decease he was a member of the Senate.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, again without prejudice, if I may employ a phrase used earlier in the day, to the appropriateness of the gifts which have been presented and which gifts I am sure will be deeply appreciated by both sides of the house, may I say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that I am rather surprised at his statement that no committee of the cabinet has been appointed to deal with matters of this kind. My recollection is that an order in council was passed while Sir Robert Borden was Prime Minister making provision for the appointment of a committee of the cabinet to deal with all matters affecting the monuments on parliament hill, the acceptance of paintings by the government, their disposition and the like. These matters naturally should come before a committee of the kind. The recent administration had such a committee of the cabinet and I think it most necessary and desirable that there be such a committee, otherwise great embarrassment will be experienced in the matter of the acceptance of some offers and the rejection of others, and also as to the suitable placing of works of art. I am not speaking in a critical way; I am speaking simply in regard to what in itself is a matter of general interest; and is of special interest to hon. members on both sides of the house.

VALIDATION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, relating to the submission to parliament of certain regulations and orders in council.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Certain orders in council and regulations to be valid.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have the orders in council been laid on the table?

Mr. MURPHY: They were tabled in the house, and I have them here in order to table them again.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, to amend the Admiralty Act.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Before this motion is carried, I wish to congratulate the government and the house in that this is the first time parliament has acted under the new Westminster Act. We are taking advantage of it in assuming the power of managing our own affairs in admiralty courts, something which could not be done until a few months ago. To those who have worked and fought to attain that end, this is a very welcome bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, $750.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why the increase in this item?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There is a slight increase in the business. It is a little additional in the way of travelling expenses. It is all travelling expenses of an officer.

Mr. HEENAN: Has the minister under his hand information as to the amount of power that is being exported at the present time?

Mr. STEVENS: The revenues derived under this act are as follows:

Year	Amount
1925-26	$288,992 41
1926-27	358,071 89
1927-28	374,351 21
1928-29	351,783 78
1929-30	318,792 36
1930-31	395,544 58

The current year is of course not yet complete, but prior to January the amount is $159,378.86. That, however, gives no accurate information of the current revenue up to March 31.

Mr. HEENAN: Is it the policy of the government to grant licences to export power without the consent of the province in which the power is developed?

Mr. STEVENS: No; I am informed that in all cases the consent of the province is secured.

Item agreed to.

International Customs Tariffs Bureau, $1,800.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is this bureau?

Mr. STEVENS: It is an international bureau of which the Dominion of Canada is a member and which compiles the variations and so forth in the customs regulations and laws of all countries. We find it a very valuable service. Occasionally, if we have an officer in the neighbourhood, he attends their meetings. A year ago last fall Mr. Gilchrist, who was with us at the Imperial economic conference, attended the meeting in Brussels.

Mr. POWER: He must have a difficult time keeping track of the Canadian government's variations in the tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: Whatever gyrations we achieve, we find other countries have even more rapid ones.

Item agreed to.

Publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, $173,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister give us an assurance respecting the creed in connection with this item?

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend has repeatedly asked assurances regarding the creed. I answer him with pleasure in one respect, and with deep regret in another. I am glad to be able to please him by saying that no more of the creeds are being issued out of this appropriation. My regret, however, is that we are not doing so, because there is a wide demand for the creed which we should like very much to be able to supply. But the sensitiveness of my right hon. friend has made an appeal to me, and rather than wound him further I have refrained from recommending any expenditure out of this vote for that purpose. I have an inclination, however, to appeal to him personally, thinking that he and I might together make up a private subscription for getting out the creed as private Christmas cards. Perhaps he would join me in that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no intention of doing so. Might I ask my hon. friend if I am not right in saying that the creed cost the country something like $100,000?

Mr. STEVENS: Mercy, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. I mean combined with the advertisements which were inserted in the newspapers relating to the same subject. What I want to draw the minister's attention to is this: It is expenditures of that kind which are in part responsible for the government at the present time finding it necessary to cut down the salaries of the civil service and dismiss a number of employees. It is one evidence, and only one of a great many, of the way in which public money has been wasted during the first two years of this administration, for which the government, and not only the government but a great many innocent members of the public service, are paying to-day.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sure the right hon. gentleman will not expect me to associate myself with that sentiment. I appreciate his pleasantries in these matters and will not quarrel with him. I merely wish to say, however, that I sharply differ with his opinion in regard to the matter.

Mr. YOUNG: I want to congratulate the minister, not on the creed itself, because it is a vicious, pagan creed, and can have no other result than to breed a narrow, sectional spirit in our own people and engender international ill-will, but upon the success of the advertising campaign which he conducted in putting the creed across. I see that the creed has been adopted by one of our great Christian churches. I have in my hand an advertisement of one of our churches urging the people to buy its wares because, forsooth, they are made in Canada. Martin Luther, John Knox, John Calvin, and all the great religious reformers spent a lifetime trying to get their creeds adopted by different churches, but my hon. friend has succeeded in doing in a single year what it took them a lifetime to do. Again I must congratulate him on the success of his advertising campaign.

Mr. STEVENS: Thank you very much.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have an item which I think bears upon this vote. I should like to read a paragraph from the annual report of the Ontario board of censors of motion pictures for the year 1931:

> Since last April there has been a distinct falling off in the percentage of Canadian items in the news reels exhibited. Previous to that, news cameras, with their sound-recording equipment from the United States, were admitted for limited periods on permits issued by the federal authorities. Under these permits news reel organizations came in at different points to "cover" Canadian events and thus fulfil the board's requirements for a percentage of Canadian news. Requiring these concerns to pay duty on their equipment each time it was brought into Canada has had the effect of shutting them out as the payments were deemed prohibitive. As the Canadian supply of such equipment of necessity is limited and confined to the central region, Canada has almost been banished not only from its own screen but also from that abroad.

I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether it would not be possible for him, in order to get greater publicity for Canada abroad, to move to have this customs regulation altered. It seems to me that that would be a very practicable step and would do away with the necessity of subsidizing other advertising agencies.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry I have not under my hand the necessary information with which to deal with the subject brought up by my hon. friend. The matter would more properly come up in a discussion of the estimates of the customs department, under which the regulation was made, or in a discussion on the tariff when the budget is down.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is not this directly related to advertising Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: No. My hon. friend is referring to the customs regulation governing the admission into Canada of advertising news reels or equipment for the making of advertising news reels from the United States or other countries. There is quite a brochure on the subject, but the matter is not in my department and I have not control of it, consequently I am not in a position to discuss it intelligently. I know something about it. There are two sides to this, as there are to all questions, but in the absence of the material I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend much information on the subject.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not immediately concerned with the alteration of the customs regulations at this time, that can come up on another occasion. But I should like to impress upon the minister that it is practically useless for us to go on expending money advertising Canada in one way while at the same time we are preventing the natural advertising which might come if a regulation of this kind were removed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister give some particulars as to how the $250,000 was used last year on advertising and publicity, just indicating the nature of it.

Mr. STEVENS: I have the details here. The expenditure, following the practice for a great many years, is in two divisions covering expenditures in Canada and expenditures in Great Britain through the office that was established there some years ago. I have in considerable detail the information with regard to expenditures in Canada, and I was wondering how much detail my hon. friend requires. The first item is dailies and weeklies, trade papers, financial papers and magazines. I have the details covering the last four years if my hon. friend would like to have the comparison.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wanted the figures for the current year.

Mr. STEVENS: That is incomplete. Under the first heading the expenditure was $2,895.95 for 1931-32 to January 31. Then for special advertising, including Five Thousand Facts about Canada, British West Indies Year Book, and some South American advertising and Canadian press broadcasting, there is the sum of $8,278.02. For Japanese advertising, an issue in the Japan Times, there is an expenditure of $169.25. For advertising in Planters Punch of the British West Indies there is an expenditure of $200. For miscellaneous advertising such as those appearing in the Canadian Gazette in connection with foodstuffs, South America and Northland cruise, and for advertising in Canadian Progress, there is the sum of about $8,000. Following that there is an item of office expenses totalling about $2,500. A number of miscellaneous items, which I could give, total $21,845.02. The corresponding total for the year 1930-31 was $113,879.17, and for the year 1929-30 was $94,194.42.

I have before me the details of some further expenditures for advertising in Great Britain. The expenditure for advertising in newspapers and regimental journals was $10,002.29; apple campaign, $7,201.21; advertising at Antwerp, $282.90; shop window displays, $184.53; catalogues and programs, $563.80, and miscellaneous items, $1,526.81, making a total of $19,761.54. Admittedly, of course, these are not the complete expenditures for this year, but include those up to the month of January. In addition there are certain office expenditures for printing, stationery, and so forth. Under the heading of printing and stationery is included miscellaneous printing put out by the advertising office in Great Britain. The sum expended in that connection is $11,468.76. Then, for rent and salaries there is the sum of about $7,000; for travelling, about $4,000, making a grand total for the current year so far as British advertising is concerned of about $61,000.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have taken down the figures the minister has given. About $19,000 were allotted to different publications and exhibitions and about $22,000 for other expenditures. The minister however has given a grand total of about $61,000, whereas I make a grand total of only about $40,000.

Mr. STEVENS: My deputy informs me that the figure he has before him is $41,272.30. The officials in my department however have stretched out that figure and in place thereof have inserted the figure $61,033.84.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is that not a grand total for Great Britain and Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: Probably so; that is about what it would amount to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the appropriation for 1931-32 was $250,000. Of that amount, according to what he now tells us, up until January of this year only $60,000 has been spent, and assuming that the same ratio is maintained, we may take it for granted that when the fiscal year closes about $75,000 will have been spent. It seems to me that the estimate now before us might be cut very considerably.

Mr. STEVENS: We have cut it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it has been cut down to $173,500. But if my hon. friend spends only $75,000 from an appropriation of $250,000 I should think he might get along with an appropriation of $100,000 for the next year. I submit that in this type of expenditure there is more justification for cutting down than there is for the cutting down of staffs and salaries.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite agree with my right hon. friend. As he will observe, however, we have made a very considerable cut.

There are one or two matters to be remembered to which I might direct the attention of the committee. In the first place, of course, the expenditures for the two months yet to come have to be considered. Some of our expenditures include contracts which have been running for two or three years. For instance there are several comparatively small contracts in Great Britain which were entered into three or four years ago. We expect however that the total will not reach within $75,000 of the appropriation for last year. For the coming year we are asking for $173,500. Possibly we will not expend that amount, but we have under study at the present time a very considerable advertising campaign in connection with our wheat and flour in Great Britain. I do not wish to make any definite statement in that connection because, frankly, our investigations have not reached the point where I can intelligently discuss the matter. Some of my officers are directing their attention to this campaign, and within a few weeks I expect a report from which we will decide whether the necessary expenditures are warranted. I can assure the committee that we purpose keeping the expenditure down, but at the same time there are advertising movements which are thoroughly justified. It is possible that a careful study this year of the prospects for tourist trade into Canada might warrant expenditures along that line. We cannot therefore say exactly what our expenditures will be. I can assure the committee that the tendency is to keep them down as low as possible, having due regard to the vast interests of the country and what we might term the necessary expenditures in such matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has mentioned one phase of advertising which affects the country as a whole, namely that directed towards tourist traffic. I, for one, believe the government might go very much further than it does in advertising Canada. There is no doubt that a great deal of money is brought into the country through tourist travel, and I should think that money judiciously spent to make known the advantages to tourists visiting Canada at the different seasons would be warranted.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite agree.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The type of advertising, however, which, it seems to me, the government ought to view with great caution is that which relates to the favouring of particular interests, rather than those of the country as a whole; and that form of advertising which is in the nature of what may be termed political propaganda. For example, I would like to ask my hon. friend whether any part of this money will be used for such advertisements as "Buy Made in Canada Goods." I do not say it is not perfectly proper for any consumer to prefer made in Canada goods and for any producer by advertisement or otherwise to try to encourage him to buy them, but propaganda to that end is the business of consumers' leagues, business houses and others who are manufacturing or producing in Canada. Where there is an important division of opinion in the country as to whether one should be at liberty to buy wherever and whatever he pleases, as against being obliged to buy only those things which suit the policy of the government of the day, there is very good reason for every supervision being exercised over public moneys being spent in that kind of propaganda. I would ask my hon. friend whether any part of this money is to pay for those signs which one sees on the streets and around the country, advising people to "Buy Made in Canada Goods."

Mr. STEVENS: So far as I know there are none at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it the intention to use any of this money for that purpose?

Mr. STEVENS: Without answering my right hon. friend's question with yes or no, I must, in deference to himself and I think in justice to myself, say this: At present we have not in contemplation any advertising campaign of the nature he suggests. On the other hand, I do not subscribe to all that he has said in condemnation of the promotion of the sentiment of stimulating the purchase of Canadian goods.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I took great care not to condemn the sentiment; I said it was very laudable if promoted by business houses, but that the government of the country was not justified in using the taxes of the people to support those who are trying to further their personal business ends by putting forward that sentiment, to the exclusion of others who are equally entitled to consideration in the matter of their trade.

Mr. STEVENS: I have a strong feeling that the sentiment is a laudable one. But I agree that it should not be carried to any bitter extreme, and in my personal utterances and in all my activities as administrator of this department I have sought to keep within reasonable bounds. I would not like to say that not a cent of this money would be used in the support of such a campaign. Let me give an illustration. Last year certain women's organizations promoted an exhibition, which was highly commended and the objects of which were sound. Out of this vote I think we subscribed $100 in support of that form of publicity. I have not in contemplation anything of this character at the moment; I question whether it will arise during the year, but I would not like my right hon. friend to come back next year and cite some instance where we had subscribed to a fair of that kind and say I had broken my word. Generally speaking, I think I can satisfy him by saying that there is not in contemplation this year a campaign of that character.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I might make clear what I have in mind when I say that one of the reasons those engaged in the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing are not as prosperous as they should be, is that they are dependent upon a world market and an export trade. We know that one of the reasons why export trade has fallen off so largely is that there is so little in the way of import trade. In order to further trade, it is necessary that vessels should have cargoes both ways, because you cannot go on shipping goods from a country always in one direction. The inability to get return cargoes from Great Britain and Europe has been responsible, as I am sure the minister knows very well, for the failure of exporting firms in this country to get large orders from overseas which otherwise they would have been able to place. I submit that it is most unfair to those who are engaged in this country in business related to these great basic industries, for the government to use public money to further a campaign which may help one class in which they may be especially interested, but which may at the same time be helping to work a grave injury to other classes equally entitled to consideration.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend is not quite correct, though I am sure not intentionally. Last year we spent considerable sums in the apple campaign and in supporting the advertising campaign with regard to grapes, which was very successful and which I think might be referred to at this stage. The marketing of Canadian grapes from western Ontario this year was a remarkable success in everything except the price, which of course was very low in common with all prices. The whole crop was marketed in a way that never had been previously attempted. I think from four hundred to five hundred carloads of those grapes rolled out to the prairies, and we subscribed to that advertising campaign, which was directed by the horticultural council. Then we carried on a very considerable campaign for the marketing of Canadian fish in Great Britain, and a substantial measure of success attended our efforts. Our apple campaign, which is conducted year after year in Great Britain, and which is one of the major expenditures under this item, has been attended with splendid success also. We are well satisfied with the results of our expenditures and efforts along that line.

Then, as I intimated a moment ago, we have in contemplation, as I have had for some time, a campaign in Europe to demonstrate the merits of our wheat in the making of flour and for the baking of bread. We hope perhaps to stimulate in that way the demand for our wheat. So I think I am safe in saying that whatever may have been spent for the so-called made in Canada campaign, our expenditures along these other lines are larger than the amounts spent to which reference has been made from time to time.

In regard to the other point brought up by my right hon. friend on numerous occasions, I have in preparation now a statement which I hope to have an opportunity of making to the house during the present session, arising out of a survey I am trying to make personally, in the time at my disposal, and of course with the assistance of our staff, of the trade of Canada. I would not like the statement of my right hon. friend to pass without comment, but at the same time I do not wish to go into details. However, I may say there are other factors than merely the question of the old theory, very widely accepted and held by many people, that to sell you must buy. That sounds simple and clear, but when one gets close to the intricate factors actually dominating the situation he begins to realize that they cannot be dealt with by the mere adoption of a theory. While I subscribe in part to what my right hon. friend says, namely, that it is desirable to get cargoes moving both ways, I hope to be in a position very soon to show that the movement of cargoes both ways sometimes is interrupted by factors entirely apart from those to which my right hon. friend has referred. But I would prefer not to enter into a discussion on that point at this moment, because as I say I hope to have under my hand material which will enable me to make a much more accurate and complete statement a little later on in the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This effect of cargoes both ways is not mere theory. Quite recently I was shown some important correspondence which indicated that very large orders might have been placed in Canada by firms in England had it been possible for them to secure return cargoes, which would have enabled them to secure transportation at figures that would have made it worth while to do business here. It was not a matter of thousands but of hundreds of thousands of dollars; and what is true in one instance is, I have no doubt, true in a great many others.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is another matter which, although it does not come directly under the minister's department, has a very distinct bearing on advertising. I refer to the deportation of people from this country to England. We have always said that the successful immigrant was the best advertisement Canada could have; I think it is equally true that the unsuccessful immigrant is our worst advertisement. I am not charging the government with direct responsibility for a large number of these deportations; I know that the government has been urged to take this course by various municipalities who find it hard to keep these people. But looking at the matter from the standpoint of Canadian welfare it seems to me most undesirable that we should deport people from Canada simply because they temporarily come under relief, because they are poor. They go back to the old country and spread the idea that this is a very poor place in which to live. I would impress upon the minister the danger of another department entirely undoing the work his department tries to do. There is always a danger of our carrying forward government in watertight departments. We might very well contribute larger sums to keep people here rather than have them deported and then putting on an advertising campaign in an effort to offset the report which they carry back with them to the old country.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister is taking a little more credit than is his due for the success of his advertising campaign. He told us that the department last year put on a very successful campaign advertising grapes, and that as a result they were able to sell in the prairies this year between four and five hundred carloads of Canadian-grown grapes. There is another reason for this than the minister's advertising. Long ago we used to buy in the west a small basket of Canadian grapes for 35 cents and the price advanced regularly every year until we were charged a dollar a basket for these small blue grapes. Naturally very few people bought them. This year, for the first time in many years, the price came back to the old level of three baskets for a dollar. That is the reason the people bought grapes this year; it was not because of any advertising the minister's department did.

Mr. STEVENS: We will agree to that and let it go.

Mr. YOUNG: If the minister would devote his energies to devising means of placing Canadian products on the market at prices which the people can afford, it would not be necessary for him to spend money on advertising.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): In what European countries will advertising take place?

Mr. STEVENS: I said we had in contemplation a campaign to present to the countries in Europe the merits of Canadian wheat for bread-making, but I added that the officials were still studying the matter and I was not in a position to make a definite statement at the moment.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—Canada and the United Kingdom, on the Atlantic, service between, $535,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Before we proceed with this item, and in order to be absolutely frank with the leader of the opposition and his followers, I may observe that it was generally understood that we would not bring forward an estimate in which salaries are involved. The only expenditure for wages involved in this item is in connection with one inspector, and that involves a salary of $3,000. I wanted to make it clear that it was included in this vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will be without prejudice.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so.

Mr. DUFF: How is the reduction arrived at?

Mr. STEVENS: It is an arbitrary reduction in the interests of economy and is part of the many reductions we have tried to make in the estimates.

Mr. DUFF: That is not quite clear. The minister must certainly have a list of the items that made up last year's amount, which was $802,000, as well as a list comprising the present vote.

Mr. STEVENS: The subvention covers, of course, the various sailings from Montreal and Quebec and from Halifax and St. John in the winter to the United Kingdom. There are two sailings a week in the summer and one sailing a week in the winter, and we are giving that much less this year per sailing than last year. It will be scaled down per sailing and the obligation is imposed upon the company to carry the mails, which vary so far as weight is concerned. I have not the details at the moment, but it runs into a very large amount.

Mr. REID: What steamship line carries these mails?

Mr. DUFF: Are there not certain contracts with different lines, and how long do the contracts run?

Mr. STEVENS: Just for one year. I have a partial report in regard to the mails, showing 184,800 sacks.

Mr. DUFF: What steamship line had the contract last year?

Mr. STEVENS: The Canadian Pacific.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What portion of the $802,000 of last year's vote will have been expended by the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. STEVENS: All of it. There may be a few thousand through the missing of one sailing or so between now and the end of the year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is there any reduction in the service?

Mr. STEVENS: The contract, of course, has not yet been made, but I understand not.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The service will be the same?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: What line is it?

Mr. STEVENS: The Elder-Dempster.

Mr. DONNELLY: If they refuse to take the contract what course is followed?

Mr. STEVENS: They do not get the money.

Mr. DONNELLY: And there will be no service.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not say that.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia and Australia, and/or China, service between, $31,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In regard to each of these items on the Pacific ocean, what company has the contract, and is it from year to year?

Mr. STEVENS: From year to year. This is a renewal of the existing steamship service. We are hoping to get an improved service on that Canadian-Australian line, that is, faster ships. That, however, is a matter of negotiation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is that the company that gets this subvention?

Mr. STEVENS: Possibly I did not understand my hon. friend; I was speaking of the Canada-New Zealand service.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was confining my question to the first item.

Mr. STEVENS: The first item, amounting to $31,000, is to cover the completion of a contract now in existence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With whom?

Mr. STEVENS: With H. R. MacMillan; it has been in existence three years and runs out in June.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Canada, China and Japan, service between, $659,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I ask the same question in regard to this item.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the Canadian Pacific Steamship Company.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will this service take care of the aviators who desire to go to China?

Mr. STEVENS: They may do so at their own risk.

Mr. CAYLEY: Why is this item larger than the first item?

Mr. STEVENS: The question of mileage is largely responsible.

Item agreed to.

Canada and New Zealand, on the Pacific, service between, $75,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What company is this?

Mr. STEVENS: The Canada-Australia line.

Mr. DONNELLY: What service is given?

Mr. STEVENS: A monthly service.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the difference between this and the Chinese service?

Mr. STEVENS: The China, Japan and Vancouver service is fortnightly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In view of the New Zealand treaty does not the hon. minister think this subvention should be increased?

Mr. STEVENS: I should have liked to do so.

Item agreed to.

Prince Rupert, B.C., and Queen Charlotte island, service between, $15,750.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the company in this case?

Mr. STEVENS: The Canadian National steamship line.

Item agreed to.

Vancouver and the British West Indies, service between, $37,350.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the company in this case?

Mr. STEVENS: The Canadian Transport Company, Limited; it is an existing contract.

Item agreed to.

Vancouver and northern ports of British Columbia, service between, $18,600.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the company in this case?

Mr. STEVENS: The Union Steamship Company.

Mr. REID: Could that not be handled by the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend should be sufficiently posted on the Pacific coast to know that there are innumerable inlets and bays upon which are located canneries, logging camps and villages where calls must be made which cannot be made by the boats of the Canadian Pacific or Canadian National which run to Prince Rupert and Alaska.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have a question to ask arising out of the first and third items. I notice that the first item covering the Australian service is only about one-third of the vote for last year, while the New Zealand service is about three-quarters of the vote of last year. Why the difference?

Mr. STEVENS: In the first instance, it is the completion of an existing contract which ends in June. This item does not provide for the continuance of that contract, and if it is continued it will have to be provided for in the supplementary estimates. In the meantime, consideration is being given to the matter.

Item agreed to.

Victoria and west coast Vancouver island, service between, $11,250.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the company in this case?

Mr. STEVENS: Canadian Pacific.

Item agreed to.

Local services—Charlottetown and Pictou, service between, $30,000.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Is the service carried on by the steamship Pearl Cann to be continued?

Mr. STEVENS: That is not provided for in the estimates of this year.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Is it to be discontinued?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the intention at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: How will the mails be handled?

Mr. STEVENS: The post office will provide for the mails.

Mr. DUFF: I notice this service is reduced from $40,000 to $30,000, but I was under the impression that the contract had a number of years to run. Has that contract expired or is it still in existence?

Mr. STEVENS: The contract is still in existence but it is subject to a yearly vote by parliament. Our intention is to review these contracts in the light of these votes.

Mr. DUFF: In other words, the government has the power to cancel the contract.

Mr. STEVENS: It is subject to the vote of parliament.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I notice in all these items there is a considerable cut; how was the minister able to get these companies to accept the reduction? Did the minister tell them that was all they were going to get?

Mr. STEVENS: It is not quite as easy as that, as is evidenced by my bald head; it is quite a task. Generally speaking we find that people are not too unreasonable and the exigencies of the times appeal to them.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Some years ago and for a number of consecutive sessions a number of us doubted the value and wisdom of these subsidies. They were discussed at length but we were always assured that the contracts were untouchable and beyond the power of the government to alter. Apparently they were not as sacred as former ministers indicated, and the fact that there has been a diminution in the payments will prove to be a valuable lesson.

Item agreed to.

Halifax, Canso and Guysborough, service between, $6,750.

Mr. DUFF: The service between Halifax and the ports in Halifax county and Guysborough county extending to the town of Guysborough is a very important one due to the fact that the people served by the steamship Chedabucto have no railway communication. These people are located anywhere from 60 to 100 miles from the railway and unless they drive that distance to Antigonish or New Glasgow to catch the train, they have no means of transportation. These people as taxpayers are helping to pay for the railways of Canada although they have no railway transportation of their own, and the government has been ill-advised in reducing this amount, especially in view of the fact that the company has a contract with the government. My idea is that a contract should be held sacred.

Mr. STEVENS: It expires on March 31 of this year.

Mr. DUFF: If it does, I am very much afraid that if the owners of the boat do not get the amount which they received previously, the people in the district will be without this service.

Item agreed to.

Halifax and Sherbrooke, service between, $1,000.

Mr. DUFF: This is in exactly the same position. This service starts at Halifax and calls at certain ports. The junior member for Halifax will bear me out when I say that this is a very important service for part of his constituency and also part of mine. I have no personal interest in the matter, but I certainly think the government will not get any boat to perform this service for $1,000. The junior member for Halifax, who is a supporter of the government, should use his influence with them in an endeavour to have the amount of this item restored to $1,500.

Mr. QUINN: I was just about to point that out. This is a very drastic cut, out of all proportion to the others. The sum of $500 has been taken off a subsidy of $1,500, or a reduction of 33⅓ per cent. I would ask the minister to let the item stand in order that we may see if we cannot do something better for this service between Halifax and Sherbrooke.

Item agreed to.

Mulgrave, Arichat and Petit de Grat, service between, $11,250.

Mr. DUFF: I can understand the Minister of Finance in his new position is desirous of economizing and it might be embarrassing for him to get up and ask his colleague to reconsider this matter, but this is a very important service to the people living in that part of Cape Breton island and in part of my own constituency. The amount has been reduced from $12,000 to $11,250. My impression—and I think I am right—is that this contract was entered into two or three years ago for five years at $15,000 a year. Of course if the owners of this steamer accepted the $12,000 which was voted last year, that was for them to decide. Now I notice there is another reduction of $750. Have any representations been made to the minister with regard to this cut?

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. STEVENS: My information is that after careful consideration which has been given to all of these items, the amount of $11,250 will be sufficient.

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand the owners of the steamer are satisfied with this reduction and will carry on the service?

Mr. STEVENS: I am justified in saying that.

Item agreed to.

Mulgrave and Guysborough, calling at intermediate ports, service between, $10,500.

Mr. DUFF: Are the owners of this boat satisfied with the reduction? I understand there is a contract with them also.

Mr. STEVENS: The same answer applies to that.

Item agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like for a moment to address myself to the leader of the opposition. I have a number of other items which involve salaries in a substantial degree. I was not intending to proceed with them until the bill to which reference has been made is before the house and there is full opportunity of discussing it, unless hon. members are agreeable to proceeding. In putting this forward I am merely placing myself in the hands of the members of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend is in a position to say that the government will not take up items involving salaries in any other departments until the government have brought down their bill, we might, if all agree, allow him to proceed conditionally since we are now in committee.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the right hon. gentleman object to any other department being introduced? It is understood we can take up other departments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was understood that the estimates of no other departments than Trade and Commerce and Public Works would be taken up to-day, but in regard to opening other departments on or after Tuesday, it is understood that the ministers of those departments will introduce no items affecting salaries.

Mr. STEVENS: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But only such items as are not affected by salaries.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand we are to go on with items involving salaries?

Mr. STEVENS: I addressed myself to the committee a moment ago in this sense, that I had now reached the stage where I had no more items that I could call except those involving salaries. But with consent—and I place myself entirely in the hands of the committee—we might proceed with several such items in my department. It will be understood that the passing of such items will not in any way prejudice the views that members may hold regarding salaries or the provisions of the bill which will be before the house in the course of a few days.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the very procedure to which I took objection the other day. We cannot pass these items without more or less deciding salaries. This may be considered a formal matter, but there is something deeper underlying, and for my part I object to passing a single salary estimate until we decide the principle underlying the proposed cut in the salaries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is objection, I do not see how the minister can very well proceed.

Mr. STEVENS: I want my hon. friend to feel that we are not at all seeking to put anything over. We are trying to be as courteous and as fair as we can. There is an important item here relating to the commercial intelligence service. It involves salaries, of course, but also considerable amounts for other than salaries. If the committee would agree to discuss that item and make some progress with it, we could do so. The salaries in this case are all paid outside of Canada to our staff in different parts of the world. There might not be the same feeling involved in that that there would be in regard to salaries paid in Canada; I do not know.

Mr. DUFF: Are these salaries paid outside Canada also being reduced 10 per cent?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot see that it makes any difference whether the salaries are paid outside Canada or to people within Canada. The principle involved is the same, and as far as I am concerned, if these are higher paid officials, I would say that if the lower paid civil servants are going to have their salaries cut 10 per cent these higher officials should have a cut of 20 or 30 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: We are not discussing that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But we are discussing the matter of procedure, and we decided the other day that we would not go on with items involving salaries until the principle was decided.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry the hon. gentleman has taken it in the spirit he has. I placed myself in the hands of the committee, and I have no desire to proceed if hon. members are not agreeable to my doing so. I do not think there was any call for the heat shown by my hon. friend.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There was no special heat.

Mr. RHODES: On numerous occasions not only in committee of the whole but in the house itself,—for instance, when a bill is up for second reading—a member who does not agree with its principle consents to the bill going to a committee, reserving his right not to accept the principle. Similarly in this case my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre may not agree with certain provisions in these estimates, but surely on that account he does not take the attitude that he is going to prevent a discussion of the items. He will be in precisely the same position to object to the principle when the bill itself comes before the house. Of course, if hon. gentlemen opposite—I do not say this unkindly, but with every respect—will not permit us to proceed further with any items which involve the question of salary, we should be only wasting our time discussing them. It is for hon. gentlemen opposite to say, but if that is their position, we might far better take the evening off than waste it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the position taken two or three nights ago and the government had it within its power at that time to call another department if they wished to do so before adjournment, but they did not. The government had and has control of the business. They were free to arrange as they pleased. We spent a couple of hours discussing the same item in trade and commerce after the decision had been arrived at. The government instead could have gone into the Justice department or some other department. I think the general feeling is that these items which involve salaries should not be discussed.

Progress reported.

Mr. RHODES: The remainder of the government program for the day consists of estimates, and the only items we can take are those which involve incidentally the discussion of salaries. Since hon. gentlemen opposite have taken the position that we cannot make progress, rather than devote the evening to a discussion in which we shall make no progress at all, I think it would be far better for the house to adjourn. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.55 pm.

Monday, February 22, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved:

That standing order 63 of the House of Commons, relating to the appointment of select standing committees of the house be amended by adding to the select standing committees of the house for the present session a select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, to which will be referred the accounts and the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the present session, for consideration and report to the house; provided, however, that nothing in this resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of supply, and that the said committee consist of: Messrs. Beaubien, Bell (St. Antoine), Bothwell, Cantley, Chaplin, Duff, Euler, Fiset (Sir Eugène), Fraser (Cariboo), Geary, Gobeil, Gray, Hanbury, Hanson (York-Sunbury), Heaps, Kennedy (Peace River), McGibbon, MacMillan (Saskatoon), Manion, Power, Rogers and Stewart (Lethbridge).

Mr. SPEAKER: Has there been any notice as to the appointment of the committee?

Mr. MANION: My recollection, Mr. Speaker, is that the same procedure was followed last year.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask whether the names of the members constituting the committee have been decided upon as the result of arrangement between the whips or the leaders?

Mr. MANION: I have moved exactly the same committee as was arranged by the whips and leaders last year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But it is possible that changes might be found desirable.

Mr. MANION: It can stand until to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minister is willing to allow the motion to stand.

Mr. MANION: Let it stand until to-morrow.

Motion stands.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Criminal Code (unlawful associations).

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall leave be granted?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: All those in favour of the motion that leave be granted please say aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed will say nay.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does the right hon. gentleman prevent a member from introducing a bill?

Mr. SPEAKER: Call in the members.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege; I do not find a copy of this bill on the file so will Your Honour explain to the house what we are to vote upon?

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill has not been introduced as yet so it would not appear on the file.

Mr. GARDINER: I would like to know something about what we are to vote upon.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has moved for leave to introduce the bill and the question is as to whether or not the house is in favour of that motion.

Mr. GARDINER: We do not know what the bill is about. The hon. member who introduced it has not been asked to explain. I submit that this is an extraordinary procedure and I protest against it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is by Mr. Woodsworth, seconded by Mr. Heaps for leave to introduce a bill intituled "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (Unlawful Associations)".

Mr. GARDINER: I protest against this procedure. Until we know what we are voting about how can we act? How can we vote on whether or not a member shall have the privilege of introducing a bill unless we know the contents of that bill? It would be absolutely ridiculous to proceed along these lines.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps it might be reasonable to permit the hon. member to make an explanation of this bill.

Mr. McINTOSH: Could we not have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. BENNETT: The opportunity to explain a bill is a right belonging to any hon. member who introduces a bill but when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) made his motion for leave to introduce this bill he did not see fit to make any explanation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. BENNETT: He did not make any explanation.—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order—

Mr. BENNETT: —and not having made any explanation, I take it—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —my point of order is this:—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have the right to rise on a point of order. My point of order is that the Prime Minister has deliberately misrepresented the situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have had no opportunity to speak.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no point of order in that. My observation was—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. BENNETT: —purely on a question of privilege; the hon. member did not make any explanation of his bill.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not have a chance.

Mr. BENNETT: He asked for leave to introduce and he had as good a chance as any hon. member of this house has ever had.

Mr. GARDINER (Bow River): No, he had not.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not wish to avail himself of that opportunity—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order; I must insist that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) should not misrepresent the situation. As Your Honour knows I had no opportunity to explain my bill. The practice is that an hon. member is asked to explain.

Mr. BENNETT: But he is not bound to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He is not bound to. Only a moment elapsed and to my utter astonishment the Prime Minister took an attitude which I have never known to be taken in the eleven years I have been in this house. I do not know whether or not the Prime Minister means that I as a member of the Labour party am never to have a chance to introduce any bill in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was given an opportunity to explain but I did go rather swiftly from one proceeding to another and perhaps if the hon. member had been a little more alert he would have explained his bill. I think it would be reasonable to allow the hon. member an opportunity now to make the usual brief explanation of his bill.

Mr. BENNETT: It can be done only with the unanimous consent of the house as it is a question of precedent, but I do not object.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does that mean that an hon. member cannot explain a bill?

Mr. BENNETT: He can do it at the proper time and in the proper place provided for by the rules.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member had no opportunity of doing it; my right hon. friend said "no".

Mr. BENNETT: I said, "no", of course.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I, for one, protest against this new procedure of having to submit any bill to my right hon. friend before it is introduced.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Mussolini.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mussolini is but a child.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have said that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre probably was prevented from explaining his bill because I proceeded too swiftly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was the word "no" that prevented the explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there is any fault at all, it is entirely the fault of the Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not been able to hear what Your Honour has been saying for the last two or three minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member desires to proceed to explain his bill he will do so without further delay.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, this bill contains an amendment to section 98 of the criminal code which concerns seditious and unlawful assemblies. It is the same bill which passed the House of Commons in the sessions of 1926, 1926-7, 1928, 1929 and 1930, but on each occasion not being passed by the second chamber. I believe one year it failed to pass by only three votes. If this bill were introduced under the practices of the British house, so often lauded by hon. members opposite, it would have been the law of this country several years ago.

Section 98 of the criminal code was placed upon the statute books in the year 1919, the immediate post-war period. The terms of the act are so broad as to permit its use for the restricting of the legitimate activities of organized labour, Again and again, as far back as 1920, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada has protested against this section. As I said before, the terms of the section are so broad as to easily prevent organized labour taking any action whatever, and for that reason the Trades and Labour Congress and other labour bodies have protested against it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should confine his remarks to an explanation of the bill and not attempt to discuss its merits.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As has been stated in previous debates on this question, the public welfare is sufficiently protected by other sections of the criminal code. It was so stated on various occasions by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when he introduced similar bills.

The present law prevents the use of any force for the bringing about of any change. The section does not specify physical force and various judicial utterances have made it quite clear that the section would prevent the exercise of economic force, moral suasion or anything of the kind. If it means physical force alone, it should say so. Other sections go directly contrary to the generally accepted ideas of British fair play. A man may get into trouble because he is suspected of doing things and the police may proceed without a warrant. A man may be considered to belong to an unlawful association unless he is able to produce proof to the contrary. Most of us have been of the opinion that a man was presumed innocent until proved guilty, but according to the law as it now stands he is presumed to be guilty until he can prove himself innocent. That is obviously against all the ideas of British justice. Moreover—certain magistrates may take action if they have "reasonable ground for suspecting"—a most unusual phrase—that either a crime has been committed or is about to be committed. This is an extraordinary situation. I do not think members opposite of the legal profession can have read this act as it now stands on the statute books; if they have they could not defend its retention. In addition, the section gives the most extraordinary powers to postal clerks and people of that kind to interfere with mail on the possibility that they may find something that may be considered to have belonged to some member of one of these organizations. Still further, the police are given power without warrant to seize suspected property and to confiscate it to the state. These powers are entirely out of harmony with British practice and we ought not to allow them to remain on the statute books any longer. I can hardly understand the Prime Minister, who has expressed such a regard for law and order and for British practice—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order. This has nothing to do with the bill. It is in order to state the merits or demerits of the bill so that the members may know what they are called upon to vote on. I trust the hon. member will not encroach further on the rules.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have outlined some of the provisions that we consider are quite out of keeping with British traditions and that at present are found on the statute books of this country. We ask that this particular section of the criminal code be repealed. That is the purpose of the bill. It is clear to everybody; it has been discussed again and again in the house, and I trust the house will permit the bill to be introduced so that the question may be discussed on its merits.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this motion is not debatable. I rise merely on a question of order and privilege, to correct a statement made by the hon. gentleman. The Supreme Court of Ontario on Friday last delivered a unanimous judgment, Sir William Mulock, Chief Justice, being spokesman for the court, in connection with charges laid under section 98. The judgment is lengthy, covering twenty-four or twenty-five pages of foolscap, but I should like to point out that the hon. gentleman is in error when he states that lawful assemblies are in any sense prohibited or restricted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I claim the right to debate this now.

Mr. BENNETT: The jury, having found that in this particular instance the direction came from Moscow and that violence and force were to be utilized, found it an unlawful assembly and the Supreme Court of Ontario unanimously decided that they would not interfere with the conviction. It is therefore for that reason—

Mr. LAPOINTE: This should be discussed on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: There will be no second reading.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would urge on you, Mr. Speaker, to extend to other members of the house the privilege you have extended to the Prime Minister. He was not speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Fair play has been extended to the hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Justice merely has been extended to me.

Mr. SPEAKER: Justice. In view of the fact that this discussion has taken place after the members have been called in, I propose to repeat the procedure on the taking of the vote.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Woodsworth) which was negatived on the following division:

RECORDING OF PAIRS

Mr. BENNETT: I note, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen have been observing pairs. I understood, and I still understand, that that is not obligatory unless an arrangement to that effect is made. My agreement with the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was that we were paired on the following conditions: Our pairs to be in force on all matters introduced by the government or for which the government assumes responsibility, also in connection with all matters introduced by the official opposition or by any member on its behalf, and to apply also when the Speaker is in the chair as well as in committee of the whole house on such matters. My understanding is that that arrangement does not apply to pairs of this kind, but if my interpretation is not correct I ought not to have voted. I should like to discuss the matter with the right hon. gentleman and ascertain if it is not his view that our agreement does not apply to pairs of this kind, this being a vote on a motion introduced by a private member. Whatever rule may prevail I desire to observe. I mention that so that there may be no misunderstanding.

Mr. MARCIL: I was paired with the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), and our agreement was that I should not vote in any case in his absence. I have observed that pair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My pair with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) was on exactly the same basis as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister's with the leader of the opposition, but I felt differently about it. I felt that I was not free to vote, and the way the vote was given on both sides of the house justifies me in that belief.

Mr. BENNETT: That would not change the principle.

Mr. BROWN: If the Prime Minister had made that statement beforehand, many members opposite might not have voted at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think there are any communists here.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE ACT

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, to amend the Marriage and Divorce Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BURY: The explanation of the proposed amendments is very simple. Under the act as it now is, a man may legally marry either his deceased wife's sister or the daughter of his deceased wife's sister, but he cannot legally marry the daughter of his deceased wife's brother. Similarly a woman may now legally marry either her deceased husband's brother or the son of her deceased husband's brother, but not the son of her deceased husband's sister. The bill is introduced for removing these anomalies.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECT AND PEST ACT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to amend the Destructive Insect and Pest Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WEIR: Sections one, two and three of the amending bill are intended to give us authority to control the movements of agricultural products infested with any disease or insect. Section four is intended to give to interested provinces a certain amount of freedom in connection with the control of certain pests within their boundaries when for any reason this department does not consider it advisable or possible to attempt to control such special pests.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ORDNANCE AND INDIAN LANDS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Has the dominion government complete control over ordnance land and Indian lands, and of lands under the control of the dominion government at the time of the passing of the British North America Act, except such lands as have been returned to the prairie provinces?

2. Can any one province tax, or interfere through means of taxation or otherwise with these lands?

3. In the case of ordnance land, where the ordnance department has laid it out in streets and lots and sold one lot to an individual, would the province or other municipality have jurisdiction over this one lot notwithstanding the fact that the streets and surrounding property still remain ordnance land, and the lot which has been sold has never been deeded or dedicated to such province or municipality and is not even registered therein?

Mr. BENNETT: The question is not one that can properly be answered. If the hon. gentleman will look at it, he will see that it is a hypothetical question, and does not lend itself to a categorical answer. If the hon. gentleman desires to state the case he has in mind, either by putting it on the order paper or dropping a note to me, I will try to see that an answer is given to him.

Question dropped.

PAYMENTS TO MR. N. D. MURRAY

Mr. DUFF:

STE. ANNE DE BELLEVUE HOSPITAL

Mr. SPEAKMAN:

1. Who is the medical officer in charge of the t.b. wards at Ste. Anne's hospital, Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Quebec?

2. What is his salary?

3. What are his qualifications?

4. When, and upon whose recommendation was he appointed?

5. Is he a returned soldier?

6. Were there any other candidates for the position, and if so, were any of these rejected candidates returned soldiers?

8. What are the duties of the present medical officer?

9. How many cases of active pulmonary tuberculosis are under treatment at Ste. Anne's hospital?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Dr. Melvyn McQuitty.

4. (a) August 17, 1931; (b) as a result of open competitive examination.

5. No.

6. There were twenty-nine applicants in the competition, twelve of whom were entitled to the returned soldier preference granted under the Civil Service Act.

7. The preference provided in the Civil Service Act for returned soldiers, was observed as usual in this competition. That is, in accordance with the Act, if a returned soldier were found to possess the minimum qualifications required for the position, he should take precedence over all others. When the Advisory Examining Board first dealt with the applications it was found that only two candidates appeared to possess the necessary qualifications for the position. One of these was a returned soldier. The other was not entitled to the returned soldier preference. Further inquiries were made in connection with the returned soldier since his application lacked certain necessary details. Upon receipt from him of this further information, it was found that he would not be a suitable appointee for the position. Consequently, as no returned soldier applicant was found to be duly qualified, the appointment was made of a duly qualified civilian.

8. The examination, diagnosis and treatment of all diseases of the chest or any other diseases or disabling conditions of a suspected tubercular nature; general supervision of the wards and patients assigned to his care, completing the necessary reports required by the Department of Pensions and National Health and the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada.

9. 32.

3. How many pensioners and claimants for pension have been examined by the medical examiners of the pension commission during the same period?

In addition to the above, the commissioners, during this period, have considered and have ruled upon 1,234 miscellaneous cases in regard to which decisions were necessary in respect of additional pension for dependents of pensioners, change in the monthly rate to dependents of deceased soldiers, other than widows, change of administration, etc., etc.

3. Approximately, 12,850.

4. Approximately, 4,200.

In that connection I refer the hon. member to a reply respecting a similar question which I made to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) as it appears on page 283 of Hansard. Under the circumstances I submit the question should be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question dropped.

SUPT. G. L. JENNINGS, R.C.M.P.

2. If not, what is his position at present?

6. Was he father-in-law of the said superintendent Jennings?
7. Did the investigation into the conduct of superintendent Jennings reveal the fact that this officer handed over the police file to the man alleged to have stolen $10,000 from the post office?
8. Is he a fit and proper person to be in charge of the criminal investigation department of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to question No. 33 may I say that the form of at least part of the question is such that I think it is not in the public interest that any effort be made to answer it. I think the hon. member will agree that section 8 of the question:

8. Is he a fit and proper person to be in charge of the criminal investigation department of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

obviously should not be placed upon the order paper to be answered by whoever is in charge of that particular branch of the public service. If the officer referred to was placed in his position by a government, such government must assume the responsibility for his appointment which implied their belief in his fitness. In my view the general form of the question, and undoubtedly the last part of it, is most objectionable. The remaining part of the question might be worded as a matter of taste; if an hon. member desired to ask a question in that form, very well; but the second part certainly should not be answered.

Mr. VALLANCE: Apparently the Prime Minister is prepared to answer the first seven sections of the question; I think section 4 will give the information I have asked for in section 8.

Mr. BENNETT: The form in which the question is put is objectionable, and I do not care to pursue it. Section 4 of the question is framed in terms which this house has frequently said should not be used. It is as follows:

Was he suspended from the force for gross breach of confidence as a police officer?

A question such as this:

Was he suspended from the force, and if so for what reasons? . . . .

would have been fair. But to make an allegation in language couched as a question is wholly objectionable.

Mr. VALLANCE: I am quite agreeable to my right hon. friend's observations so far as they apply to section 8 of the question.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about section 4.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the whole question is dropped?

Mr. VALLANCE: No. The Prime Minister was quite prepared to answer the first seven sections.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not the first seven.

Mr. VALLANCE: My right hon. friend said he was in a position to answer the first seven sections.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not in the form in which they are, and they will not be answered.

Mr. VALLANCE: I will accept it as amended by the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may redraft the question.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, it is accepted as amended by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not amend it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the Prime Minister take objection to it?

Mr. VALLANCE: All right, we will revise it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, let it stand and I will revise it.

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand it, I have taken objection to the form of question No. 33. The hon. member has suggested that I will amend it, which I will not do for reasons which I think must be apparent to him. I suggest Your Honour's ruling should be that the question is dropped.

Mr. VALLANCE: Rather than create any disturbance, I will say "dropped."

7. How much money of the amount received, including interest, is still in consolidated revenue?

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this question should stand as an order for return. I might say in the meantime however that the Department of the Secretary of State has not any information with regard to other allied and associated powers. This question should be restricted to Canada as one of the allied and associated powers under the treaty of Versailles. With that restriction we will do our best to answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER: This question stands as an order for return.

Scotia under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized; (b) the amount expended.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, when the second motion came up at a previous sitting it was agreed that it should stand pending the bringing down of the regular return under the act. I would ask therefore that the motion stand in the meantime.

Mr. SPEAKER: That applies to one, two and three.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The same thing.

Mr. SPEAKER: One, two and three stand.

SOPHIE LIGHT—FATAL SHOOTING

Mr. McPHEE:

For a copy of all correspondence, papers and documents in the possession of the government relating to the fatal shooting of Mrs. Sophie Light of Des Moines, Iowa, U.S.A., by Constable Pirt, R.C.M.P., of Yorkton, Saskatchewan, at a picnic held a few miles from Roblin, Manitoba, on Labour day, Monday, September 1, 1930; and also of correspondence between the Attorney General of the province of Saskatchewan and the Minister of Justice of Canada relative to the payment of $500 to the husband of the said Sophie Light.

Mr. BENNETT: Subject, Mr. Speaker, to the limitations that would be imposed if it were a case of private litigation, the order will, I assume, be adopted by the house. But confidential communications touching the conduct of negotiations and matters of that kind which would be privileged communications on an order for discovery, I take it the hon. gentleman would not expect to have produced.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, subject to the reservation as stated.

MARIA, QUE., WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of paylists and accounts for materials used in the repairs to the wharf at Maria, Quebec; and also same information for protection works in that municipality.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I desire to know from the hon. gentleman whether he wishes the information with respect to the current fiscal year or for a longer period.

Mr. MARCIL: For the present year only.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No objection.

BONAVENTURE, QUE., WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of paylists and accounts for materials supplied for repairing the wharf at Bonaventure, Quebec; and also a copy of paylists and accounts for materials for repairs of protection works in that municipality.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): For the same period?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes.

ST. NICHOLAS, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. MARCIL (for Mr. Casgrain):

For a copy of all documents and correspondence exchanged between the citizens of row (rang) St. Nicholas, in the parish of St. Ferreol, county of Montmorency, and the Postmaster General, or any other official of his department, at Ottawa or Quebec, in connection with the opening of a post office in said parish.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to Number 14, Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps my hon. friend from Bonaventure who moves the resolution for the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain), will agree that it would be better to impose some limitation as to time, for it might involve a great deal of difficulty to go back a good many years. I suggest that since 1930 would probably cover all that is desired, if that is acceptable to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the absence of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, this motion and the next three will stand.

MANITOBA FARMERS—SUPPLY OF FEED AND SEED

Mr. BROWN:

For a copy of all correspondence between Premier Bracken of Manitoba or any of the officials of the Manitoba government and the Prime Minister or any of the officials of the dominion government, with reference to the supplying of feed and seed to the farmers of Manitoba.

Mr. SPEAKER: Amended with the consent of the house.

ELZEAR GAGNON—STE. LOUISE, QUE., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. FAFARD:

Louise, county of L'Islet, Quebec, and the said Gagnon's subsequent rejection by the Postmaster General.

Mr. BENNETT: With the limitation that necessarily is imposed upon this motion by reason of the fact that the government, as such, has not control over documents or papers in the hands of the Civil Service Commission dealing with the subject matter, I assume it will be adopted by the house. It will be within the memory of the house that on more than one occasion discussion has taken place as to how far an effort should be made to bring down from the Civil Service Commission documents, somewhat confidential in their nature, upon which they arrive at their conclusions. But any documents the government have will of course be promptly supplied.

CANADIAN WOOL INDUSTRY

TARIFF ON RAW WOOL FOR THE PROTECTION OF HOME GROWERS

Mr. J. B. SWANSTON (Maple Creek) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of the Dominion of Canada place a duty on raw wool that would reasonably protect the Canadian wool growers.

He said: In submitting this resolution to the house for discussion I wish to make a few observations with reference to the situation as it exists in the province of Saskatchewan and, I may add, throughout the whole of Canada. For many years the wool growers of Canada have devoted considerable effort to the improvement of wool and in doing so they have developed an excellent type of wool-producing sheep; but when there is a marked decline in the price of wool the wool growers naturally turn their attention to the medium wool-mutton breeds, with the result that the best wool-producing sheep are somewhat neglected. I hope the time will never come when the Canadian sheep grower will be compelled to ignore the development of the best wool-growing sheep.

Wool is one of the principal articles of commerce and next to cotton is the product most extensively used in the manufacture of cloth, felt and fabric. The sheep is valuable both for its wool and for its meat, and is one of the most productive animals on the farm. A sheep can live on the prairies or on hills where it is impossible for horses or cattle to exist, and perhaps there is not a country in the world with climatic conditions and pastures more suitable to sheep than in a portion of southwestern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta. Still, with these advantages, the wool-growing industry has been neglected because we have failed to place a duty on raw wool as asked for by the wool growers of western Canada. The duty that was formerly levied on wool was taken off by the late government in section 549 of the tariff, which was enacted on February 17, 1928, the commodity being thus placed on the free list. Some assistance was given the wool growers at the last session of parliament by increasing the duty on mutton, but raw wool was still left unprotected. Wool in the grease, scoured wool, noils and tops are admitted duty free, and the Canadian grower has therefore to compete in Canada with the wool growers of other countries, and with countries where wool can be produced much cheaper than in Canada.

Pressure of imported wool has prevented the development of the earlier processing industry in Canada in regard to carding, scouring and spinning, thus forcing the Canadian grower out of his own home market. The woollen trade—that is, with respect to the various processes from the yarn to the finished article—has received reasonable protection but no protection has been accorded with respect to the processes from the raw wool to the yarn, and as a result the manufacturing industries have purchased too much of their requirements from other countries. The Canadian grower in consequence is obliged to find a market in other countries. This seems to me to be very unfair to the Canadian wool grower as he has to carry the extra cost of freight, handling and selling charges in the foreign markets, while at the same time having to accept practically the same net returns as for wool sold in Canada.

When we produce only about one-third of the amount of wool needed by the manufacturers in this country, it would seem only reasonable that the home market should absorb every pound of Canadian wool. While the entire consumption of wool in Canada is in the neighbourhood of eighty million pounds, and the total production approximates twenty million pounds, it may be true that for a time the Canadian wool grower will not be able to fill all the requirements of the Canadian market; but if given adequate protection to secure the home market, and with better prices, the industry will be stimulated. There would be a great increase in the number of sheep and in a very short time the Canadian wool grower would be producing enough of the raw wool to supply the entire need of this dominion.

Owing to the fact that no attempt has been made to develop the industry of top making, the larger number of Canadian manufacturers start their operations from the tops, which are purchased by them wherever they can be found. There is nothing in the quality of Canadian wool to prohibit its use in Canada, nor is there any lack of quality which makes it necessary to import outside wool. It would appear that some of the troubles of the Canadian wool growers arise from the fact that no great effort has been made in Canada, as has been made in the United States, to develop the processes of wool from the fleece stage up to the tops. As a result, Canadian wool has to be exported in the raw state in order to find a market where the processing is carried out. Last year, western wool brought from 4 to 6 cents per pound while across the border, in the state of Montana, wool was bringing from 15 to 18 cents per pound. In order to remedy this condition the wool growers of Canada are desirous of having an adequate tariff placed upon foreign wool and to apply from the top stage down to the raw wool. The suggested duty is 34 cents per pound on raw wool, based upon the scoured, clean content, with graded protection from that point upwards. This application is supported by the Canadian Cooperative Wool Growers' Limited, with branches in both eastern and western Canada, by the Stock Growers' Association and by the Sheep Breeders' Association of Southern Alberta. This latter association passed a resolution to this effect at a meeting held on January 26, 1932, at which was represented over 900 sheep breeders, the owners of approximately 300,000 sheep. At a meeting of the Southern Saskatchewan Wool Growers' Association, representing over 125 breeders of sheep, the owners of approximately 50,000 breeding sheep, held at Maple Creek, Saskatchewan, on February 8, 1932, the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas: (a) The sheep raising industry in the western provinces as a commercial undertaking, with wool and mutton as its only source of revenue, is facing extinction unless its revenues can be increased.

(b) Any forced liquidation under the present existing prices and financial conditions would mean ruin to the present owners, and only the few with substantial capital resources will be able to postpone this much longer.

(c) The present purchasing power of the meat-consuming public has been materially reduced which, with depreciated currencies in foreign countries (the sources of our competing imports) will probably defer material improvement in mutton prices.

(d) In a general field of agriculture, sheep raising is one branch with room for expansion providing the Canadian home market for wool and mutton can be retained to the grower at anything over costs of production has an important place.

(1) On the western ranges, in making productive what may be termed semi-arid areas, and providing a regular supply of breeding stock for the farms, lambs for fall and winter finishing, as well as markets for feed to the farmers in the near districts, and

(2) On the farms, in fitting in with a better balanced scheme of mixed farming, and providing returns for a quantity of otherwise unsaleable home grown fodder, and for unused pastures, both these branches of the industry are well worth preserving, and, if possible, enlarging.

(e) In the markets of the United States the range wools of the state of Montana and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have always been recognized as being similar in type and command the same prices in those markets.

1931 western wools were bringing to the growers from four to six cents per pound, whereas in Montana, U.S.A., similar types and quantities returned from fifteen to eighteen cents per pound; therefore, there can be no reason for the wide difference betwen the Montana prices and those in Alberta and Saskatchewan than the protection afforded the Montana wool growers because of their import tariff on wool.

We cannot but believe that the enforcement of an import tariff on wools, sufficient to protect the Canadian producer in his home market, would have the same effect of improving prices to the Canadian grower.

(f) With the home consumption in Canada far exceeding production of similar types and grades of wool as are grown in the dominion, and with Europe being the only export market left to us, it appears unfair and unjust that the producer should have to shoulder the added cost of freight handling and selling in that market (as well as having to accept practically the same net returns for wool sold in Canada) when there should be a ready demand for all his products in the home consuming market.

(g) In the revision of the tariff at the session of parliament, September, 1930, all manufacturers of wool from the finished product to the yarn stage received substantial increases leaving out wool in the grease, scoured wools, tops, and noils as well as all forms of waste, resulting in the Canadian producer being unable to market his product in his own country, demonstrating clearly the fact that only substantial import tariff can improve existing conditions.

Therefore be it resolved: That we strongly urge upon the government of the Dominion of Canada that a tariff be placed on raw wool that will adequately protect the Canadian wool growers, and it is respectfully suggested that this should not be less than 34 cents per pound, general tariff, based on the scoured clean content.

To make a tariff on raw wools effective, we understand that it will be necessary to include tops, noils, scoured wools, and all forms of wool and waste between the raw wools and yarns.

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Yours respectfully,

William Kerr,
President,

George S. Herringer,
Secretary.

Southern Saskatchewan Wool Growers' Association.

The following table which appears in bulletin No. 75 of the Department of Agriculture issued in March, 1928, gives the number of sheep on farms and ranches in Canada from 1871 onwards. It reads:

1871..	3,156,509
1881..	3,048,678
1891..	2,563,781
1901..	2,510,239
1921..	3,675,860
1927..	3,265,727

The 1927 figure is the latest one given in that bulletin. The Canada Year Book for 1931 gives the estimated number of sheep and pounds of wool produced for 1930, as follows:

Number of sheep and lambs..	3,698,800
Amount of wool produced.. ..	21,016,000

The Bureau of Statistics has provided me with the average prices paid to Canadian growers for unwashed raw wool as compared with the prices received in the United States, as follows:

	Canada cents	United States cents
1925..	25	39
1926..	23	30
1927..	22	32
1928..	26	35
1929..	21	27
1930..	11	18
1931..	8	12

The American figures were obtained from the United States crop and market reports. Apparently they did not know in Maple Creek that I was sponsoring this resolution, because I received the following telegram:

Doctor J. B. Swanston, M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

We count on your influence when wool tariff comes up this week. Our men cannot continue in sheep business with wool averaging from four to five cents pound. Western producer must have same treatment as eastern manufacturer. We ask no favours. Make known demands of producers. We are also being forced out of a legitimate business by unfair treatment. Your constituency vitally interested in sheep business.

G. S. Herringer,
Secretary.
Southern Saskatchewan Wool Growers' Association.

[Mr. Swanston.]

These are the figures given by the Bureau of Statistics as to the imports and exports of wool:

Year	Imports pounds	Exports pounds
1930..	9,458,998	4,381,754
1931..	10,853,501	4,769,574

Some hon. members may wish to know the United States tariff. It is as follows:

	Duty per pound cents
Wool in the grease or washed.. ..	34
Scoured..	37
Wool on the skin..	32
Sorted, not scoured..	35

I have under my hand an article from the Farmers' Advocate of February 4 of this year. This magazine conducted a good deal of correspondence with the wool mills, particularly those doing custom work, and in its issue of February 4, 1932, it has this to say:

From one mill which does little but custom work we have this report:

"I have many customers who still have blankets in use that were made in my mill twenty-five years ago. I use only virgin wool. It takes from two to two and a half pounds of wool in the grease to make one pound of finished goods. It makes no difference what the product, all Ontario wool I have used is good."

Two and a half pounds of wool will make only one pound of the top, so that you would have about eight pounds of raw wool in a suit of clothes.

Another such mill says they use nothing but Canadian fleece, so customers are assured of receiving Canadian wool in their goods. Here is the testimony of another mill:

"We make motor rugs of two-ply yarn that cannot be worn out in a generation. Blankets made in 1875 to 1880 are still in use. Knitting yarns made from the best fleeces of sheep that thrive in the snow, goes out with a guarantee and will wear as well as the old-fashioned home-spun yarn."

One mill says that Leicester and Oxfords give the best wool for blankets and yarn, while Shropshires are best for batts.

Another declares that Shropshires make the strongest cloth. For fine cloths, Canadian Northwest Merinos are excellent.

From a mill specializing in custom work comes the assurance that all wools are suitable for domestic use except the very coarse long wool.

In conclusion sir, in the world market in recent years, the demand for raw wool has not kept pace with the supply. This is due to several causes among which may be mentioned the competition of other fibres, such as artificial silk as well as the general depression. Stocks have accumulated, and prices have become very much lower. Canadian wool has to compete in the world market which sets the price. Accumulated stocks of wool in other countries are dumped on the free Canadian market and force the prices downward. As a consequence, the sheep raising industry in Canada, which has made considerable strides as a result of much effort and organization on the part of the wool growers, has received a severe setback. A reasonable duty on raw wool, based on the scoured, cleaned content, would tend to better prices and the absorption of production in Canada. When I think of the wool consumption of this country being approximately 80,000,000 pounds and our total production being only 21,000,000 pounds per annum, and the Canadian mills alone using twice the latter amount, it seems difficult to understand why some policy could not be worked out, as has been the case in the United States, so that the whole of the Canadian clip could be absorbed by the Canadian mills and the Saskatchewan and Alberta wool growers would be put on a financial basis in keeping with that of their fellow ranchers on the other side of the line in Montana. In the United States the wool grower is protected; consequently the domestic production is absorbed by home industries and prices received by the grower are much better than those prevailing in Canada.

Our Canadian wool is as good, grade for grade, as any produced in the world and it is sold in world markets. Such being the case, the Canadian wool grower has some justification for demanding that the home clip be consumed in Canada. In these times when the prices of what the rancher and farmers have to sell have sunk below the prices of the things they have to buy, everything that can be done to lighten their burdens should be done, and a reasonable duty on wool is an aid which should be extended to them to save the wool growing industry in this country.

Mr. J. S. STEWART (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is with some satisfaction that I rise to second the motion of the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston)—satisfaction in that I know it will meet with the approval of the people of the riding which I have the honour to represent, and the vast majority of the people in that riding will endorse this resolution; satisfaction in that it gives me an opportunity to carry out a pre-election promise to the electors of the Lethbridge riding that if elected we would support any resolution—and I think this one meets the case—and any legislation that had for its object the keeping of the home markets for the primary producers of this country; satisfaction in that it gives me an opportunity to tell the house about the situation that confronts many of the people who live in the Lethbridge riding, their difficulties and the economic conditions in which they find themselves. Lethbridge is a constituency that lies immediately north of the United States boundary, runs for sixty miles straight north from Montana, and extends 120 miles from the southwest corner to the northeast corner. Its grasses, climate and lands make it a very fine country for the sheep rancher who has prospered in the years gone by. In this constituency there are men who for twenty to thirty years have been engaged in the sheep ranching business.

As the hon. member for Maple Creek has stated, we have in Canada a little over 3,750,000 sheep. In Alberta we have some 520,000 sheep, or about one-seventh of the sheep population of the dominion. We have centering around Lethbridge, many men who are engaged in the sheep ranching business. There are farmers who have herds of twenty or more; there are ranchers who have herds running from fifty to as high as hundreds or even thousands, with about 3,000 as the highest number on our fine range lands. These men have banded themselves together into the Southern Alberta Sheep Breeders' Association which sells cooperatively, through the wool growers' cooperative body in Toronto, over 1,000,000 pounds of wool each year. These men have also associated with them independent growers who with the membership of the association number in all 900 farmers and ranchers and control 300,000 sheep, or about one-twelfth of the sheep population of the dominion. They also produce one-twelfth of the wool of this country. In the years 1920, 1921 and 1922 some of these sheep ranchers were rated as millionaires. They made a considerable amount of money during the war both from their wool and their mutton, but to-day we find that their equity is almost all gone, and unless some assistance is given, it will be only the very well-to-do who will be able to carry on much longer.

How has that come about? It is because of the very short-sighted policies of our hon. friends opposite, through lack of a policy of protection and by reason of the treaties they have made with other countries. The Sheep Breeders' Association of Southern Alberta holds frequent meetings, to which I have been invited since the election of 1930. It has been my privilege to attend their executive meetings where the bankers sit in with the sheep breeders, and where one acquires an intimate knowledge of the conditions, economic and otherwise, surrounding this industry. I think, therefore, that I am in a position to say with some confidence that I have a fair understanding of the difficulties under which the sheep ranchers of southern Alberta are operating at the present time. I am also firmly convinced that they are only right and just in urging this government to give them some protection on the production of their wool because if they do not get some assistance it will not be long before most of them will be put out of business, and there will come to an end the sheep ranching industry which has flourished in southern Alberta for more than thirty-five years. Here is a statement which they gave me just before I left home, which describes the conditions under which they are working. They say:

> The sheep raising industry in the western provinces as a commercial undertaking, with wool and mutton as the only sources of its revenue, is facing extinction unless its revenues can be increased.

Besides attending the private meetings of the Sheep Breeders' Association it has also been my privilege to be present at their public meetings. They have held two since the election of 1930, one last year in February in the town of Magrath, and one on January 26 of this year, immediately before I left Lethbridge to attend the session here. At these meetings there were not present any manufacturers. The meetings were composed wholly and solely of men engaged in the sheep ranching business, and these men had arrived at the conclusion that if it was a good thing for the manufacturers to have a tariff, it was time that the sheep ranchers were accorded the same rights and privileges. One of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why I am here to represent the Lethbridge constituency as a Conservative, after twenty years' representation in this house by members of other parties, ten years by representation of the Liberal party and ten years by representation from the United Farmers party of Alberta, is because of conditions surrounding the sheep industry at the present time and during the last election —conditions which, as I said before were chiefly brought about through a lack of protection and through the unfair and unwise treaties which this country entered into with other countries.

It might not be amiss for me to indicate just what influence the sheep and wool business in southern Alberta had on the elections there in 1930. We had in the Lethbridge constituency, which I have the honour to represent, three candidates, one representing the Liberal party, one the United Farmers of Alberta, and myself as the Conservative candidate. The candidate of the United Farmers of Alberta, before he would accept the nomination, stated publicly at the convention, that so far as he was concerned he believed in protection for the primary producers of Canada, and that if elected to parliament his policy would be protection for his hay to enable him to transport his hay from the province of Alberta into the neighbouring province of British Columbia, which market was being supplied by hay from the United States. He said that if he got such protection for his hay it would only be fair and right that his fellow-farmer in British Columbia who was raising fruit should get protection for his apples, and that he himself should be forced to buy the apples from his fellow-farmer in British Columbia. When that statement was made our local paper—and we have a very good daily in Lethbridge—sent out an S.O.S. call to the electors of the riding, calling upon all those who believed in low tariffs to unite against the common enemy. It said that a vote for the United Farmers of Alberta candidate meant a vote for protection, and that a vote for the Conservative candidate meant a vote for protection, while a vote for the Liberal candidate meant a vote for low tariff. It was my privilege to visit some of the towns in the riding. I visited Magrath, which is known as the garden city of southern Alberta. The population there is made up of those who are engaged in farming, and many of the people there are interested financially and otherwise in the sheep-raising industry. We have there the farmer with his twenty head of sheep, and we have the large sheep rancher with over two thousand head of sheep. In talking public matters over with them at public meetings I found that right there in the heart of the sheep-ranching country, which raises some of the prize sheep of the whole dominion, their neighbours were buying frozen mutton sent in from some other country. Then I went to the town of Raymond, ten or twelve miles away, and in conversation with a business man engaged in the sheep-ranching industry I asked him how he was getting along in his business. He told me that during the fall he had taken a number of his flock to the sugar factory to fatten them on its by-products, and after having kept them there all winter, with men to look after them, he had sold them in the spring and lost just $1,500 in the transaction. Is it any wonder, then, that the polls right in the heart of that sheep-ranching country have returned for the first time in the history of southern Alberta a Conservative candidate by a large majority for that part of the constituency? I venture to predict, Mr. Speaker, from my knowledge of the farmers, that when another general election is held there will be many more representatives from western Canada sitting on this side of the house and standing for tariff protection. I might point out that that good paper in Lethbridge, which always supports our hon. friends opposite, now serves a country where the vast majority of the people are opposed to the policies it advocates. For every individual in that district who advocates a low tariff policy, there are not only two but three people who are opposed to the tariff policy of that paper and of the Liberal party. A short time ago a Liberal organizer came to the Lethbridge riding. The comments made on the visit were broadcast throughout every district of southern Alberta. It was said the difficulty in Canada to-day is that we have too high a tariff, and that what we need is a low tariff. We now see the spectacle in southern Alberta of the very paper which published the speech of that organizer advocating a tariff on wool, the very same policy as that advocated by hon. members on this side of the house. Having paid close attention to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite during last session, and the short session of 1930, it is not difficult to understand why there should be on their part a lack of consistency with regard to tariff. After observing the actions of many hon. members opposite, I have no difficulty in understanding this lack of consistency. One is forced to the conclusion that if he wanted to know how a real, expert contortionist performs he should listen to a Liberal on the floor of this house discussing the tariff.

I want to say that the farmers of southern Alberta are alive to the benefits accruing from a tariff. They realize it is right and fair that manufacturers should have their tariffs, so that industry in Canada may survive. They have also decided that if tariff is good for the manufacturer, it is good also for the wool producer; that is why we are here to-day—to plead the cause of the wool growers before hon. members in this house.

At the meeting held on January 26, just before we came east to attend this session, about one hundred members of the Southern Alberta Sheep Breeders' Association were present. At that meeting the wool situation was discussed, recitals were passed and resolutions adopted unanimously. Those decisions were made by men belonging to both the Conservative party and the United Farmers of Alberta. I have before me one of the recitals which I shall place before hon. members:

> In the general field of agriculture sheep raising is one branch with room for expansion, providing the Canadian home market for wool and mutton can be retained to the grower at anything over costs of production.

In so far as the mutton industry is concerned, this clause finds support. About 4,000,000 pounds of mutton were imported into Canada during each of the years 1929 and 1930. In the last mentioned year 4,443,527 pounds of mutton were imported, about 150,000 head of sheep. Undoubtedly, when the government brought down its tariff changes in September, 1930, it had in mind helping the sheep ranching industry, and those engaged in breeding sheep, because at that time the general tariff on mutton was increased from 6 cents to 8 cents, the British preferential tariff from 2 cents to 4 cents, and the tariff applicable to Australia from one-half cent to 3 cents per pound. Did those changes have beneficial results? As the boy on the street would say: "I'll say they did"—because during the year 1930 the imports were about 4,500,000 pounds whereas in 1931 they dropped to 1,185,327 pounds. Those figures represent a reduction in imports of over 3,000,000 pounds of mutton, and the farmers engaged in the sheep raising industry were allowed to supply this to the home market in Canada.

Unfortunately the price of mutton is very low. I have in my hand a telegram I received on February 13 from the Sheep Breeders' Association. In my view one of the reasons for the present low price of mutton is that we had a carry-over of about 5,000,000 pounds in cold storage at the commencement of this year. The telegram I have before me is as follows:

> Finished lambs fed on concentrated feed since December 1, now selling at four one-half to three-quarter cents pound with limited demand. When additional feeding costs considered this represents less than October and November prices, so only hope is for improvement in wool and can see no chance for this unless retention Canadian market for Canadian wools through tariff action assured.

In the manufacture and preparation of wool, from its raw state up to the finished article, there are five phases or processes. First we have the wool in its natural state, or in the grease. Wool in the grease is wool as it is shorn from the lamb. Heretofore there has been a great deal of trouble selling wool in Canada because we did not have proper grading. During the last few years however government officials have graded our wool, and when the manufacturers want to buy a certain grade they have merely to send in their orders and they are properly filled. The grading has meant much to those men engaged in the wool business. We find that there is a manufacturer operating at a point very close to the city of Ottawa who uses nothing but Canadian wool. His orders are sent to the Canadian Cooperative Growers Association. I refer to Mr. Rosamond of Almonte, who in a statement made in March of last year said:

> Now that the northwest wool is up to such a standard we find it splendid. We want to have the finest portion of the fleece, and we find it coming in splendid shape. We are using northwest wool entirely.

The use of the Canadian product has increased as a result of having reliable standards. The second phase in connection with wool is the scouring process by which burs, grease, smut and vegetable matters are removed. Foreign vegetable matter can be removed most effectively by a process of carbonization. After removal of foreign matter the fleece is washed and dried; during this process shrinkage, which is controlled by the degree of coarseness or fineness of the wool, takes place. Colonial wool and wools from foreign countries shrink as little as 30 per cent; in other words 70 per cent of the original amount of wool will remain after scouring and washing has taken place. So far as Canada is concerned however we suffer from much heavier shrinkage, ranging as high as 70 per cent. In western Canadian wool the average shrinkage is about 55 per cent. The third phase: after scouring the wool is combed; any wool over two inches in length can be subjected to this process. As a result of combing the manufacturer produces the long parallel skeins of wool used by the worsted manufacturers. Apart from the woollen skeins there are by-products or left overs called noils, which can be used for the manufacture of woollen articles. The fourth stage of production is that performed by the spinning industry, and the fifth by the weaving industry. I ask hon. members to take note that concerning the first three stages of woollen processes there are no tariffs applicable. There are however tariffs in regard to yarns and spinning and weaving processes. From the time the government placed a tariff on yarns, in September, 1930, great benefits were received by woollen manufacturers in Canada, because in the year 1930 we imported 6,000,000 pounds of yarns, whereas in 1931 by the assistance of the tariff our yarn imports were reduced to less than 3,000,000 pounds.

As has been said by the mover of this resolution, the annual consumption of wool in Canada is about 80,000,000 pounds. Canada produces about one quarter of what it uses, and yet in 1931 we exported approximately 4,750,000 pounds. We had left for domestic consumption approximately 16,500,000 pounds.

A goodly part of this wool was used by the people in their homes; it was manufactured by the little custom mills in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. We also imported in 1930 wool in grease, up to and including yarns, to the amount of 40,714,450 grease pounds, and wool converted into the finished product to the extent of 35,000,000 grease pounds.

With the importation of this large amount of wool, and Mr. Rosamond, one of the leading manufacturers in Ontario, stating that our wool is plenty good enough for his plant, why should it be necessary for us to export 4,750,000 pounds a year? That is the question worrying the sheep breeder and the wool grower in western Canada. I should like to draw the attention of the house to this article which appeared in the Canadian Textile Journal of June 18, 1931:

> With the expansion of the output of Canadian mills that is coming, and that is, indeed, already well under way, it should be possible to absorb all Canadian cross-bred wool and still have a large market to offer to other wool-growing countries.
> But cross-bred wools form the great bulk—about 85 per cent in point of fact—of the raw wool used in Canada.
> It is a matter of first class importance that Canadian mills, after absorbing all the home grown cross-bred wool available, shall fill their surplus requirements in this regard with wool from New Zealand.

It was hoped, and that hope has been realized, that by the tariff changes of September, 1930, there would be a stimulation of the textile trade of Canada, and many speeches were made last session which stated that to be the fact. But it was also hoped by those of us who live in western Canada that as a result of those tariff changes it might stimulate the purchasing and the use of Canadian wool by our manufacturers. But I am sorry to say such has not been the case; we are exporting more wool to-day than we did before those tariff changes were made. In 1930 we exported 4,381,754 pounds, and last year—after the tariff changes—4,769,574 pounds, or an increase of over 350,000 pounds in one year. Until last fall we in southern Alberta had been accustomed to having representatives of the wool houses in Boston and other parts of the United States visit our country to purchase part of the wool that is sold by the independent wool growers, but this year no one has come, and it is impossible for us to sell any of our wool to the American houses. It may be asked: Why are they not purchasing? The answer is simply that the tariff has been raised against our wool. In 1921 the United States tariff on scoured wool was 20 cents a pound; in 1930 it was raised to 34 cents a pound. To-day we are selling our wool to Great Britain, and the added cost of transportation has to be borne by the sheep men, the wool producers, and as a consequence they are getting very low prices for their wool. I understand that in eastern Canada the price that the sheep breeder gets for his wool is not so important, but in western Canada it is one of the main factors in the sheep breeding industry, because 50 per cent of our income comes from our wool. Shortly before I came here I visited the sheep breeding country with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). We heard a gentleman who has many fine sheep offer to give their wool to the sheep shearers in return for their work, but they refused his offer.

The Sheep Breeders' Association of Southern Alberta at a meeting on January 26th last issued the following statement:

> 1931 western wools are bringing to the grower from four to six cents per pound, whereas in Montana, U.S.A., similar types and qualities returned from fifteen to eighteen cents per pound; therefore, there can be no reason for the wide difference between the Montana prices and those in Alberta and Saskatchewan than the protection afforded the Montana wool growers because of their import tariff on wools.
> We cannot but believe that the enforcement of an import tariff on wools, sufficient to protect the Canadian producer in his home market would have the same effect of improving prices to the Canadian grower.

I should like to place before the house an article which appears in the February number of the Farm and Ranch Review. In answer to a letter which was sent to the editor, he wrote this editorial:

> I agree with you fully that the price of wool is absolutely disgraceful. I have dealt with the matter time and again in the columns of the Review. One very effective remedy would be a reasonable protective tariff on raw wool. I have brought this to the attention of the Sheep Breeders' Association several times and have urged it in the columns of the Review, but so far without success.
> Wool at the present moment is absolutely on the free list, which, in my judgment, is a scandalous situation.

I think the house will agree with me that with the price of mutton at 4½ to 4¾ cents a pound, and with the price of wool at 4 to 6 cents a pound, if the present conditions obtain for some time, and the sheep breeders are forced to liquidate, they cannot do so without taking a very heavy loss. It is not surprising that they state:

> Any forced liquidation under the present existing prices and financial conditions would mean ruin to the present owners and only the few with substantial capital resources will be able to postpone this much longer.

Not only did our exports of wool increase last year, but our imports also increased, and although the manufacturer was given protection—and with that protection we most heartily agree—yet he evidently failed to purchase his wool from the Canadian grower. Probably he had some inducement to do so—he imports his wool free, that is, wool in its raw state, scoured or pulled up to and including tops and noils. In this semi-manufactured state he is able to import the wool at a lower price than he could scour and comb it himself. It means a difference possibly of hundreds of thousands of dollars in a year so far as the manufacturer is concerned and I do not altogether blame him for doing so. But we do say that we have in Canada plants that are equipped to carry out all these processes; we have plants that can scour the wool and we have plants that can comb it. Why not therefore have that part of the manufacturing carried out in Canada as well as the processing from the tops to the finished article? I am stating the views of the Sheep Breeders' Association of Southern Alberta when I say that they are asking for a tariff on wool in its raw state, on wool scoured and on wool known as tops and noils.

Before I conclude I wish to place before the house a resolution that came before this meeting of farmers at Lethbridge on January 26 last, a resolution which was endorsed not only by those who were there as Conservatives but also by those who were there as Liberals and by those who came as farmers. They all want a tariff on wool, and they declared:

> That we strongly urge upon the government of the Dominion of Canada that a tariff be placed upon raw wool that will adequately protect the Canadian wool growers, and it is respectfully suggested that this should not be less than 34 cents per pound general tariff based on the scoured clean content.

The sheepmen of southern Alberta, I feel, have every confidence in this government. A delegation of sheepmen had an opportunity to place before the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) at an open meeting held in Lethbridge in the fall of 1930 their views with regard to the protection of the industry. The sheepmen of southern Alberta who are engaged in the ranching business have been very fairly treated by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy) in the adjustments he has made in connection with the lease rentals they have to pay to his department, and they have every faith and confidence in the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), who has also visited our locality and has heard the proposals put forward by those interested in the sheep industry. They are also confident in that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) comes from the province of Alberta and knows the conditions there; he knows the conditions under which the sheepmen are labouring. I am sure that he will not only sympathize with them but will lend them aid in the time of their need.

I respectfully suggest to the government that in any treaties that are being made the primary producer of wool in Canada be not asked to step up to the bargain counter and foot the bill to allow other products to be exported out of the dominion and other items to come into the dominion to the disadvantage of our producers. In any trade agreements that are made I would urge upon the government to see to it that the primary producer of wool in western Canada is given a square deal. I would respectfully ask the house to adopt the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston), and may I add that we trust the government will take action upon it.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): While we have no exportable surplus, a tariff on wool would undoubtedly raise the price of this commodity, and the very moment we had sufficient wool to be able to export, the tariff would not affect the price at all. The result would be that wool would fall to the price at which it was selling on the world market. We have had examples enough of that to know how true it is. All that a tariff would do in the meantime would be to encourage the production of much more wool than is now produced so that we should very rapidly go on an export basis. And when we did the price would be no better. In the meantime a great many people who thought that the good price would continue would have spent money on their flocks and gone into the industry on a more extensive scale, and they would then come to parliament asking for help, to a greater degree even than at the moment.

Surely the story of the dairy farmer in Canada is recent enough for us to learn the lesson he has been taught. I should really like to support the resolution, because the hon. member who moved it (Mr. Swanston) and the hon. member who seconded it have suggested that it would help the government to carry out their preelection promises. Heaven knows they need a little help in that direction. I wonder that anyone on the government side has the sheer nerve to recall the dairy industry story from 1930 up until to-day. The tariff was going to do wonders for the dairy industry. A lot of people knew what it was going to do: It was going to raise the price of butter for one thing, and it was going to bring in prosperous times. The same is true about eggs. As a matter of fact, one hates now to recall the prices of dairy products at that time and to compare them with the present prices. In the meantime we have had this tariff stacked up and it has done no good at all. Under the circumstances, as the representative of an agricultural constituency, and as the representative of intelligent people—for there are still some, I mean on the tariff and not necessarily in regard to other things—I am opposed to the resolution. I am not going to fool myself about it, not even for the two hon. members who preceded me. I am opposed to it because it is some more of the sheer nonsense we have been going on with in regard to agricultural products. You cannot raise the price of farm products by tariff. You can until you are ready to go on the markets of the world with an exportable surplus, but in the long run you cannot do anything about it. This is only one more step in the wrong direction, and we are stepping along in that direction swiftly enough, I think. Our imports are falling and our exports must fall too. Our foreign trade is being shot to pieces. No Canadian enjoys seeing the reports as they come out month by month, no matter to what party he may belong. For all these reasons I must oppose the resolution. We are living in an interdependent world when tariffs can no longer be maintained. We who are here to-day are going to see a reversal of policy in regard to tariffs the world over, and I do not want to postpone the task or make it more difficult. I am therefore opposed to the resolution.

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary): The mover (Mr. Swanston) and the seconder of the resolution spoke from the standpoint of the farmers who are growers of wool, and I am going to spend a few minutes discussing the protection of the wool industry from the point of view of one interested in the industry as it affects the city. Before, however, entering on that phase of the question I wish to summarize a few facts that have impressed themselves on my mind during the discussion of this resolution.

It appears that the imports of wool, principally raw wool and the wool in the first and second stages of fabrication, are four times as great as the production of wool in our whole country. At the same time, of the wool which is produced in Canada, probably one-third is being exported to find markets abroad. Another thing that has struck me is the well-established fact that Canadian wool is the equal of any other wool produced and meets all the requirements of the manufacturer in the fabrication of his textiles. That in itself would seem to indicate that there is every reason why the initial producers of wool should receive a protection sufficient to safeguard them against unfair competition from abroad. Again, if I have gathered correctly, the manufacturers of the various textiles processed past the first or second stage have received substantial increases in the tariff, so much so that they have placed themselves on a safe basis. Protection has been given to this industry but they have not reciprocated to the initial producer; on the contrary they have increased their importations from outside. Those who fabricate and manufacture are receiving substantial protection while the growers receive no assistance whatsoever. If there is such a difference between the amount required by the Canadian manufacturers and the amount actually produced, it stands to reason that there is a substantial potential market for raw wool, provided the initial grower receives a fair return for his production.

The growing of wool goes hand in hand with the production of mutton. While sheep may be raised for the purposes of obtaining wool, no embarrassment need be suffered by the meat end of the industry. The raising of sheep for the purposes of wool and mutton should be protected by this parliament, and I have no hesitation in supporting the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Maple Creek.

The manufacturer has not seen fit to cooperate with the wool grower and in view of the ample protection he receives I do not think any consideration need be given to him in regard to the placing of a duty upon the importation of raw wool. It is only fair that he should be compelled to purchase Canadian wool from Canadian producers.

Mr. YOUNG: Does the Canadian manufacturer pay more for the wool he imports than for the Canadian product?

Mr. STANLEY: The foreign wool is cheaper; that is why he imports it. He obtains it in semi-fabricated form because that work can be done cheaper in foreign countries. That is why we want protection.

I come from an urban community in Alberta and I would like to repeat some remarks made last year in regard to the geographical situation of this province. Whether we go east with our products or whether we send our manufactured products to the west, we are at the extreme end of transportation. We have to pay the top price for transportation either way. This province is very rich in natural products. We have cheap coal and abundant water power. There is a considerable home market for manufactured goods and we have a potential market in the orient which is not by any means inaccessible. It is felt by many that every step should be taken to industrialize our towns and cities and also to encourage the industrialization of our agriculture. The wool industry offers one of the best illustrations in this regard. It is important to encourage the growing of wool to be sold to manufacturers in eastern Canada or elsewhere provided a sufficient price can be obtained, but from the standpoint of our towns and cities as well as of the initial producers, it is more important that advantage should be taken of the home markets which are available both for the producer and for the manufacturer.

Fifty per cent of the wool produced in western Canada is produced in the province of Alberta, and a large portion of that production is in the constituency of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart). In 1930 Alberta imported from all foreign countries woollen products amounted to $3,500,000. The imports from other provinces in Canada amounted to $2,500,000. It will be seen that there is a potential home market amounting to about $6,000,000. When the three western provinces are taken as a group, they offer a potential home market amounting to over $37,000,000. It is not claimed that the province of Alberta will be able to retain all these markets, but if encouragement can be given to the production of manufactured goods within the province it would be good business for this government, for the provincial government and for the people of the province, to translate this $5,000,000 or this $37,000,000 into a payroll for Alberta workmen.

The woollen industry offers an opening for the fabrication of raw wool into all its various stages. As the hon. member for Lethbridge has just said, at the present time some of our wool goes all the way to the old country where it is cleaned and processed up to the stage where it can reenter this country free of duty. Why should wool grown in our province be transported all that distance, fabricated to the point at which it is permitted to enter Canada free of duty, and then possibly be shipped back to our province? Under a reasonable protection, a portion of this work could be carried on by our own workmen in our own cities. This matter has been engaging the attention of many men who have gone into this question with great thoroughness.

It is only fair to say that probably not enough encouragement has been given by the provincial government to this matter. I confess that it will be necessary for them to change their viewpoint with regard to the wool producer. It might prove very interesting to relate some of the cooperative undertakings carried on in this province. As it appears to observers and those best informed as to industry in our province, the wool industry has been neglected and no encouragement has been given to cooperative work in connection with it.

Manufacturers have come into the province and made a careful survey of the whole situation from the point of view of those who would be interested in fabricating the raw wool through its various stages. But before a manufacturer can commence operations, as I heard an hon. member say not long ago, something other is needed than just the bare opportunity. There must be encouragement; attention must be paid to a psychology that will encourage the capitalist to make his investment and the manufacturer to build his factory. We are just in that position in Alberta. It is necessary to protect the initial producer at this time, to stabilize the industry in a way that it has never been stabilized before, so that when the manufacturer makes his investment, when the capitalist puts up his money, he will know there is an established industry protected sufficiently by this country to afford him a permanent investment, one in which he will know his money is safe and secure so far as the supply of the initial product is concerned. The policy of the federal government, I need hardly repeat, has been to encourage the fabrication of our natural products in our home towns, the supplying of our home markets with home produced and manufactured goods. I am pointing out one of the best opportunities we have in Alberta in connection with the wool industry.

Before concluding, may I go a step further? Many towns in Alberta are entirely solid on the proposition; they have come to the stage where they are prepared to support home industry. Let me give just one illustration. Almost three years ago the consumption in Alberta of beet sugar produced in that province was about 5 per cent. A campaign was undertaken throughout the province to urge upon the people the consumption of the product made there, and in three months' time the consumption had increased from 5 to 45 per cent. This shows that it is necessary not only to supply the product but to educate the consumer, to create a psychological condition that will make the people stand behind the product that is made at home. That being the case, in the wool industry in Alberta there is afforded to us one of the best opportunities which any industry can have in its relation to the cities and towns of our province.

As a further proof that the assertion I make is correct, let me point out that in 1905 capital invested in Alberta manufactures amounted to $5,000,000, whereas last year it had increased to $107,000,000. During the years of the boom between 1924 and 1929 manufacturing in our country was going ahead by leaps and bounds, the increase in manufactured products in Canada being about 50 per cent, while in Alberta it amounted to about 65 per cent. Therefore I can say with assurance that the attitude of the people of our province is right, and I urge upon this house, and I shall continue to urge in public, that the viewpoint of the government of Alberta be changed so that they will support us in an effort at the industrialization of our towns and cities, with a proper relation to industrialization of the agricultural industry.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I shall not take very much of the time of the house in speaking on this resolution. Indeed, I must be careful, in speaking about it at all, to indicate that in this matter I am speaking only for myself and for the wool growers of the riding of Wetaskiwin. I shall not attempt to say that I am representing all the farmers of Alberta and that they are all in favour of this resolution, because I do not know whether they are or not.

It has been well understood throughout Canada for some time that farmers generally, and certainly those farmers who are sufficiently organized to speak with one voice, have been protesting against tariffs of all kinds. If there is any change in the minds of organized farmers to-day, it has been brought about largely by discouragement, having voted for so many years to reduce tariffs without obtaining any reduction of them. It may well be that they are now beginning to wonder whether or not they should change their tactics. They are beginning to turn their minds towards the other possibility, which is to obtain equal protection with others as an alternative to tariff reduction. I do not say that that opinion is general, but if there is any such opinion, that, I imagine, would be the interpretation of it.

It must be evident to everybody that there are at least two ways in which our agricultural population can be brought to a basis of equality with other classes in the country so far as tariffs are concerned. The first is that tariffs be reduced on all things which the agriculturists have to buy, thus bringing the agriculturist nearer to a basis of equality with the other classes. The second is to impose new tariffs or increase the present rates on everything which the agriculturists have to sell. One party in Canada has professed to take the former course, to reduce all tariffs, and thus place the agriculturist on a basis of equality with all the other classes in the state. Yet ever since confederation we have had a very high protectionist tariff, sustained by both parties in Canada. The other party say that they are going to bring about equality by imposing tariffs on everything which the farmer has to sell, and so far as the carrying out of that policy is concerned I think the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution (Mr. Swanston) deserves some credit for asking the government to do what they stated would be their policy when seeking election. I also hope that when those who advocate freer trade once again find themselves elected to support a government, they will not hesitate to do as the supporters of this resolution have done, and that is to come forward with a specific resolution urging the government under those conditions to bring about reductions in the tariff as they were elected to do.

May I say one other thing in that regard? The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has just made a speech on this subject, and very properly she says that we are living in an interdependent world, and that tariffs cannot go on. That is true, but the curse of it is that the tariffs are going on.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We have heard that talk for fifteen years.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, the only trouble is that this interdependent world apparently does not know that it is interdependent, and the fact is that tariffs do go on. I am not in this connection going to subscribe to any argument which might be brought up on the old battleground of tariff or no tariff, protection or free trade. I shall not subscribe to or associate myself with fanaticism on either side of the question, and we have that on both sides of the house undoubtedly. On the contrary, I want to point out, as has often been done, that we are dealing not with a theory involving the question whether we ought to have free trade or protection, or whether the world would be better off under the one policy or the other, but with this one fact, that the wool producers in Canada have to buy innumerable articles which are protected and which are increased in price by protection, while the commodities which they are engaged in producing have to be sold on the markets of the world without any protection, thus placing them at a disadvantage as compared with the other classes in Canada with whom they must deal. That is a practical proposition, and I am speaking of it now for the reason that I have received wires and letters from people in my riding urging me to support this very resolution. I have had wires also from the wool growers' association, and innumerable letters from individuals. I am going to read a section from one letter which I think will place before the house better than I can the viewpoint of the wool grower, and that will be just about all I want to say in connection with the matter.

Mr. HEPBURN: I do not think the hon. member has said very much yet, anyway.

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend has been so busy leading the forces of reaction for the last six months or so that I question whether he is capable of passing judgment on a matter of that kind. Further, when my hon. friend himself says something, either here or anywhere else, he will be in a better position to judge whether other people say anything or not.

In quoting a section of this letter may I say to my hon. friend who has just interrupted (Mr. Hepburn) that I am carrying out a principle to which I have always subscribed, and that is that my task is to say from this seat what the people I represent want me to say. That is perhaps too democratic for my hon. friend, but that is what I am trying to do now, and I will leave the matter to the judgment of the house. This writer, says:

> We have absolutely no protection on our raw wool but pay a pretty stiff duty on woollen goods. Under ordinary conditions I am not an advocate of protective duties, but as Canada for the present at any rate has determined on a protectionist policy I feel that we farmers in all fairness should get whatever benefit we can out of that policy. I am speaking not only for myself but also for a large number of your constituents, who, like myself, would very much appreciate your best efforts to have this matter put right.

That, Mr. Speaker, I think puts in a few words the position of the wool growers and what they are asking in this resolution. I would like to suggest to the government that if they carry out this resolution it may be necessary to do a little more than that. We are aware of the fact which the hon. member for Southeast Grey has mentioned, that protection does cease to have any value to agriculture at that point where the prices paid at home are determined by the export price. That is true; it has been true in regard to butter to a very large extent, and it will be true, I presume, in regard to any other commodity which may be similarly dealt with. It may be necessary in regard to the farmers who have received protection on butter, and who may receive protection on wool or other products, for the government to go a little further than imposing a tariff which is only nominal, and make such tariff real by adopting some such methods as have been adopted in New Zealand and Australia where export boards have been created to control from one common centre the export market and to maintain the home price at an economic level, the board having power to issue the necessary regulations. What I would call the economic level is the price at which it is possible for the producer to continue to produce under all the given economic conditions.

I hope Mr. Speaker that the government will take into consideration not only the wool growers but also the dairy interests and other sections of agriculture which may be benefited by protective measures. I am not advocating either of the old philosophies of protection or free trade, but I do advocate equality—and may I repeat this—equality of the classes in Canada, so far as legislation affecting their economic life is concerned, so that those who buy protected goods may receive protection equal to those who sell protected goods. If that cannot be done, some other means will have to be considered whereby such equality may be effected. I hope the wool growers will receive the consideration at the hands of the government outlined by the resolution.

Mr. F. H. PICKEL (Brome-Missisquoi): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to register my approval of the suggestions contained in the resolution now before the house. Statistics have been given by the mover and seconder, so that I need not revert to that phase of the matter. I should like to say, however, that the west is not the only section of Canada interested in the production of and duty on wool. Quebec and Ontario, especially Quebec, are much interested in this matter. There are no better sheep raising lands on the face of the earth than those existing in Quebec. Forty-five or fifty years ago within a radius of fifteen miles of my home I could count twelve woollen mills all of which were doing a very good business, but they are all gone because, so far as we are concerned, the sheep industry is a dead one. To-day we import hundreds of thousands of foreign lamb carcasses and vast quantities of foreign wools; as the mover and seconder have stated, those wools are brought into the country after partial fabrication has taken place. The fact that they are partly manufactured before they enter Canada means that there is an appreciable loss of labour which could be done here.

I have risen simply to state that I am in perfect accord with the motion and would ask that a good stiff duty, one that would really be effective, be given to the industry.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at length upon the resolution now before the house. Facts concerning the woollen industry have been debated thoroughly by hon. members who have preceded me. I wish to say, however, that not only in western Canada but in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the maritimes there are large areas of land admirably suited to the raising of sheep. The sheep raisers in the part of Ontario I have the honour to represent have for many years felt the need of assistance. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston) has said that we are producing only about 20,000,000 pounds of wool in Canada where our annual consumption is about 80,000,000 pounds. If adequate protection is afforded, however, I am sure Canada can produce a quality of wool equal to that now being imported by our manufacturers. It has been argued, and probably with some effect, that we are not producing a wool capable of being manufactured into the finest yarns. If such is the case, our inability to produce first class wool should be investigated. I am firmly of the opinion, however, that if we are given proper protection and encouragement we can produce wool as fine in quality as that produced in any part of the world. Certainly if there is one part of the agricultural industry requiring protection, it is the sheep growing section. I am heartily in accord with the provisions of the resolution.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I wish heartily to support the resolution before the house in favour of a duty on raw wool. In doing so I am expressing the sentiments not only of the wool growers and sheep raisers in the constituency I represent but of those engaged in the industry throughout British Columbia.

If I caught the remarks correctly of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) this afternoon, she said she was not going to help the government carry out its preelection promises. I should like to address this question to the hon. member—I am sorry she is not in her seat: Did she ever support any government that has done more to carry out its preelection promises than has the present government? It seems to me that the efforts put forth by this government to make good its preelection promises, and the success that has attended those efforts, will stand as a mark for a long time to come for any succeeding government to reach. She also said that in the recent election campaign the Conservatives promised that the tariff was going to increase the price of butter. Probably some of them did make that promise. But as a member of the Conservative party let me say I never understood that the tariff could be expected to keep up the price of butter in the face of reduced prices brought about by world competition, and that while we might still maintain our domestic price, we could not get away from the inevitable effect of declining prices in the export market. I do not think any Conservative in the course of the campaign ever intended to convey any other impression when dealing with the effect of the tariff on the price of butter. The hon. member also said that we have "stacked up the tariff but we have not got any good out of it." I do not think that is a very temperate statement. I would remind my hon. friend that whether or not the people in her riding have received benefits from increased tariff rates, certainly we have benefited in British Columbia. Had it not been for the tariff policy of this government the fruit and vegetable growers of British Columbia, I venture to say, would have got nothing at all for their crop last year in face of the dumping competition which then threatened, but which never became effective simply by reason of the prompt action taken by the government. I venture to say that there are many other instances where benefits have been derived by the people of Canada from the tariff increases which were imposed last session.

I have before me a resolution with respect to a duty on raw wool, the subject matter of this resolution, passed by the British Columbia Sheep Breeders' Association, and I will read it to the house:

Whereas the Canadian sheep industry is having a hard struggle to carry on, and

Whereas the amount of wool produced in Canada does not begin to supply the amount of wool required by the Canadian factories; it does not seem reasonable or right that 85 per cent of our wool should go outside of Canada for a market. The United States, with a high tariff, use similar wool to that produced in Canada and the grower receives 15 to 17 cents per pound when Canadian wool is only bringing 5 to 6 cents per pound. Would a tariff not help the Canadian wool producer?

We as tax payers are paying for care of unemployed and the factories of Canada are importing a semi-manufactured product, giving employment to men of other countries.

Therefore, be it resolved,—That we urge a general tariff be placed on all importations of raw wool and wool products, as tops, noils, scoured wools and all forms of wool and waste.

I may say that the head office of the British Columbia Sheep Breeders' Association and also of the wool cooperative organization happens to be in the city of Kamloops in my constituency.

British Columbia as a whole is very much interested in the sheep raising industry. At present it has a sheep population of 197,600 head, with a wool production of 1,103,000. For 85 per cent of that production the wool growers have to find a market in England. The wool has to be shipped out of the country for processing in England, and then shipped back here as a semi-manufactured article. Our manufacturers of woollen goods, of course, are using a good deal of that same class of wool. Our sheep breeders claim that if our manufacturers have to import that semi-manufactured wool, would it not be good business to give a certain measure of protection to our raw product to ensure that that processing shall be performed in Canada. As has already been pointed out, we have no scouring and combing industry in this country, and it is to encourage such an industry that this tariff protection is asked for.

With regard to our wool imports and exports, I should like to place these figures on Hansard. In 1929 we imported $54,428,000 worth of wool and its products.

Mr. YOUNG: We imported $54,000,000 worth?

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): We imported $54,428,000 worth of wool and its products; in 1930, $46,644,000; in 1931, $33,637,000. Of course, during the last few years there has been a drop in the importation of wool just as there has been of other commodities, and this is accounted for partly by the drop in prices. I want to analyse these importations of raw wool. In 1929 we imported 11,358,125 pounds.

Mr. YOUNG: Have you got the value?

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): No, but the value can be easily ascertained. According to the Bureau of Statistics this wool was imported from the following countries:

United Kingdom	4,795,000
New Zealand	1,744,000
United States	1,431,000
Australia	762,000
British South Africa	278,000
Argentina	174,000

Following are the percentage figures of these imports:

	Per cent
United Kingdom	51
New Zealand	18½
United States	15
Australia	8
British South Africa	3
Argentina	2

I understand that the National Research Council was asked to make an investigation into the quality of our wool, and that to get a proper basis on which to work they analysed these importations and found that the countries of origin were not correctly given by the Bureau of Statistics; that is, instead of being shipped direct, the wool we imported had been shipped from Australia or New Zealand to the United States, or Great Britain, and thence to Canada. The Bureau of Statistics made an analysis of the countries of origin as well as they possibly could and they have given out a statement in this regard. Of that 11,358,000 pounds the National Research Council find that the following are the figures with respect to countries of origin: United Kingdom, 3,435,000, or 30 per cent; New Zealand, 3,514,000, 30 per cent; Australia, 1,349,000, 12 per cent; South Africa, 680,000, 6 per cent; the Argentine, 5 per cent; and the United States, 173,000, or 1½ per cent. You will observe the difference in the shipments from the United States; instead of 1,434,000 pounds, as reported by the Bureau of Statistics, the National Research Council give only 173,000 pounds of American wool coming into Canada. The rest came through the United States. This analysis of imports is based on 11,358,000 pounds of raw wool in 1929, and indicates that for that year the supplies came from the different countries in these proportions: New Zealand and Australia, 43 per cent; United Kingdom, 30 per cent; South Africa, 6 per cent. We also imported 202,000 pounds from the Irish Free State and British India, or 2 per cent of our imports, making a total of 81 per cent of empire origin and 19 per cent from other countries—quite a different analysis from that given by the Bureau of Statistics. I understand there is a tendency in the trade at the present time to restrict imports through the United States by the appointment of Canadian agents in Australia and New Zealand, so that importations in the future will come largely direct from those two countries.

So far as the imposition of a tariff on raw wool is concerned, I take it that it is the policy of the present government to place a tariff on natural products of this kind. With particular reference to the sheep industry, I might point out that until June, 1931, our tariff on mutton was 15, 25 and 27½ per cent, and in June last year we raised that tariff to 4, 6 and 8 cents per pound, with a 4 cent per pound rate applying under the Australian treaty as well. As was pointed out this afternoon, imports of mutton declined from nearly 4,500,000 pounds to about 1,200,000 pounds between 1930 and 1931, showing that the imposition of the tariff must have been a factor in the reduction of imports. If it is a factor in the reduction of imports of mutton, I think it is a sound argument that it would be a likely factor in reducing the imports of wool as well.

As I said a few moments ago, the trouble in Canada seems to be that while we impose a duty on the manufactured article we have no duty on the raw product or on the product in its initial stages of manufacture; that is to say, we have no duty applying to the scouring and combing industry. Now it is for the purpose of establishing such an industry that this tariff is asked. There is a widespread opinion among wool producers in British Columbia—whether it is justified or not I am not prepared to say, but I mention this for the information of the government—that the manufacturers have altogether too much say in regard to the making of these tariffs, and it would appear that what we are saying with regard to wool bears out that statement.

An hon. MEMBER: Come over here.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): No; I will get you over here. As to the quality of wool, it has been contended by the manufacturers, rightly or wrongly, that the quality was not up to the standard required by the Canadian industry. I understand that the National Research Council have made investigations in this regard but so far they have not arrived at a conclusion. It is likely, however, that these investigations will be continued and that in the not distant future some statement will be made by the council which will once for all settle that question. But there is this to say on this point. The wool producers, as a result of their own investigations, and from information derived from various sources, have reached the conclusion that there are no grounds for a charge of that kind and that Canadian wool can be worked into all sorts of commodities necessary for Canadian consumption. The government, in addition to providing a tariff on mutton to assist this industry, have also given assistance to a very considerable extent through the Department of Agriculture; for I find that they expend in one way or another, for the benefit of the sheep and wool industry of Canada, the sum of $125,000 in that department. If they have gone to this extent it seems to me only a short step towards meeting the requests of the wool producers throughout Canada for this increase in the duty on raw wool.

For many years the wool industry in the United States has been protected, with the result that it has expanded in proportion to the population of that country. In 1870 they had a tariff of from 25 to 35 per cent on raw wool, and that has been increased from time to time; and now, as was pointed out this afternoon, there is a tariff over there of from 22 to 37 cents per pound of clean content, which is a substantial protection for the United States industry. Shielded behind that protection their industry has gradually extended, not only in the production of manufactures but also in the variety of products turned out. Moreover, it was the means of introducing new and improved machinery and methods in the woollen textile industry of the United States. If a tariff can produce such results in the United States I see no reason why similar results should not follow the imposition of a tariff in this country. The industry in the United States employs to-day a total of 180,000 people and consumes 200,000 tons of raw product.

I have no hesitation in supporting the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston), seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart). The conditions that prevail in the sheep industry in Alberta are very similar to those that prevail in the part of British Columbia which I have the honour to represent in this house. While the results of a tariff may not be apparent right away, I imagine it will not be long before the industry will show signs of improvement. I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to defend the government against its own supporters? The resolution under discussion reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of the Dominion of Canada place a duty on raw wool that would reasonably protect the Canadian wool growers.

What is protection? Hon. members opposite, for whom I have the highest regard, say that it would protect the sheep industry of this country. Will that industry be benefited by high or low tariff? I am informed that the government has removed the dumping duty on wool, and for this action it is to be congratulated. It shows that the government is getting away from that economic nationalism which has proved to be the curse of the world, more especially to the United States. Some years ago that country started to erect high tariff barriers and the example was followed by other countries and by this government. A very distinguished person, speaking last year in Buenos Aires, stated that trade is exchange and is essentially international.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite remind me of the Bourbons who had forgotten nothing and learned nothing. For many years we have heard that protection is the remedy for all evils. Last year I put a question on the order paper asking for the date when the highest duty on butter was in effect, and the date when the lowest price had prevailed, and the answer I received disclosed that when the duty was the highest the price was the lowest. To such an extent was that true that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) allowed a large quantity of butter to come out of storage without paying duty. When I inquired of the minister why the price of butter should be so low in the face of the high duty, he informed me that as we were then starting to import butter, we were forced to meet the price quoted by other countries, especially on the London markets.

Many prominent members of the Conservative party have expressed their views in connection with high tariff. There is one gentleman who must be considered as having still a very high standing in the party, as he has lately been made the official leader of the party in the other house; I refer to the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. On April 8, 1926, as reported on page 2253 of Hansard, he is quoted as follows:

> Mr. Ross (Moose Jaw): You contend that if the tariff is taken off the prices immediately rise?
> Mr. Meighen: We contend it and we know it, because we see the facts.

Apparently that view has been accepted by the government in the removal of the dumping duty on wool. That is a step in the right direction, and I congratulate the government upon their action. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) is quoted on the same page of Hansard as follows:

I say the protective policy of Canada gives the manufacturers in Canada, and the farmers for that matter, an opportunity to hold the market for themselves; and they sell the goods cheaper when they can hold the market for themselves. That is what protection does. That is the mistake my hon. friends from the west make. If you take off the tariff you raise the price of goods.

I agree with that statement, and I am glad that that policy is being followed by this government.

The speech of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) was just a mass of figures and interesting only to an expert mathematician. One cannot remember the figures quoted but one can easily arrive at a conclusion, and a definite conclusion seems to have been reached by such eminent Conservatives as the Minister of Railways and the official leader of the party in the other house. Hon. members on the other side who have taken part in this debate would derive great benefit from reading the page of Hansard from which I have quoted.

If this country is to prosper it must trade with other countries. Trade is international and the lower the tariff barriers are the more trade there will be. Unemployment can be cured only by increasing our trade, and if high barriers are erected as a measure of so-called protection, in a very short time conditions will be even worse than they are at the present time.

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, in the course of this debate we have listened to many able representations of the views expressed in the resolution. It has always appeared to me, in considering the problem of diversification, that there is no branch of the farmer's work that lends itself more readily to desirable expansion in this country than that of sheep raising. In every province of Canada there are tracts of land which are particularly suited to the raising of sheep and possibly lend themselves to no other use. On some of them for generations sheep have been raised, but unfortunately the industry seems to be in a languishing condition, or at least it has not increased considerably, and there undoubtedly is an impediment in the way. That impediment is the fact that the industry is not carried on under lucrative auspices and is not remunerative to the farmer who spends his money and gives his time in that occupation.

Those interested in the industry—officials, for instance, of the Department of Agriculture—have endeavoured to increase the interest taken in sheep raising, but their work has largely been unsuccessful. So long as we leave the industry in the condition in which it is to-day, so long as we refuse to make use of such assistance as is advocated in the resolution, so long will the industry stand still. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston) introduces his resolution at an apposite time. We have recently seen a considerable increase in the consumption of mutton and lamb of Canadian production resulting from an increase in the tariff. Wool, no doubt looked upon in the past as a raw material, has remained untouched by tariff. If Canada produced no wool that policy might have been reasonable; but not only does Canada produce wool, she produces it in the grades required and is capable of very considerable expansion in quantity, so much so that with reasonable assistance it would not be long before we produced all that our manufacturers require.

When certain items in the woollen fabric schedule were raised recently, there resulted a satisfactory increase in production, but unfortunately the benefits of that increase died out before they reached the wool grower. He did not benefit therefrom because the manufacturer imported in increasing quantities the semi-fabricated article. If, therefore, it would be possible to decrease largely the quantity imported so that the actual grower of wool would receive the benefit, we would see many areas in Canada at present undeveloped given their chance of expansion.

What, then, has stood in the way? The only thing I can think of is that proper consideration for the consumer which must always be given by a government contemplating an increase in tariff. But would the addition of a reasonable tariff in this case unduly affect the consumer? In a man's suit of clothes, weighing possibly four and a half pounds, it is probable that the woollen content amounts to some four pounds. As we have already heard to-day, the various stages of scouring, washing and turning the wool in the grease into cloth, reduce the quantity of wool to such an extent that in all probability eight pounds of wool in the grease are required to provide the woollen content of the finished suit. If, to the present price, yes, or to double the present price of eight pounds of wool in the grease, were added the reasonable duty suggested in this resolution, I maintain that it would even then be but a small factor in the cost of the finished article. If a suit of clothes cost $20 or $70, eight pounds of wool with the reasonable duty added would be but a small factor; and we should remember that the lower the price of the finished suit, the less the woollen content. If there were a tendency for the manufacturer to increase the price, we could surely look to that competition which exists in the woollen fabric industry to prevent undue extortion.

I support this resolution because it has appeared to me for a considerable time that until we do something to assist the wool grower as apart from the manufacturer, we shall continue to see the wool industry languish. Experts tell us that the grades of wool required by Canadian manufacturers are all capable of production in Canada if they are not all so produced to-day. We know at the present time there are certain grades right up at the top of the list which come under the category of the superfine wools which are not produced in this country, but we are also assured by experts who have examined into the matter from the production point of view that in western Canada, particularly in British Columbia, where the mellowing influences of the Pacific breezes are felt, it is quite possible to grow those fleeces from which the superfine wool can be made. In the valleys of southern British Columbia from which I come, the sheep industry has been in existence for a long time. Climatically and geographically that district is well suited to the purpose. The lambs are born in the valleys, the flocks are taken to the mountain tops for summer range and brought down to the plateaux and foothills when winter comes, and from there they are returned to the shelter of the valleys where they receive the food produced from the cultivated land. At the north Okanagan exhibition, which yearly is increasing its number of exhibits, I saw two years ago seventeen breeds of sheep on exhibit, a greater number of breeds, I must admit, than I knew existed in western Canada. Year by year the sheep growers are endeavouring to improve their breeds, to do all they can to produce wool of the best quality, and most suited to the Canadian market. There is no doubt that assistance of some kind must be given to them if the industry is not to languish and disappear.

For these reasons I gladly support the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Maple Creek, and trust it will receive the earnest consideration of the government.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, with the object in view, namely the encouragement of sheep raising for the purpose of supplying wool to our factories, I fully sympathize. I quite agree with the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) who has just taken his seat, that we have not done enough in that regard. In that part of the province of Quebec in which is situated the constituency I represent there is not the slightest doubt that very large tracts of land not fit for other purposes would be excellent sheep-raising grounds, and the same is true of very large portions of territory in other parts of Quebec and in Ontario and the maritime provinces. But as to the means propounded in the resolution for encouraging this industry I must say that I have some hesitation. I remember that in the past I advocated the same thing—putting up the duty on raw wool so as to encourage the raising of sheep; but after I had given more time and study to the question I came to the conclusion that that was perhaps not the best remedy for the situation.

First of all, speaking at least for eastern Canada, I think there has been too much neglect in the matter of the breeds of sheep which have been introduced into this country. Of late years something has been done by the government of the province of Quebec to encourage the breeding of good wool-growing sheep, but that is still a very feeble effort. As to the federal government, I remember last year receiving a letter from an agricultural organization in my county asking under what conditions they could secure from the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa the services of blood sires to improve their stock. I made inquiry and I found out that it would have been possible for them to get a stallion; but it seems to me that in the present state of things it is not the breeding of horses that should be encouraged but rather the breeding of sheep.

Much has been done by provincial organizations and by private organizations more or less connected with governments to improve the dairy herds by breeding good stock. Much progress has been made in that direction, but not enough has been done I think with regard to improving our breeds of sheep.

As to the qualities of wool, I have tried to inform myself as well as I could through Canadians or foreigners who are engaged in the industry, and I have been told—I do not give it as a fact myself because I am not an expert—that in order to produce certain qualities of woollen goods we still have to import foreign goods and that in exchange we export raw wool of a coarser quality. Whether in those parts of British Columbia, to which the hon. member for Yale has alluded, it is possible to raise the finest grades of sheep that give alpaca wool, for instance, I do not know, but of course my hon. friends from that part of the country know. As far as eastern Canada is concerned I do not think that either our climate or our soil is favourable to the raising of these finer breeds of sheep. Therefore we must consider the problem from the viewpoint of the whole of Canada, and for that reason I do not think that Canada can become a wool producing country to the same degree as Australia or New Zealand or India. Nevertheless something should be done.

There are various means at the disposal of both the federal and the provincial authorities which would meet the object of hon. gentlemen who are supporting this resolution, without resorting to that old and somewhat worn-out remedy of raising the tariff. I do not think it is necessary to raise the tariff; to do that would have a greater effect than the hon. member for Yale believes. We have already experienced the effects of the tariff. It is all very well to make calculations of the amount of duty actually levied on the quantity of wool that enters into the making of a suit of clothes, but as my hon. friend knows, by the time the raw article has been imported, manipulated and turned into manufactured goods, the amount of duty is trebled and quintupled and very often multiplied ten times for the benefit of the manufacturer or the tradesman, so that the consumer really pays more than the actual amount of the duty levied upon a certain portion of material entering into a manufactured article.

But I do not want to bring up again the whole question of protection. As I have stated frequently in the house, I have no bias on that question; I may say—cynically perhaps—that I have no principles on the question. I do not believe in the creed of protection or in the creed of free trade, but I do believe that in these days, considering the interests of Canada as a whole, more or less interwoven as they are with the interests of other countries, and considering the necessities of trade, the government should hesitate before applying the crude remedy of raising the tariff every time there is some complaint by the producer of an agricultural or manufactured product. This question should be studied more thoroughly. I understand that the National Research Council has made a study with regard to the quality of wools, to which the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) made reference. I suppose their conclusions will bring some light on that one aspect of the question, as to the varieties of wool and the possibility of producing in Canada the finest quality of wool which is required for the finest articles. In that connection, however, hon. gentlemen must bear in mind the great change which has taken place in—shall I say?—the fancies of the people. In the old days, for example, the general demand was for wool, pure woollen goods both for undergarments and for outside clothing, even for dresses. Well, I suppose the ladies are largely responsible for the change in our habits, because from day to day and from year to year they have been looking constantly for lighter and lighter articles, until they dress up, or rather dress down, even in winter to such an extent that the woollen industry has suffered largely through these changes in fashion. Even some men believe it is more healthy to wear a much lesser proportion of woollen undergarments than they did in the old days. I am one of the oldtimers; I still stick to wool, but it has become very difficult to get the real woollen articles manufactured in Canada. I may tell the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) that every time I go to the other side I buy a shirt or two in England or France in order to be sure that I get a woollen shirt, because you cannot get them in Canada. The article which is sold in Canada as woollen is not woollen, although there is some portion of wool in it. So that is another aspect of the question.

Encouragement should be given to the breeder to raise better stock, by way of premiums or some other means which could be discussed between the federal and the provincial authorities, and the manufacturers also should be induced to make greater use of wool. My good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) could make use of his fine spirit of propaganda, and issue, not in any luxurious way, but in a practical way, not a creed, but some sound advice to the public of Canada to make use of an article which is suited to our climate. We are not living in Africa or in the tropics. We live in a cold climate, where woollen goods are a necessity, I consider. A good many of the illnesses that are going around among both sexes are due largely, although there are other causes, to the fact that we have discarded the good woollen shirt and the good woollen under and upper garments.

I wish to direct my next few remarks to the discouragement of the small industries by large manufacturers. Without applying my remarks to any particular constituency or geographical circle, may I say that in the old days in the province of Ontario, the maritime provinces and most certainly in the province of Quebec, there were small woollen industries producing articles for local consumption. In my own constituency, for example, most of the goods used in the shanties by lumberjacks were made in the surrounding country. The manufacture of those woollens gave work to the people in the villages; many women were enabled to stay at home and work on these products, in that way fulfilling at once their social duties as mothers of families or daughters assisting their mothers, and helping a local trade.

What has been the course pursued by the large manufacturers? They have discouraged and hewn down the small factories. In my constituency the father of a family, an industrious man, thought he would be helping himself, his family and his community by establishing a small woollen industry. He purchased nothing but wool grown in the community, the work was performed by his sons and daughters and the cost of production was reduced to a minimum; but what happened? The minute he began to expand his trade and sell some of his articles in Montreal and Toronto he was immediately boycotted by the representatives of all the large factories. As a result his trade was ruined.

The successful endeavours of large monopolized industries to kill small local industries apply not only to wool but to many other commodities. If there is a desire to encourage the farmer to raise the proper kind of sheep to produce the best grade of wool there must be an endeavour to place at his disposal at the nearest possible point a small factory which will purchase his wool at a fair price and will not cut down the rate under the pretence that a large industry, being capable of purchasing in bulk quantities and importing from foreign countries, cannot afford to pay large prices to small farmers. They may urge the excuse that the small producer does not clean his wool properly. In my view it would be a very simple matter for manufacturers with good will in their hearts to teach the farmers the best manner in which to prepare their wool, so that uniformity, quality and cleanliness of product might be the result.

I have no intention of dealing at length with this subject, but wish simply to associate myself with the desire of the hon. member who sponsors this resolution. I suggest, however, in the most friendly spirit that I do not think the remedy proposed is quite sufficient, and in my view it would not have the result he anticipates.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with this resolution, for three principal reasons. First, I am in favour of the protection of every sound industry in Canada, basic and manufacturing; second, because I represent a district very largely concerned with the raising of sheep and the production of wool; and, third, because of the loss to Canada of the woollen industry in general.

It is difficult for me to conceive of any industry which should be more typically Canadian, from the point of the original product to that of the very highest manufacturing, than the woollen industry. All across Canada there are areas ideally suited to the raising of sheep. Regardless of what may have been said I contend we live in a country where woollen goods are required, and everything that can be done should be done to foster our woollen industry. The question at once arises: Why has the industry, surrounded as it has been by every natural condition which should tend towards its development, languished? The answer is simply this: In the woollen industry, as in almost every other industry, no one in Canada has been able to tell from year to year what was going to happen to the particular line of manufacturing in which he was engaged. For a short time there would be a protective tariff and at another period it would be taken away. The vacillating policy which was pursued has made it impossible for the man raising sheep to know what was going to happen in one, two, three or four years.

One or two questions have been raised with regard to the industry in general. An hon. member has asked why we export wool, and another has asked why we are importing it. We ask ourselves why we should export any portion of our wool and at the same time be importing the same product. The answer has been that our exports are of qualities not suitable for manufacture in Canada. Less than a year ago it was my privilege to attend a conference of wool growers and sheep raisers from different parts of Canada, and at that meeting I heard the reasons why we are exporting wool and, at the same time, importing. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart) mentioned this afternoon the name of Mr. Rosamond of Almonte, a manufacturer of woollens who uses, very largely, Canadian wool. He said to that conference, "We manufacturers are anxious to use one hundred per cent Canadian wool, but we cannot get it. First, there is not sufficient wool produced for the present general requirements, and second, the industry has been in such an unstable condition that it has not been possible to develop the type of industrial organization to take Canadian wool, and bring it to a point where it would be suitable for the manufacture of all classes of goods produced in Canadian woollen plants." It was pointed out at that conference that there was no combing or carding industry in Canada; consequently Canadian wool had to be sent out of the country for processing. So far as I know the same wool may come back in manufactured form. The statement was made that if there was an assurance of continuous and reasonable protection for the woollen industry, both producer and manufacturer, it would be possible to build in Canada that high type of manufacturing plant capable of receiving the fleeces from Canadian producers and converting them into high grade woollens required by the most exacting manufacturers.

The statement has been made that Canadian manufacturers have dictated the extent of protection that the wool producer should receive. I know nothing about that, but I was told at the conference, composed partly of wool growers and sheep raisers, that a tariff doubling or trebling the price of Canadian wool to the manufacturer would be satisfactory. The manufacturers said they would continue to purchase Canadian wool in large quantities. In passing may I add that the grading of wool has added largely to the security of the manufacturer buying the raw product. Under present conditions he is in a position to secure any grade for which he may ask. Those manufacturers pointed out that even if the price of wool were doubled or trebled the cost of the raw product would be but a small item as compared with the cost of the finished article. To illustrate, one of the delegates said that the actual cost of the raw wool in the suit of any delegate present would represent only about twenty-five cents of the whole cost of the suit.

It may be said that although the woollen industry is languishing every other industry is in a similar plight. That may be true, but it is no reason why some attempt should not be made to stabilize this industry, indigenous as it is to almost every province of Canada, particularly the west and some areas in Ontario and Quebec. I may say that in the district I represent the area devoted to sheep raising could take care of all the sheep in Canada, if they were raised in the intensive way in which they raise sheep not only in England and Scotland, but also in Australia and New Zealand. That is an illustration of what may be possible.

This afternoon my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) raised the point of developing industry to its highest point in Alberta. Nothing that the hon. gentleman said or could say was more pertinent than that statement. Anyone who has had the privilege of going through the province and seeing its possibilities—power, fuel, oil, with the tremendous areas available for sheep raising—must reach the conclusion that under any plan of reasonable encouragement Alberta should be the home not only for the raising of sheep, but also for the manufacture of woollen goods for at least all the western part of the dominion.

I wish to associate myself with this resolution, Mr. Speaker, and to urge on the government, as strongly as I possibly can, favourable consideration of its subject matter, which has been supported so adequately by members on this side of the house.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Long Lake): Mr. Speaker, the facts with regard to the subject matter of the resolution have been presented by the mover and the seconder so convincingly that it becomes unnecessary for me to speak at any great length. There is one phase of the resolution to which I wish to draw the attention of the house. I fancy our friends across the way, particularly those from my province, have already received copies of this resolution and realize that it is a straight, clear cut, fullblooded, definite declaration in favour of protection of a branch of farming in order to develop agricultural industry. Judging by the silence of hon. members opposite they have swallowed the whole thing, for we have not had a word from them throughout the afternoon or this evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have not had a chance.
