Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): You wait until we are all through; that is the coward's game. I have been waiting for the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) to declare his views on this resolution, but he has sat in his seat like a dummy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I repeat, Mr. Speaker, this resolution is a clear cut, definite, full-blooded declaration in favour of protection. Can you imagine such a resolution as that coming from the province of Saskatchewan? Imagine it! Ten years ago we out there were branded as ready for the asylum if we dared to suggest protection. Here we are to-day with this declaration asking the house to do something, not only for Saskatchewan but for the whole of Canada. For this is not a sectional proposal, it is national in its scope. The adoption of this resolution will put money into the pockets of every farmer in Canada who goes in for the raising of sheep.

Mr. YOUNG: Oh, oh.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): My hon. friend from Weyburn laughs. I dare him right now to stand up and oppose the resolution, and then go back to Weyburn.

Mr. YOUNG: I will do it.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): You have either to swallow your principles or oppose this resolution. The scene has changed out there entirely.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And it will change again.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): We of the Tory party out in Saskatchewan as far as organization and results are concerned have put it all over you. You have no possible chance of ever winning out there again, and we propose to make use of our opportunity and give the benefit of the tariff to every corner of this dominion. Those people state in this resolution that they are in favour of a clear cut, definite policy of protection for every industry that can be developed in the dominion, and for the protection of industry in all its branches. We hear it constantly stated in this house that agriculture cannot be protected. But who knows better than the farmer himself as to this? I fancy the farmer knows.

Mr. YOUNG: He knows now.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Yes. My friend need go back only a short time when in the Hotel Saskatchewan, Regina, seven hundred representatives foregathered from all over the province, presumably all free traders, and passed unanimously a resolution in favour of a duty on butter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): You may laugh, but I tell you they are doing it yet. Now the Saskatchewan Sheep Breeders' Association have passed a resolution, and this is the concluding paragraph:

> Therefore be it resolved that we respectfully urge upon the government of Canada that the sheep breeding industry be encouraged and the wool growing business be protected by the enactment of a protective tariff on wool equal to the tariff on woollen yarns and semi-manufactured cloth.

My hon. friend is a farmer. Well, here is a whole bunch of six or seven hundred farmers. They have laid down a sort of feather tick so they can fall on it and not get hurt. We ask that this resolution be enacted so that the raw wool industry of Canada may be fully protected.

You say that the Conservative party has really gobbled up the province of Saskatchewan, and that this is probably a sort of political dodge. I have heard that suggestion before. To safeguard myself against anything of that kind, I wrote the secretary of the Sheep Breeders' Association and asked him to send me a copy of the resolution. I know the secretary very well; he and I are good personal friends. I refer to Mr. J. G. Robertson. You ask: Who is Mr. J. G. Robertson? I tell you he is live stock commissioner for Saskatchewan under the provincial government. That sounds political, you say. It does. But he was appointed live stock commissioner by the late Liberal government and has been continued in office by the present government, although he is the rankest Grit in the province. He sent this resolution to me and asked my support for it. So you see the resolution is not political at all, it simply means that a lot of Liberals are not less Liberals by passing this resolution; they have simply acquired a lot more sense.

We ask for the imposition of a duty on wool because we believe it is necessary to the industry. The member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston) told you that Saskatchewan is a splendid country for raising sheep. So it is. All the country south from Maple Creek to Willow Bunch is splendid for the raising of sheep. But it is not the only part of Canada suitable for sheep raising. I think I know Canada fairly well from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I do not know of one place in the whole Dominion where sheep raising is not natural. It is a natural industry. When I was in old Ontario long years ago, milking cows and attending to horses and doing all the work that everyone does on a farm, the raising of sheep was part of our activities. It can be made a profitable industry to-day. A report from the dean of the University of Saskatchewan declares that sheep raising is profitable. Indeed, it is the only really profitable part of the industry of agriculture that I know of to-day. Why not let us take hold of this industry and build it up for the farmers of the country?

I represent a rural constituency 125 miles by 110 miles, and in some parts of that constituency the farmers raise a great many sheep. In one part of the riding, where farmers were lured by the prospects of a railway, they are raising sheep to-day 25 and 30 miles from transportation. The farmers, of course, can always kill a sheep when they need meat, but so far they have not been able to get any advantage from their wool. They have to shear the sheep but they do nothing with the wool. Where is it? It is lying in the sheds. you will find tons of wool rotting in the backyards simply because it does not pay the farmers to take it 20 or 30 miles by truck or wagon to the railway and then pay railway charges. A reasonable amount of protection would stimulate the industry, and I therefore gladly associate myself with the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston) who has moved this resolution. The hon. gentleman was brought up on a farm and he knows the industry from beginning to end; he knows the possibilities there are in wool producing. I am therefore very glad indeed to support his resolution and I hope my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) will tell me whether or not he is in favour of it.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I am not going to prolong this discussion but there are one or two observations which I wish to make, after listening with a good deal of interest to the debate thus far. Let us see what the resolution says:

> That is the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of the Dominion of Canada place a duty on raw wool that would reasonably protect the Canadian wool growers.

I take it that the proposed duty on wool coming into this country is purely for the benefit of the wool growers. We all know that the woollen industry, so far as the manufacturing end is concerned, is pretty well protected; it is well taken care of. I have listened with a good deal of interest to my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Fraser), who gave figures in regard to the imports of wool into Canada, and also in regard to exports. If I caught his remarks correctly, he said that we imported last year 11,358,000 pounds of raw wool and exported 5,000,000 pounds. Now, let me say to my hon. friend from Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) that I have come to certain conclusions in regard to this resolution, and when I have stated those conclusions I do not wish him to get the impression that he has converted me in any way, because he has not. I have arrived at my conclusions in a different way from hon. gentlemen across the floor. The riding I have the honour to represent in this house is largely a rural constituency engaged in mixed farming. The sheep industry is a part of its agricultural operations, and the representations that I have received from the farmers there, no matter to what political party they belong, are all the same. They are unanimous in this view, that the present government which came into power in 1930 has done absolutely nothing in their interests, nothing to promote their prosperity. Agriculture in this country is going down, and if the imposition of a duty on raw wool will help it I am inclined to support the resolution. Wool is something that we can produce. I am not very familiar with the industry as a whole but I have heard it said that there are certain qualities of wool that are not produced in this country—qualities suitable for certain classes of woollen goods. It is necessary, so I am told, to import these varieties. Apart from that, however, if the imposition of a duty on raw wool will help the industry I am inclined to favour the resolution. It may stimulate the sheep industry and the production of wool and provide the farmers of the country—and I am speaking particularly for my part of Ontario—with a market at a price that will give them a profit. There is not a single solitary article produced on the farm to-day which the farmer can sell at a profit. The price he is receiving is below the cost of production, and we should do everything we can to stimulate the industry. If agriculture does not prosper nobody in this country will prosper at all. It is all very well to talk about tariffs, and you can raise tariffs as high as you like for the manufacturers; but if the farmer has no purchasing power these tariffs are useless.

As I have said, I have arrived at my conclusions in a different way from my hon. friends across the house, and I am inclined to support the resolution. For heaven's sake let us try to do something for the farmer. I repeat, this government has done nothing to stimulate the great basic industry of the country, agriculture. We need not go further than the estimates which have been brought down. There, Mr. Speaker, you will find that the estimates for this great industry for the next year are some $3,300,000 less than they were last year. If there is any industry in connection with which the estimates should not be cut down, even in this time of stress and strain, it is agriculture. I will support this resolution and give the government of the day a chance to show that they will attempt at least to do something for the farmer. I sincerely hope that if a duty is imposed on raw wool coming into the country the manufacturers will not attempt to raise their prices. If they do it will be only a farce. However, I take a chance on that and support the resolution.

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): I regret that I find myself in complete disagreement with my hon. friend (Mr. Sanderson), who has just concluded his short address. I shall have to do to him what Premier Henry did to me in the Ontario legislature the other day, I shall have to take him out in the front yard and spank him. I agree with the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) that this resolution involves a clear cut declaration of policy; therefore there should be no fear with regard to the outcome of the vote. I know that my hon. friends across the way always have been true to a false policy, and I anticipate that they always will be; but I do not like to see them pulling the wool over the eyes of hon. members on this side, especially in a debate on the wool question.

I should like to make passing reference to the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). I have followed his career for a number of years, the first time I heard him speak being back in 1921. At that time he was denouncing the evils of protection, but apparently he has been partly converted. At the present time he does not seem to know whether he is coming or going; his speech started nowhere and ended very much in the same place. After listening to his speech one of his colleagues recalled to my memory an occasion when I followed him in this house a few years ago, after he had delivered a similar address. At that time I said he was very much like the negro who was going through a deep wood during a thunderstorm. The negro kept saying: "Good Lord, good Devil, good Lord, good Devil;" he did not know into whose hands he was going to fall.

I know where I am going to stand; I am going to stand consistently by a policy of low tariff. I do not think anything will be gained by applying further tariff protection to the woollen industry. I represent a constituency which is at least half rural and I have the interests of the farmer at heart just as much as any hon. member in this house. Let us look at this thing in a general way. We all know that the sheep population of practically every country is falling off. There must be some reason: one reason is that we are changing our mode of attire. We know that wool consumption has not increased along with the population of the world. I suggest to the hon. member for Long Lake, who I understand is the Grand Kleagle of the Ku Klux Klan, that if he is sincere in this matter he should have his organization use woollen instead of cotton sheets. As a matter of fact I would forgive him if he came down here next year dressed like Mahatma Ghandi. We know that as far as the average man is concerned he subscribes to the advice of advanced science and believes that by wearing lighter apparel it will be conducive to better health. We know that as far as the female of the species is concerned in the wearing of woollen goods, the bathing suit is the last stand and there is not much left there.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. HEPBURN: Not only is consumption falling off, but as far as our country is concerned we are not producing the right kind of material to make the finer classes of woollen goods. The National Research Council has been endeavouring to evolve a method of producing a better grade of wool, but climatic conditions are against us. No act of this parliament can change our climatic conditions. The only way we could produce a class of wool fine enough for certain manufactured products would be to grow our sheep under glass. If the principle of falsely bolstering up protection is right, let us follow it right through and provide a tariff high enough to permit us to grow our sheep under glass. That would assist the glass industry.

We recall the arguments which emanated from the other side of the house, and I regret to say from this side as well, during the debate on the New Zealand treaty. Our hon. friends said that all we had to do was to put up the tariff sufficiently high to increase the production of butter in order to make prosperity for the dairyman. However, other economic factors entered into the situation just as they have in connection with the wool producers. As I said, the world consumption of woollen goods has fallen off and we cannot produce in this country a salable product for export. The same applied to butter, but we did not consider that and we foolishly went ahead and put a prohibitive tariff on the importation of New Zealand butter. During the last campaign I spoke in the riding of the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Boyes). At that time I knew he was absolutely sincere in believing that the high tariff which would prohibit the import of New Zealand butter would contain remedial measures so far as the dairyman was concerned. However, we could not produce a product salable on the export market. Our cheese rated 96 per cent No. 1; our butter rated 70 per cent No. 1, and in the interests of good business naturally we sold our surplus in the form of cheese. Our cheese commanded a premium of 3 cents per pound on the Liverpool market and it was good business for us to continue to sell our surplus in that manner. But then came the false propaganda of our Conservative friends, as a result of which the importation of New Zealand butter was stopped. What was the further result? The New Zealander did not throw his product in the sea; he made it into cheese and sold that cheese in Liverpool in competition with ours. The result of the new competition was a lower price; that price was reflected in Canada and we had the anomaly of cheese at 12 cents per pound and butter at 37 cents per pound. That condition did not obtain for very long and we then turned to an increased butter production, which production was increased some 36,000,000 pounds.

This is the very thing which our friends advocate as being in the best interests of the dairy producer of Canada. At that time I pointed out that the worst thing which could happen would be for us to go on the export market with an unsalable butter product. We are now trying to sell butter which grades only 70 per cent, No. 1, and naturally we have to take an abnormally low price. We enjoyed a premium on the British market for our cheese; we had practically no competition, but the New Zealander entered the market and Doctor Ruddick, dairy commissioner, stated a short time ago that New Zealand practically had captured our market in England because we had failed to maintain a continuity of supply. We adopted the same policy which we are being asked to adopt in connection with wool; we put ourselves on an export basis with a product which was not salable. I do not think there is one intelligent member across the way who advocated that policy two years ago but who will agree that it has had a very adverse effect upon the dairy industry.

We have the same situation in connection with wool. If we stimulate the production of wool beyond the consumptive capacity of Canada, then we will be going into the export market with an unsalable product.

Mr. BOYES: The New Zealand treaty was in effect many years under the previous government, and the cancellation on May 1 did not come into effect until October 1. During that period other countries shipped into Canada such large quantities of butter, which at that time was protected, that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. BOYES: Our butter industry received a serious blow at that particular time.

Mr. HEPBURN: There has been such a noise in this part of the chamber that I could not hear my hon. friend. I suggest that he make a speech after I finish.

I am dealing with the question of producing a surplus of products which is not salable on the markets of the world. I am sorry the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) is not in his place, as I would have liked to point out to him another case of falsely stimulated production. A great effort was made in southern Ontario to defeat me during the last elections. I know of the propaganda that was carried on among the bean growers there. They were told that all that was needed to bring prosperity was a tariff of $1.25 on beans.

[Mr. Hepburn.]

That idea was presented to the farmer. Finally an indignation meeting was held in the riding of Elgin and on that occasion I tried to reason with about 800 men who attended, endeavouring to point out to them that if they produced an exportable surplus of their product, they could not sell on the export market because they had not the proper grades and the beans had too much moisture content. I told them that if they increased the production beyond the consumption capacity of Canada, the price of beans would be less than $1 a bushel. The tariff was applied; the production was doubled and the result was that they had a surplus of 1,500,000 bushels that would not sell on the export market. The consequence was that the price of beans, which had stood at $3, dropped down to $1 a bushel, causing a state of chaos in the bean industry. The producers, however, came back for more of the hair of the dog that bit them; they came to the Prime Minister and he gave them a dumping duty and they again increased their production. The result is that this year they are carrying 1,000,000 bushels of beans in their granaries and the price has dropped to about forty-five cents a bushel.

The same thing may be said about any other product you like to name. Although the tobacco manufacturers told the producers there was too great a production and that they could not consume it, the producers came to the government asking for an increase in the tariff. For what purpose? In order to produce more, although the market will not absorb the present production. It is a time we called a halt to this uneconomic state of affairs. Production is increasing at the rate of 20 per cent due to the policy advocated in this very resolution, while the world population is increasing at the rate of only 5 per cent. That is why we have this state of chaos at the present time. We will yet go through a process of elimination and the country with too high a cost of production will be put out of business.

The other day we had a debate on the bonus on wheat. That bonus was given obviously for the purpose of stimulating the production of wheat. We know at the present time we have a world surplus of wheat. If it is a sound policy for us to dip into the public treasury to stimulate the production of wheat, it follows it is good policy for every other country to do likewise. If as a result of the policy endorsed by this government every country adopts the same idea, and instead of a 500,000,000 bushel surplus we have a 1,000,000,000 bushel surplus, is that going to help the basic producer? It certainly will not.

I believe the farmers of southern Ontario are thoroughly convinced they cannot exploit anybody else and that is the whole purpose of dangling the protection bait before the farmers, telling them: You vote for us and we will give you a tariff. They have had a fine example of the policy of the government and they are thoroughly sick of it.

As regards the men to whom the government are giving special privileges, I can refer to the gasoline industry which to-day is exploiting the basic producer. The agricultural machinery industry, as a result of tariff concessions granted recently, has increased the price of repairs on machinery. I could refer to anything else you want to name. If you want to do something for the farmers, stop this exploitation that is taking place at the present time. I have under my hand some letters I received to-day from southern Ontario. One man tells me that as a result of the policies of this government which have brought about trade restriction, which have lost markets for him, and which have increased the cost of everything he has to buy, so far as production is concerned the only thing he can get at to-day is his poor hired help. He says that in his neighbourhood at present married men are working for $25 a month and they are trying to maintain at the proper standard of living a family of six or seven. Can you picture a condition of that kind—a married man, in some cases where the wife has to help with the milking morning and night and the man has to feed and clothe seven children and send them to school? Do the government think they are helping that man by adding to his burden an increased cost of living? We are on the wrong track completely and the sooner we reverse the processes of all governments and have some regard for the fundamental law of supply and demand, for the cost of production and for the masses to-day who are being exploited, the sooner we shall make this world a better place in which to live.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I find myself in accord with the sheep raisers. I have been engaged in the live stock industry for half a century. It is well known that the sheep men and the cattle men never agree on the ranges; they have quarrelled since the beginning of time; but in this case, when I find the raw product going out of the country to be fabricated elsewhere, I have to be in accord with this resolution. I endorse the resolution because the sheep raising industry has practically petered out. The sheep brought in from Montana under the policy pursued by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) were sold at ridiculously high prices to many settlers in my constituency; they were sold at $14 a head when they were worth only $6, and this resolution is intended to help those men to get out of the hole in which they found themselves by being loaded with sheep at such exceedingly high prices. These sheep were brought from Montana into western Canada with the idea of eradicating the weeds from the farms that the wheat growers had been working. I do not want to tackle the wheat grower again, but by mining the soil he had been growing nothing but weeds and it was for the eradication of those weeds that the idea was formed of bringing in the sheep.

I want to have it understood that I am in favour of this resolution; I wish to have our raw products manufactured at home. I do not want to see them leaving our shores to be fabricated in other countries. It would make one's blood run cold to stand on the platform in the Winnipeg, Toronto and other Canadian stockyards and see the growing yearly steers going out of the country to be made into meat products in the United States, the beef being shipped back to Canada and used in some of the principal hotels. I do not want to see that. I am in favour of any measure on this side of the house that will keep the raw products of Canada in Canada and have them fabricated in this country. Therefore I associate myself with the resolution.

Mr. VALLANCE: How does the hon. member propose to keep the raw material in by the application of the tariff?

Mr. MULLINS: I have lived in Canada for sixty-two years; I have lived under every government from Macdonald down to the present Prime Minister, and every time there was a fair tariff, not an exploiting one, this country has prospered. My hon. friend opposite had a tariff. What about the countervailing duties they were going to impose? They had a tariff but they camouflaged it. They tried to make the people believe: Oh, we are free traders. Why, there is not a Cobdenite or John Bright amongst my hon. friends opposite, not even the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young).

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends opposite for the past two or three years have been carrying on a campaign urging people to buy made in Canada goods. It is interesting from this side of the house to watch the development of that idea. At first the cry was: Buy goods made in your own country; buy goods made in Canada. This met with a measure of success. Now it has gone one step further and the cry is: Buy goods made in your own province. This afternoon I listened to the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) speaking to this resolution. His chief concern seemed to be to build up a woollen industry, not in Canada, but in Alberta. What he wants really is interprovincial tariffs to shut out from Alberta the competition of woollen producers in the east. That same policy of buy-in-your-own-province has taken hold in Saskatchewan. The friends of my hon. friends opposite are in power there and they are preaching "Buy goods made only in your own province." Today they are taking advantage of the plight in which the farmer finds himself to force him, through the Saskatchewan Relief Commission, to burn only Saskatchewan coal whether his stoves are suitable for it or not. I wonder how my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart) who is supporting this resolution likes that. How do my hon. friends like the policy of buy home made goods carried a step further when it is confined to their own province? The next logical step in this policy of theirs would be: Buy only goods produced in your own family. When we reach that stage it is only a step to Gandhi and the spinning wheel, and if they could bring us to that pass they would lower the standard of living in this country to what it is in India.

In September, 1930, a special session of this house was called for the purpose of raising tariffs. That session was brought to a speedy close because the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) wanted to get to the Imperial conference in England, an imperial conference called for the purpose of promoting inter-empire trade. One of the first things we did during the short session was to raise the duty on New Zealand butter, and the very day we did it the Prime Minister of New Zealand sat on the floor of this house and watched it done. He went away from here in rather an unfriendly mood. The Imperial conference proved to be a fiasco.

Mr. DURANLEAU: How do you know that the Prime Minister of New Zealand went away in an unfriendly mood?

Mr. YOUNG: By his action in retaliating when he got back to New Zealand. He shut out Canadian goods. The Imperial conference held in London to promote empire trade failed. Why? Primarily because our country made preparations for that conference by raising tariffs against Great Britain. Next summer, in this chamber probably, another conference for the same purpose, to promote empire trade, is to be held. I wonder if this resolution is a preliminary step to raising the duty on Australian and New Zealand wool so that we can go into that conference and—what? Promote empire trade, or make the conference another failure as was the last one?

Mr. CHAPLIN: What does the hon. member mean by raising the duty? Is there a duty now?

Mr. YOUNG: Putting a duty on, then.

Mr. VALLANCE: The duty was wiped out by this government by order in council.

Mr. YOUNG: It is rather disappointing to think that the farmers, after all the experience they have had in the last two years, would support a resolution of this nature, disappointing to think that farmers could be made to believe that their products can be protected. We were told two years ago that if the farmers would vote for a higher duty on butter they would get a better price. The treaty rate on butter was one cent a pound. It was raised under the general tariff to fourteen cents and under the preferential to eight cents. Now the Australian rate is five cents. Did that help the price of butter? When the duty was one cent a pound butter was selling for 38 cents a pound in Montreal. With the lowest rate of duty, now in effect five cents a pound, butter is now selling at 22 cents a pound in Montreal.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did the change in duty lower the price?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It certainly helped.

Mr. YOUNG: Did it raise the price? My hon. friends told the farmers that it would raise the price.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) said that the change in duty lowered the price.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friends opposite promised to raise the price by means of a duty, which they utterly failed to do. The same thing happened with eggs. The duty on eggs coming in from the United States was three cents. My hon. friends opposite told the farmers that they were not getting a high enough price for their eggs because the duty was not high enough. They were returned to power and raised the duty to ten cents, and what was the result? Eggs two years ago in January were selling in the west for 40 cents a dozen. When I left home this year they were selling for ten cents a dozen, and that is fresh laid eggs. Did the duty raise the price? No. Did it hold the price up, did it prevent it from going down? No. Then they put a duty of thirty cents a bushel on wheat. What for? To shut out less than one million of bushels of a certain kind of wheat brought in for special purpose. When they did that the price of wheat was in the neighbourhood of 90 cents a bushel; to-day it is in the neighbourhood of 60 or 70 cents. Again I ask, did the duty hold up the price? Again it failed.

My hon. friend from Lethbridge mentioned to-day the case of mutton. A duty was put on mutton last year to hold up the price. What happened? Mutton on his own admission is lower to-day than it was then. Now since the tariff has failed to hold up the price of butter, since it failed to hold up the price of eggs, since it failed to hold up the price of wheat, since it failed to hold up the price of mutton, since it failed to hold up the price of beans since it has failed to hold up the price of practically everything on which it has been applied of the products which the farmer has to sell, what reason have we to think that a tariff of 34 cents or any other rate will hold up the price of wool?

Mr. MANION: Under these circumstances what is the objection to a tariff on manufactured goods?

Mr. YOUNG: I will explain that in a moment.

Mr. MANION: Why not now?

Mr. YOUNG: Wherever you have an exportable surplus of a staple commodity, and that surplus is sold in the world's market, the world price fixes the price of the domestic article, but wherever you have a commodity that can be sold within a sheltered market with outside competition shut out, as is the case with manufactured goods, then the seller of those goods is in a position to take advantage of the tariff to boost the price, as he does.

We were told this afternoon, and figures were quoted by hon. gentlemen opposite, that we export approximately five million pounds of raw wool. If you put a duty of 34 cents a pound on raw wool, what effect will it have on the price? Those five million pounds of export wool will be sold on the world's market, and the world price will determine the price that we will pay for wool in Canada. So the price will not advance one cent.

My hon. friends say that they will shut out the wool that is imported and supply the demand with the wool that we now export. But they will not do that for the reason that it is not the same kind of wool. They told us that the Canadian woollen manufacturers have assured them that the Canadian wool is suitable for the fabrics they produce. So it is. But it is not suitable for the fabrics they do not produce, and that is the reason they do not produce them. Canadian wool is suitable for certain fabrics, but with all their enthusiasm for made in Canada goods I wonder how many of my hon. friends opposite would like to come into this chamber in a suit of homespun, made of all Canadian wool. I wonder how many would like to wear a suit of underwear made altogether of Canadian wool. Is there any difference between Canadian wool and other wool? Yes. It is not due to the breed of the sheep. It is due to our climate. Our climatic conditions are such that our sheep grow a wool which is suitable for certain purposes but not suitable for other purposes, and the wool we export is the surplus wool we have over and above our own requirements for the purpose for which that wool is suited. The wool we import is wool that we require for making goods that cannot be made with our own wool.

Reference was made to the price we pay for this foreign wool, as compared with the price we receive for our own wool. I asked the hon. member who was speaking a question, and he said that we get the foreign wool cheaper. That is not the case. I have here the 1930 price of foreign and domestic wool. The price of western Canadian range wool was 16 cents a pound. That was the average price paid that year. The price for the cheapest kind of imported wool in the grease was 33 cents a pound, more than twice as much as the price of the domestic wool. This year the average price of imported wool in the grease is 20 cents a pound, and hon. gentlemen opposite have been telling us all day that the price of our Canadian wool is from 5 to 8 cents a pound. I ask this question: Why does the Canadian woollen manufacturer pay twice as much for imported wool as he would have to pay for Canadian wool? Why does he do that? Is it because he is prejudiced against the Canadian wool grower? Not at all; he is a practical business man. He pays a higher price for that wool because he requires it for his purposes, and no duty which can be placed on imported wool can force him to buy Canadian wool for purposes for which it is not suited.

Let us suppose that a duty is applied; what will happen? Either it will or it will not increase the price of wool. It it does not increase the price of raw wool to the farmer what good is it? If it increases the price of raw wool to the farmer it increases the price the manufacturer has to pay for his raw wool. What will the manufacturer do? He will be back to-morrow knocking at the door of parliament asking for a higher duty on finished woollen goods. How would the government refuse him?

What are the chief competitors of wool?—cotton, rayon, silk and other fabrics. If the government did anything to advance the price of wool they might tax it right off the backs of the people and force them to wear articles composed of other fabrics. I suggest we cannot help the woollen industry by increasing the price of woollen goods. England tried that in the seventeenth century. Because her sheep growers were most influential she was resolved at all costs to build up her woollen industry. She resorted to every conceivable device, such as import and export duties. She passed laws stating that all other fabrics such as silks and cottons imported into the country must be exported so that the people would be forced to wear woollen goods. She passed laws compelling people to be buried in woollen shrouds. What was the result? She failed utterly to build up her woollen industry; she forced the people to use cotton. So far did she carry out her attempt to protect the woollen industry that a continental observer in England wrote to this effect: "It is a felony in England to export wool; yet they who furnish all the world with wool have the least manufacturing of it among themselves." What happened? The English weavers who were denied the use of imported wool had to weave their cloth out of domestic wool? The French weavers who had the world from which to select were able to choose finer wool, produce a finer fabric which drove the English woollen goods out of every market in the world. At the same time the price of woollen goods in England rose so high that the people turned to the wearing of cotton, and the woollen industry which the government was trying to build up by artificial means was utterly ruined.

What is the remedy for the woollen situation to-day? We say that people are not wearing as much wool as they used to; that is true. The fact is however that Canadian wool is not to any great extent used in the manufacture of garments. Its use is confined chiefly to the making of blankets and other coarser woollen products. I should like to take some of my hon. friends opposite into some of the houses which are not heated with steam, and where the occupants are not quite as comfortable as are my hon. friends, and show them how many of those people would like to have woollen blankets, but cannot afford them. How many people are sleeping between cotton blankets because they cannot afford wool? To create a larger market it is necessary to put woollen goods upon the market at a lower, rather than a higher price.

Mr. FRANK BOYES (East Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations concerning the resolution before the house, with which I am in hearty accord. I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) who is situated just to the south of my riding, and who stated that he is not in accord with this resolution. I should like also to refer to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) whose riding is to the north of mine. It would seem that to some extent he has been converted and is falling in line with the Conservative party to the extent of allowing some protection on wool.

Mr. SANDERSON: My hon. friend need not flatter himself in that regard; I am far from being converted to high protection.

Mr. BOYES: At any rate my hon. friend has gone some distance.

Mr. SANDERSON: I do not want my hon. friend's congratulations at all.

Mr. GOTT: We could not congratulate the hon. member on his London speech.

Mr. BOYES: No, we could not. I do not desire further to take up the time of the house, but wish merely to repeat that I am heartily in accord with the resolution now before us to the effect that there should be a duty on wool. Undoubtedly some help to the producers would assist greatly.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the hon. members for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) and Weyburn (Mr. Young) have expressed admirably the views I entertain, and I feel that there is no necessity for repetition. I should, however, like to refer to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) who, I am glad to say, is now in his place and whose attitude was well described by the hon. member for West Elgin. I presume, however, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin attended the United Farmers of Alberta convention which passed the resolution read a short time ago. I hope the attitude of the hon. member is not that taken by the Alberta farmers. At this time it would seem proper to read the resolution to which I presume the hon. member for Wetaskiwin gave his assent. The resolution, with which I heartily agree, is as follows:

Whereas, the fiscal policy known as protection or a protective tariff which has been on trial in Canada for over fifty years since its inauguration in 1879, has belied every promise of its promoters, both then and since, and has utterly failed to promote the general well-being of the people of Canada and has developed instead a most pernicious maldistribution of our wealth, and is on this account immediately responsible for that disparity in market values as expressed in present day prices, which exists between what the farmer sells and what he buys, which disparity is one of the principal causes of the present industrial debacle and the general economic depression;

Be it therefore resolved, that the time has come for an immediate all round reduction in our custom duties to the intent that within a period of not less than five years every feature and constituent of this barbaric economic superstition be eliminated from the fiscal policy of our country.

I repeat: I presume the hon. member for Wetaskiwin gave his consent to that resolution?

Mr. IRVINE: The assumption is entirely wrong.

Mr. BROWN: Hearing the hon. member's speech I was reminded of the Irishman who was willing to sign the pledge, with certain exceptions—that he might indulge at a wedding, at a wake, at the market or a fair, or "when I think I need it". So it occurred to me that some people are strongly opposed to the principle of protection except when they think they need it. Hon. members opposite evidently are utterly unable to understand that those representing farmer constituencies should be opposed to this resolution. Listening to the arguments advanced in its support, I was taken back to my boyhood days. The first knowledge I had of political affairs was gained in the election of 1878. I remember we were hearing then the very same arguments for protection on wool that we are hearing to-day. Personally I am convinced the farmer is on the wrong track when he commits himself to the principle of protection. He may secure some immediate temporary advantage, but ultimately it will be to his disadvantage. Surely we have had abundant results to confirm that. If anything should warn the Canadian farmer of his danger, it is the experience of the farmer in the United States. He has been urged again and again to support the principle of high protection, and he has yielded. What is the condition of the American farmer to-day? Has he benefited because of his adherence to the principle of protection? No, his acceptance of that principle has been to his complete disadvantage.

I am satisfied that if the condition on the farm is to be what we want it to be we must seek the remedy along entirely different lines; we must seek it along the lines of reducing the cost of production rather than increasing the price of the product that we have to sell, for in a general way that price is beyond our control. Surely we have had experience enough in the case of butter to show that a protective tariff in itself does not give the farmer the returns to which he is entitled. We have listened so frequently to the arguments from the other side of the house, that having seen those arguments so falsified one is amazed that they should be repeated to-day.

When addressing the house the other day I said I had a message that I wanted to deliver to the member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins). I did not do so on that occasion because he was not present. I am going to deliver it to him now. I have received a letter from a friend of mine telling me that he had just sold a 10 gallon brimful can of table cream—the highest grade of cream—that tested 32 per cent butter fat, for which he received $2.85. Now, I should like to say to the member for Marquette, and to all those other members from the west who during the election campaign went around the country showing cream cheques—the member for Souris (Mr. Willis) was one; I think probably all the Conservatives in Manitoba did the same—I want to say to them that some of those 1930 cheques would look mighty good to-day.

Those who support this resolution are, I submit, proceeding along wrong lines. The only effect it can have if translated into practice is as was pointed out by the hon. members for West Elgin and Weyburn; and in spite of the inability of the member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) and other members opposite to understand that we who are interested in the prosperity of the farmer take the position we do, I am compelled, Mr. Speaker, to stand by the position I have always taken,—that the farmer is on the wrong track when he seeks to increase his profits by means of a protective tariff.

Mr. IRVINE: Will the hon. member kindly explain to the house and the country the reason why he did not reduce these tariffs in the way he wants them reduced when he had the opportunity?

Mr. BROWN: I have no objection to answering the question. I think any person who has listened to any speeches I have made in the house during the last ten or eleven years will understand my position. I said again and again that I wanted to go further than we ever yet have gone in the way of reducing tariffs, but because I had not been able to get all that I wanted in that direction was no reason why I should want to throw in my lot with those who want to raise tariffs.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you get?

Mr. BROWN: If you will look up Hansard of two or three years ago you will find that the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) put on record a list of the tariff reductions that had been made in seven years, and it took fifteen pages of Hansard to record those reductions, in spite of the statement made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), that there is no difference between the two parties on that question. I think that is a sufficient answer to his question.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): I desire, Mr. Speaker, to associate myself with this resolution. I am a practical farmer; that is the way I make my living. I am fairly well acquainted with sheep, with cattle and with hogs and with every other line of agriculture that the farmers are attempting to carry on at the present time.

Farming has changed considerably in the last ten or fifteen years. I speak with reference to the maritime provinces, particularly my own province of Prince Edward Island, one of the counties of which I represent. At one time our chief agricultural industry on the island was the growing of hay and coarse grains for export to the cities of central Canada and to the different markets of the world. The motor car has changed all that; it has driven the horse off the streets of our cities and of every other city in the world. In a word, the motor car has supplanted the horse and has changed our transportation methods. Now we have to change too. Instead of attempting to put our hay and coarse grains on the market in their raw state, I thought the best thing for us to do was to turn them into something that man could eat or wear, but I am getting very little encouragement in my line of business, especially from hon. members on the other side of the house.

With reference to the sheep industry, let me point out to the house that the sheep is one of the most important animals on the farm. It is good for three things: first, we can produce from its carcass the finest meat that you can put on a man's table; second, its fleece can be fabricated into cloth for garments; third, as an aid to the farmer in the eradication of weeds it is second to none amongst domestic animals on the farm. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, anything that can be done by this house to increase the number of sheep in this dominion and, incidentally, the profits of those who are engaged in the raising of sheep, would be of substantial benefit to the Canadian people.

A great deal has been said about butter, and I notice that my hon. friends on the other side of the house always curl up a little bit when butter is mentioned. I do not wonder at that because they rather slipped up on this question at one time. I am surprised that they even want to put it on their bread, it was so bad to them about July 28, 1930. But with reference to the butter situation as I see it, it is quite true that we are selling our butter to-day below cost of production; but we are selling below cost of production everything else produced on the farm. And we are no worse in that regard than the farmers of every other country, so far as I know. We are told by men engaged in other walks of life that they too are sharing in the hard times. The manufacturer of the very farm machinery that has been talked about to-night tells you that he cannot make a profit; indeed, he is not merely standing still but is going behind. That is what I have been told by the dealers with whom I have talked. But to come back to the question of butter, as I pointed out a moment ago, if we cannot market our raw material in its present state—hay, coarse grains and so on—what are we to do with it? My idea is that we must turn it into food and clothing for mankind. A year or two ago we were importing from New Zealand 40,000,000 pounds of butter in one year. To-day we have had to turn our attention to the making of butter ourselves. Now, I do not know what the duty did or did not do; I am not interested in that. But the fact is that this year we have increased our own Canadian make of butter by 30,000,000 pounds. And remember, I am talking from the standpoint of the farmer. If the Candian consumer had continued this year to eat New Zealand butter what would I have done with mine? It is true it is cheap, but would it not have been cheaper still? What could I have done with my butter if the Canadian consumer had continued using New Zealand butter? Perhaps my friends on the other side will take credit for the fact that they themselves were instrumental in shutting out New Zealand butter. I give them all credit. But when we see the same thing in connection with wool as we saw in regard to butter, I think our hon. friends opposite should be fair enough to support the resolution before the house.

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I have no doubt that all that has been said with regard to the troubles of our wool producers is true. Their condition is the same as that of every other agriculturist throughout the country. They cannot make anything out of their wool at the present prices, nor can the producers of any other farm products make a profit under present conditions and at present prices. But I am surprised indeed that even one of our friends opposite should venture at this time to bring in any resolution proposing a further tariff on agricultural products after the example we have had of what has happened. Some of my colleagues on this side have fully discussed the question of butter and eggs, and we are not forgetful that last year, when dealing with the duty on corn, we were told that the price of barley was going to be so enormously increased that we could keep out corn coming from the Argentine for feed purposes, as the farmers would turn to barley as feed instead of corn.

Mr. GOTT: What duty was there on corn from the Argentine?

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Will you please sit down? You will have your chance to speak if you wish to. We know what the result has been as regards the effect of the duty on corn. The price of barley is even yet below cost of production; the imposition of a duty on corn had no effect. As my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) has said, the main trouble with the woollen industry to-day is not the need of a tariff, but the fact that rayon silk and similar fabrics are being used in place of wool products. In this resolution we are merely asked to give the patient, the farmer back on the prairie who is struggling to make ends meet, a little more of the medicine that made him sick. That is really what we are doing. In other words, it is just another move by a tariff-mad government to add a little more to the burdens of the farmers.

I am not going to deal with the question of a tariff on butter and eggs. Some of my colleagues, I must confess, have stolen most of the ammunition which I had prepared. There is, however, one question to which I will refer briefly, and that is the entirely different effect that tariffs have on the trade of the country. That has been shown quite clearly in the last year and a half since that short session of 1930 at which the tariff was raised, and my views are fully expressed in an editorial which I clipped from the Toronto Star of April 22, 1931. This is what they say with regard to the effect of a tariff:

> Since the Bennett government introduced its high tariff legislation at the special session last autumn twenty-three countries have taken retaliatory tariff action against Canada. Belgium will, it is said, be the next. If, in half a year, one-third of all the countries with which this country has been carrying on her world trade have taken retaliatory tariff action against us most of the forty other countries with which we have been doing business will probably be getting back at us before the year is out.
> There is a tendency in all countries to answer blow for blow in this tariff war.

I am opposed to any further imposition of a tariff on farm products, for this reason, that everything which the farmer produces is a drug on the market to-day, it matters not what it is, and this is due largely to tariffs, as this editorial states. We restrict the products of other countries by a high tariff and the result is that we cannot sell to those countries. I cannot support the resolution because to my mind it will have the same effect that tariffs have always had—it will increase the price of woollen clothing and other products made from wool.

Mr. GOTT: Will the hon. gentleman answer a question? He referred to the imposition of a duty on Argentine corn. What duty was applied to Argentine corn?

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): It would be under the intermediate tariff; you can get it.

Mr. GOTT: I know what it is; I am asking you to explain.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): The hon. gentleman can get the information for himself.

Mr. GOTT: Why make statements you cannot back up?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this resolution but I feel I must express my approval. It is rather hard for me to understand the opposition of agricultural members from Saskatchewan. I wonder if some of the hon. members of the opposition will not agree with me that one of the principal reasons in the drop of the price of our wool is the effect of the tariff put into force by the country to the south of us. That explains why the price of our wool went down. No hon. member, especially of the opposition, has referred to the agriculturists of Great Britain and what became of them because of the policy of free trade. I think all hon. members will be ready to acknowledge that it about wrecked the agriculturists of that country. The last elections demonstrated the results which the farmer of Great Britain had been obtaining through free trade.

I am rather surprised to hear hon. members declare that they never will endorse protection. The principle of tariffs was in force long before this government came into power. I would refer hon. members to Germany, France, Italy and those countries which put up tariffs amounting to as much as $1.80 per bushel against our wheat. I attended a meeting in my constituency and I was asked to explain why a tariff against wheat coming into Canada from the United States would be of any assistance in view of the fact that both countries were exporters of this product. I was very glad to have an opportunity of answering a question like that. If I remember rightly, in 1929 a tariff of 12 cents per bushel was in force against American wheat. For four or five months the Winnipeg market was leading by 21 cents per bushel, and I think the opposition will agree that a considerable amount of wheat was bootlegged into Canada to be sold on the Winnipeg market. There was an advantage in price even though both countries were exporters.

I feel sure that the hon. members of this house are in accord that something should be done to help the producers of wool. One hon. member has said that wheat has been a great boon to the farmer; I endorse that, but I do not know of any animal on the farm which gives a greater return than does the sheep.

In view of what has been said I have come to the conclusion that it is pretty hard to convince any man against his will, even though he may think as you do. It looks to me as though certain hon. members of the opposition feel that this policy is right, but it would be going against their will to give some benefit to the producers of sheep in western Canada.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very able and thorough presentations which have been made on this subject matter by the mover and seconder of the resolution, there is very little left to be said. It is not my intention to speak at any great length, as tariffs are not directly under my department. I must admit that I admire one characteristic of hon. gentlemen opposite, that is the ability to speak with an apparent conviction based on a logic which they cannot really accept. Speaker after speaker, not only in this but in previous sessions, has risen in his place and inferred at least, if he has not made the definite statement, that the reduction in the price of butter, eggs and some other commodities has been due to the tariff. I would like to see hon. gentlemen follow that logic one step further and apply it to the commodity with which we are dealing to-night. I believe I am safe in saying that the drop in the price of wool has been greater than that of any other agricultural commodity. The sheep industry of Canada has been practically at a standstill right from its inception. In 1871 the sheep population of Canada was in the neighbourhood of between three and four million head, and the present day population is about the same; there has been very little change or fluctuation throughout the sixty years.

The sheep ranchers and farmers of the Canadian west take second place to none. I met some of these men last summer in Lethbridge and I was very much impressed by their intelligence and the amount of care they had exercised in carrying on this industry. But in what condition do they find themselves to-day? On this side of the line the price received for wool in the grease is from 4 to 6 cents per pound, while the American farmer is receiving from 15 to 18 cents per pound for wool of a similar grade and character. Will any hon. member say that if the tariff in the United States was removed the price would remain where it is to-day? The tariff must have a bearing on the price of wool or it would not be where it is to-day.

In 1921 when the American government first put on anything like a fair tariff on wool only 49 per cent of the total wool consumption was domestic. The tariff was increased in 1930, up to which year there had been a continuous increase in the percentage of domestic wool, finally reaching 89 per cent. Figures are available only for eleven months in 1931, but they show a higher percentage of domestic wool being used in the total consumption than for any year during the last thirty years. It must be admitted that the tariff has kept up the price of wool in the United States and has also increased the percentage of domestic wool used in home consumption.

The sheep growers, who know whereof they speak, claim that they cannot continue in the industry should prices remain at their present levels. Is it worth our while to do something to keep alive this industry into which these men have put so much? Personally, I feel that it is. If they were not efficient it would be a different thing, but they are as efficient as the sheep farmers of any country in the world. I have no hesitation in stating that we should put forward every effort to keep this industry alive.

The resolution asks that a tariff be placed on raw wool. That alone would not be sufficient to protect the wool industry. I feel that any tariff that will protect the wool industry must be on the whole schedule of wool from wool in the grease, wool scoured, wool tops, yarns and so forth. I therefore appreciate this opportunity to put myself on record as being in favour of the resolution.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, for reasons which will be obvious when my voice is heard in this chamber, my remarks must of necessity be exceedingly brief, but I feel it is incumbent upon me to say a few words with respect to the subject matter of the resolution, even in the present condition of my voice.

Let me at once compliment the mover (Mr. Swanston) and the seconder (Mr. Stewart, Lethbridge) of the resolution upon the excellence of their presentation and upon the wealth of material which they have brought to bear upon their argument and discussion. Indeed, it has occurred to me that the discussion, particularly on the part of the proponents of the resolution, has been conducted throughout on a very high plane, with exceptional credit to those who have participated. I say "proponents" of the resolution, because I could not help feeling that I was on old and familiar ground in listening to the arguments of some of my hon. friends opposite. I was at pains to follow the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) who demonstrated to a reductio ad absurdum that a duty upon wool would have the effect of lowering the price to the farmer and therefore would be disastrous to the industry. Apparently his argument found favour among those who surround him. But if you please, sir, almost in the same moment an hon. gentleman who sits but a few feet from him, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), proceeded to demonstrate that the placing of a duty upon wool would have the effect of increasing the price to such an extent that it would be too expensive to use and people would have to resort to cotton. I could not help thinking that hon. gentlemen opposite, as illustrated in the two speeches to which I have referred, were absolutely consistent in their characteristic inconsistencies. But, that while this inconsistency came from two different hon. gentlemen opposite, they at least were in far better position than those gentlemen of their party whom I used to hear twenty-one years ago demonstrate upon the platform that reciprocity with the United States was going to get the farmer higher prices and the consumer cheaper commodities.

I do not propose to enter into a discussion as to the merits of the resolution, but I could not help making this brief reference to the position—I might say, to the juxtaposition—of hon. gentlemen opposite. There must be something wrong with an industry which to-day, with a population in Canada of more than 10,000,000, has only as many sheep as there were sixty years ago when our population was just one-third of what it is now. The argument presented by the proponents of this resolution impressed me very favourably. There is a time-honoured custom as to the method whereby announcements with respect to the tariff are made, and it is not incumbent upon me to make any pronouncement now as to what it is the intention of the government to do.

Mr. YOUNG: We can guess that.

Mr. RHODES: But I will say this much, that the resolution now before the house, taken not as an absolute direction but as an expression of approval of a principle, in that sense is quite acceptable to the administration.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention whtever of participating in this debate, but when I hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and the newly appointed Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) take the stand which they have taken to-night, I feel that I should say something. I should like first to congratulate the Minister of Finance on his elevation to his present position. His appointment has been pleasing to every member of the house. We note with pleasure the manner in which he discusses any question with which he chooses to deal. He has always that fine, soft smile we like to see from any person, even if he happens to be saying things he may not approve.

But the point I should like to make is this: if the imposition of a duty on wool is something which ought to be done in order to aid the industry of agriculture, and in particular the sheep growers of this country, why have the members on the government side been silent as the grave for seventeen months until the third session of this parliament? Why have these two ministers of the crown been silent during all that time respecting the matter? Is it because, as I happened to say over twelve months ago, this is a one-man government with a following so meek and submissive one would almost think a condition of hibernation had taken possession of them? I am not going to discuss the matter at length, but I should like to say this: I have not heard all the discussion to-day, but I have heard hon.

gentlemen opposite time and time again discuss this question of protection and the principle of protection. I believe the words of Thomas Carlyle are as true to-day as the day they were uttered when he said:

> During these many years I have heard no argument for it excepting such as might make the angels and even the very jackasses weep.

Mr. J. B. SWANSTON (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, in closing the debate I must thank hon. members who have given such support to the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would inform the house that if any hon. member wishes to speak he should do so before the hon. member speaks; otherwise he will close the debate.

Mr. SWANSTON: This subject is very important to the wool growers of this country, especially to those of western Canada because of the long distance that separates them from the market where they can sell their wool. I appreciate the stand taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) and also by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). I hope the government will see fit to give this situation their early and favourable consideration.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Swanston) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. BENNETT: I was paired with the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). Had I voted I would have voted for the resolution. May I add that in view of the pairing which took place this afternoon an adjustment was made of the pair of the right hon. leader of the opposition, so that the opposition was not deprived of that vote.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Tuesday, February 23, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I intend to move the motion which stood in my name yesterday with reference to the select standing committee on railways and shipping, substituting the name of Mr. Munn for that of Mr. Hanbury. This suggestion has come from the other side, and I therefore move as follows:

That standing order 63 of the House of Commons relating to the appointment of the select standing committees of the house, be amended by adding to the select standing committees of the house for the present session a select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, to which will be referred the accounts and the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the present session, for consideration and report to the house.

Provided however, that nothing in this resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of supply and that the said committee consist of Messrs. Beaubien, Bell (St. Antoine), Bothwell, Cantley, Chaplin, Duff, Euler, Fiset (Sir Eugène), Fraser (Cariboo), Geary, Gobeil, Gray, Munn, Hanson (York-Sunbury), Heaps, Kennedy (Peace River), McGibbon, MacMillan (Saskatoon), Manion, Power, Rogers and Stewart (Lethbridge).

Motion as amended agreed to.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED DEDUCTION OF TEN PER CENT IN INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to state that owing to the indisposition of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), he will be unable to move the motion standing in his name and I should like to have it stand.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would inquire of my right hon. friend if I am correct in understanding that before this resolution can be proceeded with in committee of the whole at least one day's notice will have to be given to the effect that on such and such a day the motion will be considered and that the resolution has received the approval of His Excellency.

Mr. BENNETT: I understood that the resolution had been brought forward by the Minister of Finance in terms to conform with the rules of the house. I was not present when the resolution was placed on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As to that His Honour can advise the house. My understanding is that the resolution is in the correct form, but before it can be proceeded with at least one day's notice must be given.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion will be that the house at its next sitting resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider this resolution.

Mr. BENNETT (for the Minister of Finance) moved: that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize deductions of ten per cent from the amounts of certain salaries or other compensations or indemnities payable by the government of Canada during the fiscal year 1932-33.

And to provide for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of all current contributions payable under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act in respect of the salaries payable during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933, of all employees who receive not more than one thousand two hundred dollars per annum.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) advise if he has received the report of Sir Alexander Gibb in regard to the harbours of Canada.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Not yet.

RECORDING OF PAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) will permit me to speak, I would direct the attention of the house to a statement made last evening just before adjournment by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as follows:

> May I add that in view of the pairing which took place this afternoon an adjustment was made of the pair of the right hon. leader of the opposition, so that the opposition was not deprived of that vote.

It has always been the practice of the house that any vote once it is cast cannot be changed nor can any record of the house be altered. Hon. members will recall that several years ago the then member for Nelson, Mr. Bird, inadvertently voted the wrong way; he forgot his pair and there was the utmost condemnation of his action. Mr. Bird rose in his place and attempted to rectify the mistake but it was then ruled that it would be impossible for him to change his vote once it was cast. I should like to ask the Prime Minister how he was able to rectify the mistake which he claims was made yesterday afternoon.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not say that a mistake had been made yesterday afternoon. I noticed that the language in which the arrangement for pairs was made did not cover a private member's motion, but in view of the fact that I observed after the voting that pairs were being announced, I at once made the statement to the house. I spoke to the chief whip on this side, but not to ask that my vote should be changed, it having been recorded, nor was any effort made to change it. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look at Hansard he will find that my vote is there; no change was made. He is deliberately, or otherwise, making a statement, presumably—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: —for reasons entirely beyond the understanding of any hon. member, on this side of the house at least. It will be found that in the adjustment of pairs, a matter of which the house takes no notice, it was provided that the vote of the right hon. gentleman should be paired against one of the hon. members on his side, so that the opposition was not deprived of its vote in consequence of the pairs having been respected as they were. The language of the document covering pairs did not cover private members' resolutions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: No change has been made in the vote as recorded and the hon. member has no reason to pursue the matter further.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not charge that the vote of the Prime Minister had been changed.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member did; he asked how it was done.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege; I did not charge that the right hon. member's vote had been changed. I have Hansard before me and I know it has not been changed. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not he altered the records of the house with regard to the statements made concerning pairs.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose it is the duty of anyone who happens to be in my position to answer a question of that kind; however, I can say that there were no records to alter and none were altered. The arrangement of the pairs is a matter of which this house takes no notice, it is a matter between the whips, and that arrangement was made in order that there should be no misapprehension. It was a private member's motion and having seen a large number of pairs respected I desired immediately that the right hon. gentleman's vote should count as being paired with one of our members. I had no desire in any sense to change the record. The whips arrange the pairs according to the practice in this house.

Mr. YOUNG: How could they do that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the pairs—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —are recorded on page 384 of Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has stated his case. The record is clear and if he will read Hansard he will see that nothing irregular has been done. There is no necessity for further discussion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I would call your attention—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —to the fact that on page 384 of Hansard there is a record of the pairs. I ask whether that record was furnished before or after the Prime Minister asked that it be altered.

Mr. SPEAKER: Neither the Prime Minister nor anyone else is under any obligation to answer the question; and I would ask the hon. member to keep order.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I do not wish to add to the discussion, but I notice as reported on page 384 of Hansard I am paired with the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Smith). I have no doubts as to the estimable character of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, but I have never had a pair with him. I understand, however, from what the Prime Minister says, this was an arrangement made to offset the pair that I have with my right hon. friend. To avoid the possibility of mistake, may I just ask my right hon. friend if he does not understand by the pair which we have that it extends to any motion on which the house divides obviously on party lines, whether that motion is introduced by a private member or not?

Mr. BENNETT: That was the difficulty, and I took the trouble to read to the house the language of the document under which my pair with the right hon. gentleman was arranged. This is what I said on that occasion:

> My agreement with the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was that we were paired on the following conditions: Our pairs to be in force on all matters introduced by the government or for which the government assumes responsibility—

That is, any affirmative measures taken by the government for which it assumes responsibility.

> —also in connection with all matters introduced by the official opposition or by any member on its behalf, and to apply also when the Speaker is in the chair as well as in committee of the whole house on such matters. My understanding is that that arrangement does not apply to pairs of this kind, but if my interpretation is not correct I ought not to have voted. I should like to discuss the matter with the right hon. gentleman and ascertain if it is not his view that our agreement does not apply to pairs of this kind, this being a vote on a motion introduced by a private member. Whatever rule may prevail I desire to observe. I mention that so that there may be no misunderstanding.

It will be observed that those were the conditions under which the pairs were arranged at the beginning of the session and they were in the form of a written instrument signed by the right hon. gentleman as well as by myself. There is no provision for a case such as that which arose yesterday which was on a motion by a private member and not by a member of his party. It did not occur to me that there was any doubt about the matter until I noticed some hon. gentleman opposite had observed pairs. When I asked the chief whip about the matter, he told me that pairs had been observed by the hon. gentlemen and I immediately made the statement to the house. Certainly what transpired yesterday does not come within the language of the document which we signed; but if it is desired that it should, I am only too willing to assent.

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): In view of what occurred with respect to the vote of yesterday, I might say that I was paired with the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) and I respected that pair; otherwise I would certainly have voted to allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) an opportunity to introduce his bill, and further, had I had an opportunity, I would have voted for the bill.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. WALBURG-LOON LAKE-BONNYVILLE-ASHMONT LOOP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways a question in regard to the St. Walburg - Loon Lake - Bonnyville - Ashmont branch of the Canadian National Railways, north of the North Saskatchewan river and linking North Battleford and Edmonton. I understand twenty-five miles of that road towards Edmonton is graded and ready for steeling and forty-four miles south of the Beaver river towards North Battleford graded and ready for steeling. Has the Minister of Railways, considering all phases of the problem, looked into the question of steeling on those sixty-nine miles in order to supply railway facilities to the people along that line and also as an aid to the solution of the unemployment problem in North Battleford?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I hope the hon. member means "steeling" with two e's.

Mr. McINTOSH: I would not accuse the minister of the other.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman informed me yesterday he was going to ask this question. I am told by the railway management they have not made any recommendation towards the continuation of that work at the present time any more than they have towards the continuation of any of the branch line work on other branches throughout the country because of the very serious financial situation of the railways and because of the continuous decrease in the earnings of the railways even as compared with last year. It is in exactly the same position as other branch lines throughout the country, and so far as we know at the present time no further work is likely to be done on it. There is quite a wide space, I think thirty-six miles, on which nothing has been done yet.

BULWARK-AIRWAYS BRANCH LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways if the same answer will be given to the proposed branch line from Bulwark, Alberta, to a point called Airways, where a grade has been made?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I do not just know about the line to which the hon. member refers, but I shall look into the matter.

MAFEKING CUT-OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Before the Minister of Railways considers completing the line referred to by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), will he consider the Mafeking cut-off?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I do not think anybody else need consider the Mafeking cut-off when my hon. friend is giving so much attention to it.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if any provision has been made for the employees of the photographic branch of the Air Service who were dismissed last Saturday?

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): I cannot give a definite answer at the moment to that question.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he contemplates bringing down any amendments this session to the Canada Grain Act?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Subject to any unforeseen matters that may arise during the session, no.

SHELBURNE INDIAN DOCTOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I want to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to question No. 24 which was answered yesterday, and to point out to him, if he will permit me at this stage, that the answer to question No. 6 is not responsive to the question. The question reads:

On whose recommendations did the Department of Indian Affairs make the change?

The answer reads:

On instructions issued by the Superintendent General.

That is not what was asked. Will my hon. friend take the matter up with his departmental officials and supply me with an answer to the question?

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) I beg to move that you do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I want at this stage to take up the question of unemployment in Canada and before I conclude I intend to move the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

That whereas the present Prime Minister of Canada in appealing for support in the election of 1930 made the following definite promises to the electors, in regard to unemployment:

At Victoria, B.C.—"You have my promise that if the Conservative party is returned to power that as soon after July 28 as possible parliament will be called together to deal with the problem of unemployment by providing, not doles, but work." "Is there any excuse for Canada to have hard times if the government is discharging its duties as it should."

At Calgary, Alta.—"I propose that parliament shall formulate a definite plan for permanent relief, and that parliament shall deal with this national problem and provide amelioration for the conditions in order that next winter the Canadian people may not be facing the crisis that is upon us without having a remedy at hand." "I am convinced this unemployment has now ceased to be local and provincial and has become national in its importance."

At Edmonton, Alta.—"I spoke of unemployment last night at Calgary," the Conservative chieftain declared. "We must face it absolutely at once." . . . "I accept the challenge and I say again that I will call parliament together, at the earliest possible moment to provide at once the remedy—employment for all who can and will work."

At Moncton, N.B.—"The Conservative party is going to find work for all who are willing to work, or perish in the attempt. It is going to call parliament at the earliest possible date, after July 28 and take such steps as will end this tragic condition of unemployment and bring prosperity to the country as a whole."

At Moncton, N.B.—"I promise to end unemployment."

At Sarnia, Ontario: "Someone is responsible for unemployment; not individuals, but governments. Governments by their majorities in parliament are responsible for enacting all legislation."

At Quebec, Quebec: "There was no necessity for a conference on unemployment," he continued. "The solution was too apparent. What you want is work," he exclaimed, "not conferences, and you are going to get work.

"Unless his promises to the people of Canada were kept if elected to office," Mr. Bennett said, "he wanted Quebec and other members of his party to vote him out of office;"

That whereas notwithstanding the government demanded and received from parliament unlimited authority to use the resources of the treasury of Canada to such an extent as the government deemed expedient for the purpose of relief of unemployment, the measures taken by the government to eliminate unemployment have proven wholly inadequate and ineffective;

That the measures adopted by the government have involved an expenditure of public moneys out of all proportion to the employment provided;

That owing to lack of proper supervision and organization there has been partizan administration of the moneys provided by parliament for the benefit of those who were the most in need of work;

That notwithstanding the promise that these problems would be dealt with on a national basis, the government has shirked responsibility in that respect, by making a large part of the assistance provided to relieve unemployment, conditional upon contribution by provinces and municipalities, and has thus rendered abortive the relief which was solemnly promised to be granted on the basis of a national obligation;

That the giving of these solemn assurances, the using of them to secure support at elections and their violation after the attainment of office reveal a flagrant disregard of political honour and tend to lower the standard of public life;

That the failure of the government to implement its pledges and promises has caused privation, want and suffering amongst thousands of Canadian citizens;

That in the opinion of this house the provision of employment for our people is the most pressing problem before the present government, and immediate measures effectively to relieve the serious unemployment situation should be presented to parliament by the government without further delay.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that there are two features to my motion. The first part is a condemnation of the government for failing to fulfil its pledges to the electors. The second part calls upon the government to bring in immediately measures that will effectively deal with the situation. I want to offer my sympathy to the government at this time because any man or any party of men that undertakes to do a job with which they are not familiar and fails to accomplish it really needs sympathy. I know that my hon. friends on the other side are all recently converted to the idea of doing something for the workingman, but I once heard a prominent statesman, in fact, it was the present Prime Minister, say: Never trust a convert to do anything he is not used to doing, because he will always make a mess of it. On the other hand, there is sufficient of the milk of human kindness in my make up and I want to throw out a life line to save anyone who is sinking. To my mind the present government resembles a disabled ship at sea, tossed about on a wild ocean, drifting about aimlessly, but with the crew hoping that some chance wave will wash them safely ashore. If it were not for the fact that there are some few poor souls aboard that ship one might deem it a derelict. A derelict, as hon. members know, is a ship half sunk, without a soul on board; it is a menace to all other ships which are making progress. Unfortunately in the present case there are a few souls aboard this old ship, and I wish to throw out a life line to them. I wish them to heed the pleadings of their leader who said at Quebec during the election: If I do not carry out my promises to the electors, then I ask all the members from the province of Quebec and other members sitting behind me to vote me out of office.

Mr. ERNST: The trouble with the hon. gentleman is that he had to walk the gang plank.

Mr. HEENAN: The captain of the Conservative party, the present Prime Minister, is a gallant captain. He hesitates to leave the ship, and he stands on deck and says: Save yourselves, my boys; I will go down with the ship; it is quite evident, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen opposite will not reach out to grasp any life line that may be thrown to them. I am very much concerned with respect to some of my hon. friends opposite. I would like to save them if I could, and in proposing this motion I am giving them an opportunity to do the very thing which their own captain asked them to do when he pledged himself before the electors of Canada that if he failed to redeem his pledges he would ask his followers to vote him out of office. Here is one opportunity for my hon. friends opposite to carry out one of the government's pledges to the electors, by voting it out of office, for we all remember that the government said that it would end unemployment or perish in the attempt. There is no member, I am sure, supporting the government who will dare to stand up in his place and say, at least he cannot truthfully say, that unemployment in this country has been ended. On the contrary, the government's own reports indicate that unemployment is on the increase. There is no question in anyone's mind with respect to that because the government's very latest report states the fact plainly. Indeed, there is evidence of many other kinds to show that unemployment is on the increase, and those evidences are manifest to anyone who is observant. Railroad earnings used to be taken as a fair barometer of the condition of trade and employment within the country. Look at railroad earnings to-day, or at the number of cars loaded and the tons of freight moved, and you will find that the business of the railroads has decreased practically to the point where, so far as railroad men are concerned, they do not know but what they will be out of a job at the end of every trip. When the railroad companies were presenting their views to the Board of Conciliation and Investigation which inquired into the recent decrease in wages they stated in a public document that they had hoped for some improvement in economic conditions but that now they were without hope, and in order to carry on they claimed that they must have a reduction in the wages of their employees. So the railroads, whose business used to be taken as a fair barometer of trade conditions generally throughout the country, have confessed publicly that their hopes for improvement have not materialized to any great extent, that they are hopeless of any improvement, and accordingly they have decreased the wages of railroad men in this country. I was at a meeting of railroad men not so very long ago, and I heard one gentleman say that at his particular terminal they used to have nine freight crews. To-day they have not one freight crew in the whole terminal, and the freight and way freight package business is being done by a mixed train. In my home town of Kenora there are engineers old in seniority who to-day are back working as firemen. To-day many old conductors are working as brakemen, and some men who have had many years seniority are entirely out of work, because they are not able to hold a position. Practically in every railway terminal in Canada shop men, maintenance of way men, car repairers and all sorts of railroad men are not being used. There is no question that conditions are becoming worse instead of better.

The relief measures adopted by this government have proved wholly inadequate. I recognize that in my part of the country men have been given work on the highways, and many are working for 30 cents an hour. As I pointed out time and again completion of the highway under construction was promised by the Ontario government to take place in 1926 or 1927. It would seem that at last some work is being done on that highway and I am glad. While I am speaking of inadequate measures, I should like to point out to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) that the residents in northern Ontario are being discriminated against. From the road work the people resident in those communities are receiving only two weeks' work out of each month while, on the other hand, those labourers sent into the district are working full time. I should like the minister to review that condition and see that the residents in those localities get a fair share of the work provided under employment relief measures.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask a question?

Mr. HEENAN: Certainly.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does not my hon. friend admit that the expenditures made on the highway practically all remain in that community, the roads are all left there, and at least half or more of the work goes to the people in that part of the country.

Mr. HEENAN: I am afraid my hon. friend will have to get his wind up; I cannot hear him.

Mr. McGIBBON: Very well, I shall repeat my question. Will the hon. member not admit, first, that the product of the work is all left in northern Ontario, secondly, that the money is largely left there, and, thirdly, that a great part of the work is given to men in his locality?

Mr. HEENAN: I am not talking about that at all; I am talking about the residents in my hon. friend's district as well as those in mine and in every other part of northern Ontario who are not getting a square deal.

Mr. McGIBBON: I will look after my own.

Mr. HEENAN: They are not getting a square deal. They get only two weeks' work every month while on the other hand those men sent into the district are working full time. Only 30 cents an hour is being paid, and 40 cents should be paid.

Mr. COTNAM: Go out and tell the farmers that.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not say 50 cents?

Mr. HEENAN: If I said 50 cents my hon. friend would leave the chamber, because he never heard of anybody getting 50 cents an hour in his part of the country. The Ontario government has made a contract to provide food and provisions for the camps. Generally speaking, these contractors are bringing in their meats and other foods from the large centres, they are not purchasing hogs and beef from the settlers in that district, as was originally intended. When unemployment relief measures were brought forward by this government they promised that such measures would be directed towards helping people in communities requiring relief. In that promise, therefore, they have fallen short.

While I am speaking about wages I should like to point out to the government, and particularly to the Minister of Labour, that with respect to unemployment relief we have now a new principle announced in our fair wages policy. Throughout the world, so far as my knowledge goes and in every instance with which I am familiar, the fair wages measure has been considered as providing for a minimum wage. In fact, after attention was drawn to the matter by hon. members on this side of the house, the present government, in its regulations of 1930, establish a minimum or prevailing rate of wages. But what do we find in the new agreements? They provide for a maximum, not a minimum wage. For the information of hon. members I think it would be worth while to make a comparison of the two regulations. In 1930 the regulation was as follows:

All agreements made with provincial or municipal authorities involving the expenditure of any portion of the moneys appropriated by the act for public works or undertakings shall contain provisions for the payment of fair wages and hours of work in accordance with the intent of the Fair Wages and Eight-Hour Day Act, 1930, and the fair wages policy of the government of Canada as set forth in order in council P.C. 1206 dated 7th June, 1922, and amendments thereto.

That is the prevailing rate of wages and the principle which has been announced and adopted by parliament on many occasions. At the present time however there is an agreement providing for a maximum rate of wages, and providing that the provinces and the municipalities cannot pay more than the federal government is paying for work of a similar type. That represents a complete turn over. Whether or not it was done to fool the people, I do not know, but in order to have it on record I think I had better read it.

Fair and reasonable rates of wages shall be paid by the province and municipalities, but such rates shall not be in excess of the rates required to be paid by the federal government for the character or class of work in the district.

As I have said, this clause represents a complete turn over of principle as proclaimed in fair wages or minimum rates of wages regulations in any part of the world. Whether or not deception was intended, I do not know. There is one class of people however which is not deceived, and that is the working people of Canada. I should be pleased if the Minister of Labour would make an investigation so that proper adjustments may be made in rates of pay, and so that the working men of northern Ontario—because they are the men for whom I am speaking particularly—may receive rates of wages provided by this parliament and by the laws of Canada.

A few days ago I asked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) a question as to the wages paid to labourers on federal public works in the constituency of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). The minister very kindly sent me the information, and I find that in his constituency labourers are paid 40 cents per hour on federal public works. I say to my hon. friend that so far as I am concerned I consider the workmen in my part of the country, in fact the workmen all through northern Ontario, just as good men and as much entitled to 40 cents per hour as the workmen in his constituency. Again I would ask him to see that the workmen of northern Ontario be given a square deal in that regard.

When we complain of these matters on the public platform or in the press, what do we find? We had the spectacle yesterday of the representatives in this house of the labour men of Canada being denied an opportunity to speak. When the local member for Kenora and I complained of these things we aroused the ire of the Minister of Lands and Forests of Ontario to such a degree that at a board of trade banquet at Kenora he threatened the local authorities that he would spend the money appropriated for that district in another part of the country where it would be more appreciated if they did not officially repudiate what their elected representatives had said. Talk about intimidation! Could a Minister of Lands and Forests go into a constituency in any other part of the world and threaten the board of trade and the town council in that manner?

Mr. MANION: Can the hon. member quote anything to prove that statement, instead of just making it?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, I will prove it.

Mr. MANION: Well, go ahead and do so.

Mr. HEENAN: I will prove it by no less an authority than the newspaper owned and edited by the defeated Conservative candidate at the last provincial election. It is all on the front page, but maybe the heading will be sufficient.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it all.

Mr. HEENAN: This is the heading:

There is lots of work to be done here, if we all work together. Will otherwise spend money where it is appreciated.

That will be found on the front page of the Miners' News of July 15, 1931.

An hon. MEMBER: What does the writer say? Never mind the headlines.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: My hon. friend over there does not seem to grab hold of the life line yet.

An hon. MEMBER: Not from you.

Mr. HEENAN: I admire his spunk—stick to the ship until the last.

An hon. MEMBER: Your faith is not very great.

Mr. HEENAN: My faith in this government, to use a witticism, was dead long before it ever became a government. I have criticized working conditions in the road camps. True, those conditions have been improved since my criticism. I notice in the speech of the Minister of Lands and Forests to which I have just referred that he stated he intended to pay 50 cents a day in northern Ontario but because of some of us he had to pay a higher rate, so I am not ashamed of the position that I have taken in the matter.

[Mr. Heenan.]

I can prove every statement that I have previously made or make now with respect to working conditions in northern Ontario. However, I am glad to see that the great highway is in course of construction—the highway that we have been promised by our Conservative friends at every provincial and federal election since 1921. But instead of building one mile here, three miles there, half a mile somewhere else, just so many detached pieces of road, the work should have been proceeded with in a systematic manner. Goodness knows if any of these detached pieces of road will ever be connected together.

This government undertook to deal with unemployment as a national obligation. But in their very first bill they adopted a different principle entirely; they declared that unemployment is "primarily a provincial and municipal responsibility." In their last measure for unemployment and farm relief, the provinces and municipalities were required to share the larger portion of the burden.

I have not yet consulted the rules to see whether or not I am entitled to reply, but the motion speaks for itself.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not entitled to reply. He is not limited now as to time; he can go on as long as he pleases.

Mr. HEENAN: This government has reversed everything since it took office. Instead of giving work to the unemployed in the spring, summer and fall, they left them to sleep in the parks and to beg for a living or go hungry, and then they commenced their various relief undertakings in the winter time when the work could not be done in comfort by the men and with profit to the country. Then they have denied the workmen fair wages; they have instituted a maximum instead of a minimum rate of wages; they have given the residents in some parts, particularly those in northern Ontario, work on a half time basis, while newcomers are being given work on full time. Instead of dealing with the question of unemployment on a national basis, they have granted federal relief conditional on contributions being made by the provinces and the municipalities, and these contributions represent by far the greater portion of the burden. In short, while they pretend to give the provinces and the municipalities assistance with one hand, they are withholding it with the other; that is, they are withholding necessary public works that could have been undertaken at a fair rate of wages. They promised the electors that if they were returned to power they would treat old age pensions as a federal obligation. The cost of this to the treasury was estimated at one time to be $24,000,000 annually. Up to the present time the government have paid about $8,000,000 this year. Therefore they have been robbing the provinces of $16,000,000 annually. Here is another case where they are contributing with one hand and withholding with the other.

The government passed an act known as the Technical Education Act amid a great blowing of trumpets and beating of drums, but they failed to pay to the provinces the money authorized by this legislation. Is it any wonder that the ship is sinking? Now, when it is sinking, the government, not knowing where to turn and having failed to reach the port for which they set out, have turned to the civil service of this country, making them contribute in order to help them out of their dilemma. Last year they say they contributed $20,000,000 to the provinces, and in the estimates which have been presented this year there is a saving of about $43,000,000. The public service of Canada is suffering, and these civil servants who depend on their salaries for a living have to pay in order to make up the deficit caused by the mismanagement and bungling of this government.

So in moving this amendment I should like to point out that it is not only a condemnation of the government for its failure to live up to its promises; it is also a request for immediate measures adequately to provide for the employment of workmen in this country. We do not want the government to dilly-dally, as they have been doing, wait week after week and then at the last moment before prorogation bring down a bill asking for a blank cheque with nothing to prevent that money being sent out again and used in a partisan way.

In conclusion I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I hope every hon. member from Quebec on the opposite side of the house will heed the pleadings of their captain, take hold of the life line and vote the government out of office. Then they can go back to their constituents and say, "At least we carried out one promise to the electors of this country." Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), the amendment I read at the beginning of my remarks.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow this occasion to pass without making some observations with respect to the address just given by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan). I do not forget the time immediately prior to the election of 1930, when I think almost every thoughtful man in this country recognized the fact that things were not as prosperous as they had been in previous years, and while it is not my desire or my habit to go into the past in order either to build up a defence or make an attack upon my opponents, yet in the light of what has been said I think it would not be out of place to say a word or two with respect to the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in the early part of 1930.

In the first place, the government became accustomed to the prosperity with which the world was visited during the years prior to 1930, and it was difficult if not impossible for them to realize then that a change had taken place and that this country was entering upon a period of decreasing business and lessened prosperity. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) then Prime Minister, in dealing with the subject would not go further than to say that there was an alleged condition of unemployment. But I remember quite well when the right hon. gentleman made his pilgrimage across western Canada. Each successive hundred miles seemed to impress him more and more with the seriousness of the condition before this government took office, until by the time he reached the Rocky mountains the right hon. gentleman was indeed convinced that we were in the midst of a depression.

What was the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite at that time? They did not recognize the condition, or were unwilling to admit it. As I remember the debates in this house, from reading them in the press and subsequently in Hansard, the substance of the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite was that no one in Canada could expect a helping hand from the federal government unless their political views conformed to the views held by the administration of that day. That was the declaration made at that time.

There were a number of factors which contributed to the condition obtaining at that period. Some of those factors were entirely out of the control of any government or any individual, or of industry or agriculture. Some of them, on the other hand, were capable of being controlled and disciplined by governments, and I will ask hon. members to pardon me if I dwell once more on one subject with which I was very familiar at that time. I refer to the subject of immigration. I am not unmindful of the fact that this country has two great railroad systems, with three transcontinental lines, two of them conceived about 1908. To-day I think there is no thoughtful man who will not admit that we are over-railroaded. So let us bear this in mind, that by reason of our projection of railroads across this country, whether we like it or not, we must get over to the positive side of immigration, because we must have more people if we hope to pay off the debt with which ten million people are loaded at present by reason of the railroad problem on our hands. That may not be a pleasant thought to those of us who entertain a more modest and homely idea of our country, that is, that a nation is only a collection of happy, prosperous, christian homes, and that its strength may be measured by the number of such homes within its boundaries. It is not a happy thought for those of us who entertain that conception of our country, but whether we like it or not, if we are going to pay off that huge debt we must get over to the positive side of immigration as soon as we can. That opens up a serious problem as to where we are to get people who will be acceptable to this country and who will be easily assimilated into our national life.

What was the situation during the months just prior to this government coming into office? I think I am stating what was in the mind of every man who travelled within Canada when I say that the late government, not recognizing the condition that was becoming all too apparent, did not take any steps to curb the undisciplined flow of immigrants into Canada, which had been carried on for three or four years prior to 1930. I want hon. members of the house to remember this: During the sixteen months ended July 31, 1930, 221,561 people were brought into Canada, 99,367 of whom were adult males. This factor contributed largely to the unemployment problem which is facing this country today because if the figures are analysed it will be found that a large number of these people did not go into the open spaces of the country and engage in agriculture, where they could at least support themselves, but drifted into industry in the cities. There is abundant evidence of this fact in all the large cities in the country. It has been found that thousands and thousands of men and women have been here only a short time, many of them having entered the country immediately prior to the coming into power of this government. We are taking care of these people; they are not starving, no matter what anyone may say to the contrary. Immediately after this government came into power it took into consideration this one factor which was contributing to our difficulties. This problem was tackled in a determined and vigorous way. A vast system had grown up through the years to induce people to come to Canada; connections had been made all over the world, particularly on the continent of Europe. The transportation companies were fully organized to bring people to this country and other associations were acting towards the same end. It was not an easy thing to curb this flow of people without creating some hardship and injustice, but this government did it, although in doing so it was subjected to a good deal of criticism.

The transportation companies did not like it at first, but since November, 1930—for the first time, as far as I have been able to determine from the officials of the department and from those who have engaged in bringing migrants to Canada—the transportation companies, both on the ocean and within Canada, have been working in harmony with the department in an effort to colonize at home and to clear up the mess which was left to this government by those who preceded us. The result has been that some 44,000 souls have been taken from the industrial centres and placed upon the land. This has not been accomplished by a state-aided system of colonization but by using the organizations of the two great railway systems and our own department. That large number of people are off the unemployment lists, largely through the efforts of the present government. I contend that that is not a mean contribution towards relieving the situation which confronts us, and it has been made without expense to the country.

The depression was easily capable of being identified in the spring of 1930, but as time went on it became something more than a local depression. While the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) may be twitted from time to time, as he has been in the past, for the speeches which he made during the elections, I say—of course hon. gentlemen may laugh and will probably sneer at my statement—that any normal depression would have been cured by the measures adopted by this government. However, no one could possibly have foreseen the world depression with which we are confronted. On top of that we were faced with the disaster which overtook parts of the western provinces, mainly in Saskatchewan. This government had to and was glad to go to the rescue of the people in western Canada. It was a great burden to bear, but that burden will be discharged by the government.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) has said that the government has done nothing to assist people to carry on through this period. Just as soon as it was possible to do so, this house was convened. A measure was passed permitting the government to use the sum of $20,000,000 to take such steps, in conjunction with the municipalities and the provinces, as were deemed desirable and necessary to relieve unemployment and to assist the destitute and needy people of this country. That measure resulted in a total expenditure of $70,472,832—the federal government's share being $17,372,848—on various useful works and the employment of the requisite number of men.

I feel convinced that if we can divorce ourselves from political partisanship, and I hope we can at a time like this—probably the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) can do this if he tries—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When that does happen, it will be very much appreciated.

Mr. GORDON: As time went on it was apparent that further measures would have to be adopted in order that those in want might be given such employment as would tide them over, and the result was the legislation of last session. Under that legislation, 334,301 persons have been given employment up to January 31, 1932, the total number of man-days being 7,415,973. The total commitments necessary to carry on the work to February 22, 1932, amounted to $76,426,387, the federal government's share being $32,822,847. This work is still proceeding. The figures I have given will be subject to some slight variation when the report is tabled, which I trust will be shortly.

Reference has been made by the hon. member for Kenora to the matter of the wage scale, and it has been suggested that this government has not adopted a course best calculated to preserve to the labouring man the standard of living and wage scale which had heretofore obtained. I would point out to the hon. member that he is losing sight of the fact that there is a vast difference between relief and wages. I am sure that this government will never adopt an attitude likely to destroy that which the labouring man has sought to build up through all the years, namely, a fair and honest wage and a decent standard of living. I think I can speak for labour just as competently as can the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, because I have been associated with labouring men all my life. In fact it was labouring men who sent me here and I expect they will send me here again. I know them; I am acquainted with their difficulties. For over a quarter of a century I have lived my business life right in the country of which the hon. member speaks, and I certainly do not propose to allow the statements made by the hon. member to pass unchallenged. I believe I was in that country actively engaged in various business avocations before the hon. member was, and I do not think I am boasting when I say that for many years I took an interest, as actively as my capacity would permit, in every public movement throughout northern Ontario, and not from a political standpoint. Anyone who lives in that part of the country knows that I had no thought of entering into politics.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding about the situation with respect to relief in northern Ontario, I should like first to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of October 26, 1931. He is said to have made this statement:

> "Never have I heard of nor seen such a gigantic political machine as the Conservatives have built up in northern Ontario," emphatically declared Hon. Peter Heenan, M.P., former minister of labour, addressing an enthusiastic political rally under the auspices of the Elmdale Ward Liberal Association in the Knights of Columbus Hall, Spadina Avenue, Saturday evening. "Patronage has run rampant there and actually free speech is being prevented on political questions."

I do not think it is possible that the hon. member ever had his capacity for speech curtailed. He continued:

> "Men and women are being discriminated against, intimidated and persecuted for their political beliefs; and that all under the British flag," Mr. Heenan averred.

The hon. member quoted from the Kenora Miner and Nation. Let me quote from the same journal in its issue of October 21, 1931, from an editorial referring to the criticisms of the hon. member with respect to the work in that locality. The journal from which the hon. member quoted and from a subsequent issue of which I am now quoting, makes this statement:

> No more unfair or untrue statement has ever been issued by a public man than that given out by the Hon. Peter Heenan to the Fort William Times-Journal, October 13th. It could only be conceived by a mind filled by jealousy at the success of the measures taken by the provincial and Dominion governments to relieve unemployment in this district.

Mr. HEENAN: Who is the editor of that paper?

Mr. GORDON: It is the same journal as that from which my hon. friend read.

Mr. HEENAN: He is the defeated candidate.

Mr. GORDON: These statements that were made by the hon. member on what I am told was his only visit to northern Ontario since the election—

Mr. HEENAN: That is not true.

Mr. GORDON: —of course came under the review of the responsible minister at Toronto who has this work in hand, and at the risk of tiring hon. members I should like to ask their indulgence while I read the minister's statement as reported in the Toronto Telegram of October 30, 1931. This statement was published widely and copied in the press, not only throughout Ontario but throughout other provinces. It is headed:

Northern Development Work at Kenora

Some statements recently appeared in the Canadian press from Hon. Peter Heenan claiming that the relief work being carried out by the Northern Development Department at Kenora is being conducted in a partisan way. Mr. Heenan is in the habit of making extravagant and reckless statements, and in this case he may have some excuse because he has only been in his constituency a few hours on one occasion in the last fifteen months. Anyone who is familiar with the situation knows that the statements are entirely false.

Last year Mr. Heenan and Mr. Hutchison, the Ontario member, made some similar charges, and, for the purpose of answering them and clearing up the situation, the Hon. Mr. Finlayson, Minister in charge of the Department of Northern Development, went to Kenora at the beginning of this season's work and a public meeting was called in the town hall at which the mayor, the members of the board of trade, and a large gathering of citizens were present. Mr. Heenan did not attend the meeting but Mr. Hutchison did.

Mr. Finlayson fully explained the working of the system there and the local people were entirely satisfied. Mr. Hutchison sat through the meeting but did not make a single complaint or attempt to answer the minister. The citizens generally expressed their entire satisfaction.

The district of Kenora is the only district in northern Ontario where there is a member opposed to the Ontario government, and, notwithstanding that fact, last winter Kenora had more of Northern Development money spent in it than any other district, and the highest rate of wages in northern Ontario was paid in Kenora. This season, 1931, the rate of wages was made uniform throughout all northern Ontario, and Kenora is one of the districts in which the largest expenditure has been made.

On account of the large amount being spent on the construction of the trans-Canada highway in the Kenora district, we were able to take care of practically everyone in the district and also to send in a large number of men from southern Ontario for work on the trans-Canada road in that district. The department have felt that this is a national work and the present situation calls for sympathetic treatment without regard to nationality, politics, or creed. In Mr. Heenan's constituency on the 24th of October, this department were employing 5,013 men on road work. As the total population of his constituency is given as 26,315, it will be seen that the employment is on a very generous scale. By far the greater number of these men are being paid half by the Dominion government. This is in marked contrast to the conditions that existed when Mr. Heenan was Minister of Labour and the Dominion government were not making any contribution of this kind.

As to the selection of labour, this is done through the municipilities and is under the charge of the district engineers who are professional officers on the permanent civil service list and have had a great deal of experience and success in this work.

The department wish to assure the public that this work is not being conducted in a partisan way and is entirely above and beyond politics. Perhaps the best answer to Mr. Heenan is to quote three messages from responsible bodies in his own district who know far more about the circumstances than he does.

This is from the town council of the town of Kenora:

"The members of the Kenora council can truthfully say that as far as is humanly possible all detail in relief administration in the town is being carried out without regard to the applicants' nationality, creed or politics, and peace and harmony prevail among the workers, of whom fully ninety-five per cent are at work. We realize Engineer Lyons has a gigantic undertaking in the administrating of the work in our district, and are fully aware he is carrying it out as fair as is humanly possible, and we appreciate his efforts fully.

We regret that the Hon. Peter Heenan should have seen fit to give this untrue and unfavourable report to the press.

W. S. Carruthers,
Mayor."

From the Canadian Legion at Kenora: "Be it resolved that the executive of the Kenora branch of the Canadian Legion of the B.E.S.L. deplore the statements made in the press that returned soldiers in the district are denied positions by the Ontario government rightfully belonging to them, and this executive are not aware of any such case and have received no complaints.

F. Gray,
President."

From the Kenora Board of Trade: "Be it resolved that this council express its genuine appreciation of the much needed unemployment relief work being carried on by the government in the Kenora district and express our satisfaction on the non-partisan manner in which said work is being distributed by the association to those in need.

We also deplore any attempt at this time to create an impression that administration of unemployment relief in this district is otherwise.

J. Allan Sherrett,
Secretary-Treasurer."

I deemed it necessary in view of the very serious charges which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River had made—because statements of that character, particularly when we are passing through a trying period, are only calculated to stir up anxiety, distrust and irritation amongst both those in affluence and those in obscurity, those who have plenty and those who are needy, creating in their minds, and very, very wrongfully so, the impression that those who are endeavouring to discharge the affairs of this country have their eyes solely on the next election—in view of these charges I deemed it my duty to cover other parts of Ontario.

Mr. HEENAN: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. HEENAN: I think my hon. friend wants to be fair. He should at least have read all the correspondence and shown that the telegrams—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. HEENAN: Are there no doctors over there to prescribe for those boys? If he had read all the correspondence it would have shown that those telegrams were in response to a telegram sent by the Minister of Lands and Forests.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question or correct an inaccuracy it is open to him to do so, but he is not in order in reopening the debate.

Mr. HEENAN: I was not reopening the debate, Mr. Speaker. I was simply asking the minister if he would not explain that those telegrams were sent in response to a telegram sent by the Minister of Lands and Forests.

Mr. GORDON: I deemed it my duty, Mr. Speaker, as one of the members for northern Ontario, to make inquiries from responsible people in other parts of northern Ontario, because I may say that the wholesale charge that was made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River gave me a great deal of anxiety. I confess that I was persuaded that he was probably carried away by the enthusiasm created by the ward Liberal association meeting which he was attending, but at the same time his charge was too serious to pass over. I therefore communicated with the centres where, if there was discrimination, if there was all this partisanship and persecution of the people, it would be most easily identified and known, namely in the mining centres. So I wrote to Timmins, to try to get a letter from the mayor of that town. I did not know who the mayor was, but I recognized him when the letter came back. His name is George Drew, a well known and very responsible man in that large town. I am told, although I am not sure of this, that he is a very strong Liberal—I hope he has changed his views. This is his letter from Timmins, dated November 14, 1931, addressed to A. F. Kenning:

Dear Sir,—

With reference to our conversation of a few days ago in regard to work being done by the department of northern development, I am very pleased to state that I have never heard any complaints or any reports of preference being given in the work due to party politics. I might also state that party politics has never received the slightest consideration in any relief work which we are doing in Timmins, or when choosing the one hundred men who were taken from here by the northern development branch.

Yours truly,
George Drew,
Mayor.

I have another letter dated November 9, 1931, from Thomas McDonald. This man I know very well. He is president of one of the Liberal associations in the riding of North Cochrane, so I am sure that the hon. member for North Timiskaming will recognize the gentleman and probably be able to add some eulogy as to his party activities:

Dear Mr. Kenning,—

Re your conversation with me over the telephone regarding discrimination between Liberals and Conservatives being employed by Mr. Lough, district engineer, I absolutely cannot see any discrimination or favouritism shown to either party. Political affiliations have no bearing whatever in the securing of jobs in the electoral district of South Cochrane.

Yours truly,
Thomas McDonald,
Mayor.

I find another letter dated November 9, 1931, signed by the mayor and clerk of the town of Matheson. The mayor is the same gentleman who wrote the letter which I have just quoted. His letter is as follows:

With further reference to our telephone conversation of the 7th instant I have been unable to discover one single act of discrimination in regard to the employment of men in the northern development branch in Mr. B. Lough's district, and I am quite satisfied that it does not exist and that employment is given without any regard to anyone's political affiliations, but as far as possible on the particular capacity of the party applying.

Then I have a letter from the mayor of the township of Teck. Some of you may not appreciate the significance of the township, but it is in that township that the very large gold district of Kirkland Lake is located. Most of the larger gold mines are in the township of Teck. This letter is dated November 9, 1931, and reads as follows:

Dear Sir,—

Mr. J. W. McBain—

McBain is the municipal clerk in one of the largest gold-mining camps.

—has just spoken to me and asked if I had had any parties complaining to me that in giving work to the unemployed political discriminations were being made and that certain parties were being refused work by reason of their political affiliations. For your information I beg to say that no such complaint has ever been made to me by any person whatsoever.

Yours truly,
M. G. Hunt.

Mr. Hunt is a very prominent Liberal in that mining camp and hopes to be a candidate some day, he says, although I still believe he will vote Conservative.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. gentleman explain to the house how it is that there are so many Liberals in high authority in northern Ontario?

Mr. GORDON: I can answer my hon. friend. There are many, many thousands of Liberals in northern Ontario, but they all vote Conservative.

Mr. JACOBS: By the same token, I suppose all the Conservatives vote Liberal.

Mr. GORDON: Going a little further south I caused a communication to be directed to the mayor of the town of New Liskeard. This town, as many of you know, is located in what is known as the clay belt, the farming belt of northern Ontario. While they are having a little difficulty in connection with the prices of products from their farms, yet I hazard the opinion that there is not a district in all of Canada—I do not say this in a boastful but in a thankful way—that presents a finer farming opportunity than that part of Timiskaming. Its fertile areas, thousands and thousands of them, fortunately have not passed out to speculators, but are still held largely by the crown, and are adjacent to such great markets as the mining camps afford. I thought I had written to the mayor of the town of New Liskeard, but I find that he wrote to me. His letter which is now before me is dated November 14, 1931, addressed to myself and is as follows:

I have noticed in the press certain statements said to have been made by Honourable Peter Heenan relative to political interference of men being employed on road construction in northern Ontario, and while I have no wish to enter into any political discussion, these alleged statements by Mr. Heenan are so untrue, in so far as this particular section is concerned, that I felt I should write you stating the situation in so far as this municipality is concerned.

First of all, we were asked to register the names of the unemployed. Following this a representative of the northern development branch interviewed me, and in view of the fact that the municipality was to receive government assistance to carry out certain municipal work to provide employment, it was agreed that if the municipality would take care of their own married men the northern development branch would undertake to find employment for the single men.

This plan has been followed out, and is still being followed. As men apply for work at our municipal office, they are being employed in this manner: The unmarried men have been taken on without question by the northern development branch, the only requisite being that they present a paper signed by our town clerk certifying as to their place of residence. Certainly politics has not entered into this in the slightest manner.

I have further investigated sufficiently to positively say that so far as our residents are concerned there has been no political interference either before or after the employment of these men. Neither have I heard of any interference with men from other municipalities.

The arrangement has worked out very satisfactorily, and the government should be much complimented rather than criticized for their endeavours in this connection.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) H. W. Sutcliffe,
Mayor.

Then, I pursued the situation a little further and made inquiries from men whom I met as to the situation with regard to the work being carried out in that great country. As a result I can state to this house with a great deal of confidence that while there are some men out of employment, probably more than there would be in normal times, although owing to the seasonal nature of occupations in that country there are always some out of employment—the work in that part of the province is being properly administered, so far as it is humanly possible. The utmost efforts are being made to see that the work is given only to those who need it, and is carried out efficiently, and that the money goes the farthest.

While some people say that the town of Cobalt is on the down grade, I still think it has a long life before it. It is however a great centre for working men, especially miners, and a great deal of work is carried on in that town. On November 2, 1931, a letter was addressed to me by the mayor of the town of Cobalt. I do not know what his politics are, but I expect he voted for me. The letter is as follows:

Honourable Sir,—

I have read with surprise and much concern certain statements attributed to Honourable Peter Heenan in the Ottawa Citizen of October 26, 1931, and which embody sweeping denunciations of governmental administration of works in northern Ontario.

While I have no direct knowledge of conditions in the western part of northern Ontario I can speak with a reasonable degree of confidence concerning the conditions as they are in this section since I have, owing to unemployment conditions, been in fairly close touch with road work and other development here. The work is going forward apace and I have not found that political affiliations have been an impediment to the employment of any man or class of men otherwise qualified.

I feel further that the majority of people in this part of the province are satisfied with the conduct of affairs as at present administrated.

It is true and in the very nature of things that in the opening up of northern Ontario to travel and transportation and in the development of our vast virgin resources the demands of local authorities on both governments are great and in all likelihood you will find these authorities rapping at the door of the government for some time to come but that is no indication of lacking appreciation for the sympathetic consideration of our appeals and demands in the past.

It is quite conceivable that a continuous harangue of unfair criticism may find willing ears in some directions but what I consider more unfortunate is that the wholesale charges voiced in the article above referred to may tend, if persisted in, to dampen the enthusiasm of those ministers of the government whose ambition has been to open up northern Ontario and lay open to development the potential resources of which we are so proud.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) R. L. O'Gorman,
Mayor.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the reason for the letter; there is a fear that the ministers of the crown may withdraw their assistance.

Mr. STEVENS: Cheap.

Mr. HANSON (York Sunbury): The reason for the letter is my hon. friend's colleague over there.

Mr. RALSTON: It is certainly unsolicited testimony.

Mr. STEVENS: Cheap; petty stuff.

Mr. GORDON: I ask hon. members to pardon me for having quoted at such length from these various letters and papers. Sometimes very little is contributed to debate by everlastingly referring to quotations, from here, there and everywhere. At times I have thought it would be more refreshing if an hon. member were to develop an idea of his own and let us have it. Whether or not we could agree with it, at least it would be original.

So far as the government is concerned, working in harmony among themselves and with the authorities both provincial and municipal, with the industries and transportation companies, with anybody who has confidence in the future of Canada—and he who has not, I am afraid, is not the type of citizen who will get anywhere in any country—this government will proceed to coordinate its efforts, with all its various influences, in one joint effort to see, first, that the needy and the worthy are taken care of, and that there is no destitution in this land; and, secondly, that through a persistent effort we will bring this country back to normalcy faster than any other country in the world.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much indeed that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) should have introduced this resolution in the form in which he has, because, as was almost inevitable, it has led to a discussion along party lines. From the cheers which I hear in the lobby outside it would seem that we are to understand that there has been a great victory by the Conservative party because the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) has answered the charges of the former incumbent of that office (Mr. Heenan). I am afraid however that in the midst of this partisan debate we are forgetting the original purpose of the resolution, namely, that something should be done at the present time for the unemployed in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the purpose of the resolution; it is designed to make political capital.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Someone has just said that they are making political capital.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I did not say that. I said the purpose of the resolution was not to help unemployment, but to make political capital.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hear the statement of the member.

Mr. HOWARD: Was that a question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, a statement of fact.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman opposite will recall very distinctly that two years ago in this house my colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) introduced a resolution with regard to unemployment that led to a debate of some six days, and placed the then government in a very embarrassing position. Indeed, I have sometimes thought that the Labour group must assume some responsibility for the defeat of the Liberal government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Don't fool yourself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We did call the attention of the house and the country at that time to the failure of the Liberal government to tackle this great problem of unemployment. The Conservatives made a bid for votes by promising that they would cure unemployment. I will not say that they could possibly do so. I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is quite right when he says that unemployment in Canada is part of a great depression that is world wide in character; but I think in fairness he should have pointed out that that depression was already setting in when the Liberals were in power. It was already in existence when the Prime Minister, speaking across the country, promised that he would cure unemployment. At that time the Prime Minister did not recognize the world-wide character of the disease.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I don't know whether we did or not, but I think a reference to the debates of recent years will show that we came a great deal nearer to recognizing the real position than did the majority of members at that time. All through these debates we have been stressing the economic character of our social difficulties, we are continuing to do so, and I am very glad to say that a large number of the members are beginning to recognize this aspect of the case. Certainly we did not then realize that the disease was going to spread as rapidly as it has, and I do not know that anybody else did. But we are pointing out to-day what I think is not yet recognized by the government—that this disease is not cured. In the speech from the throne the government is trying to persuade us that we are on the upgrade, that we need not expect to face any very serious difficulty in the future. We in this corner would like to point out that it is quite possible there may not be a return to the normalcy to which the Minister of Labour refers, and in any case it is not likely that any such return to prosperity will occur within the next few months. I do not know quite what the Minister of Labour meant when he referred to "normal depressions." It is most unfortunate if we have to concede that our present economic system postulates periods of prosperity succeeded by periods of depression. I am afraid that that has been more or less the case in the past, and it was for that reason that during the past few years we have endeavoured to point out the necessity of providing some form of unemployment insurance, so that when these depressions do come we would be able to safeguard the interests of the workers. Capital takes very great care to have its reserves, and I do not see why labour should not have its reserves also. Now, unfortunately, we have no time to prepare the machinery necessary to set up a scheme of unemployment insurance; we face a crisis which must be met within the next few months. As I understand the situation, the legislation which was adopted last session runs out in the course of a few days, and so far the government has given us no indication whatever as to what measure it proposes to bring down to meet the needs of the coming year.

One other point in the speech of the Minister of Labour that I should like to comment upon is that he distinguishes between relief and wages. I know perfectly well there is a theoretical distinction between the two. It is supposed that relief is something given by the community more or less in the form of charity, whereas wages are supposed to be that portion of production to which the employee is entitled. But I would point out to the minister that if relief wages, that is, wages paid on relief jobs, are lower than the normal rate, it is simply a question of time until the ordinary wages are dragged down more or less to the level of the relief wages. That has been very clearly recognized by labour for a number of years, and under the predecessors of the Minister of Labour it was conceded that an attempt should be made to give wages on the scale then prevalent so that there should not be that danger. But apparently the minister has abandoned that plan and is content to allow wages to be paid on relief works that are much lower than those current in the various communities in which those works are being carried on. I say that such an arrangement is prejudicial to the interests of labour in this country, because if we have this pace set for the lowering of wages in one class of work, it will inevitably reflect itself in the other class.

The minister has said that the government has cooperated with the various provinces and municipalities. That is quite true, and I have nothing to say with regard to the charges which have been made as to the working conditions on relief works in northern Ontario. Possibly the scheme as a whole has been working fairly well. There have been abuses; some of those are not the fault of the federal government, but rather of the municipalities or the provincial government. But it is not that aspect that I wish to emphasize to-day. It is rather this, that something must be done in the near future, as the plan adopted last year has not been altogether satisfactory. For one thing, I do not think it is possible to carry on that plan for another year by reason of the financial state of the provinces. Several of the provinces are almost on the verge of bankruptcy. In my own province of Manitoba only a few days ago the provincial savings bank—which ought to be the most secure institution in the country—had to close its doors. I understand it has assets which ultimately will be realizable, and that the accounts have been transferred to chartered banks. But it seems to me a most serious thing that our province is in such a bad condition financially that we have had to close our savings bank. How can we go on applying relief in Manitoba when the province is in that situation? In defending a certain policy the premier of another western province recently said to me, "I have to take this action whether I like it or not; I hate to be the first to declare bankruptcy." When the provinces are in such a shaky condition as that I do not quite see how we can go on with an arrangement which will call upon the provinces to contribute a very large proportion for relief purposes.

If the provinces are in a bad condition financially, the municipalities are in a worse condition. Many rural municipalities in the west are virtually bankrupt. Some of our cities—if the truth has to be told—have very considerable overdrafts at the bank, and they hardly know how to meet their expenses during the next few weeks, or how they can possibly balance their budgets. So I do not see how it will be possible for the municipalities to continue to carry the load they have carried in the past. Again, private agencies have up to the present given considerable assistance. People have been willing to contribute to charitable agencies; old clothing has been distributed; rentals have been paid; in some cases Christmas baskets and even steady food supplies have been furnished by private agencies. That is particularly true in eastern Canada, but the treasuries of these charitable agencies are becoming depleted, and more than that, owing to the general depression those who usually have given through those charitable institutions now are no longer able to contribute. So that is the situation we face, the private agencies not able to do so much, the municipalities, in the west at least, almost on the verge of bankruptcy, and many of the provinces not knowing which way to turn and even having to come to the federal government to get help in order to carry on from day to day.

Now let me direct attention for a few moments to the actual situation which exists in my own city of Winnipeg, for example. The report of the unemployment committee for the city council for the week ending January 31, 1932, shows that on relief, as of February 1, there were 5,299 married men, an increase of 186 over the previous week; 5,145 single men, a decrease of 167 as compared with the previous week, and 598 women, married and single, an increase of 20. The relief spent during the week amounted to $76,000. The relief to single men was not included in this amount, nor was the cost of looking after transients; that was the amount spent upon those having recognized claims upon the municipality. That is an enormous burden for a small city to carry, and that city cannot possibly continue to carry such a burden for much longer.

Notwithstanding the long drawn out depression an attempt has been made to treat the people resident in Winnipeg fairly well; at least I can say they have received a good deal better treatment than has been given in some other municipalities. But at the meeting of the city council on February 1 the rates were cut down; previously a small family received $3.49 a week for food, and that was cut to $3 a week. I believe that works out to $4\frac{3}{5}$ cents, or less than 5 cents a meal for each small family. I cannot see how any family can exist on 5 cents a meal, even though at present vegetables may be cheap and the farmer not getting a very high price for his products. In the parliamentary restaurant we have to pay 75 cents or $1 for a meal, and there are other restaurants in the city where each individual meal costs $1 or $1.50. This amount of 5 cents a meal is for a whole family, a man and his wife and perhaps a small child.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Someone across the way thinks this is a great joke. I can hardly see how any man who has a family of his own can laugh when I am discussing a matter of this kind, affecting the welfare of thousands of our fellow citizens. They may say I am a joke, if they like.

Mr. SPOTTON: We do not think it is a joke; we did not hear it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There was a laugh went up, and I do not propose to let derisive laughter pass unchallenged during the discussion of a matter of this kind.

Then there is another thing. In my own city a committee of women, in cooperation with the Department of Health, have been making some sort of survey, and it has been found that in some 1,500 homes a child is expected within the next few weeks. These homes have been able to provide nothing whatever for the care of the baby when it arrives, and the good women of Winnipeg are setting about making some effort to provide some infants' outfits in order that the babies may be wrapped in something when they are born. In a number of the homes they have nothing for that purpose but newspapers, and some of the women have taken the ground that under these conditions the only thing is to attempt to have some method of birth control, because they say children should not be allowed to be born into the world where there is no provision made for them. When that position is taken by reputable women of the city of Winnipeg I say we in this house can hardly afford to laugh at the condition of some of these people who are faced with such a desperate situation.

In my own city recently they went further and adopted what I think is an altogether unjustifiable attitude. I am not blaming the federal government for this; I just want to set out the facts of the case. They asked each recipient of relief to sign the following agreement to repay:

> In consideration of advances made or to be made to me, by or through the city of Winnipeg or any relief department thereof, by way of relief, I agree to pay to the said city on demand the amount of such advances, and I agree that a certificate by the treasurer of the said city shall be final and conclusive evidence against me as to the making of such advances and the amount and value thereof, and I hereby charge all my property and assets with the repayment of such advances of the value thereof.

That simply means that under the duress of starvation reputable men and women are being asked to sign a bond which places them in serfdom forever, because these people will not be in a position to repay even when they are working again. The normal wage of this country is not sufficient for that, so a great many never will be able to repay. The more conscientious will object to signing this document and will try in every possible way to avoid receiving relief. The waster, the man who does not care anything about his word, of course will sign, so it is really no guarantee that the city will receive payment, though it has a tremendously bad effect upon the recipient of relief. He feels that in his dire distress he is being forced by the city of his adoption to sign away his rights. If he has any little property that he has gathered together in the last few years it must be hypothecated to the city.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we treat the poor in an altogether different way from that in which we treat the well to do in this country, and this is the point to which I had reference in an earlier debate in this house, when I called to the attention of an hon. gentleman opposite the fact that when we were granting bonuses by way of tariff concessions to the great corporations, because of the depressed condition of the country or because of something in the industry that the owners claimed would not allow it to compete with that of other nations, we did not insist that the amount given them should be later repaid. In this country we have given bonuses and tariff concessions to the tune of tens of millions of dollars. There is no doubt of that. We have given to large corporations during the past years, we have been giving enormous bonuses and concessions within the last few months, and we are not asking that ultimately they repay us; rather we take the general view that it is to the good of the community that they be allowed to carry on their business. But when it comes down to the workingmen of this country, who have no resources other than their labour power, we hold them up at the point of a gun, as it were, making them sign this document promising to repay. I do not think a document of that kind could be considered as legal; I do not think moneys given under these conditions would be recoverable. But that is what the working people of this country are faced with.

If all of us were poor, then I should not mind. A newspaper of my own city called attention to these things, while in another column they referred to the condition of the banks. For example, the dividend of the Bank of Montreal in 1891 was 10 per cent; it was increased in 1919 to 12 per cent, and has remained at that rate while bonuses have been paid from time to time. The Bank of Nova Scotia paid 8 per cent prior to 1900, when it was raised to 9 per cent; in 1916 the rate was raised to 16 per cent and has remained at that rate. The Bank of Toronto rate was increased in 1911 to 11 per cent; in 1919 to 12 per cent, and has continued at that rate while bonuses have been declared from time to time. The Bank of Commerce rate was increased in 1906 from 7 per cent to 10 per cent, and at the present time the same rate prevails. The Royal Bank of Canada rate was increased in 1903 to 8 per cent; in 1919 it was increased to 12 per cent, and has remained at that rate. The Imperial Bank of Canada rate was increased in 1899 to 9 per cent; it was raised to 12 per cent in 1911, where it has remained while bonuses have been declared from time to time. I could continue to read these figures, but we are all more or less familiar with the facts revealed in the annual statements of our banking institutions.

Many of our industrial concerns have passed their dividends but some are still paying a very good rate, not being very far behind the peak of two or three years ago. As long as there exist in this country such large reserves of wealth, I see no reason why the poorer people who are suffering from the depression should be given such miserable pittances or should be asked to mortgage their future.

During the war we were told that there had to be equal sacrifices, but many men took advantage of that period to grow rich. Many purchased tax-free bonds and have been drawing very good revenues since that time; with the deflation of money which has occurred they are drawing to-day twice as much as they are legitimately entitled to. As long as there are these sources of wealth, the poor in our community should receive the first consideration.

In my own city a large number of people are receiving relief and this number is increased by farmers who have come in from all over the province to try to obtain relief. I have had them come to my own door in the last stages of destitution. These men have not been able to make a success in the country and have drifted into the city in the hope that with the larger population and more charitably inclined people they would have some chance.

What is true of Winnipeg is true largely of the other western municipalities. Just before coming to Ottawa I visited Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary and Edmonton, and everywhere it was the same story. Municipalities and the provinces are almost at their wit's end, and no prospect for the future.

I receive letters almost daily from the industrial towns of Ontario—I do not know whether or not other hon. members receive similar letters; perhaps as a Labour member I receive more than my fair share—and in all these industrial towns there are large numbers of unemployed who complain bitterly of the amount of relief they receive. I spent last week end in the city of Montreal and met some of those connected with the granting of relief to girls. This is almost a new phase of the matter to me, because while we have some women and girls unemployed in the west, there is nothing like the number which exists in some of the eastern cities. Large numbers of girls are registered in Montreal—I had hoped to have the figures here but they have not come through—and a very small amount is being given in the form of relief. The social workers complain that these girls are practically being driven out into the streets and forced to adopt all sorts of questionable means to obtain a livelihood. That is a disgrace to a country as rich as we are told Canada is, a country which is rich when viewed in the light of the statements of our banks and financial corporations.

I had a letter only the other day from Halifax describing the unemployment situation there. I do not think it is as bad proportionately in the maritimes as it is in the west, but large numbers of sailors are unemployed in Halifax, some of them having been dismissed from our own Canadian National steamships. They are wondering what they are going to do next. These sailors have reinforced the number of the unemployed already in that municipality.

From time to time we have urged upon the government the necessity of a definite plan to meet this kind of thing. Unemployment insurance has been mentioned and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has promised that this would be brought into force during the lifetime of his government. I should like to ask him whether or not any scheme is being prepared, or is he going to adopt the attitude that because of the hard times it will be impossible for him to implement his promise. I do not put forward unemployment insurance as a cure for unemployment; that has never been done by us; it is merely a palliative. However, I contend that the insurance schemes in existence in Great Britain and on the continent are a better way of handling the situation than is the scheme adopted in this country. This unemployment insurance has been referred to as the dole, but there is no dole so demoralizing as the dole given at the doors of our mission houses and soup kitchens where some of our people have to apply for help. The other has some semblance of dignity; a man who contributes when he is working feels that he has some right to the insurance. When your house burns down you feel you have a right to the insurance for which you have paid. The methods adopted here regarding relief to the unemployed are of the most haphazard nature that could be imagined, and I hope the government has not in view the carrying forward for another year of any such scheme.

I should like to deal for a moment with the demoralizing effects of charity without work. It may be that some of the higher-ups can accept a large salary for a nominal job—there are certain sinecures which exist even yet—without experiencing any demoralizing effect, but I am a bit doubtful. When a man spends day after day looking for work without success, when he is forced to hang around the unemployment agency, when he spends week after week and month after month visiting the soup kitchens, he is not only unemployed but usually becomes unemployable. But what about the wife at home? She is worrying over whether or not there will be a sufficient supply of food for her family; she is faced with the necessity of having to go to some charitable institution to obtain supplies and having to submit to the inquisition of a charity visitor. Such visits may be very necessary from the standpoint of the municipality, but from the standpoint of the home, it is absolutely demoralizing. Yet this is the plan we are carrying out in this country.

The present arrangements will run out within a few days but no indication was contained in the speech from the throne or in any utterance of the Prime Minister as to what is being proposed for next year. The estimates indicate that there is an increase in the vote for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a very sinister thing. It is quite possible that part of this increase may be accounted for by the fact that we are taking over the policing of Alberta. It is barely possible that some may be accounted for because of the proposal to take over the policing of other places. That I do not know, but it looks very bad to me that our police force, which is practically a military one, should be increased at this time. Surely the government is not taking the position that the way to settle this unemployment question is to shoot down those who are unemployed. Is that what this means? I see one or two of my hon. friends opposite shaking their heads. Probably they think this is not what it means, but what else are we to infer from these increased figures? If the force were increased and if at the same time there were any provision for increased constructive work, I might not be so apprehensive; but when we have no constructive measures and when, on the other hand, we have an indication of repressive measures, what am I to think? Last year when the military estimates were under discussion, I said that we had come to the point in this country where we had to recognize that the military were here, not for repelling some foreign enemy, but in order to shoot down our own people.

Mr. STEVENS: How does the hon. member then interpret the cut of several million dollars this year in the military estimates?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand that is chiefly in the air force, and I would point out that a part of the air service in any case has been used for civil work.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. member knows there is a much greater reduction in the agriculture estimates than in the military.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. Just on this very point, I think the air force is the only part of the force that has been used for civil work, and it is precisely that part which is being cut down. That does not interfere with my statement that on the whole the military forces of this country are being maintained not to repel some foreign enemy but to shoot down our own Canadian people.

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some hon. members say "no" and "shame."

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hon. gentlemen repudiate this, but let me read what was said by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) before the League of Nations on September 9, 1931. He said:

> We maintain only such military, naval and air forces as are necessary for the maintenance of law and order within our own border.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That was said by the Minister of Justice before the great assembly of the League of Nations.

Mr. STEVENS: Read the rest of it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have the rest under my hand. It was right along that line.

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Those are the words of the Minister of Justice, which the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not contradict.

Mr. STEVENS: What does the hon. member want us to contradict?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will read the statement again.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Justice made one of the most eloquent appeals for peace that was made at the assembly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, he made an eloquent appeal for peace. I heard him deliver it. He said: We in Canada do not want to repel any foreign enemy; we do not have to have a military force; we have no enemies east or west; we have a friendly republic to the south, and so on. He said: We do not need any forces for defence purposes in Canada, we are not like some countries in Europe, and then he said this:

> We maintain only such military, naval and air forces as are necessary for the maintenance of law and order within our own border.

Mr. JACOBS: Is the hon. gentleman opposed to that view?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not the point in question. I shall deal with that when we come to the military estimates.

Mr. MORAND: The hon. member speaks every day. We hear the same thing again and again.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall speak every day if it pleases me, when under the rules of the house I have the right to do so.

Mr. YOUNG: If the Prime Minister permits the hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, if the Prime Minister permits me; but let me point out to some of his followers opposite that their leader was elected from the constituency of West Calgary and I was elected from the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre, and constitutionally, whatever may be the practice in the house, I have the same rights on the floor of this chamber as has the Prime Minister. Those who object to my speaking so often may well turn and ask how far their leader monopolizes the business of the house.

I want, however, to come back to this point which I think is worthy of consideration. I had, indeed, no intention whatever, until I was interrupted by hon. gentlemen opposite, of saying anything with regard to the tactics of the opposition, but when I am interrupted I am forced to resort to that. What I want to emphasize is this, that so far the government has given us no indication of any constructive measures.

Mr. MORAND: Neither has the hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not according to British practice that the opposition should be called upon to formulate policies. We are given no opportunity of doing so. The government, I think they will admit, do not accept them when we do advance them.

An hon. MEMBER: You have none.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, we have policies. I have suggested one of them to-day as a palliative, that is, an unemployment insurance scheme instead of the present method of dealing with the question. My colleague the other day suggested another palliative, namely, a shorter work day. That was not accepted. We have suggested that instead of raising money the way we do, we should raise it by a steeply graded inheritance and income tax. That proposal is not acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite, and so they tell us that we have no policies. I suggested that if we are to cut down the wages paid to the civil servants and to labour generally, there was no reason why the wages of capital should not be cut down. Supposing we cut down the wages of capital by 10 per cent; immediately there is an uproar from the other side of the house because they do not accept our solutions, our constructive suggestions. I should like to see—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Lawson): I would direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that his time has expired.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this amendment in connection with unemployment, and I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is not in his place. I wish to refer particularly to the relief measures in British Columbia under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act which was passed at the last session of parliament.

As hon. members will remember, the question of the seriousness of unemployment throughout the dominion was stressed at various times by many hon. members on this side, and in passing I might say with regard to this that rather an unfair statement was made to one of the municipalities in my constituency when, in answer to their request to Ottawa for financial aid and as to what steps were being taken to combat unemployment distress, they were informed on July 29 of last year:

> Parliament has been sitting roughly five months and seldom has there been so much talk, so much obstruction of public business at a time when action was so badly needed. Happily the end of the session draws near.

These remarks were very unfair and uncalled for to be made in reply to the municipality of Burnaby when it was asking for further aid.

I wish to speak with particular reference, however, to the operations of the act affecting British Columbia and the serious condition of some of the municipalities which have been endeavouring to cope with an unemployment situation such as never was contemplated since their formation as municipal areas. When parliament met in 1931 unemployment was not a new issue. In the session of 1931 figures were given and many instances cited to show that unemployment had indeed grown much worse. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was seized of the acuteness of the distress and the general discontent prevailing throughout the dominion, and at his request parliament voted an unnamed sum of money in the form of a blank cheque, as the Prime Minister said it was not known just what sum would be required to meet the unemployment situation. He assured the house however that no one in Canada would be allowed to starve. The undue burden which had been placed on various municipalities up to the session of 1931 had been many times drawn to the attention of the government. It will be remembered that from the beginning of 1930 up to the session of 1931 both this government and its predecessor had maintained that it was primarily the duty of the municipalities to take care of their indigent poor. The situation in British Columbia by August of last year had assumed alarming proportions. Thousands of unemployed had congregated in coast cities like Vancouver and were living under conditions which were not at all good either for themselves or the cities. Immediate action was demanded by the cities and municipalities, which already had spent every dollar in an effort to relieve the situation. They had reached the end of their financial resources, and they besought both the dominion and provincial governments that further financial aid be given, or in the alternative they asked these governments to take over the burden of the unemployment situation. While no definite promise was made to any municipality as to what help would be forthcoming, I am of the opinion that the statements made by the right hon. the Prime Minister, which were given wide publicity in the press, with respect to the assistance which the various municipalities could expect and the proportions which the dominion and provincial governments would contribute, were relied upon. I have here a copy of the statement that was published throughout the province on September 5, purporting to give the exact words which the Prime Minister had telegraphed to Premier Tolmie of British Columbia. It reads:

Then follow the exact words of the Prime Minister:

"As there appears to be some misunderstanding regarding the relative responsibility of the Dominion and provinces for relief measures, may I again point out that any effort on the part of the Dominion to undertake the direction of purely provincial or municipal undertakings would be in derogation of the constitutional rights of the provinces."

"We have indicated that we are prepared to make most generous contributions, subject to effective supervision, to enable the provinces to provide employment for large numbers of persons. We have further concluded that in addition to our responsibility for purely federal undertakings and assistance direct to provincial undertakings, we will contribute one-half the cost of approved relief undertakings, in British Columbia cities and towns, and will loan to your province the additional one-half, leaving to you the responsibility of making satisfactory arrangements with such cities and towns as to their contributions, on the assumption that they will deliver to the province their bonds as security, and that treasury bills of the province will be delivered to our government for the one-half thus loaned."

"We are particularly interested in immediate action being taken to relieve the unemployment in large centres. Please advise what undertakings are now under way, and the number of men employed."

Some responsibility must be accepted by the Dominion government in this matter. The government was well aware of the acuteness of the situation prevailing at that time and also of the financial condition of many of the municipalities. Knowing all this, and the government having received a blank cheque for any amount necessary for the purpose of relieving unemployment, it was felt that the promise of aid should have been carried out; but that it was not carried out is very evident in many districts of British Columbia. Later I shall cite a particular case in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, namely at Burnaby; and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is not the only municipality that finds itself in financial difficulties due to the great burden cast upon it in the matter of handling unemployment relief work. As to unemployment relief works carried out by the provincial government, I intend to leave that matter till another occasion. At this time I wish to speak with particular reference to conditions generally.

An agreement was signed on August 19 of last year by Hon. S. F. Tolmie, representing the province of British Columbia, and the Hon. Gideon Robertson, then Minister of Labour, representing the dominion, and was subsequently approved by order in council. It specified the proportion that would be paid by the dominion government on unemployment relief work and on relief work jointly undertaken as between the province and the dominion, and also the various amounts as between the municipalities and the dominion, showing in each instance the proportion which the Dominion government would contribute to all such undertakings. With that agreement I can find no particular fault, but I do say, Mr. Speaker, that the Dominion government should have accepted the statements and assurances given by reesponsible dominion cabinet ministers to some of the municipalities and to the province of British Columbia. The then Minister of Labour was the one member of the cabinet who was in closest touch with the situation, and it was generally recognized when discussing agreements with him that any recommendations that were acceptable to him would be approved by the cabinet. That certain promises of work and schedules of work were given approval by the then Minister of Labour there can be no doubt. It would certainly appear that there was some grave misunderstanding in this matter which persists even now, notwithstanding the remarks of the present Minister of Labour.

I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour to the fact that some of these agreements were approved, but not signed, in the presence of the Minister of Public Works for the province of British Columbia and the then Minister of Labour, the Hon. Senator Robertson. I will mention three or four of them in my own riding. There was the agreement with Richmond municipality which was approved by the then Minister of Labour and the province of British Columbia, involving an amount of $100,000. There was the city of New Westminster agreement, which was approved by the then Minister of Labour, involving an amount of $200,000. The Burnaby municipality project was approved by the then Minister of Labour in the presence of the Minister of Public Works at Victoria to the amount of some $400,000, although in all instances the schemes which had been proposed by these municipalities were almost 25 per cent and in some cases 50 per cent greater than the schedules agreed to by the then Minister of Labour. To show that I am not alone in my contention I should like to quote a letter sent out by the Union of British Columbia Municipalities to the right hon. Prime Minister, dated January 27, 1932. It reads:

> Representatives of thirty-five British Columbia municipalities of the lower mainland and Vancouver island met provincial cabinet at an all-day session re unemployment. Provincial ministers allowed us to peruse all correspondence between Dominion and provincial governments from the time Senator Robertson, Minister of Labour, made certain arrangements and agreed to certain undertakings with provincial government.

I have read that first part and shall probably read the whole of the telegram sent to the Prime Minister to show that I and the municipalities in my riding are not alone in understanding that the agreements were signed or approved by the then Minister of Labour.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, some cities and municipalities had met the then Minister of Labour in company with the Minister of Public Works of British Columbia, Mr. Bruhn, and presented for their approval projects and estimates of relief works proposed to be undertaken by them. I say again that the Dominion government should have honoured these approvals, even if they were given in only a verbal way; because if there was one minister capable of representing the Dominion government at that time, and especially capable of making agreements with any province or municipality, surely it must have been the then Minister of Labour, who, as I say, was more thoroughly acquainted with the acute condition prevailing from one end of Canada to the other than any other member of the cabinet.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, another member of the cabinet, had been interviewed, and so far as I can learn he did not object to the schemes put forward. He also gave some assurance that so far as he was concerned he would do all within his power to have the projects sanctioned. He said he believed he had the support of his colleagues at Ottawa. The general impression was—and there were ample grounds for such an impression—that the work would be begun immediately as a relief measure for the thousands of unemployed in that province. It would appear that the provincial government had every assurance that public works on a scale never before seen in British Columbia would be proceeded with by the provincial government. About 170 camps were constructed throughout the various parts of the province. Tools, equipment, machinery and supplies were purchased in a lavish manner. As I have already indicated, however, that is another story of which undoubtedly more will be heard.

While there is no doubt that the schedule or program of work had been submitted by the various municipalities to the province of British Columbia and had been in its hands for some time, it did not reach Ottawa until October 28. The Dominion government must have had some knowledge that relief works had commenced, and it was well known by them that there was acute need throughout the province. In fact, in some districts feeling was running so high among the unemployed that the urgency of the situation demanded some action by way of relief work.

A shock was received in British Columbia when the schedules for work submitted by the province, which included not only provincial projects but municipal projects as well, were not accepted. At least the federal government should have accepted those undertakings which had been accepted by the provincial legislature on behalf of the municipalities.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I call the hon. member's attention to the rule which prohibits the reading of speeches?

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, I am merely following my notes. It may well have been that the program of works and relief measures which had been commenced by the provincial government, and for which large expenditures and commitments had been made, did not meet with the approval of the Dominion government. I am of opinion that perhaps there was some justification for that attitude; but I say that so far as schedules or relief works submitted on behalf of the municipalities were concerned, there should have been an acceptance in full. I say the full program of undertakings should have been accepted by the Dominion government or the Dominion authorities. The various municipalities in my opinion were in that regard unfairly treated, because in the first instance they were led to understand that if unable to carry out any relief projects the Dominion government would come to the rescue by giving them 50 per cent of the cost of all relief work, and 33⅓ per cent of direct relief expenditures. At the same time loans would be made to the provinces to enable municipalities to take care of the 25 per cent of the proportion which, under the agreement entered into, they would have to meet.

After submitting their program of works and in some instances going the length of enacting by-laws, the municipalities were in the majority of instances informed that the total sums as submitted and agreed upon could not be granted. This information was given to them after the Dominion government had stated clearly to British Columbia that the total amounts as submitted for all relief purposes were too great. The municipalities were informed that the amounts as agreed upon could not be proceeded with, and that their schedules of work would have to be amended.

Before I pass on to further subjects I should like to draw to the attention of the government the fact that many of these municipalities had gone the length of submitting by-laws to their people. One municipality I have in mind, that of Richmond, had been given an assurance of a total expenditure of $100,000, and had spent the sum of $54,000 before they were told that their total allotment would be only 50,000. The municipality of Coquitlam in the constituency of my hon. friend for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) had submitted a by-law providing for the sum of $34,800. That municipality had purchased equipment and made all arrangements to begin work before they were informed that their program must not exceed an expenditure of $19,000. The municipality of Burnaby, which in the first instance hoped to expend $780,000 under its unemployment work, and received permission from the then Minister of Labour to expend the sum of $400,000, were notified that their expenditures must be cut to $380,000. The city of New Westminster, which had submitted a program involving an expenditure of $400,000, of which the sum of $200,000 had been agreed to, were notified that their program would have to be cut down to $95,000. That city was hit particularly hard because it had made contracts for the buying of material, and had launched out on a program of work with the clear understanding, —and with at least some semblance of authority—that their claim for $200,000 would be granted. As I have said, after their program was under way and material had been contracted for, they were informed that their total expenditure must not exceed $95,000.

One cannot go too extensively into this subject because all the details of transactions, have not yet been placed upon the table. When New Westminster approached the provincial government asking why their expenditure had been cut they were told that Ottawa was responsible because a bridge was to be constructed in the locality of Ladner the erection of which would necessitate the engagement of about 1,500 men. As that project was to be proceeded with, therefore New Westminster would not require $200,000 for unemployment relief. Telegrams and communications concerning the erection of the bridge were shown to a delegation from the city council of New Westminster who visited the city of Victoria, asking why their grant had been cut.

I say therefore that the Dominion should have accepted the agreements entered into in good faith by the municipalities many of which had been given approval by the then Minister of Labour whilst in the city of Vancouver. The municipalities cannot be blamed for going ahead with the work. The distress of the people was of primary importance, and if the government had been taking any note of what was being done in that province they would have realized that when the schedules were rearranged a drastic cut had in some instances been made. Reductions to the extent of 50 per cent were common, while, on the other hand, other municipalities were permitted to proceed with the programs first submitted by them. Further, some cities and municipalities had their allotments actually increased. So that if the government's intention was to cut down British Columbia's allotment, that object was not fairly achieved on the schedules as presented by the provincial government, because these schedules, as I have said, cut certain municipalities and cities in some instances more than 50 per cent, other municipalities were allowed to proceed with their original program as O.K.'d by the provincial authorities, and others again were actually given an increase over what they had originally asked for. In due time some explanation should be given by the Minister of Labour or by some other member of the government as to why British Columbia was limited in the manner I have shown. It was fully expected that between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 would be spent for the relief of unemployment in the province, as it was contemplated that at least 20,000 men would be given employment, although over 50,000 men had registered. And they registered under oath. I have before me a copy of the oath if any hon. member would care to see it.

I now desire to confine my remarks to the misunderstanding that exists between the provincial and the federal government. It has affected unemployment relief work in the province and has caused considerable grief in some municipalities. When British Columbia's program of work was rejected it came as a bombshell and the premier of that province could hardly understand the decision reached by the federal authorities. His statement in the Daily Province of October 27, 1931, was that Mr. Jones, the provincial Minister of Finance, was then on his way to Ottawa. I might quote his own words when he was informed that Ottawa had not accepted the province's program of work. Mark you, this information came to him while Mr. Jones was on his way to Ottawa and had not yet reached the capital. Premier Tolmie said:

> Mr. Jones has in his portfolio documents to prove definitely that the province did not embark on its present program and did not announce plans for extending the Pacific Great Eastern railway without full authority for doing so.
> This government insists that the federal government, through Senator Robertson, Minister of Labour, and Hon. H. H. Stevens, Minister of Trade and Commerce, insisted on an early start on work and promised to pay half the cost. In one telegram the federal government said it would not accept any responsibility for further delay in public works.

The newspaper makes this comment:

> It had been known here for some time, and announced in these columns. that the federal government regarded the British Columbia works program as too large though this was denied officially in Ottawa. What staggered the provincial government to-day was the report that, having summoned Mr. Jones to negotiate, the federal government had announced that it had rejected his plans before his arrival. This was incomprehensible to the provincial authorities and made them wonder what would come out of Mr. Jones' mission.

Regarding that misunderstanding, I am going to cite one clear cut example—its effect on the municipality of Burnaby. The municipality were given to understand that before they started work they would be financed either by the province or by the dominion. They were told on good authority to formulate their plans and that a loan would be made them up to any amount which they cared to take. With this understanding they approved a program of $400,000. I have not time to place on Hansard the number of telegrams that passed between the municipality, the provincial government, and the Dominion government, but the size of the file I hold in my hand will give hon. members some idea of the number of messages sent. So bad did the situation become that the bank told the municipality they would not accept the word of the provincial government in regard to finances. On receiving this intimation the municipality shut down the work. The municipality financed the whole project, although given to understand that if they contributed 25 per cent the provincial government would give bonds to the Dominion government for their proportion. The municipality have spent a total of $311,000 on that program, towards which they have received only $132,125 up to the 21st of this month. They are spending a thousand dollars a day on direct relief, and have been called upon to bear the whole of that capital expenditure. Their council have been almost distracted in their endeavour to cope with this embarrassing situation. That some misunderstanding does prevail is evident from a telegram sent to the reeve of the municipality by the Hon. S. F. Tolmie on January 21, showing that not only he but his Minister of Finance were under the impression that the money sent by the federal government had been intended for some other purpose, and not to pay any share of the municipality's proportion of the relief work undertaken. The premier told the municipal authorities that as soon as he received a cheque from the federal government the municipality would be paid. He has told them that all the vouchers have been sent to Ottawa and that the provincial government has borne any expenditure which has been made by the municipality. In spite of the statements made by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) a few days ago to the effect that over $2,500,000 dollars has been spent, the provincial government still assert that they are awaiting payment from the dominion, and that as soon as they receive the money it will be remitted to the municipality. I submit that the government should take immediate steps to deal with this acute situation. They must give serious attention to the case because these expenditures come under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931.

I think the mover of the resolution should be commended for introducing the subject of unemployment. I feel it is the most threatening and serious problem confronting the dominion to-day, and one that will have to be grappled with even more seriously than it has been during the past year.

In to-day's press, Mr. Speaker, I noticed an item in connection with the unemployed in British Columbia, which states:

> "Hunger Marchers" On Parade In B.C.
> British Flag Heads 5,000 Unemployed,
> Soviet Emblems Follow Behind
> Vancouver, B.C., Feb. 22.—Five thousand "hunger marchers" representing unemployed from Vancouver, New Westminster, North Shore and points in the Fraser valley and the interior, gathered at Powell street grounds and paraded to Cambie street grounds here to-day. At the head of the parade was carried a British flag while behind it came emblems of the Soviet Union and broad banners carrying slogans of the unemployed.

They received more than a sympathetic hearing from the council of North Vancouver, who gave them a contribution to enable them to present their views to the government at Victoria.

Coming back to the question of the misunderstanding, if assurances were given and employment was started, further money should be sent to fulfil that promise, but if more money is sent I would ask that the Dominion government appoint someone to handle those funds. If the misunderstanding is cleared up and this government just makes a grant of $250,000 or $500,000, as they have done in the past, the provincial government may well use those funds for purposes other than the reimbursing of the municipalities. So I say that if the government is contemplating the sending of further funds to British Columbia, some commissioner should be appointed with authority to handle those funds and see that the municipalities get their just proportions.

There is one other point before I sit down, Mr. Speaker. I did not intend to dwell on this matter, but since the Minister of Labour has brought in the question of patronage I should like to direct the attention of the government to a case in my own constituency with regard to which I have absolute proof. As hon. members know, each member of parliament received a letter from Ottawa asking that he place before the federal Department of Labour such schemes for the relief of the unemployed as seemed most necessary in each district. I took time to visit the various municipal councils, asking for their advice with regard to such schemes; I submitted the result to Ottawa, and my report included the extension of a wharf at White Rock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): His Honour the Speaker has been called away for a few hours and has asked me to preside in his absence, and in doing so I ask the indulgence of the house.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

EXCLUSION OF OUTSIDE SERVICE FROM OPERATION OF ACT

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gagnon for the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, a few evenings ago when the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) moved the second reading of this bill, I expressed some astonishment that such a proposal should come from a member of the Conservative party, the party chiefly responsible for the placing upon the statute book of the Civil Service Act. It is to the credit of that party that it has always shown unswerving allegiance to the merit system. I am tempted to ask the question: What is the attitude of the government to-day towards this particular measure? It is well known that last year the attitude was adverse, but I am not so sure what it is this year; although it is almost unthinkable that that party should reverse its well known policy.

During his remarks the hon. member for Dorchester stated that certain doubts which had existed as to the attitude of the government towards this bill had been removed. What was the doubt as to the attitude of the government which has been removed? Was it that the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) intended to have this bill go to the committee with the appearance of having passed the second reading, when in fact it had not passed? I do not know what was meant, but there is a sinister sound in the suggestion that the attitude of the government has changed. I sincerely hope that it has not changed.

I was disappointed in hearing the hon. member draw Doctor Grant into the discussion as being a supporter of a measure of this kind. Doctor Grant of Upper Canada college has been a supporter of the merit principle all his life. He has fought for it unswervingly for many years and the attempt to use any writings or sayings of his in support of a bill of this kind is nothing but a misrepresentation of his position. I have since secured copies of the articles from which the hon. member quoted, which quotations I challenged at the time. If any hon. member will read Doctor Grant's statements he will find that there is not one single line or sentence which challenges the merit principle of the Civil Service Act. All that Doctor Grant does is to challenge the administration of the act under the present commission.

I share many of the views held by Doctor Grant in that connection. I would point out that this bill does not in any way alter the position of the commission. The hon. member does not suggest what Doctor Grant has suggested, a one-man commission; he asks that the commission continue with abbreviated powers, that it shall administer to a certain degree the inside service but that the work in connection with the outside service and in connection with the merit system generally be put aside.

The hon. member alleged that this bill embodied the recommendations made by the Senate committee of 1924, known as the Béique committee, and by the Malcolm committee of 1923. When the hon. member made that statement I realized that he had not read the reports of these committees, much less the evidence upon which they were based. The only possible similarity between either of these reports and the bill is the second paragraph of the bill, which repeats almost word for word one section of the recommendations of the Senate committee of 1924. I could find no similarity in the Malcolm report. The Senate committee's recommendations were made in an effort to cut down the number of civil servants and not to jeopardize the principle of the Civil Service Act.

In discussing the general administration of the act the hon. member gave one or two pithy illustrations which seemed to amuse the house at the time. Hon. members who were present will remember his reference to the recent vacancy of the position of chief page of this house. To the intense amusement of those hon. members around him, and I regret to say of some to my right, he told a story of how candidates were asked to write an essay on the League of Nations, which story was received with loud ridicule. I have made it my business to secure a copy of the examination paper, and I have it before me. It is a perfectly understandable and comprehensive examination for a position of this kind. The hon. member did not explain that the position of chief page in this house is one of some little responsibility, as it concerns the comfort and convenience of the members of this chamber. The chief page must be able to direct the minor pages where to secure the necessary material which may be required by hon. members, and he must have some knowledge of what hon. members are talking about. In order that it might be assured that an efficient person should be in charge of the pages of this house, the commission submitted the following examination paper, upon which I challenge any hon. member to cast ridicule. The first question is:

Tell what you know of any three of the following:

It is significant that the hon. member was not quite accurate in his statement; he said the candidates had to write an essay on the League of Nations, whereas they could select any three of the following subjects upon which to write:

The recent activities of the League of Nations; the present British government; Remembrance Day; shipping wheat via the Hudson bay route.

That is perhaps the only ridiculous item. The question continues:

The National Service Loan; the 1931 census.

The second question is a collection of names and numbers which are to be arranged in alphabetical and numerical sequence. Questions 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 are problems in simple arithmetic; surely this qualification should be required of the chief page. Question No. 8 is as follows:

(a) How many members are there in the House of Commons?
(b) How is the number of members for each province determined?

My French Canadian colleagues would certainly agree a question like that might well be asked of any page of the house, much less a chief of pages. Then there are these questions:

9. (a) What is the seating arrangement of the House of Commons?
(b) On which side of the speaker's chair do the government members sit?
10. Who is the speaker in the present House of Commons? the government leader? the leader of the opposition?

Surely these are intelligible questions to ask.

11. Give the names of five cabinet ministers and the departments they administer.

An examination of this kind might well be one of the qualifications for a member of the House of Commons, and especially for some civil servants; because I had in my office one who claimed he had been sixteen years in the civil service and he did not know the name of the Minister of Immigration in the last government.

12. Explain briefly any five of the following with reference to parliamentary procedure: mace; quorum; division; adjournment; prorogation; dissolution; legal limitation of duration of parliament.

Therefore I submit the hon. member for Dorchester has completely failed to make any case on the basis of his facetious remarks about the League of Nations and the chief of pages of the house.

The next reference he made was one that could have been made only by a man who did not acquaint himself with the facts but who relied on hearsay evidence or statements of some persons who had filled him up with stories of this kind. I am quoting from his speech in connection with a vacancy for the position of expert mechanic in the marine signals branch in the Department of Marine at Quebec. He said:

One of the three men who were appointed to act as examiners was the janitor of St. Patrick's church in the city of Quebec.

Surely the hon. member could have verified that before he made the statement. A person who was not a friend of the Civil Service Act must have prompted the suggestion, and my hon. friend used it. As a matter of fact the following is what took place, because I inquired of the commission about the matter in order to verify the facts. The applicants for this position were orally examined by Mr. F. V. Moffatt, superintendent of Lights of the Department of Marine, Quebec, and the Reverend Brother Germain, Director—not janitor—of the Christian Brothers' Commercial school, Quebec, as the commission's representative and a representative of the Canadian Legion. It was a fairly good body of examiners, as the result shows. What was the result? The applicants were rated on their experience, intelligence, personal qualifications and physical fitness, and as a result of the ratings Mr. J. J. Kiley, a returned soldier with extensive experience as mechanic and fitter, was selected for the appointment and has been found by the department to be satisfactory in every way. A certificate in favour of this gentleman was furnished prior to the examination by Mr. B. J. Kaine, marine agent at Quebec.

That disposes of the pleasant little canard with reference to the janitor of St. Patrick's church or any other church in Quebec.

The hon. member also cast ridicule upon the present method of appointing postmasters and submitted—imagine an intelligent member of the house doing so!—that a member of a constituency is better fitted than the Civil Service Commission to appoint postmasters. What are the facts? We all know from our personal experience the pressure that is brought to bear upon us from every quarter. We know very well that sincere and hardworking individuals, meeting hard times, will come and say: Look here, Garland or Jones or Bennett, I am up against it; my crop has failed this year; my family is growing up; I have to have some money; I am tired of the farm anyway and I would like a job as a postmaster or a boiler mechanic or something else; cannot you get me into the service? The pressure is unrelenting, persistent under the patronage system. The average member has little idea of the qualifications required in a postmaster, and if he has the giving of the appointment will on many occasions give it to a friend without regard to his qualifications. But what is the position under the merit system? Let us say that under the merit system a vacancy has been created or has occurred. The position is advertised. The people in that district may apply. Applications are sent in. An examination is held by the post office inspector of the district. This gentleman is a man who has worked himself up in that branch of the civil service until his decisions are certainly entitled to be regarded as having some authority and weight. He gives the applicants a thorough examination in regard to the following qualifications:

1. Training and experience.
2. Personal qualifications.
3. Standing in the community.
4. The location and accommodation he is willing to offer for the post office.

The fourth is a technical qualification. The post office inspector then rates the applicants in the order of merit and submits the list to Ottawa. The Civil Service Commission then verifies the facts as set forth, especially with regard to qualifications and soldier preference, and having verified the facts, awards the position. That is an infinitely preferable situation for the sake of both the member himself and the whole service, to throwing the outside service, including postmasters, into the hands of the distributors of the old type of political patronage.

The method adopted by the Civil Service Commission in connection with outside appointments, technical or otherwise, is to appoint a local examining board, one or more of whom shall be representative directly of the commission. For example, supposing an architect is required, let us say in Winnipeg. This is a technical position. What is done in such a case? A board is appointed consisting of a local architect, a man well known in his profession, the district architect of the Department of Public Works and a third architect. Such a board is certainly far more capable than a member of parliament to pass upon applications for a position of that kind. I might not know the qualifications of an architect; in fact I am quite free to admit I would not. This bill takes no recognition of that; it would exclude the entire outside service from the Civil Service Commission and throw it once more into the hands of patronage. I wonder if hon. members know what that means? Before I tell them what it means, let me make this citation to the hon. member. He called in as witnesses on his behalf, but he did not show how they were witnesses, the Béique report and the Malcolm report. Both of these reports come out stubbornly and definitely for the merit system. The Béique report states:

> Your committee is convinced that the method of appointment and promotion by competition (usually known as the merit system) is preferable, in every way, to advancement by favour or influence. In support of this principle may be cited the findings of a number of committees, extracts from which will be found in the appendix to this report.

This bill is certainly not following out the Béique report in that regard. Then the Malcolm report has this to say:

> Your committee is of the opinion that the two fundamental principles of the Civil Service Act are the merit system and the system of appointment by competitive examination, and that both these principles must be preserved.

Again I ask my hon. friend to substantiate his claim that this bill is modeled after either or both of these reports. It was a ridiculous assertion and had no foundation in fact. The passing of this bill would throw the whole civil service of Canada back to the period of 1908 and you would again have the same old struggle against the hordes of patronage until you established a worth while, businesslike civil service act. Do not let me be misunderstood. I believe there is incorrect administration of the present act; I am not satisfied with it. Sufficient has come to my attention in the last three or four years to convince me that the government is on the right track when it proposes a committee of investigation. But that is an entirely different thing from passing a bill to sabotage the entire merit principle. I am utterly against the bill and am absolutely in favour of an investigation. This bill should be defeated and the committee appointed. We can then, as a result of the committee's findings, determine what amendments, if any, are necessary to the Civil Service Act, and what reorganization of the Civil Service Commission is necessary if a reorganized commission is decided upon.

Secondly, this bill will radically alter the whole method of promotion. It will leave in the hands of the ministers and deputy ministers—and in their hands alone, mark you—the whole power of promotion even within the inside service. Imagine what a hopeless position the whole service would be in if it is to be again subject to the miserable, petty, personal elements which prevailed for so many years before the Civil Service Act came into force.

Lastly, but among the most important of all considerations to which I direct the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, the passing of this bill will almost completely destroy the effectiveness of the returned soldier preference in respect of at least thirty thousand positions. Why do I say that? This bill does not say that the returned soldier preference shall be abolished, but it does exclude from the operation of the Civil Service Act, under which the soldier preference has existed, the entire outside service, including also, by modification, the merit system with respect to the inside service. What has happened that would justify my statement that this would mean almost the entire destruction of the returned soldier preference? That is a point upon which I wish to dwell; for I am satisfied that no hon. gentleman opposite, on being acquainted with the facts and faced with the actual conditions that will arise, will support this bill. I therefore press this particular point upon them in view of their protestations in the past.

The Veteran, the official organ of the returned soldiers, some few years ago made an analysis into the operation of the soldier preference in respect of positions excluded from the operation of the act. Hon. members of this house who were here in past years will recollect that the late administration, much to its discredit and much to my disappointment and over my adverse vote and speech, did exclude from the operation of the Civil Service Act some 18,000 odd positions. More than that, 12,000 positions were excluded from the operation of the act in one order in council alone. The Veteran decided to make an examination, and they found out this, and published it in the form of two tables. The first table shows the number of male appointments to the civil service by the Civil Service Commission for the years from 1920 to 1924, both inclusive, as follows:

Year	Veteran percentage of total appointments
1922	53·18

Average percentage of veteran appointments under the Civil Service Act, 53·97 per cent.

Now take the positions that were excluded from the operation of the act. The Veteran published a table showing appointments during 1924 to positions exempted from the Civil Service Act as reported to the Civil Service Commission. It is as follows:

Non-veterans	7,116
Women	313
Total	8,262

Percentage of veterans—	Per cent
Of males	10·434
Of total	10·033

So there you have a reduction from 53.97 per cent to 10.03 per cent. It is a fair contention, then, with the evidence in front of us, to state that this bill will largely destroy the effectiveness of the returned soldier preference.

When this bill was up the last time, I referred to the attitude of the Conservative party in regard thereto, much to its credit. The great battery of Conservatism for this bill was Sir Robert Borden, and to him stands the credit for having ultimately forced the issue in this house. I think it was in 1907 that he secured the acquiescence of the entire party in the Halifax platform, which included the following:

A thorough and complete reformation of the laws relating to the civil service, so that future appointments shall be made by an independent commission acting upon the report of examiners after competitive examination.

Speaking on that occasion he said:

I need not dwell on the importance of this. Of necessity some appointments must be left to the responsibility of the executive. Appointments to the judicial bench and certain other high public offices are of this character, and the people have it in their power to compel an honourable and decent performance of this great public duty. There are also many minor appointments which could not for the present be brought within such a system.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

But for the rest, I prefer a competitive system of appointment to the present partisan system.

Three-fourths of the time of members supporting a government is occupied in dealing with matters of patronage. Party patronage and party service have more weight than character and capacity. The public service is cumbered with useless officials. I am convinced that we shall perform a great public duty by establishing in this country that system which prevails in Great Britain under which a member of parliament has practically no voice in or control over any appointment to the civil service.

That became the fixed policy of the Conservative party. Sir Robert Borden says that the Halifax platform became the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, which was thus committed to the principle of civil service reform upon the lines above set forth.

Later on, not satisfied with the general announcement of the fact, the late Sir George Foster rose in the house in the year following, 1908, and moved the following resolution:

That the civil service system of Canada should be based on merit and character alone and all the appointments thereto should be made from candidates whose competency has been established through open competitive examinations conducted under a non-partisan civil service commission.

On that occasion Sir Robert Borden said:

I again repeated my conviction that appointments, both in the inside and outside service, should be based upon results obtained by competitive examination and that the system prevailing in Great Britain should be adopted in Canada.

So the issue was joined. But the battle continued, and Sir Robert Borden said that it was impossible to secure the passage of this effective legislation which we have in the Civil Service Act so long as only one party was in office. It was not until the Union government was formed in the war years that it became possible in 1918 to put over the act. Now only a few years later, comparatively speaking, we have the proposal from the Conservative ranks to destroy the splendid work of all the preceding years and to render almost impotent the Civil Service Act.

Mr. DUFF: What did the Borden government do after its return in 1911?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That was a long time before 1918, before the passing of the Civil Service Act. I have no doubt that my hon. friend is bitten by the same dog that is now biting those people over there. He has not the opportunity of patronage, whatever little there is in it.

Mr. DUFF: That is not an answer.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): So long as the party system continues in this country it is essential for the character and efficiency of men in the public service that men of all political parties shall have nothing to say as to appointments to the civil service. Both appointments and promotions should depend upon the merit system, should depend solely upon the merit and capacity of the candidates who offer themselves. If I had the time at my disposal I could continue quoting from the eloquent speeches of the great leaders of the Conservative party. Right Hon. Arthur Meighen made some of the most pronounced and courageous statements in regard to the maintenance of the merit system. The present Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) made an eloquent plea in support of the merit system. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) no later than 1928 made an eloquent speech on the same subject. Speaking in this house on May 8, 1928, he said:

It—

Referring to a resolution aimed against the act.

—means the recurrence of the patronage system, which should not be tolerated in this country. It is not conducive to good service or to the public weal. While there have been many defects in connection with the administration of the civil service the fact is that it is a great advance over anything we have had heretofore in this country. We protest against any effort being made to return to the old condition of patronage.

I echo his words to-day and protest against any attempt, either through private bill, resolution or committee of this house, to return to the old days of patronage.

Not content with that, the Prime Minister —of course at that time he was not Prime Minister—speaking on May 16, 1928, is reported at page 3221 of Hansard as follows:

I do not propose to trespass upon the time of the house further than to say that it is essential that we should maintain in its integrity the principle of appointments to office being made by the Civil Service Commission.

Could anything be clearer or more sharply defined than that? The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is reported at page 3169 of Hansard as follows:

Undoubtedly the patronage system had more evil attached to it than merit. Appointments under the patronage system are made for the purpose—I think I can put it simply and plainly —of giving jobs to those who are in favour of the ministry of the day, whatever ministry it is. . . . I am opposed to this bill to the extent that it departs from the principle of appointment by the Civil Service Commission.

I think it is only fair to give the statement, one which is certainly well worth giving, of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). Hansard of May 15, 1928, at page 3173, contains the following:

Because of this strong public opinion in favour of the merit system under the Civil Service Commission, I think the minister should hesitate long before going back to a system which, rightly or wrongly, has become discredited. On the whole I believe the Civil Service Commission have given the country reasonably satisfactory service, and whatever faults they may have—and no doubt no commission is perfect—those faults are few and slight compared with the condition of affairs under the old system.

I thoroughly agree with the minister's statement, and sincerely hope his views have not changed since then. I hope he and his colleagues, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Prime Minister, and his colleague in the Senate, the leader of that respectable body. will reject utterly the proposal of the hon. member for Dorchester.

Again, time limits me; had I time I could quote resolutions piling in to myself and other members opposed to this bill, coming from every branch of the civil service in the Dominion of Canada. I could quote reports of commissions and committees which have been appointed within the last fifteen or twenty years, every one of which was opposed to the very principle embodied in this bill. Mr. Speaker, if this house does itself justice —justice not only to its own conscience and intelligence, but to the cause of the civil service in general—it will reject the bill. I purpose voting against it.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) mentioned my name as one member to sit on a committee which, among its other duties, would have to consider this bill. At once the house must recognize the very difficult position in which other members of that committee and myself are placed. According to the interpretation of the rules of the house, if I vote for the second reading of this bill I shall have committed myself to the principle of it. If I vote against the second reading and the second reading should carry and the bill be referred to the committee of which I am a member, I should be placed in the same embarrassing position. Therefore at this stage I cannot address my remarks to the merits, if any, or the demerits of the bill now before the house. I may add, however, that if ever there was a bill—I do not think I am saying too much—which should have been used for the purpose of establishing the precedent which was established yesterday, this is the bill.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two observations concerning the bill now before the house. I believe every member ought to be in favour of maintaining an efficient civil service. The question arises as to how we are likely to effect that end which, I think, ought to be the object of every member of parliament. In my view it is impossible to have an efficient civil service if we revert to a system of patronage and fill vacancies in the civil service at the request or bidding of members. Consequently I feel constrained to oppose the measure now before the house.

At this time I am wondering who is asking for the change outlined by the bill. I have yet to find from any source whatsoever any indication as to who is seeking these changes. I do know, however, that from many sources throughout the length and breadth of Canada there is a strong feeling of resentment and opposition to this measure.

I am one who believes in the merit system; I realize fully that the moment patronage creeps into the system of appointments merit goes by the board. I believe employers and employees recognize that in the filling of vacancies there are two principles to be maintained, namely merit and seniority. In all my experiences as a public representative I have always attempted, when I have had to deal with the filling of vacancies, to be guided by those two factors. As a rule one does not go far astray if he observes those principles. On more than one occasion when I stood as a candidate for public office I have taken the stand that I refused to act as an employment agent for my constituents. I have refused to approach department heads asking for employment for those who happened to be within the boundaries of my constituency. I am of opinion that from a political point of view, the handling of patronage by members of the house does far more harm than good. The obtaining of a few privileges for a constituent does not necessarily make friends for a member. I have found that members who have been able to obtain positions for a favoured few have, as a result of their activities, made more enemies than friends.

One of the chief reasons which has prompted me to rise in my place this evening was a statement made by the hon. member who introduced this measure to the house. He said he would like to have an extension of the patronage now existing, and made reference to the appointment of postmasters as one reason for a change in the Civil Service Act. I have not had as long an experience in this house as have some other hon. members. One incident however came under my observation to which at this time I feel constrained to refer. The hon. member who introduced the measure urged that if appointments were left to the discretion of hon. members of the house—which, of course, would mean hon. members on the government side—better appointments would be the result. To-night there occurs to my mind one appointment which was made and to which I shall make special reference at this juncture. Through a vacancy which occurred in the city of Winnipeg an appointment was recommended by a member of the party in power. For obvious reasons I shall not refer to any names. I learned that a certain gentleman was to be appointed to a responsible position, and to my amazement I was informed that the recommendation made by a Conservative, was in favour of a man who had a criminal record and whose family's record was no better than his own. This man was actually recommended for a responsible position.

Mr. McGIBBON: The appointment would come under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. HEAPS: No, it did not. I should like to amend the act so that we may obviate things of this character. To my astonishment the appointment was made, although people in the district had signed a petition in protest and transmitted it to the minister, and I myself protested emphatically the objectionable nature of the appointment. I told the parties responsible for the appointment, "I do not mind your appointing a Conservative to the office, I expect you to do it, but in the name of decency and common sense appoint an honest Conservative."

May I point out further that the individual so appointed was handling His Majesty's mail. A few days after the appointment his son was released from the penitentiary, and very soon afterwards complaints came from my constituents that this person was also handling the mail. I protested to the responsible minister, but I could not make the slightest impression. Later when I came to Ottawa I called on him and told him that unless something was done to cancel the appointment I would feel obliged to raise the matter on the floor of the house when his estimates were under consideration. Then I received a promise that action would be taken. What happened? On the first of October last a change was made—the daughter was put in her father's place. Now the house is being requested by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) to extend the patronage system in order that we may get a more efficient civil service! At the time the protest to which I have referred was being made against the appointment the chief of police of Winnipeg was asked for the man's record; this was submitted to the minister but nothing could be done to cancel the appointment. I said to the local postmaster, "Go down to the police station and make inquiries in regard to the character of this man." He did so, and was told, "That man's reputation stinks to the sky." Yet he was appointed to this responsible position in the city.

We have been told by the mover of this bill that the Civil Service Commission is at the bar of public opinion. Nothing of the kind, Mr. Speaker. What is now at the bar of public opinion is the action of members of this house in regard to this bill. Are we going to return to the patronage system, or shall we put more power into the hands of the Civil Service Commission. If the personnel of the commission is unsatisfactory, then it does not seem to me that we have to repeal the act; the logical thing to do is to change the personnel so that any defects of the commission may be remedied.

I move, seconded by Mr. Coote:

That the word "now" be left out, and the words "this day six months" added at the end of the question.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a certain confusion between the administration of the Civil Service Act by the Civil Service Commission and the object of this bill. That reform should be made in the operation of the act and perhaps certain amendments incorporated in order to make it more effective I think is conceded on all sides. But to adopt the principle of this bill and revert to the old patronage system would be a step backward that would stamp the parliament of Canada very unfavourably in the eyes of all civilized nations that have reformed their civil service system. I know something of the operation of the civil service in England, and I think there is unanimity of opinion among all public men there as well as among all other people that civil service reform has been one of the greatest political and administrative reforms adopted in that country in the last century.

With regard to the outside service, the withdrawal of which from the Civil Service Commission is the main object of this bill, to a certain extent I agree with the member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon). No doubt the idea of giving, theoretically,—I insist on the word and I am going to explain its application —of giving, theoretically, authority to three gentlemen in Ottawa to make appointments to every petty office, such as the postmastership in a small village or the caretakership of a small public building, is preposterous, because they have to rely upon somebody to advise them; and that is what they do. The idea that these three gentlemen could always appoint the proper men to every small post office from Sydney to Prince Rupert is out of the question. But to say that these appointments should be handed back to members of parliament is something on which I cannot agree with my hon. friend. He says that the member representing the constituency is better informed than any other man with regard to the qualifications of persons for such appointments. Well, if by that he means any member representing a constituency it may be so. But then is he prepared to recommend to the government, and are his friends who uphold his views ready to recommend to any government, that they take the advice of every member of the house, to whatever party he belongs, to the same degree as they would take the advice of their own friends? Maybe he could secure such a promise verbally, but human nature being what it is, he knows very well that in every constituency represented by an independent or an opposition member there would be an uproar among his own supporters if that promise were redeemed; they would complain that the patronage was in the hands of the opposition. I have found that to be the case time and again. I will not insist on that aspect of the question.

The suggestion I make is this. I think all those who would stick to the principle of the Civil Service Act, who think that we should not revert to the evil of patronage, should vote against the bill. But at the same time that does not prevent the committee proposed by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) going into all the aspects of the situation, and if they think proper, they might recommend certain amendments to the act in order to give an opportunity in every constituency for people at large, municipal councillors or others, to advise the responsible heads of the department in the appointment of petty officers. I would have no objection to that. Certainly some changes should be made.

May I say in that regard that the patronage system has not proven effective, even from the point of view of my hon. friend. Take the narrow point of view as stated by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps)—and that is very old history—members of parliament have suffered much more by the exercise of patronage than they have gained from it. Naturally when they have just won an election they feel the elation of victory, and they like to show a little of the spirit of domination in their county; but that does not last long. As was stated by Mr. Louis Frechette, the poet—he was a member of parliament for a short time—for every appointment recommended by him to the government he made one ungrateful person and a hundred others furious against him. He never gained anything thereby. But that is a small aspect of the question.

From the purely administrative point of view my opinion is that much more authority and freedom of action should be left to the permanent heads of departments, not to the ministers. I think ministers themselves are much too bothered with questions of patronage as it is. They should have enough confidence in their deputy ministers and the heads of the various branches of their departments to rely upon them in all that concerns promotions and appointments from a list prepared by the Civil Service Commission, based on the technical merits of the candidates.

That is with regard to the inside service. As far as the outside service is concerned I may tell the house that the method I generally adopted, even in the old days, was to inquire from the people of the community which place was best suited for a post office, and what person was most capable of rendering service to the people. I recommended the person designated by the people of the community, without regard to politics. I would find it hard to say, of all the recommendations I have made, whether they concerned Liberals or Conservatives, for the very good reason that most of them vote for me no matter what may be their politics.

However that is beside the question. I repeat that a greater opportunity should be given the people concerned in local appointments to express their views, and those views should be accepted by the department. Much more responsibility should be given the permanent heads of departments, just as in large corporations like the Canadian Pacific railway, the president and board of directors do not concern themselves all the time with the appointment of employees. They rely upon certain responsible heads of various departments to choose their employees according to their requirements, and the employees are promoted gradually under the two standards indicated by the hon. member for North Winnipeg, that is, seniority and merit. Then they are largely protected through their labour organizations. Now that the civil service has organized itself on a proper basis, some suggestions of that kind might be studied by the committee, and I think the object of my good friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) might be served. I know him well enough to be sure that his object is not simply to exercise political patronage. Then the committee could report to the house and the house might take action, of course under the guidance of the government, without having to accept the principle of this bill to which, for my part, I am utterly opposed.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the time available for the discussion of this bill, scarcely five minutes, will hardly permit any detailed analysis, and I do not purpose to attempt to do so at this time. Lest the time elapse before I have an opportunity of stating my view of the bill I shall reverse the ordinary procedure and, before giving my reasons, state that I am opposed to the principle of the bill and I shall vote against it. It is with some regret that I find myself holding the view that I cannot support a bill introduced by my good friend and colleague the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), but there is a principle involved of very wide application.

The bill divides itself into two parts. One provision is that all civil service appointments, outside of appointments at Ottawa, shall be removed from the operation of the Civil Service Act. As to the remainder, that is to say, the appointments to the service at Ottawa, even in those cases the right of the commission to make such appointments is very considerably curtailed.

With regard to outside appointments, if this bill were enacted as introduced, what would be the practical effect? It would then devolve upon the member for each constituency, with such advisers as he may gather around him in the way of an executive, to recommend from time to time persons to fill vacancies. It would not be complimentary to other hon. members of this house to urge that, from whatever constituency they may come, they would not use good judgment in such matters or that they would not be competent to make good selections. The dangers from that point of view would seem largely theoretical. I believe that an hon. member faced with the duty of recommending a person for any position in his constituency would be guided by the merit of the individual who might be recommended. It may be urged that it is only natural that a member would nominate someone from his own political party. Perhaps that is quite true, but as I am quite prepared to concede that a Liberal member representing a constituency can find among his followers men worthy of being nominated for positions of honour and trust, so I think they will concede that we on this side of the house can find such men among our own supporters.

Therefore it is not primarily the question of appointments in respect to which I am apprehensive, but it is the effect upon the service itself. If the political be the first consideration in the matter of appointments, when you come to a change of government the supporters of the member then representing the constituency in question, remembering that certain appointments were made first because of political considerations, will demand, and press that demand with considerable force, that, the new government having the right to exercise discretion and make a change, the change be made. In very large measure the principle will apply that "those who live by the sword shall die by the sword."

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Guthrie for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heenan.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): When the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was telling of an incident that occurred in my own constituency in connection with patronage under relief work being carried on by the federal government. I was induced to refer to this because of the remarks of the Minister of Labour with regard to patronage in another district.

A grant of some $6,300 was made for the construction of a wharf at White Rock, and when I visited the job I found that the names of the men employed had been furnished by the district engineer. On making inquiries of the district engineer I was informed that he had been given these names by the Conservative association. Despite the fact that he had been notified, as hon. members were notified, that in all work carried on for the relief of unemployment, federal or otherwise, no discrimination was to be shown, he had deliberately gone to the Conservative organization and obtained the names of the men who were working on that federal relief job. On his own word he confessed it. I asked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) to take serious note of this, because patronage may be bad enough in ordinary times but it becomes terrible in times of stress when only those belonging to the party are given a chance to participate in the grant.

I have just received another telegram from the municipality of Burnaby. I received one on Monday last and again to-day, and before quoting them I will state that they are contrary to the advice given to me by the department. I was told that in connection with the $2,500,000 sent to the province of British Columbia, vouchers would not be required to be O.K'd before payment was made to the municipalities. I transmitted that information to the municipality which immediately got in touch with Victoria, when the information was given that such was not the case. The telegram which I received on Monday reads as follows:

> Total amount spent on direct relief to January 31, $65,844, total payment received to date, $32,681. Cost of direct relief shared equally by municipality, province and dominion under unemployment relief acts, 1930 and 1931.

The telegram continues:

> Total expenditure on unemployment relief works, $341,000; total of vouchers already submitted to Victoria, $310,935. Total payments received to date, $132,125.

They were advised that Victoria was waiting for funds from Ottawa before paying out any money. The telegram I received to-day reads as follows:

> McGeough advises that Victoria has received one million dollars. Phoned Deputy Minister of Finance at Victoria who states he can only pay provincial and municipality's share; is still awaiting authority from Ottawa to pay Dominion's share. Instructions received by Victoria forbid them to release Dominion's share till Ottawa passes the vouchered accounts and issues an order for payment. Believe this is the cause of conflicting reports. Payment will be held up indefinitely until this is cleared up.

I would direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Labour to the seriousness of this situation. As long as these conflicting reports exist, the buck will be passed from one government to the other and great distress will be caused to the municipalities. Conditions are somewhat similar in other districts. Last week I received a telegram from the city of Fernie, in the constituency of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), advising that similar conditions exist there. Other municipalities are feeling the stress of this unemployment problem, and I would like to quote a portion of a telegram sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on January 27. This telegram shows that the municipalities had an idea that the government had agreed to pay over the money as soon as the agreements were signed by Hon. Senator Robertson. The telegram, in part, reads as follows:

We now find municipalities in desperate circumstances owing to work programs being curtailed so that now relief work has practically ceased and municipalities appear to have no alternative but direct relief. We now apply to you to have work relief programs as originally presented and agreed to by Senator Robertson put into force so that we can have work completed as therein laid out. To cease unemployment relief work at this time will not only cause hardship to unemployed but will be uneconomical as many works would be left unfinished. We are distinctly opposed to spending municipal moneys on direct relief as no returns to taxpayers accrue. Other municipalities not included in previous work programs have to care for local cases and want some consideration given at this time to their requirements, and to make conditions worse, provincial road work has ceased. Municipal taxpayers are in no position to finance any undertakings to take care of these situations as the ability of taxpayers to pay was fully demonstrated last year when in many municipalities only sixty per cent of 1931 tax levy was paid. Any additional increase will mean many will lose their home.

Union of British Columbia Municipalities.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate until the last speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) wandered away from his own district and encroached upon one of my municipalities. Speaking in support of this motion of want of confidence in the government, the hon. member cited the case of a political friend of his, the reeve of a municipality in his district, who has had some trouble in obtaining assistance in the matter of unemployment relief from both the federal and provincial governments. I listened carefully for forty minutes to the hon. gentleman, and after hearing him read many letters and telegrams I came to the conclusion that this was entirely a misunderstanding. The hon. member mentioned a municipality in Fraser Valley constituency and referred to it as being in the same plight as this almost notorious place, Burnaby, of which we have been hearing so much this session. I have received a letter from the reeve of Coquitlam, in which he draws to my attention some trouble which he had had but which proved to be a misunderstanding. This letter is addressed to me, and the first two paragraphs read as follows:

As a result of a meeting with the hon. Mr. Bruhn,—

Mr. Bruhn is the Minister of Public Works in the provincial government. The letter continues:

—at his room in the Vancouver hotel at the time of the visit of the Hon. G. Robertson, federal Minister of Labour, I was made to understand that our municipal proposal under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, amounting to $34,800 would meet with approval on the basis of 50 per cent federal contribution, including labour and material, and 25 per cent provincial contribution for labour only.

On the strength of this verbal assurance we submitted a money by-law to our ratepayers for the balance, for their approval.

I took up this matter with Mr. Hereford, the dominion director, and his letter in reply explains this case. It is addressed to myself and reads:

I am directed by the Minister of Labour to acknowledge yours of February 10 regarding unemployment relief matters for the district of Coquitlam.

The agreement with the province provides for an expenditure of $19,000 for Coquitlam to which the Dominion government contributes 50 per cent.

With regard to the reeve's statement that at the time of the visit of the Hon. Senator Robertson to Vancouver, the reeve was made to understand that the amount which the Dominion government would contribute would be $34,800, I am quite satisfied that the Senator did not intend to convey any such impression as the Senator knew quite well and invariably stated that all submissions were subject to the approval of council.

The undersigned accompanied Senator Robertson on his trip to British Columbia last summer and I have been present during hundreds of interviews, both at Ottawa and all over Canada, and observed that the Senator invariably made it clear that however much he might personally favour a proposal, and however far he was willing to go in recommending it to the government, it was always subject to the approval of council. I cannot, therefore, understand why the reeve should have submitted a money by-law on the basis of what he himself describes as a verbal assurance which is apparently not implemented by the actual agreement.

That explains fully the case of Coquitlam as well as Burnaby, because we find on the tenth of this month the hon. member for New Westminster moving the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the situation that has arisen in the municipality of Burnaby in the province of British Columbia where hundreds who have been employed on unemployment relief work have not, as he states, received wages or payment for work so performed. In the course of his remarks he points out that they had visited Victoria, had waited on the representatives of the federal government and had certain understandings that a specific sum of money would be forthcoming. The hon. gentleman moved the adjournment of the house on the tenth of this month. The other day he read a telegram stating that these conditions were still serious; that nothing had been done for Burnaby. I have under my hand a clipping from a paper published in the hon.

gentleman's constituency, containing a special despatch from one of the districts in Burnaby under date of February 8, or two days before the hon. member moved the adjournment of the house. This clipping is headed:

Burnaby gets $16,000 cheque from Victoria.

That is two days before he told us in the house that those men were still without their pay; that their wages had not been paid, and he tried to compel the federal government to take some action in the matter. This clipping from Edmonds, which is dated February 8, or two days before he moved the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, states:

With the receipt from Victoria of a cheque for $16,000, the Burnaby financial situation has eased somewhat. Wages due to municipal workers of the outside gangs and arrears due to relief workers were paid this morning. This afternoon Treasurer R. Bolton will go into the matter of paying January salaries to the municipal hall staff and teachers. He is of the opinion that with the money received from the government and advance payment of taxes, there will be sufficient funds to make these payments.

Mr. REID: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BARBER: The hon. gentleman also represents another municipality. The reeve of Burnaby, as I said before, is a very strong personal and political friend of the hon. member for New Westminster. In this case we have another—the reeve of Surrey. This is under date of January 9.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What paper is that?

Mr. BARBER: A Westminster paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which one?

Mr. BARBER: The Columbia. There is only one that I know of. It has supported my hon. friend on many occasions. This is from a correspondent at Cloverdale in the hon. gentleman's district, and this is what Reeve Brown says:

Surrey did well despite depression.
Splendid financial report is presented by Reeve Brown.
Reeve Brown, who is a Liberal, absolved the provincial government of all blame in connection with the unemployment relief trouble. There were two sides to every question, he said, and fair judgment must be passed.

That is the situation as regards Burnaby. I do not know that I have anything further to say in that regard; in fact, that covers almost all the hon. gentleman's remarks in his forty minutes. There is just the question of the general situation in British Columbia. I am not going to undertake to discuss the details of that situation.

Mr. MUNN: The hon. gentleman knows better.

Mr. BARBER: The hon. gentleman says I know better. I have been long enough in the house to know this is not the place to thresh out the domestic or other little troubles of one of the provinces. The hon. members for New Westminster and Vancouver Centre spent some time in a provincial by-election in British Columbia and perhaps it is on this account they claimed a scalp for their belt, but the whole result was they were successful in returning a Liberal in a strong Liberal constituency.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By two to one.

Mr. BARBER: The situation is altogether too serious for one to indulge in the cheap political claptrap that our hon. friends have been handing out in the house on more than one occasion. The financial situation as it exists in British Columbia and other provinces is not what we would desire. The finances of our province as well as that of others, of the dominion as a whole and of other countries, have been adversely affected by the world-wide economic depression. The people of British Columbia will agree that the present financial troubles in that province do not all lie at the door of the Conservative party. We had a Liberal party in power in that province for twelve years and to a great extent they are responsible for the financial situation just as the former Liberal government in the federal parliament were responsible for the railway situation that we have at the present time. As I said, we had a Liberal government in British Columbia for twelve years, and it is interesting to recall that during the twelve years they were in office we had only two small surpluses aggregating $452,124, compared with ten deficits aggregating $17,109,399, or a net deficit during the period, of $16,657,275. The expenditures during that period rose from $9,349,000 per annum in 1917-18, to $26,580,400 in 1928-29.

Mr. MUNN: Tell us about the crowd in power in British Columbia now.

Mr. BARBER: The people do not and will not forget for a long time the government that was in power in British Columbia for twelve years. They increased the public debt in that province from $25,521,860 in 1917 to $117,452,558 in 1928. That is the record of the Liberal government in that province, and during prosperous times. While any business man or business government would have made some provision for a rainy day, they kept on with their extravagant expenditures, their great land deals, and if I wished to trespass upon the time of the house to go into provincial matters, hon. members would be astonished to hear of some of the deals that were put over by the Liberal government during those days.

Mr. MUNN: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question? It is not a political one. Knowing the situation as well as he does and as well as I know it in regard to unemployment in British Columbia, does he contend that everything concerning the unemployment situation in that province is being properly conducted?

Mr. BARBER: I think it is the opinion of the people of British Columbia that the situation in the province is being honestly handled, and that it would not be very much improved if the previous administration were in office, having regard to their record. But I am not going into that question because it is being investigated at the present time in the legislature of the province of British Columbia. That is the place to air the whole question. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) says no, that this is the place. But here he cannot meet those directly responsible for the situation. Let him go on the platform with those men who are carrying on that work in British Columbia, rather than take advantage of their absence from this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have done so many a time. I did it a month ago and will do it again.

Mr. BARBER: I have corrected the statements my hon. friend made with regard to Burnaby, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member has been more or less misled by the reeve of that place, a friend of his, who I understand, according to the press, is a real example of a one-man government. The council of Burnaby called a meeting the other day and insisted upon appointing a committee to run the unemployment relief work rather than leave it all in the hands of the reeve. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the hon. member will take kindly the criticism I have offered.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Before going into details of the administration of the unemployment relief money in the province of New Brunswick and especially in the county I have the honour to represent, I wish to refer briefly to the speech made this afternoon by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). I note that he claimed that the unemployment relief system as now administered has proved a huge success, and he quoted figures to show that some three million days' work had been given to the unemployed in Canada. He gave the number of unemployed receiving the opportunity of doing this relief work as 300,000 odd. But if we dissect those figures, Mr. Speaker, we will find that they mean on an average 23 days' work for 300,000 or 350,000 unemployed, or if you place it on a yearly basis of employment, it means the giving of work to only 25,000 out of 350,000 unemployed, and that at a cost of $70,000,000 to the Dominion of Canada, to the provinces, to the municipalities and to the two railways which took part in providing unemployment relief work. If that is a huge success in administering unemployment relief under the act that was passed in September, 1930, then I would like to know what success really means in that line.

Having dealt with that phase of the minister's argument let me now refer to other parts of his speech. He produced evidence in an attempt to prove that the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) was not telling the truth in connection with the administration of the unemployment relief fund in northern Ontario. But if you will carefully examine the proof, Mr. Speaker, which the hon. gentleman produced you will find that it was all negative evidence. Not one individual could the minister produce of his own personal knowledge to prove the contrary of that which the ex-Minister of Labour had alleged in this house. I was astonished to think that a gentleman occupying the position which the Minister of Labour does at the bar could find no other evidence but negative evidence to substantiate his refutation of the charges made by the ex-Minister of Labour. Negative evidence has no weight in court, and it should have no weight in parliament. The strongest proof that the minister could produce in refutation of what the ex-Minister of Labour had stated was quotations from a newspaper, the editor of which was a defeated Conservative candidate in the last provincial election in Ontario, and of course, being a Conservative attempting to defend a Conservative administration at Ottawa he would not be in any way biased; we can readily understand that. The attempt made by the minister to belittle the ex-Minister of Labour and to lessen the force of the charges of mismanagement of the situation by quoting the evidence to which I have just referred will not in any way lessen the esteem in which my colleague the ex-Minister of Labour is held by every workingman in this dominion. I think the Minister of Labour should have hesitated before violating the rules of the house in quoting from newspapers in an attempt to prove that statements made by an hon. member on the floor of this house were not in accordance with the truth. But he was so far lost for argument that he had to violate the rules in his attempt to prove that the ex-Minister had not stated to the house the facts as they were.

Let me now deal in some detail with the administration of the unemployment relief fund in the county which I have the honour to represent. I shall discuss that question under two heads: first, the expenditure of public money for unemployment relief purposes under the federal Minister of Public Works; second, the expenditure of unemployment relief money in cooperation with the provincial authorities in New Brunswick.

In taking up the first division of the subject, the expenditure of relief money under the direct supervision of the Minister of Public Works, I wish here publicly to pay my compliments to him and to thank him for the interest he displayed when complaints were laid before him as to the manner in which public money was being expended in the county of Gloucester. I want to thank him for the very determined stand he took when those complaints were laid before him to see that there would be no political discrimination, to see that those who got the money were really in need of it and that it would not be earned in the county of Gloucester by men who had bank accounts and did not require relief work to see them through the hardships of the winter.

On the 24th of October last year I happened to be in Ottawa. Previous to that I had visited certain of the works being carried on in my county, and after seeing the work I came to the minister and made my complaints. Why was I prompted to make those complaints? Because from personal investigation and personal knowledge I learned that the money voted by this parliament to be expended under the direct supervision of the federal Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) to help the unemployment situation was not being expended in the manner the minister and the government had promised.

I found that not only was the foreman of work at Grande Anse employed on the work but his two sons were working also. Within a gun-shot of where he and his two sons were working, unemployed were crying out for bread for their families, and could get nothing. When applications were made to that man by unemployed men who had nothing in their houses for their families to eat, his answer was, "You are on the wrong side of politics." I came here and complained to the Minister of Public Works, and as a result he issued from his office instructions to the district engineer in St. John to proceed not only to Grande Anse but to Petit Rocher and Caraquet, concerning all of which I had complained. Instructions were issued to the foremen in charge at those places that if they did not carry out the directions of the department they would be dismissed. A government engineer investigated and found that as far as Grande Anse was concerned my representations were well grounded. After his visit to Grande Anse conditions changed and those men who were not entitled to unemployment relief were put off the work and replaced by men in dire need of means to keep the wolf from the door.

The engineer was not as successful at Caraquet as he had been at Grande Anse. He visited Caraquet on Wednesday and found that wealthy fishermen, as the term goes in that section of the country, men who had money in the bank, were employed on relief work. He found that not one man working on the Caraquet wharf needed unemployment relief to keep him through the winter, but men who lived from hand to mouth had been refused work. The foreman promised that on the following Monday he would make a change, and would endeavour to comply with the regulations or instructions issued by the minister through the engineer. Monday arrived, but no change was made; Tuesday came and passed; Wednesday came and passed and no change was made. I reported the matter to the district engineer, who sent his assistant to Caraquet and found that the superintendent in charge was not carrying out instructions. As a result work was stopped, dismissals were made and the instructions of the minister complied with, when work was resumed. At this time I wish to thank the federal Minister of Public Works for his action.

An hon. MEMBER: That shows what a good government we have.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot say as much for my hon. friend across the way, the official government interrupter, who has said that the action of the minister shows what a good government they have. I say it shows the type of officials distributing the moneys this house voted; that is what it shows.

Mr. SPENCE: Those partisan officials belonged to your own county.

Mr. VENIOT: They were Conservatives, that is the worst of it.

Mr. SPENCE: They are all alike down there.

Mr. VENIOT: If they did not stand as well in public opinion as do my hon. friend and his associates from Ontario, I would pity them.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not think you ever will.

Mr. GOTT: There are 86 Conservative members in the legislature—

Mr. SPENCE: You are just playing politics the year round, that is all you are doing.

Mr. VENIOT: If my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Gott) would only attempt to control that large tongue of his which is wagged by such a small brain, he would be better off.

Mr. GOTT: Very clever, very clever.

Mr. VENIOT: I know it is clever; that is why it hurts so much. I said I had not as great a compliment to pay to the late federal Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) as I had to the federal Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart). To some extent I think the present Minister of Labour should bear the responsibility.

Mr. GORDON: In other words, prepare for the worst.

Mr. ST-PERE: Yes, the worst is yet to come.

Mr. VENIOT: I state from my place in this house and on my honour as a member that in the county of Gloucester the unemployment relief money during the progress of a by-election was made the greatest campaign fund which possibly could be used in any county.

I make that statement advisedly; I am prepared to stand by it, and if the government chooses to appoint a federal commission I shall be able to bring before such commission evidence to substantiate every word I have said.

I made complaints to the Minister of Labour, and on September 30, 1931, I received the following letter from Mr. Harry Hereford, the Dominion Director of Unemployment Relief:

In the absence of the Minister of Labour from Ottawa on official business, I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of September 24, in which you complain regarding political discrimination in connection with work being carried out on provincial highway near your home.

I have investigated this matter so far as I was able to with the details you furnished, and I am advised by the provincial authorities that an individual was appointed at Bathurst to register the unemployed. This individual worked in conjunction with the Poor Commissioner who is appointed, as you are no doubt aware, through the county council, and that the same method is being followed in Northumberland,— —and assurance is given that those needing employment most have been given work regardless of political or religious affiliation.

I do not know why he referred to Northumberland.

Who was the gentleman appointed to register the unemployed in the municipality of Gloucester? He was a man living in the town of Bathurst, having an office in an incorporated town which had nothing to do with a matter of unemployment relief. No man could enter the office for registration without having to take part in a discussion of the political situation. As to whether or not the individual received work depended greatly upon his comments along political lines.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. member know that of his own knowledge?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, "of his own knowledge."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You were not there; what you are stating would be only hearsay.

Mr. GOTT: You know a lot about Ontario, too.

Mr. VENIOT: I know nothing about Ontario, and I am only mentioning Ontario in reply to the interjections of my hon. friend —and I think I know enough about him to qualify those interjections as they should be. Now, sir, let me go one step further. On October 16 I sent this night message:

To Hon. Gideon Robertson,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa.

Doctor W. H. Coffyn, provincial government candidate in by-election now being held in Gloucester county publishes a call to the electors in which he makes the pretence that registration for unemployment relief comes through him as the government candidate. Speakers on government side do not hesitate to tell our people that the amount of relief money to be expended in this county depends upon the election of Dr. Coffyn. In many cases relief money is being earned by people who do not need it, and many who do need it badly are left in the cold. Relief money is being utilized as a vote getter and not as relief, and therefore I feel it my duty to enter a strong protest. The election takes place October twenty-sixth. A dirty canvass is being used that if Coffyn is defeated the relief work will be stopped. Has he any authority by which he can have relief work stopped in this county. Please wire me reply.

Mr. GORDON: May I ask the hon. gentleman who sent the telegram?

Mr. VENIOT: I did.

Mr. GORDON: Oh!

Mr. VENIOT: I knew the truth of what I was saying, every bit of it. I got no reply to that telegram one way or the other. What happened? On the first day of December—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stop.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, in order that the same privilege of debating this question may be accorded to me as to other members, I ask that you take the necessary action to establish peace and order, perhaps by expelling some of these members.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): Order.

Mr. VENIOT: Now, sir, I received no further word from the Minister of Labour until December 1, 1930. On that day there arrived in Bathurst two gentlemen, Mr. J. B. Carter and Mr. Trottier. They called on me at three o'clock in the afternoon and told me they had been instructed by the Minister of Labour to proceed to Gloucester county and investigate the relief work that had been carried on in that county, based on complaints that I had sent to the minister. I said to Mr. Carter, "It would have been far better had the minister sent you at the time I made the complaints. Then you would have found the people at work against whom I complained in my telegrams and letters, and you would have had first hand information." "Well," he said, "they did not send me then; I am here now." I went to my home and compiled five pages of complaints and submitted the original —this is a copy—to Mr. Carter. He undertook to investigate the complaints. He was some eight or nine days in the county of Gloucester. What was the result of his investigation? I asked that his report be placed on the table of the house. Here is what I received as that report:

> Memorandum to Dominion Director
> In reference to attached newspaper clipping,—

I want the house to note those words, "newspaper clipping."

> —you will note that the Honourable P. J. Veniot is reported as saying "At a place six miles from his home," he said, "twelve men with money in the bank were employed under the unemployment relief scheme, and riding back and forth in cars, not one of which cost less than $1,200."

Then he goes on to say that he investigated this and he did find that cars were being used by these gentlemen—gentlemen labourers—white collar workmen, men who although they had money in the bank were taking a bite from the mouths of starving children in the vicinity for the sake of making $2 to add to their bank account. But the curious thing about the whole business is that at the end he says:

> This work was not paid for under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931.

Then why did he investigate?

An hon. MEMBER: Because you asked him.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not ask him to investigate. If he chose to take a newspaper clipping and act upon it, and then found that this was not unemployment relief work, what right had he to make that report to the minister? Why did he not report on my complaints with respect to the work on the old Bathurst road leading from East Bathurst for five miles out towards Chatham? Why did he not report on the investigation he made of the unemployment work in the parishes of New Bandon, Bathurst and Beresford? He investigated those. He had the evidence of thirty or forty people before him. Why did he not submit a report of those cases to the minister? That is why he was sent down to Gloucester county. Moreover, in my presence—and there is no mention of it in his report—in reply to the question: How was it that work done in the month of October had not yet been paid for on the fourth day of December?—one of the district engineers replied that the pay sheets were being held up because there were irregularities in them. The engineer under investigation had to admit that on the 26th of October there had been placed on the pay sheets relating to the East Bathurst road and South Bathurst road no less than two hundred names of men that never worked a minute on the 26th day of October. Mr. Carter has that evidence in his possession. Why did he not report it to the minister?

Mr. GORDON: Is it not true that Mr. Carter found on inquiring into the complaints made by the hon. member that the works complained of were being carried on by the province of New Brunswick and not by the Dominion government?

Mr. SHORT: Absolutely.

Mr. VENIOT: Absolutely no. The hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about. I have here, sir, in my possession, the returns from the Department of Labour submitted by the hon. minister three or four days ago. I find in 1930-31 there was no less than $47,000 of federal aid, besides the $47,000 of provincial aid, expended on roads and bridges in the county of Gloucester. If what Mr. Carter says is true, that this is all provincial work, then this document is false.

Mr. GORDON: Oh, no.

Mr. VENIOT: This document must be false because that money was spent in the county of Gloucester. The hon. Minister of Labour accepted the projects as they were submitted and the money was paid to the province of New Brunswick. There was over $750,000 worth of projects accepted by the Minister of Labour for the whole of New Brunswick. Of that amount something like $50,000 was to be spent on roads and bridges in the county of Gloucester. I saw the instructions which listed the work on the East Bathurst road as unemployment relief work under federal cooperation, so I know what I am talking about.

Mr. GORDON: One more question and I am through. How much money was spent on the East Bathurst road?

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot say, but I do know that part of the money spent for unemployment relief in Gloucester, with the cooperation of the federal and provincial governments, was spent on the East Bathurst road. Mr. Carter investigated an irregularity in the pay sheet, and on October 26, the day of the election, he found that not one man on that pay sheet had worked one minute. I know that because I stood at the poll where at least 125 of them voted.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): What sort of people have you down there?

Mr. VENIOT: They are no worse than the grafters in your province, and heaven knows there are enough of them.

Now let us go on. Part of the unemployment relief money was spent at Blue Cove, and not only was part of that money used politically during a provincial election, but certain candidates for municipal honours who were supervisors of roads used the influence of that money to help their election to the municipal council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is wrong with that?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not going to attempt to answer a gentleman who wants to know what is wrong with the use of unemployment relief money in that way. He is so biased in his attitude, and so strong in support of his own party, that he could not see anything wrong even if the party were going to hades.

Now let me refer to another feature of the case, and perhaps the minister will want to ask me a question on that also. The Department of Labour has not obtained sufficient information upon which to correctly advance its portion of the money to the province of New Brunswick on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works of that province. As proof of this let me say that if the department had investigated the two projects I am going to mention the minister never would have accepted the recommendation. I refer to the transmission lines in Restigouche and Gloucester counties, and the Fredericton, Kingsclear, and Oromocto line. The Dominion proportion for these works respectively was $27,522.50 and $28,700, as is shown in papers brought down the other day.

I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not opposed to the construction of the transmission lines. No doubt they are needed for the convenience of the farmers along those routes, but I do say that no unemployment relief money should be used for the construction of lines which are part of a commercial and profit-making business. Under the laws of New Brunswick the hydro commission have the power to extend their transmission lines, and when they do that in a certain neighbourhood they set aside 12½ per cent as the share of the cost which must be paid by the subscribers on that line. On the basis of 12½ per cent the hydro commission of New Brunswick, which is a government body, receives sufficient revenue to pay interest on capital, sinking fund, replacement value and maintenance over the period of twenty-five years for which bonds are issued. That being the case, and these two projects being money making and profit producing ventures, the Dominion government has no right to hand over unemployment relief money to the hydro commission of New Brunswick when that money could be well used in other ways, perhaps to relieve unemployment in the district through which these lines pass. That is why I say the Department of Labour was not given sufficient information in connection with the recommendations made by the Department of Public Works of New Brunswick.

Now let me give another example of how unemployment relief money was used in Gloucester county, and to forestall any question from the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) I will say that I have personal knowledge of these things. Here is the case of a boy under eighteen years of age employed on relief work. Instructions were issued by the federal government that no one under eighteen was to be employed except where the head of the family was unable to work through sickness. With that provision I agree; it is perfectly right, but here is the case of a boy under eighteen years of age, whose father earns $7 a day, taking the place which should be held by the head of a family.

Mr. GORDON: Is that in New Brunswick, where a man earns that much?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, it is in New Brunswick, and the same thing has happened in other parts of the dominion. Here is the case of another boy seventeen years of age whose father is employed the year round as a railway man. Here is the case of two sons of a foreman earning so much a day on the work, while the father earns $4.50 per day himself. Here is a case where the father is a carpenter on the work and the son is employed also.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Have you the names?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I have.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Give them to us.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I will not. If an investigation is ordered I will give the names then.

I could go on at much greater length, sir, but in conclusion let me say that the statements I have made to the house regarding federal public works have been borne out by the resident engineer for the province of New Brunswick, and again I want to thank the Minister of Public Works for the attention he gave those complaints and the method he adopted to rectify matters. I say now, however, that Mr. Carter did investigate work that was done through the cooperation of both governments, and that he has the evidence of the padding of pay sheets on October 26, which affected 200 men who never did a tap of work. Further than that, I have it from Mr. Carter himself, and he showed me a list of names which he had gathered during his tour in Northumberland. His investigation in Gloucester county disclosed that the work slips which each man had signed contained names which had no right to be there because the individuals were not in need of unemployment relief. He told me that he would report the matter to the minister and have those names struck off the pay sheets and that the province would have to assume entire responsibility for the payment of those amounts. When I asked that that report be laid upon the table of this house I was told that the work was not unemployment relief work. Why did Mr. Carter make that report if it was not in connection with unemployment relief? Why did he go and take photographs of the cars? Why did he obtain evidence as to the age of those cars? It was for one reason, and I hate to suspect that reason. The hon. minister attempted to belittle the member for Gloucester who was attempting to defend not only his own people but the government of Canada. I pointed out that the act passed by this house was being violated; why did they send Mr. Carter down there if it was not intended that this matter should be investigated?

These are the conditions as they exist in the county of Gloucester. When replying to the former Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) this afternoon, I was surprised the minister did not tell the house that he knew the scheme had not worked well, that the system had not brought about the results which had been anticipated. With that knowledge within his breast, I was surprised that he did not take the house into his confidence and state what steps the government would take this session to remedy the situation. A statement of that nature would have carried more weight in the country than the attempt he made to belittle the former Minister of Labour.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would not attempt to take up the time of this house in a discussion of this question were it not for the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot).

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member always mentions me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There has been much ado about nothing. I am going to take the house into my confidence and state the truth of the matter.

On October 26 last there was a provincial by-election in the hon. member's county, and for the first time in twenty years he was trimmed, and trimmed to a frazzle. That is why he has attempted to-night to explode the bile which has been gathering in his system ever since that election. After what he has said about his own fellow citizens and his own electors I feel that someone should rise in his place in this house to defend the reputation of the people of the fair county of Gloucester. I do not believe they are nearly as bad as the hon. gentleman would have this house and the country believe. If they are bad, it is because of the tutoring they have received from the hon. member for Gloucester.

I have some knowledge of the unemployment relief situation in the province of New Brunswick. I have taken special interest in this work in my own constituency, where, I am glad to say, the condition is not quite as bad as prevails in other parts of the province. I happen to know that in connection with the expenditure of unemployment relief moneys in the province of New Brunswick, the Deputy Minister of Public Works, under whose immediate care the expenditure takes place, has issued specific instructions that unemployment relief is to be granted without regard to politics, race, creed or religion. Those are the instructions sent out in the signed manual of the Deputy Minister of Public Works, and I know they have been observed to the letter in the constituency of York-Sunbury. The hon. gentleman will not find one single complaint of the administration of the unemployment relief fund in my constituency, and this applies to direct relief and the relief granted by the municipalities in cooperation with the provincial government.

I do not pretend to have any first-hand knowledge of the situation in the county of Gloucester, but if the truth were known I have just as much first-hand information as has the hon. gentleman. I venture to state that ninety-nine per cent of the assertions which he has made to-night are based on hearsay evidence. In the very nature of the cases themselves it could not possibly be otherwise.

Mr. VENIOT: It was a personal investigation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If what somebody else told the hon. gentleman is not hearsay evidence, then I do not know what is hearsay evidence.

Mr. VENIOT: I saw the work being carried on and I know of individuals who had no right to be working.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be true; there may have been men there that should not have been employed, but I am not in a position, nor is the hon. gentleman, to say whether this or that man has a bank account. If he is in a position to state that, then he is sticking his nose into somebody else's business, something which he has no right to do.

With respect to the specific complaints made to the department by the hon. member for Gloucester, he admits that as soon as those complaints were made, and because they were made by him as the member for Gloucester, they were immediately investigated. The information I have received from the authorities in the province of New Brunswick is that in all these cases the works being carried on were not unemployment relief works conducted by the province and the dominion jointly, but were purely provincial works. What right has this government to investigate such works? I say to my hon. friend in all kindness, he is in the wrong court. If he has the courage of his convictions, he will have some of his henchmen from the county of Gloucester lay a charge and stake their seats in the provincial legislature.

Mr. VENIOT: They are going to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I venture to say that not one of them has the courage to lay a charge and stake his seat on the outcome.

Mr. VENIOT: Did they not do it last winter?

Mr. GOTT: I thought the hon. member did not like interruptions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My mind goes back to 1919 when the hon. gentleman was Minister of Public Works in the provincial government, and when the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Smith) was a member of the provincial legislature. The latter hon. gentleman laid charges with respect to the Shippigan road, and an investigation was held. Charges were laid in connection with the administration of public moneys in respect to this road in the county of Gloucester, and who do you suppose held the investigation? The Minister of Public Works. That is the method he adopted when he was Minister of Public works, and I should like to contrast it with the method adopted by this government. The investigation disclosed that there were boys of twelve years of age who were on the payroll and drawing a man's pay. There was one child of eight years drawing a man's pay. That is not denied; in fact, it never was denied. I was present at the investigation and the hon. member did not take any part in the hearing.

Mr. VENIOT: Because I had no right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the fact. I never made any fuss about it because the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton was present, and he was quite capable of carrying on the investigation.

With these few observations I should like to conclude by saying this, that in New Brunswick, so far as I have any knowledge, either personal or by hearsay, there has been an economical expenditure of the public moneys under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. I have personal knowledge of the direct expenditure that was made by the Dominion government through the public works engineer, and I venture to say that not a dollar of that was wasted and that it went where it was most needed. That is what we on this side of the house undertook to do so far as it was humanly possible. I believe that has been done in the majority of cases and I would hate to think the fair county of Gloucester was any exception.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is my duty to speak on this matter of unemployment in order to give at least the viewpoint of the riding which I have the honour to represent.

I was astonished at the reply given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) and at the attitude he has taken in bringing into the political field this question which is a matter of importance to Canada as a whole. It is not my intention to defend the actions of the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), but I believe they do not need any defence; they were judged by the country as a whole during the five years he was in office. The regulations that he has been instrumental in having passed in regard to labour questions will be remembered for many years to come by our Canadian workmen. I might also mention that by his constructive criticism he has been helpful in remedying the bad situation that existed in northern Ontario in previous years, and he should be given praise by the labour men of northern Ontario for bettering their living conditions. I appreciate the love the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) has for northern Ontario and his faith in that section of the country, but I believe the settlers and all the citizens there love that district; they make it their home, they believe in its future. But again let me state that to the constructive criticism that was made on the hustings and in this house by the ex-Minister of Labour, and even in the Ontario legislature, is due the better accommodation afforded to the men working on the trans-Canada highway in northern Ontario.

I do not wish to open up old sores, but I have clearly in mind, and I believe the people of northern Ontario as a whole remember very distinctly, the words that were uttered by the leaders of the Conservative party during the last general election. Their motto was: What Canada needs is a policy that will provide jobs. The majority of the people believed that statement. The Conservative leaders told the people in northern Ontario most emphatically that if the Liberals were put out of power and the Conservatives elected in their place, they would find work overnight. I am not going to fight all the old battles, but I wish to bring this question up from another angle, so as to make my point clear. In the dying hours of last session we gave the present government a blank cheque as a result of which the people of Canada as a whole expected that there would be no more unemployment throughout the country. During the whole of last summer ministers of the Ontario cabinet and of the federal government went up and down the country telling the people that every man who was unemployed would find employment at once. I am no sob sister, but I must say that in the section which I represent there are many people who are still unemployed and a great number who are near to starvation. The Minister of Labour said this afternoon that there was no starvation in Canada. There is a great difference between prosperity and enjoyment of the ordinary comforts of life. He knows that section of the country and in the rural districts settlers who came in there fifteen or twenty years ago are to-day receiving $7.20 per week. They find it impossible at that wage to have the comforts of life to which they are entitled. I mention these facts because again I must say very sincerely I regret the attitude of the Minister of Labour in his opening remarks.

Mr. GORDON: When the hon. member was in northern Ontario first, about fifteen or twenty years ago, did he have the comforts of life that he now has?

Mr. BRADETTE: Fifteen or twenty years ago we were certainly more prosperous than we are to-day. The situation is not getting any better; in fact, it is getting worse.

The Minister of Labour mentioned the question of patronage. We have suffered from patronage in northern Ontario in the past; indeed, I and my family have suffered from it. But because we aroused public sentiment and educated the people to realize that there was no such thing as Liberal or Conservative money; that every settler and every citizen in our section, whether Conservative or Liberal, was entitled to get a share of the money, I must admit that under the leadership of men like Mr. Tackaberry of Kapuskasing, Mr. Alex. Sterling, Mr. Tom Ripley and Mr. Law of Matheson, officials of the Northern Development Branch, who are active workers, we have no patronage under the present distribution of federal money through the provincial government. But I do not believe the head men of the Northern Ontario Development Department are always familiar with the situation. There are some minor officials who will go so far as to say that no Liberal will be given employment on road work. Once the situation is known to the authorities, the present sitting members in the Ontario legislature, Mr. A. V. Waters and Mr. A. F. Kenning, no political nomination will interfere with a man working for the Northern Ontario Development department. I gladly make that statement.

My view is that there are three things which are holding back the prosperity of northern Ontario and which are also incidental to the prosperity of Canada as a whole. First of all is the question of agriculture, and I am going to reserve the right to speak on that matter when the agriculture estimates are presented to the house. There is a question I wish to ask of the Minister of Labour to-morrow or a few days hence in regard to the scheme which he mentioned this afternoon and has mentioned on several occasions, in connection with which the party received a great deal of publicity, having to do with the placing of thousands of people on the land in the last eighteen months with the help of the transportation systems. Last year I asked a question in the house and I received no reply. But again following the footsteps of the present Minister of Labour, I wish to speak of the wonderful rural districts in my constituency which are well suited for agricultural purposes. The districts of Cochrane are among the finest rural districts in Canada, showing an increase of 800 per cent in the last eighteen years, but I have yet to see a single person who has been placed on a farm there under this scheme mentioned by the Minister of Labour. I am going to ask the minister, how many people have been placed on the farms in North Timiskaming under the federal government scheme?

Mr. GORDON: I shall be very glad to look up the figures for the hon. member, but I do not have them before me at the moment.

Mr. BRADETTE: It has also been stated that this scheme did not cost the federal administration a penny. Everybody knows that the transportation systems are not going to help finance the settlers further than bringing in their effects. I say as a settler myself, knowing the situation as it is in the rural sections of the country, that it is absolutely ridiculous—that is the proper word—to put anybody on the land unless he is going to receive assistance from the federal or provincial government. There should be a special grant. It is not sufficient to place those settlers on the farms; they must also be helped. The Minister of Labour knows his section of the country as I know mine, and he knows perfectly well that if you take a man from Ottawa, Toronto or any other industrial centre and place him on a farm in northern Ontario, he cannot succeed unless he is helped by the federal or the provincial government. To-day we have not merely dozens but hundreds of families in our section of the country who are near starvation. I intend to take this matter up when the estimates are under consideration. Like the minister I have at heart the settlement of northern Ontario, but I repeat, it is not playing the game with our future farmers to place them on land in northern Ontario, old Quebec or the western provinces unless they get sufficient financial support from the provincial or federal authorities to enable them to carry on at least during the initial years of farming.

I wish to say a word about the pulpwood question. Naturally we have no quarrel with the east or the west. We settlers in northern Ontario have been very glad to see the western farmers getting from ten to twelve million dollars through the bonus on their wheat. In northern Ontario we are in an unhappy situation in that we cannot even give away the primary product that we have on our bush land. If the government find it possible to bonus the wheat grower they should also find it possible to bonus the settlers who have pulpwood for their first crop. In our section outside of a limited market, all pulpwood dealers are at present offering pulpwood at $3.50 a cord, and at that price, as every hon. member knows, it is absolutely impossible for them to butter their bread. One of the planks that was included in the platform of the Conservative party at the last general election was the prohibition of the free export of pulpwood. They declared for a policy that would prohibit the free export of pulpwood so as not to allow it to be shipped to keep American mills operating while Canadian mills are working part time. That statement was made during the last general election not only by my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) but by Mr. Finlayson, the Minister of Mines and Forests for Ontario and by the federal Conservative party as a whole; and by reason of those declarations the American market which we had for our pulpwood was entirely disrupted. In my constituency there are three large newsprint mills with a daily capacity sufficient to supply the requirements of all the newspapers of Canada, and under those conditions it is absolutely necessary that we find an outside market for newsprint.

There is another angle to this situation. These mills must necessarily buy within a certain radius of their mills. The mill at Iroquois Falls, for instance, cannot buy pulpwood east, west, north or south at a further distance than one hundred miles from the mill; consequently the farmers who are outside that area must find an outside market for their pulpwood. The only logical market we have for that pulpwood is the American market. During the last general election every American buyer in the Hearst district along the Canadian National, the Algoma Central, was withdrawn on account of the threatened restrictions on the export of pulpwood if the Conservative party came into power. I speak of my own knowledge. Our rural population are absolutely relying for their existence on pulpwood as the first crop while they are opening up the land, and unless they are able to dispose of that crop they cannot remain on the land. I hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) will come out with a clear-cut statement and say that no restrictions will be placed on the export of pulpwood to the United States. Some people may say that there are no restrictions now. That may be so, but the threat of restrictions has disturbed the equilibrium of the pulpwood situation in northern Ontario. Persons competent to speak on this matter made that statement to me several times.

The other day, during the discussion of the potato situation in New Brunswick, we were told that the potato growers were given special freight rates so that they could market their potatoes in Ontario and Quebec. Unluckily for us in northern Ontario there are no preferential freight rates for any of the products that we produce. Last fall I was told by a pulpwood dealer that a contract for fifty thousand cords of pulpwood was turned down because on applying to the Canadian National railway board for a special rate it was denied the freight rates as applied in 1914. I maintain that it is the duty of this government to make the rulings of the railway board flexible enough so that in times of emergency like the present we may be granted special rates which would enable us to market our pulpwood in the American market.

I want to say a word about the trans-Canada highway, which is all important to northern Ontario. Every Conservative and Liberal candidate in the last election declared in favour of it. They were an absolute unit. The only difference of opinion between them was that some were not going far or fast enough. Some visualized the complete construction of the road within three years, others within ten years. The people of northern Ontario remember, whether they heard it from the lips of the present Minister of Labour or the Conservative or Liberal candidates in northern Ontario, that they were all a unit for the building of the trans-Canada highway through that section of the country to provide a connecting link between the east and west, a road that would go through all Canadian territory.

Last year at Winnipeg or Regina the present Prime Minister made a statement that the trans-Canada highway would be routed over the Ferguson highway. The hon. member for East Algoma has also promised us a compromised highway, which I think has been pretty well accepted by the province of Ontario, so far as the route is concerned, but to my regret no work has been done over that section of the Ferguson highway except to straighten and widen some parts of it. South of Hearst in the Coppell section we were hoping that they would commence work on the road building towards Kenora, Fort William and Port Arthur, north of the great lakes. The government owes it to itself as well as to northern Ontario to carry out the promise which was distinctly made, and which the people clearly understood, to commence work on this trans-Canada highway. It ill behooves any member of the Conservative party to come into our section now and say that the Conservative party did not make any such promise. The promise was distinctly made. It is true that there are divergent opinions as to the route. The Minister of Labour himself was outspoken as to the route. It was a foregone conclusion that it was to be over the Ferguson highway. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has also spoken of the trans-Canada highway going up to Fort William. Nevertheless the fact remains that the government should come out with a clear cut policy in this matter. Before the present High Commissioner for Canada in London left this country he made the statement, in the fall of 1930, that the routing of the trans-Canada highway rested entirely on the shoulders of the present government. So far no government, either provincial or federal, has dared to commit itself as to that routing. I may tell the present government that the people in northern Ontario are becoming impatient, but are hoping they will receive fair treatment. I repeat that during the last election campaign all candidates were in accord so far as the building of the trans-

Canada highway was concerned and its going through northern Ontario.

This afternoon the Minister of Labour quoted several letters dealing with the present situation. I also am going to quote certain articles from a Conservative newspaper. Fortunately in my district there are three good weekly newspapers, the Kapuskasing Tribune, of Kapuskasing, the Northland Post, of Cochrane, and the Porcupine Advance, of Timmins. Those three newspapers have the prosperity and advancement of northern Ontario at heart. The Minister of Railways and Canals tried to create the impression that the unemployment situation was not acute in northern Ontario. To refute that statement I am going to read some of the articles written in those newspapers. Turning to the Porcupine Advance of November 12, 1931, I find the following under the heading "Fair Play Needed":

Apparently the powers that be do not realize the seriousness of the unemployment situation in the north land. There are still hundreds of unemployed at Timmins, at Kirkland Lake, at Cochrane and at other places in the north, and up to the present moment nothing material has been done by the government of Ontario to relieve the situation. In the case of Timmins, one hundred men, out of a thousand or more, have been provided with employment in the past few weeks. What is to be done with the others? Press reports suggest that Hon. Mr. Finlayson indicates that the municipalities will be expected to care for their own married men. Such a suggestion is like Tim Buck's revolution it doesn't mean what it semes to imply. According to Tim Buck revolution isn't revolution but rather a state of mind. Hon. Mr. Finlayson's suggestion that each town should care for its own unemployed does not mean that at all, but rather it implies an inferiority complex or a pain in the neck. It should be remembered that Timmins, for instance, has already cared for all its own and a thousand over. There is not an industry or business or concern in Timmins that is not employing as many as a year or more ago. No men have been thrown out of work in Timmins during the past year or two, practically speaking. Instead there have been fully two thousand men come in here and fully half of these have been absorbed. That means in other words that Timmins has cared for all its own and a thousand besides and now the suggestion is made that the town care for a thousand others from the ends of the earth. Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa, Winnipeg and scores of other cities have had industries close down or go on part time. Are these cities caring for their unemployed? Thousands of men have been taken from the south and a few from northern centres to work on the trans-Canada highway, but not a man has been moved from Timmins, or Cochrane, or Kirkland Lake to the trans-Canada work. Where is the sense or the justice or the fairness behind the attitude adopted? Who is responsible? There is a growing belief that much of the trouble rests with Hon. Mr. Finlayson. If this is a correct guess, there will inevitably develop a demand that Hon. Mr. Finlayson be replaced by a man with some sympathy for the north, or at least one willing to give this section of country something like a fair deal. The town of Timmins is very willing to do its share and more. It has already contributed more than its fair share to unemployment relief. The government has approved a $60,000 program of necessary work planned by Timmins but even though this is actually designed to relieve unemployment of outsiders who have drifted to Timmins and are now out of work themselves or have displaced Timmins men in employment, the government apparently is seeking to evade its responsibility for these outsiders and to lay the whole burden on the town. Though approving the whole $60,000 worth of work for relief, the government is ready so far to contribute a share of only $20,000 of the amount. The attention of the government is directed to the fact that the people of Timmins are not able to shoulder the burden thrust upon them. There are literally hundreds of people here who find it a hardship to meet tax bills as they are now. Some are unable to pay their taxes at all. The general conditions and special circumstances are felt by many in serious way. Is it fair or right to overburden the taxpayers of Timmins to support the unemployed hundreds who are clearly and surely the responsibility of the province, not the town?

I wish to say a few words concerning statistics which have been recited by the Minister of Labour. He stated this afternoon that as a result of unemployment relief measures, some 334,000 people have been given work. I do not doubt his figure, but all sorts of stunts can be done with them and I should like more elaborate statements. I should like to hear the number of hours worked, the occupations, and so on. I have in mind hundreds of people in my own riding who have only ten or twenty days' work during the year, and who receive $2.40 per day for their work. Married men are allowed to work only three days a week, making only about $360 in a year, if they could find employment for the whole year. Worse than that, however, a single man is allowed to work only two days per week, and in that new section of the country we have a great number of unmarried men who have come among us to hew out a living. I can see no reason why there should be such a restriction against single men.

When the Minister of Labour mentioned that at the large salary of $7.20 per week there is really no starvation I was tempted to think that those people must be near starvation. In my own riding I know that there are families who have not the clothing to go to church or to mix with their friends, and because of that are even deprived of fresh air. I know of people eating potatoes three times a day, and who have been doing so for the last three months. These are facts; and if possible I should like some government official to go to northern Ontario, particularly to North Timiskaming, and see for himself the conditions existing up there in some of the rural sections.

I believe the Minister of Labour is sincere in his statement. I well remember that last summer during the provincial election campaign in the province of Quebec he told the settlers in that province that if they wanted roads they ought to come to Ontario. I am glad to learn that in his opinion the settlers in South Timiskaming have all the roads they require. I want to say to him that in my own riding there are settlers who have been on their places for the last fifteen or twenty years and who still have to pack the provisions for their families on account of lack of roads. If they have all the roads they require in South Timiskaming I hope the minister, out of his kindness of heart, will use all influence with the federal and provincial authorities to see that the settlers get work on the roads to which they were entitled a number of years ago. I took the statement he made in the province of Quebec at par value; I wanted to believe it represented the actual fact; I hope that every settler in those northern constituencies will have all the roads they require in the very near future. May I say, however, that in this year of grace 1932 in North Timiskaming there are hundreds of settlers who have not the road facilities to which they are entitled.

At this point may I refer to some comments made in the Porcupine Advance of December 31, 1932:

> Anyone who gives any particular thought to the matter will regret to note the sad failure made by the province of Ontario in dealing with the unemployment problem. The Dominion government attacked the problem in a big way and left the path open for the province to deal effectively and successfully with the difficulty. Instead of extended work on a broad scale, the province seems to have been overwhelmed by the situation and the effort to right matters has been spasmodic and panicky. Most of the battle has been left to the municipalities and even the towns and cities have not received the support deserved. In the case of Timmins, for instance, while all the program planned by the town was approved by the commission in charge, only part of it came in for assistance from the government, though the whole program was designed for the relief of people who are clearly a provincial or dominion responsibility and not a local one. The camp is employing over a thousand men more than two years ago, and yet had a thousand men out of work, this meaning that all the unemployment here was caused by men drifting in from other centres. In the apportionment of men for work on the trans-Canada highway there has been no quota from Timmins. Towns and cities where the unemployment has originated have been helped unduly, at the expense of other centres that were ready to care for a proportion of the unemployed of other places. Only a hundred men have been taken from Timmins for work at the special camps of the northern development department. The first hundred men have been returned and another hundred taken in their place, the matter thus resolving itself into a part time employment at a wage rate too low for decent living even under steady employment. With a number of public works very necessary for the advantage of the country—such as the road connecting up the mining camps of Sudbury, Shiningtree, Elk Lake, Matachewan, and Porcupine—it would be possible to provide work for all, to the general advantage. It may be argued that there is not money for these works. In case of such an argument there will be a general demand to know where the money has all gone, and also if there is no money for public works under which men may preserve their independence and the country receive some benefit, there is yet money for direct relief. Indeed a premium is placed on direct relief by municipalities, the government giving a larger grant for such relief than for the better form of relief—the only sensible form of relief—work for the unemployed. The people of Canada do not want relief of the charity type. They simply want some of their own money, and for this they are willing to work for the common benefit.
> Hundreds of men out of work in Timmins, though the town has done more than its share for the relief of unemployment by the providing of work! Hundreds out of work in other towns of the north, and elsewhere throughout Ontario! All this after the government has had months to prepare and arrange affairs!
> The government should turn over a new leaf for the new year. There should be earnestness and efficiency shown in the work of the relief of the unemployed. Had it not been for incidental matters that provided employment; had it not been for the work undertaken by municipalities; and had it not been for the remarkably mild weather this year, the province would have more serious hardship for a large number of men than the amount that has been encountered, and that amount has been altogether too much.
> In the new year the government should take up the unemployment question in a different attitude altogether. No thought should be given to the preservation of profits for any who have already made big money from the resources of the province. There should be no care for the feelings of the high finance group. There should be system and efficiency established, with the sole idea in mind of relieving unemployment by means of providing necessary and valuable work that will benefit the country and people.
> The Dominion government has a blank cheque for the relief of unemployment. This blank cheque has been passed on, as it were, to the provinces. Should there be more money spent than the people think has been possible in Ontario from the comparatively small amount of relief provided, and if the end of Ontario's share is in sight, then the province can safely come to the people for more funds. It is certain that the people in general are absolutely opposed to the idea of anyone starving to death, or even suffering hardship. There is a very general feeling that unemployment must be relieved. There are only two ways to relieve it, the one being by direct relief and the other by providing work. The system of direct relief is against all the ideas of the people of Canada. To the average Canadian the only sensible plan seems to be to provide work. In this the government will receive the fullest support. The government should start the new year right by getting some system into its relief work program and seeing that the ordinary run of men get a fair deal.

Having regard to the severity of the unemployment situation in northern Ontario I desire to give the viewpoint of the rural population. The Minister of Labour said in reference to the letters that he had received from the various organized municipalities that the local authorities were prepared to look after the relief work. But we must not lose sight of the fact that most of the rural districts of northern Ontario are not organized. Consequently all the responsibility for attending to relief work in these sections falls on the provincial government. There are sections in my own riding that have been opened up for settlement for the last twenty years, but they are still unorganized, and up to date the people there have not received anything by way of unemployment relief. In this connection I desire to read to the house a letter I received this morning from the president of the local settlers' association of Mattice. He writes under date of February 20, 1932:

Yours of the 1st inst., duly came to hand, and we greatly appreciate your loyal support to relieve distress in this section, although this is not altogether under the direct control of the authorities at Ottawa. However being aware that you have done all in your power, and in turn we have not pointed out to you the general injustice felt, as we had hopes that a change was to take place locally, in accord with promise made by the engineer in writing; however no change took place and nothing is being done yet to relieve conditions locally. With this in mind we feel that we should draw your attention to the following facts:

1. Relief was demanded for reason already stated, and nothing has been done although promises were made.

2. The northern department of development undertook to complete the gravelling from Mattice, starting at mileage 103 to Opesatika by trucks.

3. Married men were given employment at the gravel pit three days during week and single men two days during week, and the number of men is very small and not providing for a fair revenue to those without revenue.

4. Regular employment on this job, was given to mostly all men from outside (men from Hearst and Cochrane), and Mattice could have provided for some of this employment; why was it not done?

("A" They brought in a man from outside to cut wood for stoves, a single man. Men could have been found at Mattice for this job.

"B" They brought in a man from outside to keep fire going in the camps during the night. Men could have been found in Mattice for this job.

[Mr. Bradette.]

"C" They brought in a man from Cochrane to check gravel at the other end, when there is a man already doing this, in this case we feel it is duplicate work for nothing.

"D" They brought in men from outside to put up a small garage with lumber and a little tarred paper. Men in Mattice could have done this work.

"E" All trucks are employed six days during the week. Though this comes under the necessary relief to relieve local distress, all these men are from outside.

"F" They have a man to operate a tractor for snow ploughing who is more or less idle but on regular weekly pay. This same man has a truck of his own running on the roads hauling gravel, but employing another man in its place, this man is a single man and the son of local road inspector at Hearst.)

5. We understand that relief money voted by the federal authorities was to be spent in the interest of localities affected and in need of work for his own people and the provincial authority was to administer these funds. At Mattice, Fryatt, MacBay, and Reesar, nothing is done to give work to settlers in need.

6. If it was necessary to gravel the road for automobiles from outside, for which settlers have no use, why employ trucks altogether. This work could have been done on a fair basis by permitting the trucks to gravel the long distance travelling east and permitting the teams from settlers to get on and gravel the short distance travelling west, as understood and promised by the provincial authorities, this on about December 1st. At that time they were aware of our need and promised the work; since then nothing has been done to give to the settlers a little revenue. We are in need of revenue by the means of work, if they knew of our need. How long will it take to overcome the distress? Promises do not give a man on a lot something to eat for his family and permit him to meet his obligations.

We have already a case of a settler on a well settled farm, owing to the fact he could not get work for his horses, and not being able to afford to feed his two horses all winter doing nothing, he decided to kill the poorest one. Will this last much longer?

I feel it is not necessary to enter into very many details of this sort, for you know our general conditions. It would require very little to help us to see the year over, and this we ask and must obtain in the form of work.

In a few days now many many teams will be done hauling the little pulpwood there was to haul, and what are we going to do?

We understand that some men made the statement that the settlers in this section were well off and did not need relief work. Why this statement? I presume it is in the form of punishment which is not needed, for we have enough of the actual distress without allowing such statements to be made and taken as granted that we are not in need of work. These statements is merely made by the man or men as their personal views, and are not correct.

My dear Mr. Bradette, is it not possible apparently to obtain satisfaction within our needs? By good will we all urge you to bring up our cause to the proper authorities again, and if necessary take the matter up in House of Commons of Canada. We are Canadians and we want to be Canadians. Through you, our representative, we demand action.

Previous to the last election during the debates in this house certain hon. members put the onus on the government of relieving unemployment on the ground that it had become so serious that it was a national matter. During the last election the Conservative party stated that unemployment was purely and simply a federal matter, and if they were returned to power it would be so dealt with at once without any red tape. I know that the Hon. Mr. Finlayson, Minister of Lands and Forests in the provincial cabinet, has been down to Ottawa on different occasions, and the officials of the northern development branch have told the settlers in my section of the country, and rightly so, that if they did not get the relief work they were entitled to it was because the federal government had not made the necessary grant to the provincial authorities. The Canadian people are alive to the situation and are giving the fullest latitude to the government to apply adequate remedies. On January 31, the Mail and Empire contained the following despatch from Ottawa:

Ontario Asks Funds For Highway Work

Request for Further Appropriation Presented to Federal Cabinet

Finlayson in Ottawa

Ottawa, Jan. 31.—The Dominion Cabinet has under consideration the request of the Ontario government for further appropriations to make it possible to continue work on the trans-Canada highway. Hon. William Finlayson, Ontario Minister of Lands and Forests, was in Ottawa on Saturday, when he laid before some of the ministers the need for additional appropriations.

Hon. William Finlayson, who was in Ottawa Saturday conferring with the Dominion government regarding further finances for the trans-Canada and other Northern Ontario road relief projects, stated last night that he expected a definite reply from Premier Bennett to-day on the situation.

Mr. Finlayson declined to say what appropriation is required to carry the road work on until April as originally scheduled, or what the province had asked the federal authorities to contribute further in this regard.

Premier George S. Henry to-night stated work on the trans-Canada highway in Ontario had progressed with unexpected speed owing to mild weather prevailing throughout the areas in which construction camps are situated.

The result, he said, had been that more money was already spent than officials had anticipated. The original estimates provided funds to carry work on until April 1. The province and the dominion provided the money on a fifty-fifty basis. Mr. Henry said he could not immediately determine the amount of money remaining from the original appropriation, nor the length of time it would be possible to carry on the work without calling for more funds. Eventually, he said, more money would have to be appropriated.

I know the Prime Minister is anxious to relieve unemployment, and therefore I make this statement to him that on the first of April all the money distributed for unemployment relief in the province of Ontario will have been spent, but there will still be unemployment. This is the worst time of the year for our settlers in northern Ontario, for if they are not able to earn sufficient money to buy seed grain and keep their families in food and clothing they will have to abandon their holdings and come down to the already overcrowded urban centres. I make an earnest appeal to the government—and if the Minister of Labour were in his seat I know he would cooperate with me, because he knows the situation as well as I do—I make an earnest appeal to the government that more money be appropriated for the unemployed in the rural and industrial sections of northern Ontario, that more road work be undertaken so that it may be carried on well into June and July. I am making this appeal in the hope that the government, being now familiar with the seriousness of conditions in northern Ontario, will devise a plan to relieve the pressing necessities of the population there, otherwise they will find it impossible to remain on their holdings or keep their property. In the name of my constituents, in the name of the fine type of people of whom the Minister of Labour spoke this afternoon, I make this fervent appeal to the government to take such measures as will enable them to carry on their work of opening up for Canada and for the world that wonderful section of the dominion that we call northern Ontario.

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull): I shall be very brief in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, but I was induced to speak on this motion after listening to the remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), who quoted figures to show to what extent the government had helped to relieve unemployment throughout the country. He stated that in 1930 no one knew exactly how long this depression would last or what its intensity would be, and he also said that if it had been a normal depression the measures adopted by the government certainly would have had a good effect and would have relieved unemployment to a greater extent.

The minister stated that $70,570,080 was spent in 1930 throughout the country on relief work, and that the share of this government was about $14,000,000. He also stated that this provided work for 332,000 individuals. He stopped his figures at that point, but I think he should have gone further and stated how many days these 332,000 people had worked. It would have been found that they had worked only a little over seven million days. Going further, we find that during 1930 these people worked an average of 23 days during the entire year; that was the extent of the relief given the unemployed by relief work. If we were to calculate the amount spent as compared with the number of individuals receiving relief, we would find that each working day given these people cost the municipal, provincial and federal governments about $10, and in 1931 the figures were not much improved. Up to January 1 of this year $60,000,000 was spent on relief work, giving work to 285,000 people, who averaged 11 days work per person. The share of the federal government in that relief work amounted to about $28,000,000.

It must be remembered that in addition to relief work the government gave money for direct relief. In 1930 this amounted to about $2,000,000, according to the Financial Post of January 20. This amount helped some 430,770 heads of families and single people, so that the $2,000,000 spent on direct relief, together with the $5,000,000 provided by provincial and municipal governments for that purpose, helped more people than were helped by the relief work which has been carried on at much greater cost.

After the minister said that no one knew how long the depression would last or what intensity it would reach I was tempted to ask what measures the government would have taken had they known this depression was world-wide; I was anxious to learn what other means they could have employed to relieve conditions. The minister was silent on that matter; he only stated that people throughout the country were kept from starvation through the actions of this government. I must remind the house that when this depression started in 1929 the revenues of the country were going down, so the money spent for relief had to be borrowed. This $70,000,000 was secured in that way and added to the funded debts of the municipal, provincial and federal governments, so there must be added to our obligations a further amount of about three millions, being amount of interest on that borrowed money.

The largest part of this money was spent on public works, such as buildings, highways and bridges. We did not actually need a great many of these buildings and highways, or at least they could have waited for normal times when the cost would have been lower. Surely some other scheme to aid unemployment could have been devised. I still believe the government should have helped by direct grants to the provincial governments and the municipalities, because in that way more people would have been assisted.

As to local conditions in the city of Hull, I may say that we have about two thousand people unemployed or employed on part time. The different industries in Hull are working on part time, and since we have also a certain number of civil servants, we will suffer still more if the proposed bill concerning civil servants is passed. Since September 1 last we have spent nearly $75,000 on direct relief, which amount has been contributed by the municipal, provincial and federal governments, but every day we have unemployed persons stopping us on the streets or calling at our houses for food. They are so destitute that they have not the pride that enables people to bear up under this depression. Hull is not a very rich city; it is composed in the main of labourers, and when our few industries close their doors necessarily these people must rely on help coming from the different governments. Of the two thousand people I am told that about four hundred received one week's work out of four in the city.

As to the city of Ottawa, where unemployment should not be known, I should like to quote from the Citizen of a few days ago. The article is headed "Work for Ottawa Women", and states:

> Yesterday in Ottawa some devoted members of the Local Council of Women opened a workroom where destitute women can be given an opportunity to earn a few dollars weekly. The plan is to give out sewing and mending work. On the first day more than 130 women applied. Some were receiving temporary relief through the welfare bureau, but they are women who want work rather than a charitable ration of food.

Mr. GOTT: Mr. Speaker, I direct your attention to the fact that it is eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PETROLEUM AND NAPHTHA

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 20, to amend the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce this bill?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The proposed bill is so simple and short that I am surprised my hon. friends raise any objection to it. It deals with amendments to the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act, and it also deals with a 100 per cent Canadian product. The act as it stands at present provides that:

Petroleum shall not be sold or offered for sale for use in Canada, for illuminating purposes—

Among other things.

—(b) if it weighs more than eight pounds and seventeen-hundredths of a pound per gallon.

I want to change that seventeen-hundredths of a pound to four-tenths of a pound. The reason is this, that the consistency of the petroleum in the red sand district of Alberta does not happen to fall within the act, but it would so fall if this paragraph read "four-tenths" instead of "seventeen-hundredths." There is no objection raised by anyone and this amendment would allow a market for this petroleum without the necessity of gasoline being added to it in order to bring it within the requirements of the act as it now stands.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MARINE SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Has the minister received from the Vancouver harbour commissioners, safety regulations (for safety in loading and unloading ships), with the recommendation that same be established, as a harbour by-law?
2. If so, has the Department of Marine approved said regulations, or is the matter under consideration?
3. If the Department of Marine has not approved such safety regulations, is it the intention of the minister to bring before parliament at this session a bill to ratify the draft convention of the International Labour conference, at its twelfth session, for the protection against accident of workers engaged in loading or unloading ships?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Yes.
2. No. In the opinion of the Department of Justice it is not competent to the Vancouver harbour commission to enact such a by-law.
3. Not at this session. A partial revision of the "convention concerning the protection against accidents of workers employed in loading or unloading ships" is on the agenda for consideration at the 16th session of the International Labour Conference to be held at Geneva, April 12, 1932.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, GLOUCESTER, N. B.

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Did the government of the province of New Brunswick recommend to the federal government the granting of direct relief to the municipality of Gloucester and the council of the town of Bathurst?
2. If so, what was the amount of direct relief so recommended, and did the federal government accept the recommendation of the government of New Brunswick?

Mr. GORDON:

1. The agreement between the Dominion government and the province of New Brunswick under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, provides that the Dominion shall pay to the province for remittance to any municipality 33⅓% of the expenditures of the municipality for direct relief where suitable work cannot be provided for the unemployed. No recommendations have been made by the province of New Brunswick in regard to the granting of direct relief to any municipalities in the province of New Brunswick, but the federal government is paying one-third of accounts for municipal direct relief as certified by the province in accordance with the agreement.
2. Answered by No. 1.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. SPEAKER: As agreed at the last sitting, notices of motion numbers 1, 2 and 3 (Mr. Ralston) will stand, and numbers 4, 5, 6 and 7 (Mr. Casgrain) will stand in the absence of the hon. member.

Motions stand.

STEAMSHIP ALETTE

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, papers or other documents, relating to application of the Timber Transport Company, Limited, for a petition of right relative to the ss. Alette.

Mr. MANION: In the public interest I must regretfully oppose the carrying of this motion?

Mr. VENIOT: Why? I know this motion is not debatable, but the minister says it is not in the public interest that this motion should be passed. He should have better grounds than that. What interests are involved?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The motion is not debatable. If it is not agreed to by the government, my hon. friend can put it under notices of motion that are debatable and the matter can be discussed.

Mr. VENIOT: It would save the time of the house if the hon. member gave the reasons now.

Mr. MANION: With the consent of the house, while I am not entirely familiar with the matter at the moment, not having looked it up for some time, I shall explain it very briefly according to my recollection. In 1913 a steamer was engaged to take lumber from Texas to Nelson in Hudson bay. The steamer went up to Nelson with the lumber or timber or a mixture of both and for some reason the cargo was not delivered there. The ship departed but later returned and was beached. The opinion of my departmental engineers was that it was beached intentionally. At any rate, in 1916, after a great deal of investigation, correspondence and negotiation, the matter was settled, and according to the department's memorandum, the department was given a complete release of claims arising out of the chartering of this steamship in 1916.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. VENIOT: By whom?

Mr. MANION: By the agent of the owners.

Mr. VENIOT: Who was the agent?

Mr. MANION: I think Powell was the name. Mr. Powell settled on behalf of the owners of the ship as their representative and as the matter is closed and it is fifteen years old, we take the attitude that the opening up of this case can have no possible advantage to anybody and is not justified.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall I say "dropped"?

Mr. VENIOT: No, I cannot consider it dropped.

Motion negatived on division.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. EULER (for Mr. Ralston):

For a return showing the pay sheets of men employed on the breakwater on the south side of Cape Sable island, in connection with the expenditure of moneys during the last six months under the Unemployment Relief Act of last session.

Mr. EULER (for Mr. Ralston):

For a return showing the pay sheets and vouchers in connection with moneys spent in the last six months on the wharf on the west side of Port Dufferin, Halifax county.

Mr. EULER (for Mr. Ralston):

Mr. GORDON: With respect to Nos. 9 and 11, I doubt seriously whether the business of the house will be advanced by carrying these motions because these matters are now being incorporated in a report relating to legislation on unemployment relief. It would mean a great duplication of work, although if it seems desirable to anticipate the report, we will try to meet the wishes of the mover, but certainly it would add to the expense and probably would not avail much because the report, I trust, will be ready and tabled within a very few days.

Mr. EULER: Might I suggest that in the absence of the mover the motion stand?

Mr. GORDON: Might I ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, to allow motions Nos. 10 and 11, which are in the same position, also to stand with the consent of the house?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Only on the understanding that there is not going to be undue delay. Very frequently these returns are delayed and are not brought down until nearly the close of the session. If the motions are to stand it is understood there will be only a reasonable delay.

Mr. GORDON: The act itself provides that this return shall be made within fifteen days of the act becoming operative. That would mean the 15th day of March. I can assure hon. members that we are doing our utmost to have this return ready long before the time contemplated by the statute. I will table the return just as soon as it is prepared.

Mr. EULER: In the meantime the motions stand?

Mr. SPEAKER: Motions Nos. 9, 10 and 11 stand.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BEET SUGAR INDUSTRY

USE OF SUGAR MANUFACTURED FROM HOME GROWN RAW MATERIAL

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should in cooperation with the sugar factories encourage in every reasonable way the use of sugar made from home grown raw material.

He said: In briefly introducing this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the house the conditions in a new industry, an industry that merits the attention of the members of this house and of the people of Canada on account of its great potential importance.

According to the Bureau of Statistics, in Canada we consume—I am using round figures —971,000,000 pounds of sugar annually. Of that amount about 847,000,000 pounds are manufactured from material which is grown outside of Canada. Some 25,000,000 pounds are exported, chiefly to Newfoundland.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to desist from loud conversation. It is against the rules, and it makes it impossible for a speaker to be heard in the chamber.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GERSHAW: Some 50,000,000 pounds of pure sugar are imported. It can be said fairly, however, that of the amount of sugar consumed in Canada only about 10 per cent is manufactured from raw material grown in Canada. In the United States they grow the raw material for 20 per cent of the sugar which they consume, and even in Great Britain, a country with a large population and a limited agricultural area, we find that one-fifth of the sugar which they use is manufactured from material grown at home.

The relatively large importation of raw material into Canada for the making of sugar is not due to any lack of fertility in our soil. It is not because our climate is not suited to the growing of this material, because we find that in 1929 the sugar beet grown in Alberta had a larger sugar content than the beet grown in any other part of North America.

The sugar beet was originally a small root vegetable, but by cultivation, and as a result of experiments in plant breeding, the present article has been developed so that when it is grown in the sunny regions of our country it contains eighteen and even up to twenty-two per cent of sugar content.

We need have no fear about the quality of the sugar made from the sugar beet, because we find that manufacturers of sugar, with the assistance of specially skilled chemists, can produce a chemically pure product, a product that is just as pure and just as wholesome as the product of cane sugar. We find also that it conforms to the chemical formula of sugar and that it can be used for any household purpose whatsoever. Those manufacturing sugar from the cane had difficulty in removing the molasses. Those manufacturing sugar from beets had, for a time, difficulty in removing certain of the bitter acids, but these difficulties have been overcome and sugar can now be manufactured from sugar beets that will give satisfaction for every purpose.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that my words would reach the ears of the housewives of Canada, and that I had the eloquence to persuade them to insist on using sugar manufactured from beets rather than sugar manufactured from cane, because I believe that if they would do that they would be doing a great patriotic service to a struggling industry in this country. If we used more beet sugar we would, of course, import less of the cane sugar, and it would be interesting to see how this would affect our trade and commerce. We are told that if we are going to sell to other countries we must buy from them, that exports must be paid for by imports. It is interesting to note from what countries we get nine-tenths of the sugar that we use. In 1930, we imported sugar, in the usual classification not above No. 16 of the Dutch standard, as follows:

	Pounds imported
Australia	894,000
British East Africa	26,000,000
British South Africa	78,000,000
British Guiana	174,000,000
Barbados	108,000,000
Jamaica	97,000,000
Trinidad and Tobago	77,000,000
Other British West Indies	77,000,000
Cuba	33,000,000
Fiji Islands	92,000,000
Peru	15,000,000
San Domingo	27,000,000
Other countries	994,000

From those countries we imported that great quantity of raw material for the manufacture of sugar. At this particular time there is a very good reason why the people of Canada should use sugar made from Canadian material. That urgency consists in the saving of the many irrigation projects that are now on the verge of ruin. In Alberta alone provision has been made to place a million acres of land under irrigation, and about half that amount is actually under irrigation at the present time. During the last thirty years millions of dollars have been spent on irrigation schemes. Some of this money was secured from the provincial governments, some from the transportation companies and some from the long-suffering British investors. Those investors and the men who actually carried out the earth-moving developments hoped for profits. On the other hand however they must be credited with vision. They had a picture of those dried-out areas being turned into fertile gardens capable of producing bountiful crops to feed our great population. They had a vision of neatly painted cottages housing a contented people. They felt they were making a contribution towards the building of empire, and money was not spared for supervision, for colonization schemes, for demonstration plots and things of that nature. Years have passed and their hopes have not been realized. Investors and operators alike have been deplorably disappointed by the limited success and the many disasters encountered in connection with these irrigation projects. The land cost the settlers some $50 to $70 per acre; the water cost $1.50 per acre, or $2 per acre per season. Owing to the collapse in prices of farm produce in the last few years wheat-growing is a dead loss. The farmers cannot grow fodder crops to feed live stock because the price of stock has depreciated accordingly. The irrigation farmer must work long hours during the day and often long hours of the night in the mud and water to look after his fields, and he has come to the place where he finds that in spite of his original investment, and in spite of the years of hard work, he has no equity in the land, he does not own his home and has no hope for the future.

[Mr. Gershaw.]

In reviewing the situation, may I say it seems clear that part of the failure in these irrigation districts is due to the fact that they have not been able to grow crops of a high acre value. In the western states beet-growing is the very basis and foundation of irrigation farming. In the state of Montana which, in area, is somewhat similar to that of Alberta, we find that they have 55,000 acres under beets whereas we in Alberta have only about 12,000. We find that they have three sugar factories and we have only one. Growing a crop such as sugar beets would to a great extent save the irrigation farmers and, to at least some degree reclaim or regain some of the investments which outside interests have made. Sugar beets would provide a cash crop for irrigation farmers. The present price of $5.50 per ton is too low to allow a profit, and too low to make feasible the beginning of operations by new factories. True, the growers receive a bonus on account of high sugar content, and if they grow ten tons per acre, which is a usual crop, they receive a cash price of from $60 to $65 per acre. Then, again, the growing of sugar beets would constitute a great link in crop rotation and would help to make possible the proper balancing of farm operations. Growing this crop would provide a system of cultivation which would help to keep down the weeds, wild oats and all foreign growth, and would increase by 50 per cent the productivity of other crops, such as alfalfa and sweet clover, which would be grown in rotation with the sugar beets.

Perhaps the most important effect of the growing of sugar beets would be the advantages derived from the by-products such as the beet pulp, beet tops, molasses and so on.

The production of these by-products would encourage the live stock industry, the development of secondary industries, and would necessitate the use of, and demand for, fuel, lumber and lime. Work would be provided for thousands of Canadians, our railroads would reap some benefit, and undoubtedly the stabilization and development of the farming industry, to a very great exent, would be the result. I have tried to show that we need have no fears about the quality of sugar we can produce from our beets, that preparation has been made to grow large quantities of sugar beets, that we have a market in Canada for nine times as much of this product as we are growing at the present time, and that great advantages would accrue to people in the irrigated districts if the sugar market could be secured.

At this point I wish briefly to mention some of the ways this government could assist the industry. I realize fully that immediate assistance must be given because the people on those farms are about discouraged and cannot longer continue under their present system of farming. The collapse in prices during the past few years has brought them to that condition. I do not think the question of tariffs enter largely into the matter. Canada has entered into a treaty with the West Indies in which the duty on sugar has been definitely stated and, for that reason, it is not likely that tariffs could be used to relieve the present situation. However, there are other methods which could be used to assist this industry. Loans might be made to responsible individuals sufficient to give them an opportunity to start a factory and thus create a market for the farmers in the immediate district. This government has on other occasions loaned money for various purposes. I may point out that in the district of which I am speaking the farm loan board has practically excluded the local farmers from the benefit of the act, so probably assistance along the lines which I have indicated would in a measure compensate them for that exclusion. It may be said at once: Why not let joint stock companies be formed and have them apply to the government for the assistance required? We must remember that those who have capital are extremely cautious these days and will not enter into a new business enterprise unless they know there is a reasonable chance of success.

Another method of assistance is by subsidy. I find in Great Britain this industry is so encouraged. Under the British Sugar Beet Subsidy Act, passed in 1924, a subsidy is granted to home-grown beet sugar for ten years, at the rate of 19 shillings and 6 pence per hundredweight for the first four years, 13 shillings per hundredweight for the next three years, and 6 shillings and 6 pence per hundredweight for the remaining three years. In 1924, the number of sugar beet growers was 4,039, and the total acreage 22,637. Six years later, in 1930, the number of growers had increased to 40,415, and the acreage to 348,920; that is, the growers had increased tenfold in number, the acreage fifteenfold. It is interesting to find that the factories had increased from three to eighteen, the labour employed from 1,435 to 9,900 persons. It is significant, too, that Great Britain has captured the confectionery trade of a large part of the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for excellent reasons this government gave a bonus of 5 cents per bushel to the growers of wheat. This assistance, I may say, was much appreciated, and I believe if the government could see its way clear to grant a bonus of $1 or $1.50 per ton to the growers of sugar beets they would bring hope and encouragement to many homes in the irrigated districts. Those people who are now on the verge of despair would be encouraged by such a move.

There is one other method I might suggest by which the government could help and encourage the growers of sugar beets and promote the development of this industry. That is by a system of advertising. It is not a new form of assistance. We have spent money on advertising to encourage the use of Canadian hemp, and the consumption of Canadian grapes and Canadian apples. It would seem to me, therefore, that some of the money that has been voted to the Department of Trade and Commerce for advertising purposes might well be used to encourage our people to use sugar made from the raw materials grown right within our country. Whatever methods may be adopted to this end, I hope they will be sufficient and effective; and I also hope that they will be applied immediately, because the very low price of farm products during the last year or two has made this a very urgent and a very important question.

The great national value of a sugar beet factory as compared with a cane sugar refinery can be easily shown by roughly contrasting the two operations. Cane sugar is grown in tropical countries and imported as a raw product, to be melted, filtered and purified in the refineries. On the other hand, Canadian labour is required in the production of beet sugar, and it starts from the seeding —in fact it starts before the seeding, because the land must be prepared; then we go through all the processes of seeding, weeding, thinning and cultivating the crop during the growing season, followed by the harvesting operations and the transportation of the crop to the factory. Much Canadian labour is required for all these operations. At the factory the beets must be sliced and steeped and the resultant juice dealt with. In fact 60 per cent of the factory investment is used before the beet sugar reaches the stage at which the refinery first gets the cane sugar, so that twice as many men, twice as much fuel, and double the quantity of supplies are required in the production of beet sugar.

Beet sugar factories are needed in the irrigated district at Brooks and Vauxhall, and probably at Medicine Hat and Lethbridge, or wherever they can be most economically operated. In many cases local capital is not available, but if some assistance could be given along the lines I have suggested I believe more factories would be established, and thus a great service would be done to those Canadians who have invested their all and devoted years of their lives to the growing of sugar beets, only to find themselves now in a very unfortunate position.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, with all deference, if the government can see its way clear to give some assistance to this industry, that it be given in such a way that it will reach the sugar beet growers, because they are the ones who most need assistance and encouragement. By so doing I believe the government would, in a limited way, help to solve the unemployment problem, which is the greatest problem confronting the dominion at the present time.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Before the hon. gentleman takes his seat, would he say if he has some direct proposition to make in the way of subsidy or bonus?

Mr. GERSHAW: A dollar and a half a ton.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in supporting the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), let me say that Canada has been known as a country suited to agriculture. Many agricultural products have been produced of late, however, for which the farmer cannot find a market, though agriculture in this country is still the primary industry, from the point of view not only of the number of persons engaged in it, but also of the capital invested. I believe I am safe in saying that at the present time agriculture is in distress, and that when agriculture is in distress practically the whole country is in distress.

As everyone knows, sugar is a staple product. According to the returns issued by the Bureau of Statistics, last year our importations of sugar were valued at about $21,000,000. In many parts of Canada to-day we have farmers who cannot find a market for their products, but here is an article which, if manufactured in Canada, would provide a market for at least one product of the soil and would give encouragement to the agricultural industry which is badly needed at the present time.

In British Columbia we have the Fraser valley, which is admirably adapted to the growing of sugar beets. Two or three years ago a United States concern came into the Fraser valley and encouraged the farmers to grow beets, which were shipped to the state of Washington and manufactured into sugar. If we are to depend upon a concern which is not within the control of this country, the growing of sugar beets will not be encouraged at all, and I think it should be fostered on this side of the line. The growing of sugar beets and the manufacture of sugar should be encouraged by the province of British Columbia; it would not only provide a market for a product of the soil but would also provide work for a great many people who to-day are seeking employment.

We import sugar, but there is another product of the sugar beet of which up to the present we have imported a great deal. I refer to beet pulp, which is used in the dairying industry. If we could grow enough sugar beets and establish factories in British Columbia I think a good market could be developed for that product also. I believe this resolution merits the attention of every hon. member of this house, especially those who represent agricultural constituencies. So I have great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in seconding the resolution.

Mr. J. S. STEWART (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable diffidence that I rise to speak to this resolution, because the mover has so clearly placed before the house the facts with regard to the use of sugar throughout Canada. In fact I find myself limited in my remarks to rather a parochial statement, in that I must confine myself to the constituency I represent, which is very much interested in the growing of sugar beets and also in the other subject dealt with by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), that of irrigation.

I appreciated the very clear manner in which the hon. member placed before the house the needs of the people in southern Alberta, and I should like to endorse many of his statements. The growing of sugar beets in western Canada, especially in southern Alberta, is not possible except in connection with irrigated lands. Therefore irrigation and sugar beets go hand in hand; they are interlocked, and they are questions which must be decided in conjunction with each other.

I should like to digress for a few moments and speak of irrigation, because in a large measure agriculture in southern Alberta cannot be carried on without irrigation, at least as far as the semi-arid region is concerned. In a large part of that area there is an average annual rainfall of from 13 to 16 inches, and this must be supplemented by irrigation if crops are to be raised. The Rocky mountains to the west supply us with great quantities of water, enabling the irrigationist on the prairie to produce his crops, but even without this irrigation I should tell the house that with a normal rainfall these semi-arid regions have produced many millions of bushels of the very finest wheat in the world. But, owing to the fact that for a number of years in succession we have had a very limited rainfall, the question of irrigation has been brought very much to the fore, and as a result I think in that respect we have expanded and gone ahead far too rapidly and to a much greater extent than we should have.

As the hon. member for Medicine Hat said, the total irrigated acreage of southern Alberta is over one million acres, of which hardly one-half is under cultivation. Of course, the most extensively irrigated areas in Canada are to be found in southern Alberta; other irrigated areas such as the fruit areas in British Columbia and the ranching areas in southeastern Saskatchewan are very small in comparison, and I venture to say that few members of this house and very few people who reside in Alberta have any idea of the size of the irrigated areas in that province and the vast amount of capital invested. The records show that in Alberta we have four corporations that have installed works for irrigation; we have seven irrigation districts and 332 privately owned schemes. Of the four corporate projects, three are under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and I should like to tell the house the size of those districts and the area that can be irrigated in each. The Canadian Pacific Railway area at Lethbridge gets its water from the St. Mary river, and contains 99,000 acres. The Canadian Pacific Railway west area contains 300,000 acres, the eastern area 400,000 acres and the area supplied by the Canada Land and Irrigation Company 130,000 acres. Then there are the irrigation districts, the Taber, with 21,661 acres, the Lethbridge northern with 100,000, the New West with 4,501, the Little Bow with 3,090, the Magrath with 6,975, the Raymond with 15,129, and the United with 34,235. In all, with the 332 privately owned schemes, we have 1,090,806 acres available.

Many of these irrigation works were carried on with money raised through the sale of bonds issued by the various districts, and in some cases those bonds were endorsed by the Alberta government. The people who resided in the districts were not able to meet the annual interest charges, and as a result the districts have been taken over by the provincial government and to-day are being operated under government supervision. The money tied up in these irrigation districts amounts to a tremendous sum. When I say that the initial investment in the province of Alberta is over $35,000,000 and that we have spent many millions more in betterment and upkeep, the house will realize just what liability the people of this country have in these irrigation schemes. It is true we have a great asset in these irrigable lands, and this asset runs far beyond the canal that carries the water or the ditches that bring it to the several farms. I also want to point out that there are very few of us who realize the immense liabilities that face those who have to meet the bonded indebtedness thereon. If we are to avoid any danger in regard to the security that is invested, the people who live on these lands must be enabled to grow specialized crops which will bring more in return than the ordinary wheat farmer could get if he were to put all of his land under wheat. These irrigated lands are adapted to the growing of specialized crops that cannot be produced on dry land, and the mistake that the irrigation farmer has made in the past has been that he has confined his efforts to a single crop that would bring in the most return with the least effort, and that is wheat. The last returns we have from the irrigation projects show that in the year 1928—that was the last return we were able to get—more than 66 per cent of the land under irrigation was devoted to wheat. That is a great mistake. The years that have followed have shown that we must find some other crop to supplement that wheat crop. The farmers have recognized that and they are now going in for specialized crops.

Among specialized crops I might mention alfalfa, because we can produce annually from four to five tons per acre of luscious alfalfa hay from these irrigated lands; and we can also raise alfalfa seed, for in 1931 we took first and second prizes at the Chicago and Toronto fairs for alfalfa seed grown east of Calgary. The first prize for potatoes was captured by a farmer living in the immediate vicinity of Lethbridge; and so far as the sugar beet is concerned I shall show what has been produced within the last year, and what that country is capable of producing in that direction. When we come to specialized crops there are two points to be taken into consideration—first of all agricultural suitability, and secondly the economic value that can be obtained from the growth and harvesting of the crop. As regards agricultural suitability, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat has pointed out, there is no crop that is more suitable for irrigated areas than sugar beets; and so far as economic value is concerned, it is still the best crop, because we find that there is a greater return from its production than from any other crop grown on these lands in the west. And the large acreage that is kept under sugar beet production in the western states, where they have conditions similar to our own, goes to prove that this is the best-paying crop to be found on the North American continent, so far as irrigation is concerned.

I will not go on to tell the house anything about the agricultural suitability of the sugar beet as a crop for the irrigation farmer, but I would place before the house some facts with regard to two farmers living on one of these irrigation tracts, side by side, one on a northwest and the other on the northeast quarter sections north of Lethbridge. The first farmer had this last year 33 acres of sugar beet, which produced 330 tons, giving a return of $1,715; 12 acres of alfalfa, 48 tons, $384; 30 acres of wheat, from land which the previous year had grown sugar beets and from which he secured 46 bushels per acre, giving a return of $438; 24 acres of wheat following wheat, 25 bushels per acre, with a return of $210; 20 acres of oats following wheat, the return being $270; 8 acres of barley following wheat, giving $96, making a total of $3,113, from a farm of 160 acres. Besides this he had 28 acres of sweet clover for pasture purposes. This man keeps from eight to ten milch cows besides pigs, chickens and ducks, and he has a wonderful garden producing all kinds of vegetables. He had an income of over $3,000. Now listen to what his neighbour had. He was a wheat farmer, leaving some of his land for fallowing in the summer; he would alternate, putting in half his land this year and the other half next year.

[Mr. J S. Stewart.]

He had 100 acres of wheat and he received $700. Compare the two: One man with an income of $3,113 and the other with $700.

The sugar beet crop has meant very much to the farmers in the irrigated areas of southern Alberta during the past year. Seven hundred farmers in 1931 on 12,000 acres of sugar beet land produced 105,000 tons and received from the company $630,000. In other words, those 700 farmers received an average of $900 each; or, for each acre they had under cultivation, they received $52.50. The highest previous yield was in 1927 when the farmers produced 7.72 tons per acre. This year, through better cultivation and a wiser use of fertilizer, which we find practically at our doors, being able to secure it from the Consolidated Smelters of Trail, we have increased the tonnage to 8.75 tons per acre, which is an increase of over one ton per acre. We have around Lethbridge what is known as the 15 Ton Beet Club. Membership in this club is limited to those who have grown sugar beets and have produced more than 15 tons per acre on a 5 acre plot. This year we find that the gentleman who secured first prize produced 21.797 tons per acre on his 5 acres, receiving $595 cash; the second prize went to the farmer who produced 19·36 tons per acre, receiving $480 for his plot; the third prize to the farmer who produced 17·641 tons per acre, receiving $440; and the fourth prize to the farmer who produced 17·227, for which he got $430.

The money spent in connection with these sugar beets is vast, and it goes to a great number of people. The sugar company paid $630,000 to these farmers who raised the sugar beets; but these farmers in turn had to pay in wages to the 1,500 men who hoed the crop, the sum of $250,000. That was what was paid out in labour. And coming to the expenses in connection with running the factory, we find that last year the sugar factory paid 335 men $165,000. Their supplies were:

Lime rock	10,000
Bags	75,000
Coke	6,000
Boxes, oils and other supplies	73,500

The amount of freight paid to the railways was made up as follows:

Beet haulage	$105,000

To secure their beets they must haul them over a stretch of territory 120 miles from the centre of operations.

Coal	$ 16,000
Lime rock	6,500
Bags	1,000
Coke	1,000
Sugar distribution	160,000
Boxes, oils, etc	1,500

This makes a total of $665,500 for factory labour, supplies and freight. The grand total distributed through that one sugar plant in the immediate vicinity of Lethbridge was therefore, in the last year, $1,295,500. The year before it was over $1,400,000. The result has been of great benefit to those who grow sugar beets. I am informed by an official of one of the irrigation companies that 80 per cent of the beet growers paid all or part of their irrigation rates during 1931, whereas only 40 per cent of the non-beet growers paid any rates at all, and that the beet growers paid back 98 per cent of the loans they had secured in 1931 from the credit societies, whereas only 40 per cent of the non-beet growers paid back any of those loans.

The manager of the beet factory, in speaking at a meeting a few days ago, had this to say:

> The beet growers here had received $5.50 per ton for last year's beets due to the high sugar content in spite of the low prices of sugar. Mr. Wood here stated that the beets grown in this factory district last year were the best beets grown on the American continent, being the highest in sugar content.

Therefore I can endorse the statement made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), but I should like to elaborate further on it. The sugar content of the beets grown in southern Alberta this year was as high as 18.34 per cent; that of beets grown in the United States was 17 per cent, and that of beets grown in Great Britain was 15 per cent, so that in all probability the sugar beets raised in southern Alberta have the highest sugar content of any beets grown in the world. I see an hon. member from Quebec shaking his head. He will be at liberty, when the opportunity arises, to give his views to the house.

For some seven years we have had one sugar beet factory operating in western Canada at the town of Raymond in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. It is needless for me to inform the house that for some years previous we had a factory there, but it did not prosper very well and had to be removed to the United States. This last factory was established there in 1925 and for six years operated as a straight beet sugar concern. But last April, or to be accurate, on April 23, 1931, this sugar beet factory was purchased by the Cane Sugar Refineries of British Columbia, and it is now operated as part of their plant. This sugar beet concern, having been placed with the cane sugar interests, is hardly seeking expansion. I think the management are not very anxious to expand. But the sugar beet growers of southern Alberta are most anxious that we shall have another factory and they are asking for an expansion. The present management limited the sugar beet acreage from 14,000 to 12,000 acres last year, and it may be they will be able to take a few more acres next year because I believe they are about to spend some $300,000 in betterments in their factory.

So far as this question is concerned, I have from the very first avoided interjecting politics into it. It is too large a question to permit of the introduction of politics; it means too much to the people of southern Alberta and also to that very much greater question, irrigation in southern Alberta. But when one finds some officials of a local beet growers' association, who have always taken a great interest in politics, and quite rightly so, using their official position to advance the interests of the Liberal party, either on their own account or by guidance or assistance from the heads of the party in the city of Lethbridge, and seeming to be more anxious to advance the interests of the Liberal party than to secure an expansion of the industry, I think the time has arrived when the member who represents that constituency should stand in his place and inform the house as to the particular situation of this industry. Last session the hon. member for Medicine Hat quite rightly questioned the government regarding their attitude as to assisting the industry. I sat silent, thinking it would be in the best interests of the community that they should hear the definite reply from the minister in charge, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who was then Minister of Finance. But when politicians who belong to the beet growers and officials of some of the local organizations take an opportunity to publish certain statements in a paper that is not friendly to the government, that is not friendly to the gentleman who leads the party, a gentleman of whom I am extremely proud and to whom I hope to be most loyal, it makes me feel it is time for me to explain some of the details regarding this matter. In that paper they state they are disappointed at and dissatisfied with the attitude of the present government as regards expansion of the sugar beet industry. The first statement which, in all courtesy, I should like to make to hon. members opposite is that if in southern Alberta we have only one sugar beet factory instead of two, it is due to the tariff policy of our hon. friends opposite and to the lack of assistance and support by the former administration to this industry when it was in its infancy. I informed the house that this industry operated for six years as a straight sugar beet factory. It could have been assisted by the then Liberal government as a straight sugar beet cooperative association, but things were allowed to continue until the project had almost reached the point where it could not operate any longer. I should like to refer the house to Hansard of September 19, 1930, where we have a statement by the ex-Minister of the Interior, the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), who was the Alberta representative in the former Liberal cabinet. This is what he says, as reported at page 418, in regard to the sugar beet factory at Raymond:

> I know of the establishment of this industry and the success it has been in the locality, and I know how valuable it is to the farmers there. I know also that they have for a year or two been asking that some consideration be given them in the way of more protection. Their machinery, which was secondhand in the first place, was brought into Canada free of duty, and we did lend them some assistance in that regard. I may say to my hon. friend that any information I could obtain with respect to their ability to carry on and to make reasonable profits under the existing duties seemed to be well borne out, and I do know that they intended to expand. I think that perhaps, even without further assistance in the way of a duty, they will expand.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that they applied, not for one year, but for two years to the former government when this was a straight sugar beet corporation. Let me repeat the hon. member's words:

> I know also that they have for a year or two been asking that some consideration be given them in the way of more protection.

They were long-suffering; they were patient, because they kept at it for a year or two. They applied for assistance, but all the assistance they got was permission to bring in second-hand machinery free. No doubt they also got something else that was free, and that would be God's blessing and the word, pass on, my brother. The former Minister of the Interior goes on to say:

> I may say to my hon. friend that any information I could obtain with respect to their ability to carry on and to make reasonable profits under the existing duties seemed to be well borne out, and I do know that they intended to expand.

That statement was made in this house on September 19, 1930. The intelligence branch of the former Liberal administration was not working up to the proper pitch if that is all the information which the former administration had on the subject. Surely it must have been known to the then minister that a delegation was sent to the United States, to Salt Lake city, for the purpose of trying to induce the Utah-Idaho Sugar Company to establish another plant near the city of Lethbridge. That delegation consisted of farmers from the Lethbridge northern and from some other irrigation districts, as well as members of the board of trade. The delegation brought back a report which was published in the Lethbridge Herald and was given to the board of trade. I find that this report was signed by the vice-president and general manager of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Company, who made the following statement to the delegation:

> As you are aware, the price of sugar both in the United States and Canada has had a fairly steady decline during the past few years due to the world's increase in the supply of sugar, over which we have no control. In addition to this, our Raymond factory has not thus far been able to secure sufficient beets to run to capacity, although the present outlook for the coming year indicates that this condition will be corrected during 1930.

Then listen to this:

> As a result of these conditions, our operations in Alberta have shown thus far a very considerable loss.

That statement was made in January, and less than eight months after, the former Minister of the Interior stated that the sugar beet industry of southern Alberta was getting along very well and could expand without any assistance.

I find that my time is growing short. In conclusion, I wish to repeat my statement regarding the lack of assistance by the former administration to this project. Due to that lack of assistance the industry was prevented from expanding. The second reason lies with the tariff. The former administration gave no assistance except that they allowed this company to bring in secondhand machinery free. But let me tell the members of this house that a delegation met the present Prime Minister of this country within ten days of the time he took the oath of office, about August 15th, 1930, the first delegation from Alberta, so far as I am aware, to meet the Prime Minister. It was composed of representatives of the beet growers and of the manufacturers. These two men, one representing the company, and the other the beet growers, placed their representations before the Prime Minister, and the manager of that factory had the following statement to make to the Prime Minister within ten days of the time the Conservative party came into power:

> The instability of Canadian tariff policy as affecting sugar has been the factor which very largely has prevented progress in the establishment of a domestic sugar beet industry.

If I had time I should like to read that again. He states that the reason the industry was not able to go ahead and expand was that they could not get any assistance from the former government.

Mr. YOUNG: No stability of tariff?

Mr. GOTT: You would not second the resolution. Keep quiet.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): These representatives who came to see the Prime Minister told him of the economic conditions and of the financial loss which they had sustained, as well as of the desire of the beet growers to have the industry expand. But they told the Prime Minister something more than that. They told him about a condition that was allowed to go on during six years of the regime of the former administration. The Prime Minister on September 19, 1930, speaking in this house, said, as will be found at page 455 of Hansard:

> And they were asking, not so much for protection, as for some assurance that they would not be destroyed by unfair competition, which they regarded as possible under the circumstances that prevailed. They were perfectly frank about the matter.

What was that unfair competition? It was competition coming from a great cane sugar concern, competition which was very real indeed, and in regard to which competition our hon. friends took no action during six years that they were in power. Let me tell the former Minister of the Interior that during the early months of the year 1931 cane sugar refined in Vancouver was selling at a lower price in Calgary, because it had to meet the competition of the sugar beet product manufactured in the town of Raymond, than it was selling at points on the main line of the Canadian Pacific within half the distance from Vancouver to Calgary.

Mr. YOUNG: Was that unfair competition?

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): By all means. It was competition that was meant to put that industry out of business.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask a question?

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): My time is very limited, but if my hon. friend will ask his question after I get through I shall be glad to answer him. The irony of the situation will be seen when I state that on that delegation that went to the United States to ask the Utah Idaho Sugar Company to erect another factory, there happened to be one of the very men who are to-day dissatisfied with this government and with its attitude towards the expansion of the sugar industry, one of the very men of that sugar beet local. He was one of the delegates to the United States, and he knew—he must have known—the dire situation in which that industry was at that time. I wonder if he ever said anything to the former administration about being dissatisfied because they would not come to the help of that infant industry. I wonder if the hon. member for Medicine Hat ever rose in his place in this house in those days and asked the former Minister of the Interior to do something to help that industry that was about to pass out. I wonder if the paper published in our territory, and which is very unfriendly to this government so far as its tariff policies are concerned, ever printed an editorial urging that assistance be given to an industry which was then in its death throes. No. They waited until it was just about to pass out, and then they had to go and get another doctor. An hon. gentleman asks, what did we do? We had less than six months to attend to this matter when the industry passed into the hands of another concern. I am sure that my hon. friend from West Edmonton will not rise in his place and ask that we give any assistance to the sugar cane industry of Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why wouldn't he?

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): Because the people of Canada have been very generous to that industry, and if any assistance is given to the sugar industry at the present time it would be given indirectly to the cane sugar refineries of Canada.

Lack of time prevents me from stating what action the Prime Minister took. He promised the delegation that met him that he would meet their wishes if he could, and not only did my hon. friend from Weyburn believe that, but he questioned the Prime Minister about it. There are also some very astute business men in this dominion who believed it, and as a consequence we find that the sugar beet projects in Canada have now gone out of business. In order that we may have a thorough inquiry into the sugar beet industry might I suggest that the house invite representatives of the sugar beet growers to come to Ottawa to meet with representatives of the cane sugar refineries at Vancouver, British Columbia, as well as representatives from the Consumers' League of Canada, because they are all interested in this question.

Mr. YOUNG: We will be there.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): Let them come here, sit around a table and see if we cannot work out some plan whereby we will be able to do something to assist in carrying that tremendous irrigation load in the province of Alberta.

I have therefore an amendment to move, seconded by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley). The resolution of the hon. member for Medicine Hat is as follows:

That in the opinion of this house the government should in cooperation with the sugar factories encourage in every reasonable way the use of sugar made from home grown raw material.

My amendment is as follows:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted:

All questions affecting the beet sugar industry in Canada be referred to the select standing committee on agriculture with instructions to inquire into the action which may be taken by the government by way of customs duties, subsidies, bonuses or otherwise, either in or without cooperation with the provincial governments for promoting the prosperity of the said industry and developing the production of Canadian grown sugar, and report to this house.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I would not infringe upon the time of the house had it not been for the interjection of my name into this debate by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart). He and I bear the same name and have been in various parliaments for a goodly number of years. I think he will agree that when I had some authority with respect to matters of this kind, not only in the federal but in the provincial arena, the good people who live in the constituency of Lethbridge received considerable attention at my hands. The irrigation project in which my hon. friend is now so much interested was launched at a time when I happened to be premier of the province; I was premier when the bonds were guaranteed, consequently I had a good deal of interest in the constituency and in the project to which my hon. friend has referred.

Unfortunately that project has not been as successful as its promoters had hoped. May I say to my hon. friend from Lethbridge however, and to this house, that so far as the industries in this country are concerned, my position is only too well known. I never encouraged an industry to come into Canada by any promise that it would be bonused or helped—never on any occasion. My hon. friend will not be traducing my position if he states that I held out any hope that if that industry came to Canada I would at any time as a representative of the province of Alberta be willing to pledge myself that the duties on an import of such magnitude would be increased in order to encourage that industry, or the industry in which my good friend from Essex, who is so voluble, is interested. I wish to make my position clear in that respect. After the failure of the first company which operated at Raymond, the company to which my hon. friend from Lethbridge referred proposed to come to Canada and to move in machinery which already had been in operation in the United States. We were very glad to say to them that by order in council we would relieve them from the necessity of paying duty upon the machinery so brought in. At no time, however, did they receive any encouragement or promise from the then government that they would be given a bonus, or that the tariff duties on sugar would be affected or changed to suit their interests. So much for that.

My hon. friend has said that from the very inception they experienced difficulty. I ask him, Mr. Speaker, why it was that a delegation of farmers went to interview that company and ask them to expand their business? The business, as I stated in the speech from which my hon. friend has quoted, was in a fairly prosperous condition. True, the price of sugar was higher in those days. It is quite possible that if sugar had been at its present price that industry would not have been established in Lethbridge. The fact is, however, that sugar prices were then higher; the prices of farm produce were higher, and I was perfectly correct, from the information I possessed, in my statement in this house that the company did intend to expand.

May I say further that I have never known a manufacturing industry in Canada or anywhere else which was not at all times willing to accept something at the hands of the government by way of greater protection or increased bounty. I have not known one of them to refuse help of that type; the fact is that they are usually around looking for protection. I am one who believes—and we might as well settle this question once and for all, so far as I am concerned—that secondary industries established in Canada which cannot exist through their own efforts had better not come here. They generally cost us more than they are worth, from the point of view of either of creating employment or of creating advantages for the individuals who have to be the purchasers of the goods they manufacture. I make no apology for making that statement at any time, and I will make it in Lethbridge or anywhere else.

If my hon. friend opposite thinks he can make political capital out of what I have said in his constituency of Lethbridge, he is perfectly welcome to do so.

May I say something further to my hon. friend—and this is something which arose from his statement to-day: How does it come about that the company to which he referred was able to operate under a Liberal government, and although they were so generously treated by the present Prime Minister of this dominion ten days after he took office, within two years they are forced to sell out to the sugar trusts? That was the very interesting statement to-day on the floor of this house by my hon. friend. Why was it that for six years that company was able to operate under the beneficent influence of a Liberal government, but within eighteen months after a Conservative government took office, a government pledged to relieve entirely their difficulties, they had to succumb to the great trusts and sell out?

My hon. friend is here to-day pleading that this house should do something because of the unfortunate position in which that industry has found itself, owing to the lack of action on the part of the federal government. That is the situation in a nutshell, and I believe in making that statement I have held strictly to my hon. friend's description of the conditions. I will be interested to know what the government purposes to do to relieve the situation my hon. friend has described; probably they intend to increase the tariff on sugar. If they do I shall vote against such a measure. I am content to take the consequences of what may happen to me. If it is proven that in other ways the industry requires assistance, and such assistance can be given in a manner similar to that in which it was given to the coal industry of Alberta, I will reserve my judgment until I know exactly what such assistance should be. So far as tariffs are concerned I state clearly that I am opposed to the increase of tariff on any commodity. Surely to goodness we have before us to-day an example of the effects of increasing tariffs. If increasing tariffs is helping Canada to-day —then, God help Canada; that is all I have to say. If increasing tariffs is bringing prosperity to any industry, I want to know it, because I have not been able to find it for myself. I learn only that the silk industry, one entirely foreign to Canada—

An hon. MEMBER: And the button industry.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, true; we on the farms will not have to use nails any more. So far as I am able to discover, the system of protection is not the proper method to assist any industry; certainly every attempt of the present government to assist industry in that way has proved a dismal failure.

Hon. R. D. MORAND (East Essex): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the acting leader of the party opposite who, with considerable heat, has been worrying as to why these particular sugar industries were forced to sell out their interests, I can readily understand why the mover of the resolution (Mr. Gershaw) did not get very far during the years his government was in power. First of all I should like to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) upon the recruits that his creed has made on the other side of the house. This afternoon I have heard from the member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) quite a good confession of his creed. However, the hon. member is somewhat timid yet in his new faith. Probably he is influenced a little by his desk mate. The pious wish that he expressed was a gesture to his constituents.

I may tell my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) that there is not the least doubt that when the concerns who have the sugar business in Canada absolutely within their hands saw the new party in power and realized the danger of a great increase in the beet sugar industry, they made it their business to secure the sugar beet factories and so control their operation.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. MORAND: My hon. friend laughs. Permit me to tell him that this year that has happened to two sugar beet factories next to my constituency—one in Chatham, the other in Wallaceburg; they have been purchased by the cane sugar manufacturers, and to-day the farmers are being told that there will be fewer sugar beets grown in that country. It is quite easy to understand that those who are interested in the importation of cane sugar and its refining are not interested in the development of a rival industry that interferes with their prices.

I do not propose to take very much time in discussing the sugar beet industry in my part of the country. We have had two factories there, and they have been a wonderful assistance to the local farmers. Anything more that I might say would simply be a repetition of what has been said about the conditions of the industry in the west, and about the kind and quality of sugar beets—and superlatives usually fail after the westerners are through talking.

The sugar industry started in Canada nearly fifty years ago with bounties from the Dominion government. It was developed in Ontario by the Ontario Agricultural college. It was subsidized to the extent of half a cent a pound in this province, until to-day we have a type of sugar beet which contains more than double the sugar content of the beets grown at the inception of the industry. In my part of the country thousands of people depend on the sugar beet industry; the growing of sugar beets gives a tremendous amount of work to the farmers, and the conveyance of the crop to the factories is a source of income not only to the trucking concerns but also to the manufacturers and distributors of trucks. The land for the growing of sugar beets is either irrigated, as in the west, or, as in our part of the country, land which has been improved by very expensive drainage.

For a number of years in my county we were able to send sugar beets into the United States, and quite a large industry was developed along that line; to-day our sugar beets can no longer be exported to that market. As a result of this and other causes the curtailment of sugar beet growing in my part of the country is a real hardship on those engaged in the industry. The farmers have prepared their land for this crop and it is highly taxed, they have secured the machinery necessary for their farming operations, and the trucks for hauling their crops to the factories, and any measure which will in any way not only ensure a continuance of the beet growing industry but also increase the acreage under cultivation would certainly be of real value to our farmers.

I have a great deal of pleasure in supporting the amendment to the resolution, because I believe that if this whole matter is thoroughly threshed out before the agriculture committee much information will be elicited that will be of service to the farmers and others, even including my good friend from West Edmonton. The amendment proposes that the committee study the question of helping the beet sugar industry by way of customs duty, bonus or otherwise. I would suggest that under the "otherwise" the question of quotas be studied. This system may be new in Canada, but it is frequently discussed in Europe. In a study of the quota system made at the last Imperial conference it was particularly stressed that articles to be usefully treated under the system must go through some one definite avenue of distribution. Surely the sugar industry of Canada presents a bottle neck that would very well lend itself to at least a study of the question of establishing a quota for beet sugar grown in Canada. I am told that in France and in Italy from time to time they definitely set the quota of home-grown wheat which must enter into their domestic flour production. When the committee meets I hope they will consider the question whether it would be possible to establish a quota for Canadian grown sugar that our sugar interests would be forced to apply in the sugar they produce and distribute throughout the dominion. The quota possibly could be based at the beginning on the average acreage over a period of five years, to be gradually increased year by year until the percentage of home grown sugar to the imported had reached a certain level. I am not sure whether this is possible, but I think it is worth while studying. It may appeal to our friends on the other side inasmuch as its adoption would not be raising the customs duties. It has the further value that despite the fact that the sugar industry of Canada may be in the hands of a very few persons, they will be forced gradually to increase the number of acres under cultivation and so assure for the farmers of Canada a fair distribution of their own production throughout the dominion. With that addition to the amendment I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Morand) gave us a very interesting and a very brief history of the sugar industry in Canada. He tells us that it was established many years ago by a bonus, it was encouraged by the technical skill and research work of experts of the Department of Agriculture, it was maintained by bounties received from the provinces, it was sheltered by a protective tariff. Now, we are told that after all this it has become a part of the sugar trust, and is coming before this parliament asking for what? Asking the government to help pay for beets it requires in its business. The resolution of my hon. friend from Medicine Hat is a much more serious matter than would appear on the surface. It aims to have all our refined sugar made from Canadian grown sugar beets, rather than from imported raw sugar, and the hon. member suggests a bonus of $1.50 a ton. A bonus of $1.50 a ton on the sugar we consumed in this country last year would amount to $600,000, while a bonus of that amount on sugar beets would cost us, according to the figures my hon. friend gave, about five times as much, or $3,000,000. But that is not the entire cost. If this resolution should succeed in its purpose and raw sugar should be shut out, requiring our manufacturers to use Canadian sugar beets, it would cost the treasury of this country in loss of revenue $3,271,000 yearly.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend laughs; let me prove that statement. Last year we imported 8,301,000 hundredweight of sugar, on which the duty amounted to $3,271,000. If that sugar had been imported under the general tariff, from Cuba or some other country outside the empire, it would have yielded a revenue of $9,625,000, but because we bought it within the empire or from those countries enjoying a preferential rate, we received only $3,271,000. In other words, for the privilege of buying our raw sugar within the empire we paid last year the neat little sum of $6,154,000. I hope my hon. friends opposite will remember that this year when they attend the Imperial conference to encourage trade within the empire.

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend disapprove of that?

Mr. YOUNG: Does not my hon. friend think it would have been better to leave that $6,000,000 in the pockets of the Canadian people instead of in the pockets of people in other parts of the empire?

Mr. STEVENS: I am asking my hon. friend if he disapproves.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, I do, if that helps you any.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend wants the general rate to apply throughout?

Mr. YOUNG: No; I want the tariff removed all along the line instead of in spots. If you are going to apply a tariff I want it applied equally to everyone.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): The tariff on sugar was reduced during the regime of the Liberal party.

Mr. YOUNG: So much the better. As I said, this raw sugar coming into the country brought in revenue to the extent of $3,271,000. If you shut out that raw sugar and supply our refineries with Canadian grown raw sugar you will lose every dollar of that revenue. We will not get our sugar any cheaper; that money will go into the pockets of the industry, and that loss of revenue will have to be made up in some other way. Again the government would have to resort to new methods of taxation in order to make up the revenue which by this resolution would be diverted into the pockets of private individuals.

My hon. friend from Medicine Hat says that this assistance to the industry is necessary in order to save a tremendous investment in irrigation work in Alberta. He says a million acres can be irrigated there, and that investments have been made with a view to irrigating that area of land, but the trouble is that the land was bought at from $50 to $70 an acre, and the cost of the irrigation work has been so high that the only way they can hope to make the project successful is to grow something that will yield a very high acreage return.

Let us suppose the project is successful; let us suppose we put a tariff on sugar that would enable those gentlemen to put the million acres under sugar beets. What would happen then? Last year we had 40,000 acres in Canada under sugar beets, and my hon. friend says that this acreage produced 10 per cent of our sugar requirements. That being the case, all our requirements could be met by 400,000 acres, but here is a proposal that would have the effect of putting one million acres under sugar beets in Alberta alone, to say nothing of what might be done in British Columbia, Ontario and the other provinces. What would be the result. If this scheme were successful it would result in more sugar being produced than we could possibly consume; we would be forced into the export market, and the sugar beet grower would find himself in the position the dairy farmer is in to-day.

Mr. GOTT: They are exporting now, instead of importing 44,000,000 pounds a year.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, and we know what they are getting for the butter exported. Our sugar producers would be exporting, and the world price which would be much lower than the domestic price would fix the amount the grower would get.

Mr. GOTT: What would be the price of butter if we had imported 44,000,000 pounds in the last twelve months?

Mr. YOUNG: Reference has been made to the attempt of the British government to assist the sugar industry in England by means of bonuses. I think it was Sir Herbert Samuel who wrote an article a short time ago analysing those sugar bonuses and their effect on trade. I have not the article or the figures before me, but the cost to the treasury was appalling and the benefit to industry was practically nil. It was one of the most colossal blunders the British government ever committed, and the same thing would happen if we resorted to that practice here.

My hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart) said that the sugar industry needed stability of tariff. I am sure the tariff was more stable under the previous government than is the case now. What about the new valuation for duty put on sugar a short time ago? This power which has been placed in the hands of the minister to put a valuation for duty on any commodity at any time is the most unsettling influence we have had for many years in the commercial world. When a man undertakes to bring in a shipment of goods he does not know what the duty will be, even when the ship lands. So unstable is our tariff to-day, with this provision, that from day to day no man knows what he may have to pay in the way of duty. No man can make contracts for the shipment of goods into this country because he has not even a remote idea of what duty the government will make him pay when the goods arrive.

I agree with the statement of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) that we should not support any industry here that cannot stand on its own feet. We should not encourage industries to come to this country simply because somebody says it would be a fine thing to have them here. Any industry that is leaning on its neighbours is not a source of wealth to this country; it is a handicap to other industries which otherwise might be self-supporting.

Mr. GORDON: I should like to ask the hon. member a question before he concludes. He says he is behind the statement of the hon. member for West Edmonton with regard to the denying of bonuses to industry. How then does he justify the bonuses to the coal industry by way of subventions, which were introduced when my hon. friend was a member of the former government and which were started by the hon. member for West Edmonton?

Mr. YOUNG: I never was a member of the government.

Mr. GORDON: A member of the governing party, then.

Mr. YOUNG: As regards bonuses to industry, will any man here say that he ever heard me speak a word in support of them?

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): I have listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks made in this house this afternoon by the mover of the resolution, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), and I regret very much that he did not see fit to draft the resolution in such a way as to cover the oldest sugar industry in Canada —the maple sugar industry. As hon. members know, this industry was flourishing in Canada even before the arrival of the French, during the time of the Indians. I have consulted a very interesting book published in Ottawa by Mr. J. B. Spencer, The Maple Sugar Industry in Canada. In this work a careful study is made of the progress of the maple sugar industry in Canada. With the indulgence of the house I should like to quote rather extensively from it. The writer says:

> The making of maple sugar, which is confined entirely to the American continent, had a very early beginning, as before the advent of the white man, the Indian had learned to extract and concentrate the sap of the maple tree. On the approach of spring, the trees were gashed with a tomahawk, in a slanting direction, and beneath the opening was inserted a wooden chip or spout to direct the fluid, drop by drop, into receptacle resting on the ground. The sap was caught in a birch bark dish and boiled in earthen kettles. The small quantity of dark, thick syrup thus made was the only sugar available to the Indians, and is stated by early writers to have been highly prized. The first settlers learned from the Indians the art of maple sugar making and followed for perhaps a century their crude methods of manufacture, except for the substitution of iron or copper kettles for vessels of clay or bark. In the early days, before the timber acquired much value, the axe continued to be used for tapping the trees, and the sap was caught in wooden troughs and conveyed in buckets to a central point to be boiled. The boiling was done in large iron kettles suspended from a pole in the open woods, in a sheltered location but with no protection from the sun, rain, snow or the ashes, falling leaves, moss and bits or bark that were driven about by the wind. The products made by this crude method were strong in flavour, dark in colour and variable in quality. In the past 50 years, however, maple sugar making has become a rather highly organized commercial industry. An early improvement was the substitution of the auger for the axe in tapping, coopered buckets taking the place of the birch bark "caso" or hewn sap trough, while the kettle gave way to the evaporating pan which has in late years developed into the modern evaporator with corrugated bottom and separate compartments. Not alone for the conservation of the life of the tree but also for cleanliness in sugar making, the wooden spout has almost disappeared in the most advanced sections; in fact, the present tendency is toward the use of metal in every article of equipment with which the sap, syrup or sugar comes in contact.

I apologize for having quoted at such length from this book, but I wished to impress upon the house the fact that this particular branch of the sugar industry flourished centuries ago. I am surprised, considering that the sugar beet industry has been in existence in Canada for only thirty-five years, that no hon. member, either opposite or on this side, has given any thought to the maple sugar industry.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. gentleman inform the house how many countries compete with Canada in the manufacture of maple sugar?

Mr. GAGNON: From the statistics which I find in The Canada Year Book 1931, it appears that no country in the world is competing with us. I was just going to give a few statistics, however, to show the progress of the industry since 1926. In 1926 the production of maple sugar in Canada was 7,137,303 pounds, and the production of maple syrup 1,765,570 gallons, the total value being $4,896,375. In 1927 the production of maple sugar was 9,831,697 pounds and the production of syrup 2,154,705 gallons, the total value being $4,934,801. In 1928 the money value of both products was $5,584,588; in 1929, $6,118,656; and in 1930, $5,252,620.

Now, taking the production of maple sugar province by province, I find that in Nova Scotia the industry has been making progress, and the same is true of the provinces of New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec. In other words, the whole of eastern Canada is deeply interested in seeing that the government take proper steps to encourage the expansion of the maple sugar industry of the dominion. Turning to beet sugar production, I find that the Ontario government has given a bonus to the industry, but I would point out that at no time has the federal government extended any subsidy or bonus to the maple sugar industry of Canada. I find also that the tobacco industry has received subsidies, and the same remark applies to the live stock industry. The federal department of agriculture grants certain amounts to live stock cooperative societies, and recently the federal government has allowed the sum of $50,000 for the purpose of promoting the sale of salmon from British Columbia. I submit, therefore, that the maple sugar industry being a national industry, in which thousands of farmers throughout eastern Canada are interested, ought to receive a special protection from the federal government. I recognize that such help ought to come first from the provincial government, but in order to stimulate the trade in maple sugar and maple syrup, this government ought to cooperate with the provincial governments. In the province of Quebec the maple sugar producers have organized a cooperative society which is known as Les Producteurs de Sucre d'Erable de Quebec. This organization has established a refinery plant at Plessisville in the county of Megantic and has recently begun the construction of another refinery plant at Beauce Junction, in the county of Beauce represented in the house by my hon. friend Mr. Lacroix. A great number of the maple sugar and maple syrup producers from the county of Dorchester are interested in that society and I have no doubt that what I say in this regard will meet with their approval. The maple syrup industry yields to the farmers of Dorchester a revenue equal in one month to that derived from the milk industry over a period of twelve months.

As I said a moment ago in view of the fact that the federal government has already subsidized the tobacco producers as well as those engaged in live stock and other forms of agriculture, it ought to help the maple sugar and maple syrup manufacturers of our country. May I also point out that, according to the information I have, the National Research Council a few months ago was able to send a specialist to England to study the wool industry. Wool is produced in every country in the world and is subject to universal competition. On the other hand, maple sugar and syrup are produced only in Canada and are under no competition from other countries. The maple sugar industry, this old agricultural industry is now in need of subsidies or grants in order to extend its production and the sale of its products in the open market. Therefore a few days ago I wrote to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) asking for some help in order to encourage the production and extension of the maple sugar industry in this country. In that regard may I suggest to the government that the Department of Trade and Commerce together with the Department of Agriculture should grant a subsidy, say of $10,000 each year for five years. In that way, the cooperative societies at least in our province, not to speak for the other provinces which may take such steps as they deem best, would be in a position to begin researches and experiments towards finding new ways of utilizing this product as well as launching a publicity campaign for the extension of the maple sugar and maple syrup market. Last year, may I repeat it, the federal government gave a subsidy to encourage the salmon industry in British Columbia and I respectfully submit that the same consideration ought to be given to the maple sugar industry in Canada.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am rather astonished that the mover has not seen fit to broaden out the scope of his resolution sufficiently to cover the maple sugar industry of Canada. I do not say that by way of reproach or criticism, because I understand in Alberta whence he comes, there is no production of maple sugar. But may I suggest to the mover of the resolution that he add to it the following words:

And encourage the production and extension of the maple sugar industry in Canada.

If this resolution is sent to the agriculture committee, I think it would be proper that experts be called upon to give their views as regards the maple sugar industry in eastern Canada and also as to the advisability of asking for a bonus from this government to stimulate the production, perfect the methods of production and undertake a campaign of publicity to increase the sale of maple sugar and maple syrup amongst the Canadian consumers and those from abroad.

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): Mr. Speaker, before this resolution passes, I should like to say a word or two in respect to the motion itself and the amendment thereto. I deprecate to the fullest extent the fact that this motion has emanated from this side of the house.

Mr. GOTT: On a question of privilege, before the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) proceeds with his remarks, I want to draw to the attention of the house some observations that he made in a speech recently. This is a question of personal privilege. According to the Border Cities Star of February 23, the hon. member said:

Mr. Hepburn also expressed his regret that Eccles J. Gott, M.P. for Essex South, was not in his seat.

At another place in the same issue of the Border Cities Star there is in glaring headlines:

Hepburn Regrets Gott's Absence from criticism

Mr. YOUNG: We always regret that.

Mr. GOTT: I am not speaking to the seconder of the resolution. The hon. member for West Elgin sought to impress upon the people of southern Ontario that Gott was continually absent from his seat in the house. That is my question of privilege. During my six years in the House of Commons, this is the first time I have ever been privileged to see the hon. member for West Elgin arise to address the house. I may have been absent when he has spoken, but on a question of privilege I want to say that I am a constant attender in the house. I believe in the last five years I have been in my seat in the house twice the time that the hon. member for West Elgin has.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order. As soon as the hon. member has stated his question of privilege, he cannot stress it further.

Mr. GOTT: I have not stated my full question of privilege. The Border Cities Star goes on to say:

"I am sorry," said Mr. Hepburn, "that my friend from South Essex is not here."

Mr. HEPBURN: Was the hon. member here at the time?

Mr. GOTT: I was not. As I say, I never was present in the house when the hon. member for West Elgin was speaking. Is he afraid to speak when I am in the house? That is what I should like to ask him? He goes on to make the most rambling statements.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. gentleman is in order in stating his question of privilege, but he is hardly entitled to make a speech.

Mr. GOTT: I have not yet stated one portion of my question of privilege. As reported in the Border Cities Star, he goes on to say:

It is the same with tobacco, we produce more than we can possibly consume, and now the growers are asking for a greater duty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Order.

Mr. GOTT: I am not going to develop that further. I have stated my question of privilege and I am going to resume my seat.

Mr. HEPBURN: I suppose it would be in order to congratulate the hon. member on his admirable address. He usually sits in the house listening to the wind whistling through the great open spaces in his head. As to his statement that he has never been in the house when I have been speaking, I believe he has heckled me on many addresses I have made and, indeed, that is his greatest contribution to any debate. He usually gives a grunt; in fact he has been called in this house the "alarm clock from South Essex," and properly so.

I want to deal with the question before the house, that is the matter of a sugar tariff or subsidy or whatever you like to term it. As I said before, I am sorry that it emanated from this side of the house. I can understand the feeling of the hon. member; he is probably trying to represent the interests of his riding. But this brings to my mind a statement by Philip Snowden who said: "One of the evils of a protective tariff is that once the system is introduced, the members are no longer representatives of their parliament or their country, they just represent the selfish interests within their own ridings." I believe every hon. member will agree to that. I naturally expected that the baby would be adopted and fostered on the other side of the house. It is in line with true Tory uneconomic policy. Before we undertake to stimulate the sugar industry and to bring into the country more sugar industries, it might be well to survey the general situation throughout the world with regard to sugar, because conditions are so internationalized at the present time that we cannot detach ourselves entirely from what is going on in other parts of this great universe. If the production of wheat in the Argentine Republic is high this year, that increased production there is felt immediately and we see a lowering of price in Canada. So it is with sugar.

What is wrong with the sugar industry? This year we have the prospect of the greatest production of sugar ever known in the history of the world, a production of 31,500,000 tons, a quantity far beyond the capacity of the world to consume. Let me touch on the history of sugar during the past few years and if some hon. members can take that breadth of vision, if they are capable of it, one can see at a glance from the figures I give, just what is wrong. In 1910 the world produced a little over 17 million tons of sugar. In 1920 that production had increased to 20 million tons, or an increase of about 2½ million tons. During that period world consumption increased about 20 per cent, and took care of the increased production. But from 1921 on, almost every country increased its tariffs to stimulate production of some product or another, without regard to the law of supply and demand. See how that affected the sugar industry. Between 1920 and 1930 the world production of sugar increased from 19 million tons to 31½ million tons, an increase of 55 per cent in world production. The unfortunate part of it was that, not having any regard to the law of supply and demand, cognizance was not taken of the fact that somebody had to consume that sugar, and during that period world consumption increased only 7 per cent. There is the situation in a nutshell: Production increased 55 per cent and consumption increased only 7 per cent. The world was faced with the greatest over-production in the history of the sugar trade. The price of raw sugar dropped to 98 cents per 100 pounds. We have never had such a low price for sugar, and we have never had such over production, yet our hon. friends opposite say that the cure is to produce more sugar, and that we ought to be generous with the beet growers. There are lots of them in my own riding. I am not catering to any selfish interests in making these remarks; I am speaking from a national standpoint.

First, our hon. friends opposite advocate putting a tariff on sugar, or in lieu of a tariff a bonus of $1.50 a ton on sugar beets. We produce 400,000 tons of sugar beets, and to pay that bonus we would have to take $600,000 from the treasury. Follow that to its logical conclusion. In order to produce in this country our sugar requirements by such uneconomic means, we would have to increase that subsidy by 100 per cent or dip into the treasury to the amount of $6,000,000.

Assuming that this principle is sound, and hon. gentlemen opposite think it is, because they have endorsed it on every occasion, what is it going to cost the country ultimately if we apply the same principle to all lines of production? With a production of 400 million bushels of wheat we would have to dip into the treasury to the amount of $20,000,000 at the present rate of bonus. We had a debate on the wool tariff the other day. If we increased the tariff on wool sufficiently high, it would probably cost the people of this country another $20,000,000. I was not surprised to get requests this morning from the organized dairy interests asking for a subsidy on cheese and butter. Assume we pay a subsidy on cheese and butter. That may cost another $25,000,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Might I suggest that the hon. gentleman's figures as to the wheat bonus are not quite right? He is figuring on the basis of a bonus of 50 cents a bushel, instead of 5 cents, when he says that the bonus on 400 million bushels would amount to $200,000,000.

Mr. HEPBURN: I said $20,000,000. Here we have this principle involved. We have over-production of wheat, and the cure of hon. gentlemen opposite is more production. We have over-production of cheese and butter and their cure is more production of cheese and butter with every dairying country in the world increasing its production of those products. We have the same condition in sugar.

Let us look at this question from another angle. We dip into the treasury to the amount of $76,000,000, assuming, of course, that we can make ourselves rich by dipping into the treasury. The Finance minister will then have to increase taxation, because governments have no money except what they raise from the people through taxation. Increased taxation will increase our cost of production. I hold no brief for our manufacturers, but I know that they are having a hard time in having to compete in an export market with the manufacturers of other countries which are not subject to the heavy taxation which we have in this country. This world-wide over-production, this struggle for world markets, will become more fierce, and the country to lose out will be the country that adopts just such policies as the one that is being advocated here to-day, which will increase the cost of production and impose a further handicap on our producers when they come to sell in the export market. There are, of course, precedents for such a policy as is now being advocated. Some years ago in Australia they were seized with the bright idea that what they had to do to protect their producers was to increase the tariff, and they increased it up to a 40 per cent level. That increased the cost of production to the basic producers who had to sell their wheat, and their wool and their cheese on the world market. They got no more for their products, but their cost of production was increased by the increase in the tariff. The result was that in Australia the producers got in a bad way and they appealed to the government for a subsidy. The government bowed to the popular will and dipped into the treasury, and the result has been that Australia to-day is in a state of financial chaos, just the same as we shall be in if we adopt policies such as this. In the United States, notwithstanding such an example before them, Mr. Hoover endorsed the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, despite the fact that it was opposed by every economist of note in the United States. He put that tariff into effect. Did the increased tariff help the basic producers in the United States? No, certainly not. They came right back to the position that we are in to-day. The clamour from the basic producers grew louder and louder, and in order to satisfy them the government of the United States evolved a scheme which meant dipping into the treasury and taking out $500,000,000, which was given to a farm relief board to administer. It attempted to administer that fund honestly, I suppose, and tried to keep up and maintain farm prices at an unnatural level. Did it succeed? Certainly not. While this huge sum of $500,000,000 was being dissipated, the unfortunate farmer in the United States, the dupe of the same kind of propaganda as emanates from our friends across the way, saw all their farm prices go to the lowest levels in this century at least, and now they have to stand taxation to take care of this expensive experiment put into effect by Toryism across the line. In view of two such glaring examples as I have pointed out, is this chamber prepared to endorse and re-endorse such a policy in Canada?

Mr. GOTT: Will the perforated member permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN: Had I an extended waistline like the hon. gentleman I would want to be perforated even more.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member spoke of the Hawley-Smoot tariff and its application. Will he tell us how many Canadian cattle and how much Canadian butter it kept out of the United States?

Mr. HEPBURN: The hon. gentleman needs a lot of enlightenment, but I am not going to try to enlighten him because to do so I would have to stay here for the rest of my life, and even then I might not get very far. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, there are just two facts that I would point out: First, that the cure for over-production is not more production, and secondly, that you cannot get rich in any country by taking money out of the public treasury.

Mr. MORAND: After listening to the hon. gentleman's speech I would ask him: Is he in favour of helping the sugar industry?

Mr. HEPBURN: I am opposing the motion and the amendment thereto, absolutely.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I have just a word to say on this resolution before the question is put. I am afraid that the house has not received all the facts in connection with this industry. I congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Gershaw) who introduced the resolution, because I feel that he was absolutely sincere in his effort to further a certain agitation which has arisen in his constituency, and I congratulate the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart) on having so successfully and completely kept politics out of the discussion. It was a worthy effort on his part, and I am sure that his name will go down in history as one of the rare non-partisan debaters on the question of the tariff.

The history of sugar beet growing in Alberta is exceedingly interesting, and has been roughly but accurately sketched so far. The industry established from the Utah sugar fields by the establishment of a plant at Raymond some time ago appeared to be able to operate for about six years. The production of beets during that period did not reach the capacity of the factory, and about the time that capacity was being reached the British Columbia refineries stepped into the picture and purchased the plant.

This is the picture I wish to place before the house. This country, wisely or unwisely, has decided upon a policy of protecting the refineries in Canada. The sugar refineries, importing raw sugar from outside and finishing it in Canada, are protected because it was alleged that they were not able to compete against the imported refined sugar from outside. Well and good. Hon. members opposite protest that they did that in the interests of both the refineries and the people. The proposal now comes however to set up competing interests within the boundaries of one country, and to bonus them so as to enable them to compete with protected industries. That is the absurd position into which protection inevitably leads when carried to the extremes now proposed. I would not object if there was any logical reason to believe that the producers of sugar beets would be helped. It cannot be shown however that the growing of sugar beets has, either on the whole or on any average, been a profitable occupation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, it has not. That fact cannot be shown in the Lethbridge district. I have before me the report of a meeting held at Strathmore by sugar beet growers of the district to secure the establishment of a plant in that place. Similar agitations were carried on at Bassano and Brooks to secure the establishment of a plant, presumably to be operated for the benefit of the growers. Actually it would have been for the benefit of one or two persons who hoped to become officials in the newly established company. The only beet sugar company established in the country was bought by the British Columbia refineries. What was the effect of the purchase? To answer that question I quote from a letter dated April 29, 1931, from the Bow Valley Sugar Beet Association:

> The purchase by the B.C. people of the Raymond factory is a severe blow to our hopes and I, personally, am not for one moment deceived by their intentions, as announced in the press, of continuing to operate the factory at Raymond.

The secretary of the Bow Valley Sugar Beet Association, under date of April 29, 1931, wrote the Prime Minister of Canada as follows:

> I am convinced that the purchasers will close the Raymond factory at the earliest possible moment and on the slightest of pretext and that the purchase was put through for the purpose of killing competition from the beet sugar factory at Raymond.

I have no hesitation in saying that the sugar combine, of which the British Columbia refineries are a part, will destroy all other separate industries which may be created either on a bonus or on any other basis. That is not the way to deal with the problem.

Now I come to the producers' point of view. The same gentleman, the secretary of the Bow Valley Sugar Beet Association, wrote from Bassano on May 16, 1931, as follows:

> I enclose herewith sample crop share contract used by the growers and tenants on the Raymond project in 1929, from which you will gather that the total cost per acre, divided as therein set out, amounted to $54.30 on an average yield of eight tons to the acre, which was about the average, and at $7 to the ton the average farmer just about broke even.

And no more. At $7 a ton they broke even, and no more. Since that letter was written however the factory has reduced its price to the farmers from $7 or $7.50 to $5.50 per ton. I have no hesitation in saying that since that time the average beet grower has not made money, and has been very lucky if he broke even. Undoubtedly there have been one or two outstanding illustrations where some money has been made. In almost every industry or occupation in Canada there could be found one or two growers who, through fortunate circumstances, climatic or soil conditions, made a profit. The propounders of bonus policies always pick those few out as striking illustrations. They do not however represent the true state of affairs. The representative from Lethbridge who addressed the sugar beet association of Strathmore was a gentleman named Robertson whom possibly my hon. friend from Lethbridge may know. Mr. Robertson is alleged to be a practical man who has carried on farming operations in southern Alberta for sixteen years, and last year successfully harvested 75 acres of sugar beets. What did he tell that meeting? Did he give them hope or enthusiasm? Listen to what he says:

> . . . . in 1930, 14,000 acres in the Raymond area produced 128,000 tons, distributing to the farmers over $800,000. . . .

Those figures indicate that there was a production of 9½ tons to the acre, which was worth about $800,000 to the farmers. Of course that sounds very splendid in the aggregate. In answer to a question he said:

> Costs would run from $45 to $50 per acre.

There is the statement of a practical farmer engaged in the production of sugar beets who says that costs will run from $45 to $50 per acre, and the farmer receives only about $55 when it is marketed. There would not seem to be much hope there.

There is one further point I wish to impress upon hon. members, namely that the growing of sugar beets is a peculiarly difficult farm operation. The quality of the beet depends upon large quantities of water in the month of September to promote proper pollenization because the beet receives most of the sugar content in that month. For that reason sugar beets cannot be grown in western Canada, except under irrigation, so that water may be put on at proper times. That is probably one reason why costs are so high in the production of sugar beets. The labour entailed throughout the year in their production is of such a character that the average Canadian or American will not participate in it. The result is that during the last several years in the province of Alberta growers have imported oriental and central European labourers to attend to their crops.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My hon. friend says "no"; I say to him that I saw it myself. More than that, I saw moving pictures produced by the province of Alberta showing workers in the field.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): Where did my hon. friend see the orientals? Were they not raising beets for themselves?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They were employed as labourers to thin and hoe the crop. Will my hon. friend deny that labourers from central Europe are brought in to do the work of cultivating the sugar beets? It cannot be denied.

Hon. members should very seriously consider the bonusing of an industry which will have as part of its purpose the employment of a class of labour we cannot find within this country. I am opposed to the motion. If, however, I can find a seconder I have before me an amendment to the amendment which I will move, as follows:

That the words "select standing committee on agriculture" in the amendment be stricken out and that there be substituted therefor the words "advisory tariff board."

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the amendment to the amendment prepared?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, it is prepared, but I do not suppose anybody would second it because this diligent and active government has so far failed to appoint a tariff board.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the hon. member does not propose an amendment to the amendment.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, before a vote is taken on this motion, as a representative from the maritimes, I wish to make a few observations. As the hon. member who moved the resolution is one of the most genial and likable members in the house I am sure it is not easy for hon. members on this side to oppose anything he would wish to introduce, especially when it would benefit the people of his own constituency. The argument he put forward is largely that it would help out the irrigation system and possibly give a return to the men who have invested their money in the sugar beet industry.

As has been pointed out by the member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn), the largest sugar production perhaps in the history of the world is in sight at the present time, and the difficulty for the sugar producing countries is to find a market for their product. There was a time in the maritime provinces when Cuban sugar was imported, and in exchange we were able to send large quantities of our potatoes and other agricultural products. Under the present practice of applying dumping duties we find sugar is being shut out of almost every market in the world. Cuban sugar has been excluded from our market. Naturally the Cuban government have practically refused to accept any of our maritime province products. As you know, Mr. Speaker, last year a representative from this government was sent down to Cuba to see if an arrangement could be made to find a market for our potatoes. The Cuban paper Mundo carried the following item:

Commercial relations between Cuba and Canada, after expiration of the existing modus vivendi in December, were discussed at a conference between Canadian minister Macdonald, Canadian commercial attaché Marmack, officials of the Departments of State, and of Agriculture, Commerce and Labour, and members of the tariff commission. The state department is said to have indicated that Cuba will not change her tariff policy, but will consider modifications in favour of Canada provided that country makes special concessions as to Cuban sugar, rum and tobacco, and the Canadian representatives agreed to study the question.

If the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) were in his seat I would ask him to tell the house whether, as has been asserted several times this afternoon, and as I have good reason to believe, the dumping duty has been applied in a good many cases. I would also ask if any effort has been made by the government to find a market in Cuba or in other parts of the world for our potatoes, and especially if they have endeavoured to raise the British embargo. We hear our friends from the west talking about the desperate straits of the farmers in the prairie provinces. I doubt if any farmers are in a more desperate condition than the farmers in the maritime provinces who have been engaged in the production of potatoes on a large scale.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Are they not the most prosperous farmers in Canada?

Mr. MacLEAN: Not at all. To-day the farmers of Prince Edward Island have millions of bushels of potatoes on their hands, for which they cannot get over 8 or 10 cents a bushel at the very most; the farmers of New Brunswick are in an even worse position, having to sell their crop at 20 to 25 cents a barrel; Quebec is in a similar position.

The Cuban government put before our representative a definite proposition; they asked him if the Canadian government was willing to consider some arrangement whereby a treaty could be worked out. Mr. Macdonald replied: I will present these facts to my government, and they will take them under consideration.

The time has arrived when, if we are going to bonus one branch of industry, we have got to bonus every branch, else we must stop this bonusing system. You cannot bring in discriminatory measures such as are being advocated in this house in favour of one branch of industry and leave other farmers to shift for themselves. You cannot build up their industry and make them prosperous by means of bonuses. Everyone knows the system has failed; it has failed across the line, it has failed in Canada. The only thing we have to do is to face the situation and endeavour to get our products into all the countries of the world, and so give our farmers a chance to compete on fair and equal terms. I believe the time has come when we in Prince Edward Island might very well ask that the local starch industry be bonused. Our farmers are compelled to turn their potatoes over to the starch factory at 5 or 6 cents a bushel delivered; they practically have to give them away. How in the world can farmers exist under such conditions? If any body of men in Canada should ask for a bonus after two or three years of the conditions I have described it is the farmers of the maritime provinces.

I am sorry to be compelled to oppose the resolution and also to vote against the amendment.

Mr. GERSHAW: Mr. Speaker, I must thank hon. members for the way in which they have received this resolution. A considerable number of people have given a good deal of thought to the question of assistance to industry; and the individual who is struggling along and trying to get a new industry established cannot understand why old and well-established industries can get assistance while he is denied help.

I have read the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart), and with the consent of my seconder I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment?

Amendment Mr. Stewart (Lethbridge), agreed to on division.

Motion (Mr. Gershaw) as amended agreed to on division.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 25, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

CHARGES BY HON. G. N. GORDON

MOTION FOR PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS AND EVIDENCE

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto) presented the first report of the special committee appointed to inquire into certain charges made by the Hon. G. N. Gordon, K.C., as follows:

> Your committee recommend that 500 copies in English and 250 copies in French of proceedings and evidence which may be taken be printed, as required, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.
> All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. GEARY moved that the report be concurred in.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I say with respect to this motion for the printing in English and French of five hundred copies of the proceedings of the committee which is investigating certain allegations made by the Hon. Mr. Gordon, that I think it is a waste of public money to print the proceedings of this committee. What useful purpose is going to be served by it? The Prime Minister wishes to have certain facts brought out and no doubt a statement by Mr. Gordon in reference thereto. This will be brought out in committee and the committee can make its report, but surely it is simply throwing away the money of the people, which it is difficult enough to raise through taxation these days, to spend it on the recording and printing of the evidence of a committee functioning for the purpose for which this committee is functioning. I submit again that this matter should never have been brought into parliament at all, and I believe the less there is of record concerning it the better it will be for the Prime Minister and all concerned. I protest against the printing.

Motion agreed to, on division.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOTT

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GOTT: On a question of privilege, or parliamentary procedure, or order, I want to draw to the attention of the house an item that appears in yesterday's Hansard at page 502 under the name of Mr. Hepburn, in answer to a remark that I made. My remark was:

Will the perforated member permit me to ask him a question?

The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) appears in Hansard to have said, although he did not utter this remark yesterday, as I have verified from the Debates office:

Had I an extended waistline like the hon. gentleman I would want to be perforated even more.

I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, if an hon. member of this house can insert in Hansard any remark he likes in order to make his constituency think that he is a very wise member of this House of Commons. This is a matter that should be decided to-day. I do not think that any member should be permitted to interject into the records of this house any silly statement like that.

Mr. HEPBURN: I might say that I did make the statement. It was heard by members on this side of the house, and Hansard asked me to say just what was said, owing to the fact that there was a disturbance at the time and my remark was not caught by the Hansard reporter.

Mr. GOTT: I stated, Mr. Speaker, that the remark was not reported by Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: It will be inquired into.

SEED GRAIN ADVANCES

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): May I ask of the minister the following question: Are seed grain liens being taken on all resultant crops from seed grain advanced in Saskatchewan? Are such advances due and repayable by the farmers by August 15 of this year?

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

OUTSIDE APPOINTMENTS TO BE MADE ON RECOMMENDATION OF MINISTER

On the order to resume from Tuesday, February 9, the debate on the motion of Mr. McGibbon:

That, in the opinion of this house, all outside appointments should be taken away from the Civil Service Commission and made upon the recommendation of the minister.

Mr. McGIBBON: In view of the fact that the government have promised to send this matter to a committee I wish to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the permission of the house to withdraw the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, if the motion is withdrawn, will it then be possible to send the motion to a committee which is not yet appointed?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. member to express a wish to withdraw the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite correct, but I understood him to say—it is his own business, of course—that it was going to be sent to a committee, and I do not see how it can be sent to a committee which is not yet formed and that at a time when the motion is no longer on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the permission of the house to withdraw the motion?

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot quite understand that proceeding, Mr. Speaker. As I understand it, the hon. member wishes to withdraw his resolution. There has been no consent of the house to that, and certainly this house has not passed a motion that this shall go to a committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, the motion has been withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no motion before the house that the resolution go to a committee at all. As far as the house is concerned it has consented to the withdrawing of the motion, and that is the end of it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But in asking leave to withdraw, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) said that the understanding was that it was to go to a committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: He was entirely mistaken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what I was pointing out.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I could not catch it.

STABILIZATION OF CURRENCY

PROPOSAL FOR CONSIDERATION ON AGENDA OF IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

The house resumed from Monday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLean and the amendment thereto of Mr. Irvine.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): The resolution placed before this house by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, if the empire is to become an economic unit, the stabilization of currency within the empire is very important and should be one of the first questions for consideration on the agenda of the Imperial conference at its meeting in July next.

Later in the debate the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) moved the following amendment:

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that" in the first line and substituting therefor the following: in the opinion of this house the Canadian representatives at the coming Imperial economic conference should move for the stabilization of the currency of all British countries to be on a basis other than gold.

Continuing this debate, Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to congratulate the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) upon bringing before this house one of the most important subjects it has been our lot to consider. The matter of currency and credit is very closely linked with the trade, commerce, welfare and the happiness of the people of any country. I am only sorry that we have not heard a single word in support of the resolution he proposed to the house from any other member of the group to which he belongs.

I wish however to congratulate the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) who in his speech in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne criticized the government by stating that in the speech from the throne no mention had been made of the subject of currency and credit. He drew attention to the importance of this subject and wondered whether in view of the crisis we are going through the government of the day was quite satisfied with the present situation and whether our present condition could not in some degree be traced to the unsound state of currency and credit. In making that reference however the right hon. gentleman travelled a long way from the stand he took only a year ago when I had the privilege of moving a subamendment on behalf of the group to which I have the honour to belong, to the effect that we should go off the gold basis, so far as holding gold behind our currency was concerned. At that particular time the right hon. gentleman criticized me severely for making such a suggestion. Since that time however much water has passed under the bridge; Great Britain and many other countries have gone off the gold basis and, the subject being now more popular, it is of course in order for anyone who wishes to climb upon the proverbial band wagon.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) decided to take part in this debate, naturally we anticipated something of a constructive nature from him, particularly because of his great ability and because of the important portfolio for which he is responsible. I was therefore very much surprised when, in the short time he spoke, he treated the subject rather lightly and did his best to criticize the efforts of the hon. member who brought the resolution before the house. Continuing the debate, an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) upon which I should like to congratulate him, and which, if accepted will, in my view, add weight to the motion. I should like also to congratulate the hon. member upon the very able manner in which he presented his argument to the house. We know that for many years he has given this subject a great deal of thought and from time to time has placed his views before this house. I do not think however that he has ever made a more able speech and one more to the point than he made the other day.

I should like to remind the house of a statement by C. E. Neill, who before his death was vice-president of the Royal Bank, to which reference was made by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) and which reads as follows:

If the central banks of all the countries on a gold basis should deliberately adopt a common policy they could within a certain time lag, raise or lower the price level almost at will.

I entirely agree with that statement. Unfortunately, however, countries do not pull together in this regard and prices are not regulated because we have not international cooperative effort. In this connection may I refer to a very able address given by Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, president of the Midland Bank of Great Britain who, speaking to the shareholders of that bank is reported in the Manchester Guardian of January 30, as follows:

We must have a managed gold standard by an international agreement or we must definitely abandon gold and rely on a managed standard of credit and currency without any metallic basis at all.

Further, he stated:

The time has gone by for the child-like belief that as long as a country is on a gold standard all is well.

And, further:

The world crisis is due in part to the inefficient working of our monetary machinery.

Making a study of this subject I come to the conclusion that we face an inevitable collapse of our financial structure so long as we try to tie ourselves to a gold basis. I remember that in the year 1923, when the Bank Act was under revision, and before that time when an investigation was being made into the basis of credit, its function, control, and relation to trade, one of the witnesses placed before the committee a graph in the shape of an inverted pyramid showing the position of the Canadian monetary system, and indicating very cleverly the way that the monetary system was, supposedly, built on a small basis of gold. It showed, as it would show to-day if a similar figure were drawn, that we have only a small basis of gold in Canada, and that on top of that there is an amount of currency nearly three times the amount of gold, and payable in gold—and I say "and payable in gold" because although private bank currency is not payable in gold it is payable in dominion notes, which are payable in gold. Therefore we might make the blanket statement that all the notes used are payable in gold. On top of that we have bank deposits aggregating to-day about two billion dollars. Then, above that, we have bonds which, in round figures, aggregate approximately $2,300,000,000, all of which are supposed to be payable in gold. It is manifest that all those notes and securities could not possibly be redeemed in gold. Indeed, if we required redemption in gold, that is, if we applied the gold basis strictly, there would not be a solvent bank in this country. Of course, the gold basis is perfectly all right when it is not called upon to function; in other words, it is a matter of imagination, and the sooner we realize that the better for all concerned. That this is so, I need only remind the house that whenever there is a world crisis, whenever we are in a state of war, whenever trade is particularly bad—as it is to-day—then we promptly go off the gold basis; the government passes an order in council or secures legislation declaring that paper currency may be redeemed in other than gold.

It is interesting to realize that our monetary system is made up largely of three things: coin, currency, and credit. Coin to-day, we use to the extent of about $31,000,000; currency varies anywhere from $300,000,000 to $400,000,000; as to the balance, according to the statement made by Sir Edmund Walker in 1923, no less than 96 per cent of our monetary transactions are carried on by the checking system. The amount of money therefore can be increased or decreased entirely at the wish of those who have the control of credit. At this point I should like to bring to my aid a statement by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna. He asks the question:

> How can the supply of money be increased?

This is his answer:

> The amount of money in existence varies only with the action of the banks in increasing or diminishing deposits. We know how this is effected. Every bank loan creates a deposit, and every repayment of a bank loan destroys one.

I know some hon. gentlemen will contend that that is a reversal of the process that takes place; some of them still think that our loans are all created from savings deposits. I should like to remind them, however, that if that were the fact the more loans you made from pre-existing deposits, the smaller amount of savings deposits you would have. But instead of that, a study of the bank returns will show that the more loans made the greater the amount of the deposits; the more loans cancelled, the smaller the amount of deposits will be. In his book on the Elements of Banking, Mr. H. D. Macleod writes:

> The essential and distinctive feature of a "bank" and a "banker" is to issue credit payable on demand, and this credit may be put into circulation . . . . and serve as money.

The manner of creating money was brought to our attention most pointedly during the late war. At that time we needed a great deal more goods to carry on our part in the great conflict. This involved a larger supply of money, and this supply was secured through the issue of bonds. This action would have had no effect at all on prices so long as on the one hand we put more money into circulation and on the other hand we created an extra quantity of goods; or if after creating these goods we had destroyed them, and had also cancelled the additional amount of money put into circulation; in either case prices would have remained stationary. But instead of that, while we destroyed a great quantity of goods in the theatre of war, 94 per cent of the new money was left in circulation. Therefore we had a larger amount of money in circulation in proportion to the quantity of goods on hand. Naturally this had the effect of increasing prices. Again and again large sums of new money were put into circulation, and each time the same thing occurred—most of the new goods being destroyed while the greater part of the new money was kept in circulation. Consequently at the end of the war we found we had to pay very high prices for everything.

Now, it had taken a number of years to inflate the currency in that way, and the only fair thing would have been to deflate this currency—if deflation was necessary—over a number of years equal to the period during which inflation had taken place. Instead, a drastic deflation was brought about. I might say that a gradual inflation is always a good thing for the producers, for it is always to their benefit to produce for a rising market; on the other hand, the investors, particularly bondholders, lose to a certain extent, because they do not get any more interest on their bonds to compensate for the higher cost of living. But deflation is always a very bad thing for producers—and they compose the major part of our population—because they do not want to produce for a falling market; by contrast, however, the investors are correspondingly benefited, because their revenue is not diminished and they have the advantage of the lowered cost of living.

Now, what happened after the war? Let me again quote Mr. McKenna. He points out that in Great Britain—and the same thing occurred here:

A policy of deflation could only end in the strangulation of business and widespread unemployment. Such a policy had already received public official sanction. Unhappily, employment decreased month by month as this policy was enforced.

On the same point I desire to cite Mr. J. M. Keynes as follows:

Deflation . . . involves a transference of wealth from the rest of the community to the rentier class and to all holders of titles of money. In particular it involves a transference from all borrowers . . . to lenders.

At this point I should like to pay a well-deserved compliment to Mr. Keynes on the remarkable fulfilment of the prophecy he made in 1919. It will be remembered that in an advisory capacity to the British delegates, he took an active part during the negotiations which resulted in the treaty of Versailles. Then he resigned and wrote a book entitled The Economic Consequences of the Peace, from which I take this passage:

The war has ended with everyone owing everyone else immense sums of money. Germany owes a large sum to the Allies; the Allies owe a large sum to Great Britain; and Great Britain owes a large sum to the United States.

The holders of war loan in every country are owed a large sum by the state; and the state in its turn is owed a large sum by these and other taxpayers.

The whole position is misleading, artificial, and vexatious. We shall never be able to move again unless we can free our limbs of these paper shackles. A general bonfire is such a necessity that unless we can make of it an orderly and good-tempered affair in which no serious injustice is done to anyone, it will, when it comes at last, grow into a conflagration that may destroy much else as well.

In his very interesting book entitled The Story of Canada's War Finance, Sir Thomas White gives us most interesting details of what was done during that period. I should like to give two small quotations from that book. The first is from page 17, where the author says:

In a word, we paid the cost of our military operations by our production during the war.

I often wonder how our returned soldiers felt, coming back from the war, knowing a statement such as this had been made and knowing it to be true, yet having to do their share to pay for the war all over again. Then on page 59 Sir Thomas White said:

The burden of the debt created is passed on to future generations as a legacy and reminder of the waste of war.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that there is no need for gold at all behind internal currency, and I was very pleased to read Mr. McKenna's speech in the Manchester Guardian, to which I have already referred. He supports this and many other contentions made from this corner of the house during the last ten years. I should like to refer also to another very able man, Sir Basil Blanchet, a director of the Bank of England, who spoke to the Canadian Club of Ottawa only about a year ago. At that time he said there was absolutely no need for gold behind internal currency, that it should be limited only by legislation and that there should be no limitation until there was an ample supply to meet the requirements of the public for a medium of exchange in the transferring of goods and services from one to another. As I said before, gold never has stood up in a crisis; it never will, and the sooner we get rid of it as a pure make-believe the better for all concerned.

No doubt there is value to gold in settling international balances, but the gold we have at present cost us a lot of money, and we are making nothing out of it. We might as well take that gold and use it as it is needed to pay our debts, and in that way we would save a great deal of the interest we have to pay at present. With the amount of gold we have on hand this would make a very considerable saving in our interest charges, for I want to remind the house that last year we paid no less than $124,000,000 in interest on our national debt.

I might quote various other authorities in support of the stand I have taken; I should like to mention Major C. H. Douglas, of London, England; Professor Soddy of Oxford university, Professor Irving Fisher of Columbia university, and many others who have given this matter a great deal of thought.

To-day we are going through a period of contraction of credit. No one, no matter what may be his business, but has had a great deal of difficulty in getting credit for the last couple of years, irrespective of security. What does contraction of credit mean? First it means a crash in prices, then a collapse of trade and following that, inevitably, a great increase in unemployment. The only silver lining I can see in the cloud at present is that this crisis is man made, and therefore it can be man mended. I do not believe humanity is going to be so insane as to let this crisis reach such a pitch that chaos will rule supreme; I believe some remedy will be found which will prevent the present rapid drift towards a chaotic condition in the world. If I were to make one sugegstion—and I could make many—it would be that the government form what might be termed a finance statistical bureau, whose first duty would be to keep very close tab on price levels and to recommend to the government and to the banks, since those are the two agencies through which credit or currency is issued at the present time, when to contract or when to expand credit, because it is the total quantity of money available to be spent that determines price levels.

In the speech from the throne we were told that world conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people. That may be so, but our share of world control is not beyond the reach of the Canadian people and, as part of the world, it is up to us through whatever government may be in power to put forward some remedy to try to rectify the situation which faces us to-day. If we cannot make an international agreement we can make the next best thing, an agreement between all the British countries, and at the Imperial conference to be held here next July Canada will have an opportunity to bring forward such a resolution as we are considering to-day, together with the amendment which has been suggested, for consideration by the best brains attending that conference, in order to seek some means whereby the present serious drift will be checked and conditions brought back to normalcy.

In studying this question I have often thought how we have become turned around in so many things. For instance, when all is said and done, money should be nothing more or less than a medium of exchange for goods or services as between man and man. Instead of that, and instead of making money a slave to humanity as it should be, humanity certainly has become a slave to money, or to finance and those who control it.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the house to some of the practical disadvantages to Canada of the erratic system under which we allow ourselves to be controlled. For instance, we find that it is possible for Australia to dump wheat into Vancouver in competition with the farmers of the prairie provinces, who as we all know are producing wheat to-day at a great loss. That is an extraordinary situation, and it has been brought about largely because of the difference between the currencies of the two countries. I know of one association which sends cattle to Great Britain, and which has lost no less than $19,000 for the same reason. It is because of these reasons that I sincerely hope the house and the government will give very sympathetic consideration to the motion and amendment now before us, so that when the Imperial conference meets in Ottawa in July of this year these matters will be brought forward in the hope that something worth while may be done.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the tremendous importance of the subject which is included within the ambit of the resolution and the amendment warrants, I think, the most careful consideration of the house, and so far as I am concerned I am anxious to give to it the closest study. I think I can say on behalf of the government that it is intensely interested in and impressed with the importance of the subject. Before giving expression to the few thoughts I have on the subject generally, I should like to offer an amendment to the amendment, because possibly it will place this question in a somewhat better light. The resolution itself was a little innocuous and was very general. I was rather sorry that the hon. member who introduced it (Mr. MacLean) did not enlighten the house as to just what he meant, what he wished or what he hoped for, and consequently I am not able to interpret correctly what he did have in his mind. The amendment is one to which we have no great objection except in one particular, and that is that it is more or less a contradiction. It asks of the economic conference that an effort be made towards the stabilization of the currencies of the British countries, but in the last clause it puts an absolute estoppel upon the gold basis—it must be on a basis other than gold. In other words, the amendment asks the house to request the Imperial conference to study the question but it ties the hands of the conference, so far as Canada is concerned if parliament adopts this resolution as it stands, in regard to the inclusion of gold as a basis for money under any consideration. I have therefore an amendment to move to the amendment, and I offer it not in any spirit of criticism of the efforts of my hon. friends opposite but rather to bring the question into a form that would be more acceptable. I beg to move in amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after the word "conference" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"Should initiate and support measures for the stabilization of the currencies of all British countries in such manner as to facilitate trade between the component parts of the empire and to promote economic unity therein."

As thus amended, the resolution would read:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Canadian representatives at the coming Imperial economic conference should initiate and support measures for the stabilization of the currencies of all British countries in such manner as to facilitate trade between the component parts of the empire and to promote economic unity therein.

I wish to preface by one or two general observations a necessarily brief study of the question of currencies, money and so forth. I believe that if we are to give this matter intelligent consideration we ought to keep in mind certain major factors, certain conditions that exist, whether we like it or not, and endeavour to study the problem from an impartial standpoint and in the light of all these factors. I do not presume for a moment that in the brief time at my disposal I shall be able to present to the house all the factors, but I shall hope to present some of the factors that enter into this very important subject.

In the first place, I would point out that our difficulties to-day are not of a domestic origin; they are largely of international origin. In saying this I am not for a moment seeking to relieve the government of the day of any responsibility; I am not seeking to evade the responsibility, shall I say, for coping with conditions within Canada. But I do wish to face the cold facts, and I say that the most serious difficulty that we have in this country in regard to commodity prices—whether it be lumber, fish, iron, lead, silver, zinc, copper and so on, any or all of these things—the difficulty arising from low commodity prices, is due to international or worldwide factors which must be faced and dealt with before we can hope for any definite change in conditions. Again, I would emphasize the fact that these conditions cannot be changed by any purely Canadian effort; it will require the effort not only of Canada and of the countries within the British Empire, but the efforts of the countries of the world before we can hope to overcome the present difficulties.

May I in passing point out certain facts. It will be recalled, for instance, that during the past few years, that is to say, prior to a year and a half ago—the period following the war and up to that time—Great Britain has made an heroic effort to assist in the financing of the affairs of the countries of Europe. And particularly is this so in regard to Germany. Recognizing that it was absolutely essential that Germany should be given the wherewithal to function economically before she could be expected to pay reparations, Britain rendered assistance to that country heroically, to the degree of jeopardizing her own interests. As a matter of fact, when these loans to Germany and other countries became frozen it resulted in the collapse of the gold standard in England. That was the extent to which Great Britain went. The result of all this was, as I say, that Britain went off the gold standard. Moreover, Great Britain in the meantime found her exports decreasing and her imports increasing to such an extent that it became impossible for her as a country to carry on. Another thing that happened to the mother country was this. As a direct result of her efforts to assist Germany and other countries in Europe there was a flight of capital from Great Britain. In France, for instance, they realized that the British policy was one which would endanger the financial stability of the country and they withdrew their deposits from London. The result of that was, among other things, to force Great Britain off the gold standard. Another very considerable factor in this worldwide financial collapse was the tremendous amount of loans made by the United States in South America and other parts of the world. Perhaps the South American loans were the most disastrous. Many of these loans have been virtually repudiated, involving hundreds of millions of dollars. If they have not been repudiated legally they have simply been allowed to go by the board so far as paying either interest or principal is concerned. The result has been that the United States in turn has lost tremendous sums of money abroad. Then add to that the well known and oft cited fact of the burden of debt which is resting on the necks of the people the world over, nationally, internationally and individually.

I sometimes think that the present day condition, taking the world picture of debt, is very similar to the condition which obtained, if I recall my history correctly, in the little republic when Solon took charge. I recall that one of the first acts on his part was to release the people from debt. So burdensome and terrific had become the debt of the people that many natural born citizens of that country had mortgaged their bodies, their lives, to other people as a security for debt. So burdensome had the situation become that when he took office he decided that the first step was to wipe out those debts.

I do not cite that historic illustration for the purpose of saying simply, as many do, that the only thing to do now is to wipe out debts. It is not as simple as that. I could enlarge on this theme more fully, but I intend only to state one thing just as a sort of reminder that it is not as simple as it may appear, and that is this: The debts of many people to-day are represented on the other hand, by the savings of people equally deserving. For instance, the savings of estates which are the support of widows and orphans, and so forth, invested through trust and loan companies constitute the debts of people who are the mortgagors and the borrowers. It is not enough to say that debts should be wiped out; one must follow the thing through and recognize the injustices which might be done by a sweeping reform of that character. Nevertheless the fact remains that international debts are resting and bearing so heavily upon the people of the world as to constitute a problem which must be faced and for which we must find some relief or remedy.

I should like to discuss briefly the questions of currency and money as I think it is desirable to have some understanding of the elementary principles which underlie these terms. We use them very often quite thoughtlessly and glibly and fail to realize the important elements involved. From time immemorial the activities of man have been vitally influenced by money in some form or another. I hear certain economists—if I may so term them—say: Let us have barter, let us exchange some of the goods we have here for goods elsewhere. Or they say: After all, trade is nothing but barter. These loose utterances leave the impression that there is nothing involved but the exchange of wheat for silk, or something of that character. Trade is much more complex than that. As I say, from time immemorial money has been an important element in the exchange of goods and from the most exhaustive study I have been able to give to the question I believe it is useless to think of returning to the old system of barter unless we desire to revert to the old standards which obtained when barter was the sole process in the exchange of goods. Money has become a standard or measure of value. At this point may I emphasize this fact: One thing above all else is essential in money, and that is confidence.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister advise the house what gentleman prominent in economic circles to-day has suggested the restoration of the barter system?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend had followed me closely he would have understood my meaning. I was endeavouring to be courteous. I said, "there are those whom"—and I hesitated—"I might dignify as economists." As a matter of fact, they are not economists but I did not wish to be personal in the matter. Let us put it this way: There are individuals who presume to speak as economists who have given utterance to these views. My hon. friend evidently feels and believes that they are not economists who make such suggestions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The whole thought is unthinkable.

Mr. STEVENS: I agree with that, too, so there is no point of difference between us. As I was saying, there is one thing above all else essential in money, and that is confidence. In other words it is quite useless for Canada, for instance, to have a certain type of money which might be quite satisfactory to us and sufficient to handle our internal business, if China, Great Britain, South America, South Africa or any other country would not accept it at its face value as money. The whole secret of the success of the use of money in the settlement for the interchange of goods is that there be confidence in the money used. I should like that point to be kept very clearly in mind.

Another point is this: Money in itself does not increase. There is, I think, a very widespread and false belief that money loaned out and bearing interest increases because of the fact that it bears interest. Money does not increase, the payment of that interest comes from some other source as the result of the production of goods of some kind by the people who pay the interest. In other words, money does not increase or accumulate except by the addition to it of interest which represents, in turn, production by the debtor.

The suggestion is made sometimes that commodities can be used as money or that money should be based upon commodities. I shall have more to say about this in a moment, but at this point I should like to say that from time immemorial, as far back in history as we can read, gold and silver have been largely the bases of money. Only recently I read a very interesting book dealing with the monetary system of China, which goes back to 1200 B.C. I was tremendously impressed with the fact that throughout the centuries and millenniums that great country has been using money, chiefly in the form of silver it is true, but case after case is disclosed in that historic record where gold played a very important part. Only a few years ago a very definite effort was made to introduce a gold standard in China. I merely mention this in order to emphasize the fact that gold and silver have served humanity in a most valuable way and in a most important manner in the form of money.

I should like to give expression to a thought which may find response in the hearts of some but which may be considered to be heresy by others. This thought is: Money loaned for other than productive purposes constitutes a drain upon production, capital and the interest thereon double the burden upon production.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I knew that would please some. I think it is desirable to keep these facts in mind when considering these questions. I do not reason that capital is bad, that in itself it is an odious thing and that so-called capitalists are all bad. That is not at all a corollary. As a matter of fact capital is simply a means of production and money is a channel of distribution and when studying these problems it is essential that we keep this distinction and these two facts clearly in mind. Capital is the means of production, it is the aid by which men are enabled to produce, and money is merely the blood which runs in the veins of the body politic enabling freer and a more equitable distribution of the wealth created by the application of capital, and, of course, labour.

There are, generally speaking, four major schools of thought among economists as to what type of currency should be used in these days, at least, that is the way I choose to divide them. First, there is the existing standard used in most of the leading industrial countries, the gold standard. Then there are those who suggest a paper currency, that is, just the turning on of the printing press. Then there are those who suggest a managed currency, and there are others who hold to the view that there should be a currency with a metallic backing of silver and gold. May I briefly review these alternatives, not that I am at the moment expressing a preference or making an argument for one or the other, but I do wish to present some views which may perhaps be useful in considering this problem.

The gold standard is not an old standard, as time goes. As a matter of fact, silver is a very much older and a more generally used basis of currency than gold, but in the modern development of industry and commerce, gold has for some centuries played a very important part. It has been the chief basis of money for several centuries. The Bank of England received its charter in 1694 as the result of a loan made to the crown to enable England to carry on the war against France. This loan was for £1,200,000 sterling. The loan was made in gold by certain goldsmiths, and in return for this a charter was given to these individuals, later known as the Bank of England. That was the origin of the Bank of England. The loan of £1,200,000 sterling in gold was made to the crown to enable the country to carry on the war. In return for this, the bank got the securities or the notes of the nation, which now forms the basis of the British funded debt. But the bank also got the privilege of issuing its own notes to the amount of its own capital. In other words, it made this loan to the crown of £1,200,000 at 8 per cent, plus a bonus of £4,000 annually for management purposes, so the bank got the 8 per cent and it was empowered to issue its own notes up to the amount of its capital, and that enabled it to make further loans to the public and to its own customers for such sums of money as they might secure. Thus they secured a double rate of interest. That was really the foundation of the Bank of England. This bank, of course, grew as the years and centuries passed, but it was not until 1791 that the London banks began to issue cheque books which was epoch-making in what might be termed banking in the modern sense. This introduced a new form of currency. Much is said to-day about bank cheques being currency. That is perfectly true, but I would ask my hon. friends opposite who sometimes emphasize the significance of bank cheques as currency, how much they would likely be able to buy with a bank cheque of mine in Germany or South America. They might get my friend and colleague who sits beside me and knows me well (Mr. Manion) to accept it as currency, but it is very unlikely that a bank cheque of mine would be recognized as currency outside a very limited circle where I myself am known and where the bank upon which the cheque is drawn could be communicated with to ascertain if the cheque was good. Therefore, we cannot say that bank cheques are currency in the true sense. They are undoubtedly ancillary to currency. They are something which facilitates the movement of goods and the interchange of commerce between nations and individuals, and the same thing applies to bank drafts and bills of exchange, and so forth.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member has asked the question, what would his cheque be worth in certain foreign countries? I would ask him how much more recognition would be given to a dominion note, let alone the note of a private bank, in the same countries.

Mr. STEVENS: A Dominion of Canada note could be presented in Buenos Aires tomorrow morning and would receive immediate recognition and be accepted by the banking institutions of that country. It is true that reference would be made to the daily rate of exchange between the two countries, but a dominion note would be accepted without question by any reputable banking institution in any part of the world.

Mr. VALLANCE: At a price.

Mr. STEVENS: As I was saying, it was not until 1791 that bank cheques were introduced, and unquestionably they became a part of the currency of the realm, a secondary part. Undoubtedly they facilitate the movement of goods and the extension of industry and commerce. It should always be borne in mind that bills of exchange, drafts, cheques and so on are a most valuable adjunct—shall I say?—or support to a universal currency, but the usefulness and universality of this class of currency is limited by two considerations, the house upon which it is drawn, and the drawer of the instrument, whatever it may be. Of course, I admit this, that the Bank of Montreal, for instance, drawing a cheque on itself, would have that cheque accepted in almost any centre in the world, but a cheque drawn by myself on the Bank of Montreal would be perfectly useless outside the limited sphere in which I am personally known.

Another point I wish to make is this, that gold in so far as it is attached to currency, is undoubtedly very, very valuable for two things: One is the settlement of international accounts, whether for trade or for debts or whatever it may be, and the other as a background or basis of security for internal currency.

For a moment let me refer to this question of the sufficiency or otherwise of gold. There is no difference of opinion among the most outstanding economists of the world as to the insufficiency of the supply of gold to-day. The generally accepted view is that the shortage at the present time amounts to approximately $100,000,000 per year, and that by 1941, unless there is a very rapid development in the production of gold, such as through some abnormal discoveries, such as the California gold rush or the Australian or Yukon gold rush, with that exception, the shortage by 1941 it is calculated will amount to as high as $300,000,000 per year for the necessities of international trade.

Mr. BROWN: Would it not be possible by international agreement to have the value of gold fixed so that the present limited amount of gold would as equally well take care of a larger amount of trade in the settlement of international balances?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think so. I would rather not digress into a lengthy explanation to give my views on that point. Briefly, I would not agree to that being the case.

The production of gold now amounts to about $400,000,000 per annum. Roughly speaking, about half of this goes to arts and industries for various uses and in various forms. The other half goes into the currency. I am giving just rough figures. As I said a moment ago, it is estimated that the extension of trade generally throughout the world calls for an increasing use of gold as a basis of currency, and it is generally accepted that there is a shortage of about $100,000,000 for that purpose.

Another point I wish to emphasize is this. The gold system that we hear referred to is not a system which has been deliberately designed and put into operation. I think we make a tremendous mistake in discussing questions pertaining to economics in this house and elsewhere, when we refer to the gold system or the capitalist system as if it were something that had been taken and put into a finished form, something which could be removed and replaced by some plan or system without interfering with or to any great extent disturbing the forces of the nation.

The gold system has grown into the warp and woof of the financial, commercial and industrial life of the countries where it is being used. Unquestionably a departure from it, a correction or disturbance of it, whatever character those changes may take, must and will affect all the various units interested in the country where such a change is made. By that I am not for one moment suggesting that we should simply sit down and do nothing about the gold standard system—not at all. Recognizing, however, that there is an insufficiency of gold to uphold the system as it is operated to-day, and at the same time do justice to internal and international trade, we cannot say that by merely wiping out such a standard and replacing it by a paper system we will correct the evil complained of.

I find I must hasten on, because I wish to cover considerable—

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister say a few words concerning managed currency?

Mr. STEVENS: I shall come to that; I am now speaking of paper currency. There are those who argue that all that is necessary is to issue a currency bearing the mark of a nation and bearing on it the statement, "This is a dollar bill, and is backed by the general credit of the nation." That may be a somewhat extreme view. At this point may I refer to, and compliment the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) upon his speech delivered a few nights ago. In my view it was, by long odds, the most informative speech delivered in this discussion this session. He did, however, refer to the investigation made by the banking and commerce committee of 1923 and complained, at least to some degree, of the attitude of some hon. members on that occasion who opposed certain proposals, and to which group I belonged. One of those proposals was that we should turn on the printing presses, turn out two billion five hundred thousand dollars worth of dominion notes and pay off the bonded indebtedness of Canada, thus eliminating the necessity for paying interest. That was one of the suggestions to which at that time I took very sharp objection. I wish to point out now that simply by turning on the printing presses and producing currency we will not get money which will be of value in internal or international trade, because such money will then be accepted only upon the value placed upon it by those to whom it is offered in exchange for goods. Hon. members will recall that when Germany, Austria, Poland and other countries in Europe during the years following the war turned on their printing presses and issued great quantities of paper currency, the result was a race between the receiver of such currency and the person who parted with the goods as to who could reach the bank first, or could first get rid of the currency in exchange for other goods. So accelerating was this round of effort that the printing presses could not turn the money out fast enough. The result was commercial and industrial collapse.

Already I have dealt briefly with the matter of cheques and bills of exchange. Some argue that the only currency required would be bills of exchange which represent commodities. At this time I should like to refer to this angle of the question. It is quite true that a warehouse receipt for 100,000 bushels of wheat is a very valuable instrument and one which can be used in exchange for something else. For the sake of simplicity we will bring the number of bushels down to 1,000 so that it will be within the ken of most of us. We will suppose that a man holds a warehouse receipt for 1,000 bushels of wheat which, we will say, is worth $1 a bushel. He has $1,000 in hand. However, he wants to pay $100 on his grocery bill and other bills which have been accumulating; he wishes to buy a plough; he wishes to buy clothing and food for use in his house. Probably there are a dozen things he wants to do. Our present procedure is to deposit the warehouse receipt in the bank and, through the agency of currency which is accepted by everybody at a fairly well stabilized value, that man goes out and buys the things he requires, and pays his debts. So that while we may admit that a bill of exchange representing commodities is, unquestionably, a useful piece of paper as currency, it is not a piece of paper which can be used with facility, or a medium through which trade can be facilitated throughout the world. Furthermore, we may suppose that a man who acquires a piece of this paper does not want to spend it all at once. Wishing to have it last for a period of six months he must be in a position to turn it into something with which, at will, he can buy other commodities. Again arises the absolute necessity of a currency universally accepted and one which can be used at will for purposes of replacement.

Of course it is highly desirable that there should be a degree of constancy in currency. The currency that a farmer, for instance, would receive for his wheat in the autumn which might be worth only half its value in the spring would certainly be a bad piece of currency. It is true that under the unusual and abnormal deflation of the past two years, that is precisely what has happened. A person, for instance, who put a mortgage on his farm two years ago when wheat was, we will say, $1.50 a bushel, received, we will suppose, about $1,500 in the currency of the time, and spent it for some purpose. To-day however he is asked to pay back that debt, and there will be required, roughly speaking, about 4,500 bushels of wheat to pay back a sum equal to the value of 1,500 bushels two or three years ago. Obviously something is radically wrong, and it is that defect we are trying to correct. What is required is a currency which will remain reasonably stable, a currency which will be universally acceptable and one which, as I said a minute ago, will not fluctuate from day to day or from month to month. Yet, those who advocate paper currency, are, I think, inviting the most fickle and most uncertain type of currency.

I should like to deal further with that point, but I must hasten on. Reference has been made to a managed currency. In this respect I wish to say that from my observations, which during the past few years have been fairly intense, I have not yet heard a really clear definition of what is meant by "managed currency." Nearly everyone who speaks upon the subject uses more or less vague terms, and there is no precise definition of what is meant by managed currency. It would seem that one has one meaning, and another another. I have in my hand the Macmillan report from which I wish to read a brief extract concerning this particular subject. Discussing the question of managed currency I find the following:

> It may be asked whether the aim of central bank policy should not be to return to the more automatic working of the gold standard of prewar days.

The central bank policy is, invariably, connected with managed currency. The general suggestion was that central banks should be erected in each of the major countries of the world—in fact, in all countries through whose offices the management or control of currency should be manipulated or performed. I repeat the extract from the report:

> It may be asked whether the aim of central bank policy should not be to return to the more automatic working of the gold standard of prewar days.

I read that for one purpose only at the moment. Even this committee which leans strongly to a managed currency indicates that it is necessary to have a scheme that will work automatically. And that is really the main complaint that I have against any scheme of managed currency that is at present offered. The report continues:

> . . . Both the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the Bank of England have developed very considerably the "open market" system which has been found in certain respects extremely effective. It is in itself, however, the antithesis of an automatic system. Thus, we believe, all central banks are faced with the necessity of a greater "management" of their currency systems, involving inevitably greater responsibilities and also a more urgent need of cooperation.

Then they state the obstacle facing central banks, one of which I now cite:

> In this task of management the central banks are faced with possible divergences between the interests of their own country and those of the world outside.

That is the very point to which I wish to draw particular attention. A managed currency presupposes certain things. One is this, that a central bank organization, or a central financial organization, within a country which is enabled to control all banking therein will be empowered so to control the loans that are made and the interest that is charged as to manipulate the currency in circulation up or down in order to maintain a balance between the currency in circulation and the requirements of trade for currency. That, roughly speaking, is what they are called upon to do.

But here is the fatal weakness, to my mind, in a managed currency within a country. It is necessary for the group of individuals who control that central bank or central financial authority to foresee what the needs may be one, two, three months hence, because these things cannot in their very nature be put into operation overnight; the effects of what is done to-day in the loaning or putting into circulation of money cannot possibly be known until a few weeks or a few months hence, and so it is necessary for the banks, or the controlling factor in this matter, to have a prescience that will enable them to see into the future what the possible effects of their action to-day may be.

Let us look at what happened in the United States. The United States have what is called a managed currency. The Federal Reserve Bank system, through their open market operations and the raising and lowering of interest charges, are able to control the movement of currency in or out. What happened in 1929 when the stock boom was—shall I say?—on the flood, when it was becoming alarming? They raised the interest on loans to brokers to 10 per cent, then to 15 per cent, and, if my memory does not fail me, to as high as 25 per cent. And yet, this did not correct the situation, it did not prevent the crash, it did not prevent hundreds of millions, yes, billions of dollars flowing into the wildest orgy of speculation the world has ever seen.

I am told my time is about up. I should like a few more minutes on this point, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. STEVENS: I have said, I think, sufficient on the difficulties of a managed currency internally. Then come to this: multiplied by the prejudices and the needs of forty or fifty countries, one can visualize the difficulty. For instance, a managed currency that would take in the United States, Great Britain, Germany, France and Italy would require, in the first place, that the central control factor in each of those countries was able to foresee the effect on currency of loans or of rates of interest within their own territory, plus being able to agree with the central authorities of each of the other countries as to what should be done to-day for what may happen three months hence. My own opinion is, and I have seen nothing to change it, that a managed currency presents the gravest of difficulties in its working out. If it does not work almost to perfection, then the object for which it is brought into existence is defeated; for if there is a variation in the value of the currencies, then the very difficulty we are confronted with, the exchange difficulty, is present in just the same manner as it is to-day.

There is a fourth suggestion—a currency with a metallic basis composed of silver and gold. As I intimated a moment ago, one of the difficulties in connection with the gold standard, in which I think all the leading authorities are in agreement, is that there is insufficient gold in the world properly to sustain the gold standard and facilitate trade; that is, in its present form of use. Now, one of the reasons for that is that it is possible either for individuals or for countries to hoard gold. Gold is so valuable and of such small compass in proportion to value that it can be easily hoarded. It is a matter of history that countries, for instance, India and China, absorb tremendous quantities of gold. No one knows where it goes; it is simply absorbed and passes out of circulation and out of use; it is lost so far as the world and the services of industry and commerce are concerned. That is well known. It is hoarded because of its high value in comparison to other commodities. But, it is argued by some, if you had as the basis of your currency silver and gold, it would not be possible to corner or to hoard it; therefore you would create a currency the quantity of which would be automatically controlled by the general production of these two metals, that there would be no incentive to hoarding, and thus there would be a wide and general distribution. I am not going into a detailed analysis of the argument any further than to summarize my remarks in this way: When we enter into a study of currency questions I think it is advisable to keep in mind the need of a currency in which there is universal confidence, and that all the factors should be given most careful study and consideration. In offering this amendment we are inviting the house simply to pass on to the Imperial economic conference authority for the Canadian delegates at that conference to initiate and support measures that will bring about a careful and exhaustive study of this very important question.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to ask a question.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I was on my feet first, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. leader of the opposition has the floor.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question also. This is a very important amendment and one which I must say I wish had been preceded by some notice, because I feel that the subject is too important to attempt to discuss on the spur of the moment. In order that I may be quite sure as to his meaning, I should like to ask the minister what significance he attaches to the words "economic unity"? Do they imply the conception of the empire as an economic unit or have they some other significance?

Mr. STEVENS: It means precisely what it says, that is, to promote the economic unity of the empire as far as that is possible by a currency which will be stabilized throughout the empire. In other words, the two points must be taken together. We desire to facilitate the movement of trade within the empire, not to the exclusion of trade with other countries, but because we are meeting as representatives of that group of nations for the purpose of stimulating trade within the empire and thus promoting the economic unity of the empire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand the minister to attach a significance to the words "economic unity" other than we would attach to the word "unity" in general, or to "prosperity" or to some other word of the kind? Has he in mind, for example, the creation of an economic unit out of the empire?

Mr. STEVENS: I would say this, that if as a result of the deliberations of the conference there was developed a currency which would so extend trade within the empire that the empire should become as a matter of fact a powerful economic unit, it might be taken in that sense, but the question of attaining that ultimate objective is not in contemplation at the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has it any relation to the general subject of tariffs, for example? Does that aspect come into the mind of the minister?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I was thinking solely of currencies in the movement of trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then may I ask my hon. friend another question: He speaks of initiating and supporting measures for the stabilization of currency. Has my hon.

friend, or have the government, considered any measure that will have that effect, and could the minister indicate to the house the kind of measure which would be initiated or proposed by the government?

Mr. STEVENS: The conference meets in July, and a careful study is being made of that and many other subjects with the idea of having them ready for presentation when the conference meets.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend in a position to tell us at present, while we are discussing this matter, what the measure would be which the government might propose, or what any one measure might be?

Mr. STEVENS: I think I have already answered my right hon. friend, and I may add that we are not in committee and I am not in a position to answer every question that comes up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My purpose in asking these questions, as I think my hon. friend will recognize, is that I am anxious to cooperate with him and with the government as far as possible in any matter that has to do with the forthcoming Imperial economic conference. The conference is one of the most important gatherings which this country will have, and indeed which the empire will have, for possibly many days, and it is desirable that there should be some measure of unanimity, if that is at all possible, between all parties in this parliament with respect to the measures that are to come before the conference.

I have just said, in regard to the amendment moved by the minister, that it involves important questions of policy affecting matters that are to come before the conference. Up to the present time all the Prime Minister has told us is that we are not to be favoured even with so much as an agenda. This is the first intimation we have had that the question of the stabilization of currency, or that any currency matters, would be discussed at the conference.

Mr. STEVENS: No, no; my right hon. friend is quite unjust in that statement, and also in his reference a moment ago to the unexpected way in which this matter was brought up. His own supporter introduced this motion a week or ten days ago; it was discussed during one whole sitting and it came on to-day in the regular order. There was no attempt unexpectedly to present the matter. Further, may I say to my right hon. friend that the original motion moved by his own supporter, presumably with the consent and approval of his party, contained these words:

> . . . if the empire is to become an economic unit . . .

Those words were more extreme, I might say, than the modified form in which I have placed it. I cannot understand my right hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend refers to the motion introduced by a member on this side of the house, but the amendment strikes out that motion altogether, or the substantive part of it.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend is unjust to me again. There was an amendment moved by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) and this is an amendment to that amendment. My right hon. friend is entirely unjust.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This goes back to the original motion. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) has moved an amenment to the original motion which does not leave the motion as it was presented to the house. However, we need not wrangle over a question of words or of form. My point is this: To-day the government is asking this house to give it instructions to initiate and support measures at the forthcoming economic conference which will have to do with the stabilization of currency within the British Empire, the promotion of trade and of economic unity therein. As I have said, that is a very large question indeed, and before this house should be asked to vote on any direction to the government as to what it is to do at the economic conference, we should be put in possession of the particular measure or measures which are to be initiated and supported by the government.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the tendency of hon. gentlemen opposite is to ask parliament for a blank cheque or authority to be given the ministry in altogether too many directions. That was the policy of the government with respect to the all-important question of unemployment; we were asked to give a blank cheque and allow the ministry to do as they pleased with it. We have seen what the effect has been of giving the ministry a blank cheque to deal with unemployment. The situation has not been remedied; it has been made worse. Now they ask us to give them blanket authority to deal with the question of currencies at the forthcoming economic conference. For my part I am quite prepared to allow the ministry authority to support measures which have been brought into this house in the first instance and approved by this house, but I am not prepared to give the ministry authority to initiate and support measures of which this house has no knowledge in advance. In my judgment to do that is to surrender altogether any judgment in the matter of what may be best.

Mr. STEVENS: But this subject was introduced by a supporter of my right hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking now with regard to the speech made and amendment moved by my hon. friend this afternoon. If there is one thing above another in connection with his address on which I might congratulate him it is the very manifest way in which he disclosed the fact that of all subjects, this question of currency is one of the most intricate and complicated. Having done that, I submit that before he asks parliament to authorize the ministry to initiate and support any measures respecting currencies, he should be in a position to state to parliament what that measure is so that we may pass upon it. Let the minister bring in a measure which he believes will have that effect, and let us debate it. We may find out that it will serve the end in view; on the other hand we may find out that it will be far from serving that end. My objection to the amendment proposed by the minister, in particular, is that it requests blanket authority to the ministry to propose any measure with the result that parliament will then be put in the position that it has authorized the ministry to take the step it has.

I should like to point out another possibility; the minister may say this is not the intention of his resolution, but in considering resolutions we must be very careful as to their intent as expressed. The resolution states not only that the ministry shall initiate measures but that it shall support measures for the stablization of currency. If this method is to be followed, measures possibly will be brought before the conference having to do with the stabilization of currency which are expressive of the views of India, of Australia, of New Zealand, of South Africa, of the Irish Free State, or of Newfoundland. Is this parliament to instruct the ministry in advance that they are to support any measures simply because they are labelled measures to assist in the stabilization of currencies? The resolution as it reads is an instruction to the ministry at the forthcoming Imperial economic conference to support measures that have stabilization in view. Well, who is to determine whether a measure brought before the conference is or is not a proper one? I say that an instruction of that kind is altogether too wide and too general. It would be a very serious mistake. I do not think it is a method which would commend itself to any of the governments that might be present at the forthcoming economic conference.

The minister, in concluding his speech, gave a rather different interpretation of the meaning of the amendment from that which it bears on its face. He said that it was asking simply that a careful study should be made of the question by the conference. Had he so worded his resolution I would have been prepared to support it most cordially, but such is not the wording or the meaning. I think that is the form in which a motion of this kind should be framed. I believe that among the different subjects to be dealt with at the approaching conference should be this important question of the stabilization of currency, and in my opinion it will require as much thought and attention as can be given to it by those who may be present. But the part of the conference should be in the nature of a study. The conference itself could, as a result of such study, if it so desired, make recommendations to be submitted later on to the various parliaments of the British empire for adoption as they might see fit. May I say to my hon. friend that, having attended two imperial conferences, I may presume to know something of the procedure that is followed at these gatherings; and in this I think I shall have the support of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), who holds a similar point of view for I have heard him present it in this house time and again. He has said over and over again—and I support this view—that a conference is essentially what is implied by the term: It is a bringing together of groups from different parts of the empire to consider and discuss certain questions. But in no sense is a conference a cabinet or imperial council; in no sense is it a body to lay down policies for the empire. It is a body to consider, and consider very carefully, what it will be best to recommend to the respective governments represented at the conference. If we are authorizing the ministry to initiate and to support certain measures at the conference we are to all intents and purposes placing the ministry in the position where, when the conference meets, they will have to assert that they have instructions from this parliament to press forward a certain measure and ask that it be adopted by the conference. In my opinion, it is not wise that the ministry should be placed in such a position.

Speaking at this moment in illustration of the point I am making, may I say to my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) that if tomorrow we on this side should ask the government to follow a certain course with respect to the tariff or any other matter that might come before the conference, I am sure he would reply immediately, albeit it is not the course he himself has followed, that it is not the business of the government, before going into the conference, to be too definitely committed to any policy or obliged to present a particular point of view—that the government must be perfectly free when it is in the conference to consider all aspects of a situation as they may be presented from different sides.

I believe my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) has drawn his amendment with the best of intentions, but I have no doubt that on reflection he will agree that it is open to the interpretation which I have just put upon it—namely, an authorization of the ministry to initiate measures of which this parliament has no knowledge whatever, and to press those measures at the conference as representing the views which the Canadian people, through their parliament, have instructed the ministry to put forward. The proposal, as we have it, is also in the nature of an obligation upon the ministry to support other measures that may have that particular end in view, although we do not know what they are. And in the third place it introduces, in rather ambiguous terms, a reference to economic unity, which may be all very well provided that this house is agreed upon the significance and the meaning of the term, but which might prove to be the very opposite should there be at the conference any misunderstanding as to just what is implied. My hon. friend says that there appeared in the original motion the words, "if the empire is to become an economic unit." When I saw the original resolution and read those words in it, I asked the hon. member on this side of the house (Mr. MacLean) what they meant, and he told me they were purely hypothetical or parenthetical and did not commit anyone to anything. I said to him, with regard to the phrase, an economic unit, that the government had put forward some idea of the kind, and that if they had anything of that sort in view this phrase would be the feature of the resolution which the government would seek to have control the whole.

Mr. STEVENS: Was that made clear—that it was parenthetical?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it was, because when the hon. member for Prince began to debate the resolution he said that he would like to withdraw the clause. It was the Prime Minister himself who objected; he would not allow it to be withdrawn.

Mr. MANION: So long as it meant nothing we were going to go on with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend would be able to go on with anything that means nothing. My understanding of the expression, "the empire as an economic unit," is this. Those who support the economic unit idea hold to the theory that the empire is to become an isolated economic unit, that it should be so organized that it will be possible for the different parts of the empire to trade only or almost exclusively within the empire. They believe that this economic isolation will be brought about by a system of tariffs around the whole, which will be so high as to render impossible trade of any extent with the rest of the world. Those of us who sit on this side are wholly opposed to making of the empire an economic unit in that sense, and I submit that we should not be called upon to support a resolution that lends countenance of support to the theory in that sense of an economic union or unit. As regards anything that will make for unity of the empire, anything that will promote the prosperity of the empire, we on this side are as heartily in accord as are hon. gentlemen opposite. We all want to see the empire united and prosperous, but our view as to how that unity and that prosperity can best be achieved differs diametrically from that of hon. gentlemen opposite.

If my hon. friend presses his amendment in the form in which it now stands, I am afraid I shall have to oppose it, and I hope he will understand quite clearly my reason for so doing. Speaking generally, apart altogether from his resolution, I do not think that this house should be asked to authorize the government to initiate or support any measure of which the house has no knowledge whatever, and I might add of which the government itself at this time has no knowledge. Furthermore, it should not be asked to instruct the ministry to support measures at the economic conference merely because they relate to a particular subject. I am heartily in accord with the whole idea of currency questions being studied at the conference, and any substantial contributions which can be made by the Canadian ministry towards that end will be something which I am sure will be appreciated not only in this country but in all parts of the empire.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I am not sure whether I have the right now to ask the minister a question, but I wanted to ask him this question before he sat down. I will put the question and he need not answer it if he does not desire. I understood him to say that I had advocated during the investigation of 1924, I think it was, that Canada should pay her national debt by employing the printing presses. Does the minister mean that I advocated that? If so, I should like to know on what page of the evidence it is to be found because I do not recall even thinking of such a thing.

Mr. STEVENS: I said it was advocated, without referring at all to my hon. friend.

Mr. IRVINE: I was never that foolish, openly anyway; I might have been foolish enough to think it inwardly but never foolish enough to utter it. I have not before me a copy of the amendment which the minister has moved, but as I was able to understand it from his reading it, I do not see why the house should not give it the fullest possible support. When I drafted the amendment which I moved to the original motion I was told by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) that it would be open to the very objection which the minister has raised. I realized that it would be open to that objection but I moved it nevertheless because I could not conceive how there could be any stabilization of our currency on a gold basis except by putting a fewer number of grains of gold into the pound sterling or the dollar. There may be some other method of remaining on the gold basis, but if there is I have never heard of it.

The minister said that some of us or some of those who think they are economists have said that they regard trade as being barter and that we should go back to the barter system. I never thought of shipping a carload or shipload of eggs across the Atlantic in return for a cargo of automobiles. I never thought of trading in that crude way, but it just happens that I have before me an excellent pamphlet published by H. Mitchell, M.A., professor of political economy at McMaster university. It is entitled The Money Crisis and in his interpretation of money he states:

> Our money economy is really no more than a refined state of barter.

Apparently there are some real economists who hold that view. They do not contend that we exchange goods for goods directly but they say that money itself is a means by which barter is made possible in our highly complicated society.

Before I sit down I should like to refer to the remarks just made by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). May I say very frankly and sincerely that his remarks came to me as the most discouraging thing I have heard in this house since I first became a member. Personally, I have been looking to him for great things during this session, I have been expecting the opposition to bring forward real, constructive suggestions for the remedying of the real danger which exists, not only to Canada but to modern civilization. This question of currency is recognized by the statesmen of all countries as being the most urgent to be considered, but the leader of the opposition has not one single constructive thought to offer. He endeavours to make his opposition as effective as possible in trying to prevent the consideration of this matter at the Imperial conference. He asks for a definite and complete statement of the exact thing which is going to be put up to the conference. As I understand him, he contends that a notice of motion should have been given to a question of such importance. The motion to which the amendment has been moved has been on the order paper for many days, it was introduced by a member of the Liberal party and ample opportunity was afforded every hon. member to acquaint himself with the subject matter and to be prepared to deal intelligently with it. I suggest to the leader of the opposition that with a question of this importance confronting the public mind, and in the face of economic conditions which exist in the world to-day, he should have spent his time last summer studying this matter and should have come to this house with a real policy and given real leadership in the carrying into effect of that policy.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the hon. member suggesting that the leader of the opposition resign in his favour?

Mr. IRVINE: I cannot hear what my hon. friend is saying—

An hon. MEMBER: You are not missing anything.

Mr. IRVINE: —but if it is anything like his usual remarks, it does not matter whether or not I hear him. The right hon. gentleman says that he is willing to support the measure if it means merely that it will be talked about at the Imperial conference, but if there is to be action, no sir—no support for action. We have not as much time as the right hon. gentleman imagines we have to deal with this matter. The people of Canada are looking to the Imperial conference for definite action; the people of the British commonwealth of nations expect great things from this conference. I will go as far as to say that if great things are not accomplished, it will be a bad thing for Canada and the rest of the British nations. In my opinion this is the most important thing upon which the government has touched this session and yet the Liberal party, supposed to be making a bid for the support of the people at the next election, claiming to be able to lead us out of this terrible morass in which we find ourselves, raises opposition to the only living issue which has been presented on the floor of this house this session. It is a most discouraging thing to any hon. member who expects parliament to stand for something worth while.

In regard to economic unity, the right hon. gentleman says: If you are going to advocate economic unity, why not wait until you have an interpretation of economic unity to which the house will agree? In eleven years I have never seen this house agree to anything, and if before we can do anything we have to wait for an interpretation of economic unity which will meet with the agreement of this house, we are going to wait a long long time before we have economic unity in this or any other country.

I congratulate the minister on bringing this amendment forward. We are not expecting that a question of this importance will be settled completely and absolutely at one conference, but we do want some action. Are we to have to wait until this house comes to an unanimous opinion upon some policy not yet proposed? What will our farmers in the west say to the leader of the opposition? They want to sell their products in England next month, but they cannot do it because the currency is so unstable, and the exchange so adverse. They want action, and the Imperial conference affords the only opportunity for such action to be taken. I think it is the duty of every hon. member of this house who wants immediate action on a question of this importance to support this resolution.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter of the stabilization of the currency of the empire is undoubtedly one of very great importance. Few things have done more injury, using the word in a broad sense, than the action taken in Great Britain in going off the gold standard. As a matter of fact, it wrecked the financial structure of practically every country in the world except two, and the loss sustained by Canada and by other parts of the empire was very, very great.

The question of empire currency is not new. It has been discussed at every succeeding imperial conference, but no action has ever been taken nor have any definite results followed. During or prior to the war my attention was directed to the possibility of providing for a pound containing gold to the value of five dollars with the hope that a pound or pax, or whatever name might be given to it, might have circulation in every part of the empire at that value. That had nothing whatever to do with paper money nor has it anything to do with the matter that is now being considered by this house, namely, that direction be given to the government that there be placed for consideration before the economic conference to be held in this city the question of a stabilized currency. The right hon. gentleman I am quite certain was not serious in suggesting that it was possible in February to prepare and submit to this house an agenda for a conference that is to meet in July. Neither would the right hon. gentleman I think, if pressed, and asked to look back on past conferences, say that it had ever been the practice nor could it be the practice to lay before the House of Commons the details of proposals that would be made to the conference.

The question now before the house as expressed in the subamendment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is virtually that the question of the stabilization of empire currency be brought to the attention of the conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is different—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are all agreed on that.

Mr. BENNETT: Or that if the question is placed on the agenda by some other country it shall receive the support of those who represent this country at that conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We differ there.

Mr. BENNETT: I am unable to understand the language of the amendment if it means other than that. Let us look at what transpired. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) introduced the resolution. He read copiously from essays and statements and speeches and reports of eminent men, and he indicated clearly that he had not the least knowledge in the world of the subject matter of the resolution. I am not saying that offensively. That is a matter of fact that will be found by reading the record. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) introduced an amendment and made a speech which indicated that he had profoundly studied the matter, but at the end he used words which indicated that his views as to a sound currency were not in accord with those which I believe are held by a majority of the members of this house. Having in mind the very circumstance to which the right hon. gentleman has alluded, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has indicated as clearly as it is possible to indicate anything that there are great difficulties in the way of a stabilized currency. By a stabilized currency it is not, of course, meant that you are going to give a like value to every form of currency or that you are going to have the like terminology for every form of currency, but that you are going to endeavour to establish a stabilized currency in order that the very difficulties to which the hon. member for Prince referred, namely, the great fluctuations in exchange values, should be avoided. I think this house will agree that it is highly desirable that the ends sought should be attained, if possible, by this conference.

I agree entirely with what has been said by the right hon. gentleman that a conference has no legislative power; it has no executive power. It has merely the power to recommend to the respective governments that action along certain lines should be taken, and that has been the case since these conferences were commenced. Their conclusions were not in any sense binding, and no one knows that better than the right hon. gentleman opposite. He knows that as a very condition of these conferences being held, those principles were asserted, and this house is not bound by anything that may take place at a conference until this house has seen fit to agree to what is recommended. When the right hon. gentleman came back from the Imperial conference which he attended in 1926 I think he will be the first to say that nothing had been placed on the records of this house that indicated that the proposals that were there considered were to be considered. There is nothing upon the records of Hansard or the Journals of this house that indicated that the great questions that were then discussed were to be discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Not in the sense that they were discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was an agenda.

Mr. BENNETT: But the agenda broadened out in its reach and scope in the discussions that took place.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were resolutions—

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, I am aware of that. Then came the question of the action to be taken. This house was not bound until this house had expressed its approval, and it will be recalled that a debate ensued; a debate always has ensued, Mr. Speaker, on matters of that kind. There is no legislative power in the conference. It cannot bind the members of this house nor the Dominion government, nor can the members who for the time being represent the country at that conference. The prime ministers of some of the great dominions in the commonwealth have from time to time contended that it was rather unsound that only one party should be represented at the conferences, that rather the government of the day should be assisted by the leader of the opposition and that there should be a representation of parliament, rather than of the government, to speak for the country at the conference. But that view has not obtained, and it is not likely to obtain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad that the right hon. gentleman thinks that a sound view. He has always expressed that view, as did his predecessor in office. The principle upon which opposition has been made to that view is this, that the government of the day must assume responsibility for what is done at the conference. When it comes back to parliament and asks parliament's approval with respect to any particular item of business that may have been transacted at the conference or of any conclusions embodied in the form of legislation, the government must assume sole responsibility for its action, and risk its life upon the result if it pledges its position as a government in asking the support of the house to those proposals. That view, I say, the right hon. gentleman has consistently maintained, and that is the view which many other members of various parliaments represented at imperial conferences have from time to time maintained. I am bound to say I used to think that at imperial conferences it would be much better if all parties in the state could be represented. But in discussions that I have had since responsibility has fallen to my lot it has appeared that there might be difficulties to which the right hon. gentleman has in times past referred. Whatever there may be of value in it from an academic viewpoint, as a practical matter it need not now be discussed, for the government will accept responsibility. The government cannot bind Canada to any line of action beyond agreeing to submit to parliament, its own parliament, any questions upon which deliberations have taken place and conclusions have been reached. That was so, for instance, with respect to matters that were considered in 1930. That was so in connection with the Merchant Shipping Act. The Merchant Shipping Act is highly technical legislation. It was discussed in the 1926 conference. It was discussed in 1929 by a group of experts, and certain conclusions were formulated. It was again discussed in 1930, and certain approvals were given. But Canada could not be bound until such time as this parliament enacted legislation based and founded upon the conclusions which had been arrived at at the conference,—or, variations from them, if this house did not desire to approve.

This resolution, as it stands, asks the House of Commons—directs, if you will; I will use as strong a term as that—directs that Canada's representatives at the next Imperial economic conference to meet in this city shall place upon the agenda paper, or shall initiate discussions dealing with the stabilization of empire currency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the amendment is redrafted I am content to support it in those terms, but I cannot in other terms.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall proceed a step farther. The statement is also made that if the initiation comes from some other quarter, not that Canada will be bound by what some other quarter suggests, but that the Canadian delegation shall support not the identical measure, but any measure which deals with the stabilization of empire currency—if initiated, for instance, by India, South Africa, or it matters not where. That does not however for a moment imply that we will support those views. But the very fact that the subject is thrown into the melting pot for discussion involves the fact that there will be a free expression of views by men from various parts of this empire as to the possibilities of stabilization of empire currency. It is in that sense that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has presented this matter to the consideration of the house.

This is a question dealing with currency and trade. What we are endeavouring to promote by every means in our power is that on one-quarter of the world's surface, including as it does many countries and a quarter of the world's population, we should, if possible, have a stabilized currency or a medium of expressing values for trade and exchange and, in the words of the right hon. gentleman, "trade being exchange," that these media, if you will, should have values not necessarily in the same terms, but that they should have stable values for the purpose of facilitating the transaction of business and the advancement of trade. That is the position. The language of the amendment to the amendment, which I have not before me, but which I saw before it was moved by my colleague, endeavours to express that view.

It is gratifying indeed to find the right hon. gentleman expressing a desire to co-operate with the government in the success of the conference. I venture to say—and I hope he will not take my comment as being unduly unkind—that his remarks present a marked contrast with observations he made publicly elsewhere, in which the very fact that a conference would be held at all was called in doubt, when he was wondering if there ever would be one. The very name of the conference must indicate its character. It is to be an economic conference to deal with trade and currency, currency and trade, the development of them, the stabilizing, if possible, of our currency, a medium of exchange, or expressions of exchange values between the various parts of the empire—all these matters will be discussed. Whatever complaints may hereafter be made, whatever criticisms may be urged, and however doubtful the right hon. gentleman may have been in times past as to our ability to succeed in having a conference at all, we ought at least, it seems to me, to be entitled to some credit for having succeeded in our efforts. Whatever the conference may bring about, at least we have succeeded in our effort to secure one, and have had it definitely decided that such conference will be held in the capital city of Canada, where, most hon. members will recall, the second conference was held. The colonial conference of 1887 was succeeded by the conference of 1894 which met in the parliament buildings in this city. Those who are curious to see the matters then discussed, who are interested in the development of ideas, and realize that after all, a long time is required to make progress in any particular line of action, would do well, if they have some time at their disposal, to take from yonder library the records of that conference. They will find that there may be and, we hope will be, a realization in 1932 of the hopes, aspirations and views which found expression by the statesmen of the empire in 1894.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: As I understand the Prime Minister's general interpretation of the term "stabilization of currency within the empire," it would mean a stabilization of exchange values as between the different currencies used in the various parts of the empire. Might not the interpretation be made—and certainly this has been the hope of many of us—that the question of the stabilization of price levels should be included as part of the question of stabilization of currency—as, indeed, a most important part?

Mr. BENNETT: The view is generally expressed that one might follow the other. I think however there is a body of opinion questioning that, as the hon. member, who reads so much, will readily understand. If once we arrive at an agreement for the stabilization of exchange values I should think the matter to which he has alluded would not be as difficult as it has been under fluctuating exchange values.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few very brief observations to make in this debate. It was my intention to enter upon a detailed analysis of the various factors brought into question by the motion of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean), the amendment moved by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) and the subamendment now moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). First, however, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) upon the, generally speaking, reasonable tone of the address he has just delivered. I wish also to offer to my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin the observation that, despite his obviously superior academic qualifications, there are some of us in the Liberal party who for years have given careful study and thought to the question of currency, and have advocated, as widely as he has, proper reforms in the Canadian currency system. Personally, having played some part in the publication of Liberal policies and theories, I repudiate the animadversions of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

I wish also to extend to the Minister of Trade and Commerce my personal felicitations upon his exhaustive and comprehensive analysis of the monetary situation. I think when he took his seat he received as much applause from the benches of the Liberal party as from his own side of the house. It is very encouraging to-day to find in the Canadian House of Commons a minister of the crown who has such a complete knowledge of the most intricate problems which concern us in Canada. Not speaking for the opposition, but only in a personal capacity, I wish it were possible at the coming Imperial economic conference for Canadians, regardless of their party affiliations, and leaving out of their discussions matters of tariff, to concentrate in more than a national manner upon the question of currency reform. Because a significant feature about the Macmillan report to which reference was made a few nights ago and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon, is that there is no mention in this brilliant report, presented to parliament by one of the most outstanding committees which ever functioned in the United Kingdom, of the possibility of an empire currency. Subsequent to the report of the Macmillan committee there was formed and established in the old kingdom a committee of the Federation of British industries and the Empire Economic Union. In paragraph 50 of the report of that committee there is a distinct recommendation in regard to the stabilization of empire currency. As the right hon. Prime Minister has just intimated, in previous conferences the question of currency reform was submitted by each dominion, and New Zealand brought it forward at the economic conference of 1923. I am convinced that the greatest danger facing Canada to-day is not the throbbing problem of unemployment, it is the imminent destruction of our social and economic system unless we wake up.

As far as I see the situation—and I am not speaking at all in a partisan sense—the remedies are twofold. In the first place, there are national remedies which can be applied by whatever government happens to be in office; in the second place, there are international remedies. And I am convinced that we cannot solve our weighty national problems except by international thought, international study and international discussion. That is the reason why the Macmillan committee has based all its observations in regard to monetary reform, not on the empire unit, but on the world.

I am exceedingly pleased to know that the question of currency will be discussed at the economic conference next July. I think that all parties in this house are united on that idea. Unfortunately we are divided on the phraseology of the motion and the amendment. Personally I am conscientiously opposed to the motion, and with my limited study of economic questions I am opposed to the amendment of the learned member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). I am also opposed —but only as to phraseology—to the amendment so ably moved by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and which now becomes a matter of government policy. We who are adhering to Liberal principles and to certain tariff doctrines are not forgetful that the phrase "economic unity," although it sounds glorious, has a sinister origin. I want to keep this discussion entirely non-partisan, but it must not be forgotten that that was the slogan used by our good friend Lord Beaverbrook when he was proclaiming his gospel of empire free trade. If my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce had used any one of these phrases "economic prosperity," "economic well being," "economic welfare," I am confident that every member in this house would be 100 per cent behind him. I suggest that if unity in Canada and in this house is worth while we can very well agree upon the language used by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister when he said that the amendment moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce means only that instructions be given to the government to submit the question of a stabilized currency to the next Imperial economic conference. I think every single member, regardless of his political affiliations, will support the right hon. gentleman in that interpretation. It would be a wonderful gesture if this house could send a united resolution instructing the administration to submit to the approaching conference the subject of currency reform, and this unanimity could be brought about by changing the phraseology of the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I trust the necessary steps may be taken to this end, for I am firmly convinced that currency reform is one of the greatest problems confronting not only Canada but the whole civilized world at the present time.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but I think it necessary to make a few remarks in reply to what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has said with regard to the effect on the world of the abandonment of the gold standard by Great Britain. Recently I had sent to me a newspaper published in the north of Ireland, containing a report of proceedings at a meeting held under the auspices of the Unionist Association in one of the constituencies in that country. The chief speaker was a Mr. W. H. Webb, and he reviewed the recent economic and financial events in Great Britain. Dealing with monetary reform he said:

> Monetary or currency reform, both internal and international, was a matter of the greatest urgency. The long drawn out depression, from which we are still suffering, was almost entirely due to monetary causes. The originating cause was this country leading the world blindly back on to the gold standard in 1925.

Mr. Webb also spoke of the two committees which have just been referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), the Macmillan committee and the committee set up by the Federation of British Industries and the Empire Economic Union. He said:

> These committees agree that in a stable, highly developed country like ours a gold backing for our internal currency is no longer necessary, and that a gold reserve is needed for no other purpose than to meet a foreign drain and provide an international standard of values. This means that our internal currency would not be dependent on gold and would not be increased or decreased by inflows or outflows of that metal, and would also keep industrial and agricultural prices free from violent fluctuations due to external influences. It would be possible under such a system to provide sufficient money to support expanding industry and agriculture.

I think, Mr. Speaker, there is not very much doubt that the return of Great Britain to the gold standard in 1925 was one of the most unfortunate policies which was ever adopted by British statesmen. Unemployment increased there as a result of the adoption of that policy. Unemployment in the most highly civilized countries of the world is one of the greatest difficulties we are facing to-day. It is one of the causes for the trouble which all countries are experiencing in balancing their budgets. We have the expense of unemployment relief. The Royal bank in its December circular contains this statement on the British situation:

> By December, 1930, the unemployed numbered 2,500,000 and by the end of September, 1931, the peak, they numbered 2,826,000. By November 16th this total had fallen by 177,000—

This improvement in the British unemployment situation in such a short time is, I think, undoubtedly attributed by the writer to the fact that England abandoned the gold standard. In my opinion it was a splendid thing for England that she did abandon it. In an issue of the Farmers' Sun shortly after the suspension of gold shipments by Great Britain, I find a statement to the Canadian Press by Sir Thomas White, our Minister of Finance during the war years. The report is headed:

> Suspension of gold standard may be blessing in disguise.
> Will call halt to dropping price level of commodities, stimulate trade and assist in bringing about fairer distribution of gold reserves predicts former finance minister.
> British manufacturers have advantage.

We should not forget that England did not abandon the gold standard because she wished to. The national government was formed for the express purpose of saving the pound, of keeping it at par. Mr. Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, floated a loan of £80,000,000 for this express purpose. That money lasted him only three weeks, and he was forced to abandon the gold standard. Why? Simply because the Bank of England could not meet the demands for gold. It should not be forgotten that Mr. Snowden, according to press despatches paid for that loan of £80,000,000 a rate of 6½ per cent interest, an unheard of rate for Great Britain to pay in peace time—all for the purpose of preserving this wonderful gold standard. The gold standard, I think has had more to do with world depression than any other thing in our economic system.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the hon. gentleman realizes that the sale of securities in foreign countries, and their application for gold in exchange for the purchase price, was what brought about that immediate result.

Mr. COOTE: Yes, and because of the gold standard they were entitled to do that. Any debtor country in the world to-day may be forced into a similar condition at any time foreign investors take the notion, and for that reason I am emphatically opposed to the idea of stabilizing Canada's currency on gold again. It should not be done. I have before me a copy of the Financial Post of September 26, 1931, the leading financial paper in Canada and a very orthodox paper, which says:

Sterling drop far-reaching in its effect. British manufacturer gains temporarily in Canada market.

Then there is also a splendid article on the foreign money ring and the world crisis. I have not time to read it, but I commend it to every hon. member of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Whose opinion was that?

Mr. COOTE: This is the opinion of Mr. J. B. McLean.

Mr. BENNETT: Was it not written by someone else?

Mr. COOTE: This article carries at its head the name of J. B. McLean. It says:

The Foreign Money Ring and the World Crisis

The present financial flurry is merely another incident in the progress of the international money ring.

The story of this super-banking system has been covered from time to time. . . .

In effect, it has been shown that a group of Austrian-German-Dutch-Greek-born financiers years ago settled in England, then the world's financial centre, among a people rich in character, in good records and great wealth. These foreigners proceeded to exploit and debauch that country—its commerce, its banking, its industries and its public men and public servants.

And so on. I do not want to take time to read all this, but somewhere near the end of the article it states that the forced departure of Britain from the gold standard may be the final act of that money ring which was described. Then I have a copy of the front page of the Financial Times for September 25, 1931. It says:

Departure from gold basis may prove real boon. Basic industries and tourist business should benefit from dollar discount.

Another column bears the heading:

Dollar discount should be great newsprint help.

If there is any industry in Canada, other than agriculture, that seems to need a little help it would appear to be the newsprint industry. I could fill several pages of Hansard with quotations from the press to prove that the departure of Britain from the gold standard was a boon to industry and, to a certain extent, improved the employment situation in that country. If Canada had been wise enough to abandon the gold standard a year ago Canada would have benefited very substantially in the same way. Apparently the policy being pursued by Canada at present is to keep our dollar as near parity with the United States dollar as possible, but perhaps before proceeding to elaborate that point I might say that Canada has not abandoned the gold standard because the government wished to abandon it; she has abandoned it in fact, if not legally, because she had not the gold to meet the demands of foreign investors.

Mr. YOUNG: If my hon. friend objects to stabilizing Canadian currency again on the gold basis, on what basis would he stabilize it?

Mr. COOTE: I will come to that right away, for the benefit of my hon. friend. Rather than give him my own ideas I should like to quote a man who should be regarded as an authority. I refer to Doctor J. P. Day, associate professor of economics at McGill university, who is reported as saying:

A country which abandons the gold standard will find its exchanges fluctuating, but it is at least relieved from worrying about an adverse balance of indebtedness, since the fluctuations of the exchange will look after that.

I should like to commend that to the attention of the Prime Minister, who thinks one of the great problems of this country is to balance our trade. Then Professor Day says:

The first immediate necessity is therefore to restore stability to the foreign exchanges. Does this mean a return to the gold standard? I should not like to say this is a totally impossible event, but I agree with a writer in the Economist who says it would be a nightmare if the treasury and the Bank of England had closed their minds to any other idea.

Probably it would be a nightmare for us also if the Prime Minister closed his mind to any other idea.

For, after all a return to the gold standard would only leave the world where we were a year ago, still faced with a crushing burden of indebtedness and a price level that afforded no prospect of rising. Furthermore, it is very doubtful even if Britain could return to the old parity rate, whether other countries, and especially debtor countries, could.

Then he refers to a suggestion made by Professor Leacock that the pound should be stabilized on gold but that the number of grains of gold in the pound be reduced. I will not read that. Then Professor Day says:

What I should infinitely prefer to see is a sterling block of countries formed. The British monetary authorities would do all in their power—which they are probably trying to do but finding political faction extraordinarily hampering—to keep sterling at a steady purchasing power at home. Other countries renouncing gold would also keep their monetary units at a stable purchasing power and if these efforts were successful, the foreign exchanges would be stable too.

I think that is the only thing necessary, stable price levels in different countries; then the rate of exchange between those countries will remain fairly stable.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question without annoyance? Surely he will admit that obligations payable in gold must thus be paid?

Mr. COOTE: I am not suggesting any change in that at all. This writer says:

No foreign exchange rates would fluctuate except those of countries on the gold standard and these need not if they like to disregard gold and manage their currencies with a similar aim. Thus the whole world would be aiming directly at the stabilization of the purchasing power of monetary units instead of indirectly as it formerly did when the effort was to keep all currencies with a similar aim.

That is a much better principle on which currency should be stabilized than the gold standard, and I think a return to the gold standard is absolutely impossible unless it is done by reducing the number of grains of gold to the pound, as has been suggested by Professor Leacock and many others. That was only a suggestion; I do not want to commit Professor Leacock to that principle, but that is one way in which it might be done.

There is a splendid article in the Toronto Saturday Night of October 17, 1931, by Professor T. E. Gregory, of the London School of Economics, who says in effect that the gold standard exercised such pressure on the price levels as to imperil the standard itself. Finally it did break the gold standard and made it impossible for the countries of the world to operate under it. It became impossible for England to stay on that standard, and when England abandoned it nearly all other countries followed suit. To-day only a minority of the so-called civilized countries maintain a pretence of being on a gold standard. Of the countries that are on the gold standard I believe the United States is the only one that is really living up to the standard, that is, paying out gold on demand. Even France, who holds such a large share of the world's gold, will not pay out gold on demand except in the form of $8,000 bars, and of course the ordinary person cannot present legal tender to the extent of $8,000 in demand for gold. So that the Bank of France is relieved of the necessity of paying gold to private individuals. Recently, according to an article in the Financial Post, United States $20 gold coins have been selling in Paris for $24. Frenchmen anxious to secure gold coins for hoarding must now pay a premium of 20 per cent to get that gold, even in a so-called gold standard country.

Some of the newer economists are coming more and more to the belief that currencies can and should be stabilized without reference to gold, and I am very pleased to note that Dr. D. M. Marvin, economist of the Royal bank, in a speech delivered recently before the Canadian Club of Toronto, suggested that possibility. According to the report:

He saw the high price of credit in countries on the gold standard as the major cause of the depression and suggested trade would swing upwards when credit was obtainable at more reasonable levels.

He goes on to suggest that the currencies of different countries in the world might be stabilized, practically in the way proposed in the remarks of Professor Day which I have already read to the house. The following observations are significant:

Those countries no longer on a gold basis have means of controlling their own price level, although the machinery for doing so is not perfect and outside of Great Britain and Sweden there seems to be no great number of economists and banking authorities who have given consideration to this phase of the subject. Generally, the attitude of the governments, the press and the public is that a misfortune has overtaken the country which will be overcome at the earliest possible moment. They overlook the advantages which have accrued to them by reason of the premium on gold and fail to realize that they can afford to seek the old parities of exchange with the gold countries only after deflation has been arrested and reversed and the price level of the gold countries brought up to a level with their own. . . . It would seem that the monetary loss to one class, mainly government bodies, will be somewhat more than offset by the gain of another class, mainly the export industries, but the effect of the premium on gold in checking deflation and improving the price level is a most important positive advantage.

Before I conclude I want to show how agriculture is being discriminated against at the present time; I want to show how it is being ruined by the attempt to cling to the gold standard. The purpose of the gold standard is generally admitted to be that of keeping foreign exchange rates at par as between different countries which are on the gold standard. I noticed in the press recently that General Smuts, leader of the opposition in South Africa, made the statement that adherence to the gold standard by that country was crucifying agriculture; and that is just as true in Canada so far as we can adhere to the gold standard. As a matter of policy, if it applies in South Africa it applies here. In another paper I saw that one of the wool growers of South Africa had pointed out that on sales of wool which they made to England, and for which of course they were paid in British pounds, they were receiving about $4 to the pound sterling, because the pound is at a discount in South Africa. But in Australia the pound sterling commands a premium, and the Australian wool grower, on a similar shipment of wool, is paid at the rate of about $6 to the pound. Anyone can see the advantage which the Australian wool grower enjoys over the wool grower in South Africa. A similar situation exists so far as Canada is concerned, and I would illustrate it with wheat. The effect of the depression in Canada was felt chiefly because of the drop in wheat prices. Wheat is sold on the markets of the world at the prevailing prices. We have been told quite often, and some of us are inclined to believe it, that we cannot set an arbitrary price on wheat. The bulk of our wheat is sold for British pounds. We cannot set the price, but the rate at which we can transfer British pounds into Canadian currency really sets the price of wheat in Canada. When Britain was forced off the gold standard the pound of course collapsed and the Canadian dollar fell part of the way with it. But it has not fallen as far as the pound, and I hope that when the Imperial conference takes place means will be devised to bring our currency down at least as far from the gold parity as the pound has come. At the present time the pound is worth in Canada about $3.97. The old parity of the pound was $4.87, and as a result of the fall, if we send a shipment of wheat to England to-day which, let us say, brings us £1,000 in Liverpool funds, we translate that into Canadian funds at the rate of $3.97, and for that shipment of wheat the exporter receives $3,970. If our currency were at par with Britain, the pound would still be worth $4.87 and we should receive $4,870. It can easily be figured out how much we are losing in our shipments of wheat to England. If we went back on the gold standard the pound would be worth the same as in the United States, $3.45, and for a shipment of wheat such as I have suggested our return would be $3,450. But even as it is to-day, the price of wheat would be increased easily by 15 cents a bushel if our currency were at par with Britain.

Let us see how our trade in cattle is affected. Cattle are on an export basis the same as wheat. The price of cattle exported to England fixes the price of cattle sold in all stockyards in Canada to-day. We have a surplus and the price of that surplus determines the price of all our cattle. When we send cattle to England we are paid in English pounds at prices prevailing over there, and on a steer which brings a net price of £10 in Liverpool to-day the Canadian exporter, when he translates that into Canadian funds, receives $39.70. If our currency were at par that steer would bring us $48.70 a difference of $9 on a low priced steer. Now, we are making all sorts of efforts to encourage the shipment of cattle to England; we are reducing freight rates, cutting insurance rates, and so on, and all these things are a mere bagatelle compared with the question of exchange. If we could go back to the gold standard next week and were on a parity with the United States, what would be our position in regard to cattle? That steer would bring $34.50. Compare our position with the grower in the Argentine. If our currency were on a par with that of the Argentine that same steer would bring $55. How under heaven can the Canadian farmer compete with the farmers in Australia and in the Argentine under these conditions? The farmer in Australia and in the Argentine will put us out of the wheat market if something is not done to correct the situation.

The thing which should be done is to allow our currency to go down until it is at least on a par with the British pound. The Argentine and Australian farmer still would have a very distinct advantage over us. I recall a speech delivered in 1922 by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, at which time he quoted Doctor Melchoir, the famous German economist. Speaking of Germany's depreciated currency, Doctor Melchoir said that a depreciated currency gave a premium on exports which at the same time ruins the industries of competing countries. Our chief competitors in cattle, wheat and wool, are the Argentine and Australia, who have that premium on exports which, according to Doctor Melchoir, will cripple the industry of Canada. We have no chance to compete. What I have said with regard to wheat and cattle applies equally to hogs. These are the three mainstays of the Canadian farmer. I think it would apply as well to our dairy products, because they are now on an export basis. It applies also to newsprint and all the products of fishing, lumbering and mining, all our basic industries. The prices of our exports would be increased. It is true there would be some increase in the budgets of our governments, because they would have to pay a premium for foreign exchange to meet the interest on loans payable in New York funds, but the farmer has been carrying this burden long enough.

After all, why should not the value of our dollar depend upon our export and import balances? If the gold standard is removed and the value of our dollar in foreign markets is fixed by our balances in international settlements, that would be only fair. One reason why we went from a favourable to an unfavourable trade balance within the last two years is because of the drastic drop in the prices of our exports, principally wheat. If we had not been on a gold standard a premium on foreign exchange would have been created almost immediately. The wheat farmer sells for foreign exchange. That premium would have increased the price of his wheat and it would immediately tend to hold up the price of his products. The drop in the prices of our agricultural exports would not have been nearly as severe as it has been. More money would have been placed in the hands of the farmer with which to pay his interest, with which to pay taxes and to buy goods. After all, it is only through the purchase of goods that employment can be created in the factories of Canada.

I think this is one of the most important questions which the Imperial conference could discuss, and I hope that as a result of that discussion some measure may be found to improve the currency system of every country in the empire and to obtain as near as possible stable exchange rates. However, before I sit down, I want to warn the government that an attempt to stabilize our currency through making it redeemable in gold would be placing the price level of Canada, our standard of living, our whole internal stability, at the mercy of foreign bankers who could at any time decide to withdraw gold from Canada and break down our price levels and our civilization which has taken so long to build up.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I should like to take the opportunity which the subamendment gives me to say a few words with reference to the very able speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). First of all I wish to congratulate him very heartily upon the splendid speech he made to the house this afternoon. There are one or two remarks of his to which I wish to refer, and if the rules of the house do not permit the minister to reply on this occasion I hope that he will do so at the next opportunity when the subject comes up, which I hope will be this session.

If I heard him correctly, he stated "That money itself is not increased". I would ask him to define what he terms money. Does he include in money not merely coin but currency and credit or anything that functions as money? If he includes all those three, and if I am correctly citing his statement that money itself is not increased, I cannot understand how he comes to his conclusion, when every time we make a new issue of coins at the mint we are certainly increasing the quantity of money, and every time the banks take avantage of their power of note issue currency is certainly increased. Currency is increased every time the banks use the Finance Act provisions which enable them to bring various securities to the treasury board and to get dominion notes. Also in time of war, as in 1914, when our circulating medium was increased by about two billion dollars, surely money was increased. In this connection I would refer to a statement made by Sir Thomas White in his book, War-time Finance, in which he said that Canada surprised not only herself but the whole world when her people subscribed twice as much money as all the money in Canada to various war loans, and then had amply sufficient in addition to carry on a growing business. I would like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to be kind enough to answer those questions when he rises the next time this subject is under debate.

Secondly, he referred to a managed currency. I would ask him if by that he meant currency and credit, because currency itself is a very small part of our monetary medium.

Thirdly, he referred to someone in the banking and commerce committee of 1923 advocating the very free issue and printing of paper money. I would remind the house that no one in this corner during the last ten years to my knowledge has ever for a moment suggested using the printing machines for issuing money without any check whatever. We have always been very, very careful to guard against such a policy.

Before I sit down I wish to refer briefly to a remark that was made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) this afternoon. He informed the house that the Liberal party had for some time past been giving a great deal of study to this monetary question. I am fully aware that the hon. member himself has been giving some study to it, but except for a few words that he uttered on a previous occasion I had never heard a speech made on this subject by any member of the party to my right until the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) spoke the other evening. But if it is true that the party to my right is making a serious study of the money question, I wish to say most sincerely that it is one of the best pieces of news that we have had for a long time, and anything that I and those sitting around me can do to cooperate with them in studying this all-important subject we shall be only too glad to do at any time and place.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the question is put, has the minister given any consideration to a modification of the words of his amendment in order to have them accord with the interpretation given to the amendment by the Prime Minister? What becomes of record is the resolution as it stands, which is quite different from the meaning being read into it. As it stands, in the language employed by the minister, for reasons I have already given, it is not in a form which we on this side of the house could support.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite sure that the house and the country will accept the explanation and the interpretation placed upon it by the Prime Minister, and I cannot see any object in making a change in the language.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Stevens) agreed to, on division.

Amendment (Mr. Irvine) as amended agreed to.

Motion (Mr. MacLean) as amended agreed to.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

LIMITATION OF RATE OF INTEREST CHARGED BY BANKS

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River) moved the second reading of Bill No. 16, to amend the Bank Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. SPENCER: This bill is somewhat similar to one I introduced a year ago. I feel quite confident hon. members did not sufficiently understand the bill introduced at that time, or it would have received more considerate attention. The purpose of the present bill is simply to insert a clause in the Bank Act which will make it imperative for banking houses to keep within the statute in making their interest charges. I cannot think of any other legislation under which transgressors may operate without punishment.

The bill now before us is most important, not from the point of view of keeping the rate of interest down to a certain point, to which I shall direct my remarks in a few moments, but because it seeks to keep inviolate a statute of this country. If we pass laws in this parliament which are ignored because no penalty clause is provided, then we are simply extending an invitation to anyone, anywhere, at any time to break our laws, if he can do so without being punished. It is for that reason I introduced this bill.

The bill as drawn up a year ago called for rather severe penalties, which were criticized by hon. members on the government side of the house. To meet that criticism the penalties for which provision is made in the new bill are very much lighter. For instance, the penalty against a bank breaking the statute has been dropped from $5,000 to $500. The penalty imposed upon a director of a bank has been left out entirely, and the penalty directed towards the officer of a bank who violates the provisions of the statute is that he be found guilty of an indictable offence and liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding $100—a penalty very much lighter than that which appeared in the previous bill. The reference to imprisonment has been deleted.

To my mind the terms of the bill are so reasonable that I cannot imagine the house would wish to turn it down this year. A summary was made last year in the province of Alberta of rates of interest being charged by various banks including the following: the Bank of Montreal, The Canadian Bank of Commerce, The Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Toronto, the Imperial Bank of Canada, the Dominion Bank, and the Bank of Nova Scotia. The returns which came in show that at two places 8 per cent was being charged, in seven places the rate was from 8 per cent to 10 per cent; in eleven places the rate was from 8 per cent to 9 per cent; in six places 9 per cent was being charged; in one place the rate was 10 per cent, and in one hundred and five places the rate was 8 per cent. Those rates are higher than the legal rate of interest, and for that reason I should like to see this clause inserted in the Bank Act to penalize any banking institution or the officers of such institution for going beyond the statute. May I add that similar returns were obtained from the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

As I said before I have not introduced this bill because I think 7 per cent is a particularly fair charge; as a matter of fact, I think that rate is altogether too high. I am putting the bill forward however because I should like to see the law in Canada respected, whether it refers to banking institutions or to private individuals. I have in my hand a note which came from the province of Saskatchewan for over $900, with an interest rate thereon of 8 per cent. There is no necessity for such high charges. Although I have not the exact figures before me, we were given figures a few nights ago to show that most of the banks in Canada are paying good dividends, and keeping them up to the standard attained in better times. I very much regret to say that business in Canada is very bad indeed, nevertheless it would seem that these institutions are making charges high enough to provide their regular dividends. As I have altered the penalties in this bill, and because of the justice of it, which I contend, is absolutely sound, I trust hon. members will give it their favourable consideration and allow it to pass.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, owing to the indisposition of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), I am, for the moment, content to take his place rather than to ask the hon. member to let his bill stand. During recent years, having regard to the decisions of the courts, I think there have been relatively few violations of the provisions of the Bank Act, as compared with conditions prior to the first decision of the courts as to the legality of charging more than 7 per cent. I agree wholly with what the hon. member has said, that laws placed upon the statute books should be observed whether by corporations or by individuals. They are intended for both and should be respected equally by each; as to that I think there can be no doubt.

There are, however, reasons given by the chartered banks why in some communities they have, as a matter of contract, charged more than 7 per cent; they said if they did not do so they would have had to close their branches. May I add that they have given lists of communities in which that fact is true. Whether or not those reasons would satisfy the hon. member and his friends as to the soundness of the position which has been taken, I am not prepared to say. All I can say is that last year, as he has very properly pointed out, the penalties were out of all proportion to the offences. To-night if I were going to criticize any particular section of this bill—and I do not purpose to discuss it at length—I would say that to make a violation of the act an indictable offence would involve the provinces in very large expenditures of public moneys for prosecutions and, in most instances, I should fancy there would be difficulty in securing convictions. A summary conviction would probably be sufficient to meet all the purposes the hon. member has in mind. Without in any sense committing myself to the principle that he suggests, but agreeing wholly with him that any law placed upon the statute books should be observed, I suggest to him that if he will, without committing hon. members to the principle of the bill, let the house give it its second reading, it can be referred to the committee on banking and commerce, where an opportunity will be afforded to those who are interested to express their views and fully present the case which they may make as to the undesirability of enacting a clause such as suggested so long as banks are asked to be maintained in very small communities where the cost of maintenance is far beyond the profits derived from their operation. If the hon. gentleman is prepared to adopt my suggestion, I would certainly commend that course to the house.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad indeed to acquiesce in the wishes of the Prime Minister.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE ACT

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) moved the second reading of Bill No. 17 to amend the Marriage and Divorce Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BURY: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is much that I can add to the explanation I gave the house when asking leave to introduce the bill. The amendments are of a very simple nature. The marriage law as it now stands provides that a man may marry his deceased wife's sister or the daughter of a sister of his deceased wife, but does not provide that he may marry the daughter of a brother of his deceased wife. The first amendment is for the purpose of making it legal for a man to marry the daughter of a brother of his deceased wife, as he may now marry the daughter of a sister of a deceased wife. The second amendment is analogous to that in reference to the woman. By the marriage law of Canada a woman can marry now a brother of her deceased husband, or the son of a brother of her deceased husband, but cannot marry the son of a sister of her deceased husband. The second amendment is for the purpose of remedying this anomaly.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

EXCLUSION OF OUTSIDE SERVICE FROM OPERATION OF ACT.

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gagnon for the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Civil Service Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): I wish very briefly to further discuss certain details of this bill. When speaking to the bill the other day the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) drew the attention of the house to the fact that if it were enacted it would have the effect of destroying what is ordinarily known as the preference under the Civil Service Act to those who served in His Majesty's forces overseas during the war. If there be any doubt as to the force of the point raised by the hon. member, reference to the act itself will make the position very plain. Section 26 of the Civil Service Act provides:

> Competitive examinations shall be held by the commission to establish lists of persons eligible for appointment.

Section 29 contains this provision:

> Immediately after each examination a list of the successful competitors in the case of a competitive examination, and of successful candidates in order of merit in other examinations, shall be made out and published in the Canada Gazette.

> 2. The commission shall prepare and maintain a special list of persons in receipt of pensions by reason of their services in the war who
> (a) have from causes attributable to such service lost capacity for physical exertion to an extent which makes them unfit efficiently to pursue the avocations which they were pursuing before the war;
> (b) have not been successfully reestablished in some other avocation; and
> (c) desire to be placed on such list.

There provision is made for a special list on which shall be placed those in receipt of pensions who have qualified at competitive examinations. Section 29 provides further by subsection 4:

> In all examinations for entrance into the civil service the persons named on such special list who are found to possess the necessary qualifications shall be named, in the order of merit, on the list of successful candidates above all other candidates; and all other persons who have been on active service overseas on the military forces or who have served on the high seas in a seagoing ship of war in the naval forces of His Majesty, or of any of the allies of His Majesty, during the war, who have left such service with an honourable record or who have been honourably discharged, or when any persons who have served as aforesaid have died owing to such service, the widows of such persons, and who, in either case, obtain sufficient marks to pass such examinations, shall, irrespective of the marks they have obtained, be named in the order of merit, on the list of successful candidates next after any candidates who are on the special list mentioned in subsection two of this section and above all other candidates.

This bill provides that section 63 be added, as follows:

> The outside service shall be excluded from the operation of the act, and the governor in council may make such regulations as are deemed advisable, prescribing how such positions are to be dealt with.

It is obvious that the only preference with respect to those who served overseas, so far as appointments to the civil service are concerned, is created by virtue of and under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Therefore if all outside appointments be removed from the operation of the Civil Service Act, certainly the provisions of that act will no longer apply thereto.

In fairness to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), who introduced the bill, I wish to state to the house that I have had the privilege of talking over the matter with him. He informs me, and certainly I am convinced, that it was never in his mind that the proposed amendments to the Civil Service Act should destroy that preference. But in addition to being generously endowed by nature with a keen mind, the hon. member has the further advantage of a training in law and a mature experience, so I think no argument is necessary to convince him—and I assume it will not be necessary to convince other hon. members of this house—that we must take the bill as we find it. It is true that the bill itself makes no reference to the removal of such preference, but in connection with the removal of outside appointments from the Civil Service Act it makes no reservation in relation to the preference at present enjoyed. Therefore, whatever may have been the intention, we must face the facts as they are, and if the bill were passed in its present form it would have the effect of destroying that preference.

It is not my purpose to-night to enter into any discussion or argument as to whether or not such preferences should have been granted. That question is not before the house. But the effect being as I have indicated, for that reason alone I cannot support the bill. It is true that the measure contains a provision that with respect to apointments to the outside service the governor in council may make such regulations as are deemed advisable, yet the bill itself contains no reference to what those regulations may be, so I cannot give it my support.

That is only one feature of the bill, though it is an important feature. In their general application, however, other provisions of the bill are much wider. They refer to all appointments to the outside service, that is to say, to all appointments outside the city of Ottawa and its immediate environs. It means that with respect to all outside appointments we are going back to the patronage system. Was it not an advance when the Civil Service Act was introduced? I am indebted to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who has placed on Hansard extracts from the speeches of distinguished members of this house relative thereto. The fact that they are there makes it unnecessary for me to repeat or refer to them in detail, but the general feeling was that in the interests of the public service it was advisable that so far as possible we should do away with the old system of patronage.

Were those men wrong? I am aware of the fact that in the administration of the act the Civil Service Commission cannot be held blameless, in view of certain recent investigations and exposures. But because that is so is it desirable that we do away with the whole operation of the act? Surely it is a question of the proper administration of the act, and not a question of doing away with the principle on which it is based. If in their administration of the act the present Civil Service Commission have allowed considerations other than merit to enter into the question of appointments; if they have allowed considerations other than merit to enter into the question of promotions, the fact remains that whether it be necessary to perform a minor or a major operation in connection with the commission, this is a matter of disciplining that body. I understand that a committee of this house is to be appointed to consider the whole matter of the administration of the Civil Service Act by the commission; I understand from my hon. friend from Dorchester that it will be proposed that this bill be not pressed but that it be referred to a committee, so I am quite content that the matter should be disposed of in that way. I think it is desirable in the interest of the public service and of the administration of the Civil Service Act that the whole matter of its administration be thoroughly and diligently investigated by a committee of this house.

To take from under the operation of the act all appointments to the civil service of Canada outside of Ottawa is to my mind unthinkable. Instances have been given of appointments made under the Civil Service Commission as it operates to-day which have not been creditable, but to my mind those reflections have not been upon the principle but rather upon the administration of the act.

I have heard it urged that hon. members know best who should be appointed from their constituencies. The other evening in discussing this bill I had occasion during the few minutes at my disposal to make reference to that phase of the matter. Frankly, I am not apprehensive to any great degree on that ground so far as original appointments are concerned, but assuming that original appointments, even if left in the hands of individual members, are made on merit, what about the uncertainty of the service if the principle of patronage is to apply? Take a young man in private industry. He enters the service of a firm with high hopes, willing to give of the best that is in him, expecting—what?—that by diligence, by industry and by the application of such abilities as he possesses he will get advancement. But once you introduce again into the civil service of Canada the principle that appointments shall be made on the strength of party service, there follows as day follows night this fact, that when there is a change of government those who owe their appointments to their party loyalty and party service will in many cases stand in danger of losing those appointments. The same principle would apply to either party; unfortunately it is too true. And with what result?

The class of applicants you will get for positions in the service will deteriorate. What young man, ambitious and desirous of advancing himself in life, would wish to join the service knowing quite well that after probably eight or ten, or at the most twelve or fifteen years, he is going to face, to put it mildly, the possibility of being removed from the service? Apart from the deterioration in the class of applicants who would enter the service, consider the situation of public servants working under such conditions, with the apprehension always ahead of them that some day diligence, industry and ability will avail them nothing but that instead, by virtue of the patronage principle, they may be cast out.

To my mind, apart altogether from the first observations I made in regard to the question of preference to returned men, it would be a mistake to pass the bill. I heartily endorse, however, the suggestion that a committee be appointed, that the whole question of the administration of the act be investigated and that helpful suggestions looking to its improvement be there fully considered.

Mr. T. F. AHEARN (Ottawa): I wish to make some very brief remarks respecting the bill now before the house. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) have left me very little to say because I find myself in almost complete agreement with both. I cannot regard this bill as anything but a very long step towards a return to the patronage system, and in my opinion the patronage system is as dead and as much discredited to-day as when it was abolished and the merit system, under the Civil Service Commission, substituted for it. I do not believe that any case has been made out against the merit system. If there is any serious criticism it is directed against the Civil Service Commission and its methods; but those who believe in the merit system have no fear that a committee of this house, taking evidence in the fullest manner, can fail to point out a way to administer the merit system to the complete satisfaction of the people of this country.

I strongly believe that it is the will of the great majority of the Canadian people that entrance into the civil service of Canada shall be open to any Canadian who possesses the qualifications necessary for the position that he or she aspires to, and that adherence to any political party shall not be a consideration. I believe that this is the great point insisted upon by the majority of Canadians, and that most hon. members on returning to their constituencies will find that this feeling is just as strong to-day as it ever was.

I think I am safe in saying that those who are in the civil service stand almost as a unit in opposition to the provisions of this bill. The merit system, to those who have got into the civil service, stands as a guard against favouritism and influence, which I believe would endanger them if the patronage system were restored. Civil servants giving faithful and honest service would lose all feeling of safety, security and fair play.

A man may be a good and efficient party worker but at the same time be utterly unsuited to some position in the civil service which he may aspire to. Yet, frankly, I feel that hon. members would find it difficult to resist pressure from party organizations to recommend that type of man under certain circumstances. My own opinion is that patronage is a snare and a delusion so far as any member of parliament is concerned. You recommend one man for a position and immediately you incur the hostility of ten or twelve others; and you find yourself, so far as your own party is concerned, in greater difficulty than if you had done nothing at all. For that reason, looking at it from the point of view of practical politics, I do not think there is anything to be said for patronage.

I hope and expect that this bill now before the house will be defeated, and if that occurs the committee proposed by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) will be appointed. In that event the Civil Service Commission will appear before the committee and tell its side of the story—because there are always two sides to any story. Until that examination is completed, and findings based on evidence are arrived at, I do not propose to criticize the Civil Service Commission in any way.

A certain amount of political patronage affecting minor jobs still flourishes, unfortunately. I regret to say that a letter from a ward chairman, a member of parliament or a defeated candidate is still as potent to-day as it has been in the past. Nothing has hurt the people of my own constituency more than the fact that, in these hard times, those who are in need of help cannot obtain assistance. I think we should consider ourselves as Canadians first and party men afterwards.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. AHEARN: The hon. member may laugh, but that is my belief. I hope to see the civil service kept open to every Canadian, irrespective of party, who is able to qualify for the positions vacant, and that the act will continue to protect those already in the service from favouritism and unfair influences. The preference now given to war veterans should be retained. It is a contract which must be kept if we are to keep faith with those who served during the war. The partial wrecking of the Royal Canadian Air Force constitutes a great blow to all service men and surely no further blows should be allowed to fall upon them.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask the house for permission to withdraw my amendment to this bill. I have been informed that it is the intention of the government to propose an amendment which, if passed, would have the same effect as if my amendment had carried. I have been favoured with a copy of the proposed amendment and I note it contains the provision for the appointment of a committee of this house to inquire into practically all phases of the administration of the Civil Service Act. I welcome such an investigation and I therefore ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might be well to read the amendment which has been submitted to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the leader of the party in the other corner (Mr. Gardiner). The motion for six months' hoist having been withdrawn, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Ryckman, the following:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The appointments to, and the control and direction of, the civil service of Canada, and, generally, the administration and operation of the Civil Service Act, be referred to a special committee consisting of seven members of this house, to be appointed hereafter, with instruction to inquire into and report concerning the repeal or amendment of any of the provisions of said act or the substitution therefor or addition thereto of other provisions, as the committee may deem advisable, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

The effect of the passing of this amendment will be to block the second reading of the present bill, and the question, not of the present bill, but of the Civil Service Act as set out in this amendment, will be then referred to a special committee of seven members.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has mentioned his submission of this amendment to myself as leader of the opposition, I should like to say that when that was done I expressed to the minister, as he has just said, the view that in my opinion such an amendment would be satisfactory to hon. members on this side. I should like it to be understood that in expressing that view I had no desire to curtail in any way the debate or discussion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The debate could proceed on this amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not an agreement in any sense to bind hon. members on this side of the house to any arrangement.

Amendment (Mr. Heaps) withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is now on the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie).

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I am in entire sympathy with the amendment moved by the Minister of Justice, but I have grave doubts if it is in order on the second reading of this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: It is covered by May.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am asking His Honour, not a private member.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no doubt it is in order.

Mr. F. W. PERRAS (Wright): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy indeed to associate myself with those who have preceded me and to say that I stand four-square in favour of the merit system. I have a good many civil servants in my constituency who have given faithful and diligent service to the crown. Some of them have been employed for a number of years; others have been in the government service for shorter periods, but they are all doing their work in a most satisfactory manner and are entitled to be protected. My principal objection to the present bill is that those who would enter the service in the hope of securing permanent employment would never be sure of their position. After serving a number of years and after buying property and entering into numerous obligations on the strength of a permanent position, they might find themselves on the street and their families placed in very painful circumstances

I believe in the merit system, I think it is the fairer way of making appointments, and in the long run it is productive of the best results. It is also more satisfactory for the employees themselves. After giving many years of faithful service it is only fair that they should obtain the promotion to which they are entitled. Under this system the employees are satisfied and I am sure that a satisfied employee gives much more attention and care to his employer's business than one who is discontented. It is because I am one of those who firmly believe a faithful employee should be protected that I am in favour of the continuance of the merit system.

If any objection can be raised to the present system I think it would be to the provisions of the law itself. I am opposed to the bill but I would not object to this matter being referred to a special committee so that any difficulties now present may be removed. I would not, however, want anything done which would adversely affect the present merit system, and I will vote against any attack made upon it.

Mr. E. A. PECK (West Peterborough): I want to say a word or two on this bill. Speaking generally, I am not in favour of the bill receiving the endorsation of this house, but there is a matter which I think should be taken into consideration by the committee, at all events, to which this whole question is going to be referred.

I do not think the member for the district in which an appointment is to be made should be entirely ignored. After all, the member should have some say as to who should be appointed. He is as a rule a person of reasonable intelligence, and more than that, he is the choice of the people of the district. Surely, therefore, he should have some voice in the selection of those who are to carry on the business of the government in the riding that he represents. The inside service is not under consideration in this connection at all, but when there is a vacancy in the outside service, what happens at the present time? There is a perfunctory kind of examination; some representative of the department concerned, I suppose, goes down to the district, probably knowing nothing of it or of the candidates, and after making a few cursory inquiries goes back and reports to the Civil Service Commission that such and such a person is the one he thinks should be appointed to the position. He has not the means of knowledge which are open to the member for the district, because generally the member has been brought up in that district and is very well acquainted with the people who are likely to be applicants. So I submit that the committee should consider this question; that after a list of eligible candidates has been prepared by the commission it should be submitted to the member for the district, or at least the first three or four names on the list, so that the member may express his opinion as to the merits of the candidate. In that way we would avoid having someone appointed who is not really under all the circumstances the most suitable person for the position. I think the member can be relied upon to select a suitable candidate. He is responsible to the people he represents, and I am sure he can be relied upon to decide on the basis of merit.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I suppose there is very little to be gained in prolonging the debate after the announcement by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) that he proposes to appoint a committee to inquire into the administration of the Civil Service Act and possible changes that may be made in it, but I should like to state my own view that it would be a backward step to make any drastic change in the principle of the Civil Service Act.

I am at a loss to know whence come the objections to the act. Perhaps I should not put it in that way. So far as I can ascertain, there has never been any great objection on the part of the Canadian people to the purpose and operation of the Civil Service Act as it is to-day. The objections come almost entirely, I believe, from individual members of the House of Commons, who seem to believe that they are in a better position to make these appointments than the members of the Civil Service Commission. There may occasionally be some truth in that statement, but as a general principle I think it is absolutely incorrect, because with the best of intentions—I give credit to most, in fact all, of the members of the house for a desire to discharge their public duties with absolute honesty—it is entirely unavoidable if you return to the system of political patronage that the pressure will be so great that the chief thing to be observed in making recommendations to the Civil Service Commission will not be the merit and ability of the candidate to perform the duties of the office, but rather whether he has performed the right kind of political service for the party involved.

Mr. PECK: Not necessarily.

Mr. EULER: Not necessarily, but I am afraid that that will be the case in very, very many instances.

The Civil Service Act was enacted, if I remember correctly, in 1918, under the Union government, as it was known. I think it has worked fairly well, although in 1921, again if I remember correctly, there was an attempt made to drive what was known then as a coach-and-four through the Civil Service Act by what was known as the Spinney bill. I happened to be a member of the committee to which the Spinney bill was referred, and I opposed the recommendation made by the committee at that time. In that recommendation was a clause to the effect that the Civil Service Commission should have the power to divest itself of authority to appoint certain employees to the civil service if they regarded such action as being in the public interest. I hope that no such recommendation will be made by the committee which is now to be appointed, because that would transfer authority from parliament to its creature, the Civil Service Commission. If any changes are to be made, they should be made by parliament itself.

I am not here to say that there are not difficulties in the administration of the Civil Service Act. After an operation of some thirteen or fourteen years I think it quite likely that changes in the act could be made with advantage to the service. Possibly I might be able to point out some myself. The statement has been made at times that one result of the enactment of the Civil Service Act as it is to-day has been to transfer the patronage from the members or the ministers to the heads of branches in the departments, and it may be that that has sometimes been the case. I can conceive of cases where the heads of branches, to whom after all is committed the giving of the ratings where promotions are concerned, may, if they do not do their duty, exercise favouritism either on political or on personal grounds. I am almost certain that that at times has been done and that in isolated instances favouritism or patronage has been exercised by the head of a branch rather than by the minister himself. But despite any weaknesses that may exist in the operation of the act, I still hold that the advantages to be gained by the provisions of the act are so much greater than any defects there may be, that there is really no argument with regard to the matter. There may have been difficulties, there may have been disadvantages, there may have been abuses in the administration of the act. If so, they should be disclosed before the committee.

It seems to me that there is a good deal of money wasted to-day. For instance, to-night I received in my mail notice of an appointment to be made to the wardenship of one of our penitentiaries. It is pretty much a waste of time and money to print and distribute these notices. We receive them almost daily at home, and they are of absolutely no use to anybody. That practice might just as well be discontinued, because we have nothing whatever to say in the making of the appointments. I have a certain degree of sympathy with the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Peck) when he says that the member might very well be consulted by those making inquiries in his neighbourhood as to appointments to certain vacancies. I can see no particular objection to that so long as there is no duress or compulsion, so long as the member is not clothed with any authority to dictate to those making the investigation.

I am entirely opposed to the principle of this bill and I am absolutely in favour of the amendment which will refer to a committee the matter of investigation and possible amendments to the act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have heard observations made by hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the position I have frequently taken in connection with civil service appointments. I have advocated the merit system on more than one occasion in this house and out of it. During the last fifteen months I have had occasion to examine the operations of the statute, and I think perhaps this house is overlooking the fact that after we concede the merit system is the proper system, the next question is: Who is to determine merit? That is where the difficulty has arisen, and it is a real difficulty.

Let me give this house an illustration: In a certain town of this dominion it was necessary to appoint a caretaker for a public building. A representative of the Department of Public Works met the applicants and, having seen them and discussed their qualifications, placed one of them in charge temporarily. That man, had, first, the qualification of being a returned soldier; secondly, he had had some experience in the sort of work required; thirdly, he was of proper age, and lastly his scholastic attainments consisted of a public school education. He wrote the application in his own handwriting. There were other applicants for the same position; they, too, wrote their applications in their own handwriting, as required; at least some of them were returned soldiers. The temporary employee was rated by the public works examiner as being better qualified for the position than anyone else. Suddenly however an educational test became necessary for the job of caretaker, and a clerk in this city was named to determine the educational qualifications of the applicants. Without seeing them, and without any examination other than looking at the application forms which they had filed, he gave an applicant other than the one who was temporarily in charge eight points more than that temporary employee. The result is that the temporary appointee was put out of his position, and the appointment was given to the one who had the educational qualifications determined in his absence from looking at his application form; and mark you, the selection was made not by the Civil Service Commission but by a clerk who receives compensation I think wholly in keeping with his merits, and who was appointed for reasons which need not be discussed.

There you have the merit system; there you have an instance where the merit of that caretaker was determined by a clerk in Ottawa who never saw the applicants, and who determined that the educational qualifications of the one appointed were superior to those of the unfortunate young man who was in charge, who was also a returned soldier and who had as good an education, I would say —because I have photostatic copies of the original documents—as the one who succeeded in securing the position.

It must be apparent therefore that something must be done by which the merits of contending applicants may be decided by proper methods. It was that case and other cases of the same type which made me so desirous of having this matter considered by a committee. We are shocked when we think of a man giving absolute satisfaction in a position, and who is actually better qualified by experience, being removed from it because, after looking at two application forms and without seeing or examining the applicants in any way, the educational test of one is said to be superior to the other.

I am now advised by the commission that the educational test has been removed in connection with positions of that kind. The result is that if that unfortunate returned man now had his position he would be able to keep it, but because attention was directed to this abuse he is now out of a position and another man who was not seen by the examiner and was given a rating of eight points higher than his competitor, on educational qualifications, is now working. I am bound to say that very ugly rumours were about as to what determined the difference of eight points; I leave them out, however, as they have nothing to do with the matter under discussion, I merely mention the circumstance.

Matters such as that have brought suspicion and distrust to the minds of many people concerning the commission, and have necessitated action being taken. Only the other day complaints were made as to the high expense of its operation. We gave notice to that branch of the public service, as we did to others, concerning temporary employees. To-day we are advised that they can effect retrenchment to the extent of $9,000 per annum by the withdrawal of a certain number of temporary employees. That represents the interest on only $180,000, but indicates clearly why the public outside of Ottawa has become so deeply interested in what factors determine merit. I could recite a great many more cases of a similar character. Mistakes will happen; we must allow for them. Difficulties have to be overcome by experience in the operation of a statute. The present statute has been in force thirteen years, and the circumstances to which I referred happened only last year. As I say, there are others just like it. It is for that reason the government has concluded it owes a duty to the merit system to see that the factors which determine merit are factors not under the control of a hidden hand which operates through an official drawing an insignificant compensation, and with power to determine the life or death, officially, of applicants for positions. It is for that reason the government asks that this bill be referred to a committee so that these matters may be considered.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the speeches of the members who preceded me in this debate. Some were in favour of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) requesting this house to amend the Civil Service Act by excluding the outside service, others, perhaps for personal reasons, express contrary views and oppose the bill.

In no manner do I wish to criticize the Civil Service Commission! Far be it from my thought, because I feel certain that in the discharge of their duties they have acted honestly to the best of their ability and in the interests of the public. However, I wish to state—even at the risk of shocking the house—that the Civil Service Act rests on a false principle, that is deceit. It was framed with a view of depriving members of both present and future governments of the responsibilities inherent to the administration. I state that the act is contrary to the principle of self-government, because a government conscious of its responsibilities must be vested with the authority necessary to appoint its officials or employees.

Far from being opposed to the merit system, I should like to see all applicants for positions in the public service, submit to the required tests; however, I would insist that these examinations be corrected by those who are responsible for the administration, by those who are accountable to the people, and thereby best suited to choose, among the applicants, candidates who are as well qualified as those chosen by the present commission.

I am therefore in favour of the bill because it is in keeping with the principle of self-government, and, because, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, former governments as well as this government, have always managed to find positions for their friends. When the question of promotion arises, the heads of departments, for instance, are requested by the Civil Service Commissioners to report as to the qualifications required by the candidates, and I may state that often, under previous governments and the present one, favouritism was shown on such occasions to friends of the government which happened to be in power. Bearing in mind our responsibilities as legislators, we should avoid deceiving the electorate and enact legislation based on sincerity and honesty of purpose, so as to satisfy everybody and also in the best interests of Canada.

I therefore again state, sir, that this act is unjust—not to say hypocritical—and has but one aim, that of deceiving the members of Parliament and the candidates who aspire after civil service positions. In closing my remarks, I again state that I am in favour of this bill, however, I would not support it if I thought it had been introduced in order to reestablish patronage in the civil service. I believe in the sincerity of the sponsor of this bill and I am convinced the merit system will be retained in the administration of the civil service.

Instead of applying this system "at large" as at present, it should be applied in each department in such a way that the civil employees would be fairly dealt with, not be disappointed in their rights and not be dismissed for trivial reasons, like a large number of postmasters have been since this government is in power.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Do not forget that under the late government dismissals also took place.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): For these reasons, sir, I am in favour of the principle of the bill, and I trust that in the future this government, as well as the government which will, I am certain, replace it in two years, will have the right to appoint its employees in keeping with a merit system which takes into account the government's responsibility towards the people.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): Whatever sentiments, Mr. Speaker, we may individually entertain towards either the bill under discussion or the motion which was moved by my friend from Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), I think we can all agree that they have both served a good purpose in bringing up for discussion on the floor of the house, and we hope for some practical settlement, a question that has been—not to use a more inelegant term—long over-ripe for settlement. It is a question of very great importance to the public service of the dominion. I hope that the amendment which has been moved by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) will carry the support of the house. Not that I believe that it is the best way of dealing with the matter, but because it is a step in the right drection and may enable us later to take a further step.

The questions raised and the issues involved in the bill itself and in the resolution affect the interests vitally and profoundly of a large body of our fellow citizens, many of whom have devoted practically all the active years of their life to the public service, and some of whom have built up a record for industry and effective and honest work of which any nation might well be proud. But those questions and issues concern not merely this great body of public servants, but the public service as a whole and the interests of the dominion. Therefore it seems to me that parliament can do nothing less than give to them the most serious consideration, the most searching inquiry and the strictest non-partisan and patriotic thought.

When the hon. member introduced his resolution he ventured the assertion that he was assured of the support of nine-tenths of the members of the house. I doubted it at the time, but I said to myself: Well, if that be true, I am one of the twenty-four and a half members who constitute the one-tenth. I may be only the half member of the despicable minority, but I can take no other stand than I now take. I find, however, during the course of this debate that my hon. friend grossly exaggerated the amount of sympathy and support this resolution would evoke, and if I am any judge of the sentiments of the house I am quite satisfied that the resolution moved by the Minister of Justice will carry.

There were two propositions put forward by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario from which I wish at once to dissociate myself. He said that the present act, the present civil service system, was a relic of war hysteria, that the parliament of 1918 was stampeded into taking up a position which was extreme, which it never should have adopted, and from which we must now retreat. It may be that there is a certain measure of truth in the fact that war sentiment had its effect upon the measure introduced in 1918; it would have been unnatural if that had not been the case. Men felt profoundly at the time. But, Mr. Speaker, while we may give the greatest possible weight to the argument that post-war sentiment played its part in determining the provisions of the bill and the nature of the civil service system set up by the act, this argument has to do with details and not with the principle of the act itself. As I listened to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), I could find nothing in his speech dealing with the principle of the system or of the act, though I did find much that dealt with the administration of the act and with details.

If that be true, and if the controversy to-day has to do with details and not with principle, does it not rather savour of a too drastic remedy to suggest that we should sacrifice the principle in order to rectify the details? Is it not a little like proposing to cut off Cromwell's head in order to remove his wart? We remember that the Protector had pretty strong views as to how he should be treated. He said to Lely, the great Stuart painter of the time, "Paint me as I am. If you leave out the scars and wrinkles I will not pay you a shilling." "Paint me, wart and all." If anyone had suggested that in order to increase his beauty the wart and other blemishes should be removed by taking off his head, I can well imagine the sentiments he would have expressed. But the bill, and the resolution which has been dropped, both proposed to sacrifice the principle for the sake of the administration of that principle.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does my hon. friend wish to indicate that the dropping of responsible government by appointing the Civil Service Commission was a detail?

Mr. BURY: I am coming to the second proposition which my hon. friend made, and I will answer his question when I come to it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Be sure you come to it.

Mr. BURY: I will answer my hon. friend's question; I will not shirk it in the least. I have given one answer to the first proposition, that the Civil Service Act was a relic of war hysteria. Another answer, given by my friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland), seems most conclusive and convincing. He showed that the principle of the act was laid down in 1907, seven years before the war broke out, by Sir Robert Borden in the Halifax platform, and was re-affirmed by Sir George Foster in 1908 before the first rumblings of the 1914 war were heard. Even if you put the first signs of the great war at the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as some of us did at the time, the answer still applies. Seven years before the war this principle was proclaimed, and it was reasserted one year later.

I was not in Canada in 1907; I only came in 1912. But I remember that when I took an interest in provincial and federal politics in the beginning of 1913, almost as soon as I arrived in the city where I still live, I discovered that there were two problems which obsessed the minds of the Conservatives of Alberta. One of them was the return of their natural resources, for which they were fighting, and the other was the introduction of a proper civil service system that would do away with the abominable system of patronage. I flung myself heart and soul into the fray in support of the second of these proposals, and in 1913 I had an opportunity to assert to a large assembly in Edmonton that the people of Canada might as well expect to get decent public service from their civil servants under the patronage system as they might expect to distil attar of roses from a skunk. Perhaps that is a figure of speech more forcible than refined, but it is absolutely true. I am not reflecting upon the civil servants of 1912 or 1913, or any other year up to 1918.

Mr. SHAVER: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? I think he compared the civil service of to-day with attar of roses.

Mr. BURY: I did not compare the civil service of to-day with attar of roses at all.

Mr. SHAVER: At any rate this is the question I wish to ask: Does the hon. gentleman consider that the personnel of the outside service to-day is more efficient than it was twenty years ago?

Mr. BURY: I am not saying they are more efficient; I am saying that I do not reflect upon the civil service of 1912 or 1913 or subsequent years to 1918. In many respects we were given good service, but we did not get it because of the principle of patronage. We got it in spite of that principle, and because of the fact that notwithstanding the patronage, ordinary men are honest, and ordinary men want to perform the duties for which they are paid, however abominable the system under which they are appointed and maintained in office.

There was a second proposition made by my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario, which brings me to the answering of the question he put to me a few minutes ago. He made the statement that the reason why we should change the present system and go back to patronage in respect to the outside service was that the member for the constituency was best fitted to say who should fill positions in that constituency. That was a staggering proposition to me. Perhaps I have not been in the house long enough to sustain shocks of that kind, but when he made that statement I indulged in a little introspection. I began to argue, "Well, if the member of a constituency is the man most capable of saying who should fill positions in the outside service, or in any part of the service, it would appear to follow that if a member is not the man most capable of saying who should fill positions, he should not be the member; he is out of his place." I began to wonder whether after all I was properly in my place in this house because I could not convince myself honestly that I was most capable of filling all civil service positions in the city of Edmonton. Now you know it is rather a serious thing to undermine the confidence of a member of parliament in his divine right to sit in the House of Commons. We are all so perfectly certain that our election made us the proper representatives of our constituencies, that we are the best fitted to represent the people there, and it is not nice to have that confidence undermined. But the doubt did not trouble me very long because I have come to the conclusion that it is no part of the business of any member of the House of Commons to make appointments to the civil service. It is no part of representative government; it has no connection with the principle of representative government. That is the answer I make to my hon. friend's question which he put to me a few minutes ago. It is no part of the principle of representative government, no part of the democratic principle that the members of the House of Commons should appoint the civil servants of the country. If that proposition were true, then the ideal towards which we should strive, in the form of our civil service, we should get from the United States instead of from the mother country; and if I had to choose the line of direction along which I should wish the civil service of Canada to develop, it would certainly not be southward but towards the other side of the Atlantic, towards the motherland which has built up a civil service second to none in the world. England has been working on the civil service problem since 1855. She has had commission after commission since that time. I have the list of them here but I will not detain the house by reading it. Let me say, however, that there is no people that has the genius for practical government in so great a degree as the British people, and there is no phase of public life in which the people of Great Britain show their practical sense so well as in the sphere of administration. And they have shown it in its full essence and flower in their civil service system. That is one reason why I should prefer, instead of the amendment moved by the Minister of Justice and the appointment of a committee of the house to inquire into this subject, that a commissioner be sent over to study the English system of civil service on the spot, to meet the civil servants of England on the spot, and on the spot to see how that system works. He could then report to the government what he had discovered in regard to the methods of operation of that system.

Let me quote the words of Sir William Clark, High Commissioner for Great Britain in Canada, in an address given at a luncheon on May 29 to the Civil Service Federation. He said:

> Someone will always grumble whatever the system may be, but I have no hesitation in saying that ours commands the general confidence of the service—

That is a most important thing; but can you honestly say that the present system in Canada has secured and holds the confidence of the majority of the civil servants of Canada? I cannot say so from my little experience and from the expressions of sentiment that have come to me from one and another of them.

> —and as civil servants you will agree that confidence in this respect is wholly essential for the maintenance of service morale.

But if the argument is true that the member of the constituency is the best man to make appointments, the man most capable of making them, I am faced with grave difficulties. In my constituency there is a post office and I venture to say that, if I started to make appointments to that post office, the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) would come and say to me, "Bury, this is not the post office of East Edmonton but the post office of the city of Edmonton, and I should have a say, just as much as you, in the appointments that are made in the city of Edmonton". There are Indian reserves that may lie on the border of a constituency. It may be that an Indian reserve spreads into another constituency. Well, who is to determine the appointee there? Let me ask the house another question. If that principle is true, why stop at the outside civil service? Why leave poor Ottawa out? If the member is the best man to make appointments in the outside civil service, why not in the inside as well? I cannot see why there should be a distinction. I cannot justify the discrimination against the city of Ottawa and the large number of civil servants who make up the civil service staff in this city.

The ideal of a civil service is twofold: to get the best men and to get from the best men the best service which each of them can give. And I venture to say that we will attain neither end through a system of patronage. You will not get the best men. Often the best men in a constituency have no particular regard for politics at all; they are not interested in politics. They occupy towards politics the same relation that the great mass of the people do who are not partisans on either side, the people who swing elections. I have tried again and again to get my people to understand that elections are not won or lost by the partisans but are won or lost by the movement of the great non-partisan body of the electors of the country who must be convinced of the soundness and the justice of a policy before they will support it. The best men in any constituency may not be partisans. They may say to the partisans of a political organization, as Mercutio said:

> A plague o' both your houses . . .
> They have made worms' meat of me.

A plague o' both your houses—they have made politicians' meat of me; between the two of you I am killed. That is or may be the attitude of the best man in the constituency, and if that is true what chance has he of appointment? We are not living in the millenium; we are not living under conditions of Utopia; and while I am willing to admit that I have not noticed any barbed tails or cloven hoofs, I have not heard the rustle of any wings on either side of the house. I know perfectly well what would happen. Whatever hon. members may say, and however much they may protest that the principle of patronage would be honestly and honourably exercised, human nature being human nature and political exigencies being political exigencies, in the heat of an election or in the crisis of one approaching, I know perfectly well what would happen, and from the crown of my head to the sole of my feet I am opposed to any movement looking to the return of the patronage system. You will not get the best men. What kind of service are you going to get? The essential for good services is singleness of eye. Will you get it? No; every one in the service will have one eye on the results of the next election and the other on his work; one eye will be on his duties and the other on the movement of political sentiment throughout his particular constituency and throughout the country. Instead of singleness of eye we shall develop what might be termed the civil service squint; and may we be forever preserved from that. There can be singleness of eye only when a man knows that as long as he is doing his duty well and faithfully, no power, political or otherwise, can disturb him. We will never have the best service available until that is a fact.

It is said that it is not proposed to give a member the power to dismiss. Why not? If he is the best man to appoint, why is he not the best man to dismiss? Where are we going to draw the line, and what right have we to draw a line? Is a man who has won a federal riding by one, two, three or a half dozen votes to be divinely invested with some strange power which he did not have before the election to enable him to know who is the best man to appoint? If so, then I ask: why is he not the proper person to dismiss? Once the power of appointment is given it will not be very long before the power of dismissal creeps in. Even if it did not, it would be hanging over the heads of the civil servants. There would be continual temptation to curry favour because they would feel they were at the mercy of political tides and political sentiments; they would feel they were at the mercy of some man who through some passing wave in the tide of political feeling had been put into power.

I intend to support the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice, not because I believe it to be the best amendment possible, but because I hope that when its purpose is effectuated a commission will be sent to England to obtain first hand information in connection with the working of the English civil service.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) has given to the house his reasons for supporting the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), I should supply to the house some evidence to show the disregard into which the Civil Service Act has fallen. The evidence which I will present does not cover all members of the cabinet, as it would take such a long time to make a complete investigation, but may I give a few instances in connection with the department of the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) which, I think, will dumbfound hon. members on both sides of the house.

On November 23, 1930, the minister stated that fanaticism was Canada's worst enemy, and in the same month he declared that he would defend a faithful employee of the government against even his own personal friends. That is, if a Conservative member or a Conservative defeated candidate asked for the dismissal of an honest employee, the Postmaster General would reply: Shut up, do not say a word; that man is a faithful employee and I am bound to defend him against your complaint; you have no reason to complain and I will stand by my promise. When in Cornwall the minister made a very nice speech and he told of how his heart bled when anyone mentioned dismissals. He said he had the courage not to dismiss a faithful employee who was doing his duty. I should like to quote from a translation of that speech, as follows:

> From the moment I took office as Postmaster General, I promised justice, economy and honest administration. On that occasion I declared that the civil servant, postmaster or other employee who performed his duties as required and who had not violated the law by taking an active part in politics had nothing to fear from me, that I would protect him even against my own friends. The postmaster who did not take part in perpetrating an injustice by accepting the place of one of his fellow citizens, unjustly dismissed, had nothing to fear. The letter carrier who in the fulfilment of his duties of distributing mail from door to door did not become the active agent of any political party, had nothing to fear.

In presenting this evidence to the house I will not mention names as I have no desire to reflect on anyone, but any hon. member who desires particular information can obtain it.

In a certain country post office the postmaster had a daughter of about sixteen or seventeen years of age. This daughter frequently visited the post office and she became very much interested in the correspondence of the boys and girls of the village. One day a friend borrowed her coat and found it to be extra heavy on one side. Upon investigation she found in one of the pockets between fifty or sixty letters addressed to different boys and girls in the neighbourhood. Complaints were made, the postmaster was dismissed and another appointment made by the Civil Service Commission. Was this man unjustly dismissed? His daughter had intercepted letters in the post office, and what happened to him was not because of his politics. He lost his job. He was replaced by a competent man. Last year there was an investigation about the latter. Ten witnesses were heard. One of them was this man's predecessor, the former postmaster, who had lost the post office. What was his evidence? He said: I have no knowledge that the postmaster is guilty of political partisanship. And that man lives the second door away from the post office. He had no reason at all for not telling the commissioner what he knew about the postmaster who had succeeded him, because he knew that he had lost the postmastership on account of the doings of his daughter. He was under oath before the commissioner and he told the truth, and that was his evidence. The mayor of the municipality, who is a Conservative chieftain or leader, gave exactly the same evidence. Nine witnesses out of ten gave exactly the same evidence. Only one witness stated that the postmaster had shown around a paper giving figures as to what the local member had obtained for his constituency, and that was denied right off by another witness. The commissioner asked the witness: Did the postmaster canvass you to vote for the candidate? The witness said no, and the commissioner came back and said: Are you sure that he did not canvass you? The witness again said no. The commissioner then asked: Do you remember that he did not canvass you? And the witness said no, I do not remember that. Here is his statement as drafted by the commissioner:

> I do not recall having talked politics with the postmaster at the post office. I am his brother-in-law.

The only witness who gave that so-called evidence against the postmaster was a newcomer to the village. He came from another parish where he had left no good souvenirs. He was the only one who made a complaint against the postmaster and he was interested in making it. His evidence was not corroborated, on the contrary was denied. What happened? The postmaster, who is a former mayor of the municipality, was dismissed, and he was replaced by the very same man who had accused him, the only one who had accused him, in spite of the fact that all the Conservative leaders in the community who lived near to him said that to their knowledge he had taken no part in politics.

The Postmaster General says:

> The postmaster who did not take part in perpetrating an injustice by accepting the place of one of his fellow citizens, unjustly dismissed, had nothing to fear. The civil servant, postmaster or other employee who performed his duties as required and who had not violated the law by taking an active part in politics had nothing to fear from me, that I would protect him even against my own friends.

In this case the majority of the favourable witnesses were the friends, and the best friends, of the Postmaster General. They were against dismissal, but evidently the Postmaster General acted against his own friends in that case. A petition was signed by a large majority of the people within the post office area, by the curé and many others to prevent a change of post office, but it was disregarded and the postmastership was given to a man who had made an interested and a false complaint against the postmaster. What I have said so far is only to make the mouths water of those hon. gentlemen who are honouring me with their attention. Now I have something much nicer to tell them.

As every member of this house knows, the Post Office Department has sent to all postmasters throughout the country a circular letter advising them that they are strictly forbidden to take any part in federal or provincial elections, and that those who had done so had better resign in order to save the cost of an expensive investigation.

Here is the case of a postmaster at a place I will name, St. Eusèbe-de-Cabano. The postmaster, who was also mayor, received such a circular letter and he resigned. What happened? He was replaced by a man whom I will name, and for a very good reason, as the hon. members will see. He is called Paul Langlois, and he replaced the former postmaster on June 30, 1931. A month and a half later or so the provincial elections were taking place in the province of Quebec, and Mr. Langlois could not show in any better way his gratitude to the Postmaster General than by canvassing for the provincial Conservative party. Langlois was replacing a man who had received a notice of dismissal because he was supposed to have taken some part in the election, whether federal or provincial I do not know. Here is what he did, and I am very sorry that the hon. Postmaster General has left the house with his portfolio under his arm. I hope that some of his friends will call him back here so that he can hear what I am saying.

On or about August 12 of last year Langlois, the postmaster, went to Rivière-Bleue in his car to get some liquor to be used in canvassing. He was accompanied by three men named Thimothée Dubé, Pierre Dubé and Jos. Albert Dubé. I do not wonder what their political affiliations are, but naturally at election time one is rather suspicious about such joy rides. When they came back with the liquor, Dubé's rig was at Langlois', and the new postmaster transferred the liquor from the auto to the rig, probably keeping some for his own use. Though all this took place at night, it was clearly witnessed by someone who reported it very accurately. I would ask the Postmaster General this question: If a man must resign his position as postmaster upon a charge not specified but perhaps because he has been accused of canvassing in the federal or provincial elections, will the Postmaster General take the same steps with regard to a postmaster who has carried liquor in his own car to be used in political canvassing?

If the mouths of my hon. friends opposite water a little bit, I have something even more relishing to tell them. In my constituency there is a parish named Sully, situated on the Transcontinental railway. There were rumours abroad that the postmaster of that place was to be dismissed. He also was mayor, and a very dignified gentleman who did not incur any blame, so far as I know. His removal seems to have been founded on the old principle that to the victor belongs the spoils, and although the Conservative candidate was defeated he was, nevertheless, the victor so far as the granting of postal offices to this or that one was concerned.

In that parish there was another gentleman named Isidore Jean, a returned soldier whose regimental number was 2245410. He served two years at the front, performed his duty as a good soldier, and as the parish is not very large he knew there were some intrigues afoot to dismiss the postmaster. Naturally, as charity begins at home he thought he had better take his chance and, as a result, wrote to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren), to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and to the Postmaster General, saying, in effect, "If you intend to dismiss the postmaster in charge of the post office I shall be very happy to file my application for that position." Although the letter is in the French language, as it is not very long I shall read it. This letter is from Isidore Jean to the Postmaster General, and is dated November 2, 1931:

(Translation):

Honorable sir,

On February 17, 1931, the right hon. Prime Minister's secretary wrote to me that he had forwarded to you my application for the post of postmaster at Sully in the event of this position becoming vacant.

On October 5, the same gentleman suggested that I should communicate directly with the secretary of the Civil Service Commission and with yourself, since you have complete jurisdiction over your department.

On October 28, the Minister of Pensions' secretary wrote to me that he had forwarded to you my letter and the others attached for your kind consideration.

On March 4, 1931, your acting deputy minister wrote to me that there was no vacancy in the post office at Sully at that time and that should it become necessary to make a change the appointment of the new incumbent would be made by the Civil Service Commission. He further added that my application had been noted and that it would be referred to the commission should the circumstances warrant it.

On September 28, your deputy minister wrote to me that should it be necessary to make a change at Sully, the permanent appointment of the future incumbent would be made by the Civil Service Commission which would advertise publicly the vacancy occurring in that locality, and that the minister had taken careful note of my application.

On October 14, your deputy minister again wrote to me that my application had been referred to him by the private secretary of the minister and that he wished to draw my attention to his letter of September 28.

The officials of your department wrote to me on three different occasions this year that in the event of a vacancy occurring the appointment of a postmaster at Sully would be made by the Civil Service Commission. Should you decide to make a temporary appointment, while awaiting the ratification of this appointment by the Civil Service Commission, may I have the honour to remind you of my application for the post of temporary postmaster at Sully, in case you decided to replace the present postmaster, and this, on the score of my record of services at the front where I fought during two years. My regimental number is the following: 2245410.

I am, sir,

Your grateful servant

(Sgd.) Isidore Jean.

What happened? That man was told by the departments of Pensions and National Health and of the Postmaster General that in the event of a dismissal, and a vacancy in the post office referred to, the matter would come before the Civil Service Commission for the nomination of a new postmaster. What was done? The application of the man who had a creditable war record was entirely disregarded, and the Postmaster General appointed another man who had had no service at the front. In my view this would have been a fit case to bring before the British Empire Service League to show that the Postmaster General paid no attention to the soldier's application to fill the vacancy which occurred in that post office. This particular case deserved serious consideration because the applicant was a poor soldier who is at present unemployed; therefore the reasons for his appointment were two-fold. It is indeed unfortunate that his application was disregarded by the Postmaster General in spite of and against the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Not only did the protégé of the Postmaster General carry liquor in times of provincial elections, and not only does he disregard the Civil Service Act so far as it applies to veterans, but there is something to relate even better than that. It is this: My contention is that in this country public offices should be held either by Canadians by birth or Canadians by naturalization, and that aliens should not be allowed to occupy public offices. I have in mind an instance which occurred at Pointe Lebel, and because that place is in the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay I am sure my hon. friend from that constituency (Mr. Casgrain) will be pleased to hear about it. The former postmaster was dismissed and replaced by a man named Grenier. That man came from France some years ago, and I am told from reliable sources that he has never been naturalized. I communicated with the Department of the Secretary of State to learn if Grenier of Pointe Lebel was naturalized. I am under the impression that my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay will vouch for my statement that this man Grenier came from France some years ago, and was never naturalized. When we came to the naturalization branch of the Department of the Secretary of State we asked if they had any record of Grenier, and they replied that from the year 1915, when records were first kept they had no record. I was told to communicate with the Bureau of Statistics, but when I approached that branch of the service I was answered that information could not be given because the information on the sheets filled out for statistical purposes, or for purposes of census, was given in strict confidence. As a result I could not get the information I desired. The evidence, so far, is that there is no record of Grenier in the Department of the Secretary of State and it is a fact that Grenier is not a Canadian by birth or naturalization and is not entitled to public office. Rather than allow Canadians by birth or naturalization to enjoy public offices the Postmaster General deprives them of their rights and gives preference to foreigners. It is not at all surprising that the returned soldier feels he is not receiving fair treatment.

But there is more than that Mr. Speaker. Last year, speaking on the budget, my hon. friend, then Minister of Fisheries, now Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), said:

> I am sure my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and his leader would have been the first to take exception with, during the last session under the previous government, hon. members on the other side of the house who had fastened the responsibility upon the then government for the utterances of my hon. friend from Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), when he made attacks upon the premier of the province of Quebec.

Was he referring to a memorandum based on the fact that aliens in the province of Quebec were entitled by statute to be appointed to public office? I communicated with the premiers of the other eight provinces asking what stand they took in the matter, and this is the answer I received from the hon. gentleman who was then premier of Nova Scotia and is now Minister of Finance in this government:

> Absence from my office in other portions of the province has prevented me from making earlier acknowledgment of your letter of June 26th.
> The ground you take with respect to the holding of office by aliens is, in my opinion, undoubtedly sound.

I hope my hon. friend will have the courage to stand by the views he then expressed and support me in my demand that the Postmaster General be required to furnish all available information about that man Grenier, as to whether he lives under a false name, when he came to this country, when he was naturalized, and on whose recommendation he received his appointment.

Let me conclude my remarks in the sweet language of France by giving an excerpt from an article published by the hon. Postmaster General:

> Je le répète, avouons franchement nos erreurs afin de bénéficier autant que possible même de nos fautes.

This may be translated:

> Let us be frank about our mistakes in order that we may get as much benefit as possible from them.

A fine sentiment! I hope he will have those words recorded in homespun and place them in front of his desk that he may ponder them frequently. I must ask the Postmaster General to be serious. Most of his colleagues seem to have greater respect for the Civil Service Act. So should he. He is not a bad man. He should be strong enough to resist his friends. I am sure that when he made the promise he was confident of his strength to keep it as a man. Now, why doesn't he do so? He should do it for the reason expressed by the hon. member for East Edmonton. I listened with very much interest to the hon. member's speech. He said it would be a very bad thing for the civil service if civil servants could not live in peace and be free of anxiety about their future, that only in this way could they give the thorough service that the country expected from them. I submit that that is a very strong argument in favour of the Postmaster General doing what he is requested to do. The reason is that after a man has been in the civil service for a number of years it is difficult for him to return to his former occupation. What I am trying to convey is well-expressed in French —those men become "déracinés." The civil service of Canada is as good as that of any other country in the world, and it should be protected against those greedy and lazy persons who by intrigue seek to bring about the dismissal of industrious and capable civil servants in order that they may be appointed to the vacancies so created. I hope tomorrow morning, Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General, who is not in his seat to-night, will read Hansard and take heed of what has been said this evening.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, had the motion for second reading of the bill been proceeded with I should have been compelled to vote against it. I wish to express the pleasure I derived from the speech delivered by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury). I am sure we all regret that the occasions are not more numerous when he participates in debate. Those of us who were here with him in the hectic session of 1926 will remember the many fine speeches he then delivered, and I feel certain we regret that the limitations imposed upon a supporter of the government prevent us from hearing the hon. gentleman oftener.

I am heartily in sympathy with the sentiments he expressed. I should like also to commend the speech made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), in which he set before us very clearly the position with regard to the Civil Service Commission. I believe I am safe in making the statement that only a minority on either side of the house is in favour of doing away with the Civil Service Act and returning to the old patronage system. I know that is true of this side of the house, and I am happy to believe from the speeches made to-night that it is also true of the other side. I have always been strongly opposed to the patronage system. While it may be true that the act is not working perfectly at present, there is no reason to suppose that as time goes on it may not be administered more efficiently. I think there is every reason why an investigation into the working of the act should be undertaken. Undoubtedly there are just causes for complaint, and if these were threshed out before a committee I hope the result would be beneficial to the service as a whole.

I do not think the government has handled this matter in the best possible way. At the outset they very well could have removed from the minds of hon. members any fear of the possibility of the merit system being destroyed. Perhaps it was necessary to give the hon. member for Dorchester an opportunity to fulfil the pledge which undoubtedly he made to his constituents, that he would do his best to secure a return to the patronage system. I think we had his own word for it last session that he made such a pledge, and perhaps it was necessary that he should be allowed an opportunity to keep it. At the same time I think if a little different course had been pursued by the government we would have had our minds satisfied on this question at an earlier time, and perhaps there would not have been the necessity for so much discussion on the merits of the case.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take any part in this debate until a number of hon. members seemed to prefer to discuss me rather than the question before the house. One of the principal objections has been that the member is not the man best qualified to make any appointment that may be necessary in his riding. The hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) was particularly strong on this point. I am quite willing to concede, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member is capable of speaking for himself, and I have no quarrel with the decision he makes when he says he is not capable of making the appointments that may be necessary in his constituency. That is his prerogative and his privilege; as he sits in judgment upon his own capabilities and renders a verdict of that nature, far be it from me to dispute its accuracy. I think possibly that is quite true, but the unfortunate thing is that in such a case he is not the one who suffers; the people who send him here suffer, and that is rather too bad. It is too bad that any riding in Canada should have a representative who admits on the floor of the house that he is incapable of filling positions which may become vacant in that riding.

Mr. BURY: I did not say I was incapable of doing so; I said I was not the person best fitted to make the appointments.

Mr. McGIBBON: My hon. friend says he is not the best person, so obviously he is not the best member.

Mr. BOUCHARD: He was thinking of you as the best.

Mr. McGIBBON: I have no objection to my hon. friend speaking for himself, but I do object to him speaking for me. He is not capable of doing that. I say further, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a matter of appointments or of patronage; there is a bigger question involved. It is a question of the principle of responsible government.

Mr. POWER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGIBBON: I thank the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power); I have always admired his judgment and found it good. I take that very seriously. Responsible government is something for which great struggles have been waged in the past in every country in the world. The three great objects of the revolution of 1690 were responsible government, the supremacy of the House of Commons and the assurance that the House of Commons should represent the voice of the people.

In connection with these appointments, who is responsible? Is there any responsibility any place?

Mr. BURY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. McGIBBON: Do not make it too hard.

Mr. BURY: Is there not responsible government in Great Britain?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, but Great Britain has not a civil service like ours. The hon. member started to discuss the civil service of Great Britain; he only showed that he did not know anything about it. I object to these men speaking for me; I object to them speaking for the people in my riding, and in spite of what the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) has said I believe that three-quarters of the members of this house would vote for this motion if they were given a free ballot. It is only party exigencies that keep them from doing so. They know it is the best thing.

Look at the appointments which have been made by this Civil Service Commission. Does anyone in the house not remember what happened in the last few years, when the Postmaster General rose in his place and told of the hundreds of postmasters who had been dismissed because of shortages in their funds? Does that reflect great credit upon the Civil Service Commission? Within the last week or so we have had a second scandal aired. Did we have that sort of thing in the past? Would not appointments made in the past by representatives of the people compare favourably with those that have been made by the Civil Service Commission?

Another objection I have is this: I do not like the communications which the civil service of Ottawa have had the impudence to mail to me and other members of the House of Commons. I am not seeking to interfere with the inside service, and I say they have no business to interfere with the service in my riding. If there is one thing that disgusts me more than another it is the attitude that has been shown by the civil service of Ottawa towards the proposed cut in their salaries. Where is the man or woman in this country to-day making as much as they were making three or four years ago? Let me say further that more than 99 per cent of the money which pays these civil servants comes from people outside of this city. The civil service does not belong entirely to the city of Ottawa; it belongs to the Dominion of Canada. They should remember that it gives them work in good times and bad, in good weather and bad. They are not like the people we are feeding at the public expense in northern Ontario to-day, who find their pay docked for every stormy day when they cannot work. I say, sir, I have been disgusted with their attitude in a crisis of this kind when this country, like every other country in the world, is in financial difficulties. They are not willing to take voluntarily and joyfully a cut that is not equal to the decrease in the cost of living.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Has my hon. friend read the speech from the throne which states that the country is very prosperous?

Mr. McGIBBON: I fail to see any intelligent connection between that question and the remarks I was making.

I want to say again, sir, that this is not a matter of patronage. I do not think there is any hon. member of this house who wants the disagreeable job of making appointments. As I have said, patronage will kill any member if he gets enough of it; there is no doubt about that. But the people in my riding want me to assume that responsibility and I should be a coward if I were not prepared to do so. They want me to be their representative and they want me because they have some control over me; and when the day comes that I do not do what they want they will put me out. But they have no control, nor has any other constituency any control over the people who are making appointments to-day. And, Mr. Speaker, patronage has not been done away with. Why do we try to fool ourselves? Every hon. member knows that it has not been done away with. Every hon. member knows also that the educational test or the merit test in the outside service is not worth a snap of the finger.

I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in that speech he made a year ago, that too much has been taken away from the people's representatives. I believe that, with profit to this country, some of that responsibility could be restored. Everyone knows that when a member has to make an appointment he is going to make the best he can. I shall be told that when the Conservatives are in power a Conservative will be appointed. I grant you that; he would be in my riding anyway. But supposing there were a better one in the Liberal party—

An hon. MEMBER: You would not appoint him.

Mr. McGIBBON: Never mind whether I would appoint him or not. But I contend that if you got the second best man in every riding in this country you would get a higher class than under the Civil Service Commission. I am sometimes disgusted at the way debates will turn and twist in this house. It seems that at times one leader will throw it this way and another will give it a twist in some other direction; and then we get on a high moral plane as in this debate and almost immortalize the Civil Service Commission, though it has been one of the disgraceful black spots on the government of the country. Everyone knows it. Where could you find anything such as was exhibited in the courts a little while ago?

I do not want the house or the country to think that I want the job of going out and beheading people. Decent people—and members of parliament are decent—do not do that sort of thing. Moreover, when a man is in a position for three or four years he loses connection with the past, and no decent member of parliament is going to kick him out even if he belongs to the other party. I have been disgusted with that argument. I do not believe there is a man in this house who would do such a thing without grave cause, and then he would do it very reluctantly. For these reasons I am glad that this question is going to a committee where all phases of it can be discussed, and when the committee reports to the house no doubt it will be able to advise along better lines.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: May I ask the hon. member one question. I understand that he is in favour of the elected representative of the people exercising his functions within his constituency in making outside appointments. In his opinion would that apply to every elected member or only to the elected members supporting the government in power? And, in that case, would he believe in the system which has been followed at times, of the defeated candidate on the government side receiving that power of making these appointments although the people had rejected him as their representative?

Mr. McGIBBON: That is not hard to answer. I have said three or four times that personally I do not care where the member sits. But there is this to be said about it. Whether a Liberal or a Conservative government is in power, you are demanding of your representative in every riding certain services to be done and I do not see how you can overlook him in regard to the responsibility for making appointments.

Mr. J. OSCAR BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the opportunity of supporting the bill of my hon. friend and neighbour the member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) would have pleased me much, unfortunately, I fear this opportunity will not be afforded to us, as the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Justice is probably tantamount to full burial honours for the bill. I would have been pleased, I stated, to be given the opportunity of supporting the bill because, two years hence, it would have given us a chance of rectifying the injustice perpetrated by this government which dismissed, without reasons and contrary to the Civil Service Act, a considerable number of employees.

I entirely agree with the sponsor of this bill and with my hon. friend the member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) in their statement that the Civil Service Act rests on a false principle. I listened attentively to my hon. friend from Dorchester when he introduced his bill. He established rather a strong case against the Civil Service Act and the commission. I expected to hear him ask for the repeal of the act and the disestablishment of the Civil Service Commission. I was amazed in reading over his bill to find that he did not recommend the repeal of the act, not even the suppression of the commission, but simply requested the exclusion of the outside service from the operation of the act. However, I would have supported this measure because it is a step forward in the right direction.

Again do I state, the Civil Service Act rests on a false principle. If the government is vested with the responsibilities of the administration, the public employees share with the government in this administration of the affairs of the country. If the government is to be held responsible for the work of its cooperators, I fail to understand why it would not be so as regards their appointment and their selection as they think proper. Moreover this act lends itself to deceit as the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) stated just now; it is one of these insincere measures that governments enact once in a while with the fixed mental reservation of disregarding it. The election act is another instance; the government themselves are the main offenders. They, themselves, have made the most frequent inroads on the provisions of the Civil Service Act, they are the first to disregard it and to show their contempt.

To illustrate my argument, let me cite two cases. First, I shall draw the attention of members to the Votes and Proceedings of this house, of July 30, 1931, at page 661:

> Weights and measures inspection (including International Bureau of Weights and Measures)—further amount required for the salary, including the appointment of Charles Hippolyte Couture, Inspector of Weights and Measures, Quebec district, Quebec city, at $1,560 per annum, from April 1, 1931, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act.

The following are the facts: If I am well informed, there was a vacancy in the Bureau of Weights and Measures, at Quebec. The Civil Service Commission, having advertised the position, and received applications, held an examination, after which a list of those eligible was drawn. At the head of this list was a veteran by the name of Mathieu Parrot, of Quebec city. Parrot was awarded 86 points, he was at the head of this list, moreover, he was given the preference owing to his being a veteran. This did not suit Couture's backer who wanted to have him appointed, at all costs. It was then that his supporter found a flaw in the Civil Service Act, as I have just pointed out, and had his friend appointed, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, and against the wishes of the commission itself. This is a case where the government themselves disregarded the Civil Service Act.

On the same day by a special vote, another appointment was made contrary to the Act; this is another instance of the disregard of the legislation enacted by the government. You will find in the Votes and Proceedings of the same date, page 656, the following:

> To appoint hereby J. L. A. Tanguay, a clerk, grade 4, in the minister's office at Quebec from August 7, 1930, at $1,860 per annum, $3,100.

I must mention, by the way, that our friends who so highly criticized a certain act of the Quebec legislature because it had a retroactive effect, were in no way bashful in the present case to give a retroactive effect to this appointment. This is a further instance showing how the government conforms to the laws they enact. We therefore have a right to say that the Civil Service Act is utterly hypocritical, and that the government is the first to disregard its provisions. Let me further add that these two gentlemen appointed by a special vote of the house, one on the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), the other on the motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), are two common election workers (cabaleurs) of the lowest order. They are, to all intents, political appointments. Couture, again, if I am well informed, was dismissed in 1926, because he was the cause of disorder at a meeting held by the Hon. Lucien Cannon, in the county of Dorchester. He was employed, previous to that, by the weights and measures branch and lost his position for having taken an active part in politics and being the cause of disorder at a public meeting. One had recourse to this dodge or underhand dealing, after his dismissal for political partisanship, in order to reappoint him in the weights and measures branch, notwithstanding the Civil Service Commission's protest and in violation of the act, thereby doing a grave injustice to the veteran Mathieu Parrot.

Let us now examine the case of Tanguay with whom I am better acquainted, since he is a political organizer in my county. Tanguay was appointed to the minister's office as a fourth grade clerk. If I am well informed, Tanguay controls the patronage in Quebec, that is he is a middleman and performs the dirty work of the Conservative party. In my county a dozen postmasters were dismissed without cause, and contrary to the Civil Service Act, and, according to what I heard, these dismissals took place mainly at the request of Mr. Tanguay himself. At the last provincial election, in 1931, Mr. Tanguay was the principal speaker of the Conservative candidate in Bellechasse; he meddled in the election, spoke at all meetings and thereby took an active political part. I took upon myself the responsibility of denouncing him to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett), who through his secretary, wrote to me that he had referred my complaint to the Minister of Justice. The other day I inquired whether my complaint had been received, whether an inquiry would be held and Tanguay dismissed, in the event of my complaint being substantiated. The Minister of Justice informed me that the Department of Justice had no information with respect to the complaint lodged against Tanguay. Nevertheless, it had been lodged with the Prime Minister, and his secretary had written to me that it had been referred to the Minister of Justice. Let us suppose, for a moment, that the Minister of Justice had not received this complaint, the question which I placed on the orders of the day, some time ago, was a sufficient notice to the government of my complaint of political partisanship lodged against Tanguay, and the government is bound, in honour, equity and justice, after occasionally dismissing public employees for trivial causes, to hold an inquiry on a complaint lodged by a member of parliament and supported by the evidence.

The government should order an inquiry and dismiss this employee, if my complaint is well grounded.

The postmaster of Beaumont was dismissed under the plea that he had decorated his residence on polling day, in September 1926, but, on that day the person referred to was not yet appointed as postmaster; he was only appointed the following month.

The postmaster at LaDurantaye was dismissed, because his son, who is married and is not living with his father had in his automobile—the automobile of the son, not that of the father—the photograph of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). An inquiry was held by three defeated candidates. You may judge how slim were the chances of this poor postmaster in such an inquiry!

A large number of postmasters were dismissed without cause, and here is a public employee in receipt of $1,860 per year, who openly and brazenly takes part in a political campaign. A complaint is lodged against him by a member of parliament, a complaint founded in fact, and it is impossible to obtain an inquiry; we cannot even obtain a straight and honest answer from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to a question put to him the other day with reference to this matter.

I protest, sir, against such government methods, especially when to all purposes it approves the Civil Service Act. Since the government is opposed to the repeal of this act, why should it not be the first to comply with the letter and spirit of the act, and grant to civil servants, who are so unfortunate as to be Liberals, all the protection to which they are entitled.

The government should also see that civil servants whom they appoint conform to the law. Since it is wrong for a Liberal to be even suspected of political partisanship, surely civil servants appointed by the government should themselves bow to the law and not be guilty of obvious and glaring irregularities as those referred to.

Although opposed to the principle of the Civil Service Act, I am in favour of having a commission in order to classify candidates and have them undergo a test. I simply ask that appointments be subject to the jurisdiction of the government; that the latter be held responsible and given the final word in such matters.

It is held that the Civil Service Act was passed with a view of abolishing the patronage system, this is a mistake. Patronage has not been abolished, it has simply changed hands. It was taken away from members and placed in the hands of heads of departments, chief clerks and high officials. The civil service commission should be given a competent board of examiners and inspectors, it should control the tests of candidates to the various positions and it should be given the necessary authority to rate these candidates. At present, the commission has not the required staff to carry on this work. Examinations and classification are being looked after by civil servants. The latter themselves control the patronage. When an appointment is to be made, the commission sends all the examination papers to the chief clerk concerned and it is the latter himself who determines the grade and makes the appointment. Again do I state patronage has not been abolished, it has simply changed hands; it is replaced by a system of deceit—as the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) stated a short while ago—and productive of deception; it is therefore only reasonable that this system be changed.

Amendment (Mr. Guthrie) agreed to.

Motion (Mr. Gagnon) as amended agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) be substituted for that of Mr. Rutherford on the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS INCURRED IN 1931

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, respecting the Canadian National Railways, and to authorize additional provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1931.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, this bill is really one which in the past has been put through the house as a supplementary estimate, where necessary, for the Canadian National Railways. The object of the bill is to authorize the Canadian National Railways to raise an additional $11,372,000 for the purpose of paying various accounts for the last year which the estimates of last year did not meet. This bill is introduced for the purpose of allowing the railways the $11,000,000, which they require.

Probably I had better go a little farther in my explanation because, although I was informed by my officers that there were plenty of copies of the bill, I am now informed by the Clerk of the house that they are not available. With the consent of the house I should like to proceed a little farther. The fact is that in last year's estimates the Canadian National Railways were allowed the sum of $68,000,000, and they find they now require this additional $11,000,000 odd to meet the requirements of the past year. May I read one or two clauses from the bill, which I think, explain the situation:

The net additional income deficits including bond interest but not including interest on the Dominion government advances, is $20,000,000, against which—

That is $20,000,000 extra. There was an allowance last year in the Canadian National Railways estimates for a deficit, so far as interest to the public investor was concerned, of about $31,000,000. They find however that it is in the neighbourhood of $51,000,000. It is obvious therefore that about $20,000,000 is required to cover that amount. Against that however there is $13,000,000 odd under the authority of the proviso contained in last year's bill. That proviso permitted money which was not used for other purposes, and which was contained in the estimates of last year, to be utilized if the deficit turned out to be more than the estimated deficit. That provision allowed a $13,000,000 credit against the $20,000,000 extra deficit. Then there are some smaller amounts for equipment principal payments, sinking funds, and the like, amounting to $492,077.30. For the purchase of new equipment the amount is set at $11,014,284.11.

May I explain that the purchase of equipment by the Canadian National Railways is usually done on what is known as the Philadelphia plan. A payment of 25 per cent is made, and the remaining three-quarters is financed by lien notes usually issued—in fact, I think always issued—by the banks in the United States. The Canadian National Railways carried those lien notes without the guarantee of the government. However, because of financial conditions in the world, generally, and in the United States particularly the amount of $11,000,000 cannot be borrowed in the United States to-day, and therefore it comes back as an ordinary estimate to be paid by the Dominion government. That adds another $11,000,000 odd. Against that however there is $7,331,000, which was borrowed last year, and which was not spent for purposes authorized. There is in this bill a clause permitting the utilization of that balance. I do not wish further to enter into the matter because figures are confusing. The result is however that a net balance of $11,000,000 is required to-day by the Canadian National Railways as a supplementary estimate.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did I understand the minister to say that the money was used to pay interest to the public?

Mr. MANION: Yes, to pay interest to the lending public, and for other purposes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It is for the calendar year 1931?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is this over and above the $10,000,000 authorized by order in council?

Mr. MANION: Over and above what?

Sir EUGENE FISET: Over and above the $10,000,000 authorized last year by order in council?

Mr. MANION: I do not understand my hon. friend.

Sir EUGENE FISET: A meeting was held, and at that meeting we were asked to endorse the action taken by the department to finance the Canadian National Railways. Does that include such an amount?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid I do not know to what my hon. friend is referring.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the bill to provide for the payment out of the consolidated fund, or to provide for funding this amount, and borrowing?

Mr. MANION: Funding and borrowing, yes.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. CAYLEY: Is there any provision made for payment of the back interest in default on the Toronto suburban electric lines?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the statement of the minister mean that the Canadian National Railways failed, to the extent of $79,000,000, to pay their way last year?

Mr. MANION: No, it means that the interest to the public last year is short by $52,000,000, in round figures. The interest was $57,000,000, and they have about, in round figures, $5,000,000 towards that amount. That does not include interest to the government. The interest to the public is about $57,000,000, and there is a surplus on operating of about $5,000,000 which leaves about $52,000,000 which the government of Canada has to meet. In addition to that there are statutory obligations which brings the total higher than that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): When the minister refers to "interest to the public," does he really mean that, or does he mean interest to the bondholders?

Mr. MANION: Bondholders are the public.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Quite true.

Mr. MANION: I shall make it clear. There is owing by the Canadian National Railways the amount of $57,000,000 annually in interest to the bondholders, the public purchasers of the bonds.

Mr. BENNETT: Bondholders other than the Dominion government.

Mr. MANION: In addition to that there is interest owing to the government of about $32,000,000 which has never been paid and, frankly, I do not expect ever will be paid.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Does that mean a deficit of $1,000,000 per week?

Mr. MANION: Yes, there has been a deficit of about $1,000,000 per week in interest to the public. When I refer to the public I am referring to the lending public. The other $32,000,000 to which I referred is in connection with the Dominion government.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. MANION: I wish to ask the consent of the house to have this bill read now a second time. As I am asking an indulgence I probably ought to make some further remarks, because I see my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) shaking his head. Ordinarily I would not make this request, but the Canadian National Railways have informed me that this money will be required very early in March. This is only a supplementary estimate, and there will be full opportunity afforded to discuss the matter when the regular estimates come down, probably within the next two or three weeks. The request was made to my department only within the last few days, and therefore I say it is not our fault that the matter comes up late. They require the money as soon as possible and the earliest date we can get it, even if it were given its second reading to-day and submitted to the special parliamentary committee, would be next Tuesday. The bill would be referred to the special committee on railways and shipping which meets next Tuesday, and would report back.

Mr. EULER: Has that committee been appointed?

Mr. MANION: Yes. On behalf of the Canadian National Railways I urge that this bill be given its second reading, and be referred to the special parliamentary committee on railways and shipping.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): We are most anxious, so far as is possible in conformity with the practice and rules of parliament, to facilitate the work of the house. May, however, I say quite frankly to my hon. friend that hon. gentlemen opposite have developed a habit of rushing measures into discussion in the house, and not permitting time for the due consideration which should be given. The government has a knowledge of the business of the country, and my hon. friend in particular is responsible for knowing about the business of the Canadian National Railways. If he had any reason to believe that a bill such as the one now before us would be forthcoming he might have extended some word in advance to those of us on this side of the house whom he expects to accommodate him. If the government know there are matters of importance which will have to be dealt with by a certain date, if they are anxious to expedite matters, we will try to accommodate them if they will intimate to us in advance particulars of the case. I do not think, however, it is in the public interest that measures as important as the one to which my hon. friend has just referred should be other than safeguarded by the stages of procedure provided for by the rules of the house. I do not see that this measure is going to get any more prompt consideration by passing the second reading at the moment and having it referred to the committee of railways and shipping to-day than if that step is taken on Tuesday next, which is a government day. The bill itself is not printed, it is not distributed, and we have had no opportunity to look at it. I think my hon. friend will have to tell the railway management that there is a grave responsibility upon parliament to consider carefully every stage of Canadian National Railway financing—a responsibility that is not consistent with unduly rushing through the house measures pertaining to the railway.

Mr. MANION: While I sympathize very sincerely with my right hon. friend so far as the need of parliament discussing this or any other measure of the kind is concerned, I do not intend that the government shall take any responsibility whatsoever for the late introduction of the bill. The Canadian National Railways management had just put the matter before us in time for us to get the bill ready, and in fact, as my right hon. friend says, there has not been time to get it printed and distributed, although I was instructed that it had been printed. I simply tell my right hon. friend that the Canadian National Railways management claim they need the money. If my right hon. friend takes the attitude he does he is perfectly within his right, but I repeat, I do not intend that the government shall accept blame for the delay. As I have said, the Canadian National management put the matter up to us within the last few days.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say, Mr. Speaker, we each have our responsibilities, the Canadian National has its responsibilities, the minister his, and we have ours. So far as the opposition is concerned, our responsibility is to see that all public measures are carefully considered and fully discussed according to the rules of procedure of the house. It is on that ground that we take our stand. As to the division of responsibility between the railway and the ministry, I leave it to my hon. friend to claim or disclaim any share in that regard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Legislation can only be advanced one stage except by consent. Consent having been withheld, the second reading will be at the next sitting of the house.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

APPROVAL AS REQUIRED BY DOMINION LANDS AND DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACTS

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved:

That the following orders in council laid on the table on the 5th day of February, 1932, be approved:—

Orders in council which have been published in the Canada Gazette between the 21st day of January, 1931, and the 17th day of December, 1931, in accordance with the provisions of section 75 of the Dominion Lands Act, chapter 113, R.S. 1927.

Orders in council which have been published in the Canada Gazette between the 21st day of January, 1931, and the 17th day of December, 1931, in accordance with the provisions of subsection "c" of section 21, of the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act, chapter 78, R.S. 1927.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUANCE ACT, 1932,—INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I say, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the resolution you have just read, that it involves the expenditure of public moneys, and before it can be passed the Prime Minister, or whoever has charge of it, must announce that the measure has received His Excellency's assent and give the customary notice.

Mr. BENNETT: I was about to rise to say that this is only by way of notice to indicate that the resolution will go to committee of the whole at the next sitting. His Excellency has been advised of the measure, has given his approval thereof, and commends it to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The resolution as it appears on the order paper is not in the regulation form. It should be:

Moved by Mr. Bennett, seconded by Mr. Guthrie, that the house will at the next sitting resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the Statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

SEED GRAIN ADVANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, in yesterday's Hansard at page 564 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) makes the following statement:

I regret that I am not in a position to give the details of the arrangements that are being made by the Saskatchewan government in supplying this seed grain.

Is it the intention to supply that seed grain through the Saskatchewan government or through the Saskatchewan relief commission?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The Saskatchewan relief commission, Mr. Speaker, is a body under the control of and appointed by the Saskatchewan government.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

REPORTED INTENTION TO DISMISS FORTY-NINE AGRICULTURAL EXPERTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). It is based on an article in the Toronto Daily Star of the 25th instant, as follows:

The federal government is preparing to dismiss forty-nine trained agricultural experts from the Department of Agriculture, Senator Hon. Cairine Wilson told the Ontario Women's Liberal Association at luncheon yesterday in the King Edward hotel. "All are highly trained men," said the Senator, "and nearly all are graduates of Canadian universities."

Will the minister say if there is any truth in this report?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the statement that is attributed to Senator Wilson is not correct and is very much a misrepresentation of the truth.

CORRECTION—MR. WEIR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in Hansard at page 411 the following statement is attributed to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot):

To such an extent was that true that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) allowed a large quantity of butter to come out of storage without paying duty.

I feel confident this must be a misprint, because it has no foundation in fact.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

RETIREMENT OF NON-PERMANENT OFFICERS AND MEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr.

Sutherland), whether the government has in any way altered its attitude as to giving more favourable treatment to the officers and men of the Royal Canadian Air Force who have received notice of dismissal as from March 31?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): I do not know that the government has announced its attitude, Mr. Speaker. About sixty-nine officers and one hundred men have been notified that their services will be dispensed with on the first of April, and every possible consideration is being given to them.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): A few days ago I asked the minister with regard to the dismissal of certain men who claimed they had received two weeks' pay, and whether their claim was founded on fact. He was kind enough to send me a statement—really to the effect that it was. It seemed to me at the time that this was scant consideration for men who had been employed for many years. He has just said in reply to a question by my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) that full consideration is being given. May I ask if such consideration contemplates any departure from the attitude he announced a few days ago?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Speaker, I may have given a wrong impression to my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). The officers who are leaving the service get one month's leave with pay for every five years of service, and in addition, of course, if they have any annual leave coming to them in the past year that leave is added. With regard to the airmen, under all circumstances they are allowed three weeks' leave with pay, and if they have extra leave coming to them, of course, they are credited with it. That leave will start so that it will coincide with the closing of their period of service on March 31.

Mr. EULER: The minister says a month's leave or a month's pay is given if the man has served five years. Is that month the minimum or do they receive a proportionate leave or salary if their period of service has been less than five years?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If their period of service has been less than five years they may get less.

Mr. EULER: They might get only two weeks?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is possible.

Mr. RALSTON: Arising out of the questions asked by my hon. friend from North Waterloo, and the answers of the Minister of National Defence with regard to the leave given the officers and men of the air force, may I ask the minister if the consideration which is being given in the way of leave is not simply the ordinary, usual provision in that respect? It is not any special consideration in view of the summary and wholesale nature of the dismissals?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is the usual leave, of course.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NORTH BATTLEFORD-EDMONTON BRANCH LINE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways a question arising out of a question I directed to him the other day. I do not think the answer then given was as complete as the minister would like to have it. Between North Battleford and Edmonton sixty-nine miles of roadbed is ready for steel, and I understood the minister to say that he did not expect that any construction work would be undertaken this year, whether it was expected the line would pay or not pay. I should like to ask the minister whether that was what he meant, or whether consideration will be given to construction work in areas where the chances of paying are one hundred per cent.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I did not make the statement that there would be no construction in any area whether or not it could be expected to pay. As far as I remember I simply stated that in view of the serious financial condition of the road the management had not recommended to us the continuation of practically any branch lines at present.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then apparently there will be no construction this year even in areas where it might be expected to pay?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am just asking for information. You can keep refusing all you like; that does not bother me.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT REPAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Is it the intention of the government to bring into effect the new tariff schedules covering repairs to all agricultural implements, as proposed last year?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): So experienced a member as the hon. gentleman would hardly be expected to ask that question. These are not questions that should be asked until the budget is brought down, and then they are answered before they are asked.

Mr. VALLANCE: I am being asked today, by those who are vitally interested, if this is the intention of the government. I merely asked the question of the Prime Minister, and I think his answer was quite unwarranted.

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. Hugh GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 15, to amend the Admiralty Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED DEDUCTION OF TEN PER CENT IN INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize deductions of ten per cent from the amounts of certain salaries or other compensations or indemnities payable by the government of Canada during the fiscal year 1932-33.

And to provide for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of all current contributions payable under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act in respect of the salaries payable during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933, of all employees who receive not more than one thousand two hundred dollars per annum.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving that you do now leave the chair to enable the house to resolve itself into a committee of the whole to consider the resolution which has just been read, I do so in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) who is still indisposed and confined to his bed. Since the opposition have indicated that they do not propose to consider items concerning salaries in the estimates of the two departments now before the committee of supply until such time as the policy of the government has been made known with respect to the reduction of civil service salaries by ten per cent, I am moving this motion in the place and stead of the Minister of Finance. I greatly regret that it falls to my duty to do so, because the Minister of Finance had prepared himself more adequately than I to explain the resolution to the house.

I should like to preface anything I have to say by the observation that the civil service of this country has now become a very large body; approximately 65,000 people are affected by this resolution. The civil service is a body of which this country has become justly proud, because there are many employees in the service who discharge onerous and difficult duties with credit and distinction. On the other hand it is beyond question that the service has become overmanned in many departments. That, I think, is a commonplace. That the Beatty commission, charged in 1930 with the responsibility of determining the extent to which the service could be reduced or improved, has not made a report is well known to every hon. member of this house, but that there are larger numbers on the payroll of the country than the necessities demand I think has been felt by every thoughtful investigator for many years.

That does not detract from the value of the service that is rendered by the painstaking and thoughtful men and women who serve the state with loyalty and who do not look upon their positions merely as opportunities to enable them to see what they can get from the treasury, but there are those who do take that attitude, and ultimately that matter must be determined by suitable and proper investigation. After all, the civil servants of this country are the instruments by which the business of government is carried on, just as in every business there are employees, clerks, managers and executive heads, for the purpose of directing the activities of that business. So the state through its government has the right, which it exercises, of employing from time to time men and women to discharge the obligations that are necessary for the conduct of public business, and as I have said, in the main these duties have been discharged satisfactorily to the Canadian people.

During the last few days we have had much discussion as to the principles that should govern in appointments to the service, in promotions and in the payment of compensation for services rendered. The committee that was appointed, and that reported upon professional compensation, indicated that in their opinion the professional class, having regard to the salaries commanded in other walks of life, were not adequately compensated, and certain recommendations were made. I think it goes without saying, and at least my observations lead me to believe, that there is no question at all as to the fact that there are certain classes of the public service that are not adequately paid. They could command a larger compensation in other walks of life, yet in these days it is apparent that the compensation given is not so much out of line as some people have thought. There is a measure of security of employment; there is a certainty of not too long hours and there is also provision for a pension. To this the individual makes a contribution, but he does not pay the whole cost; the state itself makes continuous contributions from year to year to the superannuation funds in order that these pensions may be paid.

Then, of course, there is the other class which, in the opinion of most people, is overpaid. It is not my purpose, however, to do more than say that that is a matter which will be subsequently investigated at an opportune time. The principle upon which compensation has been awarded in the past and salaries paid has been, in my judgment at least, too elastic to bring about reasonably proper results. I know of salaries that are being paid to those in the service which are out of all proportion to the salaries paid to others also in the service. Those who are receiving, for instance, $250 a month or $220 a month, as compared with those who receive $150, are not called upon to discharge, nor do they discharge obligations at all commensurate with the difference between the two levels of salary.

Leaving that for the moment, we find that during the last two years, owing to the great pressure of depression upon the public purse, and owing to the difficulty of raising taxes beyond a certain measure, there has been, not only on the part of governments but by private enterprises, an effort to curtail and, by the practice of economies, to restore a balance between income and outgoings. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company a year ago instituted such economies; the Canadian National Railways last year instituted economies in that direction; and further economies have been effected by the findings of boards in connection with the running trades. Recently a board was sitting in Montreal when its duties were suddenly ended by an agreement being arrived at whereby a ten per cent reduction was accepted by the clerical staffs of the railways, the question then being under consideration by a conciliation board. In private enterprises throughout the country, apart from the great transportation companies, the same principle has been followed. The public service is called upon, therefore, to consider the conditions that now exist in the light of the treatment accorded by other employers to their employees, which has been governed not only by the economic necessities of the various enterprises to which I have referred but also by the fact that there has been a considerable reduction in the cost of living. The figures furnished by the Department of Labour indicate that at the present time the cost of living, as compared with 1926, is as follows: Food costs, a reduction of 30·4 per cent; fuel costs, a reduction of 5·8 per cent; rent, $\frac{7}{10}$ of 1 per cent; clothing, 23·6 per cent, and sundries, 2·2 per cent. Weighted, as is done by statisticians in an endeavour to arrive at an average comparable with other averages, the average given is 14·4 per cent; and so far as wages and salaries generally are concerned, the statisticians report that the average reduction throughout the country is approximately ten per cent, or perhaps a little more.

The proposals contained in this resolution contemplate a reduction of compensation awarded to the public service of ten per cent in the case of all those who receive upwards of $1,200 per annum, and inasmuch as under $1,200 a ten per cent reduction might effect some hardships, the state or the treasury is absorbing the five per cent for superannuation, leaving the net contribution made by the individual receiving $1,200 or less per annum five per cent of his annual salary. In other words, if he receives $1,200 per annum his contribution to the welfare of Canada will be $60 or $5 per month. That applies to all classes and all persons except the representatives of the crown, judges, and the members of the military, naval and air forces, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It will include all payments, regardless of designation. Some employees receive regular salaries plus various allowances payable either in cash or in kind. These additional payments may be designated as salaries or allowances, or other similar terms may be used; but if they form part of the remuneration attached to the office they will be subject to the ten per cent reduction. I may say that where living allowances are provided for, obviously the living allowance would not be included in the amount from which the ten per cent would be deducted. But where there is a sum added to another sum for the purpose of determining the amount upon which the superannuation allowance is paid, then that will be the sum from which the ten per cent reduction will be made. In other words, everything that is received by the individual that might be classified as remuneration, compensation or salary, for the purpose of enabling the contribution to the superannuation fund to be determined, will be the sum or the amount from which the ten per cent will be deducted.

So far as the exceptions are concerned, the representatives of the crown in the various provinces are not subject to that deduction; and those of us who are familiar with the costs and expense involved by any Canadian who has accepted the office of lieutenant governor will agree, I think, that although he pays income tax upon that sum he has not—at least so far as I have been able to ascertain—except in one province ever been able to succeed in maintaining the office on that sum or in fact on one very much larger. The judges are not included in this measure. It has been contended by legal authority, and an article in the last issue of the Law Quarterly Review goes into the matter rather fully, that it would be a breach of the statutory rights of judges to undertake to make a curtailment in their salaries in this way. There are, however, other methods by which the matter may be dealt with, and the government has not finally determined what action it may take in that regard. The ten per cent reduction will also apply to all those bodies or agents or trustees of the government that are discharging functions in the name of or for the government—for instance, the grain commissioners, the railway commissioners, the harbour commissioners. Obviously, however, there is no jurisdiction on the part of this administration or of any government to impose this reduction, if it is so called, upon the employees of the Canadian National Railways. They are dealt with by their own organizations—that is, the executive of the railway itself. But I should like to make it clear that the ten per cent reduction will apply in all other cases of employees of the public service, direct or indirect, with the exceptions I have just mentioned.

Superannuation benefits will not be affected. The contributors will make their contributions on the salaries received after deducting the ten per cent, and those retired will receive benefits based on the regular compensation rates before the reduction.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will the Prime Minister please repeat that.

Mr. BENNETT: The contributors will pay contributions to the fund on the amount that they actually receive, being the present salary range less ten per cent, but they will receive benefits based on the regular compensation rates before the deduction. And, as I have already indicated, the superannuation contributions of persons whose remuneration does not exceed $1,200 will be paid from the consolidated revenue fund, thus relieving them of one-half of the deduction applying to the public service generally. There are, of course, many cases in which there may be what I shall call purely administrative difficulties. In the measure to be founded upon this resolution it is proposed that the treasury board may make regulations to meet any difficult cases which may arise in connection with the adjustments which will be incident to the application of a principle of this kind to so large a number of persons.

I will next point out the extent to which the revenue will be affected and what it will mean in the way of increased revenues to the dominion. It is estimated that about $83,000,000 will be the gross amount from which deductions will be made, and that there will accrue to the revenues approximately $8,300,000 by reason of this reduction. On January 18, 1932, we had 36,595 permanent employees and 6,058 on a temporary basis, making a total of 42,653 receiving salaries and wages amounting to $66,808,653.01. There are a large number of seasonal and casual employees not included in the list to which I have referred, receiving various rates of pay. These total about 1,820 computed on a permanent basis—the temporary basis fluctuating from day to day—and receiving remuneration amounting to $1,297,743.50, while the temporaries, as of January 18 last, received $7,374,847.21.

Mr. VENIOT: What were the first figures given by the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. RALSTON: Was not that figure of seven million included in the other figure?

Mr. BENNETT: The $1,297,743.50 is received by 1,820 permanent employees, for the purpose of convenience classified as seasonal and casual employees; those who come and go received for the year, $7,374,847.21. This makes a total for 44,473 employees receiving $75,481,243.72. Then there are revenue postmasters totalling 12,300 in number who receive in round figures $6,000,000. The indemnities to senators amount to $384,000, and to members of the House of Commons, including compensation paid to ministers and to the leader of the opposition, $990,000. The incidentals in connection with the printing bureau and matters of that kind amount to approximately $873,000. The grand total is 57,565 employees receiving $83,728,000.

Mr. EULER: Are the rural mail contractors included in that list?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. POWER: Are the labourers receiving prevailing rates included in that list?

Mr. BENNETT: They are not included in the figures I have given. The total number of employees which I have just given is estimated by the departmental officials to be somewhat lower than what should be estimated. In 1930 a return was prepared with much care for the Beatty commission, and this gave the total number as 64,946. After making allowances for duplications and staff reductions, the departmental officials estimate the present total to be upwards of 62,000, receiving something over $83,000,000. The future of these employees has been taken care of by the provisions of the old superannuation act, the new superannuation act and the retirement act, with which this house is more or less familiar.

The general attitude of the civil service of this country as manifested by the official representations made to-day to the government and by communications received from all parts of Canada, indicates a sharp division of opinion. The official representations made to-day probably have been seen by hon. members, but every mail brings, not only to myself but to all members of the government, communications from men and women indicating a willingness, nay a desire to make some contribution in this time of stress to the country which has protected and supported them and in which they have found such ample opportunity for self-expression and development. It has been marvellous to read some of the communications which have been received. It would not be right or fair to indicate the names of the persons who have so communicated with the government, but some of these communications are so striking as to warrant their being referred to. One woman gave a striking example of what I might call the attitude of the average Canadian employee to the problem of the maintenance of this country's position and its integrity financially. She says:

It is now, and has long been, a cause of deep thankfulness that I have a salary to be cut, and that in these times of stress, when burdens are so great, not only in Canada but throughout the British Empire, whose honours and greatness we share and enjoy, that we can share and share gladly in the pinching. Ten per cent of my salary now seems but a small premium to pay for the security and comfort enjoyed by me in my years in the service. Since we have enjoyed the good years, shall we not also have the lean?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the right hon. gentleman be kind enough to give the name of the writer?

Mr. BENNETT: I said distinctly that I would not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is unparliamentary to read a communication without giving the name of the writer.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask Your Honour to rule on that question, whether or not it is unparliamentary for a communication to be read in the house without giving the name of the writer.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not, unless it is a public document.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The application of that rule has been insisted upon many times by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a public document.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has indicated the distinction; the document quoted was a private and not a public document, and the name of the writer need not be given.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it to be understood that hon. members are to be free to read communications in the house without giving the names of the writers? I have always understood that that is one rule to be held inviolate—I know it has been so applied to myself—that no communication should be read without giving the name of the author.

Mr. SPEAKER: The practice has been to withhold the name of a person making a private communication.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Never.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not a private communication; if it is, it should not be read in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: If a private communication is addressed to me and I have the leave of the author to read from it, I assume I have the right to do so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It becomes public when read.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe there is a rule in Great Britain which prevents members reading from newspapers, but that is not the matter with which I am now dealing. I have pointed out that there is a substantial body of public opinion in this country, employed in the public service itself, which realizes that this country is now passing through a difficult period and that it is desirable that some contribution should be made by them to the public welfare. Those receiving salaries of $1,500 and $3,000, as the case may be, are exempt from the payment of income tax; those in the higher levels make contributions to the state through the income tax, but those in the lower levels make none. I have yet to see any one of my fellow Canadians with whom I have discussed the matter who regards $5 a month as an unfair contribution to make to the Dominion of Canada at this time. That has been my observation.

I was speaking of the second class of civil service employees throughout the country and I indicated that in every city and town—and I say that deliberately—there is a large number who realize the desirability of making this contribution, and who are proud that they are living in a country where they are enjoying what they do enjoy and to make this contribution to its well-being. Those are the two sharp contrasts. I am also not unmindful of the fact that a very serious effort has been made to make this a political issue. As to that, all one has to do is to read what has transpired in the city of Ottawa during the last forty-eight hours. All one has to do is to read a statement reported in the newspapers, as made in a public gathering by a member of this house, that a nearby county would of course be able to be secured by the opposition at the next election because a large number of civil servants lived there, taking it for granted that by reason of what had been done they would vote against the present administration. This administration has measured the effect of such action and it will not be deterred from doing what it conceives to be its duty because it knows a very earnest effort will be made to introduce politics into the discussion of the matter.

But I am not unmindful of another thing and that is, that in England where the civil service has been said to be, as it is, a most exemplary service, a committee generally known as the May committee was appointed, and the report of that committee dealing with the civil service recommended not only that changes should be made by way of reductions but also that the civil servants like every other citizen of the realm should pay income tax beginning at £125, which I think was the final figure fixed upon, or the equivalent slightly over $600. At the end of last year I saw some evidence of the anxiety of not only this class of citizenship of Great Britain but of other classes receiving small emoluments, to assist the state in its troubles and their willingness was one of the most remarkable and amazing things that one could view. It expressed itself by savings, by self-denial, by sacrifice of immediate comforts for the benefit of the state.

In this instance the bill which will be founded upon this resolution has force for one year only. As the resolution itself indicates, the bill will expire on the 31st day of March, 1933. It has no vigour or life beyond that date, and I do not believe Canadians employed in the civil service of this country will be less desirous, less anxious, or less enthusiastic in their zeal, to make a contribution to the well-being of Canada than are those who are affected by similar reductions in the compensation they receive in Great Britain in consequence of the May report.

Recently in the great republic to the south, probably notice has been taken by many members of the effort that has been made to save millions now wasted in connection with the various executive activities of the government. That is the way in which their effort is spoken of in the reports that come from Washington. In every country efforts of this kind are being made. The sum of $8,000,000 represents the interest on $160,000,000. At this time, when not only are revenues urgently required, but the capacity of the average person to pay has become less and less; when the successive crop failures in seventy-six municipalities in one province have limited the productive result of efforts to an extent never before known; when the demands made by the nationally-owned railway upon the exchequer are, of which we have already seen indications, millions and millions of dollars; when it cost the Canadian people by taxation or borrowing at least $1,000,000 a week for every week in 1931, to provide for the requirements of the nationally-owned railways and those moneys or the interest upon them must be provided immediately by the taxpayer, then, indeed, the interest upon $160,000,000, which will represent the contribution which the public service will make to the welfare of Canada during the year, is a sum of very great importance. We do not believe it will work any hardship; we believe the provision that has been inserted with respect to the superannuation allowance for those receiving under $1,200 will relieve any possibilities of hardship. Despite the apparent efforts to introduce politics and to make political issues in this capital city of Ottawa—

An hon. MEMBER: Where did the right hon. gentleman get that?

Mr. BENNETT: Did the hon. member read the report of the Liberal meeting the other evening in Ottawa?

Mr. BRADETTE: The right hon. gentleman must have read about it in Brockville.

Mr. BENNETT: I am referring to the Liberal meeting held here and addressed by members of this house during the past week. If the report is erroneous, I am sure the hon. gentleman will be only too glad to deny its accuracy. I am merely pointing out that, despite that, I believe the great body of opinion of the civil service leans to the view that this is not an unreasonable contribution to make under present conditions, nor will it lie within the mouths of those who oppose this measure to charge that there has been reckless expenditure of public moneys, for whatever else may be said, every department of the public service up to this moment has lived well within the estimates voted at the last session, which were substantially less than the estimates of the previous year which were not prepared by the present administration. What is more, I think it will be found as the session progresses that there has been a real and vigorous effort to effect economies in the public service, and if these economies are not popular and do not conduce to the popularity of the administration, we conceive our duty to be far greater than that which is involved in the popularity of a government. From day to day, week to week and month to month we have continued to discharge the duties which devolve upon us, endeavouring not only to maintain the economic structure of this country and its credit, but to enable it to meet its obligations in every part of the world in the terms of the contracts creating them.

In addition to that we have been called upon to support, financially and otherwise, the western provinces of this confederation so that, despite the extraordinary depression through which they are passing and the difficulties they have to encounter, their credit may be maintained. Now, at the very threshold of a new year, so far as crops are concerned, we are confronted with the request that not thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars be provided, but that millions of dollars be provided to enable the husbandmen between the lakes and the mountains again to sow their seed, trusting to the harvest which, for the last three years, has not resulted from their efforts. These are the difficulties under which we live; these are the difficulties under which we carry on. And we believe that when there is an understanding—as there will be—as to just what the situation is, hon. gentlemen who sit opposite will not be proud of any opposition they have urged against efforts made to provide, by methods indicated, a contribution to the welfare of this country to maintain its integrity and existence as a dominion in a time of the greatest stress through which the ship of state has laboured.

We believe that, and we are content to leave the issue with those who ultimately are to decide it. We have gone forward and discharged an unpleasant task, an unhappy task. We realized the responsibilities placed upon us because of conditions which are now world-wide, and are known by every thoughtful man to be universal, that are not measured in terms of what took place in 1929, 1930 or any other year, conditions the like of which have never been known to the mind of men. Realizing all that, we have endeavoured, Mr. Speaker, to the best of our ability, to provide that there shall be a balanced budget brought about by economies and by the utmost care in the public estimates, there being reductions in them such as this house has never witnessed before, and to which we hope to give effect. The taxation we believe will not be so unreasonable as to shatter the hope and courage of the Canadian people, because there is a limit to what a new people in a new country numbering only about 10,000,000 can stand.

Realizing all these considerations, we submit this resolution to the house in the earnest hope that it may be considered fairly, free from prejudice or any efforts directed towards political advantage, seeing in it what it really is—a measure for the purpose of adding to the revenue of this country without doing hardship to any person. We have felt that a class which has received protection and security through all the years should make a definite contribution to the revenues of Canada, and I feel certain, as I said to the representatives at the meeting this morning, that as they do it gladly, when these dark clouds have passed away and this time is forgotten, they will look back with pleasurable pride upon the contribution they have made to the prosperity of the country they love so well.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I regret I have again to refer to the opposition being taken unawares with respect to measures brought up for discussion. At the time of adjournment last night when the business of to-day was mentioned by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who was the acting leader in the house at the time, he spoke as follows:

> The procedure to-morrow will depend on the health of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). If he is able to attend, we will take up the resolution standing in his name; if not, I fancy it will be postponed.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that from that statement there was reason to believe that if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was not in his seat to-day the measure now before us would not be proceeded with. I remember at the time one of my colleagues remarked to me that it was somewhat extraordinary that the Prime Minister himself had not indicated he would take up this measure, in the event of the Minister of Finance not being in his place. In previous sessions he was not reluctant to assume most of the work of the ministry, and we were somewhat surprised that the Minister of Justice had not said that, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister would take up the measure; it is the more surprising this was not said if such was the intention. I can only say that this is another illustration of the way hon. members opposite seek to treat this side of the house, so far as the discussion of public measures is concerned. In the long run I do not think anything will be gained, but I would say to hon. gentlemen opposite that in the matter of cooperation in the work of parliament they are setting an example which unless they change their ways very materially they may some day live to regret.

Mr. Speaker, I am not at this time rising to oppose the principle of this resolution—the principle, broadly stated, being that in a time of great stress throughout the country when men and women in all walks of life are making sacrifices, the public service of Canada should along with others be prepared to make some sacrifice. I believe our public service in Canada is just as public spirited as any service in the world; in fact, I would not go to England for an example of public spiritedness by public servants. I think our service is quite prepared to do its part to meet any emergency, and I am sure they have shown time and again that they are prepared to do so with a glad heart. There will be however a number of questions which will come up for consideration when the resolution is in committee, and we shall reserve discussion until the bill is introduced.

The Prime Minister himself foresaw one of the obvious criticisms certain to be directed against a measure involving an all-round reduction in the public service, when he spoke of the possible mention of reckless extravagance and expenditures on the part of the present administration. He said it would not do for anyone to raise that question. This afternoon, I am not going to dwell upon the point, but I do not hesitate to say that if the Prime Minister had been less lavish in his promises during the election campaign; and had since he has been in office refrained from doing some of the things which we on this side of the house pleaded with him not to do, there would have been no necessity to take this particular step to help meet the existing situation.

I need not remind the house that, time and again during the debates last session when the ministry was introducing measures in the nature of grants to the provinces, grants in aid for sundry purposes, we on this side of the house stated most emphatically our view that under existing conditions such grants were not justified. We said the ministry would be pursuing a wiser course if it refrained from adding to the obligations of the federal treasury until such time as the budget could be balanced. One has only to look over the records to see the extent to which obligations and undertakings of one kind or another have been entered upon by hon. gentlemen opposite in their dealings with provinces, municipalities and in other ways to appreciate the fact that if the government had been as circumspect last year, as it is becoming this year, the public service of Canada might not to-day be facing such extensive reductions as those now outlined.

I am somewhat surprised that my right hon. friend wished to bring on this resolution this afternoon in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), particularly in view of the fact that it was only this morning he and some of his colleagues were waited upon by a deputation representative of the civil service of Canada. I assume the deputation was received about eleven o'clock in the morning and that its representation lasted for some little time. Now, one thing is perfectly clear, the Minister of Finance who has this measure in hand has not yet become cognizant of what those representations were or had any chance whatsoever to consider them.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to advise my right hon. friend that a memorandum of the representations was sent to us some days ago—to the Finance Minister as well as to myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says a memorandum was sent.

Mr. BENNETT: What they did to-day was to read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want to go into the question of whether or not the Minister of Finance has been in council since the memorandum was received. I believe if that question were pressed we should find that since receiving the memorandum he has not been in council, nor had any opportunity to discuss with his colleagues any of the representations made. However, it is quite clear that so far as the delegation of this morning is concerned the government's mind was made up before the delegation itself appeared. I feel sure as well that not only had the bill been drafted but that it was printed before the delegation waited on the government.

I should like to take very strong exception to what the Prime Minister said about the making of political capital out of this measure. It does strike me as an extraordinary method of introducing a public measure—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —for the Prime Minister of Canada to begin a discussion on a great question like this by raising the cry of political capital. May I say that so far as I have heard any expressions of opinion from this side they have been very restrained, and to the extent to which anything has been said it has indicated that in the view of the opposition there was a very strong reason why at least those who are enjoying high salaries and are in a position to make a contribution to the state should be given an opportunity so to do. I have not heard one word in this house to indicate that in any way the opposition were opposing the broad principle of some contribution being made to the public treasury by those in the public service. What we have been concerned about, and what the public service is concerned about, is the justice of the particular contribution which is to be made. As I gather from the resolution, the purpose of the government is to make a horizontal cut. I believe—and I think the view is shared by all hon. members on this side of the house—that something in the nature of a graded contribution having regard to the salaries received, would be more equitable and more just. It is from that point of view, and that point of view alone, that we intend to criticize the government on the measure which it is now introducing.

Speaking here the other day, I said that so far as members of parliament were concerned, and so far as I myself as leader of the opposition was concerned, I thought it was quite right that along with the ministers all of us should, as the representatives of the people in this parliament, make a contribution that would be helpful in relieving the present very serious situation throughout the country. I would extend that to all those who are in high places.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has mentioned a list of persons—lieutenant-governors, judges, members of the naval and military forces, the mounted police and others, who will be exempted from this proposed horizontal cut. I shall wait until we get into committee to discover on just what basis these exemptions have been made, but I should like to say at once that, speaking of lieutenant-governors, His Excellency the Governor General has set a noble example—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —by making clear what the one who is in the highest office of state is prepared to do. With regard to the government houses throughout the dominion, I would say during a time like this it might be well to close them up altogether six months of the year. I see no reason why their social functions should be kept up at this time. When people are finding it as hard as they are to-day to make ends meet, and to get a bare living, it but adds to the bitterness and poignancy of their distress to read accounts of elaborate social functions carried on in government houses when in such quarters economy might very well be practised. I do submit that all of those in high places owe it to the country generally at a time like this to share in this contribution. There is such a thing as noblesse oblige. My right hon. friend keeps referring to the old country. A tradition has come to this land from the old country of noblesse oblige, and I am inclined to believe that the people of Canada as well as the people of Great Britain will be measuring what there may be of noblesse oblige on the part of those in high places by the extent to which at a time like this they are prepared to make sacrifices.

My right hon. friend was not wholly clear, at least at the beginning of his speech as to the purpose of this resolution. My right hon. friend started in by saying that the public service was over-manned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear." Now, assuming that that is true, are we to understand that this is a measure for cutting down the public service of Canada? Because if it is it is a very different measure from what I have understood it to be up to the present time. I have regarded this as a measure for a percentage deduction from the existing salaries of those in the public service; I have not regarded it as a measure to lessen the total number of persons in the public service. I do not say that an investigation to that end might not be very profitably held and economies effected where it may be possible, but I do take exception to having the public assume from the words of the Prime Minister that he at the present time under this measure is trying to reduce the public service, when as a matter of fact so far as the measure itself extends it will not reduce the size of the service by a single individual.

My right hon. friend spoke of some salaries being out of all proportion to the work or service being rendered in some positions in comparison with the work or service being rendered in other positions. That may be perfectly true, but I do not understand this measure to be one having to do with any readjustment of salaries. It has nothing whatever to do with that, and I do not see why my right hon. friend in his remarks should seek to convey to the country an impression that his government is dealing with that particular matter in this particular resolution. Because they are not doing anything of the kind.

My right hon. friend also spoke of the economies which are being sought to be effected in the public service. Are we to understand that this is a measure for effecting in the public service, economies which will continue through the years, or is it, as it purports to be and what my right hon. friend in his concluding remarks said it was, a measure to occasion a deduction of a portion of the salaries for one year only? If it is a measure to effect economy in the public service, that would imply that these salaries are being reduced with a view to having them permanently maintained at a lower level. I say the ministry in that regard cannot be too emphatic or too clear in making its exact position known.

I gathered from the concluding remarks of my right hon. friend that it is not intended by this measure to bring about in any way a permanent reduction in the level of salaries throughout the public service; I take that from his statement that this measure would have effect only until March 31 of next year. The Prime Minister says it will have no vigour of life beyond that date. Again I should like to accept the Prime Minister's word, but I am not too sure of what may happen at the end of that time, and I refer to it at this moment in order that there may be some record of this aspect having been considered at this time. I speak as I do because on this very order paper of to-day there is notice of motion that on Monday next we consider the amending of an act passed last year so as to extend its provisions from the month of March to the month of May of this year. When the measure to which I have just referred was before parliament last year we were told in very plain language that it would expire on March 1 of this year; at that time the Prime Minister was quite emphatic that the provisions of the measure would not apply beyond that date. He stated that parliament would be in session when March came around and there would be no need for extending the measure beyond that time. So I say, with that motion on the order paper, indicating a position diametrically opposite to that which my right hon. friend took at the time of the introduction of the measure, we must be particularly cautious in accepting my right hon. friend's words as to the length of time for which the present measure will be in force. However, I do accept them, and I hope my right hon. friend will see to it that what he has said in that regard will be given full value and effect when the time comes.

I do not wish at the present time to begin a debate on this measure. I think I have made it clear that to the broad principle of a deduction from public salaries to help meet existing conditions we of the opposition are taking no exception, but we will wish to examine very critically the effect of a horizontal cut of ten per cent, especially where it is applicable to those who are receiving small salaries and to whom it must mean much more in the way of sacrifice than to those who have higher incomes. The ten per cent cut, to a man who has an income above a certain amount, does not mean anything in the way of actual sacrifice; its effect may be shown in his accounts, but in actual privation it means nothing whatever. On the other hand, as respects salaries, of a limited size, a ten per cent cut is a very substantial contribution to make, and where people are living on salaries which simply provide them with a livelihood at the minimum standard of living it means a very great sacrifice. So far as families thus situated are concerned, while they may have escaped debt heretofore, because of this reduction they may get into debt immediately; where they have found it possible to contribute to the education of children, that education may have to be foregone, and so on. I need not enlarge upon the point of which these are only illustrations; I am just indicating the point of view from which we on this side of the house feel this measure ought to be considered. We believe that in considering a deduction of this kind regard should be had to the size of the salary and to the existing standard of living, particularly the minimum standard.

I do not wish to continue at greater length, but there is one further thing I feel compelled to say. It is this: If the salaries of civil servants are to be cut because of necessary retrenchments all along the line, and if non-essentials are to be avoided, I think we might well forego immediately the carrying on of some of the investigations that are being held at the public expense in order to satisfy some feeling of wounded pride, or some other sentiment, or feeling on the part of the Prime Minister. According to his own words the right hon. gentleman would have the country believe that the ministry is setting the country a very noble example. I say to him that the inquiry into the Gordon charges, so-called, is just beginning; it is going to mean a very considerable waste of public money; it is going to involve the printing of evidence in English and French; it is going to involve the bringing here of witnesses and we do not know how much in the way of time of stenographers and others engaged upon the work of that particular committee. It is going to occasion debate which will involve further additional expenditure. I say to the Prime Minister, in the matter of examples, let him begin with himself and eliminate that item of expense. Let him see if what will be thereby saved, cannot go to some of those in the publice service whom it would be possible to benefit if that amount were not taken out of the treasury.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I do not suppose the government will expect much sympathy from the Labour group in connection with the resolution now before the house. We object very strenuously to the proposed cut, particularly as it affects the lower grades employed by the government. Not only do we object to the cut in salaries itself; we also object strenuously to the method adopted in order to bring about these adjustments. We feel that the government took a most arbitrary method of bringing these reductions into force; we feel that if the government proposed to reduce the salaries of civil servants this should have been done as good employers throughout the country usually do it, that is, by entering into negotiations with the employees and trying to arrive at an amicable adjustment of any differences that might arise. I believe the principle of collective bargaining has become so prevalent that the government at this stage should have set the example by following the practice, instead of saying, "You can take it or leave it."

That action is setting a bad example throughout the country. In addition, I am afraid this reduction will have many consequences which I fear the government as yet do not fully realize. I should like to point out one or two facts in that connection. At the present there are a large number of employers of labour who have agreements with their employees, and in some cases these agreements also cover men who are employed by the government. The men who are employed by the government and who may belong to a union will have their wages reduced by ten per cent. Other employers may not reduce their wages, and consequently we will have one set of government workers receiving ten per cent less in wages than another set of workers employed by a private concern. In that way I am afraid this reduction will create a tremendous amount of confusion in many parts of the country. I do not believe the government realized this when the cuts were proposed.

I feel sure that when the government decided to make this salary adjustment they had certain ideas and a certain objective. I have to look at this from a somewhat different angle than from the government's point of view. If the government intends to stabilize conditions in this country then I claim that their action in reducing wages by ten per cent will have the very opposite effect, because the more you reduce wages, the more you reduce the purchasing power of the people, the worse conditions will become. In other words, it is only accelerating the process of what is commonly termed the vicious circle. If the government really wanted to stabilize conditions in Canada one method they could have adopted would have been an increase in purchasing power among the great masses of the people. The example they have now set, however, in reducing wages will have the very opposite effect, for I am told by employers of labour that they intend to follow suit and cut down wages in exactly the same proportion as the government now proposes to do so far as the civil servants of the country are concerned.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) this afternoon was good enough to submit to the house extracts from the May report presented to the British government not very long ago. I wish he had enlightened the house more fully in regard to the comparative income taxes paid in Great Britain and Canada. It seems to me that if the people of Canada are to be called upon to make sacrifices these sacrifices should begin not at the bottom but at the top. On this occasion, however, the sacrifices are going to be practically all at the bottom, and there will be practically none at the top. The Prime Minister read a letter from some humble employee in the government service saying how proud the public servants would be to make the sacrifice of ten per cent. Well, I did not hear anything in the form of a letter from any of the judges in Canada. I believe that the Canadian people will readily respond whenever a real crisis confronts them.

Now how did other countries face a financial crisis when it came? For the benefit of the Prime Minister and of the house I will give a few figures with regard to income tax in Great Britain in comparison with the income tax paid in Canada. It is all very well to talk about people who receive certain sums in England and to compare that with conditions here, but we are now considering the question of raising approximately $8,000,000 by means of a reduction in the salaries of civil servants. In Canada a person in receipt of an income of $5,000 pays $32 per annum in taxes; in Great Britain on a similar income he would pay $649.69 which is about twenty times more. In Canada the man with an income of $10,000 pays $232 per annum, and in Great Britain $1,764.16, or rather more than seven and a half times as such. The man with an income of $15,000 in Canada pays $632 and in Great Britain $3,281.95, or five and one-fifth times as much. On an income of $50,000 in Canada the tax is $6,703, while in Great Britain it is $18,891.79, or two and three-quarter times as much. On an income of $100,000 a year the man in Canada pays $19,064 as compared with $48,777 in Great Britain, which is nearly two and a half times as much; while the income of $500,000 in Canada is taxed to the extent of $162,952, and in Great Britain $292,882, which is nearly double the amount.

That will give the house some idea in regard to sacrifices. If the government were anxious to raise $8,000,000 this was one way they could have gone about raising it, by taxing the incomes of those best able to bear the burden at this particular time.

Recently the people of Australia were faced with a serious financial crisis. What did they do? I have in my hand the reports of two speeches which appeared in Hansard of the Australian commonwealth, and I think it would be rather interesting at this time for us to see how Australia has decided to meet the conditions that have prevailed and no doubt are still prevailing there. I quote from page 5 of the report the remarks of the Right Hon. J. H. Scullin, then Prime Minister, speaking to the House of Representatives on June 18, 1931:

> I shall outline the main features of the plan. In the first place, there is to be a loan for the conversion of the whole of the commonwealth and state securities, amounting to about £550,000,000, which it is proposed to convert into a new stock, returning, with one or two minor modifications, a rate of interest 22½ per cent less than that now received. The banks have agreed to reduce their rates of interest on deposits and advances, and there is to be a reduction of the interest charged on private mortgages, and a reduction of adjustable expenditure by all governments.

At page 7 of the same record Mr. Scullin is again reported:

> I do not think it is necessary that I should speak at great length, but I make the point that this is the first definite attempt to bring the bondholders into any general scheme of contribution to meet the fall in our national income. We are putting forward a bold proposal. It may, in the minds of many, be a revolutionary proposal; but it is not a dishonourable one. It is not a proposal for repudiation. It is an honourable proposition, asking the bondholders of this country in a time of national crisis, to convert their bonds into new stock bearing a lower rate of interest.

In Australia, it will be seen, bonds amounting to £550,000,000 have been converted into new bonds bearing interest at a rate 22½ per cent less than that paid before. This was done to meet the financial crisis there. But when we have a financial crisis in this country what action do the government take? When they go to the money market of the dominion they actually offer the people who have the money a higher rate of interest than that to which they have been accustomed for many years. When the government bring down their estimates there is a considerable reduction in every line of expenditure, and they are now asking the man receiving a salary of $100 per month to make a sacrifice of 5 per cent of his income; yet they increase the interest charges to bondholders in Canada, which charges are now $13,000,000 greater than they were the year before. In other words, the government are asking employees with low wages to make sacrifices while they are increasing the returns to the wealthy classes in the dominion. I repeat, therefore, that if we are going to ask anyone to make sacrifices we should see to it that these sacrifices begin first of all at the top and work down gradually to the bottom, assuming it is necessary for the people at the bottom to make sacrifices at all. Suppose we in this country followed the example of Australia and converted the bonds held within the confines of this dominion into new stock bearing interest reduced by 22½ per cent as in Australia? Why should bonds be any more sacred in Canada than they are in Australia? Well, suppose we followed that example, on our annual interest charges of approximately $135,000,000, there would be this year a saving to the exchequer of at least $20,000,000; and I say that until such time as those people who own bonds in this country are compelled to receive a reduced return in the form of interest charges, which must be derived from the productive capacity of the dominion, we have no right to ask our employees to accept reduced wages. Approximately $20,000,000 could be saved in that way, and if the income tax was increased to the levels to which the Prime Minister is evidently willing to agree, in my opinion it would not be necessary to ask the employees of this country to sacrifice from seven to eight million dollars of their salaries.

The Prime Minister made the statement that the low paid employees of this country receive the protection of the government. I contend that it is the great masses of the people that give to this country the protection it has. The reverse is true of what the right hon. gentleman has said; it is the great masses of the people who are performing the useful services in our midst who are helping to build up this country. To ask the charwomen and the elevator men to undertake a sacrifice at this time is, I think, starting at the wrong end because these people are performing a useful service.

The people who are receiving the protection of this country are the bondholders, and this measure is giving to them still greater security.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the hon. member tell the house what percentage of Canadian bonds are held by Canadians? In order to help him to answer I will tell him that of the bonds of the Canadian National Railways, two-thirds are payable outside of Canada, principally in New York.

Mr. HEAPS: I thank the hon. gentleman for the information, but I was referring to bonds held internally. I referred to the sum of $135,000,000 as being approximately the amount paid in interest charges on federal obligations, and I stated that with a reduction of 22½ per cent, as was undertaken by the Australian government, a saving could be had of approximately $20,000,000. This percentage of reduction applied to the total amount would give a saving of approximately $30,000,000. I allowed for two-thirds of the bonds being held within Canada, but I believe the exact percentage is somewhat higher. Speaking in Ottawa some time ago Sir Joseph Flavelle gave a figure considerably in excess of that given by myself. I understand quite well that we could not attempt any reduction in the case of bonds held externally, and I omitted any reference to such indebtedness.

I was referring to the protection given to the bondholders while practically no protection is given to the people who work for low wages. The Prime Minister referred to a ten per cent reduction in the cost of living as is shown by the figures of the Bureau of Statistics, but I should have liked him to go to the same source of information to find out what it costs a family of five to live in ordinary decency. The figures submitted at various investigations which have been held from time to time go to show that there is no justification to cut any salary below $1,800 per year. That is the minimum figure given by statisticians which will permit a family of five to live in ordinary decency and comfort. When wages are cut below a certain level standards of living have to be reduced.

If the government had submitted a measure to exempt from this reduction those receiving salaries of $2,000 per year and less, no doubt the opposition to such a proposal would not have been as strenuous as it is likely to be to this particular measure; if the Prime Minister had come to the house with a proposal to ask all the people of this country, including the bondholders, the bankers and the financiers, to make some sacrifice, then some of the objections might have been cut away from under our feet, but when he comes to the house with a proposal whereby those employed by the government and earning $100 per month or less are to be cut five per cent, and all those earning over $100 per month, ten per cent, then I say there is no justification for such action. While the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has taken the stand that he would be in favour of graded reductions, I take the stand that until the government has asked a sacrifice on the part of those able to bear it I am opposed to any effort to reduce the salaries of the employees of the government.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have no criticism to offer of the government's action in suggesting a reduction in the salaries of civil servants, and of all others in the public service, and in the indemnities of members of the House of Commons and the Senate. I believe that the average member of parliament represents people whose incomes have been cut from ten per cent to as high as seventy-five per cent or in some cases one hundred per cent; indeed, there have been instances where the total income of people has been eliminated. I believe the majority of the civil service appreciates the fact that some reduction is necessary, but I think it might be made on a more equitable basis; there should be a larger reduction at the top and a more modest reduction at the bottom.

I protest against the exemption of the members of the judiciary from this contribution to the public service. We have in Canada the following judges receiving the salaries indicated:

18	10.000
2	8,000
133	5,000

I hesitate to think that the members of the judiciary are lacking in that devotion to public service and patriotism and love of country so necessary in a time like this, and I contend that the government should call upon these men to make a corresponding sacrifice. I do appeal to the Prime Minister to change the policy in this regard and to call upon the members of the judiciary and some of the highly paid members of the military forces to make similar contributions. His Excellency the Governor General has seen fit voluntarily to hand back $5,000 of his salary to the public treasury. Surely the comfortably situated and highly paid members of the judiciary are not going to stand by and collect all their salaries while these other contributions are being made. I therefore, appeal to the government to change their policy in this regard and to ask these men to make a similar contribution.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in connection with this resolution. To one who has always been in the ranks of the working class to object to wage reductions is nothing new; as a matter of fact, we have always had to do this regardless of whether times were good or bad. Times were never so good that our masters could afford to give us an increase in wages unless we were able to take it. For that reason, talking against a proposed reduction in wages has possibly become a habit with us. I am not however apologizing for the habit if it shows itself at this particular time. We do not altogether object to a reduction in wages for civil servants. Speaking personally, I have no objection to the reduction in the indemnity of members of parliament, because I realize that we receive very much more than the average person we represent and really I do not think it is a good policy that the representative should have a much higher standard of living or enjoy greater comforts than those he represents. There are many reasons for that.

In opposing the civil service salary cut, we believe possibly no great hardship will be incurred by those who are receiving high salaries, but when we come to those lower paid people, we realize that they cannot accept a cut without a reduction in their standard of living. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), speaking to this resolution, read from one of several letters which he had received stating that this cut was welcomed by many. I have also received numerous letters, just as I presume other members have, and I shall read excerpts from one. This man writes to ask me to use my "voice, vote and influence against a cut in our already low salaries." He says:

> For your information I may state that I am employed at certain work at $80 a month. Five per cent of that salary is deducted for superannuation.

I understand that this bill is going to take care of that, nevertheless the ten per cent cut will take place. He goes on to state how some of this already low salary is used. He says:

> Five dollars a month for car fare, rent $20 a month, association dues and insurance, $1.75 a month, leaving us less than $48 a month for food, clothing, church and lodge dues and other things.

Then he goes on to say:

> We are not living very high even now. The work we do attending sick men requires special training, also demands that we live clean, respectable private lives, so that a 10 per cent cut will put us down to pork and beans and possibly beans without the pork.

This is the situation so far as all these lower paid civil servants are concerned. As I said before, for those who are receiving $3,000 or $4,000 a year, a cut of ten per cent will not mean very much; it will mean they will have to cut out some slight luxuries; but for those lower paid people it will mean they will have to reduce in regard to various essentials of living, and this in a country where we have too much of everything so that we do not know what to do with it.

I should like to point out that when the speech from the throne was read, we were told that conditions in this country were improving. I hope we are not going to get a reduction in salaries or wages, which means a reduction in our standard of living, every time conditions in the country improve. It was also mentioned that all government employees do not come within the scope of this reduction. As those who have spoken before me have pointed out, in this class there are the judges, the mounted police, the military and naval officers and possibly their staffs. It seems to me rather strange; in fact, there is something sinister in the fact that judges, police and military and naval officers should be exempted at a time like this. Is it not just possible that with the ever-decreasing standard of living, with the ever-increasing hardships on the masses of the people, the government had in mind that they would not take kindly to it and it was decided it was necessary to have satisfied judges, satisfied police and satisfied military and naval officers to take care of the situation? Nothing else can be read into this, so far as I am concerned. This man in the letter which I have just read indicates the manner in which this situation has been received by many people.

I have not the figures for the income tax returns for 1931, but I have them from the Canada Year Book for 1929 and 1930. I notice that the number of those receiving incomes of from $30,000 to $50,000 increased from 847 in 1929 to 1,016 in 1930, an increase of over forty-three per cent. I wonder if the Prime Minister had any communications from those people saying that they were willing to sacrifice, in these times of distress, some of their enormous incomes. Not only did the number of those who were receiving $30,000 to $50,000 increase, but the number of those receiving $50,000 increased from 523 in 1929 to 603 in 1930.

I do not wish to take up the time of the house. I just want to add my protest at this time as I realize many others will wish to speak on this question, but I protest against the reduction in the wages and salaries of those who are at the present time, as the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has stated, receiving $1,800 or less per annum.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on some occasions it might have been sufficient if one member from this corner or from the Labour group should have spoken, but on an important matter of this kind I feel every one of us ought to protest to the utmost against any such action on the part of the government. No other proposal brought down by the government quite so fully illustrates the class nature of the government of this country as does this one to cut the civil service salaries as now proposed. It is only the other day that in Great Britain Lord Marley made this statement:

> We have got a bankers' government carrying out a bankers' policy, to meet a bankers' crisis, caused by bankers' mismanagement.

Mr. BENNETT: Lord Morley has been dead a little over ten years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did I say he made the statement? Then I withdraw that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is that statement not to be attributed to the younger Lord Morley who recently made a statement of just that character?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Lord Marley.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, Lord Marley who was the Minister of Air at one time. That is not Lord Morley.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In any case the statement is true.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There seems to be some doubt as to which Lord Marley it is and just when the statement was made, but I am quoting from a review of last year's notable sayings as contained in The Observer, a prominent old country Sunday newspaper, a statement which was reproduced in the Western Producer. I presume therefore that this article before me covers what Lord Marley—not Lord Morley—uttered. It may be of interest to the Prime Minister to know that in this clipping one of his own statements is quoted. Reference is made to the fact that the millionaire Prime Minister of Canada said, "I have always paid my income tax with pleasure."

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is correct, is it?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, we will presume Lord Marley's statement is correct, too.

Mr. BENNETT: I corrected the hon. member by saying that Lord Morley died about ten years ago. Lord Marley is another gentleman, altogether.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was not talking about Lord Morley.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the name you first used.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I said "Lord Marley."

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member may have intended to say that, but he certainly did not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Any hon. member who has, as I have, read a great deal concerning Lord Morley, would not have referred to an utterance by Lord Morley made only last year. I am reading from the statement of Lord Marley, whom I do not know.

The statement before me was taken from a well known English newspaper. I do not think it is quite proper that the Prime Minister of Canada should try to discount my authority; fortunately however I have the clipping before me, and I shall refer to it—I do not care whether it was made by Lord Marley, or by someone else. I quote as follows:

> We have got a bankers' government carrying out a bankers' policy, to meet a bankers' crisis, caused by bankers' mismanagement.

If that is true of any other country, I believe it is preeminently true to-day of Canada because, undoubtedly here the bankers have had a clear road. They have been given a free hand to carry out their policy; no one has interfered in any way. Under our Bank Act they were practically unrestrained, and under our Finance Act they could manipulate as they pleased; so if there is trouble it is their responsibility, and not that of the ordinary people. The present government and, I must confess, the former government also, in their financial policies took the word of the bankers. The ordinary people have not had any voice, and yet when we get into difficulties the ordinary people are made to suffer and the bankers go scotfree.

Previous speakers in this corner of the house have protested against cutting the salaries of those civil servants receiving small amounts. I think it would be well to put on record the salaries received by some of these people. To give this information I quote from a statement prepared by the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, and which, I have no doubt, was received by all members of parliament. It reads in part as follows:

> The salary range of a grade 1 clerk is from $720-$1,020 per annum. An employee in this class, due to receive a statutory increase of $60 is first of all reduced by 10 per cent, or $72, then loses his $60 increase, a total reduction of nearly 17 per cent.
> Canal lightkeepers whose range is $840-$1,200 per year are reduced by 10 per cent, then lose their increase of $60, making a total reduction of $144, or 16 per cent.
> Customs clerks and examiners whose range is $1,200-$1,740 per annum are first reduced by 10 per cent, then lose their increase of $120, a total reduction of $240, or over 18 per cent.
> Customs guards and truckmen whose range is $1,080-$1,500 per year are first reduced by 10 per cent, then lose their increase of $120, a total reduction of $228, or 19 per cent.
> Cleaners and helpers whose range is $900-$1,140 per annum are first reduced by 10 per cent, then lose their increase of $60, making a total reduction of $156, or 15 per cent.
> Postal helpers whose range is $1,020-$1,320 per year are first reduced by 10 per cent, then lose their increase of $120, making a total reduction of $222, or 19·5 per cent.
> Letter carriers whose range is $1,080-$1,500 per annum are first reduced by 10 per cent, then lose their increase of $120, making a total reduction of $228, or 19 per cent.
> Postal clerks whose range is $1,080-$1,740 are in the same circumstances as are letter carriers.

On the other hand, to indicate the range of salaries of the higher paid employees I should like to quote from a return given only a few days ago to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). This return shows that there are 805 employees of the government receiving salaries of $4,000 or over. The article which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Journal of February 25, is as follows:

> The return showed the following in the various classes of $4,000 all over Canada: From $4,000 to $4,900, 537; from $5,000 to $5,900, 126; from $6,000 to $6,900, 72; from $7,000 to $7,900, 22; from $8,000 to $8,900, 10; from $9,000 to $9,900, 14; from $10,000 to $10,900, 12; from $11,000 to $11,900, one; $12,000 and over, 11.
> The return does not take into consideration in all classes of the $9,000 a year salary paid to 18 cabinet ministers and to the $13,500 paid the Prime Minister.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that to make a flat rate reduction of ten per cent is altogether unfair. The percentage one has to pay on his income is not so important as the amount which is left for a man to enjoy after his taxes or reductions are paid. If the same percentage is taken from the lower paid employees the result is, as my colleagues have pointed out, a very great hardship. The Prime Minister pays his income tax with pleasure.

He may accept his cut in salary and will not be worried in the slightest—not in the slightest. He will have plenty of pleasure left. Of course I know he derives his pleasure from his work, but if he took it in other ways there would still be opportunity, even with the amount allowed him by this government, to carry out a fairly normal and full life. That however is not true of the lower paid servants, and it is they we should keep in mind. The treatment accorded to them is manifestly unfair. I would suggest, as I did the other day, that we might very well cut down on some of the expenditures of cabinet ministers. Last year a discussion arose concerning the item of $2,000 per year for cabinet ministers' automobiles. It is very easy to follow the example of the merchants, namely to mark up your goods and then deduct a percentage. The result however is that the price of the goods, even after the deduction of the percentage, is higher than it was before the original alteration was made. It seems to me a similar practice has been in operation in some of our departments. Salaries have been marked up; now they are marked down, but the higher paid are very comfortable even after the marking down has taken place.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has suggested there should be no cut in any salary under $1,800, the amount upon which a family in Canada ought to be able to live decently and with the ordinary amenities of life. I would offer the suggestion however that there should be no cut in any salary under $1,500. In salaries ranging from $1,500 to $3,000 a cut of five per cent could be made; in my opinion that would not be too heavy; then from $3,000 to $4,000 an additional five per cent making a ten per cent cut. Then above $4,000 I would suggest that we might very well make an additional ten per cent cut on each additional $1,000 of salary. I am putting the figures in that way —they are arbitrary of course—because that would leave members of parliament who receive a $4,000 indemnity with their ten per cent cut. So I cannot be in any way accused of lessening the cut of hon. members. But if we made a graded cut along these lines, we would be bringing a little nearer something like equality of sacrifice, although even then if some of these men receiving $6,000, $8,000, $10,000 or $12,000 a year were subjected to a cut of sixty to eighty per cent they would still have a very great deal more left than the people whose salaries it is now proposed to reduce by ten per cent.

I would join with my colleagues in urging that we do not have any exemptions such as are proposed. I would exempt lower paid employees, but I certainly would not exempt the classes it is proposed to exempt—judges, army and navy people and the mounted police. I cannot see any reason for exempting those classes. Take the salaries paid in the Department of National Defence. I have been in fairly close touch with the estimates as presented year by year, but I confess when the newspapers yesterday published the return I was almost staggered when I compared the salaries received by people in the Department of National Defence with those received by people in other departments, for example, agriculture and immigration. In the department of National Defence we have no fewer than one hundred and thirty-nine people receiving between $4,000 and $4,900; thirty people receiving between $5,000 and $5,900; fifteen people receiving between $6,000 and $6,900. I would say that we have here an army of swivel-chair generals—that is about all you can call them. A returned officer called me up only yesterday in regard to this very matter. He said, "I am an ex-soldier, I know what it is to go to the front and all that it involves, but I want to protest against this kind of thing being perpetuated in this Canada of ours." The ordinary members of the militia force have been demobilized, but a great many of the officers have never been demobilized. What do they do? We all know the organization is a rather sketchy one, and it has been boasted that we have a very small force. Yes, we have a comparatively small force so far as privates are concerned, but we have a very large force of officers, and still more proportionately of higher officers. Before long these men are due for retirement, when their pensions will be based on the very high salaries they are now receiving. For the life of me I cannot see why in justice the salaries of these men should be untouched when poor postal workers and others doing constructive work throughout the country have to submit to this very, very heavy cut in their salaries.

I know it may be said that some of these salaries, those of judges and others, are statutory in character. Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see why an act once passed by this house, sometimes under great pressure or influence, should be as the law of the Medes and Persians—unchangeable.

Mr. YOUNG: Our indemnities are statutory.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, and they have been changed. These others are also statutory and might be changed just as readily.

Mr. YOUNG: Are not they all statutory?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was going to point that out. In a very real sense those who receive salaries as members of the civil service are in the same position as judges; their salaries are in a sense statutory, and their increases are statutory. Some of these civil servants, both high and low, gave themselves to the service of the country years ago; a great many of them have rendered faithful service; now, without any consultation, without their being given any chance in any way to make modifications, they are suddenly deprived of the right to their statutory increases and, in addition, have their salaries cut ten per cent. It seems to me if there is any idea of keeping contracts we are bound to keep contracts of this kind. I am not one of those who think a contract should be forever binding. It seems to me, with the variations which take place in our general social arrangements, and especially with the variations which have taken place in recent years in the purchasing power of money, that all contracts should be subject to frequent revision; that is the only fair thing under the circumstances. But I cannot see the slightest reason why anyone should urge that the salaries of particular groups cannot be changed because they are statutory, while those of other groups may be changed at will.

One of the most serious features about these cuts—and I have no doubt it is one of the reasons why they have been made—is the effect on employees outside the civil service. To no small extent this action by the government will be taken as an excuse for employers all over the country to reduce salaries. This is not merely an evil when looked at from the standpoint of the individual employee; more than that it is an aggravation of the disease with which we are now afflicted. The trouble to-day is the lack of purchasing power. I think the residents of the city of Ottawa are being taught a very salutary lesson in economics, because they are learning that this cut in the payroll means so many million dollars less to the local shopkeepers. What is true in local matters is equally true right across the country. If we had an increase in public works, and in salary expenditure it would mean an increase in purchasing power, and it might possibly start the wheels of industry moving again.

I know that looked at from the standpoint of the government in an effort to balance its budget something must be done, and I know the Prime Minister, looking at the matter from the standpoint of his own business, may say: Well, we have to slash; this is the only way we manage to balance our budget in our own private affairs, and we have to do it in our public affairs. I submit there is a fallacy in that statement that should be exposed. It is quite true that economy may be a good thing for me as an individual. But it is equally true that economy practised by a government and on a wholesale scale is to-day a fatal thing, as is recognized by all the leading authorities on economics. A government at a time of crisis, of trade slackness, should stand behind any movement to increase the general purchasing power of the people, it should embark on public works and other undertakings to supplement what is being done by private individuals. That is the only way in which this private competitive system may continue to run, because under this system we have always had these slack periods, and if these slack periods are in any sense to be ironed out, it must be by a central government. But our government is doing precisely the same thing that every private employer is doing—cutting right and left. The economic effect will be disastrous.

But while we are cutting wages, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we ought to remember that there are what have been termed the "wages of capital." These are going scot free. As my colleague suggests, they are going sky high, for after all the decrease in dividends of the big concerns is not very marked. For instance, the decreased percentage paid by the banks is not very substantial; they are keeping well up to their regular average. But it should be remembered also that to-day the purchasing power of the dollar is almost twice what it was a few years ago. I do not think that most people have become quite seized of what that involves. We talk about a man with a $1,000 bond having the right to get his interest. It is said that that is guaranteed. Yes, but his interest on it at 5 or 6 per cent is worth to-day in its purchasing power almost twice what it was at the time the bond was issued.

Mr. MORAND: Does not that apply to labour also?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, certainly it does not.

Mr. MORAND: It is a funny thing if it does not work both ways.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it does not. There is a measure of truth, I concede, in what the hon. member says,—that is in so far as that the cost of living has gone down. I quite admit that.

Mr. MORAND: In direct proportion to the value of the dollar.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: These things do work both ways, but let me point out that while there has been a gradual coming down of the cost of living, it never has dropped for the ordinary people, the working classes, anything like the way it has dropped for the bondholders.

Mr. MORAND: But surely in purchasing power a dollar is worth the same to a bondholder as it is to a workingman.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, because there are different things for which the workingman uses the dollar; there is the difference between wholesale and retail prices, and so on. But there is still another point which I do not think my hon. friend has considered. It has been impossible in the past for the workingmen to push up their wages quickly when the dollar was going up, so there always has been what the economist calls the time lag. Wages were pushed up very slowly. There is an element of truth in the argument that to-day the man who is actually working is proportionately a little better off than he was a year or two ago, but a very large number of people are not working, or are working part time. Even under these relief arrangements men are working on short time, so that the annual income which the average worker is receiving to-day is below what it was a year or two ago.

Mr. MORAND: But you are discussing the question of the men who are working.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not of them alone; I am discussing the larger aspect. But I say that there are men all over this country, as the hon. gentleman who has interrupted knows perfectly well, who are working only three or four days a week, or six or eight months in the year, and in those cases the annual income has dropped. I think he will concede that. He comes from a constituency which contains a large working class.

Mr. MORAND: I know that, but we are discussing men who are working now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We are discussing the entire situation, I quite admit that there is something in the contention that the wages of the man who is working full time are worth more to-day than they were a year or two ago, and to that extent the objection is well taken. But I would point out, for the great majority of big concerns in this country capital is steadily at work. They have had their reserves in times of plenty; they have seen to that, and those reserves generally have been sufficient to tide them over the lean years, so capital has been receiving its return pretty regularly. I know that is not true in the case of the workingmen.

The situation is this: There are two ways of balancing a budget. One is by cutting down expenditures, whether on public works, salaries and wages, or something else, and the other is by putting an additional tax on those who are most able to pay it.

Mr. MORAND: Would it increase the purchasing power of the country if the income tax were increased, interest rates reduced, and so on?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, certainly it would. Supposing our expenditures this year were the same as last year. That would mean that the employees who are being turned off to-day would be still in receipt of salaries; it would mean that the various public works would be proceeded with, and that much more purchasing power would be distributed.

Mr. YOUNG: Where would this purchasing power come from?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For the moment I am speaking of the balancing of a budget, and I would repeat that there are two ways in which the Prime Minister could balance his budget. One is by cutting down; the other is by increasing the taxes on certain individuals who can pay. I am speaking now only of the balancing of the budget, and the Prime Minister has chosen the first method, that of cutting. He may be able to balance his budget in that way. I would suggest that there might have been another way of balancing it, and that is by a very heavily graded income tax, or a special tax on our bonds. There is no reason why we should not tax our bonds to-day.

Coming back to the consideration I advanced a few minutes ago, I would say that if we cut the value of the bonds in two it would not be unfair; that is, a man having a $1,000 bond could be given $500 in exchange; in view of the purchasing power of the dollar that would not be unfair. But altogether aside from the change in the value of the dollar I would say there is no valid reason why we should not put a tax of two per cent, three per cent or five per cent on our bonds, and if we did that it would enable us—

Mr. BENNETT: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question in order to be sure I followed him. Did I understand him to say that the man who had saved $1,000, took it out of the savings bank and bought a bond with it should be given a $500 bond in exchange, and that this would be just and right?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the Prime Minister had been following my argument—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In any case I shall gladly go over it again.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not that what my hon. friend said?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Going back for a moment, this is what I said: When a great many of these government bonds were issued the value of the dollar was very different from the value of the dollar to-day. I think the Prime Minister will admit that. So, that being the case, those bonds are worth roughly speaking twice as much to-day as they were at the time of issue. I think that is true also. Then I would say it would be no great hardship if the value of those bonds should be cut in two.

I would say this to the Prime Minister: There is no doubt that to do this would work considerable individual hardship, because possibly a man might have gone to a bank yesterday and bought a bond; so that in view of that possible hardship which might be involved in any scheme of that nature I think a better way would be an increased tax on income. That would be fairer all around.

Still another method might be adopted. I am not sure that I agree altogether with my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote), but I am inclined to think that a very considerable measure of inflation might be an even fairer thing than the income tax. Leaving aside the question of its ultimate economic effects, I think perhaps a measure of inflation would be the fairest way all round, since that would allow those people who have money to-day to get the real value of that money and not a fictitious value.

Let me come back for a moment to where I was when the Prime Minister interjected his question. It seems to me that to-day we should levy our taxes upon those who have money. They are enjoying their wealth because of privileges of some kind or another, and because of the protection of the state. It has been said that if we had not had the war we would have had no wealth in this country. Those people have enjoyed whatever benefit there has come from the war, though I believe it has been precious little. They are enjoying all the protection of ordered government; in a great many cases they are enjoying special legislation which has enabled them to make money. When it comes to a time like this why should they not be taxed? I say that would be the only fair thing to do, tax them. So far, however, the Prime Minister has shown no indication of adopting such a course.

In one of the newspapers someone has figured out that by this proposal to reduce salaries the government will save between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000. This is not a very large amount when it is considered that in a great many cases it will result in much hardship. Someone has also suggested that a very small tax, even two per cent or three per cent, on bonds along the lines I have indicated would bring in something like $50,000,000. It would mean a great deal more than the saving effected by this proposed cut, but the Prime Minister refuses to take this way of balancing his budget. The situation is not unlike that which prevailed a few weeks ago in Great Britain, when it was stated that the only way to balance the budget was to make reductions in the unemployment insurance and in other directions.

I am hoping that from coast to coast across this country there will come a protest against the sort of treatment being accorded the common people of Canada.

As I said at the beginning, we have never had placed before us, legislation so clearly in the interest of a class as that brought down by the present government. The Prime Minister would object to individuals advocating what is called class war, setting one class against another, and I would suggest that actions such as this are doing far more to set one class against another than all the soap box speakers that could be stationed from Vancouver to Halifax.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Certainly, because such legislation reveals what is really meant when there is talk of "equality of sacrifice," and that everyone should take his cut and keep smiling. We know that in reality such talk is the meanest kind of subterfuge to cover up inequality and to try to becloud the minds of ordinary honest people as to what is being done. I hope that even at this stage the house will take some steps to protest very decidedly against this sort of thing. I should hope that some members opposite, particularly those who come from working class constituencies, and who must realize what their own people are thinking about, will venture from their vantage ground to protest very vigorously—I would say, to the point of resigning rather than to acquiesce in a dictatorial policy of this kind being put over the country.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): At this stage of the prospective bill I shall have to reserve my remarks in regard to the details of the measure until the bill itself is before the house. All that appears before us is the resolution, and in my opinion, so far as it affects the civil service, it is utterly bad. I make that statement without any reservation and I will give my reasons very shortly.

In the first place, you cannot possibly impose a straight flat rate of reduction like ten per cent, or any other percentage for that matter, on all civil servants regardless of whether they get $1,000 or $20,000. It is utterly unfair; I have never heard of such a proposal either in war time or in peace time. Why impose it now? It is said that the ship of state is in danger. Well, are you going to cripple the crew numerically or degrade it in any way if you want to save the ship? Yet that is what is being done by this resolution at this critical time in the history of the country. Would not the government be better employed strengthening instead of weakening the civil service as they are doing in this proposed legislation?

I have another protest against the resolution and that is that it is intended as a mere sop to those of the civil service who receive salaries of less than $1,200 a year; it is offered them as a means of making them satisfied with a ten per cent reduction. They are supposed to feel that it is all right because they will get half of it back. But do all of them get it back? From inquiries I have been able to make, inquiries not yet fully complete, about two of them will get the five per cent back for every one who will suffer the full ten per cent reduction. The fact is, many are not eligible for the superannuation subsidy which is proposed in this resolution because they are not insured. Now, what is the sense of giving them something with one hand and taking it back with the other? Why not start off with a small cut and graduate the reduction as applying to the service generally? Instead of doing that the government are merely pretending to give with one hand while they are taking away with the other. I object to this most strenuously. As I say, it is merely a sop, a safety sop intended to save the face of the government in introducing a proposal for a straight flat reduction of ten per cent that cannot be defended by any body of representatives such as this.

May I refer to one class of men who will suffer very severely by this cut. I have in mind that class dealt with in the report of the Beatty commission. They are a class of men for whom possibly, at this particular time, it is not popular to appeal, because they are getting fair salaries. Nevertheless for decades now the technical men in the civil service of Canada have been at a disadvantage; they have not received justice in the matter of salaries. During the years 1928 and 1929 we were losing many of them because government salaries were below those paid outside. It was therefore decided by the government of that day to appoint a commission to inquire into the merits of the question, and an interim report of that commission, the Beatty commission, was submitted, recommending an increase in the salaries of a certain number of these civil servants to go into force immediately. This went into instant effect—I refer to the technical men in the research council. That branch of the government service was being newly organized by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), who was anxious to have them paid such salaries as would attract the best qualified men in the country. Consequently they got the increase recommended by the commission. Another large body was recommended for an increase, but for reasons which I need not go into, and because of the incompleteness of the investigations that have taken place since the present government came into power, nothing further has been done so far as they are concerned. These are technical men who have been devoting their lives to the service of the country. Now, I ask, why reduce the morale of such a splendid and important branch of the civil service? These men—I believe there are about 2,500 of them—have not only had their proposed increase suspended during the last two years but now they are being asked to submit to a further cut, as though they had not suffered enough already.

This reduction is utterly unfair all along the line to these classes I have mentioned. I do not like the whole thing a little bit; it is unjust and, so far as I know, entirely unheard of. But there is another aspect of the matter. If the government intended to bring about this reduction with the least possible upheaval in the country, why did they not treat the civil service just as the railway employees were treated some two months ago? Those employees had the right to appear before certain tribunals and have their case argued by competent men, and after discussing the pros and cons they agreed to a ten per cent cut. Have not the vast number of men and women employed by the government of the country a right to be treated with equal justice and courtesy? Of all the civil service organizations in Canada, until to-day not one of them, so far as we learn from the newspaper reports, has been consulted or been encouraged to consult with the government. If this government realized the value of these organized bodies the first thing they would have thought of was consultation with them; they would have said, "Let us take counsel with these men who are being affected." The first thought that would have occurred to myself would have been this: What effect will this have on the state itself? Forgetting the civil service for the moment, can we afford at this time to weaken the ship of state by this action? And the next question I would have asked myself would have been this: Should we not treat these competent public servants, who are vitally interested in the proposed reduction of their salaries, courteously by consulting with them? How can this reduction be made to bear upon them with the least hardship? That is what the government would have asked itself if it had a heart at all, but it looks to me as if they have nothing but a gizzard where the heart should be, in dealing with the civil servants. Why could they not have put themselves in the places of these men and women whose salaries are being reduced? Take that body of men to whom I have referred, those civil servants for whom increases were recommended by the Beatty commission and who have been waiting patiently for the turn of the tide which would justify their receiving those increases. What is their position? Insult has been added to injury, by withholding the statutory increases and, on top of that, to impose this ten per cent reduction. I feel sure that if they had been brought into the councils of the government and had talked the matter over with them, as human beings had a right to expect, the whole question could have been amicably settled, and the government itself would not have been placed in such an objectionable and invidious position as it is to-day, trying to defend this flat rate cut which is entirely indefensible even with the five per cent sop, because it does not apply to at least one-third of those who receive salaries under $1,200 and to none at all over that amount. This superannuation proposition I repeat does not mean a thing to that vast body of civil servants receiving over $1,200 per year.

There does not seem to be a redeeming feature in this resolution, and if the bill is as bad as the resolution, I intend to oppose it, even though I stand alone. If the bill is anything like its forerunner, a great injustice will be inflicted upon the civil service of Canada.

I think I have said enough to indicate that I do not approve of the manner in which this cut is being made, and I do not think there is one hon. member who really believes in the flat rate of ten per cent, whether the salary received is $1,000 or $20,000. I had the opportunity the other day of meeting some of the letter carriers, and they tell me that rents in Ottawa have not gone down. I hold no particular brief for these men, but I happen to know some of them. My own experience in Ottawa is to the same effect as to rents, and I think this fact is confirmed by the figures given to-day by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). The price of cheap clothing has been reduced slightly, but taxes have not gone down.

Mr. SANDERSON: Butter has gone down.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, butter and other farm products have gone down, but that does not compensate these men for the loss of their salary ranges.

It seems to me that this government has a wonderful faculty of going about a thing in the wrong way. Take the conference in London, it went at that hind end foremost. Take the proposed reduction in the income tax schedules last session; there again they blundered so badly that they were forced to back away so quickly from themselves as to wear out their breeching straps. If it was not for pride, they would also, I believe, back away from the stand they take on this flat rate salary cut.

The Prime Minister apparently enjoyed seeing his name on the cheques which went out to the farmers in payment of the five cent bonus on wheat, and I wonder if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) is going to enjoy seeing his name on these superannuation cheques—I fancy not.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the house at this stage, but will wait until the bill is presented for second reading. I should like however to appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to reconsider this matter before the bill is introduced and endeavour to mete out some measure of justice in the application of its provision. Namely some grading in the deductions. Before taking any further part in the discussion, I should like an opportunity of reading the memorandum which has been submitted to the Prime Minister by the civil service. I had nothing to do with the preparation of this document; I have not seen anyone who was directly or indirectly connected with its preparation; and I saw it for the first time when a copy was handed to me this afternoon by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). I am sure the terms of this memorandum must be quite fair and I should think the Prime Minister and the government ought to consider the representations made before introducing the bill with a view of more equitably dividing the burden. I speak dispassionately in the matter as I have in all others, and it is with the utmost sincerity that I ask the Prime Minister to give to the representations submitted to him to-day the most humane consideration.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations on the resolution before the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. member that the resolution itself is not before the house; the motion is that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee to consider the resolution.

Mr. McINTOSH: Well then, on whatever is before the house. I will deal first with the remarks made this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). He tells us in an informative way that there is a sharp division of public opinion in regard to the policy of the government on this matter. I believe the right hon. gentleman is right in making that statement as I have no doubt there would be a sharp division of public opinion if this action had been taken in the days of prosperity rather than to-day. In order to clinch his argument the right hon. gentleman read a letter, but I fail to see why he should read only one letter. If any conclusion is to be based upon the letters received by the government, we should have them all.

So far as the policy of the government in making this ten per cent cut is concerned, I believe I am voicing the sentiments of hon. members on both sides of the house when I say that the membership of this house is quite willing to accept the cut. We stand on solid ground in that respect, but I believe the government has started in the wrong way—it has started to work from the bottom up rather than from the top down. That is the usual action of the present government, it does things in a wrong way. We have been told that there are three qualities in every human individual, that he is a kind of triangle, as it were. First, he has intellect which gives him vision and enables him to have some objective in life; second, he has sentiment to give him a little fire and a little sympathy and, third, he has an executive side to his nature which enables him to work out his objective in life.

Mr. SANDERSON: What about vanity?

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member asks me what about the vanity of the individual. I would say there is a goodly display of that at times in this chamber. In this instance, it appears to me that the government has the wrong objective and there does not appear to be any sentiment, any fire or any sympathy in the makeup of the government, or it would not have done what it has done. As far as an effort to attain something is concerned, they are leaning upon the civil service for help in the working out of their policy.

Instead of cutting the salaries of civil servants by ten per cent; instead of dealing with men who have not a living wage; instead of handling in anything but a sympathetic way men who are receiving $1,500 or $1,600 or $2,000 a year, why not, when you are going out gunning, go after the millionaires and the multimillionaires? Why not have a capital levy in this country if we need $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 to balance the budget as we do? I think the Canadian people realize why we need money to balance the budget to-day. The reason is that the fiscal policy of the present administration has been a bungle; that we are in the hole financially and that we must now ask the civil servants to come through with a cut of ten per cent to help balance the budget by giving a total of $8,000,000 or $10,000,000. Why not go after the millionaires who have unproductive capital, who are not using this money in a productive way, and get your $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 or $100,000,000? Why not go out after the big fellows who have the money and who are not using it to build up Canada as they might, rather than after the men who are receiving a small salary, who have not had their statutory increases during the last year and who have on their hands obligations which they must meet? I would think there is an avenue there along which we might profitably go in order to get all the money we want. More than that, we would be asking the men who can pay to put up their money. If the men who have their money in unproductive channels to-day and who love Canada and are patriotic will not come forward and put up their money, why demand of the civil servants to be so wonderfully patriotic? If they are patriotic in this respect, should we not look for greater patriotism from those in high circles? I should think we would.

Furthermore, the Prime Minister tells us that to save the economic structure of Canada we must have a ten per cent cut in the salaries of civil servants over $1,200 a year. I do not think so. I think the economic structure of Canada would be just as strong without this ten per cent cut as with it. Moreover, I believe there are other ways of strengthening our economic structure. One weakness in our economic structure to-day is that we have a wrong tariff policy. I believe we have a tariff policy that has helped to make the world condition what it is. There is no use in trying to save the government of the day by talking about world conditions. It cannot be done, because the government of Canada for the last two years has been helping to make those world conditions—to make them what they actually are. One way to strengthen the economic structure of Canada would be to put into effect a brand new tariff policy, to remove the high protection that we have at the present time and to give the country a breathing space in a commercial way, in a trading way, thereby helping to balance our budget by developing and building up international trade.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE ACT

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) moved the third reading of Bill No. 17, to amend the Marriage and Divorce Act.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): I wish to ask the sponsor of the bill if it is true that we are now going a step in advance of the law in England with regard to marriage and divorce. Under section 2 of this bill a marriage is not invalid merely because the woman is a sister of a deceased wife of the man, or a daughter of a sister or brother of a deceased wife of the man. Section 3 adds the words "or sister of a deceased husband of the woman." It seems to me that this bill goes farther than it should go. It is only a few years since the marriage by the husband of a deceased wife with a sister of that deceased wife was prohibited. This bill goes practically to the extent of permitting marriage with either a nephew or a niece of a brother or sister of a deceased wife. That is much farther than the law of England now goes, and I can see no reason why we should go so much farther than they have gone.

I refer my hon. friend the promoter of this bill to what has taken place in England. In 1919 the case re Phillips was tested, and was reported in 1 Chancery at page 128. This case does not validate or declare valid a marriage with a deceased wife's sister's daughter. Then, the law in England was amended, and the Deceased Brother's Widow's Marriage Act was passed there in 1921, two years after the decision in the Phillips case, and there is no mention made of the permission now given to the marriage of the nephew or niece of the brother or sister. I think we are going entirely too far; I know of no reason why the law should be extended in this way, and I want to voice my opposition to the bill as it now stands.

Mr. BURY: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for West Middlesex is not quite correct. I did not expect opposition to the bill at this stage or I should have had full information on the English law on the point, which in fact I have in my room. My recollection is however that there is an amendment to the marriage law in England later than the one to which my hon. friend has referred, and that in point of fact so far as the man is concerned the marriage law of England now extends the validity of the marriage much farther than my hon. friend believes. The last amendment to the marriage law of England gives a list of the parties with whom the widower may contract a marriage. The bill before us is much less extreme, if I may use the term, than the provisions of the English law.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend say that the law of England now permits a marriage with the daughter or son of a brother of a deceased wife?

Mr. BURY: I was referring to my hon. friend's objection concerning section 2. I have not my notes in front of me, but my recollection is quite clear—because I looked into the matter a few days ago—that the law of England so far as the man is concerned goes much farther than does this proposed amendment, and includes the provision contained in this bill.

As to the extension of the marriage law of England in relation to a woman, I am not prepared to say that the law goes any farther than this proposal; in fact so far as the woman is concerned, I am not prepared to say that it goes as far. As I have indicated, the extension to the man, curiously enough, is much greater than that contained in the proposed amendment.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED DEDUCTION OF TEN PER CENT IN INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bennett that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution.

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize deductions of ten per cent from the amounts of certain salaries or other compensations or indemnities payable by the government of Canada during the fiscal year 1932-33.

And to provide for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of all current contributions payable under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act in respect of the salaries payable during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933, of all employees who receive not more than one thousand two hundred dollars per annum.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, continuing the observations I was making before recess may I just touch again upon the point raised by the Prime Minister that there was a sharp division of public opinion throughout Canada concerning the policy the government initiated in connection with the ten per cent cut in the salaries of the civil servants.

Mr. BENNETT: I said within the membership of the service itself.

Mr. McINTOSH: I accept the Prime Minister's statement—within the ambit of the civil service of Canada. I observed that to cut five per cent or ten per cent from salaries of $1,200 and under, or above $1,200, was in my opinion a very weak way to get $8,000,000 or $10,000,000, and thereby square the budget. I emphasized the fact that the government in its efforts to balance the budget was beginning from the bottom up rather than from the top down, and I ventured the opinion that when the government was out gunning to get money to square the budget they would have done well to have the courage of their convictions and extend some sympathy towards civil servants who are not getting any more than a living wage; that they ought to have possessed the executive ability to take action the very opposite to that which they did take, and to tap the bigger sources of wealth, to go after the multi-millionaires, the millionaires, the half millionaires, the quarter millionaires and the other fractional millionaires to get the $8,000,0000 or $10,000,000 to square their budget.

If it is fair to cut salaries of civil servants five or ten per cent and to ask them to take such a cut patriotically and in good nature, then I should say that those with the capacity to pay should receive their obligations proportionately patriotically, and be possessed of the same fine Canadian spirit to come forward and give the best financially within their power to overcome the emergency in Canada, their native land. I do not care what they have done in Great Britain or in the United States; we are looking after our own business, and it is not what they have done across the line or across the ocean that counts, it is what we ought to do as Canadians to be fair to our fellow Canadians, who perhaps are not earning sufficient salary to look after their family obligations. In a matter of this kind it is very important to build our superstructure on a solid foundation. I would go further—perhaps the Prime Minister himself and some of the members of his cabinet might set the pace financially to square away the budget; the Prime Minister contributing a million and other members accordingly; and while they are about it they might induce eight or ten other men of affluence to contribute $1,000,000 apiece. These contributions would be more than ample to render unnecessary the desperate economies that are being effected at the expense of our civil servants in order to balance the budget for 1932. All the government needs in order to get money from such sources is vision, courage and sympathy—sympathy with the great body of our people who are passing through such difficult times.

When touching on the question of the economic structure of Canada, I stated that I did not believe the political sovereignty or the economic integrity of the dominion depended upon any five or ten per cent cut in the salaries of our civil servants. We have to get beyond this paltry idea of penalizing the civil service in this manner and making out that we are wonderful fellows. We know the inevitable result of this policy will be that every school teacher, every clerical worker, every industrial employee throughout the country will suffer to a certain extent. Salaries have been cut already by private employers, and they will be cut still further by the course the government is now taking. This will have a very serious effect upon the buying power of the nation at large, an effect so serious that it confirms me in my view that the government should have sought such means to balance their budget as would not impair the purchasing power of our people.

I think one of the most effective ways to strengthen our economic structure would be immediately to pull down some of these towering tariff walls, these retaliatory and provocative hindrances to trade that have been built up by this government during the last few years. They began their work at the special session of 1930. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if this vast dominion is to become a united nation from ocean to ocean, this can be assured only by a moderate tariff policy. I am not opposed to a moderate tariff policy. In fact I am ready to go to any place in the dominion and take my stand on a moderate tariff policy. Both as a Canadian and a westerner I am strongly opposed to any policy that will restrict trade to such a degree as to cut in two our volume of imports and exports within a couple of years. But notwithstanding the fiscal blunders of this government, I am not a bit alarmed about our economic structure. I do not believe it is about to fail—I have more faith in my country. Neither do I believe that if we do not make this cut in civil service salaries the country will go to the bow-wows—not by any means.

Besides tearing down these towering tariff walls, these insulting tariff walls—may I say? —I would go a step further. We could get money to the amount necessary to balance the budget by increasing our income taxation, by going after the men in the enjoyment of large incomes. Graduate the income tax sharply enough to get the money from those who can afford to pay it, and so scale it down that the rate of tax will bear a proper relationship to the smaller incomes.

I agree with the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) in his statement that the method of procedure adopted to reduce civil service salaries by ten per cent is an arbitrary method. The government did not proceed in a dignified way, in a way that one would expect the government of Canada to proceed. I think the first step in a policy of this kind should have been a conference between the cabinet and the representatives of the civil service federation, and at such conference I am confident that a mutually satisfactory arrangement by discussing, conferring and concluding, could have been arrived at as a basis for introducing legislation. This course would have been somewhat along the lines of the provisions of a bill introduced into this house in 1928 by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). It was known as Bill No. 4. It was discussed in the house and then referred to the industrial and international relations committee, of which I had then the honour to be chairman. We took evidence under oath, and it was the consensus of opinion in the committee that there should be further discussion in regard to the constitution of such a council with a view to the establishment of a national civil service council. The then Liberal government was in favour of such a council, and once the necessary preliminary work had been done such a body could have been established by order in council. The committee so reported and thereupon the hon. member withdrew his bill. The committee also recommended that a committee should be established composed of equal representatives of the government, of departmental heads and of representatives of the civil service association, at which any grievances could be discussed and disposed of in a friendly way in the interests of Canada as a whole. It was further recommended that a drafting committee should be established to draw up a constitution of such a council for submission to the governor general in council. After the governor in council approved of that constitution all that would be necessary would be an order in council, and the foundation would be laid for a national civil service council representing all the civil servants of Canada, and if necessary further consultative machinery could be added in order to broaden out the council and make it representative of the civil servants from coast to coast.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that practically all that work was done. The committee was set up; a drafting committee was organized; the constitution was evolved and the necessary order in council was passed, but beyond that nothing happened. In other words the present government did not create a national civil service council, and as a consequence other than the federation which met the government this morning there was no outstanding body representing the civil servants of Canada to meet the government and have this matter gone into thoroughly.

Had that body been set up I think there is no question but that it would have had the right in a matter of this kind to ask for an audience with the cabinet, and that audience could have been held long before the bill was decided upon, long before a resolution was brought into this house, and long before any arbitrary action was taken by the government. Since that was not done, as a member of this house I felt it incumbent upon me to rise in my place and say that I believed the time had arrived when that machinery should be established. Then the right would be guaranteed the civil servants of Canada, in any important question of this kind, to hold an audience with the cabinet and go into the matter of salaries or anything else in a practical and considerate manner.

That concludes my remarks in connection with this resolution; anything further I have to say I will reserve until the bill is in committee. I think, from the discussion we have had up to the present, that we may look for a frank and full consideration of this question in order that the people of this country may know exactly what are the intentions of the government in respect to this salary-cutting legislation.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I desire to detain the house only a very few moments in connection with this resolution. At the outset I should like to say to those who have spent their lives in efforts to improve the conditions of working men and women and to provide employment for them, a reduction of wage rates or of salaries is never a pleasant thing, or a move in which we like to participate. But in relation to the situation with which we are faced today, representing as I do a constituency composed entirely of working men and farmers, I should like to say that in my judgment nothing this government has done or can do will receive greater commendation throughout the country than the action they are taking in reducing the salaries of all public servants, who must be paid from money contributed by the working men and the farmers of this country.

I have a picture before me of the men and women in the constituency I represent, railway employees, men working in lumber camps and in mines, and farmers throughout the scattered parts of the district. These men are harassed every day of their lives, because of conditions at present prevailing, to meet their tax bills; and after all these are the people who must pay taxes. A great deal has been said about starting at the top, taxing the large incomes, taking away the money from those who have it. I should like to say to the house, from the slight knowledge I have of general business conditions throughout this country, that the income tax receipts will be very much less in the year ahead of us, and in the year following, than they have been in the past. The higher you endeavour to put the income tax the less you will get from it, because the men who are presumed to have these large incomes in many cases are not earning incomes at all. There is no class of men in this country who are finding it more difficult to meet the situation than those who are presumed to be the wealthy men, responsible for endeavouring to carry on industry in this country.

Let me return for a moment to the people whom I represent, the farmers in nor'hern Ontario who are struggling every day and every night to meet the situation with which they are confronted. They are forced to pay their proportion of the taxes out of which the salaries of all civil servants in this country are paid. The workingmen are in the same position, and when I go back to my constituency, as I am going to-night and meet these workingmen face to face, I know exactly what will be their viewpoint. Already they have been forced to accept very severe cuts in their wages; it could not be otherwise. Hon. members speak as though a business man, an employer of labour, can fix his rates of wages high or low, just as he chooses; they seem to think that the farmer who must go out and employ labour on his farm can do the same thing. It matters not which it is; they can pay their employees only what they receive for the goods they are producing, and they cannot pay more. For example how will the Canadian National Railway pay its income tax during 1932 and 1933? Where is it going to get the money with which to pay the salaries and wages that must be paid? The rates of wages have been cut, and how could it be otherwise? The only alternative would have been to add to the taxes of this country; that is exactly what it involved. Let me repeat that no one likes to see salaries reduced. I am one of those anxious to see working men and women get the highest rate of remuneration it is possible for them to receive, but we are faced with a situation which makes that impossible. Where are we to get the money for them?

Something has been said about reducing the interest rates on government bonds held in Canada. An hon. member of this house undertook this afternoon to prove that a widow, if you like, who is receiving an income from bonds which she purchased from the proceeds of an insurance policy, could buy more goods with each dollar she received from that source than a workingman could buy with the dollar he received for working in a factory, a mine, the woods or anywhere else. A more ridiculous proposition could not be suggested. Let me ask this: From whom would this money be taken if we repudiated fifty per cent of the interest on government bonds held in Canada? I think I have sound reason for saying that the great majority of these bonds is held by workingmen, widows, institutions taking care of small estates, and so on. I will give the house one illustration. I live in a community in which every citizen is a workingman. When the recent national service loan was floated, in the aggregate that small community took up something over $250,000 worth of those bonds. I took the trouble to find out who were the people who purchased those bonds. They were working people who had lived frugal lives, building up a small reserve which would care for them in their old age, or which they could pass on to their widows and children, or with which to assist in the education of their children, if you will, as someone mentioned this evening. Unpleasant though it is to see salaries reduced, and anxious as every right thinking man is to see business and general conditions brought back to the place where salaries can be again increased, I repeat what I said at the beginning, that in the interests of the people of this country nothing that this government has done, has created or can create a better feeling than the action of the administration and of the parliament of Canada in reducing our own incomes and the incomes of all those who are paid to serve the people of the dominion. The discussion that has taken place would suggest to one that the civil service of Canada was in a sort of holy of holies which the ordinary man dared not enter. I have the highest regard for the men and women who serve the country, but they are just men and women like all the rest of us, and they have a right to be called upon to make some of the sacrifices which other men and women in the country are making.

I should just like to refer to a remark made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon in discussing this matter when he took the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to task for giving notice of a resolution extending the time within which the federal government will assist in taking care of the unemployed from March 31 to May 31. He charged the government with failure to anticipate, when the relief measure was originally introduced at the last session of parliament, that it would be necessary to extend it that period of time. If I recall the debate that took place in this house, this was the position taken: that the grant made at the last session of parliament should extend only until parliament at this session should have had time to review the situation and to see what was necessary. It is because the people of Canada have a government administering their affairs who have courage to meet these situations as they arise that they have confidence in them. And may I say here that when I go home to-morrow, as I am going, and pass through the region of northern Ontario where tens of thousands of men are employed who could not otherwise be working, the very fact that this government is making that extension will be the best bit of news these men have had for some months, and they will realize that the government is continuing to assist them to secure the means of ordinary livelihood, meeting in part the necessary taxation through a reduction in the salaries of civil servants, until conditions are such that they will once more be engaged in normal and regular employment.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. gentleman this question? When he returns to his constituents will he deliver to them the same speech he delivered to them before the elections of 1926 on civil service matters?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just exactly the same, and if it will please my hon. friend let me say here that if an opportunity is presented I shall be very glad to deliver the same speech in the presence, if he will guarantee it, of his own leader.

Mr. RALSTON: To show your high regard for the civil service.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, and no man in this country has a higher regard for the civil service.

Mr. RALSTON: You have changed your mind.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have not changed my mind, no. I will repeat word for word what I am presumed to have said with regard to the civil service on condition that hon. gentlemen have their leader in his seat.

Mr. RALSTON: You want an audience.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I have just a few words to say on this question and I shall say them very calmly, because there is nothing on my conscience that worries me. Let me assure the house at once that, in discussing this important question, I am not talking petty politics. I have been sent here by my constituents to express their views on the policies put forward by the government, and from time immemorial it has been the right of the people's representatives to discuss such policies freely. I do not regard any measure brought forward by this government as sacred or tabou, as we say in French, so that no one can venture to discuss it. I have the greatest respect for the members of the government, but merely because a measure is introduced by any member of the government it does not follow that we should kneel before that measure and say, "sacred, sacred; this is sacred and no one shall touch it or discuss it." That is going pretty far, and as I have been brought up in a family that has been in this country for many generations, a family that knows what freedom is, I intend to exercise that freedom as I have done all my life. No one, therefore, will prevent me from saying just what I think of the resolution which is now before the house.

I would not object to the cut, although I am not a rich man, for I am a good enough sport to take it as cheerfully as anyone else; but I do not consider that it is a national duty to accept all the enactments of this government without protest, and to kneel down before them in silence with our arms crossed in perfect submission. I do not see why we should be expected to accept their dictates meekly simply because they tell us it is a national duty to do so. To many of us who are in this house, it is not a glory but rather an embarrassment to have to speak, but it is a duty which we are bound to discharge; and when we pay our debts there is no triumph in it but just satisfaction. So that there is a great difference between glory and ordinary duty. That brings me to the source of the present evil.

I am not going to censure the government to-night for any promises made during the last election, but after that election they tried an experiment, as they had a right to do. They had the support of the country in the election and one of the articles of their platform was an undertaking to protect everyone by increasing the tariff. They were free to give that undertaking and the people were free to support them in it, and I believe it was only fair for them, when the special session was called, to increase the tariff. When the question was put by Mr. Speaker at the time there were some hon. members who said —although this was not recorded in the journals of the house—"carried on division," and one of those who said this, as witnessed by the correspondent of Le Devoir, of Montreal, in large letters, was the humble representative of the county of Témiscouata. I took that view because at that time I did not believe that a high tariff was the panacea for all the ills of this country. At any rate, the government saw fit to try that experiment and increased the tariff. I quote from Hansard the words of the Prime Minister on moving the motion for supply on September 16, 1930, at page 238:

> Our tariff measure is not a general revision of the tariff, but deals only with such items in the tariff as it is believed will ensure additional employment to a large number of men and women in Canada.

The end in view was good; the intention was commendable; but the result was bad. It is not my fault; it was an experiment which it was thought would succeed but which did not. And now we have to take things as they are. That is why I say that when we are discussing the present situation we must go to the source of the evil, because you must get to the root of a disease before you can cure it. We are in trouble at the present time, and I admit that other countries are in trouble too. Whoever has eyes to see can see that it is general, is repeated daily. Evils have existed in this country for some time, but they are growing still worse.

In replying this morning to the delegation which interviewed him, the Prime Minister said:

> We are making the cut as a matter of national necessity—

The word "national" should have been dropped, although the word "necessity" is all right. The remarks continue:

> —and we do not think it unreasonable to ask the loyal—

"Loyal" is a little too strong.

> —and enthusiastic support of 60,000 of our fellow citizens to cooperate with us in helping Canada to weather the storm by a year of self denial.

When is anyone enthusiastic about self denial? I read that phrase with the greatest astonishment, and I will read it again. It is as follows:

> We do not think it unreasonable—

I think it is unreasonable.

> —to ask the loyal and enthusiastic support of 60,000 of our fellow citizens—

Who are to suffer the cut.

> —to cooperate with us in helping Canada to weather the storm by a year of self denial.

They are being asked to be enthusiastic in helping Canada out of the hole. They are asked not only to wave the flag but to be enthusiastic about helping the country to weather the storm. These storms do not come with the tide, they come from the high heavens probably as punishment for our sins.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Did the hon. member say that tariffs came from heaven?

Mr. POULIOT: I was trying to show the difference, but let me say that tariffs are very high up. The Prime Minister asked 60,000 civil servants to give a year of self denial. If that is done, no doubt Canada will be headed for heaven. The Prime Minister's remarks continue:

> There is no doubt that the civil service is greatly overmanned in this community and that at a not distant date there must be a reduction.

Neither I nor any other hon. member in this house is able to say whether or not the civil service is overmanned. How the reduction he suggests is to be made will be the subject of an investigation, but why decide that the service is overmanned before the investigation is held? After the investigation has been held and everything has been considered, then will be the time to consider whether or not the service is overmanned, but not before that.

At times I poke a little fun at hon. members on the other side; I give them knocks and receive many in return, but it is all part of the game. It is all a matter of sportsmanship, and I hope no one will be hurt by my speaking as freely as I do. The right hon. gentleman's remarks continue:

> From communications the government has received from former civil servants I am of the opinion that a reasonable reduction can be made without impairing the efficiency of the service.

I had thought that the government would be too serious-minded to pay much attention to reports which might come from former civil servants who perhaps had been dismissed for good reason. Such people are not the most reliable source of information as to the real situation which exists in the service.

The Prime Minister stated that the employees of the Canadian National Railways would not be affected by the proposed cut. This is only fair, because these men, through the brotherhood, have already agreed to a ten per cent cut to be effective from some time last year, and similar action was taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway employees. When they have already suffered a cut in their salaries it would be very unjust to impose another reduction.

I would like to see this government follow Mahatma Ghandi's example and set aside one day each week as a day of silence. Then they could concentrate, they could think over what is to be done, they could withdraw within themselves in order to have a clear understanding of the policies to be submitted later to the house.

An hon. MEMBER: What about his goat?

Mr. POULIOT: Since a cut is to be made, perhaps we can dispense with the goat.

This cut is being accepted quite willingly by the civil service, but not with any enthusiasm. It is done as a matter of sportsmanship and in the hope that future policies of the government will be taken as a matter of course and not as mere emanations from the Divinity. As my leader said one day in Quebec, we are all equal; the Prime Minister in the House of Commons is the first among equals. We do our best in our own way and according to our own principles to promote the welfare of this country and I give hon. gentlemen opposite credit for doing all they can in that regard. But there is one way in which the public business could be much better conducted, and it is this: instead of bringing up a matter of national duty and importance and asking us to vote this or that right away, we should be given time enough to consider properly all the proposals that are submitted to us. There would be nothing better for the government than to submit their proposals to the house in time to afford the opposition an opportunity to offer their humble suggestions. Then the government could accept or reject those proposals. So long as they are in power they have the responsibility for the management of the business of the country, but it is the duty of the opposition to offer constructive criticism and this is why we take the liberty to discuss very freely and sincerely the matters that are submitted to us.

After these preliminaries, there is one thing which I wish to ask the government and it is this, that they kindly consider the matter of grading the salary cuts of the civil servants. This is a matter of the utmost importance. Another thing—and I have to mention it again this evening—is this: it is a great mistake for the government to tell the people that there will be a reduction in the number of civil servants, for the reason that I mentioned yesterday, namely, that when people are not sure that they will be able to retain their positions, they do not give the same good service as they do when they have minds untroubled by such threats. In my travels to and fro throughout Canada I meet many people and the feeling amongst them at present is not as good as it was last year. Why? The people are still patient, but I do not know how long this will last. We have an honest, law-abiding population, one that respects the social order, and I hope conditions will improve so that we shall not in Canada see the excesses committed in other countries. But men cannot suffer indefinitely. I am not talking party politics; I am speaking of very serious conditions. I know people who have come from rural municipalities or urban centres to Ottawa to enter the civil service. They have obtained positions where they can live honourably, where they can bring up their children, feed and clothe them, make good citizens of them, and then in a moment, without notice, they are deprived of their positions. Their career is broken. I admire the mother who takes care of the home while the husband is out at work earning money to keep his family. I admire the woman who is perhaps a greater business manager than is the manager of any bank. Those women are admirable and are to be found alike in Ontario and Quebec, and throughout the country. They make sacrifices in order that both ends may meet when the pay envelope is brought home. These men of whom I speak, when they enter the civil service from the rural municipalities, have been uprooted and are therefore unable to take up their old occupations again. When they enter the civil service they do their duty; they try to improve their lot by working as good public servants should do, and when they are deprived of their positions, their careers are ended. What happens? We see these men who are too proud to beg, unable to do anything. Such a condition is very sad and these men now expect and hope that within a short time the government will be able to restore conditions as they were some time ago in order that they may live in the same happy state as that in which they lived before.

I hope that social unrest will not prevail in this country. We are very fortunate now that the people are still law-abiding, that they respect the established order. Why is this? It is because our people have deep religious convictions. I respect people who do not have my creed. There was formerly a member of this house who was a leader of the Orange order and I asked him if he did not think it was better for the social order that people should have a creed instead of having none, and he said most certainly yes. I shall not mention that man's name, but it is evidence that it is only their creed and faith in the future that make the people respect the social order. There are, however, times when hunger, trouble, discouragement might overcome all that. I trust this will never occur in this country and this is why sincerely, seriously and earnestly I beg the government kindly to consider at once the case of the poor and humble classes in order that we may avoid social unrest in Canada.

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I trust I may be pardoned if I do not follow the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) in his address. The only place that I shall agree with him is in his one day of silence and I honestly believe, after his speech of to-night, he has pretty nearly a week's silence coming to him.

This afternoon we heard the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in bringing down his legislation with regard to the cut in the salaries of the civil service. Knowing him as I do, when he, realizing as he does the financial and unemployment situation, stated this afternoon that the administration intended to do what they conceived to be their duty under the circumstances, I felt it incumbent upon me to say a few words on behalf of some of the civil servants of this country.

I have special reference to married men and others with dependents who are receiving, say up to $1,320 a year. In some cases there are sons or daughters of those who are already in the service and the former are receiving salaries of say $1,200 or $1,260. There are other cases of which I know where perhaps there are two young ladies in one family, each working for the government at $1,200 a year. In such instances no hardship is involved in cutting those salaries by ten per cent. But I request and urge the government, in the administration of this legislation, if possible to exempt married men or others with dependents who are receiving salaries up to $1,320 a year. If they cannot see their way clear to do that I should like them at least to exempt the married men or civil servants with dependents whose salaries are only $720. I should like also to include those employed in the char service, who come to work before a great number of people are up in the morning, who leave their homes in time to be at work about 6.30 in the morning and who work until 9 o'clock. If the government, in its wisdom, could see its way clear to exempt those people, it would be doing a great favour. I have outlined the classes whom I think the government will help, if it is within its power to do so.

Some statements have been made concerning the exemption of the judges of Canada. In my view if they are exempt legislation should be brought in to reduce their salaries.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hear, hear.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I think perhaps, however, the judiciary of Canada have enough patriotism to volunteer to accept a ten per cent reduction. An excellent example was given to them by the Governor General of Canada, and I believe that our judges in their wisdom will give their share without any change in our statutes.

Sitting in this house and listening to hon. members opposite I have often wondered how many champions there would be among them if the civil servants did not have votes. I am of the firm belief that my hon. friends opposite would not be so enthusiastic.

Mr. YOUNG: Would they have any on the government benches?

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Certainly they could not depend on the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), because he can see nothing beyond the narrow principle of free trade. In fact, if he would consult Hansard he would find that some of his statements indicate he is not familiar with the different articles used in his own occupation.

An hon. member has said that if civil service salaries are reduced ten per cent there will be a reduction in purchasing power. In my view that is not correct; we are not reducing the purchasing power. The money which came from our civil servants came from the general public, and the money they spend goes back to the general public. If taxation on commodities such as suggested to-day were adopted, that money would not go back to our people.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that hon. members opposite did not wish to use this issue as an excuse to play party politics. May I read from the Ottawa Journal of February 25, 1932, a statement made by the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Ahearn):

> In a brief speech Mr. Ahearn thanked members of the Twentieth Century Club for their support in the last election, and since then.

Mr. AHEARN: I certainly did.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The article continues:

> He predicted the return of Liberal M.L.A's. in the three Ottawa ridings, in Russell and possibly in Carleton in the next provincial election, because he said he heard that "civil servants, of whom there are a lot in the county, are not altogether satisfied with present conditions."

Mr. AHEARN: Are they?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I say to the hon. junior member for Ottawa that, as a Liberal, he has the privilege to go out and contest that riding at the very first opportunity, and we will watch the result with interest; we will see whether or not he will be returned. I have enough faith in the civil servants of the county of Carleton, knowing their patriotism, knowing their loyalty to the traditions of the Liberal-Conservative party, knowing that they have returned a Conservative candidate since the year 1867, and that they will do it for the same length of time in the future, to have no doubt as to how my hon. friend would be received.

At the same meeting the recognized leader of the provincial Liberal party appeared, and made the following statement:

> Those of us who come from outside ridings have a sympathetic understanding of the problems of civil servants, and are behind Mr. Chevrier in his efforts on their behalf, was the statement of Mitchell Hepburn, provincial Liberal leader.

I wonder if the provincial leader will make the same statement in all rural constituencies of Ontario. I venture to say he will not. He did not hand a very large bouquet to the junior member for Ottawa, because he appeared to be behind only the senior member. I should like the members for Ottawa to realize that my chief reason for supporting the government in this resolution is that the general public in this city and the surrounding district realize that these are difficult times. Perhaps the junior member for Ottawa could explain why a certain Ottawa electric railway company reduced their pay ten per cent last summer, and reduced their staff by forty per cent.

Mr. AHEARN: That is not so.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Yes, reduced their staff forty per cent.

Mr. AHEARN: That is not so.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): What did they do with a few poor people of this city who on a few occasions carried passengers? Those people were brought into court. I say to the junior member for Ottawa that he is the last man who should say anything concerning the reduction of salaries. In this city to-day the Canadian Pacific Railway is reducing salaries by ten per cent; men who had steady runs out of this city for the last twenty years are receiving similar treatment. I have in mind a young man who worked on the Canadian Pacific railway for sixteen years, and who to-day is shovelling snow around the parliament buildings. Why? Because there was no work on the railroad, and he is willing to make a dollar wherever possible.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. member who gave him the appointment?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Yes, I can tell the senior member for Ottawa who appointed that man. The member for Carleton appointed him; and if there is any other man in the county of Carleton who finds himself in a similar position, and needs a day's work, and if men are required to shovel snow I will extend the same help to him. The two hon. members for Ottawa are worried because when they walk up to parliament hill they do not know any of the persons shovelling snow.

The produce of our agricultural communities in the adjoining counties cannot be sold for a price sufficient to pay for the labour it entails. The majority of farmers in the county of Carleton are having great difficulty to pay their taxes and threshing bills. They are taking a cut of more than ten per cent; contractors are taking a cut of more then ten per cent; factories in the west end of the city are operating only three days a week. Civil servants realize those conditions, and so far as I can learn they are willing to take a cut. Do hon. members opposite believe for one moment that they are the only champions of the unemployed? They are not. They did not know there were any unemployed before the last election; in fact we were very close to the election date before they realized the state of unemployment.

Mr. YOUNG: We have no trouble knowing it now.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): No, and it would never be rectified until doomsday if the hon. member for Weyburn had anything to do with it. What has happened in the west? —family upon family without food. Do hon. members think the civil servants do not realize that? Civil servants know about conditions in the west and they are willing to take the cut in salary on the conditions laid down by the Prime Minister this afternoon—namely, that it will be for one year. They are willing to make a sacrifice. I have confidence and faith in the civil servants of Canada, and I know that when the year goes by and the Imperial economic conference is over, conditions will brighten and they will be satisfied. They have never got anything from the opposition. A few days before the last election the then Prime Minister, now the leader of the opposition, gave to the charwomen a bonus or back salary for three months. In doing this our friends opposite had no thought whatever of helping those women; they were concerned about securing the return of their two local candidates.

For the reasons I have stated, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): In the few remarks I propose to make, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour as far as possible not to inject any political bias.

Mr. SPENCE: It would be something new.

Mr. SANDERSON: I pay no attention to my good friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence). I think this question should be discussed without any political bias at all. We are going through a very trying time, perhaps the most trying in our history, and it behooves every one to make certain sacrifices. I am not going in any way to criticize the proposed reduction of ten per cent. In fact from my observations while in Ottawa during the past few years I think the civil servants are willing to make the sacrifice without much murmur. Of course, no one likes a cut in salary—I think every one will agree with me in that. I rather think the civil servants expected a ten per cent cut, I am quite sure members of parliament were expecting it. I will go further—but I hope in this I am wrong—that if conditions do not improve within the next twelve months hon. members of the Commons, hon. senators, and civil servants will have perhaps to take another cut.

As to the exemptions, I cannot understand why the government has adopted such a course. We have been told by the Prime Minister that the officers of the army and navy are to be exempted from this ten per cent salary reduction. I should like to know from the government side how this exemption can be justified. The Prime Minister, I see, is not in his seat, but the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) is. He may come to the defence of the army and navy. The officers of the army who are exempted from this salary reduction are largely what we used to call the "brass hats." We have a lot of them here in Ottawa and in every military district throughout the country. They are well paid; if I had the time I could go through the list and give the amount of pay and allowances they receive. I suppose they work at least a day or a day and a half each week; they are supposed to "swank" rather than work. If the government can show me any reason why these public officials should be exempted from the ten per cent cut, I shall be glad to hear it. Then we have the naval officers. Who they are, what they are and where they are I do not know.

They may be on the high seas.

Mr. DUFF: The last place they were at was Salvador.

Mr. SANDERSON: I think there was a social function about a hundred miles from there and they sailed away to take part in it. I should like to know from the government their reasons for exempting these two classes of officers. I am open to conviction if it can be shown to me conclusively that they should be exempted from this salary reduction, but in the absence of any explanation I can conceive of no reason for their exemption. Then I come to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Now, if there is any body of public servants in this country who for years and years back have made sacrifices as Canadians, it is the members of this force. But I am inclined to think they will come forward and volunteer to take a ten per cent cut in their pay. Why they should be exempt I do not know, but I should like to know. The next class within the exemption is the judiciary. I know that when one gets up in this house and speaks about the judges he is on rather thin ice so far as the legal fraternity among the members of this house are concerned. I am a layman. I am inclined to think that the judges of this country, most of them at least, might have their salaries cut to the extent of ten per cent.

An hon. MEMBER: Make it twenty per cent.

Mr. SANDERSON: No, I will put it at ten per cent. They are drawing good pay, they are not overworked, and if there is any body of men who should show an example in the way of sacrifice I rather think it is the members of the judiciary. Why they should be exempted from this ten per cent salary cut I do not know. Probably the Prime Minister will give the house his reasons for exempting them. He said the other day, in answer to a question, if my memory serves me aright, that their salaries should not be decreased by ten per cent because they were statutory salaries. I do not think that is any reason at all for their exemption. As a matter of fact all these salaries are statutory. I think the judges should come under this reduction of salary to the extent of ten per cent. I am not going to dwell on that because I know I shall be open to criticism from certain quarters. But this is a time of sacrifice when everyone must bear his share of the common burden. This afternoon the Prime Minister read a letter from a lady—who, he said, is in the civil service—saying she would be glad to make the sacrifice. I should like to know if the government have received any letters from judges volunteering to take a ten per cent cut. The Prime Minister is not in his seat. I do not know who is leading the government, whether it is the member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley), or the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), or the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion).

Mr. RYCKMAN: All together.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Mr. SANDERSON: You may be all together, but there is one man leading the government all the time. Will the Minister of National Revenue tell me if he knows whether any communications have been received from judges volunteering to take a ten per cent reduction in salary?

Mr. RYCKMAN: None came to my department.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) say whether he received any communication?

Mr. CHAPLIN: None came to my department.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am sorry the hon minister from South Essex (Mr. Gott) is not in his seat.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I will speak for him; none came to his department.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then may I ask the hon. minister from Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) if any came to his department?

Mr. GOBEIL: I might tell the hon. gentleman that as a member of parliament I received one letter from a justice of the peace.

Mr. SANDERSON: I want to congratulate my hon. friend on being taken into the government. However, the point I am trying to make is that in my judgment—and I am speaking for no one but myself—the judges should share in the ten per cent cut in salaries, and I think there is also another method by which a saving could be effected.

This afternoon the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke about government houses and about lieutenant-governors. I am inclined to think that under present conditions in this country all the lieutenant-governors should be asked to resign. I want to say to the government—and I am sorry the Prime Minister is not in his seat—that speaking for myself only, as coming from the province of Ontario, but speaking also for a number of my own supporters, I think no appointment should be made to the position of lieutenant-governor of Ontario until at least business conditions have improved. I know many hon. members across the way have been mentioned as probable lieutenant-governors. The name of my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence) was mentioned; as a matter of fact I think it was only a joke, but his name was mentioned. I hope he will use his influence with the Minister of Justice (Mr.

Guthrie), whom I am glad to see in his seat, so that no appointment will be made to the post of lieutenant-governor of the province of Ontario.

I do not think I have anything further to say, Mr. Speaker. I am glad to see that my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) is in a jovial mood. As a rule he sits in the house looking as though he has lost all his friends, political and otherwise. To-night he has something to laugh at, Mr. Speaker, and if in addressing these few words to the house I have done nothing more than to make the Minister of National Revenue smile, I am glad I spoke.

Mr. BOUCHARD: They are free to-night; they have no leader.

Mr. SANDERSON: Yes; my hon. friend suggests that they are free, that they have no leader. But when my right hon. friend the Prime Minister walks in, as undoubtedly he will before eleven o'clock, you will see the members of the government sit up like good little boys in school, and there will not be much of a smile on the face of my good friend the Minister of National Revenue, or of any other member of the government.

I have stated my views in regard to judges; I have stated my views in regard to naval officers and permanent force officers, and in regard to lieutenant-governors. So far as I am concerned I have no criticism to offer in regard to the reduction of ten per cent in the salaries of civil servants. I quite understand that it will mean some hardship for those receiving salaries of perhaps $1,200; they will get a five per cent cut, and I would go so far as to say I would be quite willing to exempt those classes. But whatever is done in that regard I hope the exemptions I have mentioned will be included, as they should.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I want to take up the time of the house very shortly in connection with the principle of the resolution which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has proposed shall be considered in committee of the whole. The principle to which we on this side of the house particularly object is the principle of a horizontal and arbitrary cut regardless of the size of salary affected. That is a principle which has been too freely adopted by this government in connection with other measures affecting the public service and the administration of government.

Our complaint—and we will continue to make it—is that our friends on the other side seem willing to take a running jump at almost any policy and put it into effect, and then sometimes take a step backward and make some corrections, or at other times—and more frequently—to stick to it through thick and thin, with resulting detriment to the people affected. I submit that in this case the government have already shown that they are not quite happy with regard to the proposal made by the Prime Minister some little time ago, the proposal which appears in the estimates, whereby ten per cent is simply cut off every civil government vote. Already they have begun to take a backward step in the second part of the resolution before the house. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Garland), who spoke a short time ago, mentioned politics, and the Prime Minister spoke of introducing politics into this matter. I wonder if perhaps it was not because the civil servants have votes that this second paragraph was included. Does anyone think that paragraph would have appeared had it not been for the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are just as sensitive to public opinion when expressed through the polls as anyone else in this house or in this country? I say, Mr. Speaker, that the second part of the resolution, the sop which is now thrown by way of contributing five per cent towards the superannuation funds of certain officials, is an attempt by the government to take a step backward, and is an admission that they went too far.

That has only come about because the opposition have steadfastly set their faces against the voting of any estimates which recognize salary cuts until this resolution and this legislation should be brought down, and already we see the fruits of that policy. I submit that it should be elementary in government and in the administration of public affairs, particularly in taxation, that taxes should be imposed on those best able to bear them. This is nothing but a taxation measure which is imposed upon a certain class in the community because they happen to be civil servants. There is an old adage about tempering the wind to the shorn lamb, but that was completely forgotten in the proposal first announced by the Prime Minister.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the arbitrary way in which this government went at this matter is just an illustration of what has been done with regard to other matters, to which I will not refer to-night. Can you conceive of anything less fair and more inequitable than that the people who are to be affected should see it broadcast all over this country that the ten per cent cut was going into effect, have the estimates brought down with ten per cent deducted, and then have the Minister of Justice solemnly announce that he would hear the people who were affected? They appeared this morning, by their representatives, to present their case, while upon this very order paper was the resolution providing for the reduction in salary, and I have no doubt that the bill to be founded upon this resolution has been already printed. You might as well speak of a court giving people an opportunity to bring their witnesses and present their case while all the time the judgment of the court is written, ready to be pronounced as soon as the presentation ends.

My hon. friend from Carleton pretends to speak for the civil servants; he says they are perfectly willing to take this cut. I sincerely hope that is so, because it looks as if they are going to get it whether they want to take it or not. But I do say that I doubt very much whether he is in a position to speak for the civil servants and to say whether the reduction is one that does approve itself, particularly as regards the feature to which I am referring, to the great body of civil servants of the country.

This principle is all wrong, of imposing a horizontal cut in salaries regardless of their size. Suppose a man receives a salary of $720 a year; he has to contribute the sum of $96 to the revenue of the country. Does anyone pretend for a moment that a man can as well afford to contribute $96 out of an income of $720 as the man drawing a salary of $10,000 can afford to contribute $1,000? There is certainly a scale of living in this country which is absolutely necessary. Certain absolute requisites a man must have if he is to keep his family, and these things must be provided first. As was well said by my hon. friend from North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), the principle seems to be to start from the bottom and work upwards instead of from the top down. What is being done by the government with respect to the reduction in salaries is precisely the same sort of thing that has been carried on right along; it is exactly the same thing as was done by the Minister of National Defence and by the government in connection with the air men of whom I spoke the other day. That is an illustration of the arbitrary way in which our friends opposite are acting in regard to matters of taxation and these so-called economies.

The Prime Minister read a letter which he said came from some lady who wrote that she was glad to have a salary to be cut. I am sorry the right hon. gentleman is not in his seat, but I would ask him whether as a lawyer he regards this as the proper sort of evidence to bring against the great body of civil servants of the country—a letter written by a lady whose name he will not give, whose condition of employment we know nothing about, about whose responsibilities in life we are absolutely ignorant, when I venture to say that the Prime Minister himself, in common with others in this house, has received letters by the score from civil servants all over the country protesting vigorously against the cut because of what it will mean to them in their daily lives. I say to the right hon. gentleman, and I submit to the house, that he should not have brought forward a letter of that kind, an isolated case, and presented it to this house or to the country as an evidence of the way in which the civil servants of Canada generally feel in this matter.

Misery likes company, we know, and we are all receiving the cut; but everyone has been suggesting that someone else should make sacrifices. It reminds one of what Mark Twain said about being perfectly willing to sacrifice his wife's relations. In this case, the lady to whom reference has been made might sincerely have felt like making the contribution; but there are a lot of married men in this city and throughout the country with large families and very grave responsibilities, who cannot afford the cut no matter how patriotic they are. I have spoken of the air force as an example of the arbitrary actions of the government. My hon. friends opposite rush headlong at salaries, striking off ten per cent, and it means headlines in the papers the next day and possibly some applause in some quarters. But is it scientific? Is it intelligent? Is it considerate? Is it a thing that ought to be done in the interests of public business? Take the men in the air force; they were officers who were under contract for three years, men who had enlisted for that length of service, men who had seen service overseas, half of them married men with family responsibilities who had expected that their employment would be fairly permanent and many of them on the strength of that expectation had acquired little homes of their own. They have no other profession than their training in the air force and they were working for their country to the very best of their ability. These men receive summary notice that in six weeks' time they are to be cut off the salary list altogether and they find themselves adrift in the world without any support whatever. Now, that is not the way to use Canadians. What would any employer of labour have done?

Mr. MORAND: What has he done?

Mr. RALSTON: This is what he has done. He has said to his superintendent or his supervisor: We have to reduce our staff. Show me the married men; tell me who have been longest with the firm; point out those who have responsibilities, and then we will try to temper the wind to the shorn lamb, endeavouring as far as possible to adjust matters, dropping some who have not as great responsibilities, and others who have not been as long with us, or who have not had service overseas. That is what the employer of labour has done. But he has not made an absolute brutal and ruthless cut or dismissal regardless of salaries, contracts, abilities and responsibilities. And I say that is what is being done. It is because my hon. friends opposite do not realize that there is such a thing as human flesh and blood in this country as well as questions of economics and all the other things they talk about in connection with government. They say, "we are going to do this and that or perish in the attempt," and they do it regardless of whom it hits.

I submit that the time has come in this country when we ought to call a halt to that sort of thing. My hon. friend from Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) gave some excellent advice. It would be well for the country if the government would stop for the space of just one day and give consideration quietly and soberly to the things that are being done instead of rushing at them, particularly in regard to these so-called economies. After all, we are dealing with human beings, Canadian citizens, and when you reduce by ten per cent the income of a man who gets $720 a year, or when you throw out into the world a man who has served his country well, it is time to point out that the same sort of human feeling and sensibilities that move the employer of labour should actuate the government.

Coming back to the air men, may I point out that the only employment open to these men in Canada at the present time is with the federal government. I would not mind it so much if there were not plenty of work for them to do and if they were not needed in the service of the country for the development of its resources. But I have seen, as other members of this house have seen, the excellent work which has been done by the air service, work which could not have been done, in the development of this country, without their invaluable assistance. There is not a country I know of that has made such a varied use of aviation as this dominion has done in connection with the development of our natural resources. Let me give one or two illustrations to indicate what little consideration has really been devoted to these matters. One would have thought that the government would first have considered the usefulness of these men and what they are doing in the development of this country. Hon. members know that the air force has been used most successfully in connection with the mapping of the country and the opening-out of new mining areas. You could not lay off mining areas, you could not plot them, you could not allot them nor stake them out without a map. Take the Red Lake district for example. Three or four years ago there was a request that it be opened up. A request came for a map of the district. How long would it take to make such a map by means of ordinary foot survey? About three years. The matter was handed over to the Department of the Interior and through that department to the air force, and the map was ready in a space of a little more than six months. The claims were staked out and the district was opened for development. I have in mind an engineer who wanted to make an inspection in that district. He was coming from Vancouver, having been asked by his firm to make an examination. He knows that from the time he gets off the train at Minaki until he gets on again it will take three weeks to go into the district and out again by the usual method. He wires for a plane, the plane meets him at Minaki and takes him into the Red Lake district, and he makes his examination and catches the very same train the very same day at Sioux Lookout and is on his way to New York—all this by reason of the aviation service rendered by these very men who have been dropped because the government gives no thought to their usefulness in the development of Canada.

With regard to the great northwest, of which you know a good deal, Mr. Speaker, we have lately had mineral discoveries of importance at Great Bear lake. I have no doubt that the Department of Mines will bear out the statement that it is absolutely necessary that we maintain our air service if we are to develop that country. The same thing may be said in connection with the air mail service. Civil government aviators developed air mail routes throughout the country, investigated conditions, mapped out the courses, provided the necessary information to enable contracts to be let, made experimental flights themselves, selected sites for emergency landing fields and laid the foundation for a splendid airmail service in this country of vast distances. A similar statement may be made in connection with the forest patrol. Something like a quarter of a million miles have been photographed and a quarter of a billion acres have been under patrol. These are some of the things which the air service has been doing and I have no doubt that the records of the departments of the Interior and of National Defence will show that years of work were ahead of this service.

Yet in the face of this great service which is being rendered, 69 officers and 100 men are told that they must go. I submit that such action is poor business and is very short-sighted. If something of that kind had to be done it should not have been done so arbitrarily. The matter should have been given the same consideration as would have been given by an employer of labour to a similar problem.

I submit that the government should give further consideration to this matter. The hon. member for Carleton says that he is going to vote for this resolution but he asks the government on his bended knees to give further consideration to the lower salaried class. I think the government would be acting in the interests of Canada to heed his suggestion.

With regard to the air force, in the interests of humanity, in the national interest and furthermore in the international interest, the government should reconsider this whole matter. At the present time there is talk abroad that these air men who have been thrown out in the world are about to enlist in the forces of another country. No one can blame them because it is the only thing they can do, that is the only profession they have. They say: If our own country does not want us, if our country leaves us in the lurch, we will have to take the best employment we can get. I submit that that will not be a good thing for Canada regardless of whether or not it is legally possible.

Mr. McINTOSH: It is not a Canada first policy, either.

Mr. RALSTON: As my hon. friend says, it is not a Canada first policy. On that ground alone the government should reconsider this matter. The other day the Prime Minister intimated that there would be some difficulty in the adoption of this course by these men, but there is no law that I know of which prevents enlistment in the service of another nation when that nation is not technically at war. I submit that the right hon. gentleman was wrong in giving that impression. But regardless of the legal position it would be regrettable for these men to leave this country under these circumstances and the dominion might be precipitated into an embarrassing international situation.

I contend that everyone in the public service who has given faithful service is entitled to due consideration. The circumstances should be inquired into, the conditions should be investigated and full consideration given to the whole matter before a horizontal cut is made or wholesale dismissals take place.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in reply to part of the address given by the last speaker (Mr. Ralston), but not because of its importance, as I consider the hon. gentleman's address from beginning to end was nothing but a piece of cheap party politics and an endeavour to make capital out of the troubles of a group of men who are in difficulties at the present time. I maintain that it lowers the reputation of the hon. gentleman to bring such a thing into this discussion in such a way. Last Friday he attempted to interject this matter into the discussion then taking place in the house under the guise of its being a matter of urgent public importance, but he did not succeed in getting it before the house because of Your Honour's ruling.

If the hon. gentleman had the interest of these air men at heart he would have gone about the matter in a different way. He knows very well that if a member of this parliament desires to get anything before the house or to advance any interest that is non-political, all he has to do is to go and see the particular minister and put the case before him. Many hon. members on the other side have done this very thing with me and other ministers, and I defy them to say that they have not received every courtesy.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. minister was asked on two occasions from this side of the house for information in regard to this matter, and he made the most non-committal answers; he said he had no information to give.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Within two hours of my being asked the question I wrote to the hon. gentleman who had asked it, giving what information I had. I gave information to the hon. members for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. RALSTON: What was that information?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In bringing this matter before the house the hon. gentleman has not had the interests of the air force at heart; it is simply an effort at self-glorification and an attempt to gather part of the advertising which the Chinese situation has been receiving.

This reduction in the air force is not properly a matter to be discussed at this time; it is a matter which should be taken up when the estimates of the Department of National Defence are before the committee. However, as it has been interjected into the debate I will give the cause for the reduction which has been made.

Mr. RALSTON: We have been waiting two weeks for this.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As the hon. gentleman has said, the air force has done a great deal towards the development of the north country. He instanced a number of ways in which this has been done, such as map making, exploring of various air routes, air photography and many other useful services. This air force developed to a large extent as an aftermath of the war. I have no objection to make to the expenses incurred by the air service during the few years following the close of the war in the establishing of air clubs, the inaugurating of airports and other features of the service, but in this regard the estimates for previous years are interesting and instructive. In the year 1928-29 the estimate for aviation amounted to $5,042,731; in 1929-30, they amounted to $5,921,163, an increase of $878,432. In 1930-31 the estimates amounted to $7,475,700, an increase over the previous year of $1,554,537. The depression which now exists in this country started to show itself in the fall of 1929, and surely prudence and reason would have dictated that under circumstances of that kind instead of an increase of $1,554,537 being made in the estimates for aviation, they should have been reduced.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend know that was for the development of Trenton?—and he is keeping up that development.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Trenton will be very seriously cut down.

Mr. RALSTON: But my hon. friend is adopting Trenton instead of Borden.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If the hon. gentleman, instead of developing Trenton, had stopped the development at that time, a great deal of the trouble we are having at present would have been obviated.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. gentleman had better ask some of his supporters about that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How any hon. gentleman in charge of the department could at a time of stress, when the depression had already started, give an increase of a million and a half dollars, is beyond my comprehension. The only way in which it can be explained is that in the year 1930 an election was coming on and the hon. gentleman wanted to pad the estimates at the public expense. Surely any man with reason or judgment would at such a time have enough grasp of the situation at least not to increase that estimate. If the estimate had then been decreased by $1,000,000 or $2,000,000, a good deal of the trouble that we are now having would not have occurred.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend suggest the reductions he would have made?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I certainly would have reduced the estimate very materially at that time.

Mr. RALSTON: In what items?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I consider any man who used reason at all in the administration of the department would have used it then.

Now we come to this year. The government is faced undoubtedly with a very difficult situation, and every minister who has charge of a department has had to do his share in meeting it. A minister is in this position: many people think that I, for instance, represent in the house the Department of National Defence, the navy, the army and the air force. I do not do that. I represent the people of Canada in dealing with those branches. When a question of this kind arises, the rights of the country as a whole must be borne in mind as against those of the defence department, and therefore there can be no doubt as to what the decision must be. If there is a portion of the Department of National Defence the maintenance of which cannot be justified at a time when there are men, women and children having difficulty in getting enough to eat and wear, that portion must go and when it is part of the air force that can be spared at this time, it must go. You cannot get away from that, and I think the wisdom of the decision will be recognized by the people throughout Canada. That was the condition which made the cut imperative. The hon. gentleman has said that we are breaking contracts. My hon. friend is a lawyer and he knows much better than that, because I presume he wrote or at least is familiar with this contract on which all the air officers who are being let out were taken into the force.

Mr. RALSTON: I can assure the hon. gentleman I did not write any contract.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If the hon. member followed the happenings in this department when he was in charge, he would be familiar with it. This is the form to be signed by the applicants for a non-permanent commission such as these gentlemen had:

To The Director,
Royal Canadian Air Force.

1. I, the undersigned, hereby apply to be attached to the permanent active air force for continuous air force employment for such period as my services may be required but not exceeding three years.

Therefore how can we be breaking a contract, as the hon. gentleman has said, when the contract distinctly says it is "for such period as my services may be required but not exceeding three years"?

Mr. RALSTON: What does my hon. friend say about enlistment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The form continues:

2. In consideration of the said application being granted, I hereby undertake and agree:

That, I will serve in continuous air force employment for a period of three years, if so required, under the conditions of service prescribed in the King's Regulations and Orders for the Royal Canadian Air Force, and at the rates of pay and allowances prescribed in the pay and allowance regulations for the Royal Canadian Air Force.

This shows that no contract in the slightest is being broken, and I may say that in the case of at least thirty out of the sixty-nine who are being let out, the three-year period has already expired or will expire in the course of a few days. Therefore I maintain that the department was entirely justified and was in no sense breaking a contract.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask whether these men are being let out because their services are no longer required, or because there is no money to pay them?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I cannot see the point in that question. Their services can be dispensed with, and undoubtedly the reason is that the money must be employed in a way that we consider more important and vitally necessary at the present time. That is the situation.

The hon. gentleman asked me with regard to the air men. He also well knows that in the regulations there is a clause for the air force that any man may be dismissed whenever his services are not required. That is in the King's Regulations and Orders for the Royal Canadian Air Force, section 392, subarticle 13—"his services be no longer required."

[Mr. Sutherland.]

I may say that during the hon. gentleman's term in the office that I now have the honour to hold, a difficulty arose in the department and he had to let out very suddenly quite a large number of men. That was in 1928 or early in 1929, and advantage was then taken of that same regulation as it exists with regard to the permanent force of Canada. He acted in every sense in the same way as the department is acting at the present time. Therefore I maintain that everything he has brought up now is not for the interests of the air force but for the old game of party politics and nothing else.

The statement has been made that these men were let out without notice. That again is incorrect. As I stated in the house this afternoon in answer to a question of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), the officers were given one month's leave for every five years they had put in, and they were of course also given any leave that might have been due to them for this year. They were treated in exactly the same way as any man of the permanent force who was leaving the service; in other words, they received their terminal leave and I do not think any business man or employer of labour in this country could do more than that or be fairer about it. As regards the 100 airmen, they will get three weeks' leave with pay.

May I mention another point to show that the air force has not been badly used, at least in a certain particular. They have not paid anything in to the superannuation fund as the permanent air force officers have done. Therefore, during the time they have been in the service they have really been getting more in cash than have those other men. That is the way they are leaving the service, and if there is any other way we can make the best of a bad job—because no one likes this any worse than I do, and I have every possible sympathy for them—I should like to know it. If it were not for the absolute necessity for economy this would not have been done. I can say no more about the matter. That is the situation as I understand it and what I think has justified the department and the government in the stand that they have taken.

Mr. RALSTON: Is it also the case that the officers will lose about $400 of expenditure for uniforms?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I presume a man who has been in the service has a uniform. I submit in closing that the argument of the hon. member was made entirely for party purposes, and is not worthy of the attention of the house.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would the minister tell us—

Mr. RALSTON: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend referring to my remarks, three times used the expression "cheap party politics."

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, that is what I meant.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not interrupt my hon. friend, but I ask you, Mr. Speaker to point out to him that his language was unparliamentary, and that he cannot impute motives to a member of parliament. Furthermore, I deny in the most emphatic terms that anything of that nature was in my mind; there are no air men in my constituency. I ask you, sir, to request the minister to withdraw those imputations.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the minister's remarks wherein he imputed motives to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) were not quite within the rules of parliament. It may have been that he was carried away with some warmth; I would suggest however that he withdraw the remark.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not remember saying—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: My recollection of the minister's remark was that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth had been actuated only by cheap party politics. I was surprised at his statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not see how that can be wrong, Mr. Speaker. Under what rule could that be considered wrong?

Mr. SPEAKER: My ruling in this instance is that the remark is unparliamentary.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker. If I have put my language in the wrong way, I regret it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do you withdraw it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I rise to ask a question—

Mr. CHAPLIN: I wish to ask the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. CHAPLIN: He has withdrawn; what do you want?

An hon. MEMBER: He has used the word "if."

Mr. CHAPLIN: I should like to inquire from the minister what—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the minister to withdraw.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: For the information of the minister may I say the rule is as follows:

> The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him, in his turn, of misrepresentation, charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind; all these are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference.

In my opinion the language of the minister was not parliamentary, and should not have been used.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have already expressed regret, if the language was unparliamentary.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words, even at this late hour, in regard to this matter. Before proceeding to my remarks however I should like to assure you, sir, that the last thing in the world of which I would accuse any hon. member opposite would be playing party politics.

Mr. RALSTON: The same to you.

Mr. MANION: Whether it be cheap or dear, I do not know. At any rate, I certainly should not accuse them of playing politics. I think I heard a few hon. members opposite both this afternoon and this evening state that we were playing party politics when we cut the reduction on smaller salaries from ten per cent to five per cent. So, apparently, after listening to the dispute which has just taken place, I might fairly come to the conclusion that some of them are not so particular about their own statements as about the statements of other people.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussions to-day, and have noted the different viewpoints of the different hon. members on the other side of the house. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) pointed out that we were treating the civil servants with cruelty, and with no more human kindness than would be shown by a private corporation. I am afraid I can hardly agree with my hon. friend, because there are many private corporations in this country to-day which have completely closed their plants.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What?

Mr. MANION: Which have closed their plants.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and quite a few had closed their plants completely before my hon. friends went to the country.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh no.

Mr. MANION: The only trouble was that the hon. gentlemen over there could not see it, but the people did; that was the difference.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And they are regretting it now.

Mr. MANION: I have not seen any signs of regret.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have you not?

Mr. MANION: They may not be very much enamoured of us, but they will never turn us out for that group over there.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The first part of the statement was true.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I had intended to reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth concerning private industry. As I have said, many of them have closed their plants. Business throughout the world is dull—not only in Canada, because I believe it is better in Canada than in other countries—and private industries are not as generous as the hon. gentleman would have us believe. They have to pick their good men, and take them according to seniority, as our railways have done. In my office every day, as Minister of Railways and Canals, I have protests against the actions of both railway companies, because they are laying off married men, returned soldiers, and the like; they have to take seniority into account. So I do not think the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth is quite correct when he says we have been more cruel than private corporations. As a matter of fact, the reason that labour people have always preferred government ownership to private ownership is because the former has always been, under this government or any other government, more friendly to labour than has been the latter. This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) took another attitude. He made the statement that we should close government houses throughout the country, and the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) backed up the statement. Well, in these days that is a real touch of demagogism, because it smacks of politics. My hon. friends opposite would say. "Let us close up the government houses; let us throw these rich men out on the street." As a matter of fact, many people in Canada would not approve, and would not think we were acting in the interests of the working people of our country if we closed the government houses. Those houses are generally occupied by men who can afford to spend a good deal of money, whether it be well- or ill-gotten, and in spending that money they give employment to many people. Servants are employed, merchants are given an opportunity to sell their goods, and the like. How would conditions be improved by closing the government houses? Of course, for my hon. friends to talk about closing government houses is, at the present time, good politics.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask a question?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If those people have so much to spend are they not in a position to take a ten per cent cut the same as ordinary civil servants?

Mr. MANION: Yes, but that is a statutory matter. I have no particular objection; I am as good a democrat as my hon. friend, and I have no particular objection to applying the ten per cent cut to them.

The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) said, "Let us get the millionaire." He was not playing politics—oh, no! He said, "Let us get after the millionaires." There are not many millionaires, so common people like ourselves who are not millionaires are rather pleased to get after them. Of course I would not think of accusing the hon. member for North Battleford of playing party politics when he said, "Let us get after the millionaires and let them pay a million dollars each." I know his statements were all made in good part, and he was doing it for the good of the country—oh, yes. Of course he was not thinking of getting a vote, when the time comes, from the labour people; of course his remarks were not made in that spirit.

The fact is however that, when all is said and done, it is not as easy to extract money from millionaires as he has pointed out. Not being a millionaire, I should like to go after some of them myself. The fact is that the millionaire is hit pretty hard, if one wishes to look at the facts fairly. His income taxes are heavy, and as he buys more imported goods than the ordinary working man, he pays more taxes on those goods. So in the words of the member for North Battleford the millionaire is "got" to a not bad extent.

Then I listened to the member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), the Ontario whip of his party. Coming from a rural section he did not play politics, but he did not condemn the ten per cent. Oh, no, not at all! He is good at asking questions of this side of the house. I will ask him a question: Did he oppose or support this ten per cent cut? I do not know.

Mr. SANDERSON: I will tell my hon. friend. If he had listened attentively to me—

Mr. MANION: I did.

Mr. SANDERSON: —he could not come to any other conclusion than that I did not oppose the ten per cent cut.

Mr. MANION: That is exactly what I thought; I thought the hon. gentleman was actually supporting it. In other words, coming from a rural section, not caring, of course, for votes, not playing cheap politics at all, his game—I withdraw that word; it is not parliamentary;—his idea was that he could agree with members on this side. No politics over there! Oh, no.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is policy, not politics.

Mr. MANION: That is right, it is policy for the next election. However, as I pointed out, there are various differences of opinion among my hon. friends opposite in regard to what should be done. To be serious for a few moments—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Well, if my hon. friends opposite had been listening over on this side of the house to the rather unconsciously humorous speeches they have been making the whole day, they would think a little seriousness might well be injected into this discussion.

It is to be remembered that this ten per cent cut is for one year only. That has been made very clear to those who will suffer by this reduction—and taking ten per cent off any one's income entails, I suppose, suffering of a kind. But it cannot be forgotten that Canada, like the rest of the world, is in a very serious condition at the present moment. The whole world is suffering from a depression such as it has not experienced in centuries. We are in the habit of saying this is the worst condition that the world has ever had to face, but certainly the depression is very serious and very far-reaching. It has been brought on by the war, by reparations—

An hon. MEMBER: The tariff.

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I would even deny that many of the tariffs that have been imposed since the war may have had their effect also. Then there is the unfair competition from Russia—a country which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who is not in his seat, loves so much. But he comes back to Canada, I notice. Furthermore there is the very low price of commodities now prevailing, which is probably the greatest affliction that the world generally is suffering from at the present time. As a result of all these conditions we have unemployment, and it has to be relieved in Canada as in other countries. The United States is said to have seven or eight million unemployed, Great Britain with free trade—

Mr. YOUNG: The United States with a protective tariff—

Mr. MANION: I was going to say that Great Britain with free trade has a higher number of unemployed than the United States in proportion to population.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, no.

Mr. MANION: Yes, in proportion to population.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. I have the actual figures.

Mr. MANION: I know the actual figures.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What are they?

Mr. MANION: The United States, 7,000,000; Great Britain, 3,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The figures are: United States 7,500,000, and 6,000,000 in addition to that number.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is conjuring up dreams.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, they are not dreams.

Mr. MANION: The highest figures I have ever seen give the United States about 7,000,000 unemployed and Great Britain about 3,000,000. If you take into account their respective populations, there is greater unemployment in England than in the United States.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not a fact that in the United States practically nothing has been done for the unemployed, whereas in Great Britain they are being taken care of?

Mr. MANION: That is another question. In Canada, by the way, the unemployed have been taken care of a good deal—with very few compliments from the other side of the house in regard to what has been done. I am not speaking of my hon. friend particularly. But I was pointing out that unemployment is world wide. France, the last country to feel the depression, has now a large number of unemployed, Germany has from 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 unemployed, and the condition is serious in Italy. I merely mention this to show that the condition is world wide. Undoubtedly the greatest trouble with a large portion of the world to-day is that commodity prices are so low. The wheat farmers of the west are suffering very severely from the price of their commodity being down to 65 cents a bushel.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. MANION: Surely my friends do not think we can control the price of wheat?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MANION: Two or three years ago wheat was two and a half to three times that price. The very fact that it has gone down to 65 cents a bushel has lowered the purchasing power to such an extent that, with no exception, the farmer is the hardest hit man in the community. All farm products are hit in the same way. As a rough estimate I may say the purchasing power of the farmers of western Canada has been reduced by between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000. Therefore I say that being the case, the wage earners of Canada, whether civil servants or otherwise, must expect to make some sacrifice on behalf of their country. And a large proportion of other wage earners have made sacrifices. The two great railway systems last year made cuts in the salaries of their higher-up officers by, I think, ten per cent, representing a reduction of some millions of dollars. More recently they came to an agreement with the running trades to accept a reduction of ten per cent. That is a fairly drastic cut. I notice that Roger Babson, a noted economist, said that in the United States during October there were 650 wage cuts in 40 different industries, and in August 338 wage cuts in 32 industries. There you have a total of nearly 1,000 wage cuts in over seventy different industries in two months. I admit quite frankly that the civil service is being hit by this reduction. True, they are losing some of their purchasing power, some of their income, and nobody regrets it more probably than those who find it necessary to put the cut into operation. I do not suppose that my hon. friends opposite under stress of the strongest political feeling would say that they have more sympathy in their hearts for the people than have the rest of us. We do not like to throw men out of jobs, we do not like to take away their earning power, but when the country is in such a serious condition these steps have to be taken. It must not be forgotten that the civil servants, generally speaking, have what no men in private occupations have—steady work, superannuation, sick leave and holidays, and, what is most important, as my right hon. leader mentioned to-day, they have security of employment. I mean those who are permanent civil servants. Of course, there are exceptions; for instance, when occasionally a position is wiped out, but that affects a small proportion of the whole civil service. And after all, I am sure my labour friends will agree with me that one of the greatest worries of the working people in any country is the insecurity and uncertainty of being able to earn their living in the days to come.

Another thing I wish to point out; Canada is in the position of having to pay more heavily for carrying on her national operations than ever before in her history. It is worth while remembering that in 1931 our national expenditure amounted to $300,000,000 over and above what we expended in 1913. In 1913 our whole dominion revenue was—$168,000,000. This year, in addition to running the ordinary affairs of the country, we have to pay out at least $300,000,000 over and above what we paid out in 1913. These items include $110,000,000 or more for interest on the war debt, which was accumulated between 1914 and 1919, and about $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 for pensions and other allied servies of one kind or another also due to the war.

Mr. RALSTON: All these charges have been in existence since 1921.

Mr. MANION: I am not questioning that. I admit that if we take 1921 the same condition existed, but the present world condition did not exist at that time. In addition to those other amounts, this year we will pay out to the Canadian National Railways, for one reason and another—for deficit on interest due the investing public, for additions and betterments, for maritime freight rates and so on—about $112,000,000. If you add those figures together you will find that they total about $300,000,000, yet I repeat that in 1913 our entire national income was only $168,000,000, and this country never had an income of more than $50,000,000 until after 1900.

In addition to the country generally, the provinces are in difficulties; everyone knows it, so there is no harm in my saying so. Everyone knows that the western provinces particularly have been very hard hit by the financial collapse not only of this country but of the world in general. The western provinces have had to be helped very materially by this government. The Canadian National Railways have been hit to such an extent that last year the gross earnings were over $100,000,000 less than in 1928, a period of only three years. The same thing also applies in proportion to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

In this connection it might be pointed out that in 1929, the year before the election under the regime of my hon. friends opposite there were greater capital expenditures put upon the national railways, many of them of a useless character, than ever before in the history of this country or of the national road. Of course there were no politics about it, but in that year there were commitments of $270,000,000, which to a large extent we have to meet now and for which we were not responsible. When we came into office on August 1, 1930, we were committed to the expenditure of $158,000,000, the amount remaining from that $270,000,000, over which we had absolutely no control.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are continually pointing out that during their regime they reduced the national debt. I am not going to question that; perhaps they did reduce the national debt, but they increased the Canadian National Railway debt by over twice as much as they cut down the national debt. The interest owing the investing public by the national road in 1923, the first year after the amalgamation, amounted to $35,000,000, while during 1931 the interest on bonds due to the public from the national road amounted to $57,000,000, an increase of $22,000,000 which has to be met by this government. That $22,000,000 represents interest at 5 per cent on about $450,000,000, so during their regime hon. gentlemen opposite added very considerably to our second national debt, if I may so term the Canadian National Railway debt for which the government of Canada is responsible. Their additions to that debt wiped out by several times whatever little cuts they might have made in the ordinary debt of the country. Whatever else may be said, the people of Canada have to pay both debts; at least in the past they have had to pay the Canadian National Railway debt as well, and no doubt they will continue to pay a great deal of it.

I have practically finished, Mr. Speaker; I rose to say only a few words. I would suggest to my hon. friends on the other side that they might remember that these are serious times, and that we are not making these cuts because we are glad to make them or because we take pleasure in inflicting pain. We are making them because they are necessary for the good of the financial structure of this country.

By the way, I should like to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his heated address today. He spoke of the decreased purchasing power that we were bringing about by cutting the salaries of the civil servants. This will not lessen the purchasing power at all, because you simply save collecting that amount of taxes from someone else.

Mr. YOUNG: That is good, sound doctrine, and I am glad to hear you say it.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I see nothing wrong with that argument. I do not know whether my hon. friend is criticizing it or applauding it.

Mr. YOUNG: I am applauding it; it is good.

Mr. MANION: This is the first time the hon. gentleman has found anything good in my remarks.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You must be wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I will admit that I am beginning to wonder if I am not wrong. However, I repeat that if you take the $8,000,000 of taxes and pay it to the civil servants you cut down the purchasing power of the people; that is all. There is no difference, so you are not cutting down purchasing power at all when you cut down wages that must be paid out of the taxes of the people.

I suggest to my hon. friend that while I know they would not play politics, and I know none of them would be demagogues, I hope they will remember that they got my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) to withdraw a remark about politics to-night, and be sure that in dealing with this question in the future they avoid saying anything that might be imagined to refer to politics.

In closing I want to point out that we admit quite frankly that even with the great power of this government we cannot control the world.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You thought you could.

Mr. MANION: No, we never claimed we could. My hon. friends have a habit of saying we told the people this or that, and that we deceived the people.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, you deceived yourselves.

Mr. MANION: No, we did not. My hon. friend is judging us by himself; he deceives himself so often he thinks we do it also. My hon. friends opposite, who were in the majority in this house when we went to the country, told the people the other story, but the people were so fed up with them that they would not believe hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friends had the same opportunity to tell their story to the people that we had to tell our story, but the people were so tired of them and so disgusted with them, and knew they had been such an utter, ghastly failure, that they were anxious to get rid of the late government.

Of course I would not bring politics into my remarks in any way, but in closing I suggest that it is well to remember that this is a world condition, and that whatever we do must be done in association with the other countries of the world if we are to bring about a stability which does not exist at the present time. So far as I can remember, and I remember pretty well, when my hon. friends were in power they did not foresee any of the troubles which were coming upon the world. They did not perceive any of the difficulties we were going to encounter, and so they should not be too harsh in their judgment of our actions in doing the things we find necessary in order to carry this country of ours on to a better condition than we found existing when we came into power.

Mr. GRAY: Before the minister finishes I should like to have his personal opinion as to whether he is in favour of a straight cut of ten per cent, regardless of the size of the salary, as set out in this resolution.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: This government differs from the late government; we act together, and when we make a move we make it as a body. This is not a straight cut of ten per cent; it is a cut of ten per cent down to $1,200 and five per cent below that, to a large proportion of the civil servants.

Mr. RALSTON: This government acts as one.

Mr. SANDERSON: May I ask the minister a question? He asked me one and I was good enough to answer it. As a member of the government, in the absence of the Prime Minister, will he tell the house the reasons for exempting naval officers, army officers, members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and judges, as well as lieutenant-governors, from the ten per cent salary cut.

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I can give any particular reason apart from those already given by the Prime Minister. So far as the judges are concerned, their salaries are statutory.

An hon. MEMBER: Are they not all statutory?

Mr. MANION: I am informed—I am not a lawyer; I am like my hon. friend, I have the great disadvantage of not being one—I am informed that they are on a different plane entirely and therefore different conditions apply to them. I do not wish to go into that phase of the question at the present time because that would start me off on another speech. But may I say before I sit down that I am a little tired of the joke which my hon. friends seem to be so fond of, that we do not dare to express ourselves, when our leader is here, as we do in his absence. I can assure my hon. friends that the ministers of this government run their own departments; the Prime Minister does not run the departments. But the Prime Minister is leader of the government, and I should hope that my hon. friends opposite when they were in power had some respect for their leader. The suggestion, however, that any of us on this side are intimidated by the Prime Minister is rather ludicrous. I have no more reason to be intimidated by the Prime Minister than by the late Prime Minister.

Mr. HEPBURN: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; the house is not in committee.

Mr. HEPBURN: While we on this side—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HEPBURN: How does the hon. gentleman reconcile his remarks with his action and that of his colleagues in increasing their own salaries by $2,000 apiece just a year ago?

Mr. MANION: That is just a wrong statement; it is not so. We did not do any such thing. We did not increase the salaries, but by cutting out the automobiles it is claimed we saved the country $40,000 a year.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): My first expression must be one of thanks to the two hon. members of the administration who have spoken, for their frankness in informing this house of their absolute failure to redeem the promises which were made by their party, and in showing us how statesmanlike was the address given by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), who, as has been frankly admitted to-night, has clearly brought out the facts. There is no question that hon. gentlemen were speaking from the heart when they told us that this country to-day was in such an exceptionally unfavourable condition that the cabinet had no power whatever to remedy the present situation. That is what we have been trying to get them to realize for the last seventeen months. We know the situation into which the country has been brought is very largely the result of the way in which its affairs have been administered. The Prime Minister has told us time and again that we are now living in an entirely different world to that which existed some two years ago—a world, which calls for different treatment if we are to solve the present economic situation—different tactics from those that were employed in 1929, and in 1930 when they assumed the reins of power. So that I am glad to note the frank admission which these two ministers of the crown have made to-night. Before the session closes they will possibly hear more, which will cause them to realize that their administrative acts have been such that in many respects the government has been an absolute failure up to the present time.

Coming more particularly to the matter under discussion, I agree entirely with the gentlemen who have expressed themselves on this side when they say they are opposed to a horizontal cut in the remuneration of civil servants. I think the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) asked a very reasonable question a moment ago when he inquired of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) whether it was the policy of the government that certain specified officers and employees of the service as well as judges would be asked to turn in a portion of their salaries along with other civil servants. Personally, I know I voice the feeling of my constituents when I say that they approve of the salary cut of ten per cent all around, but they are also firmly of the opinion that those receiving much higher salaries should be more deeply cut than they are according to the provisions of the resolution as it now reads. So far as judges are concerned, while as we have heard from ministers of the crown—and we did not expect any other answer—that there has been no word from any of our judicial officers offering to make a contribution from their salaries, in the situation which exists in this country to-day I think it is only asking what is right when we urge that the judges of our land should help us to meet the present crisis by making a substantial contribution along with other servants of the state. If ever there was a time in the history of Canada when those receiving higher salaries should accept with the greatest good feeling a proportionate reduction in their remuneration, that time is the present, and I do hope that before this matter is concluded, before the final decision is made by the house, the government will determine upon a deeper cut in the higher salaries that are being paid to our public servants, and also that the judiciary will be required to make their just and reasonable contribution.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): I agree with the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in one remark he made, namely, that there is as much humanity on this side of the house as on the other, and that neither party is anxious to cause the civil servants of the country any undue suffering in a reduction of salaries, with malice aforethought. I agree with him in that regard; the only difference is the understanding we have of the problem. If hon. gentlemen opposite really understood the causes of our present troubles they would have taken measures to alleviate the situation rather than measures which can only aggravate it. While he was speaking the minister suggested that the principal cause of the trouble was the low price of wheat, but when asked why the price was so low he could not answer.

Now what is it that makes wheat so dear in Europe?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Tariffs.

Mr. YOUNG: What is it that makes wheat so dear in Europe that the people cannot afford to buy it and so cheap in Canada that the farmers cannot make a living growing it? It is tariffs. What is it that makes manufactured goods so dear in Canada that the people cannot buy them and so cheap in Europe that the people there cannot make a living producing them? It is tariffs. What is it that makes it impossible for us to exchange our surplus wealth which other countries need for the wealth which we need and which they have in abundance? It is tariffs and nothing but tariffs.

This reduction in salaries which has already been submitted to by our railway employees and the employees of a good many other industrial and commercial concerns, and which is now being applied to the civil service, is the inevitable result of the fiscal policy of this government.

An hon. MEMBER: Tariffs.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, tariffs. When the people of Canada voted for the fiscal policy of my right hon. friend, they voted for lower wages, fewer jobs and a lower standard of living. Lower wages are the inevitable result of an increased tariff. When the people of this country voted to shut out New Zealand's butter, they declared by their votes that they were willing to eat less butter on their bread. When they voted authority to this government to raise the duty on woollen goods to 60 per cent, 100 per cent and 150 per cent, they declared that they were willing to be satisfied with inferior clothing or to continue to wear their old clothing.

Mr. GOTT: What about socks?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, and socks too. When the people of this country voted to put a twenty-five per cent duty on agricultural implements, they intimated that they were willing to do without other necessary articles in the household in order to pay the extra price for their implements. When the people of this country voted authority to this government to make them pay $24,000,000 per year more for gasoline than was necessary, and to pay that extra money into an industry which has a pay-roll of only $8,000,000 per year, they declared by their votes that they were willing to do without many necessary articles which could have been purchased with that $24,000,000. The production of those articles would have given employment to many people. When the people of this country voted authority to this government to divert the revenue of the country into the pockets of private individuals, they declared that they were willing to be taxed in other ways in order to make up that loss of revenue.

My right hon. friend stated that if he were elected to power he would shut out $300,000,000 worth of manufactured goods which came into this country from abroad, and he now boasts that he has done it. However, if you look at his revenue returns you will find that when this year is ended—

Mr. GOTT: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order; the hon. gentleman has been speaking for ten minutes without once referring to the subject matter of the motion before the house.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true; this is a budget speech but we might as well have it now.

Mr. YOUNG: I can make another when the budget comes down. The right hon. gentleman told the people of this country that he would shut out $300,000,000 worth of goods—

Mr. GOTT: I submit that that has nothing to do with the motion.

Mr. YOUNG: When I want to model my speeches after a master, I will come to the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott). As I said, the right hon. gentleman told the people that he would shut out $300,000,000 worth of goods. He has shut them out, but his revenue will be reduced by $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 from customs duties alone.

Mr. BENNETT: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that he would prefer that that $300,000,000 which has been kept at home should have been sent abroad?

Mr. YOUNG: If I had some of the back Hansards before me I think I could quote from a speech delivered by the right hon gentleman in which he said that he thought the time had passed when men thought that we paid for imports with cash.

Mr. BENNETT: The goods must be paid for.

Mr. YOUNG: Everyone knows that those $300,000,000 worth of goods would have been paid for by other goods shipped out of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: Who would buy them?

Mr. YOUNG: And the production of those goods would have given employment to our people just as much as the production of this $300,000,000 worth to be manufactured at home.

Mr. BENNETT: Who will buy them?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They did buy them.

Mr. BENNETT: Not since the depression began.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not since this government came into power.

Mr. YOUNG: No one will buy them if we refuse to take goods in exchange.

Mr. GOTT: What did they pay for them with?

An hon. MEMBER: Onions.

Mr. YOUNG: As I said before, this $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 which has been diverted from the revenues of this country into the coffers of our manufacturers must be made up in some other way, and it is proposed to take $8,000,000 from the civil servants as their share of this sacrifice. This is the inevitable result of the fiscal policy of the present government.

My right hon. friend said that if we shut out this $300,000,000 worth of goods, they would be produced in this country; they have been shut out but they are not being produced. What has been the result? The real wealth of the world consists of food, clothing, furniture and so on, the articles we use in everyday life. Three hundred million dollars' worth of these articles have been shut out; they are not being produced in Canada, which means that we have just that much less of real wealth available for the use of our people. That amount of wealth less in the pockets of our people means a lower standard of living, and my right hon. friend cannot get away from that. When we voted for a higher tariff, we voted for a lower standard of living. Tariffs cannot be raised without the cutting of wages and the producing of lower standards of living.

I will say a word or two with reference to our indemnities—

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member is now on the subject.

Mr. YOUNG: This is the part which interests my hon. friend. I was wondering what he was so anxious about. I do not agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that all our troubles can be laid at the doors of the bankers. I do not believe that the bankers are responsible for world conditions as they exist to-day. If there is any one class more responsible for present conditions than another, it is the politicians. If there is any group of people in Canada more responsible for the necessity for this reduction than another, it is the members of this house. We passed the legislation which has made it necessary to reduce salaries. I know hon. members on this side did not support that legislation, but the house as a whole passed it.

An hon. MEMBER: We have to take the cut.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, we have to take the cut with the others. If a person wishes to be philosophical there is another way of looking at it. Suppose all those members who do not support the present government and who were members of this house three years ago had taken the sum of $400 each from their indemnities and put that amount into a fund to be devoted to the educating of the people of this country as to the fallacy of the policies of my right hon. friend, the people would have never voted him into power and this cut would not have been necessary. We did not do that; we did not feel we could afford to do it and now we have to submit to this cut and the people have been denied their education.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You spent more than that on Deachman.

Mr. YOUNG: No, we did not spend more than that.

Mr. MANION: What did he cost?

Mr. YOUNG: I do not mind telling my hon. friend; as many of us as could afford it subscribed $50 per year to maintain the consumers league, of which Mr. Deachman was the representative.

Mr. BENNETT: There were other contributions.

Mr. YOUNG: It was money well spent. I wish that the common sense which he taught us could have been multiplied a thousandfold and spread all over Canada. As I said before, I have no objection to the ten per cent reduction because I realize it is the inevitable result of the policies of this government, but I think we should follow the principle of placing the heaviest burden on the strongest backs; the biggest cut should be made in the salaries of the higher paid officials who can stand it better than the lower paid employees.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was addressing the house he alluded to the fact that the railroad employees and those employed by private interests had been forced to take a reduction in their wages. I am sorry that the present government has had to follow the lead of private interests. I have been brought up to think a government should be an ideal employer and take the lead in showing how employees ought to be treated, but in this instance we have the government following the lead of private employers in Canada in reducing wages. I am sorry, however, the government has not followed the example set by private employers in this country in taking the employees or their representatives into their confidence and discussing the matter with them before introducing legislation such as is now before the house.

This parliament has several times enunciated the principle of collective bargaining. Indeed, some of the members who are to-day sitting on the treasury benches were members of the government in 1918 when they enunciated in an order in council this principle. Order in council P.C. 1743 of July 11, 1918, reads in section two:

> That all employees have the right to organize in trade unions, and this right shall not be denied or interfered with in any manner whatsoever, and through their chosen representatives should be permitted and encouraged to negotiate with employers concerning working conditions, rates of pay, or other grievances.

That principle was adopted by the government of Canada on July 11, 1918, during the war. After the war was over, on the first of May, 1919, some members now sitting on the treasury benches were members of the government that passed another order in council cancelling some of the provisions in the former one, but leaving intact the particular clause which I have just read.

Then parliament endorsed the principle of collective bargaining and endorsed unanimously the principle of establishing a national council for the civil service of Canada. In conformity with that endorsation the former Liberal government on the seventh of May, 1930, passed the following order in council, P.C. 970:

> The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 6th May, 1930, from the Minister of Labour, directing attention to the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of Tuesday, March 27, 1928, and Thursday, March 29, 1928; and more specifically to the second report presented to the house from the select standing committee on industrial and international relations and to the record of the adoption of the said report by the house, contained therein.
> It will be observed that by adopting the said report the house endorsed "the principle of the establishment by the government of a national civil service council, composed of representatives of the government and the organized civil service in equal numbers, to consider and advise the government upon matters of mutual concern to the government and civil servants in their respective capacities as employer and employees, also as to the establishing of any other consultative and advisory machinery that may be required." And further, the house agreed "that, as the form of constitution for such a council, covering its scope and functions, can best be determined by joint agreement between the parties concerned," a committee should be set up by the government, representing both the government and the civil service organizations, to draft a constitution for such a national civil service council, any such constitution to be subject to the approval of the governor in council.
> Having in mind the foregoing, the minister submits that the time would now appear appropriate for the taking of the initial step suggested by the report above quoted.
> The committee, therefore, submit for Your Excellency's approval the following recommendations of the Minister of Labour.
> 1. That a national civil service council drafting committee should forthwith be constituted, to draft a constitution for a national civil service council.
> 2. In establishing such a committee there first arises the question of its membership. The policy of giving equal representation to civil service organizations and to the government should be observed.
> 3. Representation of civil service organizations:
> The Department of Labour has record of some twenty-eight organizations of civil servants throughout the country, varying in respect of their memberships from about seventeen to over 8,000. Obviously, with such a comparatively large number of organizations existing, giving direct representation to them all would not be practicable, in view of the fact that the setting up of a committee of at least fifty-six members would be involved thereby. Selecting those organizations reporting 500 or more members, it is observed that there are ten which fall into this category. These organizations represent substantially all classes of civil servants organized, covering practically all branches of the service in which there is organization, and they include an overwhelming majority of the organized civil service. These ten organizations should be given representation on the committee. While not directly represented under this plan, several of the smaller organizations will be represented through affiliation with one or other of the larger bodies. In order to represent as many bodies as may be possible while still limiting the size of the committee to a reasonable figure, numerical differences among organizations should be overlooked when determining representation, and if each of these ten organizations had one representative to speak for it, even though these differences in size exist, the representation would be as satisfactory as would be practical in the circumstances. Moreover, as an approach to unanimity on the part of all those interested is desirable, voting strength is unimportant. It is therefore recommended that each of the following organizations be invited to select one of the members of the aforementioned committee.

Mr. GOTT: I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that it is eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, February 29, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

CHEQUES WITHOUT FUNDS—GRAND JURY SYSTEM IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, to amend the criminal code (cheques without funds and grand juries).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is an effort to amend the section of the criminal code in regard to obtaining money by false pretences in order to make it apply to the issuing of cheques where there are not sufficient funds. The matter was pretty well discussed in the house last session, and the government then decided to introduce a bill to remedy the evil. The other branch of the bill has to do with the abolition of the grand jury system in British Columbia. The amendment is proposed at the request of the government of that province.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FINANCE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle Creek) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, to amend the Finance Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Speaker, under the Finance Act chartered banks have the right to deposit various securities with the Treasury Board in exchange for dominion notes. The amendment is for the purpose of giving the provinces the same right.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

But rather than do him any injustice by a hasty judgment I would ask him to be good enough to let the motion stand, so that in the meantime I may have an opportunity to inquire more fully into the matter.

FEDERAL TAXATION

REVENUE TO BE SECURED AND BURDEN EQUALIZED BY INCOME RATHER THAN COMMODITY TAXATION

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose) moved:

Whereas, it is becoming increasingly apparent that the present methods and extent of federal taxation are inadequate to meet our requirement, and

Whereas, an extension of the principle of commodity taxation has been suggested as a means of meeting the situation, and

Whereas, the drastic fall in price levels and the consequent increase in the purchasing value of money has seriously affected the producer and the business man, while being of corresponding benefit to those whose incomes, derived from certain classes of bonds, mortgages, etc., are still undiminished, if not increased.

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration, in order to equalize the weight of taxation and that an additional burden be not placed upon the shoulders of those who are already the chief sufferers from present conditions, that any increase in taxation found necessary should take the form of adjustments in the Income Tax Act, in order that those best able to pay should be the first and most heavily affected.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I am presenting this afternoon is worded in such a manner as to practically speak for itself. I think it will be agreed that owing to the drastic fall in commodity prices and the general depression which exists, the question of taxation assumes an added importance at the present time. May I say at the beginning that I fully appreciate the difficulties with which the government is confronted in times like this. I believe that the right hon. the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet are sparing neither time nor energy in endeavouring to meet the situation and to make conditions better in Canada. They are faced with a very difficult task and my hope is that the resolution which I am sponsoring this afternoon may assist in pointing the way to a better method of securing the moneys required from the people for the carrying on of the business of government in a manner that will be fair and equitable to all.

There is a very old saying that the only two things man is sure of in this life are death and taxation. I believe that the average man avoids meeting both as long as possible. The question of taxation is an old one. It was fought out by the British people many centuries ago when the principle was established that there should be no taxation without representation. Under our democratic form of government the theory is that if the people are well and truly represented laws will be made and a system of taxation devised that will be fair and equitable to all. If this were really true, then if adversity did come, how appropriate would be those lines which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), when bringing down his budget last year, quoted from the chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers:

> It wonderfully encourageth men in their duties when they see the burthen equally borne.

If we are passing through a depression for which no individual is responsible, then all should bear their share according to their ability to carry the load. The income tax system in Canada was first introduced as a war measure and was known as the Income War Tax Act of 1917. In the fiscal year 1930-31 the amount derived from this source was $71,048,022. Of this amount of income tax collected, $26,624,181 was paid by 143,601 individuals, and $44,423,841 by 7,603 corporations. The receipts of last year's income tax have been exceeded only once since its imposition, when in 1921-22 $78,600,000 was received. In that year individuals paid $39,820,000 and corporations $38,863,000. It is worthy of note that practically the same percentage of people contribute to the income tax in Canada as do the taxpayers in the United States, namely, one and one-half per cent.

In the United States the income tax system was first introduced about the time of the Civil war and was later found to be unconstitutional; but so convinced were the people of that country that the system was a fair and equitable means of raising revenue that they amended their constitution, a very difficult thing to do when we consider that they had to receive the consent of three-fifths of the state legislatures. This consent was received in 1913, and so successful has been the income tax in the United States that in the year 1925 nearly fifty-seven per cent of the total federal revenue came from income tax collections. In the same year in Great Britain over fifty per cent of the total revenue was derived from the income tax, and in Canada less then twenty per cent comes therefrom, so that the income tax in Canada, comparatively speaking, is not a burdensome tax. It might be further stated that to-day Germany, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway, Italy, Czechoslovakia, India, Japan, South Africa, Australia, the United States, Jamaica and other countries have adopted and retain the income tax as a means of raising revenue.

We find that a number of the provinces have either adopted or are about to adopt the system of taxations on incomes. I believe I am right in stating that the province of Quebec at the last sitting of its legislature imposed a one per cent income tax upon corporations. One of the principal arguments against the raising of the income tax is that if the tax is increased, capital will be withdrawn from the country. I wonder if that is true? What about Great Britain? In the year ended April, 1931, the British people paid income tax, including surtax, amounting to $1,576,310,000; an enormous sum.

With the consent of the house I should like to place on record comparative figures which show the rate of income tax paid in Canada, the United States and Great Britain. These figures deal with a married person without dependents, and give the rate for Canada, the present rate in the United States, the proposed new rate in the United States and the rate prevailing in Great Britain. The figures are as follows:

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF INCOME TAXES PAYABLE IN CANADA, GREAT BRITAIN, AND UNITED STATES—UNITED STATES PRESENT RATES AND PROPOSED NEW RATES

Income	Canada	Present Rate U.S.A.	Proposed New Rate U.S.A.	Britain
$ 3,000	Nil	Nil	$ 7 50	$ 242 33
5,000	$ 32	$ 16 88	37 50	649 69
10,000	232	101 25	165 00	1,764 16
15,000	632	311 25	515 00	3,281 95
30,000	2,880	1,488 75	2,275 00
50,000	6,704	4,563 75	6,095 00	18,891 78
100,000	19,064	15,743 75	22,575 00	45,777 07
200,000	51,496	40,743 75	65,575 00
300,000	87,048	65,743 75	109,575 00

These figures show that in Canada a man receiving up to $3,000 per year is exempt from taxation. The present rate in the United States allows a like exemption, but under the new rate, this man will have to pay $7.50, while in Great Britain a man receiving a similar income has to pay $242.33. A man receiving $10,000 per year pays in Canada, $232; in the United States, under the proposed rate, $165, and in Great Britain, $1,764. On a $50,000 income the tax in Canada is $6,704, the proposed new rate in the United States will be $6,095, while in Great Britain the tax amounts to $18,891. One can readily see that Canada as compared with Great Britain certainly is not overtaxed on income. The present rate of taxation in the United States runs from one and one-half to five per cent, with a surtax running up to twenty per cent. The proposed new rate runs from two to six per cent, with a surtax running up to forty per cent. It will be readily seen that the income tax in Great Britain is much higher than the tax in Canada, and yet will anyone say that there has been a flight of capital from Great Britain on that account? Are Canadians less patriotic? The proposed new rate in the United States will be higher than ours, especially on the larger incomes.

The United States has a tax of twelve per cent on corporations, while ours is only ten per cent, and we have no tax on dividends received from foreign investments. This should be rectified, for it will not prevent foreign capital coming here because the home country makes an allowance if the dividends have already been taxed. In this respect I understand most countries pursue a different policy from that of Canada.

There is another source of revenue to which I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). In doing this I should like to read a short article by A. N. Wolverton, of Vancouver, past president of the Vancouver stock exchange. This article reads, in part, as follows:

> The Dominion of Canada and most of the provinces are assiduously searching for additional sources of tax revenue. Every imaginable channel appears to have been investigated, and yet finance ministers are at their wits' end to balance budgets.
> But the most obvious source for such additional taxes is overlooked and has been overlooked for so many years that it leads to the suggestion that there must be some influence of paramount importance keeping it out of the limelight.
> Like most other modern countries, there are now hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of bonds held by Canadians. A very large proportion of such holdings are in the form of bearer securities.
> Unlike most modern countries, however, bond coupons in Canada are not taxed at the source.
> In the United States or England, no corporation nor individual can walk into a bank and cash a block of coupons at maturity unless a satisfactory income tax exemption form is attached. That tax exemption certificate is to all intents and purposes an affidavit—and if it is not forthcoming, the tax is collected then and there by the bank or financial house cashing the coupons—and there is no question about it.
> In Canada, however, there is comparatively little check made of income tax from bearer bonds. The holders of countless millions of bond coupons walk into any bank and receive one hundred per cent of the face value of their coupons without question, and without any proof that either dominion or provincial income tax has been satisfied.
> No suggestion is made that citizens of the Dominion of Canada are either more or less honest than the citizens of any other modern nation. Perhaps those millions of coupons are declared in personal or corporation income tax returns, but no other country in the world appears to be so confident in its citizens' honesty—and it is a practical surety that at least some of them "forget to declare" a substantial percentage of those maturing coupons.

If this matter is not already being dealt with by the minister, this article should disclose a source of revenue which has heretofore been neglected. The third clause of the resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas the drastic fall in price levels and the consequent increase in the purchasing value of money has seriously affected the producer and the business man, while being of corresponding benefit to those whose incomes, derived from certain classes of bonds, mortgages, etc., are still undiminished, if not increased.

That is a statement which cannot be denied. Commodity prices have fallen so sharply as materially to increase private debts. Take the case of the farmer. He contracted private debts when wheat was over $1 per bushel and now is attempting to pay them off with thirty and forty cent wheat. One can see quite readily the position he is in—it simply cannot be done. The farmer cannot meet any increase in commodity taxation, whereas the man on income finds that his purchasing power has been increased and consequently he is in a better position than before. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) stated in a recent debate that since 1790 this continent has had twenty-five periods of prosperity and we are now in the twenty-fourth period of depression. I believe that each succeeding depression is becoming more severe, and the wealth of the nation is being concentrated in the hands of fewer people. In support of this statement I should like to read a short excerpt from the Golden Age, as follows:

As Men and Monkeys View It

Perhaps the following figures from reports of the United States treasurer and bureau of statistics may shed some light on at least one fruitful cause of our present business depression.

In 1920 incomes of $1,000,000 or more totalled $77,078,139. In 1929 they totalled $1,185,135,330. In 1920 incomes of $5,000 or less totalled $15,274,217,215. In 1929 they totalled $8,282,000,000.

Thus in the last ten years the many skilled workers, small business men and the professional classes, those who usually spend about all their income, keeping the money moving in the channels of trade, have had their incomes cut almost in two, while the super-rich, who were already receiving vastly more than they put back into the channels of trade, now have fifteen times as much income as they had ten years ago, and are obliged to hunt "foreign markets" to loan their "surplus" because the dear people at home have no more gilt-edged security to put up for it.

Our wise statesmen and expert financiers seem somewhat addled, according to all their conflicting pronouncements, regarding the cause of and cure for our distressed condition. Among the numerous causes they assign they would have us believe it is because our granaries and banks are bulging with a "surplus" of commodities and money. Yet we see millions of our people suffering from want.

We believe there would be no suffering from hunger among a tribe of monkeys because nature had produced more coconuts than the monkeys could consume. But had they been endowed with as much intelligence as our efficiency experts and had nature also made all the leaves on the trees dollar bills, most of the poor monkeys would have to go hungry to bed because of an overproduction of food and an inflation of the currency.

There is a great deal of truth in that article. The farmer has been suffering for a long time, but as the depression continues, other classes are now being affected. It is like a creeping paralysis and I believe at the present time the great majority of the skilled workers, small business men and professional classes who usually spend most of their income, thus keeping the money moving in the channels of trade, find themselves to-day in a losing game. They are finding that the dice are loaded against them. If the system under which we are living permits of the control and manipulation of money by a few people for their special benefit, then a system of taxation should be devised to collect from them their proper share of the taxes, so that the burden may be borne equally by all. The average citizen to-day is carrying upon his shoulders a load which is hard to bear and to add to it is going to be most discouraging. The cost of living has fallen and salaries are being cut to meet that drop, but interest charges remain sacred. Is there any valid reason why the citizen who works should be penalized while the citizen with an income over and above a decent standard of living should be left to enjoy a premium? At this point I wish to place on record a resolution which was passed by the United Farmers of Alberta at their last annual convention:

Whereas, in the raising of the revenue of Canada the basic principle should be taxation according to the ability to pay, and

Whereas, the income tax is the only tax which is based upon this principle;

Therefore be it resolved, that we protest against reduction in the income tax on large incomes, while at the same time increasing taxes of the people;

Further be it resolved, that we stand for the increase and extension of the income tax so as to provide a much larger proportion of the revenue of Canada.

I am well aware that there may be in the house members who say that the farmers are glad to pass resolutions of this kind and who follow that up by saying that this is because the farmer evades paying income tax. I believe farmers as a class are no more honest or dishonest than any other class of people in Canada, and if they are not paying income tax to-day it is for the very obvious reason that they have no income on which to pay. It does not speak very well for the system under which we are living that those who are engaged in the basic industry of the country and who are producing the primary wealth, find themselves in such a position.

If I might quote the figures of the reduction in the value of the field crops of Canada in the last three years, hon. members will have some idea how the farmer has had his purchasing power reduced. The figures are as follows:

Year	Estimated value of field crops of Canada
1931	$431,251,000
1930	631,592,900
1929	948,981,400

With the tremendous drop in the prices of all basic commodities, the purchasing power of the dollar is greater to-day than it has been for a long time.

The Prime Minister, speaking on Friday last on the proposed reduction of the salaries of the civil service, placed on record figures from the Department of Labour, showing that as compared with 1926 the average cost of living had dropped 14·4 per cent and that salaries were being cut by ten per cent. The inference to be drawn from those figures is of course that the individual, even with the ten per cent cut, is better off than he was in 1926.

I am endeavouring here to score an important point and I trust hon. members will appreciate its significance. If the figures presented by the right hon. gentleman are correct and the cost of living has fallen by 14·4 per cent, this means that the purchasing power of the dollar has increased by the same amount. Then, may I ask: If all the citizens of Canada are to be treated alike, why should those fortunate enough to be drawing incomes from investment not also contribute a like ten per cent? Surely the citizen who is fortunate enough to be drawing an income from investment is no less patriotic than the man who is living on a salary. I would make this exception: I would adhere to our present exemptions, thus the aged and the poor widow, for whom so much concern is shown whenever this matter is discussed, would not be denied a decent standard of living. I trust we are not going to adopt in peace time the same policy that we do in war and say: You may conscript my own flesh and blood; you may sacrifice those who are near and dear, but keep your hands off my almighty dollar. I believe the time is coming shortly, if indeed it is not already here, when the great masses of the people will no longer submit to this doctrine, especially since they are getting wise to the way in which a great deal of wealth is being accumulated, namely, through such deals as Beauharnois and other similar methods of high finance. While most classes are suffering, the man with the high income finds himself in a preferred position. Take the man with an income to-day of $10,000: in Canada he pays an income tax of $232 while in Great Britain he contributes $1,764.

Mr. ARTHURS: And in the United States?

Mr. LUCAS: Under the proposed new tax he will contribute $165.

Mr. ARTHURS: But the present tax?

Mr. LUCAS: $101. The proposed new tax shows a considerable increase. If the man with an income of $10,000 were being dealt with in the same manner as the man on salary who is receiving a cut of ten per cent, this would mean that the man with an income of $10,000 would pay another $1,000 which would make $1,232 as compared with $1,764 in Great Britain. An income of $50,000 pays in Canada $6,704 and in Britain $18,891. An income of $100,000 pays in Canada $19,064, and in Britain pays $45,777. Another ten per cent on the Canadian income would bring the Canadian's tax up to a little over $29,000, or roughly speaking, $30,000, which would leave him $70,000 upon which to exist. This might be a little difficult, but he would at least not have to worry.

[Mr. Lucas.]

Mr. ARTHURS: If the hon. gentleman wants to make his argument absolutely fair, he should include the income rates in the United States at all stages.

Mr. LUCAS: Our income tax in Canada has not in the past been based upon the United States income tax; we have had a much higher rate, but the proposed new rate in the United States will be higher than our present rate when we reach the higher incomes. If we take a few thousands more from the man with the higher income, the worst that can happen is that we may hurt his feelings, possibly very badly. But when you propose to take from the lower classes an amount which brings their earnings below what we consider to be a necessary standard of living, it means real hardship; it means real sacrifice; it means under-nourishment for growing children, future Canadians; it means lack of proper medical attention; which in turn means Canadian children facing life under handicaps which may perhaps ultimately never be overcome. To me it is unthinkable, Mr. Speaker, that in this so-called enlightened age we would for a moment consider sacrificing human lives and human happiness to the god of gold.

I should like to call the attention of hon. members to the change in the trend of opinion which has taken place in the last fifty years with regard to taxation. Take, for instance, succession duties, or the inheritance tax. Less than fifty years ago it was considered that a man's savings during his lifetime were his alone to pass or to his heirs just as he saw fit. We know what a change of opinion has taken place in that regard, and that at the present time every person's estate is subjected to a very steeply graduated inheritance tax. To-day public opinion is growing in favour of a steeply graduated income tax, and I think that field should be further explored at the present time with a view to meeting the further taxation that may be required. I believe the time is coming in Canada when our income tax must be so adjusted that those enjoying higher incomes will have to assume their rightful share of the burden of taxation. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the house may see fit to adopt my resolution.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we in this corner of the house have frequently been accused of bringing forward and presenting for the consideration of the house resolutions and suggestions which have been said to be wholly academic in character, vague in their application, and having no immediate relation to the everyday problems of the present time. As to whether this accusation is wholly justified, that is another story, but one which I do not propose to discuss at the moment save to say this, that there is a remote possibility that some of these so-called academic resolutions which suggest more or less fundamental changes in our social and economic systems may in point of fact be just as practical and possibly of very much greater value to the future of this country than many of the so-called practical suggestions, the absence of which is so greatly deplored by our critics. However that may be, no such criticism can be offered in respect of the present resolution, dealing as it does with a matter which is of immediate import and of immediate effect upon the well-being of every individual citizen of this country, as well as upon the financial necessities of the state, and which from every point of view is at once highly opportune and eminently practical.

Nor is this proposal advanced, Mr. Speaker, with any purpose of embarrassing the administration. On the contrary, it should be welcomed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) and by his associates in that it affords an opportunity to the members of this house of pronouncing upon this important question, and if supported by the majority of the members here the resolution will greatly strengthen the hands of the government in dealing with a matter which in the very nature of things is bound to be highly unpopular in many influential quarters.

The hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) in introducing this resolution has presented the case with such clarity and has supported his contention with such a wealth of irrefutable logic that little remains to be said by myself in seconding the resolution or by others who may speak in its support save to reiterate, to amplify and stress the arguments which have already been advanced in my hon. friend's most excellent and convincing address, and to anticipate so far as possible some of the objections which may be raised by those who are opposed to this method of taxation.

As to the necessity of increased taxation at the present time, little need be said. We are all familiar with the position of the national exchequer to-day, and if further argument were required it may be found by a glance at the estimates which are now before the house, estimates in which in a noble effort to balance the budget we find that most of the services have been cut most drastically, that staffs in many of the departments have been materially reduced, and that throughout the service the salaries have been slashed to a point which in some cases will fail to come up to the level of a satisfactory or even a decent livelihood. We find that there is a net reduction in the proposed expenditure appearing in the estimates for the coming year of some $43,000,000. Indeed, the actual reduction is more than that figure would indicate, because we also find that there is an increase of some $13,000,000 of interest on the public debt to be paid during the coming year. So the net reduction in controllable expenditure will be in the neighbourhood of $56,000,000. I am not at the moment going to discuss the wisdom or otherwise of this policy. I am not at the moment going to analyze the situation and consider whether the ultimate effect of these drastic cuts will be to relieve or to intensify the difficulties of the situation, but for the moment looking at it wholly from the point of view of the administration and the Prime Minister, the necessity of balancing the budget at all costs, we must realize that even these sacrifices in themselves will not achieve the objective and bring about a balanced budget without some increase in our national revenues, which means increased taxation. This fact I think is generally recognized throughout the country, and the question being asked at the present time on all sides and in many quarters with anxiety and deep concern is as to what method of taxation may be adopted and upon whose shoulders will the added burden fall. Indications have already appeared in the press suggesting the methods which may be adopted, suggesting increases in our present fields of taxation as well as new fields which may be explored. Those indications have been taken so seriously in many quarters as to form the basis of many comments, adverse and otherwise, and to have aroused much discussion both public and private, as well as inspiring many resolutions by various organized bodies of business men. Of these resolutions it would be premature for me to speak at this moment, until we know more definitely the intentions of the government. May I, however, make this comment? All of the resolutions which I have seen and all of the discussion which I have heard are based upon the anticipation that these increases will take the form of increased commodity taxation of one sort or another, either by way of an increased sales tax, a turnover tax or what not; but whatever method is adopted, it seems to be universally expected that the increase will follow that principle of commodity taxation. I most fervently hope, Mr. Speaker, that such will not be the case.

It is not my intention at the moment to enter upon any general discussion either of conditions or of taxation, but may I comment upon one phase of both which is a factor, and a most potent factor, to be considered at the present time and in the present situation. I think it is generally recognized that in this country is sufficient wealth to enable us to meet all our obligations, to meet every demand made upon us, and to provide an acceptable livelihood for all our people. It is also, I think, generally recognized that this wealth is not equitably distributed amongst all classes of our population. That some greater equality of distribution should be brought about is a consummation devoutly to be desired. The method by which it may be accomplished is a problem which is as yet unsolved and towards the solution of which, so far as I know, no full and comprehensive plan has yet been offered. It has been stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) that all of us are anxious that this should be done. It has also been stated, and by the same hon. gentleman, that so far no plan has been offered and that this desirable consummation remains but a pious aspiration. I am not challenging that statement, nor am I attempting to suggest to this house any such full or comprehensive plan.

But in admitting that this problem does exist, in admitting that this inequality of wealth is present in our land, we are also admitting a certain definite responsibility, in that so far as we have power within our hands to control the situation we should use that power to rectify rather than enhance it. At the moment and without discussing more deep-seated, more fundamental changes of any kind, the most potent weapon we have in our hands for this purpose is the power of taxation, and in the resolution we are proposing that this weapon should be used, and should be used effectively. As stated in the resolution itself, while the great body of producers in Canada have suffered, and are suffering, tremendous losses through the tragically low prices of all our primary products, a small but disproportionately wealthy class of our citizens—who were in a position to invest in the recent issues of national and provincial bonds, for example—are actually profiting from the situation. Amidst the crash of falling values there is one commodity which has not only retained but actually increased in its market value—the commodity of money. Those who own and control that commodity are undoubtedly enriched both by the higher interest rates which are now prevailing—higher than I have ever known in respect of dominion or provincial bonds during my residence in this country—and by the increased purchasing power of each dollar. This being the case,—and I think no one here will challenge the accuracy of the statement—equity and sound policy alike would indicate that any increased taxation should be levied, not upon the goods already produced below cost, but upon the money itself—upon the one commodity which shows a constantly increasing profit.

Revenue from taxation, whether direct or indirect, must in the end be paid out of income, and the soundest and most economical way to collect that tax upon income is to collect it directly. Unquestionably, Mr. Speaker, the inevitable effect of present price levels, with the value of money and commodities so completely out of line—the money value of commodities so extremely low, and the commodity value of money so excessively high—must be to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer. The main corrective that we have for this situation is, as I stated, our control over taxation, the power and authority which lies in this house to take for the use of the national exchequer a fair proportion of all incomes, particularly of the larger ones. The argument which is most frequently advanced by those who are opposed to any increase of taxation upon the larger incomes is that it is to these incomes you must look for investment, for the expansion of existing industry and for the creation and establishment of new industry. While this is partially true, it is also true that it is to the multitude of those earning small incomes we must look rather than to the comparatively few wealthy individuals when we seek a market for the products of our farms and our factories. Unquestionably a million dollars divided among ten thousand individuals is of infinitely greater value to the agricultural, industrial and commercial life of this country than the same sum in the hands of a dozen wealthy men, because the smaller the income—and this is a truism, but it is so frequently forgotten apparently that it is well to reiterate it at times—the greater proportion of that income that must be spent upon the so-called necessities of life; in other words, upon the goods which are produced in this and in other countries. As a result, the greater the number amongst whom purchasing power is distributed the greater must be demand for those goods. For after all, as a consumer, the consuming capacity of the wealthiest man is extremely limited, and he can only spend a comparatively trivial percentage of his wealth on those goods which are produced. Any reduction therefore in these smaller incomes must lead to a general curtailment of consumption throughout the country, it must lower the standard of living for thousands of our families, and it must mean a corresponding diminution in the already inadequate markets which are available to our producers.

It is on these grounds, Mr. Speaker, that we are urging the adoption of this resolution, as well as upon the ground of immediate expediency. For after all there are still two main pillars upon which every sound system of taxation should rest, that each individual shall contribute to the state in proportion, first, to his ability to pay, and, second, to the benefits which he derives from living and doing business in the country. Both of these may be expressed in terms of income. May I venture, then, to suggest to the Minister of Finance that just as they say, gold is where you find it, so the place to look for money is where money is. At the present time it is not in the hands of the producer, the wage earner or the low-salaried man, but of those whose incomes are derived from the possession of money itself. These by means of certain adjustments of the Income Tax Act may be made to contribute a much larger proportion to our federal revenues than is at present the case.

It is true that in suggesting the most obvious and the most logical source for increasing our national revenue will be found amongst those who possess the largest part of the wealth of this country we are suggesting a very radical departure from prevailing practice. It is not too much to say that the opposite has been the definite policy of this and of most other countries. An extremely vivid illustration of this practice will be found in the juxtaposition of two incidents which took place in this house on Friday last. Two bills were then introduced, the first providing for something over $11,000,000 for the Canadian National Railways, necessitated in large part for the protection of the bondholders of the railway in respect of interest due. The second bill was that which provided for a ten per cent cut in the salaries of our civil servants. These two motions taken together, Mr. Speaker, were to me most significant. The interest upon capital is sacred, it must be protected; the wages and salaries of our working people must be sacrificed upon the altar of financial necessity and to provide a balanced budget. Yet why should this be? It is true, as has been stated more than once, that the interests of our bondholders are protected by statute and by our given word. So, too, were the salaries of our civil servants. Were those two motions symbolic of the relative status we accord those two great partners in our national development, in all our national undertakings, capital and labour? I trust not, and if not, if it is our policy to accord to both an equality of status, of dignity and of respect, the income tax affords us our opportunity.

May I suggest also, Mr. Speaker, that we should have some consideration for our more wealthy citizens. We should not refuse to them the glorious opportunities which have been accorded our civil employees. As I heard the Prime Minister and listened to that splendid eloquence with which he illustrated and illumined the really noble sentiments which he uttered, as he spoke of the patriotic motives which actuated at least part of our civil service in accepting the reduction, not reluctantly or grudgingly but gladly and joyfully, taking a deep and keen pleasure in this opportunity of being of service to their country in her hour of need, I thought to myself: Why should we selfishly restrict this pleasure to a limited class? Why not afford that same opportunity and grant that same privilege to the relatively wealthy men and women who are in Canada to-day? In this, as in other matters, our motto should be equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of all the foregoing facts, and in spite of the glowing words of the Prime Minister, this suggestion might prove unpopular in some quarters, and it has been stated, as indicated also by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) in his address, that the chief exponents of an increased income tax are those who, like the organized farmers, do not come under this form of taxation. That the average farmer does not pay income tax unfortunately is true, but that does not militate against the soundness of the proposal. If you consider for a moment, Mr. Speaker, the situation in which agriculture finds itself, with the price levels of all the commodities produced so low, you will readily appreciate the fact that it is the misfortune of the farmer and not his fault that he does not pay income tax. Nothing would please the average farmer more—not to be taxed; I am not going to say anyone likes to be taxed—than to operate upon such a basis as would bring him within the terms of our Income Tax Act, and may I further add that the great percentage of our federal revenues always have been obtained through one form or another of commodity taxation, and of this the farmer always has paid and probably always will pay his full share. Indeed, it is this very fact that the average farmer does not and cannot pay any form of income tax, that his income and profits alike have been reduced far below the vanishing point, which affords the most potent and cogent argument in favour of this resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask a question? He spoke of two measures introduced in this house on Friday. One was to provide for the payment of debts that had been incurred. Do I understand him to contend that this country should repudiate its obligations?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: No, Mr. Speaker, I made no such suggestion. I simply called attention to the juxtaposition of those two motions showing the degree of protection afforded to one class, as against the degree afforded to another class of people in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not the point. One is an obligation outstanding which must be met or else the credit of this country will go and we will become repudiators. That is all.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the case for the resolution has been so ably presented by the two hon. gentlemen who preceded me that there is very little left for me to say. However, I wish to direct the attention of this house to the fact that the income tax rate in Canada to-day is very much lower than the rate in effect during the years 1921 and 1922, when we had the last depression. I believe our income tax rates could be increased substantially and still be lower than the rates which were in force at that time.

During the lifetime of the preceding government substantial reductions were made from time to time in the income tax, and each of those reductions was opposed from this corner of the house. I believe in every instance we moved an amendment to the budget expressing our disapproval of that policy. To-day this country finds itself in a financial position more serious than we have ever faced before, and if there was justification for this exceptionally high rate in 1921 surely there is double reason for it now.

I should like to place on record a few of the figures in order to show the extent to which these reductions in the income tax have been made since 1921. I may say that these figures refer to a married man without children. The incomes, with the amounts contributed under the income tax in 1921 and 1930, are as follows:

$ 3,000	$ 40 00	$ ——
3,500	60 00	8
4,000	80 00	16
5,000	126 00	32
6,000	178 50	56
7,000	283 50	88
8,000	388 50	128
9,000	504 00	176
10,000	619 50	232
20,000	2,089 50	1,232
30,000	4,084 50	2,880
40,000	6,604 50	4,712
50,000	9,649 50	6,704
60,000	13,219 50	8,856
70,000	17,314 50	11,168
80,000	21,934 50	13,640
100,000	32,749 50	19,064
150,000	64,249 50	34,544
300,000	169,249 50	87,048
400,000	243,799 50	124,200

I understand that this is the highest income in Canada to-day, so I need go no further. The previous income tax was put into effect by the present party occupying the treasury benches. They left office in 1921 with the income tax as it was then, and surely if the financial condition in 1921 justified the maintenance of a tax of that kind there is double necessity for it to-day. I therefore appeal to the same party who first placed this income tax legislation on the statue books to make a substantial increase in the present figures and so assist the country in the worst financial crisis through which it has ever passed.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I just want to add one thought to the very excellent presentation of this resolution, and that is that a great many people in Canada who have really large incomes have them because of special privileges that were granted to them or to their forbears by this parliament. As all of us know, the great incomes can pretty well be traced to the special privileged groups such as the financial and banking group, those who benefit from tariff protection and those who have legally been able to clear out with a large portion of Canada's natural resources. When one thinks of Ottawa one thinks of people immensely wealthy through lumber they got for next to nothing in the early days. That being true, that the great incomes have come almost wholly from special privileges granted to these groups by this house, it does seem to me only fair, it is nothing but justice, that they should pay back in income tax, and quite a saucy income tax too, out of the income that special privilege has allowed them to accumulate. Every other point I can think of has been covered and I cannot see how this house can vote against the resolution with times as they are at the moment.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): One point that might be given consideration, a point that has not been recognized, is the importance of drawing a distinction between income derived from investments and income from salaries. I believe that distinction is drawn in the income tax legislation in the old country. When discussing this question in the past, urging further taxation of incomes derived from bonds and dividends, we have always heard of the hypothetical case of the poor widow who would be severely penalized by a tax on an income of three or four thousand dollars derived from investments. Some of us did not give much consideration to an argument of that kind and I do not think it is worthy of consideration. In my opinion a distinction should be drawn between income derived from investments, which is a permanent thing, and income derived from salary.

Let us take the case of the widow, which has been referred to in the past, whose husband has left her a large investment. She has that income going on from year to year—

Mr. GOTT: She may not be living to-day.

Mr. BROWN: That is a remark one might expect from that quarter of the house. Her husband, as I was saying, might have left her an income derived from a large investment, and she is in an entirely different position from the widow whose wage-earner died and left her without any income.

Mr. BENNETT: She pays no tax.

Mr. BROWN: In both cases, while the husbands were alive, the income might have been the same, derived in one case from an investment and in the other from a salary. I am not going to discuss the matter at any length; it has been very ably presented; but I do want to call the attention of the house to that point, that there should be a distinction between incomes derived from investments and those derived from salaries or made perhaps by conducting a certain business.

Mr. BOYES: What about the sessional indemnity of members of the House of Commons? Does the hon. member refer to those as being exempt?

Mr. BROWN: Just at the moment I do not feel called upon to discuss that question. Now that it has been raised, however, I may observe that, as everyone knows, the sessional indemnity of $4,000 is not all income by any means. I think everyone knows that while we are taxed on $4,000 we are taxed on money that we have to spend in many ways. I do not know why the hon. member should have raised the question at the moment.

Mr. BOYES: You spoke of salaries.

Mr. BROWN: Just at the moment I do not care to discuss that question. We have accepted the reduction in the indemnity because we have realized that it is necessary, but I do not suppose that we, any more than anyone else, accept gladly or gratefully any reduction in income. But the question is entirely apart from the subject under discussion.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I could not help contrasting the attitude of those who have spoken on this resolution to-day with the attitude of the house when the proposals were first made in the year 1917. I recall the situation at that time very well indeed. In fact, the then Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Sir Thomas White, in bringing down his proposals, was at pains to point out that the provinces and municipalities were limited in their scope of direct taxation whereas the dominion field was unlimited and very much larger in its area than that afforded to either the provinces or the municipalities. He took the point of view at that time that the question of income tax was one purely for the provinces and municipalities. He said on that occasion:

> As I have stated, the provinces and the municipalities are confined to direct taxation, and I have not regarded it as expedient, except in case of manifest public necessity, such as I believe exists at the present time, that the dominion should invade the field to which the provinces are solely confined for the raising of their revenue.

My more particular purpose in making reference to that question is this. Those who have spoken on this resolution—I regret that more have not done so—have apparently overlooked entirely the fact that the income taxpayer is called upon to pay not only by the dominion but by the municipal and provincial treasuries as well; and there is a disposition in both those fields to increase very heavily the burden of the income taxpayer. As a matter of fact, if my memory serves me rightly, in one province alone it is contemplated during the present year to double the existing income tax.

One would rather gather from the remarks of hon. gentlemen who support the resolution that there has been a marked disparity between the income taxpayer and others who pay taxes in the country, very much to the advantage of the income taxpayer. Particular reference was made to the man who pays very large income tax. Whatever may be said with respect to the rates themselves, so far as their application to individuals is concerned, there is nothing whatsoever in that contention. Take the case of our own country last year. We had a total of 143,601 persons who paid income tax, the total amount paid by them being a little more than $26,500,000; I speak now of purely personal income tax. Of that number, some 13,447 paid no less a sum than $23,256,550; in other words, the number which I have just indicated paid that sum as against $3,367,631 paid by some 130,154 income tax payers in the lower categories.

Mr. MacINNIS: How much had they left after they paid that large income tax?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will be able to answer that question himself by an examination of the income tax tables, but the figures which I will give in a moment will afford an answer in part.

I regret I could not follow the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas). I heard him only indistinctly at this distance, whether it was because I am slightly deaf as a result of a cold or because of the acoustic properties of this chamber, I do not know. However, I heard him make one or two particular remarks, to which I will refer. If I have missed others, I hope he will understand why I am not referring to them as well.

The hon. gentleman referred to the income tax in Great Britain as compared to the tax in Canada. He must bear in mind that not only have we a dominion income tax, but we have in addition municipal and provincial income taxes. There is another very important point which should be kept in mind when making comparisons with the Canadian income tax, and that is that our tax must bear some reasonable relationship to the rates prevailing in the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): How many provinces in Canada have an income tax?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot answer that question off hand.

Mr. BENNETT: Four, at the moment.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: It does not require any perfect argument to indicate the danger of our income tax in Canada being substantially out of line with the rate of taxation in the republic to the south. Capital is very sensitive and it will not remain long upon one side of an imaginary line if it can transfer to the other and be more lightly burdened. However, this is altogether apart from the merits of the question of whether we have or have not at the present time a sufficiently high income tax in Canada, and upon this point I will touch later on.

At the present time low as our income tax may be as compared to the tax in Great Britain or as compared to the rates prevailing in 1921, as pointed out by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), they are substantially higher than the taxes applied in the United States. I have the figures before me, but I will not weary the house by reading them in full; I will quote only a few examples. A married man without dependents with an income of $4,000 would pay in Canada an income tax of $16 as compared with $5.63 in the United States. An income of $8,000 would pay in Canada $128 as compared to $56.25 in the United States. An income of $14,000 would pay $536 in Canada and $258.75 in the United States. An income of $20,000 would pay $1,232 in Canada and $618.75 in the United States. A $30,000 income pays $2,880 in Canada and $1,488.75 in the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Are those the present United States figures?

Mr. RHODES: Yes; I am not speaking of the proposed increased taxation.

In making a comparison between the rates of income tax in Canada and in the United States I would point out to the right hon. member for Mackenzie that he must not overlook the fact that federal, state and municipal bonds are tax exempt in the United States. This makes a vast difference in dealing with the question of income taxes, as this condition does not obtain in Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Those bonds command a higher rate on the market and for that reason there is a lower return to the purchaser.

Mr. RHODES: I do not see how that has any bearing upon the question of income tax.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It means that the bondholder receives a lower rate of interest on his bond because it is tax free.

Mr. RHODES: That depends entirely upon what the income of the man may be. He might very well be able to afford to purchase tax free bonds returning one per cent if it reduced his income tax below a figure which would involve a high degree of taxation.

A man receiving an income of $50,000 pays $6,704 in Canada and $4,563.75 in the United States. An income of $100,000 pays $19,064 in Canada and $15,743.75 in the United States. We come now to the class of which most of us only read in the story books but which seems to give considerable worry to my hon. friends diagonally opposite. A man with an income of half a million dollars pays an income tax of $162,952 in Canada and $115,743.75 in the United States. The man who may have a million dollars of income pays $362,928 in Canada whereas in the United States he would pay a tax of $240,743.75.

Not to go at length into the merits, it might be interesting to know that even with a rate which is regarded by hon. gentlemen diagonally opposite as being too low, during the last fiscal year the income taxpayers of Canada paid twenty-three per cent of our total federal income. It is worthy of note that since the income tax first came into vogue fourteen years ago, the income taxpayers have paid into the treasury no less a sum than $743,000,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The average would be a little more than twenty-three per cent, having regard to the higher rates which have prevailed.

Mr. RHODES: Having regard to the fact that the present rate is much lower as compared to the years preceding, the rate in former years would be substantially higher, although I have not the exact figures in that regard.

The hon. member for Camrose referred to some remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the house last week, wherein he indicated that the cost of living had diminished to the extent of 14.4 per cent. My hon. friend said that that argument might be turned around and it might be said that money was now worth 14.4 per cent more in purchasing power. Very good. Then he said: Why should the income tax payer not pay an extra ten per cent, or in other words have his income cut to that extent in the same manner as civil servants were called upon to make a contribution of ten per cent? I would think perhaps in the circumstances the income tax payer would be very happy to accept that as a final settlement of the question. But the point I want to make in connection with that is that it is not at all in keeping with the resolution of my hon. friend. His resolution, stripped of its verbiage and brought down to bare essentials, means this, that to the extent that we require additional taxation in this country we must take the whole of it from the income tax payer. That is rather a far-fetched proposition, it seems to me. Leaving aside altogether the question of the comparative rates as between ourselves and the United States, leaving aside the question of the merits as to just how high income taxation can be, one must realize there is a limit beyond which you may not go in any field of taxation. There is a line and if you attempt to go beyond it, it will serve to defeat the very object you have in mind. You are not going to produce revenue in proportion to the amount that you increase taxation. That has been found out not only in this country but in other countries times without number.

But having said so much, let me say this to my hon. friend: I would not take exception to a resolution which took the sense of the house as indicating that there should be a substantial increase in income taxation, although I might point out that it would not be incumbent upon me at this stage and upon a resolution of this kind, to pronounce any policy with respect to the attitude of the government in regard to the matter of increased taxation. But that is not what he has submitted. Apart altogether from any inequalities which are bound to arise in taxation, he would debar us from entering any other avenue of taxation which we might very properly enter, and he would have the whole burden with respect to any increase in revenue which we might require, laid upon the income tax payer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He asks the government only to give consideration to it.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so, but were the principle in this resolution to be accepted, the government would be debarred from entering any other field of taxation open to it. That is as I read the resolution. If I have misread it, I am open to correction. The hon. member's resolution reads:

> Any increase in taxation found necessary should take the form of adjustments in the Income Tax Act, in order that those best able to pay should be the first and most heavily affected.

I do not think I am doing my hon. friend any injustice and I believe I am putting a proper interpretation on the resolution when I say that, bearing that in mind, we are absolutely precluded from accepting it. Having said so much, I would hope that it would suit the purposes of my hon. friend to withdraw his resolution, but if that does not meet with his wishes, especially having in mind the fact that there is a slimly attended house and the further fact that so few have spoken on the resolution, I would take the opportunity of moving the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion, may I interject that I think my hon. friend (Mr. Rhodes) is perhaps taking rather a drastic course with respect to this matter. I intended to say something about this contention that if the government accepted the motion, this would be the only field of taxation which the government would be allowed to enter. If my hon. friend will look at the concluding words of the resolution, he will see that such is hardly the case.

Mr. RHODES: I moved the adjournment only for the purpose of enlarging the discussion because apparently nobody else wished to speak. If any other hon. member wishes to speak, with the consent of the house, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to occupy the time of the house for a moment or two on this question. I am sorry I do not get out of the resolution the same meaning that the Minister of Finance has taken. I do not believe that if it were accepted he would be precluded from increasing taxation in other fields. If he were, of course I can quite see the handicap under which he would be acting in accepting the resolution.

As was very aptly pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) the attitude of the government with regard to taxation has been to increase taxes upon commodities. There have been substantial increases and last year the then Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), introduced a substantial change in the income tax which was not carried into effect. Just what that change would have meant, it is difficult to say because we had not the opportunity of discussing it. I should not be forecasting what the government intend to do at this session, but I have no doubt we shall have some substantial changes in the income tax. It seems to me the house is entitled to expect this inasmuch as we have had substantial increases in other lines of taxation. Having in mind the fact that the individual must of necessity have the income before he can be taxed, I cannot feel any great sympathy for those who would oppose an increased tax upon incomes. I quite recognize the fact that there is double taxation so far as incomes are concerned, but is that not true in almost every other field of taxation upon which we are asked to make payments? Of course the municipalities and the provinces do not invade the field of taxation in regard to sales, but in many other respects we find duplication between the provinces and the municipalities. It seems to me, if an individual is in receipt, after all deductions are made, of a very substantial income, he should be called upon, particularly at times like this, to pay a much larger proportion of the taxation of the country than he is asked to pay under the present schedules. It is true I was a member of a government that reduced those schedules, but at the same time we were reducing commodity taxation as well. It is also true that hon. members to my left opposed those reductions, but we had a feeling that if we were reducing taxation, having in mind the fact that commodity taxation was fairly adjusted, we were entitled to make reductions in the income tax. Now that taxation is increasing, I wish merely to say that I am entirely in accord with the resolution that the government should take into consideration this field of taxation when undoubtedly they will have to make increases, if not all along the line, at least in a good many avenues from which they are now deriving taxes. For that reason, believing that the government are not precluded from taxing in other fields, I am going to support the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, just before you put the question I should like to make a remark or two upon this resolution. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has indicated that it was the opinion of some parliamentarians some time ago that income taxation should more properly fall within the jurisdiction of provincial government. I agree with that point of view. The Dominion government has the right, I presume, to place a tax on anything or on anybody, whereas the field of taxation for the provinces is very considerably limited.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that a motion to adjourn the debate is not debatable.

Mr. RHODES: Pardon me, Mr. Speaker. I said that with the consent of the house I would withdraw my motion.

Mr. IRVINE: I was saying that the field for provincial taxation is very considerably limited. As far as I am concerned, I agree with the point of view that this particular field should be left entirely to the provinces, but unfortunately the provinces do not seem to have awakened to the great opportunity which is here afforded them and they have not taken any action in that respect. I think such action should have been taken by the provinces long ago, and so for that reason the Dominion government might well perhaps set an example to them by indicating a field in which rich harvests might be reaped. At the present time the provincial governments are all in need of funds, as are all governments everywhere. I believe that there has been before the provincial government of Alberta a resolution somewhat similar to the one that is now under discussion here. I do not know, of course, what action the province of Alberta will take, but I do hope that they will impose an income tax. Meanwhile we have an income tax here, and the question is whether we should increase it or leave it as it is, in view of the present circumstances. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) took the ordinary course which finance ministers usually take in connection with a resolution of this kind when he pointed out that any action taken by this country in this respect must have a reasonable relation to the amount of income tax imposed in the United States in order that there might not be a flight of capital to that country. I do not think that the flight of capital argument need be very seriously considered at this time, for this reason: Never perhaps in the history of Canada was there so much money lying around waiting for an opportunity to be invested as now, and in face of that fact it is a strange thing that the provincial governments should be paying as high as six and in some cases six and a half per cent for the money that they borrow. If this is not ruled out of order, Mr. Speaker, I think that that practice is a very dangerous thing, for you cannot expect people to invest money in industry, where there is always a risk, when they can get six and one-half per cent from a provincial government guaranteed by the entire wealth of the province. I think that the provincial government should be raising money at three per cent, and if they cannot get it at that rate I think they should conscript it so as to force money into investment in other channels to give employment in this country. There is no danger of money fleeing from Canada to the United States at the present time because they have more money there than they know what to do with, just the same as we have here, and they have no place to invest it because no place is safe just now, and so there is no danger of a flight of capital from this country to the United States.

I ought to take the opportunity to point out that the Prime Minister perhaps misunderstood the point of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) when he drew a contrast between one bill which asks for $11,000,000 and another which provides for the cutting of the salaries of the civil servants. The hon. member for Red Deer was not suggesting that there should be a repudiation of the debt, but rather that, without repudiating the obligation, there should be increased taxation upon those who stand to profit by the country fulfilling its obligations. That puts the matter in a very different light.

Another point which might be brought forward in connection with the criticism of the Minister of Finance is that there cannot be much danger of capital fleeing to the United States from Canada when in this country we impose on a million dollar income a tax of $362,000, whereas in the United States the income tax on the same income is only $240,000. If capital will not flee when there is a difference of over $120,000 in income taxation on a million dollars, how much of a difference will it flee for, I would like to know? I would like to know just how far we can go safely and still prevent it from fleeing. I would not mind risking going a little further and see what happens.

I think we all appreciate the point taken by the Minister of Finance, that he does not wish to commit the government in anticipation of the budget by stating to what extent the government will consider an increase in taxation in any respect, but I believe that he read the resolution somewhat narrowly, if I may be permitted to say so, for it merely asks that the government consider the question that any increase in taxation found necessary should take the form of adjustments in the Income Tax Act, in order that those best able to pay should be the first and most heavily affected. The point to be emphasized is that those who have the highest incomes should be the "first," and they should be asked to pay first because they have the money with which to pay. They also should be the most heavily taxed because they are the best able to pay it. I think the Finance minister suggested that if that part of the resolution had been a little more reasonably worded the government might have permitted it to go through without committing itself in anticipation of the budget, so therefore I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), that the motion be amended by inserting after the word "that" in the fourth line of the last paragraph of the resolution the words "to the extent found possible."

Mr. BENNETT: How will it read then?

Mr. IRVINE: It would simply mean then, any increase of taxation contemplated would be imposed upon incomes to the extent found possible.

Mr. BOWMAN: Should not the amending words be inserted after the word "increase" instead of after the word "that"?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Before the amendment is put, Mr. Speaker, I would like your ruling as to whether the original motion is in order. Personally I do not think it is in order for a private member to move a resolution involving the expenditure of public money.

Mr. SPEAKER: The resolution simply asks that the government take the question into consideration. I think it is quite in order. Mr. Irvine moves that this resolution be amended by inserting after the word "that" in the fourth line of the last paragraph of the resolution the words "to the extent found possible."

Mr. BENNETT: That does not make sense.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think the amendment improves the resolution at all. I can quite see the objections of the Minister of Finance. I am personally in sympathy with the spirit of the resolution, but the objection voiced by the Minister of Finance is I think that any increase in taxation found necessary should take the form of adjustments. That is absolutely mandatory upon the government. If my hon. friends would permit the resolution to be phrased somewhat along this line, that among the increases in taxation found necessary there shall be given consideration to adjustments in the income tax, it would I think overcome the objections of the minister and would also carry out the principle advocated by my hon. friends to my left.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I do not rise to address the house again, Mr. Speaker, but merely to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Would not the last paragraph read perfectly intelligibly in either case; that is, either in its present form, or with the words "to the extent found possible" instead of the words "found necessary"?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, I think I indicated in the course of my remarks that if this resolution had meant that the government in considering increased taxation should consider increased income tax, the resolution would be acceptable. But I do adhere to the objection which I took to the original motion, and which I think still obtains to the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). In that respect I may say that I am wholly with my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). If an amendment to this motion were couched in terms similar to those suggested by him it would be entirely acceptable to the government.

Amendment (Mr. Irvine) negatived.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was good enough to let me have a glance at the comparative figures of income taxation in Canada and in the United States. There is attached a schedule of the new income tax that is likely to be imposed in the United States. I notice that our tax on a $4,000 is about three times as much as that levied in the United States—roughly about $16 to $5. But on an income of $100,000 the United States taxation is about double that of ours.

That in my opinion is the proper principle of income taxation. We are now in a very serious condition with regard to obtaining the money to carry on the administration of the country. We are at a point where taxes must be obtained from those who are best able to bear them. That, after all, is the real test of taxation. But whether this taxation is the most equitable or not, we have to resort to the means which will give us the required revenue. In other words, we must tax the people who are able to pay. I would suggest to the hon. minister that in his budget he follow the practice of our neighbours to the south to which he has just referred and make the higher incomes bear a much greater taxation in relation to the lower incomes than they do at the present time. I have no doubt from the manner in which my hon. friend referred to these comparisons that he has in mind to apply this principle when he makes his next revision of the income tax schedules. This should be done.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, after what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has said it is evident that the resolution will not pass in its present form. Being in sympathy with its principle, I should like to see it amended so that it might possibly pass in a manner acceptable to both sides of the house. Therefore would the minister consider the following amendment? To insert before the word "any" in the third last line the word "in"; in the second last line strike out the words "should take the form of" and insert the words "consideration should be given to." The last three lines would then read "that in any increase in taxation found necessary consideration should be given to adjustments in the Income Tax Act, in order that those best able to pay," and so on.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, I can rise at this moment only with the consent of the house because I have already spoken. I did not follow my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I would need to have the text of his amendment before me in order to be able to express an opinion upon it.

Mr. NEILL: I will read it again.

Mr. RHODES: But it does seem to me that this debate will have served its purpose by expressing the opinion of those hon. members who have spoken. Obviously that is the chief purpose to be served. I can only repeat that if an amendment is moved which meets the objection I pointed out, it will be quite acceptable. I have already intimated that one couched in the terms suggested by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre would be accepted. I do not see how I can be expected to go very much further than that.

Mr. LUCAS: I thank the hon. Minister of Finance very much indeed. We have been endeavouring to get an amendment which will meet his views.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member speaking now will close the debate. If the hon. member for Comox-Alberni desires to proceed he should do so now.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to discuss the merits of this resolution inasmuch as many of my colleagues have indicated our viewpoint. I do not think the objections raised by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) are very serious, for the resolution merely asks the government to take into consideration these things. However, in view of his declaration, we should like to see the resolution amended in such a way that it would be acceptable to the hon. minister and to the house. Therefore I move the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the fourth line of the fourth paragraph of the resolution be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"amongst increases in taxation found necessary adjustments should be made in the Income Tax Act in order that those best able to pay should be the first and most heavily affected."

This amendment is seconded by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer).

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I have already moved almost identically the same amendment.

Mr. RHODES: I do not want to quibble over language, though I must say it seems to me that the objection I took to the first amendment was sound. Now we come to this amendment submitted by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). He may not have intended to do so, but certainly he has placed in this amendment words which I would not accept personally and which I could not ask the government to accept. He might very well have couched his amendment in other language, if what he had in mind was that the attention of the government should be directed to the Income Tax Act as a further source of income in the event of increased taxation being considered. That would be well and good; I would have no objection to that, and I think I made it very clear that the government is quite prepared to take into consideration the discussion of this afternoon.

Mr. NEILL: I think the minister is referring to the amendment of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. RHODES: I understood Mr. Speaker to say that it was the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but the same objection holds good. I was dealing with the amendment itself and not with the source from which it came.

Mr. NEILL: Mine is a somewhat different amendment.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Frankly I am at a loss to understand the position of the government in respect to this matter. There have been two amendments moved in an attempt to meet their point of view. The first objection taken was this: It was alleged by the spokesman for the government that this resolution committed or directed the government to an increase in income tax only. Both amendments which have been offered since removed that obstacle, and in this amendment in particular it is very clearly stated that this is not to be the only method of taxation.

Mr. RHODES: While my hon. friend is on his feet will he elucidate, for the benefit of the house, the proposition as contained in the amendment, that the income tax payer is the man best able to pay? That is the first statement, and the second is that he shall be the most heavily affected.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I rather suspect "heavily affected" were the words that touched the heart of the hon. gentleman. I have noticed so frequently that those who have a heavy income very much dislike any heavy adjustment unless it is a downward adjustment.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend flatters me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am not flattering the hon. gentleman a bit; rather I am commiserating with him in his misery at the present time. The amendment strikes out all the words after "that" in the fourth line and substitutes these words: "amongst increases in taxation found necessary." Surely that very clearly removes the first objection taken by the minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member meant the fourth line of the fourth paragraph in the main resolution.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes. At any rate, the point is that when you include the words "amongst increases" you very clearly remove the objection of the minister to the original motion, which might be interpreted by one who is a stickler for those things to indicate that no increases shall take place except in income taxation. Then the amendment says: "Amongst increases in taxation found necessary, adjustments should be made in the Income Tax Act in order that those best able to pay should be the first and most heavily affected." Is there any doubt in the mind of the hon. gentleman or of any other member of this house that those in this country best able to pay taxes are those who have incomes? So is it unfair to ask that they should have their incomes taxed heavily in the face of existing conditions?

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) himself, defending the position of the government in connection with this resolution, quoted statistics to show the income tax paid in this country in 1931. He indicated at the same time that those who had incomes were contributing substantially to the public revenue, and had been doing so in past years. If he had read the statistics from another point of view he would have found out something else, namely that of some ten million people in Canada only 143,000, in round figures, have incomes upon which to pay a tax. If that does not demonstrate the concentration of wealth in a very few hands, a concentration which is at present increasing, I do not know how it could be demonstrated. Surely, therefore, in view of existing conditions a heavy income tax on those who have incomes is fully justified. But if the minister had taken the trouble to analyse the income tax figures further he would have found even more support for my argument concerning the concentration of wealth.

It is difficult to speak, Mr. Speaker, when the minister himself, the Prime Minister and everyone else across the way is occupied with something else. I suppose it does not matter much.

Mr. SHORT: Go ahead; you are holding up the business of parliament.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If my hon. friend is paying attention I am sure that is all that is necessary; his weight with the government will be sufficient to ensure proper consideration of anything he may recommend.

Mr. SHORT: Very clever.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, not bad, considering that I had not much time to think it up. But I wonder if I may have the attention of the Minister of Finance for a moment.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps my hon. friend would postpone his vaudeville performance for a moment, as an act of courtesy, while I reply to a query put to me by an hon. member sitting close to my hon. friend.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I had no idea I was putting on that sort of performance. I am debating in this House of Commons a matter of a great deal of importance at the present time. The minister is occupied with something else. I do not know what he is considering, but certainly his remarks are not courteous or in keeping.

When the Minister of Finance was making his analysis of the income tax figures, showing the enormous burden already carried by income tax payers he would have found an intense concentration of wealth in few hands in Canada. As I said, 143,000 people make enough on which to pay an income tax, but if my hon. friend had analysed the figures a little further he would have found that of the 143,000 income tax payers in 1931, some 6,600 paid about $21,700,000 out of a total of $26,100,000. In other words a little more than six thousand people paid almost the entire income tax received. The rest of income tax payers, 136,979, paid only $6,185,000. These figures can be traced back year after year and we find that the only difference is, not in the relationship between the two, but in degree as the income tax increased this incidence. In 1930, 6,014 income tax payers paid $20,959,000, while 136,000 paid only $6,500,000, in round figures.

The fact of the matter is that Canada, in common with the United States in particular —I separate these two countries from the rest of the world—has through special legislation, as the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) pointed out in her few remarks, and special bounties, bonuses and all sorts of grants of land and rights to power in the past, laid the basis for great fortunes which to-day possess not only the wealth of this country but the great power that goes with it. We are in the hands of this government, and the government has an opportunity to serve the public and not wealth. The resolution introduced by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) urges upon the government to consider fairly in its budget proposals this year the taxation of wealth in order that the conditions of the working people in this country may not be further handicapped by the imposition of increases in duty taxation.

I doubt whether there is an hon. member who does not realize that in Canada in eight out of every ten households the family lives in the shadow of unemployment. Savings are not possible with the average wage paid in this country, if anything like a decent living standard is to be maintained. As a matter of fact, even in the civil service itself amongst the best paid wage earners in Canada, the average wage is only $1,500 a year, and that includes all the tops as well as all the very low salaries. It must be clear from such figures that the average worker, the average woman in Canada, has not an income upon which to maintain a decent standard of living and at the same time to save anything. The whole condition of this country typifies, in the present crisis we are faced with, a concentration of wealth under capitalism which in itself will destroy the capitalistic system my hon. friends are so fond of, unless they take such reasonable steps as are now proposed to redistribute in the form of taxation the capital income and wealth of the nation. I have only this further to say. We have gone a long way to meet the views of the minister and I sincerely trust he will accept the amendment. If he does not accept it then I want to place myself on record as definitely in favour of the amendment and, if that is defeated, in favour of the original motion.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): In justice to the minister it is only fair to say that when he suffered some criticism at the hands of my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) I was the one really guilty and not the minister. I had taken the liberty of consulting him for a moment to see whether it was possible to secure an amendment which would be acceptable to all sides of the house, and I therefore beg now to move a subamendment which I believe will cover the situation. In order to put the motion clearly before the house, as thus amended, I will read the resolution fully with the amendment I propose. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), that the resolution be amended by striking out all the words after "consideration," and adding the words, "a substantial increase in the income tax." The resolution before the house would then read:

> Whereas, it is becoming increasingly apparent that the present methods and extent of federal taxation are inadequate to meet our requirements, and
> Whereas, an extension of the principle of commodity taxation has been suggested as a means of meeting the situation, and
> Whereas, the drastic fall in price levels and the consequent increase in the purchasing value of money has seriously affected the producer and business man, while being of corresponding benefit to those whose incomes, derived from certain classes of bonds, mortgages, etc, are still undiminished, if not increased.
> Therefore, be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration a substantial increase in the income tax.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In view of the statement just made by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), I sincerely trust the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) will accept my apology for what he considered was, although it was not intended to be, a vaudeville performance.

Mr. RHODES: Before you put the subamendment, Mr. Speaker, may I say to my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) that I did take exception to his remarks and to the fact that he was apparently deriving some pleasure from bear-baiting me, as it were, in circumstances which must have been clear to him. I could not without an act of discourtesy to one who sits near to him direct my attention to the hon. gentleman, and I thought this must have been obvious to him, for usually he grasps a situation quite readily. In view of his remarks I am only too happy now to accept his statement and to assure him that he will find me at all times anxious to deal courteously not only with him but with every other hon. member of this house.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have always found the hon. gentleman most courteous in the past, but it was impossible for me to determine the character of the conversation or negotiations between the hon. member for Mackenzie and himself.

Mr. RHODES: Now that I am on my feet I may say to my hon. friend that I must take exception to the attitude he assumed in his argument in discussing the question before the house. The hon. gentleman would leave the impression that in virtue of this resolution and the discussion this afternoon we are determining the question as to what shall be the income tax in Canada. That would be the impression he would leave; and a reading of his remarks on the hustings would clearly indicate that to be the case. Then he takes it upon himself to suggest that the government is resisting the idea of increasing the taxation of income. Furthermore, he attributed personal motives as well. He clearly left the impression that the Minister of Finance was a man of substantial income; ergo he would object at once to any increased taxation. Well, I may say that I am very much in the position of an individual down south. A wealthy northerner coming down the gangplank of a Mississippi river steamboat asked him whether he could change ten dollars, and he replied, "No, sir, I can't; but I thank you for the compliment just the same." My hon. friend from Bow River may be pleased to call me a wealthy person, but I assure him I must take his word for it. As a matter of fact, my hon. friend knows full well that there is a method as well as a time and a place for dealing with taxation, and it is not incumbent upon the Minister of Finance nor upon the government of the day when individuals, as they have every right to do, bring forward a resolution dealing with taxation, thereupon to make a statement with respect to the subject. My hon. friend can be quite free in his arguments, but it is another matter entirely with one who holds a responsible post in government. As I say, there is a constitutional method of dealing with these matters.

Let me say that notwithstanding the sarcasm of certain of my hon. friend's remarks, to-day, we believe that any proposal having to do with taxation should be based upon the principle that those who best can pay should be called upon to pay the most. That is equitable taxation. I thought I made it quite clear in my original remarks upon the main motion that we were prepared to consider seriously an increased income tax, but I took exception to the resolution because of the form in which it was drafted. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) was entirely acceptable to me and to the government. I do not raise the question whether or not this subamendment is in order; in any case if I did so the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) would no doubt say immediately I was actuated by some ulterior motive.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No.

Mr. RHODES: In the sense that I have indicated, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) is entirely acceptable to me.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to refer to the necessity of an amendment to the Bank Act to cover reports to be made by the different banks to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). We do not know how many people would be affected by a resolution similar to the one before the house. The banks now send monthly reports to the Department of Finance stating the amount of current and savings deposits on hand, but those reports do not give the amounts of the different deposits in each bank in each province. It might be agreeable to the minister to amend the Bank Act later on to provide that twice a year the banks shall report to the department indicating the amount of savings and current accounts for each province, and also the number of accounts under $500 and the number over $500. With this information we would know exactly how many people have substantial bank accounts. Because of the good will which has been shown in the house, I will not insist further upon this point.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have just one or two observations to make in regard to this resolution. I understand there is now before the house an amendment and a subamendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. members for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) to have withdrawn their amendments? The subamendment as now proposed is not an amendment to the amendment, it is an amendment to the main motion.

Mr. GARDINER: I have great pleasure in withdrawing my amendment in order that the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) may move his amendment in the regular manner Amendment (Mr. Gardiner) withdrawn.

Mr. NEILL: I have no pleasure in withdrawing mine, but I will do so.

Amendment (Mr. Neill) withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question now is on the amendment of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell).

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I have just a word or two to say with regard to the amendment now before the house. I am in entire sympathy with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) with regard to the amendment which he has just dropped.

I understand that an announcement was made the other day by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) with reference to increased taxation along certain lines, but it must be understood that our support of this resolution is not to be taken as an indication that we will not vigorously protest against the necessity for increased taxation. We might find occasion to criticize very strenuously the necessity of such increases as might be made in the income tax. I desire to make it clear at this stage that although we support the general principle of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie, we reserve to ourselves the fullest right of discussion in regard not only to the general principle of increased taxation but also to the particular proposals which may come down in connection with income or other taxation.

Amendment (Mr. Campbell) agreed to.

Motion (Mr. Lucas), as amended, agreed to.

BANKING, CURRENCY AND CREDIT

ISSUE AND REDEMPTION OF DOMINION NOTES WITHOUT RELATION TO GOLD RESERVE—PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the standing committee on banking and commerce be instructed to inquire into the question of banking, currency and credit in Canada, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing that they especially inquire into and report on the advisability of amending the Dominion Notes Act so as to eliminate the provision for redemption of dominion notes in gold and to provide for the issuing of dominion notes without relation to gold reserve.

He said: Mr. Speaker, reduced to its simplest terms this resolution asks for an investigation into the whole question of money, and I am sure the subject is of sufficient importance to justify the most thorough inquiry. Under our present economic system, money is the most important thing in life; man must have money for his three primary requirements of food, shelter and clothing. Money means the chance to live. I think this fact is well illustrated by a story which appeared about a year ago in the Ottawa Citizen. A man had been held up on the streets of the city by a thug who pointed a revolver at his victim and said: "Hand over your money or I will blow out your brains!" The poor victim, without any hesitation, replied: "Go ahead and blow them out; I can live in Ottawa without brains but I cannot live here without money." I am sure the majority of hon. members will agree that his last statement at any rate is true and the same applies to any other part of Canada.

The amount of money which we control determines our standard of living, not only in the material sense but also in a social and intellectual way. Money is so important that the lives of ninety-five per cent of the people are vitally affected by what those in control of finance do to money or credit. If we are to have any chance of getting out of this depression this year, if we are to have an opportunity to get around that corner for which we are all looking, it will depend upon someone doing something to our money system. The providing of money for the carrying on of trade and commerce is one of the primary duties devolving upon the government of any sovereign state. Under our constitution this duty falls upon the federal parliament.

Parliament in its wisdom or unwisdom has passed the Currency Act which fixes the denomination and metal content of our coins. This act makes the dollar the standard unit of our currency and fixes the gold content of that dollar at 23.2 grains of pure gold. Parliament passed also the Dominion Notes Act, which provides for the issuing of paper money, known as dominion notes, against a certain gold reserve. It makes dominion notes legal tender in Canada except at offices of the Receiver General and provides for the redemption of those notes in gold upon presentation at offices of the Assistant Receivers General in Canada.

We have also the Finance Act under which dominion notes are issued to the chartered banks of Canada against the deposit of collateral security.

We have the Bank Act which authorizes the issuing of bank notes, that is paper money, to the extent of the paid-up capital of the banks, with certain excess issues in certain months of the year. It also provides that the banks may issue further notes against deposits in the central gold reserves. The banks are also authorized under this law to make loans and to receive deposits.

Under this system authorized by Canadian law we had in this country under date of August 31, 1931—I am quoting approximate figures:

Gold held by the government.. ..	$ 74,000,000
Gold and other coins held by banks	64,000,000
Gold held in central gold reserves.	13,000,000
Total..	$151,000,000

That is the amount held in gold and subsidiary coins. We also had issued and in circulation in Canada at that date:

Dominion notes..	$141,000,000
Bank notes..	141,000,000

Then we had:

Bank deposits..	$2,030,000,000

That makes a total, roughly speaking, of $2,300,000,000, all of which under our law would be redeemable in gold. May I point out that bank notes and bank deposits totalling over $2,100,000,000 are redeemable in legal tender, which would be dominion notes, and dominion notes outstanding at that time amounted to only $141,000,000. Dominion notes are redeemable in gold, but gold amounted to only seven per cent of the total money outstanding in Canada on that date, and in the term "money" I include only what we generally call cash, that is, coins and paper money and deposits in the banks.

Any unusual happening in the world may cause a demand among noteholders or holders of deposits in our banks for gold. If that demand is met and the gold paid out, the result is to deplete our gold reserve, and in that way restrict the issue of dominion notes. Dominion notes under our law are based upon gold and dominion notes are the basis for bank credit. Therefore, when the issue of dominion notes is restricted, it follows that the credit which can be extended in Canada is likewise restricted. The amount of credit outstanding in any country at any time is the main governing factor in determining price levels. When credit is restricted, prices fall; purchasing power is cut; business is curtailed; unemployment is created, and the whole vicious spiral of deflation is put under way. That is what has actually happened and that is the situation which we are facing in Canada to-day. Of course it first happened in some other countries of the world, but because of the gold standard Canada was compelled to follow the same policy as the countries which started this deflation.

I might point out here that to-day private citizens are being urged by bankers to pay their debts and the bankers are urging all governments in Canada to balance their budgets. They can do that only if they can get their hands on more money. The bankers do not seem to realize that under our present system the way in which the great bulk of our money gets into circulation is through the issue of bank loans. When those loans are not issued, there is not sufficient money in circulation on which people can get their hands to pay their debts. If people cannot secure money to pay their debts and buy goods, governments are not going to be able to balance their budgets. In proof of the statement which I have just made, that it was the restriction of credit which caused the world depression, I should like to quote from one who, I think, might be regarded as an authority. I refer to Mr. R. S. Noble of the Royal Bank of Canada, who, speaking at last year's meeting of the Canadian Political Science Association, said:

> In my judgment the main factor in bringing about and continuing the present world-wide depression has been the disastrous fall in the commodity price level and that this has been brought about not by over-production—

I am glad he said that.

> —tariffs, war debts, stock market collapse or any of the usual causes assigned but by a thoroughly stupid bank policy with France and the United States as the principal villains in the piece.

If a stupid bank policy was responsible for the world depression, we cannot get out of this world depression until we get an intelligent bank policy. May I point out again that because of our adherence to the gold standard, this thoroughly stupid bank policy which caused the world depression, caused the depression in Canada to be on a par with that in most of the other countries. Perhaps I might quote the opinion of Professor Gustav Cassel, one of Europe's outstanding economists, who said:

> It can never be denied that the defects of the monetary policy of the United States are chiefly responsible for the present crisis in the world's economy.

What was this stupid bank policy referred to by Mr. Noble? I have not time to go into the subject at any length, but I should like to point out again that under the gold standard, gold is the basis for credit, and on one dollar's worth of gold, from fifteen dollars to twenty dollars' worth of credit is created. The figures which I have quoted for Canada prove that.

The central banks of France and the United States, according to many authorities, have hoarded between them nearly one-third of the world's monetary gold reserves. That amount of gold has been placed in their vaults; it has not been allowed to be used as the basis for the issue of currency, and consequently the world's credit has been restricted to the extent of many billions of dollars. When you restrict world credit to such an extent, you must upset prices and all the contractual obligations of the world which are expressed in terms of money. It is therefore no wonder that to-day the world is faced with the great problem of reparations and war debts. Debts which have become impossible of payment largely because of the manipulation of our monetary system.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any shortage of credit in Canada?

Mr. COOTE: I really do not know how to answer that question. I know that due to low price levels people are not able to get the credit they ordinarily could. The situation in the world to-day so far as gold and gold standard countries are concerned, might be likened to a game of marbles. Supposing a number of boys are playing marbles and two of them corner all the marbles. The rest of the boys have to quit playing or go and play some other game. To-day countries other than the United States and France should in their own interests play some other game than that of the gold standard. I may have said this before, but if so I want to repeat it: the amount of credit money in circulation largely determines the price of commodities and the world to-day is suffering from this depression because of the contraction of credit due to the hoarding of gold. I note that recently Mr. Hoover, President of the United States, is credited with saying:

> Credit is the blood stream of our economic life. Restriction or destruction of credit cripples the revival and expansion of agriculture, industry, commerce and employment.

The paper from which this is quoted, the Ottawa Citizen, says:

> To-day business is bad because of lack of purchasing power among consumers.

The great question facing Canada at this time is what can be done to restore that purchasing power. May I point out that the industrial system produces for profit, not for use, and a falling price level destroys the motive which makes the system function. The production of real wealth is curtailed because we cannot distribute the production among our people, and the reason we cannot distribute it is primarily because we have not enough money in circulation. I remember a year ago the statement was made that in China millions of people were starving because China had no transportation system which would move food from the coast to the interior where the famine conditions existed. But we have not that excuse in Canada. We have one of the finest transportation systems in the world and yet to-day some of our people, if they are not actually starving, are not getting enough to eat. We have the food and we have the railways to transport it; the only thing we lack is sufficient money in the hands of consumers.

I agree with what the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen said last year, speaking before the Canadian Bankers' Association at the Royal York Hotel in Toronto, and I am glad that he made this statement at that particular meeting. He said:

> If people were in a position to exchange what they have too much of for what somebody else has too much of, we would see that there is not too much of anything. The trouble is that they are not in a position so to exchange. Were the facilities of exchange adequate, were the world's monetary system adequate to demands for exchange, then the three per cent increase in the world's products from year to year would mean a three per cent elevation in the standard of living each year for the masses of mankind.

I freely admit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a world situation. But we cannot permanently excuse ourselves by using that as an alibi. We are following practically the same policies as those other countries which we hold responsible for this depression, and how is the world ever going to get out of the depression if every country continues to do as we are doing—sitting with folded hands waiting for Providence to get us out? I suggest that we could take some definite action in Canada, and because I believe that our adherence to the gold standard has made the situation very much worse for Canada, one of the questions I should like the banking committee to inquire carefully into is whether we should any longer endeavour to adhere to the gold standard, and if so, why we should adhere to it. That is a subject that should be thoroughly investigated.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the question of the gold standard and stated that because of our adherence to that standard Canada was suffering unduly from the world depression. In support of my statement I should just like to quote this passage from the monthly letter of the Royal bank for June, 1931:

> It will be obvious that for countries operating on a gold basis the responsibility of the price level lies almost altogether with the central monetary authorities of the United States, Great Britain and France, which hold about 75 per cent of the monetary gold stocks of the world and influence the bulk of the liquid capital. At the present time, all other countries must conform to the composite policy of these three outstanding financial powers or temporarily abandon the gold standard, as has recently been done by Australia and two or three South American countries.

Since that was written Great Britain has been forced to abandon the gold standard. I think the same is true of Canada; that is, we have abandoned it so far as redemption of our notes in gold is concerned, although we have not yet taken legal steps to cancel our obligation to do so under the law.

Some people, of course, will ask: If the gold standard is to be abandoned what is to be the basis of our currency? Perhaps I could not do better than quote from an issue of Toronto Saturday Night of about the time Great Britain did abandon the gold standard. On that occasion this journal stated:

> The real basis of currency has always been the resources and the industry of the people in the countries which issued it. This is markedly true of Canada, which as Hon. E. A. Dunlop, provincial treasurer of Ontario, has aptly pointed out, has never been actually on a gold basis except for international payments. Times like these demand realities, not myths, and consequently the suspension of the gold standard may be viewed as a hopeful event.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think the committee on banking and commerce might very well be empowered to inquire into the advantages and disadvantages of the gold standard. After all, the gold standard is simply a monetary policy. We should inquire whether it is the best policy for Canada, or whether it should be abandoned and a better policy adopted. I will admit that it has some advantages. It does lend us an air of respectability; and stable exchange rates are very beneficial for those having to meet commitments in the United States. But the disadvantages of the gold standard I am sure more than outweigh its advantages. It limits the amount of credit in Canada by the amount of gold in the treasury. It puts the price level in Canada at the mercy of foreign banks. Canada is a debtor country and if we are to remain on the gold standard we must be prepared to sacrifice internal stability of prices, wages, employment, and our whole standard of living. For what? For the sake of exchange rate stability.

[Mr. Coote.]

Surely that is too great a price for us to pay. It is no use saying we cannot get a better system. I think a better system must be found or the whole capitalistic system is bound to collapse. It is to those who are interested in the preservation of the present system that I am appealing to-night.

Mr. YOUNG: Would my hon. friend mind explaining what he means by "the whole capitalistic system collapsing"?

Mr. COOTE: I have not time because I am limited to forty minutes. I should like the committee on banking and commerce to be authorized to inquire into the effect of our adherence to the gold standard on our primary industries. What is the effect?

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): What effect would the going off the gold standard have on the amount of money coming into this country to finance the development of gold mines?

Mr. COOTE: I will leave my hon. friend to speak on that. At the moment I want to direct the attention of the house to the effect of our adherence to the gold standard on agriculture. The leader of the opposition in South Africa recently stated that the adherence by his country to the gold standard was crucifying agriculture. Our attempt to adhere to the gold standard, is, I think, crucifying agriculture in Canada. I am not able to devote very much time to this particular phase of the subject, but I do want to point out that at the present time the price of wheat, cattle and hogs in Canada is dependent upon the price which we receive for these commodities when exported. The bulk of our wheat is sold for pounds sterling. We translate the British pound, according to to-day's quotations, into $3.93 Canadian money. If our currency were at par with Britain's—and I think that is where it should be if it is to be at par with anything—the pound would represent $4.87 of our money. In other words, we are losing 94 cents on every pound sterling that we receive from the sale of our products in Great Britain. I should like again to remind the house that the prices we receive for the products we export—grain, cattle, hogs—set the prices of all those products when they are sold in Canada.

May I also point out that we are competing with the Argentine and Australia in most of these products? The farmer in the Argentine at the present time can translate the British pound sterling into the equivalent of $5.40 of our money; in Australia the farmer can translate the pound sterling into the equivalent of $5.80 of our money. I should like to know how long the Canadian farmer is going to be able to compete with the farmers of the Argentine and Australia under those conditions? At the present time if our currency were at par with Britain's the price for the average steer sold in Canada would be increased by more than $10; the price of wheat would easily be increased by 15 cents a bushel. I have in my hand a page from the Commercial Intelligence Journal of September 26 last, containing a report from our trade commissioner in Australia. This is before Great Britain went off the gold standard. He says:

> The exchange premium in Australia gives wheat growers an apparent gain of about 6½ pence (13 cents) per bushel on all wheat exported.

That knocks our five cent bonus into a cocked hat.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that apparent?

Mr. COOTE: It is quite apparent to me, whether it is to the hon. gentleman or not.

Miss MACPHAIL: He cannot see over the tariff walls.

Mr. COOTE: The gold standard in Canada as part of our money policy is fixed first of all by the Currency Act which sets the number of grains of gold in our dollar, and further by the Dominion Notes Act. Subsection 3 of section 4 of the act provides for redemption of these notes in gold on presentation at any office established for that purpose. It is for that reason that I mention specifically in my resolution the Dominion Notes Act. I should like the committee on banking and commerce to be authorized to inquire into and report to this house as to the advisability of repealing or suspending the operation of subsection 3 of section 4 so that we should no longer be compelled to redeem our notes in gold. As a matter of fact the assistant receivers general in Canada are not to-day redeeming our notes in gold on demand. I have talked to different people who have endeavoured to get gold in exchange for notes and have been refused. The law still stands, and at the present time so far as I am aware—I speak subject to correction—we are evading the law in refusing to meet the requirement I have referred to. I should like the banking and commerce committee to be authorized to report on that particular matter—whether we should continue ostensibly to carry on under the gold standard and yet actually evade the act; or whether we would not be in a much better position if we simply repealed this subsection. Subsection 5 of the Dominion Notes Act fixes the gold reserve against which dominion notes shall be issued. I think in line with the report of the Macmillan committee there is no necessity for gold or other metallic reserve for our national currency, and that this section of the act might very well be repealed, so that the Finance minister might be in a position to use the gold to meet some of our foreign liabilities if he so desires.

I might point out to the house that the issue of dominion notes without gold reserve might be largely increased. If our issue of fiduciary notes were at the same ratio as recommended for England by the Macmillan committee, on our present gold reserve we could have issued dominion notes to the amount of $500,000,000 instead of $144,000,000 as at present. I think if this question were properly understood by the public generally the issue of a larger amount of dominion notes and their circulation in Canada would add to the stability of our system. I cannot see any reason why our gold should be tied up in a vault somewhere under the east block. I do not believe it is doing any good there to-day. I know there are certain people who refer to any money not based on gold as unsound money. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) in his remarks last week, used the term "sound money" and by most people that phrase is understood to mean money based on gold. I should like to point out that if Canada had remained on the gold standard, or what is called sound money, in 1914 it would have lost us the war. We abandoned it then in a hurry, on half a day's notice, but we cannot abandon it now to cure unemployment. To-day I think Canada is engaged in a war against poverty, and it is just as important that we should abandon gold now as we did in 1914. If we are to stick to that kind of sound money I am afraid we may lose the war in which we are now engaged.

I think the words "sound money" are much misunderstood. Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, speaking at the annual meeting of the Midland bank a few days ago, had this to say with reference to sound money:

> A sound unit of currency would always be of the same value measured in the aggregate of the things on which our money is spent.

That is what sound money ought to be, money with a stable measuring value. That is one of the principal purposes for which we use money. Mr. McKenna goes on to say that gold has never provided that, and then he states:

> Viewed in that light, could any standard have failed more signally than has the gold standard.

He says he does not see any reason to doubt our being able to keep the purchasing power of money stable with what he terms a managed currency. I am sorry I have not the time to quote Mr. McKenna at greater length; to those interested I would recommend his speech, which appears in the Manchester Guardian of January 30. However, he does say:

The art of monetary management will have to be relied on more and more to obviate such catastrophes in economic life as we are witnessing to-day. We must not delude ourselves once again into thinking that if we return to gold all will be well. Renewed indulgence in that idea would be fatal.

I commend those words to the government and to every hon. member of this house. Right along that same line, with regard to the question of managed currency I should like to quote Sir William Beveridge, director of the London School of Economics, who may be considered an authority on this subject. He said:

Liability to booms and slumps of production is bound up with capitalism, with making not for use but for profit, which depend on prices as prices depend on credit. Success or failure in controlling credit may thus prove to be the acid test of the capitalistic system.

I think Sir William's words are well worth the attention of the government and of the house.

I should like this committee to be authorized and instructed to inquire into this question: Can interest on the federal, provincial, municipal and railway bonded debts, totalling over five and a half billion dollars, together with corporation debts, real estate mortgages, bank loans and so on, be paid at existing price levels? If not, how can commodity prices be restored to the levels of 1925 or 1926? I should like the committee to inquire as to whether any action can be taken through the money system to make this payment possible. Let me quote from an article appearing in the Wall Street Journal under the signature of Thomas Woodlock, a regular contributor to that journal, on this very point of commodity prices. The article carries this heading:

Commodity Price Level Must Rise or Debts Will Be Sacrificed

I regret that I have not time to read the whole article, because I think it is splendid. The writer says:

It so happens that the world now finds itself with a volume of existing debt far beyond anything ever before existing in economic history, this because it gets its living by a system which basis upon credit—debt—as its very foundation. It is the pressure of this debt which is everywhere stirring an agitation for a change in the money units which measure the debts. What we are witnessing is an acute phase in the process outlined by Mr. Feaveryear, and the heart of our present problem is to prevent this process from destroying the credit structure which furnishes the foundation of the world's economy. It is perfectly evident that the structure can be preserved only at the price of considerable sacrifice by the creditor class for it is surely historically true that loans which do not "produce" the means for this repayment are in the long run not repaid. Borrower may be slave to lender as the phrase goes but only in a limited sense; a truer phrase is that which says that blood can not be had from a stone.

On all sides are heard proposals for a change in the "gold standard" of the United States. Some are for plain issues of "non-interest bearing treasury notes" which, of course, are to be "unlimited legal tender for all purposes." Others are for "bimetallism"—silver—and others for some kind of "inflation" by means of large government bond issues with rediscount privileges for bills secured thereby. The instinctive revolt against the gold unit is widespread and is at bottom the direct result of the pressure of debt. One thing is becoming clear; that is that either the commodity price level must in the next few years rise to relieve the debtor or the creditor will have to write off a good part if not the whole of the debt. And, if commodities will not rise to the money unit, the money unit is quite likely to come down to the commodities. This is the fundamental significance of the departures which have already been made from the gold standard.

Coming from the Wall Street Journal, Mr. Speaker, I think a statement like that should not be ignored by members of this house. Then I should like to quote very briefly from a speech made by Right Hon. Winston Churchill, former chancellor of the exchequer and the man who put England back on the gold standard in 1925. Speaking before the Economic Club of New York at the Hotel Astor, he said in part:

As to the solution of the economic crisis, Mr. Churchill said: "In my opinion, it would be sufficient at this stage if two or three of the principal governments of the world were to proclaim their intention of revaluating commodities and services upon, let us say, the 1927 or 1928 level; and then if sufficient financial experts were selected and told to devise steps by which this should be done, and the form of international currency that would be required to keep a stable standard of value hereafter, I do not think you would be setting them an impossible task. I expect they would find that there were several ways of accomplishing this purpose once it was clearly defined and authoritatively set forth.

"I would like to see the governments of United States and Great Britain, through their agents, the federal reserve and the Bank of England, come to the definite conclusion that commodities must be revaluated up to the 1927 or 1928 level, and that hereafter sufficient currency must be available to provide a stable measure of price."

Surely it is not difficult to deduce from that statement that Mr. Churchill believes the adoption of a proper monetary policy will bring commodities back to the price levels of 1927 and 1928, and until the commodity price level is brought back to that point existing debts in Canada cannot be paid, with interest at current rates.

In the few minutes left to me I should like to point to what is happening in the United States. Recently at Washington two measures were adopted, the one providing for the creation of the reconstruction finance corporation, and the other the so-called Glass bill, widening the note issue privilege of the federal reserve banks. In regard to these measures the Financial Post contains an article headed:

U.S. Embarks on Inflation to Save Banks

I know there is a good deal of objection throughout the country to the use of the word "inflation" or to the process of inflation. It is more proper to say anti-deflation or, as some writers now say, reflation. But call it what you like—inflation, anti-deflation or reflation—anyone who to-day refuses to use some such measures to put more credit in circulation and increase prices is as foolish as the man who refuses to put air in a flat tire for fear he may blow up the tire. Anyone who is driving a car with a flat tire will stop at the first service station and put in some air, even if it is not free. I remember hearing of a Scotchman who, the first time he saw the sign "free air" did use so much air that he blew out the tire. It is possible to blow up a monetary system with inflation, as was done in Germany years ago, but that is not what is proposed in the United States to-day nor is it what I am proposing in Canada. I simply advocate putting out sufficient credit in Canada to raise commodity price levels, and that is as sensible as putting air in a flat tire to keep up the proper pressure. The man who puts air into a tire uses a gauge and when he has just enough air he stops. Currency, I am quite satisfied, can be managed so as to put out, in Canada or in any other country where it is adopted, the proper amount required. I do not think there is any insuperable difficulty about that.

In my opinion there is more than sufficient reason for asking for this investigation. It seems to me that whatever other steps may be taken to lift us out of the present depression, monetary reform of some kind is absolutely essential. I should like to see the committee make a thorough and exhaustive inquiry into these matters such as was made by the Macmillan committee in England. If the committee did nothing but make a study of the Macmillan report they might suggest to the house some measures that would be helpful. I had thought of asking that there be given to our banking committee a reference similar to the one given to the Macmillan committee in England, but I have been told that the committee in England found themselves limited by their reference. This is the reference which was made to that committee:

To inquire into banking, finance and credit, paying regard to the factors, both internal and international, which govern their operation, and to make recommendations calculated to enable these agencies to promote the development of trade and commerce and the employment of labour.

I consider that a splendid reference, but I should like to see the reference to our committee, if one is granted, made wide enough that they will not feel hampered in their investigation. If the committee considered they had not time to go as thoroughly into the question as they would like to, they might suggest to the government the appointment of a commission along lines similar to the Macmillan committee. There are, however, two or three specific questions which I would suggest for consideration by the committee in addition to what has already been indicated.

First of all I would suggest this question: How can the purchasing power of the community be kept up to the point where we can consume the surpluses which our great industrial machine can turn out, so that we should not be faced, as we are at the present time, with poverty in the midst of plenty. I should like the committee to inquire carefully into the gold standard. As I suggested before, I should like an inquiry to be made particularly as to its effect on the basic industries of Canada—agriculture, mining, lumbering, fishing and other industries—and as to its effect also on employment. I believe that the return to the gold standard by Great Britain in 1925 did increase unemployment, and if that result followed in England would not a return to the gold standard increase unemployment here? I would finally suggest to the committee this question: If credit is the life blood of industry, why should the amount of credit existing in Canada depend on the amount of gold stored in the treasury vaults and which is never intended for circulation?

In short, I should like the committee to be asked to report to the house regarding changes which might be made in the monetary system so as to enable us better to distribute among our people the goods which we in Canada are so well equipped to produce.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not intend to enter upon any elaborate analysis of the resolution submitted to the house and spoken to with such clarity and lucidity by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). In regard to this very intricate and perplexing question I do not pose as either an expert or a monetary economist. Someone said the other day that the definition of a monetary economist was "one who hadn't any," and the definition of an expert was, a plain and simple man away from home.

The other afternoon we had in this house a very important resolution which asked the house to bring before the impending Imperial economic conference the question of the stabilization of our currency with a fixed parity throughout the empire. That resolution provoked a very interesting debate, and I am sure, in regard to the very comprehensive resolution now submitted to the house for discussion and possibly for decision, and moved by the hon. member for Macleod, we shall have a debate which will not proceed upon party lines. So far as I am personally concerned I am speaking entirely for myself in the few observations I am about to offer.

In analyzing the resolution of the hon. member I find that he asks for two specific things. In the first place he wants, what is very fair, a reference to the banking and commerce committee of certain matters, the first being a general inquiry into the questions of banking, currency and credit, and the second, the consideration of the question whether it is advisable to amend the Dominion Notes Act so as to eliminate the provision for the redemption of dominion notes in gold and to provide for the issuing of dominion notes without relation to gold reserve. My own opinion is this—and I express it in all frankness. Certainly, without casting any reflection on the banking and commerce committee, of which I happen to be a humble member, and with all respect to the hon. member for Macleod, I do not think that our committee on banking and commerce will have the necessary time, and I doubt very much whether it will have the necessary ability, within the short space available during this session, of entering upon a discussion of the entire Canadian credit and currency system. I wish, therefore, that the hon. member had asked the administration to institute a great national committee along lines similar to the Macmillan committee in England, for it would have six or possibly nine months in which to deliberate. It would be a committee consisting of all those who represent banking and financial institutions, agriculture, labour and industry, and so on, so that we could have presented to parliament, if not during the present session, at any rate very early in the next session, a comprehensive report on the entire Canadian monetary and financial structure.

We are confronted next year with the decennial revision of the Canadian banking system, and it would be of wonderful assistance to the committee at that time to have before it a report such as that presented in England. Now the first duty of a simple seeker after truth in regard to this intricate and complicated question is to analyze the meaning of the term gold standard. It means this: that our obligations are redeemable and are freely paid in gold on demand, and also in the second place that there is a free movement of gold in and out of the country. If you accept the theory of the economist with regard to the full and complete significance of the gold standard, then Canada to-day is not on the gold basis any more than Abyssinia or Timbuktu, because in the full acceptation of the term gold standard I doubt very much whether this dominion has been entirely on the gold basis since we passed the Finance Act in 1914. And that is a matter of great importance if we are to understand this question fully.

What happened in 1914? It will be recalled that in that year the Finance Act was passed, and it was in force until the year 1923, and many hon. gentlemen who are here now were, I believe, present in the house on both of those occasions. I read to-day the speech of that great Canadian, the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, in introducing the legislation of 1923, and also the helpful and constructive criticism of Sir Henry Drayton, who, I believe, was financial critic for the opposition at that time. The Dominion Notes Act was passed in 1914 and amended in 1915. Now, my hon. friend seeks to-night to suspend the provision for the redemption of dominion notes in gold. In 1914 we had $50,000,000 provided for as against a twenty-five per cent basis of specie reserve. In 1915 the amending act provided a further $26,000,000 worth, $16,000,000 to be loaned to the Transcontinental system which was then under construction, $10,000,000 being for general purposes throughout the dominion. This $26,000,000 added to the $50,000,000 provided for by the act of 1914 gave us a currency basis of $76,000,000. This remained in existence until the year 1928 when the Minister of Finance of that day made a return showing the total specie reserve to be $66,000,000; in other words, the $10,000,000 provided for general purposes must have been retired by the administration of that day.

The secondary consideration is international in character. Canada was upon a gold basis from 1853 to 1914. We went off the gold basis in 1914 under the provisions of the Finance Act of that year, and so continued, modified by the Finance Act of 1923, until July 1, 1926. Because of the export of gold to the United States in 1928, amounting to $44,500,000, we were compelled to place an embargo upon the export of gold. What is the situation to-day? Without criticizing the present administration, I have reason to believe that it is reverting to the provisions contained in the financial presentation made in 1923 by the late Mr. Fielding, and has inaugurated a system of export licences to cover the exporting of Canadian gold to the United States. I think it is obvious to an inquirer after the truth that unless that policy had been pursued we would not have had any gold left in our Canadian vaults. You cannot assert, you cannot maintain, that Canada to-day is on a gold basis according to the ordinary economic acceptation of the term when we have a system of export licences prohibiting the free exporting of gold from Canada to the United States. According to the theory of economists, once you go outside the circle of the gold points, which is fixed at eleven sixty-fourths of one per cent as against our exchange with the exchange of the United States, it is better for your chartered banks to export gold from Canada, provided it is available, than to pay prevailing exchange rates to buy exchange in New York. That is the ordinary economic factor in the situation. Any administration which is compelled because of conditions prevailing to prevent the free export and import of gold cannot claim that the country is on a gold basis or gold standard.

The gold standard of Canada, or, in fact, of the world, can be divided into three phases. First of all, there is what is called the gold species standard, which requires local currency to be changed into gold coin. This is the system which prevails still in the great republic to the south. In the second place, there is what is called the gold bullion standard, under which the local currency is to be changed only into bullion. This form of standard was entirely unknown before the great war and was the system in effect in the United Kingdom until September 20, 1931, when that country was forced off the gold basis. In the third place, there is what is known as the gold exchange standard which permits the local currency to be exchanged into some foreign exchange which is on a gold standard. This system was in force in India before the war. Canada, having no central bank, was until comparatively recently upon a pre-war gold basis.

Canada was on the gold basis from 1853 to 1914. The gold standard was resorted to by a combination of interests in Europe; it was resorted to by Great Britain and Germany and deliberately used for political purposes, for empire expansion and for political aggrandizement. Any student of international finance will realize to-day that another great European nation is resorting to these same tactics and there is what I would term a financial conspiracy to withdraw short term loans, which policy compelled Great Britain to go off the gold standard in September, 1931. I think it was the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett)—he will correct me if I am wrong—who suggested the other day during a debate in this house that Great Britain had been forced off the gold standard because of her trade policy.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was my impression of the remarks of the right hon. gentleman. Great Britain's trade policy had nothing whatever to do with her abandonment of the gold standard. Anyone who has studied the international byplay which has taken place in the financial world from 1927 to 1931 will know that a great European nation deliberately resorted to a carefully buttressed financial armament in order to obtain political domination of Europe. The boundaries of several states in Europe have been fixed by the financial policy of that great country. At the present time this country has two delegates attending the disarmament conference in Geneva and in the most friendly way I suggest to the administration that something more important is before the world to-day than the reducing of the number of ships of war, the reducing of standing armies and the reducing of the number of aeroplanes, submarines and the equipment and munitions of war; the greatest necessity of the world to-day is a comprehensive policy of international financial disarmament. I should like to see the Canadian delegates fighting to that end so that in the development of our national policies we shall not be compelled to suffer too much from these international factors which are at the present time directly affecting our Canadian national life.

A short time ago I had the temerity to stand in my place in this house and to advocate a qualified moratorium in Canada on capital accounts. This afternoon the Prime Minister asked an hon. gentleman to my left if there was any shortage of credit to-day. To that question, my answer would be this: I think that every single individual to-day, at least within my experience, is suffering from a most distinct and emphatic shortage of credit. Every municipality throughout Canada and throughout the west in particular is being throttled by the restriction of credit. The four great provinces in western Canada have been so reduced to financial extremities that they have had to come to the Prime Minister and ask to be allowed to depend upon the weight and security of the Canadian treasury before they could undertake the ordinary processes of financing. I hope it is not true, and I hope it will never be true that this great Canadian nation will suffer from a restriction of credit.

I agree in the main with the observations of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I know that to-day business after business and industry after industry in my own province of British Columbia is being crushed out of existence because of the policies adopted by our Canadian bankers in refusing them any ordinary or generous extension of credit. When I say that I repeat what I said a year ago, that we should be proud of the record of our banks during the great crisis through which we are passing. However, I know industry is being forced out of existence and there should be some great liquidation of the frozen assets of our nation. As President Hoover has said, we must thaw out the frozen confidence of our nation. This has been partly accomplished in the United States by the creation of a $2,000,000,000 fund, known as the reconstruction finance corporation, of which my hon. friend does not approve. Apart from agreeing with the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) in his contention that the high tariff barriers should be knocked down, I contend that one of the great necessities at the present time of the Canadian people is a real system of controlled inflation in regard to our currency and monetary system. The other day someone said something about a managed currency. In my opinion Canada has the best machinery in the world for a managed currency. Under the provisions of the Finance Act of 1914 and the act of 1923 there is vested in the Minister of Finance and his treasury officials sufficient power to enact to-morrow a policy of managed currency or controlled inflation without any alteration in the legislation except the repeal asked for by the hon. member for Macleod.

Let us consider what the Finance Act was responsible for during the great war. Let us consider what happened when in 1917 the Imperial government asked Sir Robert Borden for a loan of $50,000,000 to help them out in their struggle in those strenuous days. What happened? Overnight almost, a policy of controlled inflation under the system asked for was put into force and $50,000,000 were sent to England to help them over there. Canada did magnificent service at that time by suspending the redemption of dominion notes in gold.

Personally I agree we need in Canada more credit; we want to put an end to credit restriction; we want more confidence among the people; we want the banks, the money lenders in this country, to have less say in monetary and fiscal policies and have them laid down by the house and directed by the parliament of Canada through the government. The more we reduce the dual capacity of our Canadian banks, in the first place as money lenders and in the second place as dictators of Canadian financial policy, the better it will be for the Canadian people.

In conclusion I wish to say this: we have had in Canadian history several successions of great issues. In the first place we had provincial issues in the different provinces. Then we had the great battle for responsible government. Then we had the great debate entered into by the fathers of confederation. Then we had a fiscal policy which particularly since 1878 has divided the two main parties throughout the Dominion of Canada. Then unfortunately we had in our history some racial and religious issues which divided these two parties. Then we had a great issue that arose during the great conflict of 1914-18. But never in Canada have conditions of an economic depression forced a recognition of the necessity of all parties, regardless of previous principles or political affiliations, studying carefully the financial system and monetary method of our land. This is not a normal depression; this reminds me of some of the great European cataclysms of the past —for instance the fall of the Roman Empire, the renaissance in Europe, and the social, political and industrial upheavals in England and France in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Speaking for myself I say that the policy of the Liberal party at this time in Canada should be to look to the left, to look to the interests of the consuming masses of our people and not to be afraid to change any laws which are built up on class lines. The solution for the present depression will be found in fearlessly developing that policy which will be in the interest of the consuming masses throughout our Canadian land.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because I have had the responsibility, particularly during the last few months and until a few weeks ago, of administering the Finance Act, I shall make, without further delay, the observations that I desire to make to this chamber.

I have followed with some interest the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), and his references to the technical side of the economics of the gold standard are worthy of a great occasion. But we are dealing with practical circumstances and facts. Unfortunately his knowledge of the issues of dominion notes is hardly accurate, as I shall presently point out. As for the suggestions made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), I think I shall be able to show to the chamber that if they were adopted it would mean the ruination of this country at this time.

In the first place, may I merely amplify very briefly some of the observations made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. Why is gold used as a standard at all? That seems to be the first question that might reasonably be asked. The answer is fairly clear. First, it is rare; second, it is convenient, and third, it has, by reason of those circumstances if you will, and others, a value that is uniform throughout the world. Hence it was, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, that it became the standard for values. It was worth just as much in Australia or Hongkong or London as it was in Paris or Washington or Ottawa. It had a fixed value that did not fluctuate with changing conditions. Therefore, for these and many other reasons to which on this occasion time will not permit me to refer, gold became a standard for values and we refer to it as the rare metal, the metal of value, and in other terms of that kind. We in this country, prior to and since confederation, have treated gold as a standard for values of our monetary system. I shall not do more than refer to the statute that is the law at the present time. That statute, with which I trust most hon. members are familiar, requires that the issue of dominion notes up to $50,000,000 shall be supported by a coverage of 25 per cent of gold. That is, when the Dominion of Canada emits $50,000,000 of its legal tender or promises to pay, on demand, there lies in yonder treasury $12,500,000 in gold, that being the ratio between the issue of paper and gold which we have by our statute provided. We have also provided that for any sum beyond $50,000,000 we shall have one dollar in gold for every dollar so issued. We also provide that ten per cent of all the deposits in the Post Office Savings bank shall be covered by gold.

May I point out to the house that the hon. gentleman was slightly in error in connection with the present issue of dominion notes. If hon. members will turn to page 2188 of the Canada Gazette and look at the circulation and specie return for the 31st day of January, 1932, they will find that we have altered slightly the form of the return as it used to be made in years gone by, believing it to be desirable that any person who wished to do so might by looking at that return ascertain exactly what the gold coverage of this country was with respect to our issued notes. First, under chapter four, 1915, there was an issue of $26,000,000. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat suggested that possibly $10,000,000 has been retired. I point out to him that the whole $26,000,000 is still outstanding. Then under the Finance Act of 1927, chapter seventy, there was an issue of $45,000,000. That represents the notes issued by the Dominion of Canada under the statute of 1915 and under the Finance Act, now being chapter seventy of the Revised Statutes of Canada for 1927, amounting to a total of $71,000,000. Then there has also been issued $99,382,805.69 in dominion notes, covered as to $50,000,000 by 25 per cent of gold and as to the balance dollar for dollar. Those three items—the $26,000,000 issued and still outstanding in its entirety, the $45,000,000 also issued and still outstanding in its entirety, and the issue of $99,382,805.69, make a total of $170,382,805.69. May I point out to the hon. member for Macleod that we still have outstanding at this hour over $71,000,000 of notes which are not covered by gold in any way, shape or form. So what he asks for has already been done to the extent of $71,000,000.

But further with respect to the $99,382,805.69 of dominion notes outstanding, it is only a matter of computation that it requires $61,882,805.69 worth of gold to cover them; that is, 25 per cent up to $50,000,000 plus dollar for dollar for the balance of $49,382,805.69, making a total of $61,882,805.69 which we have in our treasury to cover, may I point out to the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mackenzie) not the $170,000,000 but only the $99,382,805.69 issue of dominion notes. That is provided for by the Dominion Notes Act. The result is that at the end of the month we had nearly $5,000,000 of gold beyond what was required. That is (a) ten per cent to take care of the post office savings bank deposits; (b) $61,882,805.69 to take care of the dominion notes outstanding under the provisions of the statute, by which 25 per cent, up to $50,000,000 is secured by gold, and beyond that dollar for dollar; and (c) a small surplus of between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000.

Beyond that we had outstanding $71,000,000 with no gold coverage at all, so that the end sought for has already been attained. We have a currency covered by gold up to, roughly, $100,000,000, and the balance is covered by the resources of this country and the promise to pay of the Canadian people.

Now if it ended there, we might not discuss further the resolution, but one must never forget that there are many obligations of this country in which there is a promise to pay in gold. When England went off the gold standard, a very distinguished political economist from London was in this country. He is a gentleman very well known by reputation to the group that sits across the chamber to my right. He said to me, "Mr. Bennett, you should go off the gold standard." "Well," I said, "obviously we are not on the gold standard as you understand it." He said, "Well, I mean that you should depart from it." I said, "My friend, do you think we could go off the gold standard, as you use that term, with the obligations maturing in New York that we have to meet in gold during the next six months?" "Explain," he said. I explained to him the situation just as it stood. "Well," he said, "that is a new phase of it." He wrote me a letter—he cabled me, as a matter of fact when he reached London—and said, "You are entirely right. You could not."

Let me explain to the house just what is involved. We have maturing outside of Canada this year practically one million dollars a day of obligations of governments, municipalities and public corporations, payable in gold, representing either payment of principal —instalments of principal, if you will—or payment of interest. Obviously, as the hon. member for Macleod says, there is not enough gold to pay those all at once, but gold, being a medium of exchange, circulates, and in its circulation lies its value. If the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat had said what I think was in his mind, namely, that the lack of circulation of the gold that is held by one of the great powers of Europe, is the cause of the difficulty, and not the mere holding of it, I would have been in entire agreement with him. The Versailles treaty provided for indemnities—we will use the word indemnities—and it follows that there is not gold enough to pay all the obligations provided for. Gold, therefore, must circulate in order to be useful; when it does not circulate its exchange value disappears and it is no longer a medium of exchange. That, I think, is what the hon. gentleman had in mind in his reference to the accumulation of gold by one of the great nations of the world.

Now what was our position? Since 1929 we have not been on the gold standard. In that year, for reasons best known to the government of the day, practically $40,000,000 of gold was shipped to the United States. The effect was of course to lessen the supply of gold in this country by $40,000,000 and for the moment to substitute for gold, credits in New York. It therefore followed that when England went off the gold basis, we were not on the gold standard as that term is used in continental Europe and in international commerce. With what my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has said I am wholly in accord, namely, that the term gold standard as it is used by international bankers and financiers means that gold is a commodity freely bought and sold without restriction or restraint. If a nation is on the gold standard, you can in Ottawa or Washington or London or elsewhere buy gold as you could any other commodity. That, in general terms, is what it means. When in the days of my youth I first visited the Bank of England, I can recall being struck by the fact that gold bars were rolled in on small lorries and sold just as any commodity is sold in a grocery store. The truth is that London was the great free market for gold, and the reason a free market for gold has to be maintained for the purpose of maintaining the gold standard is a simple one. When communities trade with one another there is rarely an equilibrium of imports and exports. There is usually a balance to be settled. The balance may be one way or the other, but whatever way the balance is, in the end it has to be settled. There is no determination of when the end comes if the world remains at peace; but in 1914 suddenly the world was at war, and it became necessary to adjust and settle balances. I make that explanation merely because the hon. gentleman referred to what happened in 1914. But let us look at the situation to-day. There is a balance, let us say, between Great Britain and Canada, or between the United States and France, or between the United States and Germany, or between Australia and Canada. In the end the only method by which those balances can be settled, if there are no bills of exchange to buy, is by some commodity that will pass at par both with the payer and with the payee. That is obvious, is it not? It must have a parity of value to the man who pays and to the man who receives for the purpose of settling that balance. If Canada owes the United States $100,000,000, Canada cannot pay that $100,000,000 in pieces of paper unless they have behind them a value which will make $100,000,000 in the United States where the debt is payable. That is so clear that I do not think it requires any argument to be understood by all of us. That is the position of gold at the moment. Gold is the one medium of universal value which enables balances between nations—and when I say between nations I mean also between great corporations and bankers abroad—to be settled.

I will give the house another illustration. When England went off the gold standard, there was a part of the Canadian National financing which had not been concluded. There was still a balance due of $19,000,000, for which a loan had been made through a great bank in New York. Now, if I shipped down to New York nineteen one million dollar Canadian bills would that pay the debt? Obviously it would not. Because those nineteen one million dollar bills could not be converted into nineteen million dollars of gold. That was the position. It put upon us the tremendous obligation of making the necessary arrangements to carry over.

My hon. friend has referred also to the position of the provinces. That position did not arise because of their internal insolvency. It arose because they, in common with the municipalities, had borrowed substantial sums of money which they had promised to pay in New York in gold, and having so promised they could not convert their dollar bills in their treasury or the money they could borrow from Canadian banks into gold as a commodity, because there was no free market for it in this country, without impairing, as it would, the whole financial structure. So they were placed in the position where they too had to rely upon the credit of the dominion for the moment to enable them to discharge their obligations which were payable abroad in gold. That is the reason those provinces—new provinces compared with old and rich provinces like Ontario and Quebec—were compelled to make the arrangements they did.

Now, sir, I put to the house this question: With a currency to-day of which $65,000,000 of money is outstanding, not covered by gold, what would happen if this act were to be repealed and we no longer remain upon the basis of supporting our currency with the coverage provided by statute? What would happen to your dollar bill? It might be worth 25 cents on the dollar—it might be. There is no man who has given any attention to this who has not realized that, and yet my hon. friend from Macleod suggests if this parliament passed a statute by which we repealed the provision for gold coverage for our currency the millennium would be ushered in so far as this country is concerned. I put that proposition to this chamber, which after all is a deliberative assembly. Does any member think that is feasible? Behind what we emit as money, behind the currency that we send out from the treasury, must not we always have something that has a fixed value? How otherwise can we manage? I just put that to the house. This talk of the gold standard in theory is something about which, as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has said, we could have very learned and lengthy discussions. The hon. member for Macleod has read the opinions of most distinguished men—they are economists. I am not an economist, but since September last I have been dealing with a real problem—maintaining the credit and financial integrity of Canada, and I know exactly what at least the men we owe say. And after all the man you owe is very often the man who has something to say about the situation. I put it to the house if that is not fair.

When England went off the gold standard you will recall—and I want to correct my hon. friend as I proceed—you will recall the news came across the water on Sunday night. As a matter of fact I am merely indicating what might be read by any hon. gentleman who so desires, that for months prior to that it was pointed out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and others in Great Britain that the steady increase in imports was making a drain upon the gold of the Bank of England to such an extent that unless it were checked or the gold deposits maintained there must be ruin. I think if my hon. friend will now do me the honour of thinking for a moment as to what I said he will recall it was this: The great excess of imports over exports brought about the situation. Once more I come back to my illustration. England had continuously increased her imports and they were swelling by hundreds of millions of pounds so that at one time they had reached the colossal figure in one week of two million pounds more imports than exports—ten million dollars in our currency. The result was that when the balances were adjusted at the end of the month, or whatever the period there be on bills of exchange to meet these obligations, they had to pay them in gold, and the only place to get it was the free market in the Bank of England. Every day the gold reserves were going down—down, down, down. Then there came the unfortunate incident in connection with the fleet. You will all recall that immediately there came from Holland and the other continental countries vast sums of British securities. These were thrown upon the market on Friday afternoon and all Saturday morning for any price they would fetch. Securities were sold for fifty cents on the dollar, or even less than that. As soon as they were sold the seller demanded gold, and although the Bank of England stopped payment on Saturday noon—it was announced to the world on Sunday—the fact is that approximately ten million pounds in gold were taken from the bank Friday afternoon and Saturday morning. The result was the bank could no longer sustain the demand made for gold; the free market had disappeared; it could no longer meet the demands for gold in exchange for paper. That being so, late Saturday night the bank concluded to go off the gold basis and the Chancellor of the Exchequer made the announcement which appeared in the papers on the succeeding day.

Now, look at what we had to do. It affords me an opportunity to tell this house, because the wisdom of what we did do has been questioned. The message to us was in cipher. It was decoded late Sunday night. It was impossible in the very nature of things to gather our colleagues about us. A decision had to be taken. What were we going to do? What would you say about your country under similar circumstances? Well, the statement I made, as you recall, was perhaps in fifteen words; I said it was for the people of Great Britain to determine what they would do but we would continue to meet our obligations in gold where we had promised to pay in gold. We had to do that or our credit was gone. We were deprived of the market for our securities. England being no longer in a position to meet any requests we might make for assistance, having failed to maintain her position as a free gold market despite the advances made by France and by the United States in the form of gold credits, we were thrown upon one market and one market only—the market of New York. And not only that. Upon what we said that night depended the credit of this country. Let us have no misunderstanding about it. The international bankers of that city knew far better than some of the members of this house the terms of our Finance Act, our Currency Act, our Dominion Notes Act, our Bank Act. It is not necessary for me to do more than make that statement. They were aware therefore that technically since 1929 the country had been off the gold standard as the hon. gentleman has defined it, but we were still working under the provisions of the Currency Act which provided gold coverage in the terms enacted for our dominion note issue. I said we proposed to meet our obligations in the terms of our promises, and we have done so. The only reason we assisted the provinces was to enable them to meet their obligations in the terms of their promises; that is all. Of course it does not follow that this means there is any difficulty in the situation of the provinces; it does not mean that they have become bankrupt. It only means this, that for the purpose of meeting obligations for which they were not able to supply gold at the time, we had to assume the responsibility of helping them, and we have advanced money for that purpose. That is the position in connection with the application of the gold standard to our country.

The modern tendency is to believe that forty per cent is a sufficient average metallic coverage for bills. That is, instead of 25 per cent up to $50,000,000, and thereafter dollar for dollar, the modern thought is that if we have 40 per cent coverage for all our issues we will be safe. That is the generally accepted rule to-day, and you will observe that on the last day of January the total outstanding was $170,000,000. Forty per cent of that makes a total of $68,000,000, and you will observe that while we did not have that $68,000,000, nevertheless our coverage of gold so nearly approximated it that the credit of this country has steadily improved. I say frankly that but for Great Britain going off the gold standard, and but for the depreciation of the pound and the difficulties the pound has experienced, the dollar of this country would be worth par or practically par in New York. About that there need be practically no difficulty. That is the reason why this government has laboured day after day and week after week, first to create and then to maintain a favourable trade balance; because we could not face the possibility of having to pay in the only medium that would be accepted universally, gold, an adverse balance which a year ago, Mr. Speaker, was $103,000,000. We have converted that into a favourable balance where the gold due to us is between $10,000,000 and $15,000,000.

I do not ask you, sir, or this house to treat that as a great tribute to a government, because the Canadian people have done it. They have had to undergo many difficulties and many privations, and they have made many sacrifices to do so. It has inconvenienced many great merchants, but in the long run I am in the judgment of the house and of those who have given thought and consideration to the matter when I say that I believe if we had done aught other than we did we would have failed in our duty to this country at this time. I believe that will be the judgment of those who have given much consideration to the question. It may interest some of my hon. friends opposite, who should take an equal pride with us in the matter, to know that there are economists who say that the greatest single achievement that has been brought about by any country in the world since the depression has been that of ten million people in Canada, who have converted an adverse trade balance of $103,000,000 into a favourable balance.

Now we get down to the question of credit. I wonder if any man in this house will say there is a lack of credit facilities in this country at the moment, having regard to the security that is available for the credit asked. I have discussed the matter with men who have asked the banks to lend—what? It is not their money; for remember that the banks have no money of their own; their capital and reserves are locked up not only in buildings and facilities but in reserves of cash, and the money they loan belongs to the small and big people of this country who have their deposits in the banks. In nine cases out of ten my observation has been that when I have pinned down the applicant who complained, with this question, "Would you lend your money on that risk," in most cases, sir, he has said to me, "No." You go into the bank and ask for $1,000—of whose money? It is $1,000 of your neighbour's deposits, but you ask to borrow that $1,000 of your neighbour's deposits, and when the banker asks what security you can give, you say, "Well, I am going out on a farm. I have not got one yet, but I expect that I will be able to get a soldier settlement farm on reasonable terms; I am going to work it, and they will help me with respect to a crop." Do you think you would want your money lent on that security, if it was on deposit? Do you think that is a risk that would enable you to draw your money out of the bank when you write your cheque and present it? What is the reason that in the United States four thousand banks have failed in the last two years? It is because their assets were in securities that were not convertible into cash so that the cheques of their depositors could be met.

The business of banking is what? It is a simple thing; it is the maintenance of an equilibrium between demand deposits and demand loans and between time deposits and time loans, so that you or I, drawing a cheque against that bank, may be certain that the bank will be able to pay what we call cash for it, notes, over the counter when the cheque is presented. In other words if my deposit has been put into a frozen credit that cannot be realized upon, the bank is insolvent, and that was what happened in the United States. That is the reason why this vast fund has been created in that country, at the instance of the president, for the purpose of enabling an organization to take up these securities that were not otherwise salable at the moment. When I say, sir, that the banking system of this country has been the sheet anchor of Canada in this period of depression, I but state a commonplace. There is not one of us who, however small or large may be his deposit in a bank, cannot with certainty draw his cheque upon that fund to-day and know that it will be paid. The business of the Department of Finance has been to watch, to scrutinize and to care for the whole financial structure so that there should not at any one time be any such loaning of demand deposits upon time loans that when a cheque was drawn it could not be paid.

Now, sir, in the light of those facts is there a single member of this house who would say we should substitute, for a system that maintains a coverage of nearly 40 cents on the dollar for all our legal tender outstanding, a system under which there is no coverage at all? Where would your credit be? I put it to you, sir: Where would your credit be?

That is the history of what has transpired. I could develop it further; I may have to do so before the session ends, but this affords a very reasonable opportunity to say to this house what I have said. The Bank Act will be up for revision next year, and there necessarily must be dealt with two or three large problems touching the whole banking structure of this country. One of them was alluded to both by the hon. member for Macleod and by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, namely a central bank. While our Finance Act enables the banks to come to the treasury and obtain legal tender, on depositing bonds of this country or of the provinces, or other prime securities, it will be observed that there is no coverage for these legal tenders thus emitted, and it follows that the question whether a central bank might not offer rediscount privileges and opportunities somewhat larger than those provided by the Bank Act is a matter well worthy of debate, especially in view of the fact that we have beside us the greatest credit organizations in the world. It might be possible to make a closer association with them by reason of the fact that you would substitute for a government organization a central bank organization which would not be the government itself but really an arm of government.

I want this house to understand that I am not expressing the view that a central bank is desirable. I am pointing out that the question is well worthy of consideration, that all has not been said about it that will be said, and all that can be said with respect to the question cannot be said upon the one side.

Under these circumstances, without labouring this matter unduly, for I have trespassed too long upon the time of the house already, I would say to my hon. friend from Macleod that the Macmillan report was not prepared in a day, nor was it prepared by any organization that might in any sense be compared with the committee on banking and commerce. I happened by accident to have a very brief discussion with the chairman of that committee while the report was still in preparation, and if you knew, sir, the amount of effort and toil and labour that was put into the preparation of that report, the number of people whose opinions were received, discussed and analyzed, you would realize how futile—I use the word not offensively—it would be to expect that from that committee would emerge a solution of this problem which we desire.

The opinions of individuals in their own country are of tremendous value. The opinion of a Canadian dealing with Canadian problems, knowing our nearness to the great republic to the south and our dependence, in a sense, for fresh capital, from the standpoint of the sale of securities, upon some country other than our own, when it gets beyond a certain limit—all these are factors that must be considered and must influence the mind and judgment of the men who are to deal with them.

I therefore suggest to the house that the closest study be given by each individual member to all the problems that are connected with currency and credit, and with the allied and kindred matters that affect the financial structure of this dominion. If I thought for a single moment that to add, beyond $71,000,000 of the present outstanding, unsecured paper money of this country, another twenty-five, or thirty or forty millions of dollars, would cure unemployment, would lift the depression and would end all our troubles, I would have no more hesitancy in asking the house for it than I have in asking the house to pass any estimate that is submitted to it. And there is not a member on either side of the house who would hesitate for a single moment so to do. But in the end one has to give to these problems the best judgment one has, and at a moment such as this, when we have institutions that have stood the shock and stress and strain of the most difficult period in our history, financially and otherwise; when we have institutions that have thus sustained these shocks with credit alike to the Canadian people and to the institutions themselves, difficult though it may be at times to understand why we should not at once change these things, the answer is that there is no assurance in anything that has been said or any suggestion that has been offered, that to substitute the bald credit of the Canadian people for a credit that is sustained at the moment by $70,000,000 of gold coverage for the notes that have been emitted by the country is an experiment which this government dare not sanction. Moreover, if its credit abroad is to be considered, if our reputation for meeting our obligations is to be considered, does anyone for a moment suggest that we could substitute the notes of the Dominion of Canada—thousand dollar notes and others—to pay bills in New York? Does anyone suggest that?

Mr. COOTE: No one has suggested it that I have heard.

Mr. BENNETT: The suggestion means that or it means nothing. It can be of no value unless it means that, because there is $71,000,000 of inflated currency, using this language not properly nor technically, $71,000,000 of uncovered currency in this country at the moment, and we know the circumstances under which it was issued. For that reason and for many more reasons that might be given to the house, without going into a long and elaborate explanation of all the circumstances that have influenced the government with respect to each matter, we have been compelled to take decisions. And one of the decisions we have taken is that it is neither meet nor proper nor in the interests of this dominion that at this time this question should be thrown into the melting pot by a committee, not of experts, men trained for the purpose of considering them, but by a committee selected from the house of members, eminent in their own respective spheres, but, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has just said, untrained to deal with these problems. The proper time and place will be when the next revision of the Bank Act comes up, when opportunity will be afforded before a committee, select or otherwise as may be determined, to deal with the whole problem of the credit and financial structure of the dominion.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I do not wish to interrupt the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his very interesting speech, but there are many anomalies in regard to the question of our currency and the gold reserve which I think should be explained. France, for instance, has a surplus of gold, and yet the franc has been stabilized at around 4 cents instead of 20 cents, which was the standard value. Again, England at the present time is receiving monthly about as much gold from India as is produced in the whole world during the same period, and at the same time the pound sterling is considerably below par.

There is one suggestion I would make to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Reading over the report of the Department of Finance I was quite surprised to see that more than one-half of the assets of each bank in Canada is stagnant in immovable property. This explains the lack of circulation or the stagnation of credit. Will it be possible for the Minister of Finance to take that fact into consideration in order to facilitate the circulation of money by controlling to some extent the construction of bank buildings?

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): If the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) had produced nothing further than the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and the speech we have just heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) it would have been well worth while. From different points of view, the presentation by each of these hon. gentlemen was certainly admirable, and their speeches will be instructive to those who are interested in the question.

The Prime Minister showed in his most able speech that he is better acquainted with theories than he would have us believe, and certainly he has all the practical knowledge which a man in his position could possess. Nevertheless, I wish frankly to take issue with the right hon. gentleman on some of the things he said. Though perhaps I have less practical knowledge than he has of the question under discussion, I represent another point of view, and inasmuch as there are several points of view possible I suggest that any view is certainly something which is well to the point and should be discussed.

The resolution which has been presented is similar to the one which passed the house in 1923, I believe. Unfortunately, however, the investigation that took place at that time was of no avail; the information which was collected by that committee was quietly buried, and all the expense involved in the study of the question was practically lost, except perhaps that the members of the committee had an opportunity to go exhaustively into the question. As has been stated by other speakers, this resolution asks that an inquiry be taken into the question of banking, currency and credit in Canada and also that the committee consider the advisability of amending the Dominion Notes Act to eliminate the provision for the redemption in gold of dominion notes.

The Prime Minister dealt extensively with the latter part of the resolution, namely, the danger to this country if we were to abandon the gold basis. The Prime Minister pointed out why gold was first selected as a basis for currency and credit. One of the reasons given was because it was rare. I must agree with that, but I answer that it is too rare. With all due respect to the difficulties with which I know the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) are faced, I contend that the thing is so rare as to be dangerous both to Canada and to all other countries.

The next reason given was that it was convenient. My reply to that is that it is not convenient enough most times, while it is too convenient on some occasions; it is too convenient at the present time for the well-being of Great Britain—it was removed just when she needed it most. The greatest difficulty with gold is that at the time we require it most, it is not there. It is too convenient in so far as its ability to be moved by others is concerned.

I disagree with the Prime Minister in his statement that gold is necessary as a standard. Gold never really has been a standard, nor do I expect it ever will be. Let us look at the absurdity of it. According to the statutory provisions referred to by the Prime Minister, for the first $50,000,000 of notes issued by the dominion we must have twenty-five per cent in gold; for all above that we must have dollar for dollar in gold. Let us apply that principle to other standards. Let us take the standard by which we measure energy, the unit of horsepower. Let us suppose parliament passes an act this year whereby we must develop no more horse-power from our water resources or our coal than we can provide living horses. Would anyone say that that was an intelligent thing to do? Yet we are asked to have a unit of value, we are told that we can have only as many units of value in circulation as we have gold dollars hidden away in some vault. I would not mind that if we had the same power to create gold as we have to raise horses, but we have not. The amount of gold we may have depends upon many factors beyond our control, and this makes it almost absurd to speak about the thing at all. As a standard of value it has never been adequate, and the requirements in respect to its being a standard are positively absurd. We do not require a horse for every horse-power of energy developed in the country, and we should not be required to have a gold dollar for every unit of value issued by the state to carry on its ordinary business.

The Prime Minister pointed out that there are $71,000,000 of notes outstanding to-day against which there is no gold. We know that those $71,000,000 of notes are as well backed as any note backed with gold. Canada does not have to limit her backing to one commodity; all commodities required by mankind have a value and behind that $71,000,000 is not only the wealth of Canada and what they may produce but also the good faith of the Canadian people, which is even of greater importance.

I understand the Prime Minister to point out—he will correct me if I am wrong—that we have coming due in the United States approximately one million dollars per day.

Mr. BENNETT: Outside of Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: It is an unfortunate fact that we have borrowed too much outside of Canada. Of course, that cannot be charged to this government or to any particular government, but we must deal with the facts. What do we get from the United States or any country when we borrow money? Do they give us gold? No. Do they give us their bank notes or their state notes? No, they do not. When we borrow from any country we get merely a line of credit, which we had before we went to borrow. There is no reason why any undertaking, industrial, private or public, could not be financed by credit issued in Canada direct without having to go to New York or other parts of the world for it. The unfortunate plight in which Canada finds herself to-day has been caused by her borrowing so much, in terms of gold, from other nations. With the present restriction on gold she now finds herself called upon to meet those obligations in gold. This is a situation which we should seek to remedy; we should borrow at least within the British Empire, or, preferably from ourselves.

The Prime Minister stated that if the section of the act dealing with the redemption in gold of dominion notes were repealed our dollar would drop to possibly twenty-five cents. I submit that the Prime Minister did not sufficiently amplify that statement. As he has said, we already have outstanding $71,000,000 of notes for which there is no gold backing, and the dollar has not dropped to twenty-five cents. Why then could we not issue some more without seriously reducing the purchasing power of the dollar? I suggest that if such issue were not sufficient to inflate the currency, values would not be affected at all. And what is inflation? There can be no inflation in any country as long as there is not more money in circulation than there are goods upon the market to be purchased by it. No one will say that there is not a good deal of room in Canada for more money to be circulating than is circulating at the present moment. Why not issue the proper amount, and not so much that all value is lost?

Strangely enough, the further we go off the gold basis the more gold will be secured. How did France get all the gold she has? She got it by stabilizing her franc off the gold basis and thus created abroad a tremendous demand for her own goods. Her export trade became so great that she did not require to take goods in exchange and demanded gold, the result being that she pulled the world's gold into her vaults. The same thing would apply to Canada. If we were a little further off the gold standard than we are at present our export trade to the United States would be greatly stimulated. We could take payment in gold for the resulting favourable trade balance and before long we would have more gold in this country than we can hope to have by maintaining the gold standard.

I do not intend to follow this matter any further in its technical possibilities than is absolutely necessary to indicate the points in the Prime Minister's speech with which I disagree. I come now to the next point raised by the Prime Minister in respect to that portion of the resolution which refers to credit. He asked: Is there a lack of credit facilities in Canada? I reply, most certainly not. Our credit facilities are admirable, perhaps equal to if not better than those to be found in any other country. The next question propounded by the Prime Minister was: Is there any lack of credit security? Again I answer. I do not think there is. He then asked: Is there any lack of credit being issued? He answered this question himself in the negative. He held, as I believe all bankers will hold with him, that for every well-secured proposition for credit put up to the banks they are ready to give credit. I believe that is true, but these are not the questions we want to ask in connection with the proposed inquiry. Let me state the question which I believe we must ask and which is more important in connection with the matter immediately before the house than the ones which the Prime Minister propounded. It is this: Were price levels lowered in Canada as a result of credit contraction, or was credit contracted as a result of the lowering of price levels? That is the question which has to be settled. At the present time price levels are so low that the returns on many investments will be very doubtful, and perhaps no amount of security would be considered adequate to cover a loan under present conditions. If a man is engaged in the manufacture of boots, where the price level is so low and business so poor, no matter how good his factory may be, he may have difficulty in securing credit. The same applies to agriculture; the same applies to any industry in Canada. Supposing any hon. member to-day had $1,000,000 that he wanted to place: where would he invest it? Would he invest it in railways? Not in their present condition. Would he invest it in agriculture, either in this or in any other country. No. Would he invest it in coal mining? No. Where would he find a place to invest that $1,000,000 in the hope of having a reasonable return upon his investment?

Miss MACPHAIL: In government bonds.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, government bonds would be the only thing left in this country or in the United States in which it would be considered safe at this time to make an investment of that sort. The question we want to ask is: How did that situation arise? Did price levels drop so as to discourage investment and to impair credits in that regard because credits were first contracted by the banks, or is the reverse the case? That is a question that is surely worth while investigating. I do not think it would be difficult to discover the truth of the matter were we to go about it as investigators. I imagine that the really accurate figures of price levels in Canada month by month over the past few years would indicate to us where the price level began to drop sharply, and the banking records would indicate very clearly when credits began to be contracted. If by a comparison of the two, it should turn out that banking credits began to be contracted before prices began to fall, we would be right in assuming that the present depression came about largely through the action of the banks in the first instance. That is the question to be settled, and I do not see how it can be settled except through such an investigation as has been suggested by the hon. member for Macleod.

I think the investigation is very necessary also because of its educational value not only to the house but to the country No one will deny that the question of finance is more in the public mind to-day than it has ever been before in our history, and no one will deny that there are few subjects upon which there is more abysmal ignorance generally than there is on that question. So, if for no other reason than that we might bring a more accurate knowledge of the subject within the range of the general public, it might be well worth while to have an investigation of this sort. Further, I think we ought to have an investigation because of the fact that next year the Bank Act will be brought up for its decennial revision. It is too late to start to think about that when we are busy revising the act; the time to get the information which should guide us in the revision of the act is now, a year ahead. I recall the last revision of that act. We came here to tackle the revision of a very long and complicated piece of legal machinery. A large proportion of the members of the banking committee are at all times neither lawyers nor bankers, and if they are to do justice to their position they have to wade their way through every part of that statute and try to understand it. If as a parliament we are going to do justice to that act, we must get information beforehand. The proposed inquiry would be of assistance in preparing parliament for its task of revising the bank act next year.

I think there is a great deal of force in the statement of both the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and of the Prime Minister that the banking committee is perhaps not the best kind of committee to investigate a subject of this nature. The banking committee for one thing is too large and cumbersome and the time at its disposal will be much too short to make the investigation that will be necessary. But just because it is true that the banking committee is not the most fitting body to investigate finance, that is no reason why we should drop the investigation entirely. Therefore, in spite of the more or less definite attitude of the Prime Minister, I hope he will reconsider the possibility of having an investigation. The question is not whether we want to go off the gold basis; the question as I see it is this: have credits in Canada, by adherence to the gold standard or basis, been so limited in volume as to have done violence to business and industry? Another question which deals directly with credit is this: Were credits contracted in Canada by the banks prior to the drop in the price level, or did the price level drop for some other reasons, with the result that the banks contracted their credit? The settlement of that question would be of great advantage in forming a policy. How can that knowledge be obtained without adequate inquiry?

In conclusion, may I suggest that with a greater knowledge than we now have of the subject, and if there is a definite relation between the volume of credit issued at any given time and the price level, it might be possible in future so to draft our Bank Act as to maintain hereafter some control of the volume of credit, thereby controlling price levels and also preventing a recurrence of a period of depression such as we are passing through at the moment. Therefore with all these considerations I submit that we would be well advised to carry on the investigation proposed. If the banking committee is not the best equipped body to do so, let us find another committee, a special one or even a commission. The only objection I have to a commission is that commissions of that sort are composed, usually of bankers, and they always find that we have the best banking system in the world; that the gold basis is inevitable and that no other policy need be considered. That is the unfortunate thing about commissions on financial matters. Such results as I have stated have been the history of commissions in other countries, and I fear we would obtain similar results here if we were to follow a similar course. But even at the risk of that, I would be more in favour of having a royal commission investigate this matter than of having nobody investigate it. May we not hope that the government will consider amending the resolution, if they so desire, so that it may go to some committee which will be competent to investigate a question of such importance to the people of Canada.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is a great privilege to be able to take part in a debate of such importance, one on which so many very able speeches have been made. The field has been covered pretty fully. There are, however, a few points that I might touch upon which might be fresh.

First of all I will deal with the first part of the resolution which asks for an investigation into the question of banking, currency and credit. The second part has already been fairly well covered by other hon. members.

[Mr. Irvine.]

I am in favour of this investigation for the simple reason that when in 1923 an investigation was obtained, just before the Bank Act was revised, the excuse made when we asked for certain changes in the Bank Act was that there was not time then to go into the matter. But if an investigation were made this year we would be able to study the information obtained and thus be in a better position to make changes in the Bank Act a year hence. Nine years ago the then president of the Canadian Bankers' Association made the extraordinary statement that nearly all the changes that had been suggested and eventually incorporated in the Bank Act had been put forward by the bankers themselves. When one appreciates that the Bank Act is, or at all events should be, a bulwark to stand in support of the rights of the people against the private banking institutions, it is indeed surprising that such a statement could be made. But it was simply because the public generally left this subject severely alone, with the result that those most directly concerned with the Bank Act, the bankers themselves, took good care to change the act as they saw fit.

It may be just as well to briefly review how a bank is brought into operation. It is still a question whether it is wise for those who are applying for a bank charter to be compelled to subscribe $500,000 capital, of which $250,000 must be paid up. Is that sum too large or not large enough? The question might also be raised with regard to the privilege that is given to banks when they get their charter, to issue an amount of currency equal to their paid up capital. That is a free issue; it is doubling their capital practically at the cost of printing. The question might also be raised with regard to the five per cent of their paid up capital which is retained by the Finance department for the note circulation redemption fund, and on which three per cent is allowed by the government of Canada. One might also very well ask for further information with regard to this fund.

Mr. CAYLEY: Does the hon. member say that the banks are permitted to issue currency for one-half of their paid up capital?

Mr. SPENCER: To an amount equal to their paid up capital.

Mr. CAYLEY: Who holds the securities?

Mr. SPENCER: There is no security. It is a privilege that is given to the banks when they get their charter. They are allowed to issue in currency an amount equal to their paid up capital.

Mr. CAYLEY: And give no security?

Mr. SPENCER: No security at all. That is one of their privileges. The note circulation redemption fund was organized supposedly to take care of the private notes of a bank in case of a bank defaulting. The amount of money put into the note circulation redemption fund by the banks is five per cent of their paid up capital, and when a bank fails, this circulation fund is supposed to be a safeguard in the interests of the depositors. The question might very well be asked in a new investigation whether it would not be in the interests of the people for the Dominion government itself to issue all the notes instead of allowing private institutions to issue notes in their own names, and by so doing safeguard the depositors.

Sometimes people are surprised to learn in how many different ways currency is issued by banking institutions. I have mentioned the first, the currency which they are allowed to issue on receiving their charter, which is to an amount equal to their paid-up capital. It is true that there is a tax of one per cent on that, but I shall not deal with that now because that comes under the question of taxation. In addition, for six months during the year from September to February, the banks are allowed to issue an extra amount equal to fifteen per cent of their paid-up capital and reserve, on which they are required to pay five per cent. If they want any more currency than that they are allowed to bring securities of various types—you will see them mentioned in the Finance Act, and it covers practically every type of security—to the treasury board and get dominion notes in exchange, for a small charge up to five per cent, although I have known the charge to be as low as three and a half per cent. So there are those three ways of issuing currency. So many people run away with the idea that the different types of currency I have mentioned pretty well fill all the requirements of a medium of exchange, but according to the very best evidence that we can get, and this is from the bankers themselves, ninety-six per cent of our medium of exchange is carried on by the chequing method. I am here summoning to my aid the statement of Sir Edmund Walker. Although a certain amount has to be paid for the currency that is issued, the currency is infinitesimal compared with the amount of money used through the chequing method.

I come now to a point which I think it is essential to bring to the attention of the house. We have heard the statement made many times that banks have no money of their own to lend. The Prime Minister himself made that statement only a short while ago, and I agree with him because the capital of the banks is largely tied up in buildings, and so forth. But the Prime Minister went on to say that the banks lend only the money of the savings depositors. That is where I distinctly clash with the Prime Minister, and I bring to my aid two very eminent men. First I quote the chairman of the Midland Bank of England, who says:

> The amount of money in existence varies only with the action of the banks in increasing or diminishing deposits. We know how this is effected. Every bank loan creates a deposit, and every repayment of a bank loan destroys one.

Here is a still better definition from Elements of Banking by Mr. H. D. Macleod:

> When it is said that a great London joint stock bank has perhaps £25,000,000 of "deposits," it is almost universally believed that it has £25,000,000 of actual money to "lend out," as it is erroneously called. . . . It is a complete and entire delusion. These "deposits" are not "deposits" in cash at all. . . . They are nothing but an enormous superstructure of credit.

In support of that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to go back to the period of my life when I had the privilege of spending a number of years in a banking institution. Members who are interested in the subject may be surprised to know that we had only one savings bank deposit ledger of about a thousand folios, and not an account on every folio by any means. We were never in a hurry to get deposits for that ledger. They did not come in in large amounts because we were paying only a small rate of interest, and those who had money preferred to put it in business with the expectation of securing greater returns. But in that office we had no less than five huge loaning ledgers. We did not borrow from any of the other banks, but we carried on a very active and profitable business all the time. How was it done? Very simply. We knew quite well that about ninety-five per cent of the media of exchange was carried on by the chequing method. When a client wanted a loan we found out what collateral he had to offer. Just as soon as he was prepared to put up sufficient collateral to cover the loan and make it perfectly safe we were only too glad to do business. The security was turned over to us, and it made the loan perfectly safe so long as he did not overdraw his account. The savings bank deposit ledger was nothing more than a nuisance to us. We did not refuse deposits, but we never encouraged them as the banks do in this country. We created current accounts by extending credit based on the people's collateral; we were acting as the agency through which they could use their credit. Every savings bank deposit we took in we had to reloan, and we therefore made less profit on it, because we lost the interest we paid to the depositor. That is how the business is carried on, and that is why in good times or in times of war when we have to extend the medium of exchange, a great deal of new money goes into circulation.

As to inflation and deflation, these subjects have been handled so well by other speakers that I will not attempt to go over the same ground.

Mr. YOUNG: What money did you lend in those cases?

Mr. SPENCER: Money is a credit created by collateral and drawable by cheque. If the hon. member would give this subject the consideration it deserves, which I am sure some day he will—and I am confident he will make a very good student when he does—he will know that money is like a concertina, it can be extended or contracted at will by those who control credit. Banking to-day is largely a bookkeeping system, and the sooner we realize that the better it will be for everybody.

Mr. CAYLEY: If the collateral you took became frozen, as has happened in the United States, how would you manage?

Mr. SPENCER: That is where the skill of the banker comes in; he should not take any frozen securities. I want to point out that although the Dominion Notes Act allows us to issue notes up to $50,000,000 with only 25 per cent backing in gold, above which amount we are supposed to hold a dollar in gold for every paper dollar issued, the act might just as well be repealed, for under the Finance Act we can and do issue dominion notes to an unlimited amount to the various banks that bring securities to the treasury board to be discounted. These dominion notes are also payable in gold, but there is no gold behind them. Therefore if we issued under the Dominion Notes Act fifty million dollars worth of notes with 25 per cent gold behind them and under the Finance Act another fifty million dollars worth of dominion notes to the banks against the securities they brought to the treasury board, we would have one hundred million dollars of dominion notes out with only 12½ per cent gold backing. It will be seen that the Finance Act at once undoes what was intended to be guarded against by the Dominion Notes Act. Not that I am critical of the Finance Act; I think it is one of the best acts ever put on the statute book.

[Mr. Spencer.]

If we had an investigation as suggested by this resolution the committee might go into the question of interlocking directorates. For instance, it may not be generally known that Sir Herbert Holt of the Royal Bank is a director of upwards of one hundred and thirty-five corporations. Is it likely that a director of various corporations in different lines of business, who has a great deal to say with regard to the functions of a particular bank, is going to encourage the starting up of another business competitive with his own? Again it might be asked, is it in the interests of western Canada that the headquarters of all the chartered banks should be either in Toronto or Montreal?

The Prime Minister's statement with regard to the payment of gold interested me. He said: We made a promise that we would pay in gold and we have kept that promise. That might have been done in New York, but it certainly has not been done in Canada. Not that I am worrying about it, because I take the stand that it is not necessary to have gold behind dominion notes for internal circulation. The late Mr. J. G. Saunders, Deputy Minister of Finance, wrote me a letter with regard to the gold basis, in which he said:

> The gold basis, so far as Canada is concerned, would require—
> First; that the banks should redeem their note issues in gold when required;

I hardly agree with him there, except that I would say that the notes of the chartered banks are payable in dominion notes, and dominion notes in turn are payable in gold.

> Second; that gold could be exported and imported at will; and
> Third; that Dominion notes would be convertible into gold when required at the various offices of the assistant receivers general.

To-day none of these things can be done and therefore, accepting those views, we are not on the gold basis. I should like to place on record one or two statements made by Mr. McKenna, chairman of the Midland bank, in his report to the shareholders of that bank the other day. He said:

> The time has gone by for the childlike belief that as long as a country is on a gold standard all is well.

Again he said:

> The world crisis is due in part to the inefficient working of our monetary machinery.

Referring to England going back on the gold standard in 1925, of which hon. members will remember he was very critical, he said:

> For upwards of six years our monetary authorities fought a losing battle on ill-chosen ground.

Finally I will quote:

"Monetary policy has a powerful and a direct influence on the prosperity of each one of us, and if it is misdirected no one escapes.

Because I believe in the statements made by this eminent banker, and because I am entirely in sympathy with the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Macleod and the other hon. members who followed him on this side, I am in favour of the resolution now before the house, from which I hope it will receive sympathetic consideration.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the financial policy of this and all outstanding countries of the world is not of recent growth; it is something that has grown up and developed over a long period of years, and it is too much to expect that it will be changed in a short time. However, a great deal of attention, time and study is being devoted to the subject to-day, and I should like to see every member of the house take the advice given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and study this question, take it up seriously and try to secure all possible information upon the subject before the revision of the Bank Act next year.

Until very recently the men who questioned the orthodox system were generally looked upon as theorists, faddists or radicals with no practical experience, who were developing certain theories of their own. However, within the last two years particularly many outstanding and powerful bankers, big business men and statesmen, men whose word and authority cannot be questioned, have been asking serious questions about the banking system, inquiring whether or not that system might be modified to better serve the needs of the human family. Therefore I propose, Mr. Speaker, in the quotations I am going to place on Hansard to-night, to confine myself to the orthodox class rather than to university professors or students, or others who might be looked upon as theorists.

The question as to what is behind our dollar bill, the paper dollar, has figured very prominently in this debate, and on several occasions it has been pointed out that the ability to deliver gold, or something like that, is after all the only thing that makes the dollar bill worth anything. Let me say that the ability to deliver goods or something of value is the only thing that creates any value or any confidence in the dollar bill. It is not necessary that gold be delivered. Any citizen of Canada, securing a piece of paper, a dollar bill or a ten dollar bill, will set its value at what he can secure for that bill at the store or some other place. If he can secure certain goods or services for it he is not going to inquire very deeply into the question of whether or not be can get gold. The main thing is the ability to deliver goods or services which is behind the issue of that piece of paper.

The question then arises as to what is the gold standard. Many refer to it as something that is fixed and determined, something that cannot vary from one day to the other. As a matter of fact it is as variable as the seasons. The gold standard is an ever-shifting, ever-changing thing. Some years ago the gold standard was whatever the Bank of England determined it should be. England was the great banker of the world, and what she said the gold standard should be was the gold standard. To-day the position has shifted and the United States has become the banker of the world; whatever the United States says constitutes the gold standard is the gold standard to-day. Not more than twenty-four or thirty months ago the gold standard of the United States meant that behind every paper dollar in circulation there was 38 cents or 40 cents in gold. To-day it means that there is 80 cents behind every paper dollar, so the gold standard has changed to that extent. It is as though a man contracted to deliver a certain amount of wheat, we will say, on the basis of four pecks to the bushel, but when he delivered the wheat he found that the standard had been changed to eight pecks to the bushel, and he was compelled to deliver twice the quantity for which he contracted originally.

I quite appreciate the position of the Prime Minister and the government in respect to a departure from the gold standard. The fact that we have tremendous obligations maturing regularly in the United States has imposed a terrible hardship not only on the federal government but on our provincial and municipal governments as well, because of the fact that we have to pay a great deal more than the value of our Canadian dollar. That is one of the difficulties with which we are faced to-day, but as the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) pointed out, there is a moral in that situation, and perhaps in future we should try to do less borrowing in the United States and more at home. When we turn over a bond to a Canadian citizen we simply agree to repay in the currency of Canada whatever that may be, whether or not it is on the gold basis, so maturing bonds held in Canada do not impose on us any such obligation as is imposed by bonds maturing in the United States.

Recently the United States embarked on another policy, which I think in time will bring the gold basis back to the old standard so that there will not be more than 40 cents or 45 cents, or perhaps only 35 cents, behind each paper dollar. That is a policy of tremendous inflation, and I predict that before very long our dollar will be back at par in New York, not because we have done anything, not because there is any more gold behind our dollar, but because the United States dollar will have been devaluated and because more paper money will have been issued against the amount of gold in store.

In dealing with this question some time ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) pointed out very clearly how utterly impossible it was for the debtor nations to pay their obligations to the United States in gold. He pointed out that the whole world production of gold, if it were in the hands of those nations and used entirely to pay off debts to the United States, would not be sufficient to meet those obligations. I wish to quote now from an article that appeared in the Wall Street Journal, written by Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock. It is reproduced in the Financial Times of Montreal. One could hardly find two more orthodox sources than the Wall Street Journal and the Financial Times of Montreal, and yet this article seriously questions the efficacy of the gold standard and of the present banking system, and asks some grave questions as to modifications in that system. The writer points out first that in connection with the gold standard there are three main rules that should be adhered to. In the first place he says that gold should function primarily as a central bank reserve, and its only other function should be its occasional use in settling international balances. Secondly, and this is very important, he says that the creditor country should follow a liberal tariff policy. It seems to me that the great depression through which the world is passing to-day is due to the fact that the United States, when she became the great banker of the world, the great creditor nation, did not follow the traditional policy that a creditor nation should adopt. For generations, as long as England was the great banker of the world, she was prepared to accept her dividends, her annual payment, in goods, and so long as she did that trade flowed naturally through the channels of the world. When, however, the United States became the great banker she either was not prepared to do this or she did not understand the rules of the game and therefore raised tremendous tariff barriers against her debtors. She said, in effect, to those countries that owed her money, "We will not take goods." As a consequence these countries shipped all the gold they could get until to-day there is an impasse; and until the United States changes her policy in this regard she certainly will be in no position to collect debts. That is pointed out clearly in the Wall Street Journal. This writer quotes an author by the name of "Peregrinus," who was writing in the London Times. He points out, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us some time ago, that the whole world production of gold outside the United States is not sufficient to meet the obligations, and that something must be done. He pointed out that if France and the United States, the two creditor countries, continued to observe the policy already described, then in his opinion there was only one course for the debtor nations to follow and that was to depart from the gold standard and get along as best they could without it. He then deals with the question of managed currency, one that has come up quite frequently in debates in this house but with which at the moment I have no time to deal. This writer points out that it is quite possible and feasible for those countries that are forced to go off the gold standard to arrange a managed currency in order to maintain a stable price level in their own domain, and they could then ship their reserves of gold to the United States and France in settlement of debts so far as they could. He also states, and this is important, that the moment these other nations went off the gold basis and the United States and France were left on the gold basis, the gold itself would immediately drop in value; its only value then would be for the purpose of filling teeth and making jewellery. It might therefore be an easy matter ultimately for these countries to settle their debts. He goes on to say that after all, the way things are going at the present time, these reparations and debts will not be paid at all, that the depression will continue until that fact is recognized and admitted all round, and that the spirit in which the admission is made will be of great consequence to the peace of the world during the next few years.

The question of a managed currency—and that is the only alternative to the gold standard—is one that was dealt with a few years ago by Maynard Keynes, recognized as one of the outstanding authorities of the world. As I understand the theory of managed currency, it is that those who have the responsibility of managing it should take a certain index price. Say there are one hundred different commodities—wheat, copper, coffee, butter, hogs and so forth—and that the index price is established at 175. Now, the men managing that would have to watch the index carefully. At the end of a certain period if they found that the price had dropped, that is that commodity prices had gone down, they would realize that one of two things had happened; either that the volume of business had increased, in which event there would not be sufficient money properly to handle the situation, or that the circulating medium, the amount in circulation, had decreased and was forcing prices down. In that case they would be faced with the responsibility of putting more money in circulation. On the other hand, if prices had advanced, their duty would be to restrict money. The banks would be forced to call in loans and that would have a stabilizing effect, forcing prices back to their proper level. That is the theory of managed currency put forward by this writer and at the present time it is being endorsed by outstanding bankers as well as by men prominent in political and industrial life.

May I again refer to the article in the Financial Times of October 3, 1930. The very heading of this article is significant:

Bankers favour abandonment of gold standard.

This appears in the Financial Times of Montreal. I have not the time to quote from this as extensively as I should like to, but I will deal with it briefly. The statement is made:

The downward trend of commodity prices has reached the stage where the efficacy of the gold standard is being seriously questioned by economists.

Further on it says:

It seems reasonable to assume that if central banks throughout the world insist upon maintaining their present standards of gold reserves, the phenomena of declining price levels over a considerable period of time may be observed.

And again:

The corrective for the monetary situation of sharply falling commodity prices is an easy money policy. An intelligent control of the value of gold is regarded as essential to improve economic conditions.

It goes on to point out the direct relationship between the amount of money in circulation and the commodity price levels. It shows clearly that if the amount of money is restricted prices will drop, and if the amount of money is increased prices will rise. The great problem we are facing in this house, the subject which is most discussed throughout the country, is unemployment. Now for thousands of years, for countless ages, one of the great aims and objects of the human race has been to have more leisure for study and meditation, more time to enjoy oneself; and that very urge in the human heart has brought about the development of the machine. The machine in turn has displaced labour, giving mankind the very thing that has been asked for throughout the ages. It has given the human race more leisure. And that really is what unemployment is. I hold that the term unemployment is a misnomer; there should be no such word in our vocabulary as unemployment. Perhaps I cannot boil down into one word the idea it conveys, but I should call it an improper distribution of goods and services. People are not unemployed because of scarcity, for, as many have pointed out, this is an age of plenty. Never before in the history of the race was there as much food and clothing, as much in the way of service, transportation, electrical power and so on, for the good of the human race. Yet in the midst of all this plenty there is poverty. What we require more than anything else is a stabilization of prices, and it is borne out by many distinguished bankers that this is dependent almost entirely on the amount of money in circulation.

I come back to the Financial Times, of October 16, 1931. Prominently displayed on the front page is an article by H. S. Denny, a consulting engineer of Toronto. I quote:

The granaries of the world are bursting with corn, and warehouses are choked with goods, yet hungry hordes are steadily increasing in numbers. They stand waiting in despair until the capitalistic Lords of Creation, under the guise of a benevolent solicitude, find some profitable method of bringing the producer and consumer together again.

The familiar picture of children flattening their faces against the plate glass of a candy shop display, mouths watering and suffering from an almost intolerable desire, is in some respect, a small scale illustration of the world condition to-day. A few pennies—helter-skelter into the shop, money paid over, candies received, jaws vigorously working, happy children and consummation of trade.

Then rather significantly the writer says "but they have to have the pennies." The article continues:

The bankers of the grim poker game called "life" have decreed that chips shall be exchangable only for the commodity called "gold," and with scrupulous care and unscrupulous methods, have taken infinite pains to corral all but an insignificant percentage of that metal in their own vaults. There is no escape from the game. All human beings must play—there is no choice—be the stakes large or small, and willy-nilly the player must provide himself with chips or starve.

I direct the attention of the house to the fact that this article does not appear in a radical paper; it appeared in the Financial Times of Montreal.

In connection with over-production, of which we hear so much to-day, I should like to refer the house to a pamphlet which has been published by Sir Henry Strakosch, G.B.E., a distinguished financier and economist of Great Britain. He lays down the general principle that there never has been over production, it is under consumption. After giving some figures of his own he bolsters up his argument by quoting Mr. Carl Snyder, the statistician of the federal reserve bank of New York. Again I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that this is not from a radical source, it is from an extremely orthodox source. Sir Henry points out that Mr. Snyder contends that during the past fifty years production has been increasing in the United States at the rate of about four per cent per annum compounded annually, while world production during the same period increased at the rate of three per cent, the world population increasing only by one per cent. That is, the production of the world on a per capita basis has doubled in fifty years. He goes on to point out that in the same period the consumptive ability of the human race has doubled. We are using radios and motor cars, we are wearing more clothes, eating better food and living in more comfortable houses than we were many years ago. Mr. Snyder has pointed out that this is capable of infinite expansion. Sir Henry asserts that the amount of money in circulation determines whether goods shall be consumed or shall pile up in the warehouses to create this thing we call overproduction. To quote directly from his pamphlet, he says:

> A symmetrical increase of production of this kind in effect raises the standard of life of the people, and that, it is almost unnecessary to say, is capable of practically infinite expansion. No disturbance in the exchange of the greater output of commodities need, or does, arise in these circumstances, provided there are available media of exchange in the form of money of all kinds to an amount that corresponds to the increased volume of exchanges that this greater production necessitates. If it is available the general level of commodity prices will remain stable. It is only when the available amount of money is either less or more than is needed to effect these exchanges that the general level of commodity prices will fall or rise as the case may be.

I again quote from another extremely orthodox source, the representative of the great Mussolini. A despatch from Paris dated November 26 in connection with the opening of the disarmament conference, quotes Senator Boriello of Italy, as follows:

> It is insufficient to disarm the military forces of the world. We must disarm the international bankers. We must have tariff disarmament just as we have reduction of weapons.

[Mr. Campbell.]

It is my conviction that there will never be a permanent improvement in conditions until the outstanding nations of the world agree on some monetary policy, whether or not there is gold behind it, to provide elasticity sufficient to meet the growing needs and changing conditions. Of course, Canada cannot control world conditions but she can do her share to set her house in order, she can reorganize her monetary system to an extent to prevent any sudden drastic upsetting of the commodity level; she can provide sufficient safeguard to prevent the sudden and violent deflations of currency which have occurred during the past few years. I refer again to the Financial Times, the issue of January 16, 1931. The article from which I intend to quote refers to the now famous speech of Mr. C. E. Neill, vice-president of the Royal bank, and to the remarks of Sir Herbert Holt made on the same occasion. These remarks startled the whole banking fraternity because they questioned the orthodox system. The editorial reads:

> A bank president who speaks with the voice of assets totalling nearly nine hundred millions of dollars (after a year of deflation) is entitled to speak with authority.

The article states that a remarkable change has been taking place in the opinion of leading bankers as to the necessity of a rigid adherence to the gold standard. In referring directly to Mr. Neill's remarks, the editorial says:

> But he made it very clear that the standard could only be adhered to if a much greater degree of wisdom were shown in the international management of the gold supply than has been in evidence since 1918. Perhaps the most significant sentences in his whole speech were those in which he stated that if the principal central banks of the world had decided, upon the collapse of the stock market boom, that drastic contraction of currency and credit were not to be permitted, they could have effectually prevented the fall in the price level; after which he went on to say that "the countries with fiat currencies, such as Argentina, Uruguay and Spain, are not suffering anything like as acutely as the gold countries."

I have many other quotations which I would like to make from the Financial Times, but I see that the clock is moving rapidly towards eleven o'clock and I will have to cut them short.

I should like to refer briefly to an article which appeared in the Financial Times of September 26, 1930. This article comes from New York and in dealing with the gold standard it refers to the figures of Sir Henry Strakosch, already quoted. It refers also to Sir Josiah Stamp, a gentleman not unknown in Canada. Sir Josiah is quoted as asserting that the menace arising from the inefficient use of gold "is the worst danger that eight years ago any of us could have feared, and finding us drifting still further into economic disaster." The article continues:

> Sir Josiah Stamp appears to agree with Sir Henry in scouting the convention that the severe decline in commodity price levels in the last fifteen months is due to overproduction brought about by rationalization and mechanization. Sir Henry argues that since the rise in the volume of production had been in progress for the last half century while the level of prices had risen steadily up to the war, there should have been no price break in 1929, provided the available money increased in proportion to production.

Again may I quote from another editorial in the Financial Times of October 24, 1930. In part, it says:

> A few days ago the Manchester Board of Trade addressed an extended argument in the nature of a petition to Premier MacDonald of Great Britain, calling attention to the fact that our volume of world business was increasing and our gold supply decreasing, and arguing that this would result in a fall of prices and an ever-increasing depression. The report of the gold delegation of the League of Nations recently was to the same effect. It stated plainly that the world was facing a "gold shortage."

In conclusion I wish just to refer to a very interesting article in Saturday Night of February 6, 1932. This is by Doctor Donald M. Marvin, economist of the Royal Bank of Canada. I have not time to put on record the quotations that I should like to give, but I suggest that hon. members who wish to acquaint themselves with the intricacies of this question, should read this article, coming as it does from a representative of one of our outstanding Canadian banks. This man disposes of the bogey of over-production. He refers to the Malthusian theory of population, that is that the human race must starve or be killed off because we cannot produce food rapidly enough to take care of the increasing population. He says that to-day the problem has developed from the opposite angle. He goes on:

> As far as present day society is concerned, neither the picture of severe deficit nor of unlimited surplus is descriptive. . . . Basically speaking, there is no general overproduction within the confines of civilized society.

He goes on to point out that it will be necessary before long for those countries hoarding gold to turn it to use, that is to issue more paper against it or else the gold itself will become of no value. This is exactly what is happening in the United States to-day. The United States has found that the sterilization of the gold there may mean that the gold itself will ultimately lose its value, and to-day they are issuing huge amounts of credit against it. Doctor Marvin further points out that present conditions forcing, as they are, other nations off the gold standard, are going to compel these nations to work out a managed currency. I have not time to elaborate the point, but this is the economist of the Royal Bank of Canada laying down quite clearly the idea that a managed currency without gold is not only possible but very probable in the near future.

I would say again that I hope all members in the house will take the Prime Minister's advice and devote some time and attention to the study of this all-important question before a revision of the Bank Act comes up again next year.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH: (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend until this afternoon to speak on this question, but during the last few days we have had quite a discussion on the currency, banking and credit problem, and as a member from Saskatchewan and western Canada I thought I had better say a few words on the matter. I listened with a great deal of attention this evening to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) discussing this very important problem of Canadian banking and credit and I am free to say that I think he made one of the best speeches that I have listened to in the house so far as he is concerned.

Mr. MORAND: Why the qualification?

Mr. McINTOSH: Because I did not intend for a minute to say it signalized a clean sweep, but I want to be fair about the matter, and after abstracting from it any politics that hon. gentlemen opposite might have thought entered therein, make a candid admission that he gave a really fine exposition of the subject under review this evening. I do not think it does any harm to make an admission of that kind in the house in a matter of such moment. From the standpoint of quantity there was not too much to it, and from the standpoint of quality and volubility it was a fair sample of what one might expect from the opposite side of the house. There should be a good deal of credit coming to the Prime Minister for standing on the financial bridge of the ship of state and directing Canada during the last few months in such a way that the credit of the provinces has been taken care of and the credit of the dominion by his firm stand maintained in the markets of the world.

But I am free to say that I disagree with the Prime Minister when he intimates, as I think the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) also did in the house last week, a doubt—mark you, Mr. Speaker—that on both sides of the house that we had that ability, that financial training, that would make it safe for a banking and commerce committee appointed from the 245 members of this national commons to investigate the question of banking, credit and currency of Canada. I am afraid I must disagree with any member who takes that stand. I am one of those who believe that not always does every member stand up and discuss a question when it comes before the commons, whether he is well posted on it or not. One cannot tell by the number of members who discuss a question as to the developed ability of the house on it. That is a certainty.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member is making the Prime Minister's speech.

Mr. McINTOSH: No, I am not. I am making my own speech. I believe we have in the house dozens of members who, on the spur of the moment and without any preparation by going through scrapbooks, newspaper clippings and files of the last five or six years, can make an intelligent speech on the question of banking and finance. That is my conviction.

I want to go a little further. I believe if that be the case—and I do not think it can be disputed—when the revision of the Bank Act comes up next year, we ought to have one of the strongest possible committees appointed from this chamber and, if it is necessary to nationalize that committee, let us do so. But let us get busy and make a thorough preparation for that investigation into the banking, currency and credit of Canada which must be made next year before we can say whether this or that part of the Bank Act must or must not be amended. We want to be sure of our ground, and for this purpose we must begin to make preparations now. I do not know what is in the Prime Minister's mind; I do not know whether or not he intends to leave this revision of the Bank Act until the next session without in the meantime making any preparation by way of the appointment of a national committee which might ultimately cooperate with a special committee of the house. If he does, then I am a little doubtful as to the report of that committee. But if so the committee should be appointed early in the session and given instructions as to what to do, I believe the ability that could be secured on that committee would measure up well to its responsibilities and a report would be turned in of which the House of Commons and Canada would not need to be ashamed. It is a question largely of time, not ability.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Further, may I say I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) trace the history of money in a word, telling us how society has revolved around the dollar bill or the various kinds of money preceding it throughout the centuries and how as a result we have been brought out of the realm of savagery and barbarism into the definite stages of civilization through which we have been passing during the last few centuries. That is an interesting evolution and I listened with rapt attention to the hon. gentleman while he unfolded the tale. He gave an excellent analysis of the question. Then I listened to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) who, as one of the members of the official opposition, analysed the banking, credit and currency problem very carefully and successfully, and indeed, put the matter before the people of Canada so squarely as to state in definite and clear language where the Liberal party stands in respect to it, not only on the prairies and British Columbia but right across the whole dominion.

I think the Prime Minister made a very important point when he said that every member of this house should give this matter individual attention during the next year. I believe that every member has been giving it a fair amount of study, but when we consider what we have to do next year in revising the Bank Act, I think every member should give the question more attention than ever. As one of our great scientists has said, I believe there is no question which the human mind can ask to which it cannot in time give an answer. Every question, therefore, that we can ask about this problem we can surely answer if we will but patiently analyze the facts and dig up the answer. By getting a satisfactory answer in regard to this intricate question the development of society, the adjustment of agriculture and industry, and the building up of Canada as a whole will follow more naturally as fitting results.

Although the question of banking and currency and credit is undoubtedly a big one, one of the great questions before Canada and the empire and the whole world, I am not going to admit that it is the biggest question. I do not believe that it is. I believe that international debts and reparations are big problems, and that disarmament is another big problem. These are two of the big problems before the world, international debts and reparations, and disarmament. After those two I would place equally in importance, or even beyond them, the tearing down of extreme tariffs right around the world. These problems, three in number, are equally as big as, if not bigger, than the question of banking and currency. They all go together, and we have to fight them in a block, and by fighting them in a block we can gradually overcome each one of them, and thereby strengthen the financial fabric of Canada and the empire of which we form a conspicuous part.

In conclusion, may I say that apart from the discussions that have taken place in the house, the big objective before us is what are we going to do at the Imperial conference? I am very glad that this problem is to come before the conference, but I do not think that that is all that we ought to do about it. I believe that the question should not only come before the conference, but be exhaustively analyzed there and the people of Canada be given the facts. We want the people educated along the line of this resolution. But beyond the analysis at the Imperial conference, and beyond the investigation we must have in this house in 1933, when the Bank Act is revised, there is no question that there should be individual preparation on the part of hon. members, so that everyone will know where he stands on it, thus doing his part to educate the people of his constituency so that we shall be able to bring united pressure to bear on this problem and the questions connected with it—international debts and reparations, disarmament and high tariffs—so that in the very near future these problems will have to fall down before the intelligence, the courage and the ability of those who are out to make Canada a bigger and better dominion and a more conspicuous self-governing unit in the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in the short time at my disposal I cannot refer to all the statements and points of interest which have been brought out in this debate. I would, however, like to refer to the suggestion made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that somebody had inferred that if we only got away from the gold standard it would bring in the millennium in Canada. May I say very emphatically that I do not believe that anyone ever suggested such a thing, but undoubtedly there are a lot of people in Canada who do expect the Prime Minister to bring in the millennium, and I am quite sure that so long as we remain on the gold standard he will not be able to do so.

I would also like to refer to the statement made by the Prime Minister that there was no shortage of credit facilities in Canada. I think I am stating the case fairly when I say that there is no credit in Canada for agriculture, Canada's greatest industry, and I do not see how that industry is going to continue to function unless credit for it is forthcoming. There is certainly credit for governments in Canada, but at what a cost? Recently two of our provinces floated loans to secure moneys for which they are paying six and a half per cent interest. If the interest on these loans is to be paid, it must be paid out of production. As Sir Thomas White, Canada's war-time finance minister said, speaking of Canada's victory loans: If the interest was ever to be paid it would be from the top six inches of Canada's soil. With the present prices for agricultural products, lumber products and mining products, how is the interest on these loans at six and a half per cent ever going to be paid? It is absolutely impossible. We are heading for a port which we shall not be able to reach so far as the paying of six and a half per cent on these loans is concerned.

The Prime Minister, either very carefully or accidentally, avoided one of the points raised in the resolution before the house. It asks the banking committee to inquire into the advisability of amending the Dominion Notes Act with a view to eliminating the provision for the redemption of dominion notes in gold. The Prime Minister dwelt at great length upon the fact that we should meet our foreign obligations in gold; that is, bonds maturing in foreign countries. No one to-night, so far as I know, has challenged that position. But under the Dominion Notes Act, Mr. Speaker, the dominion notes are redeemable in gold. Subsection three of section four of the Dominion Notes Act provides:

> Dominion notes shall be redeemable in gold on presentation at branch offices established, or at banks with which arrangements are made for the redemption thereof as hereinafter provided.

Section nine provides for the establishment of these agencies. But, Mr. Speaker, the redemption of notes in gold is not taking place at these offices.

Mr. BENNETT: Wherever requested the gold is available, but it is not permitted to be exported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 1, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER APPOINTMENTS AND THE ADMINISTRATION AND OPERATION OF THE ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That the following members do constitute a special committee of this house, pursuant to the motion adopted by this house on the 25th day of February, 1932, to consider and report upon appointments to and the control and direction of the civil service of Canada, and generally the administration and operation of the Civil Service Act, as in the said motion more fully set out; viz.: Messieurs Lawson, Bowman, Laurin, Ernst, Chevrier, Vallance and Woodsworth; with power to the said committee to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time to this house.

Motion agreed to.

SEED AND FEED RELIEF

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT OF HOUSE TO DISCUSS MATTER OF PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the serious situation of the farmers of Manitoba in regard to lack of feed for cattle and of seed grain, and the fact that no satisfactory arrangement for relief can be arrived at with the government.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) was good enough to give me a copy of his motion in advance, and I have had an opportunity to consider it. I must hold that the application is not in order, that it is an application for the adjournment of the house in order to discuss a matter for the discussion of which the motion to go into committee of supply or other appointed business will afford an early opportunity. The motion to go into supply, or the resolution on the order paper to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, will afford an ample and early opportunity for the discussion of the question which the hon. member now seeks to bring up.

Mr. BROWN: I suppose I will have to bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but this is a matter of such prime importance that on other occasions I have brought it to the attention of the house. Horses and cattle are dying—

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not that the matter is not of importance; I have so ruled because, as I have said, there will be ample opportunity to discuss the question under the appointed business of the house.

Mr. BROWN: All I can say is that horses and cattle are starving to death.

STEEL INDUSTRY AT SYDNEY

RAIL ORDERS DESIRED TO ENABLE WORKS TO RESUME OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). I am in receipt of a telegram from Sydney, which states that conditions are very serious due to the prolonged idleness of the steel works. We have been hoping that the situation might be bettered by a rail order from the Canadian National Railways. We all recognize the financial condition of the road—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): I ask the indulgence of the house for a moment while I explain my point. The rails are needed, and the order would be of great help to us just now. Perhaps I may not be in order, but I should like to ask the minister if he might anticipate his statement on the railway question, and give us some information now as to whether we might hope to get an order for rails from the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. gentleman was good enough to mention this matter to me yesterday, and I have made inquiries in the interval. I knew the road would not require very much in the line of rails, but according to the information given me with regard to the railway estimates, which will be tabled in the course of a few days, from ten thousand to fifteen thousand tons of rails will be required in the Atlantic region, which probably will affect the mill mentioned by the hon. member. That is the best information I can give him at the present time, and I doubt very much if there is any hope of getting that amount increased, for the reason he mentions, that is, the financial condition of the railway at the present time.

ONTARIO INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister or the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs if the attention of the government has been directed to certain reports appearing in the press with regard to what would appear to be a lamentable condition prevailing among the Indians in parts of this country through lack of sufficient care and food. The statement is to the effect that the situation has been brought about in part as a consequence of the cutting down of the appropriations made for the proper care of the Indians. Perhaps my hon. friend the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs is in a position to make a statement.

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Superintendent General of Indian Affairs): The right hon. gentleman has couched his question in such general terms that a definite answer is rather difficult to give. I do not know whether he refers to any particular district or to any particular group of Indians, or whether his question applies to all Canada. If he could make his point a little more definite I would be in a better position to answer his question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand the reference is more particularly to the northern Ontario region.

Mr. MURPHY: This matter was drawn to my attention, I may say, by an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe with particular reference to that portion of northern Ontario known as the district of Patricia, and the charges outlined in the article were to the effect that the Indians were not being properly looked after. This district, as my right hon. friend knows, is isolated and without means of communication other than by air-plane, by canoe or travel overland. The Indians in that territory are few in number, and in matters of relief we deal with them through the factors of the Hudson's Bay Company and the various missionaries in that area.

In answer to the right hon. gentleman's question I might read portions of a couple of letters which have been received by the Department of Indian Affairs in connection with this matter. The first is a letter from the Trout Lake mission, near Sioux Lookout, which reads as follows:

> The plane is expected in next week so I am taking the opportunity of forwarding you my requisitions for medical and school supplies. I am also sending you the statement of my services as dispenser during the past six months as this is our only winter mail. I have not heard yet as to whether there will be another plane call for the Hudson's Bay Company in June, probably there will.
> Most likely next week we shall receive the dates for your proposed itinerary next summer.

Now comes the important part of the letter:

> The Indians here are keeping very well and happy although fur prices are poor. They have an abundance of country food this winter which is by far the most important for their health and happiness. Please excuse this hasty letter. I have been very busy this winter which has been a very good thing for me as it has kept my mind fully occupied on my work.

That letter is dated February 5, 1932; it is signed by the Reverend Leslie Garrett, and is addressed to H. N. Awrey, of the Department of Indian Affairs, the officer who makes the annual payments during the summer. Then I have an extract from a letter written by Mr. I. W. McCauley, Hudson's Bay Company, Cat Lake Post, Narrow Lake Post Office, Ontario. I may tell my right hon. friend that this office is located near the Cariboo Indians, who are referred to in the Globe article, and who are also known as the Nikip band. This is the extract:

> All the Indians are well up this way and doing fairly well this winter excepting the old people and one woman who is very sick. The Cariboo Indians are also all doing fairly well and are very pleased to hear that you are going to pay them at Cedar Lake this summer.

I do not know whether or not this completely answers the question my right hon. friend has in mind; if not, I may be able to give him further information.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Arising out of the question submitted to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy) by the leader of the opposition—I am sorry I was not in my place at the moment—may I ask the minister whether he would consider sending some airplanes in there with some officers to investigate the condition of the Indians in the Patricia district, where it is reported there have been many deaths as well as considerable suffering.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a letter only three weeks' old, saying they were very happy.

Mr. MURPHY: In the light of information furnished me by the missionary and the factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, I shall have to receive more accurate information before I consider sending airplanes in at this time of year.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Now that the order in council has been passed implementing the legislation of last session with regard to Beauharnois, can the Prime Minister give any information to the house as to the condition of the enterprise, the relationship of the government thereto, and perhaps more particularly with reference to the matter of guarantees that may have been given to the banks for financing the works?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman sent me a note before noon saying that he proposed to ask the question. It is proposed to lay upon the table at an early date the documents in connection with the matter, proclamation having been issued yesterday bringing into force today the statute that was passed at the last session, and orders in council based on the authority of that statute will be laid upon the table by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) to-morrow, I trust. In the meantime I will look through the hon. gentleman's observations in Hansard and see whether I can make some further statement.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yesterday a motion standing in my name was moved by my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), for a copy of all orders and regulations of the governor in council under chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, for relieving distress and unemployment. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) asked that the motion stand, saying that these orders would all be included in the papers which would be tabled. Now I have on the order paper another motion asking that there be laid on the table all the orders with regard to the maintenance of peace, order and good government under the same statute. May I ask the Prime Minister, before the resolution is proceeded with which he has placed on the order paper for the purpose of extending that statute from March 1 to May 1, that there be brought down all the orders which have been passed thereunder since last year so that we can discuss his resolution intelligently.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is intended to lay upon the table of the house all orders passed under the authority of the statute to which the hon. gentleman refers. They comprise a considerably large number of orders in council, and the report which the Minister of Labour proposes to table will cover them all. He said yesterday that he hoped to be able to table that report by the end of the week. To postpone until that date consideration of the resolution will work very great hardship upon western Canada. They are dependent upon the ability of the government to enact the necessary legislation to make to them advances to permit them to purchase seed grain, the case mentioned by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) being one of them. I propose to make as full an explanation as I think the circumstances demand before seeking an extension of the statute, and if it will be of any interest to the hon. gentleman I may say that I am quite content that every order in council issued under it should be laid upon the table of the house at the next session of this chamber subsequent to its passing, that is, under the extended order. It is only to meet an emergent situation, full particulars of which we have been endeavouring for weeks to ascertain and which we now have.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECT AND PEST ACT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, to amend the Destructive Insect and Pest Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time and referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization.

PETROLEUM AND NAPHTHA INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 20, to amend the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Explain.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The explanation was given on the introduction of the bill. It is very short and if hon. members will take the trouble to read the explanatory note the whole compass of the matter will be apparent. No one objects and it helps everyone.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

On section 1—Tests of petroleum.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is provided in section 10 that petroleum shall not be sold if, when tested by the pyrometer, it emits a vapour that will flash, at a lower temperature than 85 degrees fahrenheit. Should not this provision with regard to the temperature be included in subsection (b)? It appears in subsection (a).

Mr. RYCKMAN: It was not there before. I do not know and I do not wish to sail under false colours; I may not know as much about temperatures as does my hon. friend, but I do know that the passage of this bill will permit a certain class of petroleum to be used. I was not a member of the house when this act was passed and I cannot of my own knowledge give the information asked for by the hon. member.

Mr. DONNELLY: If this provision does not refer to clauses (a) and (b), then the bill is all wrong. We know that when gasoline is heated it weighs much less, and when it becomes chilled it increases in weight.

Mr. YOUNG: I understand the purpose of this amendment to be to make possible the sale for illuminating purposes of a product which has not been sold in the past for that purpose. Has any scientific test been made as to the illuminating qualities of this new product? Those who burn kerosene complain that they are unable to obtain the quality which they used to get and these people are anxious to know whether this amendment is to result in an improved or deteriorated quality of kerosene.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am not in position to answer the hon. member. If he is acquainted with the provisions of the act he knows the conditions which have been in force. This bill will eliminate the cutting of petroleum with gasoline; it will provide for the production of a good product without the necessity of going to that trouble and expense.

Mr. YOUNG: I suggest that this bill should stand over until a test has been made to determine whether the quality will be improved or deteriorated.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The chemists in our department have done what the hon. gentleman asks should be done, and they have reported that the change will be of benefit.

Mr. YOUNG: Benefit to whom?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I must rely upon that information.

Mr. YOUNG: It may be that this bill will benefit some but it may not benefit others. This is a technical matter; we are not qualified to decide whether or not this proposed amendment will improve the kerosene. I suggest that this is a matter for scientific experts, and we should wait upon their judgment.

Mr. VALLANCE: The point raised by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) is well taken. The explanatory note reads in part:

> The proposal to amend the act to permit the marketing of this product has been submitted to experts of the Department of the Interior and of the Department of National Revenue, who have agreed that the proposed amendment can be made without increasing fire hazard or otherwise interfering with the objects of the act.

Is this amendment to be to the advantage of the consumer or is it to stimulate production? There must be something behind the bill. If the experts have done as the explanatory note says they have done, the minister should be in a position to say who is going to benefit.

Mr. RYCKMAN: As the explanatory note says, the experts of the departments of National Revenue and the Interior have pronounced in favour of this amendment. I do not pretend to be an expert in this matter and I must rely upon the officials of the departments. If the hon. gentleman or any of his friends have special knowledge of this matter, let them tell the committee wherein this bill fails.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is not a matter of having knowledge, it is the lack of knowledge which we want to supply.

Mr. ERNST: The hon. member has that.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): The hon. member started with that.

Mr. VALLANCE: The explanatory note states that the experts have this knowledge and it should be available to the committee. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Weyburn is well founded.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS INCURRED IN 1931

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, respecting the Canadian National Railways, and to authorize additional provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1931.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill in effect is a supplementary estimate and it is hoped that some time next week we will be able to bring down the main estimates for the Canadian National Railways. At that time I intend to make a general statement on the railway situation but at the moment I should like to have this bill referred to the special committee on railways and shipping. Then, any discussion which the house may choose to have on this matter may be undertaken next week when the main estimates are brought down.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister state to the house whether or not he is able to lay upon the table the report of the Canadian National Railways for 1931? I take it that he must have the information because he is asking for the passage of a bill which provides for the actual operating deficit for last year.

Mr. MANION: I have made inquiries and I find that it has never been the custom for the Canadian National Railways to bring down their report earlier than about March 15. They are working on it at the present time, but in the meantime they have given me sufficient information to draft this bill; they need this $11,000,000 immediately, and the annual report can be discussed by the special committee and by the house, if it so chooses, when the regular estimates are being considered.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committe on railways and shipping.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

CHEQUES WITHOUT FUNDS—GRAND JURY SYSTEM IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the criminal code (cheques without funds and grand juries).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill is an effort to remedy a difficulty which has been felt for some time, particularly among the commercial people of the country, in regard to cheques issued on banks but dishonoured by them on presentation, in most cases there not being sufficient funds to meet the cheques. The only provision at present in the criminal code which applies to such matters is section 404 which we know as the section respecting false pretences. Under that section it has been very difficult in prosecutions to obtain convictions. It has been held by many magistrates and judges sitting in various courts of the provinces that so long as a man has to his credit in the bank any small sum, he is relieved by that fact of any implications of having obtained money on false pretences, and the number of dishonoured cheques has grown to such a tremendous amount in recent years that it is thought some attempt should be made to remedy the difficulty. I think I am safe in saying that I have had representations from every province and from every representative board and association asking that some amendment be made to section 404 in an endeavour to obviate this difficulty. The number of cheques which were dishonoured last year by the banks is upwards of 70,000. I received a letter to-day from an hotel manager in Ontario stating that the amount of defaulted cheques which had been received at his hotel last year was $130,000. Subsequently the larger proportion of that amount was of course recovered, but the cheques were actually refused, dishonoured, at the banks. I mention these things to show the extent of the grievance from which the commercial community at the present time suffers.

A bill was introduced last year and a good deal of discussion took place with regard to it, but it was felt that the bill was not in the best form and the matter was allowed to stand. Since that time the law officers of the Department of Justice have given their best attention to the proposition and have drafted a clause which may to some extent meet the difficulty. The amendment proposed in this bill provides:

In any prosecution under this section—

That is, under the section in respect of false pretences.

—if it be shown that any thing capable of being stolen was obtained by the accused by means of a cheque which, when presented for payment within a reasonable time, was dishonoured on the ground that there were no funds or not sufficient funds on deposit in the bank to the credit of the accused, it shall be presumed that such thing was obtained with fraudulent intent by a false pretence, unless it be established to the satisfaction of the court that when the accused issued such cheque he had reasonable grounds for believing that it would be honoured if presented for payment within a reasonable time after it was issued.

The presumption in such a case is that the issuing of such a cheque was fraudulent, but that presumption may be removed if the accused can establish to the satisfaction of the court that when he issued the cheque he had reasonable grounds to believe that the bank would pay it. I think if this section is adopted and the act is amended and given a fair trial, it will to a very large extent avoid the difficulty from which the commercial community has suffered for so many years. It will not, I am sure, cure every case, but it is a step in the right direction.

The other section of the bill relates merely to the province of British Columbia. The government of that province has asked that what we know as the grand jury system be abolished so far as British Columbia is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister received any representations from any other bodies than the attorney general of the province?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think only from the Attorney General of British Columbia. In the prairie provinces I believe the grand jury system has already been abolished, and British Columbia no doubt is following the lead of the prairie provinces in that respect.

Mr. BRASSET: I would suggest that the following words be inserted after the word "that" in the second line:

Any payment of any account.

This is to cover the case of a man who runs a bill in an hotel, for instance, and pays any account with a worthless cheque.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill is not directed against cheques issued in payment of debts; it is intended to cover cheques issued for the purpose of obtaining goods. However, when the bill goes into committee, I shall be able to explain it more fully.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am in full accord with the first section of the bill, but frankly, I have grave doubts as to the propriety of the second section and I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) that, if possible, at a later stage of the bill, he would be good enough not to rush it to completion in order that we may have an opportunity of communicating with various interested bodies in British Columbia. No one knows better than the Minister of Justice the grand jury is an ancient and honourable institution and it provides splendid safeguards in connection with the administration of justice. In addition to the preliminary step of finding a true bill or no bill, our grand juries on every occasion in British Columbia make exhaustive investigations into the public institutions of the main centres, and their recommendations have very frequently been adopted as the basis of action. Would the Minister be good enough at a later stage to defer the final stages of the bill in order that we may get in touch with boards of trade, labour organizations, law societies and the bench in British Columbia with regard to their attitude toward this particular section?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 1.—Obtaining by false pretence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before I overlook the matter, let me say in reply to the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, that I shall be glad to let the bill stand for third reading until he has had an opportunity of communicating with the various bodies in British Columbia whom he mentioned. Personally I am strongly in favour of the grand jury system, and I hesitate very much to agree to its abolition in any province. Yet we must remember that the administration of justice is left in the hands of the provinces and the various provinces make representations that the cost of the grand jury system is very serious, particularly at the present time. I liked the old grand jury of twenty-four, now reduced in the province of Ontario to twelve. That reduction took place for the purpose of saving expense. Now the proposal in the west seems to be to do away with grand juries altogether. I think that they were a valuable part of the administration of the law, and not only in regard to the administration of criminal justice, but grand juries took a general survey of their immediate surroundings and of the public institutions in their neighbourhood and their reports to judges, and afterwards to governments, were very often very valuable sources of information. I for one do not like to see the system abandoned, but when a responsible officer of the government of a province makes a request for the abolition of that system on the ground of the saving of expense I think perhaps it is our duty to give serious consideration to that request, and as grand juries have been abolished in the prairie provinces, perhaps it would not be unreasonable to grant the same request in British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did they ever have grand juries in the prairie provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, they have never been adopted there, and the administration of the law seems to be quite satisfactory there without them. Perhaps it would be reasonable to grant the request of British Columbia. However, I shall be only too glad to let the matter stand until we hear from various public bodies in British Columbia as to what they think of the proposal.

Mr. BRASSET: The point I wanted to raise a little while ago was this: This morning I received a letter from a client of mine saying that someone had received money to give to his client, and instead of turning that money over to his client the individual put the money in the bank and made payment by cheque. Later when the cheque was presented for payment there were no funds in the bank to meet it. That happens quite often. I think there should be some provision in the law covering such a practice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am afraid that this proposed amendment would not cover the case cited by my hon. friend. That is a case where a man obtains money without cheque at all and subsequently issues a cheque to cover the debt. The clause before us applies only to persons who obtain any property that is capable of being stolen, and obtain it by the issuing of a cheque which subsequently turns out to be bad. The mere fact of giving a worthless cheque in payment of an old account does not injure anybody.

Mr. BRASSET: This was not an old account. Suppose a lawyer receives the sum of one hundred dollars to give to a client of his, puts the money into his bank and makes payment by cheque, and the cheque later is not accepted by the bank. There should be a provision in the law to cover such cases.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is already covered by our law. That is the conversion of property to his own use, which is a criminal act on the part of the lawyer. But he did not obtain the money by means of a worthless cheque.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I remember well that one of the bodies that were most active in asking for legislation of this kind was the hotelkeepers' association. The hotelkeepers always represented that in various states of the American union the hotelkeepers are protected against N.S.F. cheques, but if I read the section aright, the hotelkeepers will not be protected by the present amendment because when a man issues a cheque for his board at a hotel, it is not in payment of something that is capable of being stolen at the time he makes payment because he has already eaten his board when he gives the cheque. So this will not meet the case, if I understand it aright.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I think it is very doubtful if it will meet the case of a hotel bill, any more than any other bill. This only covers an actual transaction where the goods are obtained by fraudulent means through the issue of a worthless cheque. A man who has run up a board bill for a week or two, or a month or two, and settles with a worthless cheque is not obtaining goods on false pretences; he is refusing to pay for them.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There have been criminal prosecutions for that.

[Mr. Brasset.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: There have been prosecutions. A man was charged with defaulting on his hotel bill. He was charged with obtaining a certain amount of tea, sugar and meat under false pretenses, not intending to pay, but that man was an absolutely worthless fellow who had no responsibility. He was more in the nature of a tramp, and he was convicted under that section.

Mr. JACOBS: Was it because he was a worthless fellow?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Because the presumption was that he never intended to pay, and that he obtained a certain quantity of tea, sugar, meat and bread on false pretences.

Mr. FACTOR: The man who obtains goods at the present time on a cash basis and issues a cheque therefor can be convicted of a criminal offence if the cheque is no good, but would a man who purchases goods on credit and makes a down payment by means of a worthless cheque be affected by this section?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is only where he obtains goods by reason of a bad cheque. If a man purchased goods and pays part cash, and subsequently, when the bill comes in, he issues a cheque that is no good, he did not obtain those goods on the strength of that cheque, and that is not a criminal offence. The offence is when the cheque is issued, and as a result of the cheque the goods are obtained, and the cheque is no good. The presumption then is that the transaction was fraudulent.

Mr. JACOBS: Is not that plain theft under our criminal code now, without any amendment?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, because our courts, not the superior courts, but many of the minor courts, have held that if the accused can show that he had any credit balance in the bank the presumption is that the transaction was not fraudulent because the man felt in his mind that his cheque would be paid.

Mr. HOWARD: If that is the case I think the minister should be willing to delete the words in line eleven "or not sufficient funds," because to leave those four words in changes the whole effect.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, because these cheque operators do leave a few dollars in the bank, and they do it for the purpose of protection.

Mr. JACOBS: But there are cases where the party gives a cheque and the bank honours it, and then out of whim or caprice the bank decides that they are not going to honour any more of his cheques, and the man thinking at the time that his cheque would be honoured makes himself amenable to the law.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In that case the man would have to satisfy the court that he had reason to believe that his cheque would be honoured. That is his safeguard.

Mr. BRADETTE: What is meant by the words "reasonable grounds" in the sixteenth line of the section? That is a very wide statement. A man may keep fifty cents in his savings account at the bank, and the cheque may come back N.S.F., and he could be sued for a criminal offence. The phrase "reasonable grounds" is altogether too vague. I would like the minister to enlarge upon that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the word "reasonable" is a term that is understood certainly by all lawyers. It is a term that is used to express a condition which appeals to any ordinary man as being reasonable. We speak of reasonable grounds, and in this section also we speak of a reasonable time. What are reasonable grounds and what is a reasonable time depends upon the circumstances attendant upon each case, and that must be determined by the judge who is hearing the case. What is reasonable under any given set of circumstances? What would appeal to the man of a reasonable mind? That is a fair test.

Mr. BRADETTE: I do not believe it is a fair test because I know how the thing works out in actual practice. I remember several cases where, as a matter of fact, the parties interested had only a dollar or fifty cents in their savings accounts. In such cases suit could be lodged and it would be within the discretion of the jury or the judge to define "reasonable grounds." I maintain the proposed section is altogether too vague. The minister is opening a wide gap to anybody who wishes to work a scheme to avoid paying a bill. When an act is formulated there should be a clear definition of what is meant so that an accused when he appears before a police magistrate or any other court may know his ground of defence. I make that statement because the expression "reasonable grounds" is not explicit enough to bring a man before a police magistrate's court.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say—

Mr. BRADETTE: Probably the hon. member will permit the minister to answer.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I say the term is expressly stated in legal language, and is used in many sections of the criminal code. What are reasonable grounds? —reasonable doubt; reasonable time; those are reasonable grounds. I should not like to change the wording, because that now before us is well understood legal phraseology.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is for the jury to decide.

Mr. POULIOT: I have in mind another set of circumstances. A man may say, "I have no money, but if you will sell this article to me I can pay at the end of the month by giving a cheque for so much, and another cheque payable the last day of the next month." In the meantime he does not receive the money he expects, and when the cheque is presented to the bank he has no funds. The merchant has agreed to accept such cheque. Under the circumstances, has an offence been committed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under this clause, the circumstances outlined by the hon. member would not constitute an offence. He has described a case where a man has obtained credit on promises to pay, not on the issue of a bad cheque.

Mr. BRADETTE: I have no quarrel with the word "reasonable" but I know from practical experience that when we attempt to define "reasonable time" we will strike a snag. We will suppose that a man doing business in northern Ontario has to send a cheque to Montreal. Under such circumstances what will be "reasonable time"? Will it be the regular schedule of time for all cheques, namely about forty-eight hours? These are important matters.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The statute already provides for that. Whatever time a judge or jury would think reasonable for the cashing of a cheque issued in northern Ontario and payable in Montreal, would apply. The Bill of Exchange Act makes express provision for such circumstances.

Mr. BRADETTE: But it is not applied.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The test is: what is reasonable under the circumstances of each given case.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There cannot be any fixed delay.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The court will consider all the circumstances and will not act unreasonably when it must act reasonably. Section 165 of the Bills of Exchange Act provides:

A cheque is a bill of exchange drawn on a bank, payable on demand.

To determine reasonable time within the meaning of the proposed section regard shall be had to the nature of the instrument, the usage of trade and banks in each particular case. The court has to make the decision.

Mr. JACOBS: We will suppose the maker of a cheque asks that it be held for fifteen days before presentation. Is or is not that a reasonable time?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is an agreement to hold a cheque. When a cheque is issued the presumption is that it is payable on demand and will be paid on presentation. If however at the time of the transaction the vendor or the seller of the goods is notified that he must hold the cheque for fifteen days, he then has direct notice that at the time of the issuance of the cheque it has no value, and he is giving credit to its vendor. He is not selling goods on the strength of such a cheque. The same applies to a post-dated cheque, which is nothing more than a promissory note. It is not a bill of exchange, at all.

Mr. JACOBS: The law would not apply to cases of that type?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. BURY I should like to ask a question concerning words I find in the third line of the proposed subsection, namely:

by means of a cheque which, when presented . . .

That would cover not merely a cheque issued by an accused person but would cover a cheque negotiated by the person wishing to obtain the goods. Lower down we find wording which would indicate that the cheque must be from the person seeking the goods, I find the words:

unless it be established to the satisfaction of the court that when the accused issued such cheque . . .

and so on. I wish to call attention to the fact that the first part of the proposed section would cover not merely the accused's own cheque, but a cheque negotiated by the accused, and I should like to know whether it is the intention that the act shall be so wide?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It covers only a cheque of the accused himself.

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is quite evident by the discussion which has taken place that the wording of this section is far from being clear and that it will, in the future, give rise to numerous prosecutions. Might I not suggest to adjourn the debate in order that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) may be given an opportunity to submit a section which would preclude discussion and not open the door to legal proceedings in the future.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I think, sir, that my hon. friend is in error when he states that this section is not clear; on the contrary I think it is very plain.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Not quite so.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The only difference is that it allows one to establish a prima facie case against the accused, and that is quite clear, there is no ambiguity in this respect.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Then why all this discussion if the clause is so explicit?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The hon. member does not quite understand.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): There are many who do not quite understand, even lawyers.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I state that the clause is absolutely lucid because it allows one to establish a prima facie case against the accused.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): In other words, the law is reversed.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The law is not reversed, we simply presume a prima facie case against the accused, because it has been shown that it is always difficult to prove the bad faith of a debtor or one that obtains goods by false pretences through the means of a worthless cheque. In the present case, the maker of a worthless cheque will have to explain to the court why the bank did not honour the cheque. Judging from past experiences I think that this provision is absolutely just and will prove a protection to the business community as a whole.

Mr. BRADETTE (Translation): I am engaged in business myself and I frankly state that this bill is in no way clear. According to the provisions of the bill, trades people are in no way protected. Judging from my own experience, conditions will be worse than they are now. I am sincere and convinced in saying so.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA: I am sorry the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) did not speak in English, because he made it clear that this short text of law is much more important and capable of more far reaching consequences than most members realize. Of course, it may be very impertinent for a layman and an ignorant fellow to interfere in a discussion between legal lights. However, in my few years of the study of British law I have understood that the basic principle of penal legislation, both in Canada and Great Britain, has been that every accused man shall be held innocent until he is proved guilty, and that the duty of the government or—may I enlarge the word—the duty of all representatives in authority, whether in legislative or judiciary capacities, is, not to protect crooks, but at least to give accused persons a fair chance.

Under the proposed new text of law I find the following most striking expression:

any thing capable of being stolen . . .

I suppose that means any thing that is not too heavy to pick up and carry away?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh no.

Mr. BOURASSA: To be carried in one's hands, or trunk, or truck?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Those words are in the criminal code.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Probably it would refer to a stove.

Mr. BOURASSA: My Scottish friends would be reminded of the heroic deeds of old Scotch caterans. A trader from a village below Quebec was coming back home from that city with his truck loaded with goods, but when he arrived he found his truck was empty because the goods had been stolen all along the road. So almost everything is capable of being stolen.

But that is not the important part; what I object to most of all is that it shall be "presumed" that such thing was obtained with fraudulent intent. That is the point which I think deserves consideration, and to which I object. Since the war, probably because in this country as elsewhere the war enhanced the activities and energies of many people, many fraudulent processes have developed; and I realize the desire of the government and especially of the Minister of Justice to help honest people protect themselves against crooks. On the other hand, however, in this as in other respects let us beware that the remedy does not open the door to worse evils than those we wish to correct. I think the old British principle of not unduly protecting the accused, but of at least giving him a chance to defend himself, is one from which we should not depart without much hesitation.

It happened that while I was on the train yesterday I heard a country merchant discussing this very bill with his friend. That was the first I had heard of it. "It is all very well to protect people against crooks, but it is very dangerous to expose honest people to blackmail," this man said to his friend. "Here is what happened to me a fortnight ago. I received a cheque for $500 from one of my clients, and I deposited it in my bank. I then purchased goods from a wholesale merchant in Montreal and, relying upon the cheque which I had deposited, I issued a cheque against my own account in favour of my creditor. It happened that the cheque which I received was not honoured, so the cheque which I had issued was not honoured either. It was sent back inscribed 'not sufficient funds.' Supposing the wholesale merchant to whom I gave that cheque wanted to make use of the law which is proposed, I could have been arrested."

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, of course he could have been arrested, under the presumption that he had obtained those goods with a bad cheque, and the onus of proof would have been upon him. I suppose in that case he might have cleared himself, but as I said before you throw back upon the accused the whole onus of proof.

I do not wish to pursue that point further; I simply say that this matter deserves some consideration. We have been too apt, both in administrative matters and in the changing of our criminal law in the last few years, to endanger the basic principles of those laws that for several centuries have been the adopted practice for the protection of the subject.

Mr. JACOBS: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the words "unless it be established to the satisfaction of the court." What is the meaning of that? Would not the section be improved by striking out those words? We are not taking into consideration the jury which might sit on the case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The word "court" covers a jury.

Mr. JACOBS: Why not strike out the words "to the satisfaction of the court" and make it read "unless it be established."

Mr. GUTHRIE: It must be established to the satisfaction of somebody.

Mr. JACOBS: I am not so certain the word "court" covers a jury. I know it does in many cases, perhaps sometimes a little too effectively.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It means the trial tribunal, whatever it may be. I do not think the argument of my hon. friend that we are changing the burden of proof in some way is quite sound. It is only a presumption, which is rebuttable, and English criminal law is full of such presumption. In connection with the possession of stolen property the presumption is that it is stolen property, and you can be convicted on that and nothing more.

Mr. BOURASSA: But it must be proved that the property is stolen.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I say the law is full of such presumptions.

Mr. JACOBS: It certainly throws on the accused the onus of proving his innocence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the onus can be easily met by an honest and innocent man.

Mr. FACTOR: I do not doubt for a moment the intention of the Minister of Justice to strengthen the criminal code with regard to cheque artists, but I submit that under present conditions this section should not be passed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FACTOR: Hon. members may laugh, but I say that in all sincerity. I know of families to-day who will issue cheques for little gas accounts of $3 or $4; those cheques may be returned unpaid, and those poor fellows can be prosecuted under this section.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, they would have time to make it good.

Mr. FACTOR: I beg to differ; unless they can show reasonable grounds for believing the cheque would be paid they can be convicted under the section, as I read it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think an honest man would be able to escape any penalty.

Mr. FACTOR: That is not the point; a man issuing a cheque under circumstances such as I have mentioned can be arrested and prosecuted. He may appeal to the sense of fairness of the judge and be let off with suspended sentence, but I could tell you of men who have issued cheques for little grocery bills that have been returned unpaid, because under present conditions the poor fellows who were earning small salaries could not meet the cheques in time. I say in all sincerity that under present economic conditions this section should not be passed. I think the law is too stringent, not only because it shifts the onus of proof to the accused, but for other reasons as well. I quite agree with the minister that there are many places in our code where the presumption is put on the accused, but that has not been so in cases of this kind, and under present conditions this amendment should not pass.

Mr. SANDERSON: As a layman I should like to get some information from the minister with regard to the present law. The minister said he received representations from hotel keepers in regard to this amendment. Supposing a man stays at a hotel for a day, a week or a month, and then pays his hotel bill with a cheque; if the cheque comes back marked "not sufficient funds" after the man has left, cannot that man be arrested and prosecuted under the law as it now stands?

An hon. MEMBER: Under section 407.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then how would this amendment help? What difference would it make to the law as it stands now?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a special section of the criminal code dealing with cases of that kind. It is a subsection of section 407, and it provides:

> Every one is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine of one hundred dollars and costs or three months' imprisonment who fraudulently obtains food, lodging or other accommodation at any hotel or inn or at any lodging, boarding or eating house; and proof that a person obtained food, lodging or other accommodation at any hotel or inn, or any lodging, boarding or eating house, and did not pay therefor, and made any false or fictitious show or pretence of having baggage, or had any false or pretended baggage, or surreptitiously removed or attempted to remove his baggage or any material part thereof, or absconded or surreptitiously left the premises, or knowingly made any false statement to obtain credit or time for payment, or offered any worthless cheque, draft, or security in payment for such food, lodging or other accommodation, shall be prima facie evidence of fraud.

He is liable under that section to a charge of fraud.

Mr. SANDERSON: Let us take a case apart from hotels altogether. Suppose I issue a cheque in payment of a small bill: under the law as it stands now, if that cheque comes back as having not sufficient funds, can I be arrested and prosecuted?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the hon. gentleman mean a cheque issued in payment of a purchase made at the time, or a cheque issued for a monthly account, say?

Mr. SANDERSON: It might be for a bill which is running, but suppose it were a cash transaction?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the cheque is issued in payment of a former purchase there are no false pretences. The position of the creditor is not affected in that case; you do not make it worse. You have simply given him a bad cheque. But if you obtain goods by issuing a cheque for which there are no funds you are obtaining those goods under false pretences.

Mr. POULIOT: A person cannot be tried on summary conviction in this case. This is a crime. When a man is arrested on complaint, under the criminal code the matter cannot be settled civilly. The person defrauded would have to take civil action to recover his money. Suppose a man sent a cheque for three or four dollars in payment of his gas account; under this bill he is guilty of a crime.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. If he gets a bill for gas and sends a cheque, even though the cheque is bad he is not guilty. But if he goes to a gas station and buys gas and gives a worthless cheque in payment he is guilty.

Mr. POULIOT: Taking that view, that man can be arrested and it is a criminal matter. If the gas company or other concern that supplies the goods wished to recover, they would have to take civil action in addition to paying the costs of the preliminary inquiry. That is how I interpret it. If they have a man arrested for obtaining goods under false pretences, a preliminary inquiry takes place and the complainant has to pay the costs of the witnesses, the stenographer, and the legal costs of a clerk of the court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not in our province.

Mr. POULIOT: That is the situation in Quebec. If the complainant wishes to recover his money from the person who issued the cheque, he does not get it on his complaint but only after he has taken civil action against the man, having spent about fifty or seventy dollars for the costs of the inquiry. After he has paid those costs he has to start anew to recover.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): The objection one often meets with before the courts in matters of this kind is that the criminal courts refuse to allow themselves to be used as collection agencies. In this case it seems to me that the accused is placed at a disadvantage. The ordinary evil-minded man, the criminal, steals a certain sum of money from someone and is brought to trial and all he has to do is to sit back and the crown has to prove his guilt, whereas in this circumstance a man might be of the most innocent mind and might issue a cheque on the strength of one deposited from someone else. That cheque is returned from the bank as having no funds, and the cheque he has issued is therefore no good. He is haled before the courts and has to defend himself, and the presumption is against him, the same as in automobile cases, in the province of Quebec at least. A man charged with a breach of the automobile law has to prove that he is not guilty. This legislation is of the same kind. A man, whether he is innocent or not, is taken before the courts and has to prove that he had no intention of fraudulently issuing the cheque, whereas the ordinary criminal, as I have pointed out, has nothing to do but to sit back and allow the crown to prove its case against him. I have heard several inquiries as to who asked for this legislation, and I should be glad if the minister would inform the committee.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been asked for very generally throughout Canada by the retail merchants' associations in the various provinces, some chambers of commerce and some boards of trade. Innumerable correspondents have asked for it, including the hotelkeepers' association. I have had only one or two letters, not from the association but from hotelkeepers; my colleagues have also received letters, and I know that my good friend who brought the matter up last year has been deluged with them. The object of the bill is, if possible, to put a stop to the issuing of worthless cheques. I do not think that the people who issue such cheques should be encouraged or surrounded with all sorts of safeguards. The honest man will have no difficulty whatever under the bill. The man who parts with his goods or services should have some recourse. I think the bill should be given a trial. In spite of it the practice will continue, but I think this legislation will help. At any rate, the idea is, as far as possible, to put an end to what is a very reprehensible practice. As regards the criticism that this is a bad time to enforce it, I do not think that we can ask the merchants and gas dealers of the country to bear the costs of providing for those who are in need at the present time, and that is what this argument amounts to. A man goes into a store and obtains certain goods, and no matter how hard up he may be, if he gets the purchase on the strength of a cheque which he knows is not going to be honoured he is guilty of a transaction which no one can justify. You cannot ask the retail merchant to bear the loss. If the purchaser is honest and has reason to believe that the bank will honour the cheque, if he has a balance and has a right to overdraw, all he has to do is to explain that to the court and that will constitute reasonable grounds and he will be acquitted.

Mr. JACOBS: The plea was made only for the gas stealers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A bill would be rendered for the gas. If a cheque is issued in payment of the bill it is not an offence.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not think this legislation is necessary. Section 404 of the criminal code defines false pretences. In this definition the first paragraph contains all the elements which we need to cover in this act. The definition is this:

> A false pretence is a representation, either by words or otherwise, of a matter of fact either present or past, which representation is known to the person making it to be false, and which is made with a fraudulent intent to induce the person to whom it is made to act upon such representation.

The issuing of a cheque by a person is the representation of a fact present. If the definition in the first section is not sufficient, a slight amendment might be made stating that the issuance of a cheque returned n.s.f. is to be considered as false pretences.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We want to give the man some chance.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He will have the chance; he will be accused of false pretences and it will be up to him to explain.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me to be a professional obsession of every legal man to look at these matters from the point of view of the crook. Do they never consider it from the other side? Do they never think of the small store-keeper who has been stung by this wholesale and widespread system of extortion? We all know that the ultimate sufferer is the general public because the expenses of the store-keeper must be paid. A great deal of the objection to this bill has been raised by those who innocently or perhaps inadvertently ignore the provisions for the protection of the accused. To my mind the words "reasonable grounds" should take care of most of these objections. The popular conception of British jurisprudence is, as has been stated, that a man must be considered innocent until he is proved guilty. That has a fine sound, somewhat similar to the demand for British justice which we hear at times. My experience has been that when a man demands British justice he is often after something more than is coming to him. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has said, our laws are full of provisions whereby a man faced with a set of condemnatory or suspicious circumstances has to give a reasonable explanation. This morning the marine and fisheries committee was dealing with the amendment to an act, which provided time and time again the onus of proof shall be placed upon the accused. The same applies to our provincial liquor acts and to the criminal code.

The provisions of this bill will not apply, as some people seem to think they will, to the small business man who draws a cheque inadvertently or who believes that his bank will give him one more chance. That man can quite readily and without any trouble prove his innocence, but the intention of this bill is to get at the fly-by-night who makes it his profession—call it that if you will—or occupation to go around from town to town passing worthless cheques. This man generally comes to the store-keeper on Saturday afternoon; he is always well dressed and has every appearance of having millions behind him. He goes in and buys an article without kicking about the price, gives a cheque in payment and receives the balance in cash. This is the sort of man it is intended to get after.

Let us forget the crook for a moment and consider the 70,000 bad cheques which were issued last year. What were the protest fees alone on those cheques which the store-keeper or individual had to pay? We should consider the upset to business which this sort of thing brings about. Hon. gentlemen have asked if there has been any demand for this amendment and the minister has indicated that he has received a number of letters and petitions in connection therewith. Never since I have been in parliament have I received so many letters and applications from individuals and organizations requesting legislation. These have come not only from my own province but from the maritime provinces as well. I have received letters from Montreal, Quebec, and Winnipeg and other cities throughout the dominion. The writers stated that they noticed I was taking up this bill, and they wished me God-speed. They urged the extreme necessity of this amendment and stated that there would be no danger of injustice being done.

There is a great need for this amendment. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) quoted a section of the criminal code which he thought applied. I have not the section before me but as I understand it, the section under which offences of this kind are tried only requires the accused to say that when he issued the cheque in question he hoped that some unknown benefactor would pay money into his bank account before the cheque was presented. He might know perfectly well that he had no money in his account or that he had only a few cents, he might know perfectly well his credit was beyond redemption in every way but, under the present act, it is not necessary for him to prove anything, all he has to do is to sit back and say, "When I issued that cheque I had no intention of defrauding." The prosecution has to prove what was in that man's mind at the time he issued the cheque, and that explains the small number of convictions obtained.

Perhaps this bill does not go far enough, but I believe it takes ample care of the man who innocently overdraws his account, as I have done myself. It makes an attempt to stop the practice of issuing bad cheques. This practice increases when times are bad, because then a man will go into forms of crookedness which he would not otherwise consider. The evil is growing and protection should be given to the store-keeper, and in that way we will help poor people because it is the store-keeper to whom we turn when we need a little credit. For the protection of all we should deal vigilantly with these professional crooks.

Mr. HEPBURN: Mr. Chairman, as one who has been on many occasions the victim of these cheque artists, I believe I can speak feelingly on this subject. I am in agreement with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and I assure him that his bill will meet with the general approval of the people whom I represent in this house. The time has arrived when we should stop this ever-increasing practice of issuing worthless cheques. I see no reason why fraud should be condoned, particularly by this parliament.

A situation has developed in the rural sections in connection with the marketing of goods. Previously, the farmer sold on established markets but at the present time truck drivers go up and down the back concessions buying farm products and issuing worthless cheques in payment. These men take the goods they purchase to a nearby market and obtain cash but the farmer finds himself possessed of a worthless cheque. If he desires to enforce payment his only recourse is the civil courts.

Mr. VENIOT: Why should he take the cheque?

Mr. HEPBBURN: This sort of business is being encouraged by the present act. We know that times are bad but no one honestly can make a compassionate appeal on behalf of the man who issues a worthless cheque. Perhaps the only cure for our hard times is a change of government, but I would not want to see the minister change this bill in any respect. I am sure it will meet with the approval of the people throughout the dominion.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Guthrie for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heenan.

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull): Mr. Speaker, just before the adjournment of the house last Tuesday I had reviewed briefly the different means by which the government had tried to relieve unemployment. I mentioned relief work, direct relief, raising of tariffs and economy. By the first means the governments throughout the dominion spent the sum of $70,000,000 in 1930 to relieve unemployment, the federal share of this amount being around $18,000,000. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) stated that this amount of money had helped 334,000 people during 1930. The people that were helped received a little over 7,000,000 days of work. By going a little further we find that each person who was helped received from this fund of $70,000,000 about twenty-three days' work in 1930. By dividing the amount spent by the number of days, we find that each day's work given during that year to the unemployed cost the country $10.

It is estimated that the amount which will have been spent in 1931 will be $60,000,000, the share of the federal government being about $28,000,000. This has helped 285,000 people and given them to January 1, 1932, eleven days' work per person. If you make the same division you will find that in 1931 it still cost the government $10 to give one day's work to each of those 285,000 persons who obtained relief work. In those two years there has been spent on relief work the sum of $130,000,000.

The second means by which the government tried to relieve unemployment was direct relief. I have no figures for 1931, but I have found figures concerning 1930. In that year over $7,000,000 was spent for direct relief, helping 438,777 single men and heads of families. The amount contributed by the federal government was $2,174,000. I would like the house to note that in 1930 more people benefited under relief or the dole than by relief work.

The third means which the government had in mind to help relieve unemployment was the raising of tariffs. Tariffs were raised during the sessions of 1930 and 1931. Their effects cannot all be known at the present time, but one thing is sure and that is that unemployment, instead of decreasing during those two years, kept on increasing. Not only did general unemployment increase, but we find that employees in manufactures were less numerous during those last two years than they were before. I have under my hand figures showing the employment situation in manufacturing in the month of October for different years, as follows:

October	Employment
1926	104·6
1928	115·7
1930	107·8

This was the third means used by the government to relieve unemployment.

The fourth means was economy, which was to be practised along the whole line. Economy may be practised in various ways to relieve unemployment, but the way it should be practised is rather to keep people who have jobs working than to have them lose their positions. These four means were tried throughout the country and to-day we can to a certain extent judge the results so far as employment is concerned. In September, 1930, after the Minister of Labour had made an inquiry concerning the number of unemployed in Canada, it was found that 117,000 people were out of work. In 1931, after this legislation in regard to unemployment was put into force, it was found that the number of unemployed had risen from 117,000 to 350,000, and certain papers state that this year the number of unemployed has risen to 450,000.

May I say a few words concerning the city of Hull just across the river. In September, 1930, after the inquiry was conducted there, it was found there were 1,500 people unemployed, and during that year the municipal council, the provincial government and the federal government spent some $350,000 to relieve unemployment. This year they are spending $500,000, of which the provincial and federal governments are furnishing 80 per cent. These amounts were spent on public works just to create jobs without bringing into being any new wealth in our city. It was just a kind of dole given under the form of work. By direct relief we have spent this year some $75,000, part furnished by this government and part by the municipality and the provincial government. Are there any more employed in the city of Hull? The last figures available show that during the month of January the number of unemployed was 2,000, and of that number about 400 were working for the city one week out of four, leaving the balance of about 1,600 people without work or working only a few days a week. No industry in Hull is working full time at the present. The largest industry is the E. B. Eddy Company which works only three or four days a week. Other industries, such as J. R. Booth Limited, Woods Manufacturing Company Limited, and Grant-Holden-Graham Limited are working on the same basis. Surely the government could find some means to help these unemployed at the present time.

Instead of the number of the unemployed decreasing, we are suffering from another ill which is created by the government itself. I am informed that lately notice has been sent by the Department of Public Works to seventy or seventy-five pepole that their services will be no longer required after the first of April of this year. Yesterday I received a visit from one of those men who was employed by the Public Works department. He had been working there for the last eight years. He is the father of nine children. Although when he got this job it was not permanent, he was a good enough employee to hold it for eight years. He had bought a little home in the city and had paid for it in part. He still owes on that place about $1,200 under a mortgage. Yesterday he received notice that his services would be no more required after the first of April. What is he to do now, under present conditions? On Friday the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), speaking on the resolution in regard to reducing salaries, began by stating that the civil service was overmanned. The next day orders were given, I suppose to every department, and especially to the Department of Public Works, to throw out this surplus of men. I would just ask the government if the time is well chosen to dismiss from the public employ people who have small jobs as labourers or as tradesmen. I sought information as to whether this man was doing useful work at the department, and it was stated that he was at work every hour; he was occupied the whole time. It is hard to believe that there is any reason for throwing out at the end of this month some seventy-five employees. I wonder if the matter was ever considered on its merits, if it was ever thought that these people might have families to look after and that the married ones might be given a chance instead of perhaps keeping on some single men.

Another case came to my knowledge of a man who has been working thirty years with the Public Works department. He received notice yesterday that from the first of April next his services will not be required. In that department alone the dismissals are going to affect seventy-five families in the cities of Ottawa and Hull. Just add that figure to those I have already cited and you will realize that the help we have received from this government for the unemployed does not amount to very much.

The schemes that I have mentioned for helping the unemployed would seem to be very costly. If this country has to spend ten dollars for every day's work it provides for an unemployed man, I really think some other way should be found of giving help to those who are needing work. We must remember that when these schemes were put into operation trade was diminishing and revenues were falling, and we did not have sufficient revenue to carry on the whole administration. It was necessary, therefore, to borrow money to put these schemes into operation. The sum of $130,000,000 which I have mentioned—borrowed money—was added to the indebtedness of Canada, plus nearly $6,500,000 for interest which will have to be paid.

In the city of Ottawa one would think that unemployment would be unknown, but in February last, I read the following news item in the Ottawa Citizen, written to show that this plague of unemployment is prevalent in every city and town, and that Ottawa is no exception. It reads:

Work For Ottawa Women

Yesterday in Ottawa, some devoted members of the Local Council of Women opened a work room where destitute women can be given an opportunity to earn a few dollars weekly. The plan is to give out sewing and mending work. On the first day more than 130 women applied. Some are receiving temporary relief through the welfare bureau, but they are women who want work rather than a charitable ration of food.

It is surely a reflection on established things in Canada, in this capital city where the political wisdom of the nation is regularly assembled, that there should be decent Canadian women so beset, so trapped near the margin of existence. Many have vainly applied, day after day, at the employment office: some are bravely trying to keep a home together, to provide for young children.

The city council has granted $1,500 for the work, for the purchase of material and the payment of wages. It is a pitifully small amount; but the minister of public works, Hon. H. A. Stewart, has granted the use of a vacant work room. Ottawa has cause to be grateful to the thoughtful women of the local council who have started this measure of relief.

This welfare bureau, opening up some sort of room to give mending and sewing to women, had 130 women apply the first day for work. That will give some idea of conditions in the city of Ottawa, where so many people are in the employ of the government—or were up to this time; for soon there will not be so many. There are nearly fifteen thousand civil servants in Ottawa, and their dependents number from fifty to sixty thousand, yet we find women having to go to the welfare bureau for food or work, though naturally they prefer work to charity.

In September, 1930, the government thought that this would be a normal depression. As my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) said, we do not yet know exactly what a normal depression is, or even an abnormal one, but by this time the government has certainly found out that this is no ordinary depression. The Minister of Labour stated last Tuesday that it was not a normal depression; that if it had been, the measures adopted by the government would have cured unemployment and the depression. Now that the government knows that this is not a normal depression we are waiting to see what means it is going to adopt to deal with the situation. We do not believe they will go on borrowing money for two years up to $130,000,000 to carry on schemes that do not seem to be sound, because remember that more than half the unemployed did not receive any assistance at all. There are certain classes of the unemployed who did not come under any of these schemes. The labouring classes and trades people were helped, but what about clerks in stores and bookkeepers and office help employed in commercial houses? These people received no assistance at all under any of the different schemes of the government, and they are suffering probably more than the labouring classes. If the civil servants in this city are to be thrown out of employment at the rate of seventy-five or one hundred a week they will help to swell the ranks of the unemployed, and they can hardly do the work that the ordinary labouring man has to do. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that we are very anxious to know what steps the government is going to take in the near future to cope with this situation.

May I as a new member humbly suggest that the government give more assistance to those who desire to go back to the land, and that before they do so they let them know that they are not going on a farm to commercialize agriculture as it has been commercialized in the west.

The farmers in the province of Quebec are not suffering as much as they are in other parts of this dominion, it is for the simple reason that in our province a farmer living on the land has this in mind: first to find sustenance for his family and himself and, secondly, if there is anything left over, to give a little education to his children. He does not go on the farm with the idea of getting rich quick. He wants to make a comfortable living on the land and to provide his family with a certain standard of living, but he has not in his mind what I seem to notice in certain members from the west who come from rural constituencies. They have only one idea in agriculture and that is to raise wheat. Outside of wheat they sow nothing, and when the wheat crop fails or they cannot sell their grain, they come to the government and say: We want a bonus of five cents a bushel. The eastern members have not raised their voices on this five cent bonus. We think the western provinces should be helped, but in the province of Quebec we have not been asking for five cents a bushel bonus on potatoes or on oats. We are holding up our heads in this depression. Some day we might find it necessary to come here and ask for five cents a bushel on some product or another. What we are asking now is for a little more help for those who have no work at all. If you cannot give them work, you are going to give them charity. I do not care what the Prime Minister says about the dole, but people must not be allowed to starve. If they are not given work they must be given some sort of dole or assistance, and if they are going to starve, they will put up some fight. Every Saturday in the city of Hull some seven or eight hundred people gather at the city hall asking first for work, and when they cannot get work they ask for something to eat. If they cannot get something to eat for themselves, they ask it for their children. Certainly during this session there will have to be some new scheme on the part of the government to help us a little more. I am not painting this picture any worse than it is; I am not saying that everybody in Hull is starving, but I am attempting to show that those people are waiting for action from this government because it said it would do something for them. They have been led to believe that they might expect help. I believe, it would be the proper time for these unemployed to repeat some of the statements made by the leaders of the present government before July 1930. I quote:

> They play with the lives of men and women. What for? Do they realize there are lives that they are playing with, food for wives and children, hunger?

And this also:

> However blind he may be to your future and deaf to your present needs, surely he cannot stop his ears with smug complacence and self esteem to the cry that carries across the nation—the cry of the destitute and hungry, the cry of mothers and fathers and little children who call for us as Christians and as Canadians to heal their pain.

I do not know if those words were true in 1930 when the statement was made; they were not true at that time in my city. It is true to-day, however, in the city of Hull, and I beg this government to take some steps to alleviate the situation.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, with the last remarks of the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), I quite agree. The first consideration of this government, and of all provincial and municipal governments, should be to relieve the situation in congested cities by inducing as many people as possible to go back to the land, provided —and I insist on these two conditions—provided the proper kinds of lands are made available, and that the people sent to the country are capable of making a living on the land. Otherwise any such movement would be waste effort.

My purpose in rising this afternoon, contrary to my original intention, is to explain, in case I am not here when the vote is taken, why I cannot associate myself with the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan). After the general elections of 1930, I came back to this house more than ever decided to dissociate myself from any party movement directed for the sole or main purpose of creating party advantage. I quite understand the state of mind of my Liberal friends. No doubt they were defeated owing to circumstances and conditions over which they had no control and, may I say, to the shameless exploitation of those circumstances by their opponents. But now, in the year 1932, the people of Canada are expecting from all of us, whether we be Liberal, Conservative, or Independent, something greater than bickerings over the past election. There will be ample opportunities for my Liberal friends to bring to task their opponents. At the present time, during this session, the people of Canada expect from us something practical by way of economic reconstruction.

Turning to this motion—I was going to say this speech in the form of a motion—proposed by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River, I must say that with the sole exception of the last paragraph I find it contains nothing which will help either parliament or the people. I pass over the recital composed of quotations from speeches by the present leader of the government. If I am not mistaken those same quotations were used at least three times by the leader of the opposition; they are on record in Hansard, and the people of Canada no doubt have read them. I do not think, however, they would be disposed to read them very often. With all due respect to both sides of the house, may I say that to some people those quotations appear senseless enough, and others believe that the leader of the opposition has said enough about them. The press of the country, irrespective of party, has shown its keen sense of criticism—and I use the word "criticism" in the proper sense—by omitting in their reports of debates the reproduction of all those paragraphs. My hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River and his associates might learn that even as a vote-catcher these fourth-time recitals of quotations from speeches do not carry very much weight.

Let us now analyze the motion, paragraph by paragraph.

First, I read the following:

That whereas notwithstanding the government demanded and received from parliament unlimited authority to use the resources of the treasury of Canada to such an extent as the government deemed expedient for the purpose of relief of unemployment, the measures taken by the government to eliminate unemployment have proven wholly inadequate and ineffective;

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is too far-fetched. If the statement had been made that the measures were not as effective and as adequate as they might have been, and if the criticism had been directed to a certain laxity or abuse in the administration of enactments arising out of the indefinite powers granted by this parliament last year, I might have agreed. But to go the length of saying that everything the government has done in the last twelve months has been "wholly inadequate and ineffective," is going beyond the measure of justice, fair play and truth; and I do not think such sentiments will be endorsed by fair minded people in Canada, to whatever party they may belong.

Therefore, let us pass over that clause and come to the second:

That the measures adopted by the government have involved an expenditure of public moneys out of all proportion to the employment provided;

Again we find here partial exaggeration. Undoubtedly a great deal of the moneys spent by this government, as well as by various provincial and municipal governments, to cure or relieve unemployment, has been lost or misapplied. What proportion of federal, provincial or municipal funds has not been used to the best advantage I am not prepared to say, and I do not think any hon. member, not even the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, is capable at the present time of stating the amount of money misspent by various bodies.

I now come to the next paragraph, and my statements in connection therewith will apply also to the following one:

That owing to lack of proper supervision and organization there has been partisan administration of the moneys provided by parliament for the benefit of those who were the most in need of work;

This is absolutely true, Mr. Speaker. There has been a partisan spirit evinced—I will not say by the federal, the provincial or municipal governments, but by some representatives of those three authorities. Of such abuse, the city of Montreal offers to-day a most striking example. As the citizens of Montreal are proud to boast, that city is the largest in Canada, and therefore the one containing the largest number of paupers and unemployed. The municipal government of that city is headed by a man much discussed, but certainly very clever and energetic; I refer to Mayor Houde. He is a Conservative in politics, the late leader of the provincial opposition in the Quebec legislature, and now on the eve of his reelection, if he can secure it, as mayor of Montreal. The federal government is represented in Montreal by a federal commissioner, Mr. Gravel, and the provincial authorities by their own commissioner, Mr. Perrier. We may view the whole situation as it was painted or exhibited last week by a meeting between the authorities. The provincial commissioner, Mr. Perrier, made the charge, point blank, that the aldermen were making use of the administration of relief funds for purposes of reelection in the month of April, rather than to alleviate the sufferings of the people. There may be some truth in that. Then the mayor launched a furious attack against the federal commissioner, Mr. Gravel, charging him with attempts at corruption in order to have contracts made in favour of friends of the federal government, and to those charges Mr. Gravel issued a denial.

How much is true in any of those accusations I do not know. This I know, however: at the present time, in Montreal, there are works and contracts, worth some $500,000, which are paralyzed because of this partisan, narrow-minded attitude of the representatives of the three governing bodies. But I am not prepared by my vote to charge this government with being solely responsible for that state of things, although heaven knows I am not particularly friendly with them as a government.

I do not like to introduce small, county politics into this debate: but there are unemployed people in my constituency. Relief works have been started by the federal and provincial governments. I cannot blame this government for having made it a previous condition to the granting of federal aid to local works that, first, the municipalities and then the provinces should share in the cost, and I fail to see that my Liberal friends can throw stones at the government for having done that. I well remember, when sitting on the other side and, occupying towards the Liberal government about the same position I occupy to-day towards the Conservative government, only with a little more sympathy, hearing the Prime Minister of that day, the present leader of the opposition, state that not only the main but practically the sole responsibility for the solving of the problem of unemployment was on the municipalities and the provinces. In those days he was right. I then told him however that he was blind to the rapid growth of the evil which was soon to get beyond the power of solution by either municipalities or provinces.

In Canada, at the present time, as at every other time past or to come, no government can shelter itself behind a narrow interpretation of the law in order to avoid the fulfilment of a national duty. I agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that this is a national duty; but national duty in Canada must be performed according to the broad spirit as well as the rightly interpreted letter of the constitution. In Canada we have three powers, the federal, the provincial and the municipal. In a matter of this kind a national duty cannot be effectively performed unless those three authorities cooperate in the solution of the problem. Things should not be done in order to help the mayor of a certain town secure reelection, to help the government of a certain province secure the confidence of the electors, or to help friends of the federal government make use of their influence to secure contracts in different places. Public good and general results should be the sole aim.

Accusations have been launched, and others probably will be made during this debate by Liberal members, that some representatives of the Conservative governments, the federal or the provincial in Ontario or British Columbia, have made use of this relief act and these relief funds to help their friends. As a counterpart to that, I may tell the house that I have received letters from most reliable men in my constituency—which I may say covers two provincial divisions—complaining that in the carrying on of work subsidized by the Conservative government at Ottawa no Conservative voter need apply, because the patronage is under the control of the provincial Liberal member. I know that personally I suggested a certain piece of work, useful in itself and capable of rendering service not only this year but for many years to come, in a certain municipality. I was told by the director of national relief at Ottawa that he was prepared to recommend that work to the minister, provided the province of Quebec approved of it. Application was made to Quebec, but that application was refused because the local member did not like the people who advocated this work. Mind you, those people were Liberals, but they were not orthodox Liberals in the eyes of the local member. The Quebec government did not approve the suggestion; therefore the money from Ottawa was not sent; therefore the people are unemployed and living on charity. This all happened because of political partisanship, but this time on the part of Liberals.

So I think it is about time we in this house, who seriously wish to accomplish something for our country, should cease to talk about this grave matter from the narrow point of view of political partisanship. Mind you, I do not reproach either my hon. friends to my right or my hon. friends to my left with being party men. They have been elected as such. But I do claim that there is a time to advocate party measures and a time to forget them. It is done every day on other matters; why should it not be done in connection with this matter, which has been rightly called by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, and is so described in the motion, the most important problem we have to solve?

Mr. POULIOT: If we give suggestions in all earnestness and the government refuse to accept those suggestions, what can we do?

Mr. BOURASSA: That is not the question; I was speaking about the paragraph in the motion having to do with partisan administration, and I was proving that there is partisan spirit in the administration of the federal funds, of the provincial funds under the government of the dear friend of my hon. friend from Témiscouata, Mr. Taschereau, and of the municipal funds in Montreal under Mayor Houde. I have given names; I have given facts, and that is all I have to say for the present in that regard. Under such a system, perhaps unavoidable with our political organization, there is bound to be a large degree of maladministration in the distribution of those funds and in the approval or disapproval of certain works.

Now let us consider what works should be undertaken. In this regard there is bound to be a great variety of opinions. For example, my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River, last year and again this year, strenuously advocated the construction of a national highway in order to give work to the unemployed. I did not approve then, and I do not approve now, of that idea; it is one of the things for which I would be disposed to blame not particularly this government, but the governments of Ontario and Quebec as well. The view I have expressed both inside and outside this house—more particularly outside—with regard to this work is, that although we have as our immediate object the alleviation of unemployment, something else has to be considered. First, we cannot hope to cure unemployment, or to end unemployment, by government aid only. That sort of talk may be used at election time, but we do not talk seriously all the time during an election. Now, however, that we are attempting to do something serious, we can alleviate unemployment by giving work of a temporary nature or of a permanent nature, work capable of producing some good now but of doubtful use in the future, or work capable of being useful for years to come. I claim, sir, that the spending of millions on the construction of a great automobile highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific is largely wasting money. First of all, the construction of roads in winter time in a country like ours takes three times as much money as the construction of roads in summer; and this applies to the construction not only of that great road but of all roads that have been built in the province of Quebec under the joint approval of the federal and provincial governments. Secondly, we have to consider the whole problem of transportation. A commission has been appointed by this government with a view to solving the great railway problem of Canada; and while our railways are complaining of the competition to which they are subject from highway traffic, this government and the two provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec are spending millions to increase that competition and decrease the earnings of the railways, thereby rendering more difficult the solution of this problem, one of the most difficult which faces this government or any government that may succeed it. I claim that in this regard all that should have been done—and it is not too late yet to consider that humble but more practical solution of our highway problem—was to help, in all the provinces, the various small sections of the country that have no proper communication with the railway centres to carry their produce over good roads to the railway stations and to bring back what goods they import over the railways; in other words, to reduce the cost of local transportation. That would have been far better than building a highway at a cost of millions upon millions of dollars to attract American tourists, who in any event would not deprive themselves of the pleasure of coming to Canada and enjoying the hospitality of our various liquor commissions. They would not, I say, forego that pleasure merely because they could not drive straight through from Prince Rupert to Sydney, but might be obliged to make crochets, going through from one dry state to one free province, and from one free province to one dry state. I am sure they would enjoy their trip all the more, taking that roundabout course, and there would be less danger to passersby than if they started from a wet province and went all through the continent, east to west or west to east, from one wet province to another.

The same criticism I make against that great and costly highway project, as a competitor with our railways, I make against the project first launched in the Montreal city council and then approved of by the provincial authorities and finally endorsed by this government: I mean the building of a boulevard from one end of the island of Montreal to the other. There will be spent on this the sum of perhaps ten million dollars—to whose profit? To the profit of speculators who some years ago purchased land which they were not able to sell before prices were slaughtered and who, having these vacant lands, are now getting them expropriated by the municipal council to be paid for by the province and the dominion. And they call that a relief of unemployment, while at the present time, in that great city of Montreal, we have at least 75,000 human beings, men, women and children, who are living under conditions that are not fit for animals! Instead of devoting ten or fifteen million dollars to the building of a boulevard for the sake of land speculators and for people who are in a hurry to traverse the whole length of the island at forty miles an hour, would it not have been better to spend this money, municipal money, provincial money and federal money, in improving the permanent conditions of the poor people of Montreal, the dwellings, so that after this time of depression had passed, they might be in a condition, mental and physical, that would enable them to be of service to the city, to the province and to the state?

I cannot lay the blame for this piece of foolishness, for this social crime, at the door of this government. The first guilty party was the municipal council; the second guilty party was the provincial government; and I will admit the third guilty party is this government—guilty of having granted a share of federal subsidies to that scheme.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Is the hon. gentleman sure that the federal authorities are subscribing a share in the purchase of the land needed for that boulevard?

Mr. BOURASSA: No, oh no.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We are contributing only to the labour.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Should the provincial government or the municipal authorities see fit to build that boulevard, then we contribute a share in the cost of labour.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. When Mr. Houde and Mr. Taschereau have made an arrangement to steal the horse, my hon. friends opposite supply the money to saddle him. I admit that the share of responsibility of this government is a minimum.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is a small difference.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, a small difference; you are all partakers in the misdeed, though in varying degrees. I leave the hon. gentleman to settle that himself or to submit it to some board of arbitration. But I cite that as an example to show my unwillingness to support the resolution as it stands; because if we undertake now—and I do not think it is the proper time—to pass judgment upon all that has been done in the way of misappropriation or misapplication in regard to relief funds, then it is not just to take only one of the parties concerned without the others.

I may say in passing that this would be ample justification for the acceptance by the government and by the house of the suggestion twice made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), that this whole question, broad as it is and involving as it does, not only moral responsibilities, but the financial support of the various authorities who have no jurisdiction one over another, should have been placed in the hands of a national commission to which appointees should have been nominated by the federal government, by the provincial government and perhaps by some of the larger municipalities.

Coming now to the question of wages, I am afraid I must differ both from my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and from my friends who represent labour in the house. Speaking generally, I agree with them that it is dangerous to allow, under circumstances such as we are faced with at present, the possibility of lower wages becoming an established fact. But then I invoke again the old axiom, salus populi suprema lex esto. There is no law which does not call for exceptions at times. Now, what is the need at the present time? Everyone is agreed on that. It is to enable the largest number of people to work for their livelihood instead of living by alms, by hand to mouth charity. Given that condition, I ask my hon. friends who represent the Labour party to consider a municipality in the mountains of the province of Quebec—and there are hundreds of such municipalities—where the people can get food, lodging and fuel at about one-quarter of what it costs individuals who are waiting for work in Montreal, Quebec, Sherbrooke and Three Rivers. Are the people in such districts in any worse position if they are paid a wage which will enable them to purchase the necessities of life on the same margin, as between money earned and money spent, as the man in Montreal? What does it matter so long as they get the same in quantity and quality for their maintenance? A man earns three dollars and spends it in the purchase of what he and his family need. Another gets only two dollars, but with those two dollars is able to purchase exactly the same quantity and quality of staple goods required by his family. What difference does it make? That is the situation. I take full responsibility, before my Labour friends and before the labourers and farmers of my constituency, for having strongly advised the representative of the federal government, the director of the relief fund, to change the regulations last year.

Let me give an illustration. In my constituency there is a fairly large village where there were some forty or fifty unemployed. These men used to go to the shanties to work six or eight months and then come back to the village and perform occasional work for the remainder of the year. Last year, those men were idle; so the municipality applied to the provincial government for relief, and a certain piece of work was approved. This suggestion was sent to Ottawa, where it was approved by the federal authorities. The municipality then made a calculation to see what it would cost to make use of the federal and provincial help, and found out that it would cost more than it would cost them unaided to help their own people in their own way. Appeals were made to the people in the village that they do everything to help. They were asked to give work to a man for eight or ten days although they had no special need for it. They were told if they paid so much, the council would pay so much and the taxation rate would remain at its then level. Had they subordinated the scheme to the conditions imposed by the provincial and federal governments, even with the money received from Ottawa and Quebec, they would have had to spend more money and the municipality would have been in a worse condition.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is right, as are others, when he says that the manner in which the relief fund functioned last year has put many municipalities on the verge of bankruptcy. This was an experiment, and the government has improved, although not completeley, the administration of this fund. They are not imposing the same harsh conditions upon the municipalities as were imposed last year; and because of that I am not prepared to fully condemn the government.

The next two paragraphs of the amendment deal in a most virtuous manner with the violation of election pledges. I agree with my Liberal friends when they state that many foolish pledges were given by Conservative candidates and by the Prime Minister which have not been redeemed; but if the leader of the opposition will go back to the first days of the special session, he will remember that when he warned the Prime Minister that he and his friends would look to the government to keep its pledges, I strongly protested. I said: For heaven's sake and the country's sake, we must prevent them from keeping their pledges! Had this government endeavoured to redeem all the pledges made by its candidates during the elections, Canada would be bankrupt.

The Prime Minister delivered last night one of the most eloquent and interesting speeches I have heard in my political life. He said that in spite of all theories he had a primary responsibility in dealing with the financial situation, and that was to save the credit of Canada. He stated in effect, that it would be better to be, what we term in French slang a "blagueur" than to ruin the country.

After forty years of parliamentary experience and some reading of parliamentary history of England, the United States and France, I have come to the somewhat cynical conclusion that all parties live in glass houses and should be very careful in the expression of indignation at their opponents for having broken pledges. I remember the elections of 1896 and the pledges given in Quebec by the Liberal party that they would restore the Catholic schools in Manitoba. Pledges were given in the past by the Conservative party that they would never impose conscription during the war. I remember the pledges of the Liberal party that the moment they came into power they would eradicate the last vestige of protection. Yet the wind blowing from the south, the north, the east and the west has carried all these pledges into the deepest abyss of political oblivion. Could not, from the depths of that abyss, come the faint vapour of indulgence and political forgiveness to all parties?

The Liberals are not entitled to bring their opponents to task for this reason. The time may come when they will endeavour to prove to the people of Canada that their opponents are unworthy of the confidence reposed in them; and it may be that I, even in my old age, will put up a fight with them in an endeavour to convince the people of Quebec of that fact. But now, in dealing with this acute problem. I say, speaking with friendly candour, that my Liberal friends have been very ill advised in their present course.

The last paragraph, the one for which I would have been prepared to vote, reads:

> That in the opinion of this house the provision of employment for our people is the most pressing problem before the present government, and immediate measures effectively to relieve the serious unemployment situation should be presented to parliament by the government without further delay.

Had the amendment contained only this paragraph it might have been accepted by the government. It may be said that being an amendment to the motion to go into supply, it would have been a vote of want of confidence in the government. I take issue with that view. Different governments, both in Canada and in England, have accepted amendments to the motion to go into supply when the amendment moved has been simply a suggestion of a policy which the government felt it could undertake. My mind goes back to 1901, when the Liberal government accepted a motion of this nature moved by Mr. Russell, then representing Hants, and now a retired justice. This amendment dealt with preferential tariffs, and the then Minister of Finance, the late Mr. Fielding, accepted it as being a suggestion of policy which the government was prepared to put into effect.

If the opposition had contented itself with pressing upon the government the necessity of adopting some practical method to relieve unemployment, and if the Prime Minister had stood up and accepted the suggestion in the same broad spirit, I think the country would have been better off, both morally and politically, than it is at the present time, or than it will be after this amendment is voted down.

I am not going to vote against this amendment merely because it will be voted down; my past record is there to be seen. I have enough, I will not say of Irish blood but of Irish spirit in me, to induce me generally to be against rather than for the government. However, there is a limit to opposition; and as far as I am concerned, prepared as I am to criticize the government upon many of its acts of administration, prepared as I am to denounce the government at the next general elections should they not make more efforts to redeem those of their pledges which are capable of redemption and which would be for the benefit of the country, I am not prepared at this juncture, while we are still in the midst of a crisis, to vote for a motion of want of confidence which smacks so much of the party spirit as does the one now before the house.

Mr. E. C. ST-PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the question of unemployment is to-day of world-wide interest. It is known that the number of unemployed has actually reached 20,000,000 and the consequences of such a state we are told by certain economists have not yet been all felt. The outlook is really serious and of a nature to disturb the economic equilibrium and social order.

The motion of the hon. member for Kenora (Mr. Heenan) is of interest to workers. It will bring home facts that will elucidate the situation by showing them unemployment under its double aspect, international and national.

At the last session of the international conference held at Geneva, from May 8 to June 18 last, Mr. Albert Thomas, the director of the International Labour Bureau, made the following statement when he presented his report, and the workers of the city of Montreal as well as those throughout Canada will certainly be the gainers by closely reading the contents of this report:

> Mr. Albert Thomas first pointed out the extent of the crisis which has deprived of work 20,000,000 people throughout the world, its serious side and persistence. Indeed, the crisis persists. There might have been a question, before the International Labour Conference could take up the subject, whether the situation might not have righted itself. Alas! no. Recent statistics point out, it is true, that in some countries a slight improvement has taken place. However, it does not go beyond the seasonal fluctuation. In other parts, notwithstanding the seasonal influence, the crisis remains on the same level and at times even is worse. Notwithstanding Charles Gide's contentions, this crisis is actually a fact. It not only exists in the minds of people who have been seized with a contagious fright. While the psychological element may play an important part, it is not the sole determining factor. The sufferings of the working masses deprived of work are truly a real tragedy which one cannot despise. In a word, the crisis has taken an international character. No doubt there are national crises, which have assumed specific features, such as the American, British and German crises. . . . But the depression is no less world-wide. Each country has its own troubles, but there is also a kind of universal depression which has spread everywhere and aggravates the troubles of all. Hence the necessity of an international remedy and the question which naturally presents itself is this: what is the International Labour Organization doing in the grip of such a crisis? What can it do?
> Whatever may be the initiative it takes, Mr. Albert Thomas harbours no illusion on the dangers with which it is confronted. On the one hand, there is the appeal of those who demand immediately efficacious remedies; there is also the appealing confidence of labour centres, which expect almost salvation from the International Labour Organization and are tempted to ask more than it can give. On the other hand, there are those who remind us that the powers of the organization is limited, those who ridicule the long drawn out procedures of meetings, commissions, considerations and deliberations. . . . But is there in international life some means of evolving solutions by cooperative effort other than meetings to deliberate and forming commissions and conferences or in a general assembly? "We shall be compelled to have recourse to our system," states Mr. Albert Thomas. "After all, if we thoroughly organize our forces, perhaps, with such a system shall we make some headway in the present crisis."
> However, the director specially points out that in such matters there cannot possibly exist an unique remedy. There is a whole series of solutions and remedies that should be classified, weighed and seriated; there exists no such thing as "the solution."

My intention in the present circumstances, like that of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), is not to consider the unemployment situation, as it appears to-day, by restricting it to my constituency and commenting on it solely for political purposes. However, it is a well known fact, namely, that at the last session of the Liberal regime, our leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), now the leader of the opposition, clearly explained that unemployment as it existed in Canada was simply the result of international conditions. He stated on many occasions that no special solution could be found to this problem which interests, among others, that class of workers to which appeal demagogues, fluent speakers but nevertheless devoid of sense, and who, in every constituency, endeavour at times to stir up trouble as between the classes. I represent, sir, one of these constituencies and in this I differ from my hon. friend from Labelle. The working classes in my electoral division satisfied that the present government would find work for them, relying on the assertions put forth by our opponents that the problem was purely a national one, that we were not suffering from a crisis entirely international in character, but from an endemic crisis, voted to some extent against me; the policy of the government that I supported was approved by my constituency but a large number of the electorate deemed this criticism well grounded and believed the contentions of our friends opposite to be sound.

Let us examine the program set forth then by our opponents to prove to the country that the unemployment question was only a national one. Let us probe into the arguments they put forth at the time, and let us ponder whether the policy advocated by them, counter to all reports submitted to the League of Nations and the International Labour Bureau, at Geneva, were not contradictory to the findings of these various commissions. This government, no more than the former government, must take it for granted that the findings of the commissions organized at Geneva under the aegis and protection of the League of Nations should be set aside by all nations. What do we find in the reports of these various commissions? All without exception maintain that if the tariff walls erected at present in all countries were to disappear the unemployment crisis would be half solved. If we are to reject, sir, the findings of these commissions, let us wipe out from our estimates the amounts that we yearly vote to have Canada represented at the League of Nations.

Viewing the matter in the same light as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) does, when he asks that under the present emergency, both political parties join their forces to solve the problem, I am willing to agree with him, providing that we agree with the findings which the various countries represented at every sitting of the commissions of the League of Nations have arrived at.

We are told that these are remedies which will improve the situation. They are to be found in social and unemployment insurances, etc. However, to better acquaint the labouring classes throughout Canada and those kind people who send me to Ottawa to represent them at each election, I shall explain to them the situation as it truly exists; for it is more than ever time to cease or to use the expression in vogue in the province of Quebec "to humbug" (emplir) the working classes of Quebec and Canada as a whole. The following is what Mr. Albert Thomas says in his report:

The director does not wish to enter into vague discussions as to whether unemployment insurance is liable to foster unemployment or whether, on the contrary, it can attenuate this scourge by maintaining the power of consumption of workingmen's families deprived of work.

However, he points out two striking facts, one quoted by Mr. Lawson, a delegate of the British government, the other by Doctor Brauns, a delegate of the German government. One always refers to these labour masses condemned for years past to unemployment, and the great demoralization which affects thousands, hundreds of thousands, even millions of people. It is important to bear in mind, as Mr. Lawson has pointed out, that, among the 12,000,000 people insured against unemployment in England, 35 per cent men and 48 per cent women —that is, on the one hand, more than a third, and, on the other, one-half—have never received any insurance indemnity. It is equally important also to be reminded of the figures given by Doctor Brauns: there are in Germany 5,000,000 unemployed, 17,000,000 are insured, however, two-thirds of the unemployed receiving insurance indemnity find work before completely exhausting their rights to insurance money.

It is but right therefore to remember that notwithstanding all criticisms—because unemployment insurance is indispensable for the future welfare of industry and for both the political and social stability of national organizations—there were, in 1919, about 4,000,000 people insured against unemployment and to-day, there are nearly 43,000,000 throughout the world."

My views, sir, with regard to social insurances are founded on principles which are dear to Christian democrats. I am in favour of all those social laws, such as unemployment insurance, etc., but on one condition, that they be explained to our people under their true light, that our people be not led to believe in a government's paternal solicitude, but that they be impressed with the fact, as I was, in Quebec, during the general election, that not a single worker, in any country whatsoever where these social laws are enforced, is dispensed with paying, together with the government and the employer, his quota to the unemployment fund. Whatever may be thought or said, we are, to-day, living in Canada under the dole system. The dole, as formerly understood in England, was an unemployment insurance based on a tripartite contribution, namely by the employer, the employee and the government. An attempt was made, at the last election, to make people believe that the Dominion government would burden itself with all these social laws and thus relieve the distress of our people during times of unemployment without any contribution on their part.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): No, no, may I ask a question? Do you contend that the Conservative party, during the 1930 election, advocated a non-contributory unemployment insurance?

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): My opponent in my own constituency pledged himself to do anything except what had common sense.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Your opponent was not the whole Conservative party; I refer to the Conservative party's program.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Let us now examine the work carried out to relieve unemployment. Work given to the unemployed is a relief to the situation. I notice that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau), seems to cast an inquiring glance towards me, may I ask him, as head of an important legal office in Montreal, constantly dealing with contractors and workmen, whether there exists in his city a contractor who can state that more than 35 or 40 per cent of the money voted for work in connection with unemployment went directly to the unemployed? The greater part of that money was used to pay off expropriations or was expended in the construction of tunnels, etc., in the way of material. I may be told that the material which enters into these constructions affords work to a class of workers. I do not deny the fact that some workers benefit by such work.

Since parliament has now undertaken to settle this unemployment question, what are the best means to attain this end, if not to face the problem squarely outside all political considerations? The intervention of Providence in the present problem has often been mentioned; I am in earnest when I state that I believe in the intervention of Providence and, quoting the words of a free-thinker, Clémenceau, the distinguished French statesman, who said some time previous to his death: "If Christians truly practised their christianism, there would be no social problem." I shall go one step further than him and say that if we had always lived up to our christian principles, there would never have been an economic question.

The problem, sir, which at present interests us—with this I shall close my remarks—is of the utmost importance. The duty of the Canadian government under the present circumstances, is to legislate in the interest of all. Considerations of a private order or personal feelings should not be taken into account. Let us legislate in the best interest of all, and especially, let us not forget to particularly look after the weak and humble, for, as Lacordaire one day said: Between the rich and the poor, between the strong and the weak, it is liberty which oppresses and the law which sets free.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

FINANCE ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSED RIGHT OF PROVINCES TO DEPOSIT SECURITIES IN EXCHANGE FOR DOMINION NOTES

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River) moved the second reading of Bill No. 23, to amend the Finance Act.

He said: The bill that I am proposing to the house asks for a certain amendment to be made to the Finance Act. The act as it now stands enables the banks and certain of the savings banks to take various securities to the treasury board and obtain, in return, an issue of dominion notes. This privilege, however, is not given to the provincial governments, although I find that two of the various classes of securities that may be taken to the treasury board and exchanged are treasury bills and provincial bonds. On the other hand, the banks of this country, which are private institutions, can take these same provincial bonds to the treasury board and secure an issue of dominion notes for a certain small charge. But the same right is denied to the provincial governments.

To-day we find that some of the provinces of Canada are having a certain amount of difficulty in financing. There are only two ways of getting money. One is by borrowing (a) through an issue of bonds or (b) through the banks; the other is by taxation. Certain of the provinces find themselves in such a position that they cannot issue any more bonds—not because they are bankrupt; we heard from the Prime Minister only last night, that some of the provinces are in very good shape indeed so far as their assets are concerned, but they have not been able to sell bonds. On the other hand, in some cases the banks, for reasons best known to themselves, have set a limit on the amount of overdraft which they will allow the provinces to make. Taxes on account of low commodity prices have been coming in very slowly indeed, so slowly that some of the provincial governments are unable to meet their indebtedness coming due. Some of the provinces are consequently in a very awkward position. I know full well that the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance will tell this house that the federal government has already come to the aid of the provinces in their need. That is all very well. Probably the Dominion government has had to come to the help of the provinces for the simple reason that it preferred to see them carry on rather than default, but personally I do not like to see any provincial government put in the position of having to take second place to a private corporation such as our banks are.

The purpose of the amendment is simple It asks that the words "and to any province of Canada" be added to the act, so as to give to the provinces exactly the same right as the banks now enjoy in taking various securities to the treasury board with which to secure an issue of Dominion notes.

I well remember, Mr. Speaker, that when various banking questions were being discussed before the banking and commerce committee in 1928 the then Deputy Minister of Finance was asked by a member of the committee if it was true that the banks could take dominion bonds to the treasury board and get an issue of dominion notes under the Finance Act, and he replied: Yes, it was. Then he was asked: If a private corporation like a bank can take dominion bonds to the treasury board and get an issue of dominion notes under the Finance Act, why should not the Dominion government itself take the same dominion bonds to the same treasury board and get the same service? The deputy minister answered in this way: "Oh," he said, "that would be bad banking." I agree that that would be bad banking so far as the banks are concerned, because it would probably have some effect upon their profits. Then the deputy minister was asked: But why would it be bad banking? The only answer that he made at the time was: "Oh well, if I did that the Finance minister would fire me." So no real answer was given to the question.

In this bill, Mr. Speaker, I am simply asking that the same privilege shall be given to the provincial governments as is now given to the banks under the Finance Act.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): This bill, I submit, is so highly objectionable in principle, if I may say so in all deference to my hon. friend who has moved its second reading (Mr. Spencer), as to border upon the realm of the fantastic.

The hon. member has referred to the fact that the provinces have found difficulty in financing and in selling their bonds. Speaking as one who has had some contact with provincial financing, let me say to my hon. friend that that may be a good thing; because in the past it has been perhaps a little too easy for the provinces to sell their securities. But that is merely by the way.

My hon. friend must realize that the provisions of the Finance Act were designed solely with a view to financial transactions as carried on by the banks. In large measure the Finance Act has taken the place in this country of the federal reserve bank in the United States. Its object was to make for an elasticity of currency from day to day as the needs require, but the very basis of the act was that the currency should be liquid. Now, if my hon. friend means that the provinces should come to the Dominion, and incidentally, I may add, make the dominion their banker, what does he suggest they should come to the Dominion government for? For the purpose of getting funds to be used in their current day to day transactions? If so, bear in mind that the revenues of the provinces must be derived from taxation, and the provinces should live within their income as provided by the taxation levied respectively by them. If any province is embarrassed in anticipating from day to day the receipt of taxation, that is a banking transaction which can be taken care of by the banks without any difficulty. But I submit, sir, that if the purpose of the provinces in coming to the treasury board should be to secure funds for the purpose of locking them up in capital expenditure, they would be doing something which is directly contrary to the underlying principle of the Finance Act and which is therefore doubly objectionable.

Mr. SPENCER: May I remind the minister that the provinces could not lock the money up for more than one year?

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. However, I have known corporations, municipal and otherwise, to borrow for a year; and what if they cannot pay at the end of that period? It must be borne in mind that in addition to the security which the banks provide by virtue of the terms of the Finance Act, there is a security which could not be given by the provinces themselves. That is provided by section 12 of the Finance Act, which not only gives the dominion the security of the lodged documents but in addition makes the following provision:

> All advances of dominion notes made under this part shall be deemed to be an amount due by the bank to the government of Canada and shall be a second charge upon the assets of the bank, payment of a bank's own notes, issued by the bank, in circulation, being the first charge.

In other words, in addition to the security of the documents lodged by virtue of the Finance Act there is the security of the assets of the bank, save only the bank's own notes in circulation.

If the proposal of the hon. member were sound, that is, if it were open to the provinces to avail themselves of the provisions of the Finance Act and to that extent make the dominion the banker for the provinces—which, I submit, should not be—why should not the same principle extend to municipalities, cities and towns which would be in a position to lodge precisely the same type of security? Furthermore, there is one very grave objection to the extent to which, if this bill became law, we would expand the borrowings under the Finance Act and to that extent indulge in a practice of inflation which undoubtedly would have a very adverse effect upon the value of dominion notes.

Apart altogether from the objections I have offered to the suggestion of my hon. friend I raise the further point that consideration should not be given to this matter until a time during the next year when the Bank Act will come under review. So highly objectionable is this bill in principle that the mere fact of the house giving it second reading, and referring it to the banking and commerce committee would have an adverse effect upon the security of dominion finances. From every point of view I submit the bill is objectionable and should not be read a second time. I hope hon. members will concur in that view.

Mr. IRVINE: What would be the real difference between a municipality depositing its securities with the treasury board and a bank depositing the same securities for the same purpose?

Mr. RHODES: Apart altogether from the question of expanding dominion securities I think the great objection is that neither municipalities nor provinces are in the banking business, and the Finance Act is defined purely as a banking transaction.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: All those in favour will kindly say "Aye."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: All those opposed will kindly say "Nay."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion negatived.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Guthrie for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heenan.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before the house at the moment relates to problems of unemployment as they exist in Canada, and in particular to the measures the government of the day, since coming into office, have brought forward to deal with these problems. I do not think I exaggerate when I say that unemployment in Canada has become a national emergency, and that with respect thereto, the country is confronted with the greatest problem with which it has been faced since the time of the great war. The problem is not one of to-day alone; it has been continuous since the year 1930. Instead of conditions improving, they have become, despite the words of the Governor General's address, continually worse rather than better.

The amendment now before us recites some of the definite promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) during the election campaign of 1930, to the effect that he would end unemployment, and that, if returned to power, he, his government, or the majority behind him in parliament—in fact, he named all three—would see to it that work was provided for all who wished to work. "Work, not doles" were the words he used. It has been thought advisable to insert in the amendment some of those very definite promises. They are only examples, but they are sufficient to indicate the grounds upon which my right hon. friend made his appeal to the country, and, I think I am right in saying, the grounds upon which he was returned to office.

The amendment states that the measures the government has introduced are wholly inadequate and ineffective to deal with the problem of unemployment. I do not think I need cite conditions to verify the truth of that statement; instead of becoming better, conditions, as we all know, have continued to grow worse. Had the measures introduced been at all adequate or equal to the situation, there would have been a very great improvement. Indeed, at the time of introducing one of his measures during the special session, the Prime Minister drew attention to the fact that at that time there were about 150,000 unemployed, and stated further that, if the measures then introduced by the government operated as the government hoped and believed they would, the numbers of unemployed would considerably diminish. Instead of diminishing, however, the figures have run up to 500,000 or 550,000.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, that was the statement made by the former Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson).

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MANION: It was denied by him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that these figures are exaggerated, but certainly they are those we have been led to believe by the Prime Minister and others represented the numbers who were unemployed.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I put it this way: The Prime Minister has said over and over again that the situation we have to-day is worse than anything we have ever known. That is strong enough.

Mr. BENNETT: I said "economic conditions."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that they were worse than anything we have ever known —and that, despite the measures introduced by his government to improve conditions. The amendment states that, in the circumstances, it is important there should be other measures introduced to relieve the situation, and, even at this late date, that the government should bring forward something adequate and effective.

If it is necessary for me to refer to the past, it is because conditions as we have them to-day have grown out of the past, and largely out of the policies which have been introduced to meet them. I am not for any reasons of political partisanship going to refer to conditions as they existed at the time of the general election, and the respective attitudes of political parties at that time. My purpose in referring to conditions then existing is to explain to this House of Commons and to the people of Canada the respective points of view from which the problems then existing were faced by the political parties who were obliged to state their policies to the country, and to enable hon. members and the Canadian people to judge whether, even at this late date, policies which were advocated by hon. members who are now on this side would not have been more effective to deal with conditions as they have since existed than those which, during the past two years, have been put into force by hon. gentlemen opposite.

First of all, may I make it clear that the Prime Minister and the government have had a perfectly free hand to deal with this problem of unemployment. I do not think any hon. gentleman opposite will say for one moment that the Prime Minister and his government have not been afforded every facility a government could be afforded by parliament in dealing with this great problem. When the elections were over, one of their most important members, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce was defeated. He was permitted to be returned without opposition at a by-election. My right hon. friend desired to strengthen his cabinet by adding to it the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), who, at the general election had not been a candidate. He was not opposed in the by-election necessary to that end; he was allowed to take his seat without opposition. There was not a voice raised in criticism of the government when the special session of parliament was called; the ministry were free to bring in any measures they wished, and, the session having been called to deal with unemployment, the house took a very generous attitude towards the measures then introduced.

I am going to say a word about those measures in a few moments, to indicate whether or not what was said at the time, not by way of mere party criticism, but by way of substantial and constructive comment, has since been borne out by the facts. At the moment, I desire to make it clear that, notwithstanding the session was called to deal with unemployment, and that we were confronted with legislation with respect to the tariff more extensive than any legislation introduced in this parliament in any previous ten years, the government were allowed to put that legislation on the statute books practically without opposition. They were given equal freedom in the matter of the amount of money which they wished to have in order to deal with the situation.

Then the Imperial conference coming on was an important factor, the Prime Minister himself having stated in Toronto that on the success of that conference would depend in part the solution of the problem of unemployment. We offered no opposition to any attitude which he might take at the conference, and, indeed even when at the conference he took an attitude which we regarded as impossible and very wrong, no comment was made, except to have it clearly understood that the attitude of the Prime Minister did not represent the point of view of Canada as a whole.

After the Imperial conference was over and before the next session of parliament came on, the ministry again were given a free hand; there was no carping criticism in the country, no criticism from the opposition, or from any group. Everyone recognized that the situation was serious, and the ministry were given a perfectly free hand. Last session again the government had an opportunity to bring forward whatever measures they wished, and I would point out that once more they were accorded every facility, but, as we well know, this House of Commons was scarcely given an opportunity during that session to discuss the question of unemployment. The only measure respecting unemployment which the government introduced was not brought down until the very end of the session. It was the last item on the order paper during the last week of the session, with the exception of the two orders relating to the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means. If, therefore, the measures which have been introduced have not been effective, it cannot be said that this has been due to any opposition or obstruction which has been offered to the administration; it is wholly due to the administration itself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I make clear that this is the third session of this parliament. We are here, for the third time since the present government came into power, to deal with a question which we were told would be settled immediately after the general election. As I have already said, I think it will be generally admitted that the question not only has not been settled, but that it presents a greater problem to the people of Canada to-day than it ever has before, a problem that is growing in seriousness week by week and month by month. No one will venture to say how grave is the existing national emergency. As a matter of fact, there are many of us in this House of Commons to-day who are very silent in reference to some of the conditions throughout this Dominion, as we have reason to know them to be, simply because we do not wish to create a state of alarm in the minds of the people, and also because we do not wish to embarrass the government in any way in dealing with a very difficult situation. I shall briefly review the measures which the government have taken to deal with this problem, to see how far they have gone in helping to meet the situation.

May I say that the ministry to-day, as I understand it, do not seek to contend that the problem has been settled, or that they have been able to deal with the situation. The Prime Minister will not say that he has fulfilled his promises. Indeed, the ministry is now stating that, had the conditions through which we are now passing, and through which we have been passing for the last year or two, been like previous industrial depressions, the measures which have been introduced would have been equal to the situation. They are saying that no one could have foreseen the problem which was ahead, and that for this reason, the government ought to be excused for being unable to meet it. May I recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the summer of 1930, and, indeed, in the spring of 1930, when this house was in session and the Liberal government had the responsibility of introducing measures in parliament to meet the then existing and the threatened situation, we pointed out that a certain economic situation had developed, as a result of changes in tariff on the other side of the line, which would necessitate our finding new markets within the British Empire to take the place of markets we were losing in the United States, and we framed our measures accordingly. When we came to the time of a general election, and there were evidences of depression, we made known to the electorate that the country was faced with a depression, though fortunately, at that time Canada was in a better position than other countries of the world. Above all else, what we sought to have the people of Canada understand was that this country, in common with other countries of the world, was facing an industrial depression, and that for that very reason, much as the government might wish to bring forward certain measures, and much as the government of the day might be tempted to make promises to the electorate as to what it might wish to do, the times would not justify anything of the kind.

That was the point of difference between my right hon. friend and myself in our appeals to the people in 1930 with respect to the approaching economic depression. To-day, the Prime Minister cannot shelter himself behind the statement that no one could foresee the depression that was coming on. If he had possessed a little wider knowledge of economic history, it would not have been difficult for him to look back over the century and see that at decennial periods for at least seventy or eighty years past, there have been these periods of depression, growing more serious as the world has become increasingly one. Had he possessed that economic knowledge and applied it to the situation, he would have told the people of the country, as I told them, that we were face to face with a very serious depression, and that many things he might wish to do, if he were returned to power, he would not be able to do because of the inevitable depression. We took that position, and stated it very frankly to the people.

Instead of the leader of the Conservative party of that day taking, as I believe every member of his party expected he would take, a conservative attitude with regard to a very serious situation; instead of making it clear to the people of the country that he could not think of embarking upon vast expenditures at a time when economy was essential if people were to be spared vastly increased taxation; instead of making it plain that this was not a time when the federal parliament should begin to make anew fresh commitments in the nature of grants in aid to the provinces for all sorts of services in relation to technical education, in relation to old age pensions, in relation to highways and various other proposals;—instead of doing all or any of these things, he should have taken the position very firmly that, faced as we were with the approach of hard times, he could not make any such promises. Such was the attitude of the Liberal party. We made no promises except that we would endeavour to give to the problem of unemployment the best consideration which it could receive—and I will refer to that later on—and that we would seek to follow, in the future, policies which, in the past, had demonstrated their effectiveness in meeting an industrial situation such as then existed. We took and presented that view, and, the more firmly we held to it, the more lavish did hon. gentlemen opposite become in the promises which they made at random, and which, to secure the support of the electorate, they were prepared to make to any extent.

Now I say that we cannot afford lightly to dispose of promises made in that way. It is all very well for individuals, if they wish, to take a cynical attitude towards what is said at the time of a general election; but, if the outcome of conditions of this kind is not kept clearly in the public mind, there is going to be in the years to come no hope of saving the country from the effects of demagoguery as it will be carried on by political parties making their appeals to the people. An appeal to the people in a general election is a very serious matter, and too much care cannot be taken, particularly by the leaders of political parties, in the pledges and promises they make.

Let me point out that there is a great difference between the promise that is made, the object that is to be attained, and the means by which it is proposed to fulfil the promise and attain the object. My right hon. friend will tell us, no doubt, that he promised that, if returned to power, he would increase the tariff; that if returned to power, he would make expenditures on highways and make grants in aid to the different provinces; that, if returned to power, he would embark on many other ventures involving expenditures of considerable amounts; and he will point to various things that the government is doing in these directions and say, "Am I not doing what I said I would do towards fulfilling the promises I made?" I say, sir, that he is not doing anything of the kind. His promise was that he would end unemployment; that was the promise he made to labour. His promise was that he would give, not doles, but work to everyone who wished to work. To the farmers of the country he said, "I will give you markets"; that was the appeal made to that section of the community. The means to that end were quite a different thing. What were the means he said he would take to that end? He said: In order to secure work for you, I am going to increase the tariff; I am going to introduce a protectionist regime in Canada; I am going to do more than that: I am going to spend very large sums of public money. These are to be the means by which I shall attain the end I have in view. When my right hon. friend made those statements, we, who took a different point of view, drew the attention of the country to the fallacy involved in his contentions. We pointed out that, instead of raising the tariff to meet a situation such as we then faced, we should do all that it was possible to do to increase trade, particularly within the British Empire, and therein find the markets which had been lost elsewhere. We pointed out that, at a time like that, no government that had any sense of responsibility could think of embarking upon vast expenditures which would necessitate increased borrowings with consequent vast increase of taxation, at a time when the people were feeling the effects of depression. We asserted that point of view and opposed our policies to his; and to-day this house and the country must judge as to who was in the right and who was in the wrong in the attitude then taken.

The point which I wish to make perfectly clear is this. When I said that the country would hold my right hon. friend to his promises, I was referring to his promise to end unemployment and to secure markets. I was not referring to the means to that end, for I had already said in public over and over again that the means which my right hon. friend was proposing were not such as would prove effective to meet a situation of that kind. May I point out why those of us who were of the Liberal administration of the day took the attitude we did. It was not taken without real justification.

At the time we came into office in 1921, this country was in a very serious depression. In fact, Canada was suffering from the most serious industrial depression that, up to that time, it had ever known. We had to face that situation. Our government came into office on December 29, 1921. In the previous fiscal year, 1919-20, there had been a deficit of $92,000,000; in the year we came into office—we were in for but three of the twelve months of the fiscal year; nine months had expired before we assumed the reins of power—in that year there was again a deficit, this time of $81,000,000. That is the situation with which we were then confronted—a period of recurring enormous deficits. The Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, took very strongly the view that, unless we found it possible to balance our budget, unless in some way we were able to make revenues and expenditures meet, the country would be faced with bankruptcy, and he pointed out that we must shape our policies in a manner which would avoid such a condition by increasing the trade of Canada. Did we go about it as my right hon. friend is doing? Did we start by cutting down the salaries of public servants? Did we take measures that tended to reduce the purchasing power of the people at a time when it was desirable that purchasing power should be as considerable as circumstances would justify? Did we put up the tariff to a point where it would render impossible the shipment of goods to and fro across the ocean, making it absolutely impossible to bring in commodities from other lands on the vessels which we hoped to send out laden with our own commodities to distant countries? Did we not rather take the position that the only thing that would help to meet the industrial situation was so to frame the tariff as to reduce the duties on the implements of production in the great basic industries in order that those industries might develop, and the people engaged in them might compete favourably in foreign markets, and that our farmers might find markets in distant lands? Did we not, in regard to all those things that enter into the family budget, all the necessaries of life, seek again so to adjust the tariff as to make the cost of living as reasonable to the people as the circumstances of the time would permit us to make them? Did we not also, with regard to the expenditure of public moneys, take the view that it was a time to economize: and that, much as we should like to do many things that governments, if they have plenty of money might be justified in doing, yet we could not enter upon such undertakings, but for the time being must retrench along right and proper lines so as to help to make ends meet?

These were the views we took. And with what result? With the result that at the end of a year or two we had changed the deficits to which I have referred—deficits of $92,000,000 and $81,000,000—into surpluses; with the result that, while we were in office only eight and a half years, in seven of those years we had surpluses in place of deficits. More than that, did we not take the position that, while it might mean something in the way of increased taxation at the outset we would endeavour so to shape our policies that taxation would bear as lightly as possible on those least able to bear it; and also that the burden to be imposed on industry would be as light as possible, hoping that gradually, thereafter we should be able to reduce taxation year by year, along with a reduction in the public debt. Again, with what result? With the result that in seven out of our eight and a half years, we reduced the public debt and continued to reduce taxation at the same time; with the further result that a new spirit was put into the life of the people, a new spirit was put into the industry of the country, and the trade of Canada began to increase to bounds it had never known before.

In other words, our policies were framed primarily with a view to developing trade, because we knew that as trade develops so will prosperity come to the country, and that only as trade develops will it be possible to deal fundamentally with the great problem of unemployment. There may be those who are inclined to put forward one particular nostrum or another as a cure for depressed conditions. In times of depression there are all sorts of theories afloat, all kinds of remedies are proposed such as the making of paper serve the place of gold, and other easy methods of getting rid of difficult problems. The world is not confronted to-day with these problems for the first time; it has been facing economic problems ever since there has been an economic system in existence, and it has been found that only those policies which make for the furtherance of trade and help to develop the great basic resources and primary industries of a country will furnish ultimate solution to the great problem of unemployment. That is why we take the view which we do with respect to what we regard as so essential at this time with respect to tariffs and in respect of some other matters as to which there are differences in policy between ourselves and hon. gentlemen opposite. It has become customary for some to say: Why fight over again these old battles of free trade and protection?—to use the extremes of the issue; why fight over and over again the battle of tariffs? Why fight that battle? I ask hon. members to mark my words when I say that, as long as they live, they will find, not only in this country but in every country where tariffs prevail, the question whether tariffs are serving the people or serving special interests will be the great battle on the economic front. It is because tariffs may be so framed as to further the ends of special privilege at the expense of the great body of the people that this question must be always foremost in the country.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Beauharnois.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Bell) will try not to be rude for one evening I shall be obliged to him. As I said a moment ago, we are dealing with the greatest national emergency with which this country in relation to its economic conditions has been faced at any time, with the exception of the period of the great war, and I think it is due to the leader of a political party in this house who has given a respectful hearing to hon. gentlemen opposite to be accorded a like hearing by them. With conditions in Canada what they now are, members of a party who have nothing better to offer by way of contribution to the solution of a great problem than rude interruptions are not going to receive much consideration from the people.

I come now to the means which the present administration has taken to deal with the problem of unemployment, and I will endeavour briefly to trace step by step, the position of the two parties in regard to this all important matter. May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to maintain order in this chamber so that I may proceed without interruption.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say I have not heard any disturbing interruption.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If Your Honour has not heard it, I and those on this side have.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We heard it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In dealing with the problem of unemployment as it presented itself during the campaign, the Prime Minister took the position that, if he were returned to power, he would call immediately a special session of parliament to end unemployment. That was the reason the special session was called after the Prime Minister came into office—it was a special session to end unemployment. What was the position taken at that time by the Liberal party in regard to the attitude of my right hon. friend? It was that a special session of parliament was not necessary to effect the end he had in view, that if it was public money he wished to obtain, he could obtain what was needed by way of governer general's warrant for a limited time, having regard to the fact that an imperial conference was to be held at which the government was to be represented, and that obviously a session of parliament could not last for any length of time prior to that conference. We took the position that more important than a special session of parliament was a conference of those most familiar with the problems of employment and unemployment, a conference representative of those who could best contribute to the devising of the most effective means of dealing with unemployment. Before parliament dissolved, before we went to the country, we had placed in the supplementary estimates a vote for $10,000 to provide for the holding a conference which would bring together representatives of different economic interests to consider what steps should be taken to deal with the problem. I explained in this house before, and I will explain again what we had in view in that connection.

It was intended to bring together, as had been brought together on a previous occasion, representatives of employers' associations such as the manufacturers' association and other employers' associations; of the labour organizations, such as the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress and of other labour organizations; representatives of the municipalities, such as the Union of Canadian Municipalities, representatives of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which could speak for the great trading interests of the country; representatives of the provinces; representatives of the Red Cross, of the great transportation companies and other organizations who would be in a position to consider methods of cooperation in furthering employment and make helpful suggestions as to what might be advisable in the way of further steps to deal with this question. When that conference had come together our thought had been, had we been returned to power, to appoint an unemployment relief commission which would deal with this great question on a national scale, a commission which would be removed altogether from party controversy, which would be responsible to parliament through the government of the day, and which if the occasion so necessitated, would deal with the unemployment situation as a phase of a great national emergency.

In taking the step which we had in mind, we were but following what had been found to be necessary at another time of great national emergency, namely, during the period of the war. At that time it was found that while the departments of the government were capable of dealing in a regular way with matters of routine, they were not so manned and organized, and did not possess the expert knowledge or ability, either through the ministers or through the personnel, as to be able to undertake the handling of a great emergency situation, and that something of a special character had to be created. There was the Imperial Munitions Board, which had to deal with the question of the supplying of munitions for the war; there was the food control board, which had to do with the control of food, and there was a purchasing commission which had to do with the purchasing of supplies of one kind and another. As we all know, these different organizations were supplementary to the departments of government and were necessary because those departments were not equipped to handle an emergency situation. We took the position that that would be the proper way to deal with a question of this character, and I intend to show as I proceed that at each session of this parliament we stressed that step as the one which should be taken to deal with existing conditions.

May I point out this fact: We had it in our power, before parliament dissolved and we went to the country, to ask this house to give us one million, ten millions or twenty millions of dollars to enable us to deal with the unemployment problem. We are being criticized to-day because we did not ask for these amounts; we are being told that we were not sufficiently conscious of the nature of the problem because we did not ask that a grant of the kind should be made and then go to the people and say: We have this money and we are going to spend it in curing your ills and in seeing that everyone obtains employment. We could have done that; but had we done it, what would have been the criticism of my right hon. friend opposite. It would have been that, on the eve of an election, we had taken out of the public treasury a million dollars or many million dollars to bribe the electorate. We would have been told that action of the kind was a reason why we should incur defeat rather than why we should be returned to office. With the knowledge I have of what governed the actions of the cabinet of which I had the honour to be the head, I may say that on the eve of an election we were doubly careful to take no step which was capable of a construction of the kind. We were equally careful during the whole election, whether we were to encounter defeat or victory, not to make to the country a single promise which we had not every reason to believe we would be able to fulfil in letter and spirit if we were returned.

My right hon. friend got his special session. What happened at it? As we know, when the special session met, we were confronted with changes in the tariff more sweeping in extent and higher than anything which Canada had known in the whole of her previous history Those measures were put through practically under a form of closure, because my right hon. friend told us that, if we did not allow them to go through, he would not go to the conference, and everything as to the future of Canada's development depended on what was going to happen at that conference. So those measures were put through. When we are discussing the measures which the government has introduced to deal with the problem of unemployment, we cannot escape from considering those changes that were made in the tariff without rhyme or reason, without advice or counsel from any source, that were made to a degree wholly unwarranted, and that have brought criticism upon the administration even by many of its own manufacturing friends in whose special interests those changes were made. Those tariff changes have had more to do with the problem of unemployment being intensified to-day than any other single factor that can be mentioned.

How can the government say: You must not attribute conditions to the tariff, when they know by the way in which it has been raised, by the way in which it has been manipulated, by the way in which it has been changed from week to week and from day to day, the arbitrary way in which it has been dealt with, that there is no longer certainty in the minds of any manufacturer, distributor, consumer or producer as to what the tariff is to be a day or a week hence. Men will not invest their money, will not place orders anywhere, because they do not know what they are going to be faced with when they come to settle their accounts. The tariff measures that my right hon. friend has introduced constitute a great contributing factor to the situation as it is to-day and are responsible for unemployment reaching the extent it has.

If the tariff legislation of the government had been in the least successful, I imagine it would find itself reflected in the trade of the country. Let me give just a figure or two to show how these tariff measures which were aimed at increasing trade, the home market and manufacturers, have worked out, and ask whether their effects are not reflected in the increase of unemployment which we have at the present time. Let us take the figures in three successive years, for one month, that of January, because the latest figures are for last January:

Year, month of January.	Imports
1930	$84,000,000
1931	50,000,000
1932	34,000,000

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some hon. members say: "hear, hear." We reply to them that you cannot have trade all one way, and if you are going to have exports, you must have imports as well. If you are going to balance your budget so that the country will benefit, you are not going to do it by eliminating trade to almost the vanishing point; you must do it rather by expanding trade, and, as a result of that general expansion, bring about the desired balance. Let us see what the exports were for the same month, January:

Year, month of January.	Canadian exports
1930	$73,000,000

Then under the policy which has been in effect since my hon. friends took office:

1931	$44,000,000
1932	38,000,000

Then we have foreign exports passing through the country:

Year, month of January.	Foreign exports passing through Canada
1930	$1,800,000
1931	951,000
1932	696,000

Let us see how the total trade of this country for the month of January has been affected by the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite:

Year, month of January.	Total trade
1930	$160,000,000
1931	95,000,000
1932	73,000,000

Now let us take the total trade of the country for ten months, because I cannot bring it up to the end of the present fiscal year:

Fiscal year ten months	Imports
1929-1930	$1,054,000,000
1930-1931	780,000,000
1931-1932	485,000,000

Let us see how the exports correspond with the drop in the imports:

Fiscal year ten months	Canadian exports
1929-30	$963,000,000
1930-31	700,000,000
1931-32	500,000,000

	Foreign exports passing through Canada
1929-30	$21,000,000
1930-31	14,000,000
1931-32	9,000,000

Or taking the total trade for the ten months of each of these years:

Fiscal year ten months	Total trade
1929-30	$2,039,000,000
1930-31	1,496,000,000
1931-32	994,000,000

That is the way in which trade has been falling off under the restrictions that have been placed against it in this country.

What about the trend of business generally? Let us take the matter of the number of contracts that have been awarded in Canada:

Month	Amount
January, 1930	$37,500,000

Then just at the time of the change of government:

August, 1930	$49,409,000

I am speaking now of the periods that relate to the effect of the present policies:

January, 1931	$20,000,000
May, 1931	36,000,000
September, 1931	33,000,000
October, 1931	28,000,000
November, 1931	24,000,000
December, 1931	11,000,000
January, 1932	12,000,000

This is the way in which, according to the record of the Bureau of Statistics, the contracts awarded in Canada have fallen off.

Let us take building permits:

Year January	Amount of building permits
1931	$7,511,000
1932	2,762,000

No one is going to take any chances on building under a tariff such as we have to-day with variable and arbitrary valuations put on for all kinds of purposes which the government may have in view.

What about unemployment that was going to be ended? Employment was at a lower figure at the beginning of the month of February of this year than at the beginning of any February in years of record. Of 7,766 firms reporting, the payrolls aggregated:

Date	Number of employees
January 1, 1932	837,312
February 1, 1932	819,175

Let me now give the figures of employment by index numbers, the figure of 100 representing what the employment was in 1926:

August 1, 1930	118·8
February 1, 1931	100·7
December 1, 1931	99·1
January 1, 1932	91·6
February 1, 1932	89·7

The figures show a steady drop in employment, not only month by month, but week by week.

Take the figures of all industries, again with 1926 representing 100. On February 1, 1931, the total was 100·7. On February 1, of this year, the employment figure had dropped to 89·7.

On manufacturing, which of all others was the industry which was to be especially favoured by the tariff, what was the effect? Here is the irony of the situation! On February 1, 1931, the employment figure in manufacturing stood at 96·1, and on February 1 of this year at 85·9. Contrast that with the figures under the Liberal regime. On February 1, 1930, the figure stood at 110·2, and on August 1, 1930, when we went out of power, the figure was 110·2.

I might add that the iron and steel and textile industries, which have received very special favours, have also shown, until within the last week or two, a continual reduction in total employment. So far as hon. gentlemen's tariff policies are concerned, as they relate to this question of unemployment, though we were told that those policies were going to secure work for everybody who wished to work, the actual records of the government show that instead of increasing employment they have decreased employment; instead of increasing manufacturing they have decreased manufacturing; instead of increasing the general business of the country, the general business of the country has steadily declined and trade has steadily and tremendously declined.

Mr. PRICE: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman for one moment? Would he kindly tell the house just what the policy of his administration would have been to relieve the unemployment situation had he been returned to power? Now just tell the house what you would have done about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I will. If my hon. friend had been able to hear when I was speaking, he would have heard that already, because I made it quite clear. I stated first of all that we would have had an unemployment relief commission upon which there would have been representatives of the parties who are best informed to deal with these matters, and they would have been given a free hand to deal with them, save that they would be responsible to the government and through the government to parliament. I said also that, instead of putting up the tariffs to umpardonable heights, we would have so arranged the tariffs as to help promote trade rather than restrict it. Finally, I have said, and I come to that point now, that instead of seeking an appropriation leading to lavish waste of public moneys, we would have used judgment in what we would have asked this house to vote.

Mr. PRICE: Not a five cent piece.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend that it would have been better for him if he had not had five cents to-night.

May I come to the measure dealing with unemployment as such which was introduced by the Prime Minister at the special session? I want again to impress upon the house the fact that it is impossible to separate, from among the government measures dealing with the unemployment problem, those that relate to the tariff and those that relate to the expenditure of public money. I have dealt with the tariff. Let me deal now with the lavish expenditure of public money.

Instead of the measure dealing with unemployment relief being brought down the first of all measures at the special session, it was the last measure to be introduced. There was really very little time, no time at all, to discuss it. What was the nature of that measure?

I have a copy of it in my hand. It was simply an act for the granting of aid for the relief of unemployment by a grant of $20,000,000.

May I here point out wherein I think the government has got itself and this country into the deep water in which it is at the present time in the matter of public expenditure? This government at the special session asked the house to vote $20,000,000 for unemployment relief. Remember, the special session was held in September and the fiscal year ends on the 31st of March. It was not necessary at the special session to vote money other than for the period that parliament would not be in session, and, had the rules and practices which should prevail in parliament obtained at that time, the government would not have asked and would not have received from parliament more than sufficient to enable it to tide over the time between that special session and the time at which the regular session of parliament would be called. However, the government asked for that period the sum of $20,000,000. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that estimate was not framed with any regard to what had been done in the past, or to the proper way of meeting the situation. The Prime Minister took a figure that was purely arbitrary, without relation to what was actually needed, without relation to what had actually been expended in previous years for a similar purpose, and had parliament vote that vast sum of money. Having at the beginning asked parliament to vote that vast sum of money, a little later on the Prime Minister was forced to take steps which were still more extreme.

I have said that when we came into office in 1921 there was existing a very serious industrial depression. The year before, the Conservative government of the day laid down a policy with respect to unemployment relief, which policy was: that unemployment relief, in the first instance, was essentially a municipal matter; in the second place, it was a provincial matter; and it became a national matter only when the provinces represented to the dominion that they were unable to cope with the situation. The provinces had in 1920 represented to the Conservative government of the day that they were unable to deal with the situation and had asked for unemployment relief. An appropriation was granted by this house for the purpose of unemployment relief in aid of the provinces and municipalities.

When we came into power in 1921 we found that we had to avail ourselves of a similar course of cooperation with the provinces and municipalities in meeting what had become a national need, and we utilized sums voted and voted other sums to aid provinces and municipalities in unemployment relief. That was done for two or three years in succession. Whenever during the following years the situation grew sufficiently serious to warrant the step, a sum was voted for that purpose, but the amounts were safeguarded and restricted. Altogether, in the period of ten years from 1920 to 1930 inclusive, there was spent out of the federal treasury in aid to the provinces, to meet the unemployment situation of the dominion, a sum of less than $2,000,000—something under $1,900,000 in the whole ten years, including the period in which the Conservative administration had introduced the method of providing relief which as indicated was followed by the Liberal administration. During those whole ten years there was not a total of $2,000,000 spent out of the public treasury for unemployment relief purposes. Yet in the special session in 1930 the Prime Minister came and asked this house to vote $20,000,000 and secured that amount to meet the situation during that one short winter.

How much of this $20,000,000 did he use during the period up to the end of the then fiscal year? I think $4,000,000 was about all that was used. True enough, commitments were made, on into the spring and summer, of moneys that might still be spent, and in one way or another nearly $19,000,000 of that amount was used up. I submit, however, that if the Prime Minister had followed the example of asking this parliament to vote an appropriation only for the period up to the end of the fiscal year, and had come back for what he needed for the new fiscal year, we might have saved, not one or two million dollars, but anywhere from ten to fifteen million dollars.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen may have their views, but that is mine. At any rate, it cannot be denied that during the previous ten years not as much as two million dollars altogether was spent from the federal treasury for unemployment relief, in comparison with the twenty million dollars which was requested at that one special session by the Prime Minister for less than as many months.

Mr. PRICE: Well spent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then, having received this large sum of money from parliament, and having spent it—some hon. member suggests it was well spent—what happens? The Prime Minister comes back to parliament and says, "I want an appropriation, not for $20,000,000, not for $50,000,000, not for $100,000,000, but I want this parliament to give me a blank cheque, to allow me to take all the money I wish, and to be perfectly free to spend it by direction of the Governor General in Council." He obtained that permission from parliament; that was the second measure introduced. I say, Mr. Speaker, instead of a measure of that kind helping to meet the industrial situation, it has made it infinitely worse. Where is there throughout the length and breadth of this dominion to-day a man or woman suffering want or privation who does not know the Prime Minister has a blank cheque from parliament for an unlimited amount, and that he has been given authority to fulfil his promise that "there shall be work for everyone who wishes to work—not doles." In those circumstances has there not been added an element of poignancy and bitterness to the distress of those suffering to-day through lack of employment and insufficiency of food? First of all, by raising fears in the minds of people in this country as to the extent of impending calamity when he asked for $20,000,000 to meet unemployment, when $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 at the very outside would have been sufficient for the time, the Prime Minister caused capital to conceal itself and its owners to refrain from seeking investments in many quarters. On the other hand, by raising false hopes and stating that anyone who wished to get work would have it where there was no chance of fulfilling any such undertaking, he helped to make conditions infinitely worse than they otherwise would have been.

The trouble with my right hon. friend is this,—and I make the statement to him in all kindness, because in his efforts I think he means to be sincere—he is a man of extremes; he is never satisfied with anything that is not extreme one way or another. If he deals with the tariff, he must raise it higher than anybody else has raised it. If it is a matter of hopes, they must be raised higher than hopes ever before have been raised; if fears, those fears must be greater than have been known heretofore. Through extreme action in one direction and another conditions have been made more unsettled than otherwise they would have been. I say that, first, by arousing the fears of the people throughout Canada as to the extent of threatened unemployment; and, then, by raising false hopes as to employment for all which he has been unable to fulfil; and, now, by going to the other extreme of cutting off salaries, reducing staffs and the like—proceeding from one extreme to the other—he has placed the country in its present unsettled condition under which no one will venture to make with any degree of confidence a substantial investment in anything.

What further do we find in regard to the measures of the last session? My right hon. friend was not content to follow the practice other governments have followed in times of emergency and stress, when requests have been made to vote moneys and trust parliament to do the right and necessary thing. He was determined to deal in his own way, to get the whole business of relief into his own hands, and out of the hands of parliament. The measure he brought in at the second session was not that parliament should vote a certain sum but that he should be given powers—when I say "he" I mean, of course, the governor in council—

An hon. MEMBER: No, "he" is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, of course, as we know, my right hon. friend is more or less the governor in council. I say when he asked and obtained power from parliament to deal with the relief he went much further than any other Prime Minister in Canada has ever gone. At the time of the great war, Sir Robert Borden repeatedly had occasion to come to parliament to have parliament vote millions of dollars to meet war expenditures, moneys necessary for the maintenance of the troops at the front, for the sending of men overseas and the bringing of men back. Did Sir Robert Borden ask parliament to give him a blank cheque?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not at all. Sir Robert Borden came to parliament, asked for a specific sum of money, and requested that the money should be voted by parliament for a specific purpose and for a specific time. On no occasion, so far as I can recall, did he get from parliament authority to spend money outside the fiscal year for which it was appropriated. Never did he think of coming to parliament and asking for a blank cheque, but always asked for specific sums. My right hon. friend knows that we on this side of the house pleaded with him not to ask for a blank cheque, not to ask for the right to have moneys out of which commitments could be made beyond the period of the fiscal year. We asked him to have regard for the traditions, usages and customs of parliament. But he would pay no heed to our suggestions, and, at the last minute of the session, brought in and pressed through his measure.

My right hon. friend has talked about co-operation between the parties. What opportunity has been given to hon. members in this house to cooperate with the Prime Minister and his colleagues?

Mr. PRICE: Every opportunity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What opportunity has his own following had to cooperate with him or to offer suggestions to him? The measure to which I referred and which was brought in at the end of the last session was the last measure on the order paper. It was not brought in until the last week of the session, and hon. members will recall conditions in this chamber at the end of July and the beginning of August when this measure was considered. The whole session went by without the introduction of any legislation to deal with unemployment. Then, when every member was nearly exhausted, when all were preparing to go home, the Prime Minister presented to parliament the demand for a blank cheque. Under a process which very nearly approached closure—because when a measure is presented so late in the session that term may well be applied—he obtained the right, not only to spend all the money he wished, but the authority by order in council to make new offences, to impose new penalties, to borrow money as well as to spend it, and to do whatever he wished with respect to anything which in his opinion related to a solution of the unemployment problem.

Those are the measures which up to the present time have been introduced by my right hon. friend. I think I have already made it clear that, instead of becoming better, conditions have gone from bad to worse. There is one further step, however, which he has indicated it is his intention to take, and is one which makes a consideration of this whole matter at this time so important. The present indication is the only hint he has given us of the step he intends to take to meet the present unemployment condition. What is it? It would seem that he means while parliament is in session, to perpetuate the legislation for which he asked to enable him to deal with the situation when parliament was not in session. That legislation, the bill of 1931 to which I have just referred, was a means to enable the government to deal with unemployment after parliament had prorogued and before another session came into being. On the order paper to-day, appears the following resolution:

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

What does this mean? Chapter 58 is the act to which I have just referred. It means that notwithstanding that parliament is in session, notwithstanding that the people's representatives are here assembled for the express purpose of dealing with the great problems of the country and voting supplies in the regular way, the Prime Minister asks this parliament to give to the ministry while parliament is in session the power to do by order in council that which should be done only by act of this parliament and by supply voted in the regular manner. A more audacious or amazing piece of legislation never was introduced to a free assembly by any prime minister. This measure proposes that, while parliament is in session, actually assembled here with representatives from all parts of the country, hon. members shall forego, by the changing of a date in an act of parliament, their whole duty of dealing in the regular manner with the problem of unemployment in what my right hon. friend will tell us is another emergent situation. "We must meet this situation in the west at once; people are starving; people need this help." If we hesitate for a moment to pass the enactment we will be told that we are blocking aid and holding up the relief that is necessary. The Prime Minister comes along with this measure and by requesting an extension of its provisions from March to May asks us to allow him to have this blank cheque to use while parliament is in session, though his reason for fixing the date at which the act should expire was that he expected parliament would be in session at that time, and that parliament would deal with matters from then on in the regular way. Now he says, "Let me have the powers here conferred until the month of May." What will happen then? I think what we will find, if my right hon. friend has his way, is this: If he can avoid discussion, and get away from being obliged to bring down any policy with respect to unemployment relief until the month of May, when May comes along we will find this parliament will be adjourned until the fall; we will be told that my right hon. friend and his colleagues have to get ready for the Imperial economic conference, and will need the next two or three months for that. Then there will be no discussion on the relief of unemployment or on the methods by which the problem of unemployment is to be solved, and the unemployed will be left to take care of themselves. I may be wrong, but I believe that is the purpose underlying this legislation,—to get away from any discussion at this time by giving the ministry what it needs for the next couple of months. Then they will adjourn this house for months without any settled policy with regard to unemployment having been arrived at.

Now may I point out to the members of this house the seriousness of the situation. This is the only indication we have had at this session, of the policy of the government in dealing with unemployment, and what is it? It is a continuation of the thing which has made matters go from bad to worse up to the present time. That is the position. There is nothing new in the proposed legislation. The government confesses, by the bill it is proposing, its impotence to deal with the question of unemployment; its incapacity and its total incompetence to offer any kind of a solution to this problem. We know that this measure which it is proposed now to extend till May has been a failure; we know that things have gone from bad to worse under the two acts already passed. The ministry will have to offer this parliament and the country something more than is contained in this measure, before the country will be satisfied with regard to the way the government is meeting the unemployment problem.

It is perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that the government has no policy for dealing with this question of unemployment, other than the continued expenditure of large sums of public money in the way here indicated. Indeed, the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) the other evening was a pathetic exhibition—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —of complete incapacity to deal with the most important of all existing labour problems. Read his speech and you will see that the greater part of it was devoted to quoting from solicited letters relating to some petty squabble with regard to patronage up in northern Ontario. Two-thirds of his speech was taken up along that line, yet hon. gentlemen talk about others seeking to make political capital. What was there in the nature of a constructive suggestion in the speech of the Minister of Labour, the only expression of view we have had from the government? What was there? There was not one single suggestion of any course of action other than that the ministry would continue cooperating with the provinces and with the municipalities though, as is stated in this amendment, the government itself is evading the responsibility of this being treated as a national issue by making what it does conditional upon what is done by the municipalities and the provinces. It was the Prime Minister himself who said that unemployment had become a national question. He made that statement throughout the campaign of 1930, but to-day he seeks to back away from that position, at a time when it is becoming more of a national question than ever before.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order that no one may say that nothing in the nature of a practical suggestion has been made, from this side of the house, may I repeat again to-night a suggestion which I made on behalf of the Liberal opposition, both during the special session and at the regular session a year ago, as to what should be done at this time to deal with this question—what should have been done then and what I believe should be done now. I believe that this problem of unemployment is going to be with us not only for several months yet but, I fear, for another year or two at the least. I believe, if this problem is to be met, it cannot be met in the manner in which the enactments up to the present have sought to meet it, but that something very different will have to be devised. There is no man or woman in this House of Commons who can devise a plan that is going to meet the situation, but I do believe that throughout Canada there are those who, because of their special knowledge and understanding of industrial conditions, could, if they were brought together and given authority, deal with the great problem of unemployment in a satisfactory manner, or at least a manner as satisfactory as can be expected.

I suggest to the ministry that immediate steps be taken to appoint an unemployment relief commission, or committee, or whatever you may like to name the body. Ask the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress to nominate to that body some person or persons in whom they have the greatest confidence; ask other leading labour organizations to do likewise; ask the manufacturers' and employers' associations to name one or two members also; ask the union of municipalities to name a representative; ask the Canadian Chamber of Commerce to name its representative; ask the provincial governments, if you like, to name their representatives; ask the Red Cross, which has had to do with administering relief, to name its representative. Let us have a body of experts and allow them to make recommendations to this parliament of what in their opinion may be necessary in the way of enactments or appropriations. Let them effect the necessary cooperation between the dominion and the provinces and the municipalities. We will then have something to guide us and help us to meet the situation. The Minister of Labour himself and his department cannot cope with this situation—and I make that statement with all deference. Already we have witnessed one minister of labour break down completely under the burden; with his own lips the Prime Minister has told us that if there ever was one martyred in his endeavour to cope with a great problem, it was the former Minister of Labour. The preceding Minister of Labour had an experience in industrial problems which, with all due respect, the present Minister of Labour, with all his ability has not had. Is it to be assumed that what Senator Robertson was unable to do while in the position of Minister of Labour the present Minister of Labour is going to do? It is impossible to expect from the present minister and his department any advance upon what we have witnessed up to the present, and it is absolutely essential that the work of unemployment relief should be coordinated in a much more effective way than is the case at the present time.

Having given some study to the question of methods of unemployment relief, as well as to other phases of the industrial problem, I may be permitted to recall one instance in particular of which I have personal knowledge where a great state, confronted with the problem of unemployment, adopted a course somewhat along the lines I have just been indicating. The method which was adopted contemplated a most effective form of cooperation between the state, and municipalities, organizations and individuals. I should like to indicate what form that cooperation would take in this country if a similar method were applied here. I would suggest that, wherever work is being done in a municipality, the agencies of that municipality should be employed in the first instance to the extent to which they are capable of being employed. Municipalities have those in charge of their road work and work of construction. Allow, or rather oblige the municipality itself to provide its overseers, its superintendents, its supervisors and so on; allow it to provide what may be necessary in the way of equipment, tools, supplies, and the like. Let that kind of thing be done by the municipality. It will feel its interest; it will use economy in regard to its own expenditures. Let municipalities do all that they can do, and, when they have done all that they can, let the provinces come in with their facilities and special agencies for supervising work, for contributing supplies and the like. So far as the dominion government is concerned, let it come in when it has had an opportunity of coordinating the work as between the municipalities and provinces, and contribute its money in such a way that it will be used exclusively to pay the labour that is employed, not one cent of it going for supplies or tools or equipment or superintendence or in payment to contractors engaged on relief work. If that step is taken, the unemployed will get the benefit of what this parliament is voting. In other words, there will be a check as between the municipalities and the provinces, and a check as between the provinces and the dominion. Each will be interested in seeing that it is free from exploitation at the expense of the other, and, if this dominion adopts the policy of granting its moneys for the payment of actual labour, none going to contractors, none going to pay for supplies or equipment or superintendence or anything of that sort, then we shall find that the money which this parliament is voting by millions to help unemployment will provide work for those who are unemployed at the present time.

I offer that as a practical suggestion and I do hope my right hon. friend will accept it, and that he and his government will give it consideration. I submit that, with the Imperial economic conference coming on, and with all the other problems he has to deal with, he and his government have more to cope with than they can possibly manage. I give them credit for trying to do their best in the very serious situation of the country to-day; I think they are trying to do their best. But, I submit, they themselves must see that the measures they have brought in, up to the present time, are not adequate to meet the situation; instead, they are only tending to aggravate it. Can they not begin to throw off their own shoulders some of the burdens that are dragging them down, and to trust to others who are in a very favourable position to deal with the problems, giving them a free hand for the purpose? The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) this afternoon spoke of partisanship and playing the partisan game. Surely there is nothing of partisanship in a suggestion such as I have offered; rather, it is a means of getting away from partisanship. And that is what I am seeking to do at the moment; I am trying to induce the government to establish some representative body in which the country will have confidence.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Isn't that what is being done?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not by any means.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly what is being done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It may be done here and there in connection with some of the relief of rural distress in Saskatchewan, but it is not being done in the province of Ontario. It is not being done in the province of Quebec; it is not being done in the maritime provinces; it is not being done in British Columbia. What I want done generally is the kind of thing that the hon. member says is being done with relation to one locality only, but not done by a partisan commission, if I might so say to my hon. friend. The government have to take the responsibility for the commission they appoint. If they are unwilling to leave to responsible bodies the naming of persons whom they are prepared to trust, that, of course, is their privilege; they may name their own commission. But I think the country will judge the government in their meeting of this great national emergency by the non-partisan character of the commission they appoint, and the qualifications of those who compose it.

We are not at this stage in a position even to discuss this question as intelligently as it should be discussed because we have not yet before us what the government has done under this very enactment which expires to-day. We have not yet received any statement from the government as to what has been done. And that brings me to the concluding part of my remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen say, "hear, hear." We shall see what they have to say when I finish what I am about to say at this moment.

What is the position to-day with respect to the government's policy for meeting unemployment? No word has come from the ministry since this third session of parliament has assembled. In the speech from the throne there is not a single word with respect to any policy for meeting the unemployment situation. The only statement made there is that conditions are improving, and that is not true. There has not been a word from the Minister of Labour or the Prime Minister in regard to any sort of proposal to deal with the question of unemployment. There was a discussion the other day with regard to expanding the scope of the industrial research council. A suggestion came in the form of a motion by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) that there should be appointed a body similar to the industrial and scientific research council to deal with social and economic questions.

When that measure was brought forward, I repeated this year a suggestion I made last year, that, if the government was not prepared to appoint a commission to deal with this problem of unemployment it might at any rate appoint a few experts, under the powers given in the Industrial Research Act as it exists to-day, and allow them to work in cooperation with the government on the question of unemployment, much as the tariff board did in advising the late government on matters affecting the tariff. I suggested that it would be advisable to have some board of that character appointed. That suggestion I made last year, and the government turned a deaf ear to it. This year I have made it again, and, up to the present time, no recognition has been given it.

Has any committee of parliament been appointed to investigate this great problem of unemployment? How, may I ask, are we to measure the zeal of the government in these matters? My right hon. friend did not hesitate to put before everything else a matter of personal concern to himself and submit it as a subject of investigation by a committee of this house, even before His Excellency the Governor General had been thanked for his speech; and to-day we have a committee of this parliament investigating certain matters that are peculiarly personal to the Prime Minister. Where is the parliamentary committee dealing with the question of unemployment? Where is the committee of the Commons appointed to consider this great problem of unemployment relief? Where has there been at this session a single word by the Prime Minister, who said in seeking office, "I will end unemployment; I will see that everyone has work"—where is the word from him about the distress and suffering throughout the country as a consequence of unemployment after he has been in office a year and a half? I say, no parliamentary committee has been appointed in connection with this matter, the greatest of all problems with which parliament has to deal. Not a word from the Prime Minister thus far this session.

And what have we had from the new Minister of Labour? Not a suggestion in the speech he has made; no suggestion of any policy. Finally, to come to the resolution itself, which is all we have had up to the present time even by way of indication of what is to be expected, I take it to signify an attempt to escape from any discussion of the problem of unemployment, if this is possible, until this session of parliament prorogues. Let me read it:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the Statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

When was this notice given? It was given just a week ago to-day; that, I believe, was when this notice was put on the order paper. Why was it not put there during the first days of the session? Why up to the present time have we not had a discussion of the question of unemployment? My right hon. friend is not slow in appreciating the significance of every move he makes; but what is the position to-day? Let me read the section which it is proposed to amend. My right hon. friend is proposing that we shall substitute for the word "March" the word "May", in the act passed at the last session of parliament. It is intended to amend, in this manner, this particularly section:

This act shall expire on the first day of March, 1932.

Well, this is the first day of March, and this act has expired or will expire at midnight to-night, so that what my right hon. friend is proposing is that we shall amend a statute that no longer exists. This is his contribution to the unemployed of the country. No suggestion in the speech from the throne, no committee of parliament to investigate the matter, no special committee to advise the ministry, no statement of policy from the Minister of Labour or the Prime Minister—the only proposal made by the Prime Minister is to amend an extinct enactment, to amend a dead statute. That is what the right hon. gentleman offers in the name of his government to those who are suffering and who are in need. He knows as well as I know that that bill is as dead as Julius Ceasar; it expired last night. He knows that that statute is of no more value than the majority of those passed in the reign of Queen Anne; he knows it is as extinct as the dodo. He comes to this parliament and offers to those who are without employment and need relief the amendment of a statute which no longer exists! What will the unemployed of this country think, what will those who are suffering from need and privation think, of the solicitude of the Prime Minister for them in their present condition?

Listen to what he said when he was appealing for power. Speaking in Vancouver on June 18, 1930, the Prime Minister of to-day, then the leader of the Conservative party, referring to myself, said:

However blind he may be to your future and deaf to your present needs, surely he cannot stop his ears with smug complacence and self-esteem to the cry that carries across the nation—the cry of the destitute and hungry, the cry of mothers and fathers and little children who call to us as Christians and as Canadians to heal their pain.

"Who call to us as Christians," he says: may I remind the Prime Minister that the Founder of Christendom itself used the words:

Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?

And also:

Or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent?

The women and children who are suffering in this country to-day have asked the Prime Minister for bread, they have asked him for work, but he has given them not even a stone or a serpent; he has given them an extinct enactment, he has given them a dead statute.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, as it is probable that a vote will be taken on the amendment before the house, and since that amendment is regarded in parliamentary parlance as being a vote of want of confidence, and further since it involves a subject which is so important that it cannot be ignored, it becomes essential that the members of the group in this corner should express their view.

The opportunity presented by this amendment for a discussion of the vexed problem of unemployment is not as propitious as might have been desired. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), in his usual forceful eloquence, expressed the sentiments of the members in this corner when he decried the fact that this amendment had been offered in a political setting. It is very unfortunate that a question of such profound significance to the people of Canada should be brought into parliament in the manner in which this amendment presents it.

Undoubtedly we are all looking to the administration and to this parliament for a solution of the unemployment question, and as far as I am able to judge of the matter we will require to evolve a twofold policy. One policy will deal with the giving of sustenance to the people of Canada, the providing of support for those who have lost their means of livelihood because of a lack of work. That is the first task to be faced by the administration. The second policy should be designed to bring about an ultimate or fundamental reformation which will remove the economic cause of unemployment. The policy of providing work for unemployed rather than giving charity, was brought up at the last session of parliament, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has just stated. At that time it appeared to me to be the general opinion of this house that the policy of providing work for the unemployed was more acceptable than that of the granting of doles. It seemed to be a plausible policy, and I think it was generally agreed that it was the best, but I am not so sure to-day that it was. I have visited some of the relief camps which have been established under the control of the administration and I found them to be very satisfactory. I refer, of course, to the camps established for the building of a highway in northern Ontario. The work was being engaged in by the workers with a good deal of zest, the places where they lived were clean, wholesome and comfortable, and the food provided of an excellent character. If all the unemployed in Canada could enjoy the same conditions I do not think there would be any immediate cause for objection. However, I believe that such relief projects ultimately will have to be abandoned. I express that opinion reluctantly, but in view of all the circumstances I am afraid that that is what will happen. It is clear that no government has ever entered into any industry similar to that being carried on by private institutions, because to do so would mean that the government so doing would come into conflict with private property and the capitalistic system in general. The activities left to a government to undertake on behalf of the unemployed must be of a class usually undertaken by governments, and this is limited to a certain kind of so-called public works. The most popular kind of public work undertaken by governments in cases of unemployment in this country is that of building roads and highways, because private companies do not usually do that. What is the situation in that regard? We find in the first instance that governments must borrow the money with which to carry on that work, and at the present time such money will be borrowed at a very high rate of interest, thus paying to the bondholders not only the usual but even a higher interest rate than it is customary for them to collect. Next, the work on those highways is frequently given by way of contract, although this has not been done in the locality I visited. It is given in some instances in Alberta, I believe, under contract through the municipalities and the provincial government.

Mr. ARTHURS: Not in Ontario.

Mr. IRVINE: That allows a profit for the contractor. Then the materials are purchased at prices which permit a profit to those who deal in the commodities required. That leaves the lowest figure of wages to be paid to the people for whom all the work was originally undertaken, and finally, to cap the climax, as we sometimes say in popular parlance, the government has to accept what might be about 60 per cent of the actual work value for the money that it has expended. That is to say, work undertaken on roads and highways in the winter time in this country is very difficult to perform economically and the result usually is that about 60 per cent of what would be done under suitable conditions would be given under the present circumstances. For those reasons I doubt whether the policy of the state providing work to meet an unemployment situation, which has become so serious as to be described by the leader of the opposition a few minutes ago as a national emergency, can be carried on. However, the government must pay the bill. Winter work, as I say, is not an economic proposition, with the result that the government has to pay a very high sum for a very low return, and in view of the present financial situation throughout the world, I doubt whether such a policy can be continued indefinitely. The government of this country, like the governments of other countries, will ultimately be forced to take what may not be the best course, but the cheapest course, and under the present circumstances the cheapest course in the last analysis is undoubtedly that of giving doles instead of trying to give work. I am not advocating giving doles; I do not think that is a cure of unemployment, but in view of the financial stringency through which we are passing, the government may be forced to take the cheapest course instead of the best. But in any case I would insist that the people in Canada who have no money or work and thus have no food, shall be fed, clothed and sheltered. To do that, the state must assume the responsibility and must pay the bill. It remains for us to discover the best method by which the state can render that assistance to that part of the population which requires it.

In regard to the other phase of the matter, namely, the ultimate policy, I do not regard this as being an opportune moment to express whatever opinion I may hold in that respect. As the leader of the opposition has pointed out, there is on the order paper a measure which will afford an opportunity for a discussion of that sort, and I have no doubt, before the session ends, the government will furnish—at least I hope it will—an opportunity of discussing this question under more favourable circumstances. But in passing I would say that reformation, fundamental and constructive in regard to the economic problem which causes unemployment, is imperative. That reformation must and will come either by legislation or by revolution. If parliament wants to prevent the latter, it must see to it that it provides the former. We must provide legislation that will bring the reformation necessary if we are to prevent disaster in other ways. Parliament and the government must not forget that if we are to avoid the difficulties which we sometimes fear will arise, we must do something to prevent the necessity for such action being taken. There must be an approach fundamentally different from that made by any nation so far, and from an entirely different understanding of the problem.

In that regard I am constrained to make a reference to the speech which has just been so eloquently delivered by the leader of the opposition. With perhaps this corner in mind, he referred to the nostrums of one kind or another which are sometimes proposed as a cure for the economic ills of our time. I do not of course know that he referred to this corner, but it is probable that he did. I do not think that in that respect this corner has pinned its flag to any particular masthead, although it is true we have advocated a number of things which we believe have an economic bearing on the problem. But leaving that aside, the leader of the opposition says that the economic problem is the same to-day as it has been ever since the world had an economic system. If he really means that, he is announcing his incapacity to lead any modern nation in the circumstances now confronting it; for I challenge his view in that regard and say that never before in the world's history has there been a situation similar to the present one, and that no policy that has been satisfactory in the past can possibly be applied to the present day. It may be all very well for him to say that the lower tariff policy of the Liberal party is going to be good enough for all time. I do not believe that, neither do I believe that the high tariff policy of the Conservative party is going to be good enough for all time. In fact, I would say that neither has been good enough for any time, and I do not think either has a very serious bearing upon the economic problem of the present day.

If we are going to continue industry on the basis of competition for private profit, it is certain that we shall end in disaster. All efforts made to cope with the situation on that basis I regard as being foredoomed to failure. Sooner or later this parliament and country must make a definite decision on that matter. Until that decision is made I am not very much interested in any proposal, no matter what side of the house it comes from, because I firmly believe that unemployment cannot be cured under the present economic system, and that the first step towards a cure is a definite decision by the government and parliament that a new system must be introduced. Shall we continue to nurse the aged and dying system while youth and hope die for lack of attention? That is the problem as I see it. The decision, as I say, must be made to reconstruct our economic life on a new basis and for purposes very different from those which obtain now. Until that decision is made, I repeat, I have not very much faith in the outcome of any proposal which has in view the ultimate ending of unemployment.

Meanwhile, may I point out that Canada's richest deposits of wealth are being wasted and worse than wasted. Canada's youth is her richest vein of gold. What opportunities have we provided for the armies of young men and women who are coming year by year into the industrial field demanding the right to live by labour? I ask that question of myself and I ask it of every hon. member in this house. Coming up for the year 1932 is an army of bright and intelligent young men and women of Canada. A similar army came up last year, and one the year before; another will come the year following, and they are faced with closed industrial doors; opportunity for expansion in life's affairs is denied them. What is parliament going to do this year in order to give these young people an opportunity? The nation which cannot find opportunity for its youth will die of premature senility, and it deserves the fate. While Canadian youth is faced with that disaster we squabble in this house for a solid two days over a matter of political prestige or advantage, without bringing forward a single constructive policy to solve the problem. That is the fact of the matter as I see it. I mention the plight of youth not to be rhetorical, but to bring home to this parliament more poignantly if possible than anything else could bring it home, the importance of the question now before us and of finding some solution for it before we leave to go back to our homes.

I come to the amendment which has been proposed. I have no doubt—at least I am not permitted to doubt—that the hon. member who moved this amendment (Mr. Heenan) is sincere in his objective. But it is rather a remarkable thing that the late Minister of Labour should find nothing better to offer to the unemployed than a huge hash of the speeches of the Prime Minister for the last three years, and that is what he brings to this parliament as a solution of the unemployment problem. I shall not weary the house by reading what has been read already half a dozen times, in the last few years, has been placed on Hansard on different occasions and given to the country in various ways. I fail to see what significance it can have in relation to the unemployment problem other than a political one. I do not know if it is really the case, but certainly it appears to me that in the amendment the reference to a solution of the unemployment problem is more of a means than an end to be gained. Of course adoption of the motion involves the defeat of the administration, and it is distinctly political in its objective. We are not very much interested over in this corner in the life of this administration or any other, nor are we particularly interested in the hopes of the opposition to get over where the present administration now is. That question has never been a very serious one for members of the group over here. Nevertheless, we are forced to express an opinion and sometimes to vote on questions of this character, and we must indicate our position.

The amendment in itself, I say, is distinctly political in character. When we look at the amendment in the light of the statement of the leader of the opposition, that unemployment has become a national emergency; when we look upon unemployment as a national emergency and then look at the resolution which is proposed to meet that national emergency I really do not know what to say about the matter. It is beyond comment. So far as our group here is concerned, and I think I am speaking for the group in this regard, we are not going to vote for the amendment, because we regard it as purely a political amendment, but we say to the hon. gentleman who moved it and to the leader of the opposition that whenever they bring in a positive resolution that will bear upon the problem of unemployment we shall be more than glad to stand with them. But when it comes to a matter of this sort, to an amendment which has clearly but one objective and that the making of political capital out of this national emergency, we do not intend to sustain their desires with our votes. On the other hand, we do not feel disposed to vote against the amendment, for this reason: We do not think the government has solved the problem of unemployment any more than do the hon. gentlemen who have been proposing and supporting the amendment, and we are looking forward to a statement of policy by the government in this session of parliament on this question. Therefore we would not like to indicate by our votes that we are perfectly satisfied with all that the government has done in the matter. On the other hand, we are not hypercritical. We know that the problem has been difficult. We know that the government has done something. We know that they have kept people from starving. We are looking forward to a better policy. So, Mr. Speaker, this is one of those peculiar motions in respect to which we shall take shelter by not voting at all, neither for nor against, but rather await the proposal of the government, or a better proposal from the opposition, bearing on the problem.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I approach this very important subject of unemployment in a non-partisan spirit, and will rather seek to submit some constructive suggestions which might be of benefit in helping to relieve the unemployment situation, more particularly as it concerns the province of British Columbia.

In so far as the amendment condemns the government for world wide conditions which they could neither foresee nor prevent, I am not in sympathy with it. The amendment is on surer ground when it condemns the government for the extravagant promises on which it rode into office, promises made recklessly and apparently with very little regard to the possibilities, let alone the probabilities, of their being capable of fulfilment. Some responsibility perhaps attaches to the electorate who so readily and credulously swallowed statements and promises which an application of ordinary, common horse sense might have told them were obviously insincere, or at least, obviously impossible of fulfilment. However, as my desk-mate, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has said, that is a matter of eighteen months or two years ago, and no great advantage can be gained to-day, as we see it at any rate, by reproaching the government for the non-fulfilment of promises, the blame for which centres rather around the fact that they were made at all than that they are now found incapable of fulfilment.

The people, as the hon. member for Labelle says, are looking to us to give them some lead, if such can be done, to bring them out of this economic depression. I blamed the government for two actions in connection with their relief scheme of the last year. First, I blamed them because they did not grasp soon enough the seriousness of the situation. Hon. members in this corner of the house and myself repeatedly urged the government concerning the necessity for prompt and immediate action. Such action was not taken. Had it been taken perhaps we would not have seen the spectacle in British Columbia of ill-clad men, in some cases under-nourished, attempting to build roads in the heavy winter rains or at times in eight or ten inches of snow. Such conditions certainly did not promote efficient work, and the health of the men employed must have been affected.

The second fault I found was that too much power was placed in the hands of the provinces. The federal government did not retain enough control of the large sums of money which were being spent and for which they were primarily responsible.

Apart from those two objections I believe the present government made a genuine effort to relieve unemployment last year, and the fact that the results have been so disastrous in British Columbia is, I think, much more the fault of the provincial government than the federal. We may compare the actions of the provincial and Dominion governments in this way: The Dominion government did a considerable amount of work on its own hook. That is to say, work done which was wholly dominion in scope and paid for by the federal government. For the most part very little waste took place in that work. In common with other members of the house I was asked to furnish a statement recommending the most necessary works in the district I represent, and I did as requested. I was very careful to include only those works absolutely necessary, and included only those which had been omitted in the ordinary estimates and which should have been provided for in the usual maintenance vote. While the government did not carry out all the works I recommended, as it should have done—they were all very necessary—still all the works they did carry out were amongst those included in my list. I am sure I must have had the support of the government engineers who knew that the works were necessary for the maintenance of those wharves, floats and the like for which the government were responsible.

Of course there was a certain amount of abuse. Two regulations made by this government were largely ignored. One of them was to the effect that so far as practicable the men employed should be residents of the locality in which the work was being performed. In many cases that regulation was ignored. A second regulation stipulated that in no case was discrimination to be allowed or permitted through political affiliations. That also was not properly adhered to. Further, men were employed who were not registered, yet the local government had expressly arranged a system of registration and had provided and insisted through public notices that no man who had not registered would after a certain date be employed on relief work. That regulation was not complied with. In many cases men were selected on the recommendation of local politicians seeking only personal advantage, and in some cases selections were made on the advice of some would-be kaiser who could not resist the opportunity of inflicting political revenge on persons who, or districts which, in his opinion had not voted properly. If time permitted I could, if challenged, give definite instances of breaches of these regulations.

As I have said, this political manœuvering took place in British Columbia; it did not take place in Ottawa. I wish now to follow the example set by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) who a few nights ago gave credit to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) for fairness in the administration of his department. I also am pleased to bear witness to his fair-mindedness. In more than one instance when I found that work which should have been done perhaps two years ago, work recommended by government engineers, was being sidetracked for no reasons other than political antagonism, I communicated with the minister and he in turn took steps to see that the grievance was rectified. At the moment I have in mind a situation which obtained in Lasqueti Island where three small works were needed, and where the most important one, on account of political intrigue, was being neglected. I give credit to the minister for his attitude in connection with that work and will take every opportunity to see that he, a Conservative Minister of Public Works in a Conservative government, gets credit for his action in that regard. Despite some defects I think I can say that for the most part the work was wholly necessary and done efficiently. There were one or two small instances where through political influence some man would be put in charge of a little job who barely knew at which end of a canthook to apply himself, and perhaps was not very willing to apply himself at either end. These were small matters, however, and on the whole, there could be very little complaint.

A very different tale must be told, however, when we consider the work done by provincial authorities in which the federal government was interested. I might explain that a large part of British Columbia, other than areas within city municipalities, is unorganized. In those parts the provincial government had full control of the way the money was spent or, probably I should say, misspent. There was very little complaint of the way work was done in the cities. I do not know what custom prevails in the east, but in the west councils are elected on a non-political basis, and consequently there was no opportunity or temptation to play politics. But the cities themselves had grievances. Dealing with the province, the cities found great difficulty in getting their proposals accepted. I have a record of one city in my district which asked for $20,000, and after extensive negotiations they were told they would receive only $10,000. Accordingly they financed on that basis but were told long afterwards that they would receive only $7,000. When the figure was agreed to there would be further delay in receiving an O.K., and still further delay when moneys were to be paid.

Speaking on this subject the other day I said I believed that I would be acting in the best interests of British Columbia if I urged the government seriously to consider the appointment of a commissioner with very sweeping powers who could go to British Columbia and handle the situation very much as though that province were more or less in the hands of a receiver. I said also that a strong capable man was needed vested with wide powers. After the necessary time required for Hansard to reach the province of British Columbia there appeared in a Victoria newspaper—I shall not give the name of the newspaper so that the columnist will not receive the publicity he was no doubt seeking but to which he is not entitled—an article attacking the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and myself. They accused my hon. friend of asking for, and accused me of supporting, his request for a commission. The suggestion in the article was that the request for a commission bore with it an insinuation that there was something to investigate in connection with relief work. The words I used were a little more definite than the word "insinuate." I said, "the whole thing reeks with suggestion of graft and corruption." There is no insinuation about that. The article went on to say that I was animated by a desire to show that I was still the champion of the rights, liberties and interests of the common people. As a matter of fact, referring to the Hansard from which I have just quoted, I find the hon. member for Vancouver Centre did not use the word "commission" at all. He did say that he would like to see a full investigation. Nor did I ask for a commission; I asked for a commissioner, a very different request. So far as the third rate columnist of a second rate newspaper is concerned I am quite happy to accept the position he wishes on me—in fact I am rather proud to be classed as the champion of the rights and privileges of the common people. I am glad he knew enough to say that I am the champion of the rights and privileges of the common people, although on that occasion the words I used were "the whole of British Columbia."

Then again, Hon. Mr. Bruhn, the Minister of Public Works, rushes into print and says:

> Mr. Neill expressed his belief that the administration of unemployment funds should be placed in the hands of a strong minded official with strict power and authority from the Dominion government.

Then he goes on to say:

> This is the first time that we have known Mr. Neill to advocate a dictatorship when dealing with the unemployed.

I did not use the word "dictator," but if I had I would not have been alone. Let me quote this sentence:

> The provincial government very much requires the services of a financial dictator. . . .

That is from the Vancouver Province, the strongest Conservative paper in British Columbia. Further on they use this language:

> . . . we should say that such a tangle as obtains to-day in the relief camp service is an extremely strong indictment of the present system of control.

Thus speaks the Conservative newspaper, which in many respects is very fair-minded. As I said, I did not use the word "dictator," though I do not know that its use would not have been justified. What I advocated was not a dictator but a man whom I might classify as a go-between, with the Dominion government on the one hand, who have the money and are willing to spend it for relief purposes, and on the other hand the unemployed people who need relief work, who are anxious for it and who are going hungry for lack of it, but who do not appear able to get it because of this government of inefficient misfits in Victoria. I wanted somebody with sufficient power and authority to exercise some check over those governing curiosities in Victoria who have been blocking the progress of unemployment relief, who have been a nuisance to the government in Ottawa, a reproach to their party friends in British Columbia, and a curse to the unemployed who sought relief.

I am not attacking the Conservative government of British Columbia as such, but if I should do so I would be in very good company. There are a lot of Conservatives, including members of the local legislature, who are very frank in expressing their views of the situation. Perhaps, with a little exaggeration, I could best express the situation by saying there is no Conservative government in British Columbia to-day; it has ceased to be, though it still carries the name, perhaps in the same way a woman who has betrayed her husband will for a time shelter herself behind his name and protection. The rump cabinet of Victoria has betrayed the Conservative party, and not only the Conservative party but also that wider section of independent people, whose numbers are growing in British Columbia, who do not vote according to party lines but who vote for what they think is in the best interests of the province. At any rate the Conservatives, and no doubt many Liberals and Independents, did vote for the government, and the best elements of the Conservative party promulgated a platform to which they were pledged and which they were determined to carry into effect. They were pledged to greater efficiency, greater economy, tax reductions and non-patronage, but their cabinet has broken every one of those pledges in turn and now, in this last fiasco in connection with unemployment relief, they have broken them all at once. I reiterate what I said the other night; the local government has made a complete mess of the unemployment situation.

Mr. PRICE: Can you prove that?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, up to the hilt. I may say that I think Hon. Dr. Tolmie, decent, honest man that he is, who I hope soon recovers from his indisposition, would be one of the first to admit that conditions are unsatisfactory. I know this was a very great nightmare to the previous Minister of Labour, and I believe it had a great deal to do with his indisposition. I think even the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) would not care to go too emphatically on record as being wholly satisfied with relations between British Columbia and his own department.

Then we have another minister of the crown writing west and saying that "the provincial government seem unable to meet the ordinary business conditions which the federal government found it necessary to impose in connection with relief administration." Again we find that very early in the session of the provincial legislature a member rose in his place and moved the adjournment of the house to call attention to the fact that the government were not even paying their relief bills. Relief orders had been given to country stores, and a rather unfortunate situation existed in that regard. I know that to be a fact within my own knowledge, for I went into a country store—

Mr. PRICE: I would ask the hon. member to quote someone who is responsible and not give hearsay in support of what he thinks.

Mr. NEILL: I certainly will not quote the hon. gentleman, for I do not think he is responsible.

Mr. PRICE: You are taking up the time of the house with a lot of political nonsense.

Mr. NEILL: I might remind my hon. friend of this verse of the poet:

> While broken teacups, wisely kept for show,
> Rang'd o'er the chimney, glisten'd in a row,

I went into a country store, and the proprietor told me that his wholesaler was pressing him for cash, not an unusual thing in these days. The storekeeper had a stack of relief orders, all initialled and delivered, and he offered them to the wholesaler, but the wholesaler said, "I do not want them; I want cash." Again, we find the city council of North Vancouver, quite a large city, voting money to allow some delegates to take part in an unemployment parade to Victoria. They did so with the comment that they did not believe much in such parades, but they thought it was a good idea to take some steps to stir up the government at Victoria. Then we find the city council of Vancouver saying they did not think they could legally vote money for this purpose, although they would like to do so, but they gave these people relief while they were there and promised them all the flags they needed for their procession or parade. Again we find Senator McRae writing to North Vancouver, which he used to represent, and saying that the blame lay with the province rather than with the dominion.

I have still another example. The Vancouver Sun is known, of course, to be a Liberal newspaper, but it is no more a partisan Liberal newspaper than the Province is a partisan Conservative newspaper. The owner of that newspaper is reputed to be a man of wealth; at any rate he is abundantly able to defend any action for libel and to pay any expenses or damages which might be levied against him. A few months ago he came out in his newspaper with the announcement that he had detailed one of its editorial staff to make a personal investigation, extending from the coast to the Alberta boundary, and report his findings in connection with unemployment. I cannot read the whole report, though I should like to gratify my hon. friend opposite. I will only read three short sentences which are indicative of the whole situation.

Mr. PRICE: Your stuff is all bunk, that is all I have to tell you.

Mr. NEILL: "And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind." The article states:

British Columbia's grossest political scandal has been perpetrated under the guise of "unemployment relief."

Those words are actionable if they are not true.

In its morals the operation compares rather unfavourably with stealing pennies from the baby's bank. In its magnitude it more nearly resembles a Wall street raid.

The crime is this: that millions of dollars of public money purporting to be used in the relief and assistance of the needy and destitute, have been scattered broadcast in wages and purchases of supplies among political favourites. Meanwhile the hungry have remained unfed.

That is a statement which leaves the publisher completely open to a libel action, but nothing has been done about it. It is needless to go into details; I have not time, but at any rate, the whole thing was stopped because money ran short. In the meantime the province made a demand upon the dominion treasury; they said, "Give us half; give us your share of the money we have been squandering," but very much to the credit of the government of this dominion, they refused. They said, "No. We are willing to give our share of the money which you have spent on relief, but we are not going to spend our money on your wildcat camps, political friends, and so on." Then the fat was in the fire and the work had to be shut down instantly, and after that the government was reduced to the giving of as much direct relief as could be afforded. That is the very worst form of dole. Hon. members who have howled down any idea of unemployment insurance were only too pleased to see doles given out. Only two meals a day were given to men sitting in camp alongside a road, looking at the road which was in a disgraceful condition. I feel certain that if I had gone and said, "Boys, for God's sake fix that road at your own expense," they would have done it rather than have sat idly by and looked at it. But that was the situation: they were getting two meals a day for looking at it. That happened three months ago, and since then, about every third day we have received notice that work was going to start again, but nothing has been done. They are now talking of a scheme of giving them $7.50 a month, but even that does not seem to be in operation yet.

I repeat, what is needed is for the government to send a commissioner there with full power to investigate, not a political committee. The local government, to save their face—and there is mighty little of their face left in this regard—have appointed a political committee of their own choosing, in the proportion of seven to four. They could not even be content with a majority but they had to have seven out of eleven. And they were hand-picked on their own side because they could not trust their men. Some of the Conservatives are up in arms about the situation I have outlined, and now a political whitewashing committee has been appointed to administer the necessary whitewash. That is not the kind of investigation we are entitled to, nor is it the kind this government are entitled to for their own protection and information.

It may be claimed that this is a provincial matter and that they have not been squandering the federal money. But much of the trouble that arose in all these months, with which the Minister of Labour is at least partially familiar—because a lot of it happened in the time of his predecessor—was due to that very thing, that the province was trying to squander federal money, and the trouble came to a head when the federal government would not stand for it. It is the duty of this government to see that the dominion relief scheme is effective, and I am safe in saying that if they carry it out along these lines more than ninety per cent of the people of British Columbia will be grateful and more than grateful to them for doing so. Large sums of money are being spent. We have got into the habit of talking in millions, and the Dominion government are paying fifty per cent and in some cases more than that, so that it is their duty to investigate, not only the past, although a good deal of investigation would be necessary if we go into what has been done in the past, but what is being done now and what will be done in the future. There are months and months ahead of us during which we shall need relief from the Dominion government and steps should be taken to see that the money is properly spent.

I submit that it should be this man's duty to see that the money is spent wisely and efficiently so that good work will be done and value got for the money spent. Then he should have power to direct and to dominate, if you like, these misfits in Victoria in order to see that the work is done in such a way and under such conditions that the Dominion government can readily and without question pay their share of the expense. That will have the further great benefit of avoiding any delays, which are sometimes very unfortunate for the municipalities, whose funds are not ample. It is important that there shall be no delay in paying the dominion's share of the money. That is the primary duty of the government, and I hope they will send a good man out. Secondly—and this is most important—he should see that the money is really received by the people who need work and who are hungry. Let me refer to the act passed last year. What is it intended to do? It is for the purpose of relieving distress and providing employment; and elsewhere it speaks of the "speedy and unhampered prosecution of all relief measures". That is all I ask: that they send a man there who will see that the prosecution of the work is speedy and unhampered—unhampered by that bunch of curiosities in Victoria—for the relief of unemployed people. We shall not fulfil the purpose of the act under present conditions unless the government exercises greater supervision there.

In order that my attitude may be quite free from any appearance of partisanship I am going to join with my co-partner, or co-leader, or the other half of the independent desk—we will call it that rather than group or party—and vote against the want of confidence in the government. I hope, however, that the government will take steps to have these matters to which I have referred, carefully considered, and introduce methods that will improve conditions. They have given notice of an extension of the act under which relief is afforded and now will be the proper opportunity to provide more stringent regulations along the lines I have suggested in order that at least in the province of British Columbia, with which of course I am more familiar, the money will go from the federal authorities to the people who so badly need it.

Mr. F. R. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): In rising to say a word or two in connection with the amendment, I desire as the representative of a constituency in Saskatchewan to thank the government of the day for the most sympathetic manner in which they have come to the assistance of the people in that province. I was surprised at the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), who tried to establish a comparison between conditions to-day and conditions in the year 1921 when he came into power. There is no comparison whatsoever. At that time I was in a business in Saskatchewan which I think reflected more quickly than any other the condition of unemployment or employment. That was the time of great deflation of commodity prices as a result of the war. During the war the price of almost every commodity had gone up from 50 to 200 per cent, and in twelve months prices dropped again practically to where they had been before, so that there was considerable dislocation of trade and some unemployment. But the situation then was by no means comparable to the present situation. It is therefore a mistake to make any such comparison. In western Canada at that time there was no unemployment, or at least very little. Rentals, which are a fair index in the city I come from and in every other city and town in Saskatchewan, remained practically at the level that existed prior to 1921. It is different to-day. Rentals of business properties in that part of the country are down from thirty-five to fifteen per cent.

The problem before us is a national and international problem; it is something over which the government has no control, and the leader of the opposition knows that perfectly well. The right hon. gentleman spoke about raising fears throughout the country because unemployment was rampant. I would ask hon gentlemen opposite this question: Last year did we not sit here week after week listening to wails of woe, particularly from members from western Canada in regard to conditions out in that country? We heard these wails of woe until we were all heartily sick of them, and now the right hon. gentleman comes along and says that we are creating fears in the minds of the people in connection with unemployment. I have wondered, while listening to this talk in regard to unemployment relief, just what the late government did from an administrative point of view. I wonder to what extent the lack of administrative vision has accentuated the unemployment which exists to-day? I could quote figures from my own city in regard to unemployment and the relief granted by federal, provincial and municipal authorities, but I do not intend to weary the house. However, I should like to read a letter from the provincial secretary of the Retail Merchants' Association of the province of Saskatchewan. This gentleman is a very staunch supporter of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). This letter, addressed to the Premier of Saskatchewan and dated Saskatoon, January 12, 1932, reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Anderson:

At the executive meeting of our association which we held in Regina on Thursday and Friday, January 14 and 15, and at which meeting we also had in attendance the directors of the Retailers' Trust Company, Limited, and the members of the southern merchandising committee of our association, the subject of the manner in which the distribution of relief by the federal and provincial governments, through the Saskatchewan relief commission, was pretty thoroughly talked over by the members present.

A resolution was unanimously passed that I should write you, expressing appreciation of the manner in which this relief has been carried out by the governments, through the relief commission, and I was to say to you, Dr. Anderson, that, generally speaking, we believed it to be carried out in a very satisfactory manner, both to the recipients and to the retail trade, as well as to the citizens of Saskatchewan.

I was asked to send a copy of this letter to the Hon. R. B. Bennett, Hon. Robert Weir, and to Mr. Henry Black, chairman of the Saskatchewan relief commission.

I can assure you it affords me much pleasure personally, to write this letter.

Yours faithfully,

W. L. McQuarrie,
Provincial Secretary,
Retail Merchants' Association.

I could read other letters of a similar nature, but I will not take up the time of the house. I am glad to see the Leader of the Opposition in his place, as well as the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh). I regret that the former Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) is not present because I intend to refer to a matter which pertains to the constituencies of Prince Albert and North Battleford, and he might be interested in my remarks.

During the years from 1921 up to the time the natural resources were returned to the province a condition arose which was not in the best interests of the people of Saskatchewan. I refer to the manner in which timber permits were handed out to the friends of the late government, and also to the granting of tie contracts. I hold in my hand a list of the timber permits which have been granted to a firm in Prince Albert, friends of the right hon. gentleman, numbering in all some sixty-one or sixty-four. In each case these permits are listed as being fire-killed timber. They were granted from the year 1925 up to just prior to the last federal elections, and it is a strange thing that no one but this particular firm could obtain a permit to cut timber in this section of northern Saskatchewan. It is also a strange thing that apparently no one but this particular firm could obtain a contract from the Canadian National Railways for the supplying of railway ties. It looks very much like collusion between the Department of the Interior, the Canadian National Railways and the contractors in Prince Albert. Hon. members familiar with timber regulations know that fire-killed timber is that which has been run over by fire and fifty per cent of which will eventually die. The royalty for such timber is only fifty per cent of what it is for standing green timber, so that these contractors by being permitted to lease this as fire-killed timber have paid the government a much smaller royalty than would have been required had it been properly designated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. F. R. MacMillan.]

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit that the remarks of the hon. gentleman are not relevant to the debate. His suggestion that for a great many years such and such a thing has gone on does not concern the question under discussion; this is not the occasion on which to bring up a matter of this kind.

Mr. BENNETT: The debate has wandered over a wide area. The right hon. gentleman opposite during at least ten minutes of his address discussed another item on the order paper, and I do not think the hon. member is beyond the scope of the discussion when he points out how unemployment has been induced by the selection of only a limited number of people to furnish ties.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure that what the hon. member has been saying has nothing to do with the immediate question, that of unemployment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of the opinion that the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) is not out of order. The motion is that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of supply, and the amendment proposed thereto opens the way for a wide debate. One paragraph of the amendment reads as follows:

> That the giving of these solemn assurances, the using of them to secure support at elections and their violation after the attainment of office reveal a flagrant disregard of political honour and tend to lower the standard of public life.

Surely that opens the way for a wide discussion.

Mr. MacMILLAN: I prefaced my remarks by stating that I wondered what effect the lack of administrative ability on the part of the late government had had upon unemployment. The hon. gentleman who interrupted me will realize that there is some connection between unemployment and the matter with which I am dealing. I intend to endeavour to show him that this is so, and I hope he will be good enough to accept my proof.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall be glad to listen.

Mr. MacMILLAN: The hon. member is very gracious.

As I said before, these contracts extend from 1925 up to just prior to the recent federal elections. I hold in my hand a return made by the office of the general timber agent of the Canadian National railways, dated at Montreal, February 23, 1931. This shows that from 1925 to 1930 the contractors referred to received from the Canadian National Railways $1,311,000 for railway ties, they having taken out some 1,600,000 or 1,700,000 ties during that period. All these ties have been listed as fire-killed ties. I am going to read some statements in regard to this timber made by men living in that district. This is a statement made by Charles Marshall of St. Walburg, Saskatchewan, on the 10th day of March, 1931 and witnessed by a commissioner of oaths. He said:

1. That during the summer of 1930 I was assistant fire ranger in the employ of the Dominion government in the Meadow Lake division, particularly in townships 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, and 60 in ranges 25, 26 and 27 west of the third meridian in the province of Saskatchewan, and as such have a personal knowledge of the matters herein referred to.

2. That I have inspected and cruised all the following timber berths, namely: fire-killed timber berths numbers: 4141, 4142, 4143, 4495, 4597, 4599, and 4600 and say that all these timber berths contain green jackpine suitable for the production of railway ties and are incorrectly designated fire-killed timber berths.

3. That in the year 1929 I was employed as tie peeler, peeling some of the ties removed from some of the above-mentioned timber berths, and say that none of the ties peeled by me were fire-killed.

4. That I have found large tracts of timber ruthlessly fallen and wasted, a total loss and a great fire hazard, because the inspections by the authorities were improperly enforced, as against Hett & Sibbald Limited, the permittees.

Then I have a letter dated at Turtleford, Saskatchewan, April 9, 1931, which states:

Dear Sir:

During the year 1927 I made railway ties for Hett & Sibbald Limited from sections 2 and 3 in township 55, range 18, west of the third meridian. The timber was cut from this land by me and delivered to Hett & Sibbald at Livelong, Saskatchewan. All the timber was green timber. None of it was fire-killed.

When I was instructed by Hett & Sibbald to cut these ties they told me that they had a permit to cut this timber. I later understood that no such permit was granted and that I was unlawfully removing timber for Hett & Sibbald and without any permit.

I have seen a great number of railway ties made and in the process of delivery from townships 55 and 56 in range 18, during a number of years, particularly 1927, 1928 and 1929. All the ties made from these townships, that I at any time saw, were green ties and were not made from fire-killed timber. All these ties were said to be delivered to Hett & Sibbald Limited.

Yours truly,
Wm. Mattila.

This is another letter, dated at St. Walburg, Saskatchewan, in the constituency of North Battleford, under date of April 6, 1931:

Dear Sir,—

I know fire-killed timber berths No. 4141, 4142, 4143, 4195, 4599, 4597, and 4600, and say that all these timber berths are green timber. They are not fire-killed timber berths, railway ties have been cut off most of them and delivered as green railway ties to Hett and Sibbald, Limited.

J. H. Marshall.

Then I have a document from Frederick Cleve Jackson of Loon Lake, farmer, who says:

1. That I have visited and cruised the timber in all township 64, in range 25, west of the third meridian in the province of Saskatchewan.

2. That all the timber in the said township is green timber.

3. That the so-called fire-killed timber berths cover the N.E. and S.W. of 34; all sections 35, 36 and 27, the S.W. of 26; the W. half of 23; W. half of 14; all 22 and 15; all 21, 28, 33; the N.E. and S.W. of 32; the N.W. of 34; the S.E. of 20; the N.W. of 16; the N.W. of 17; the N.W. of 18; the S.E. of 19, the S.E. and N.W. of 30; S.E. of 31 in the said township and range incorrectly describes the said timber.

4. That the said township 64, in range 25 west of the third meridian is unsurveyed territory and the timber berths covering the various sections and quarter-sections in the said township and range are not designated by a survey, and cannot be distinguished from other sections and quarter-sections in the said township.

I understand the permit granted for the particular berths to which I have just referred was given to this firm prior to the last federal election. Most of these berths are in the constituency of North Battleford, a few of them in that of Prince Albert. I have listened many times recently to the hon. member for North Battleford when he has been speaking in the house. He is greatly concerned about those who support him in his constituency.

Mr. McINTOSH: Who told my hon. friend that?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): He is very much concerned about the people who support him. I can tell him that he was defeated in almost every town along the railroad in his constituency, but when he got into the backwoods the people who supported him were those who took out these railroad ties at starvation wages for the contractor. But they will never do it again.

Mr. McINTOSH: My hon. friend will never be returned again either.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I want to read from the evidence in a case which was heard in Battleford.

Mr. VALLANCE: North Battleford.

Mr. McINTOSH: He does not know one from the other.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): My hon. friend knows an institution that is located in Battleford.

Mr. McINTOSH: And my hon. friend ought to be in it.

Mr. MacMILLAN: And I can say without much fear of contradiction that he may find himself there shortly.

I read now from the evidence of J. H. Marshall taken on oath on examination for discovery at Battleford last year in a timber case:

Q. Did you endeavour to get a contract direct?
A. No.
Q. You never had?
A. No.
Q. During the years 1927, 1928 and 1929?
A. Yes. In the latter part of the year I called—
Q. What year?
A. 1929.
Q. Where?
A. At Montreal.
Q. Whom did you inquire from?
A. I was going through there and I inquired when them contracts would be given out.
Q. Whom did you inquire from?
A. To the office of the Canadian National Railways.
Q. Whom did you see?
A. I saw one of the clerks there.
Q. Did you know who he was?
A. No. He just asked me what I wanted and I asked him about the contracts and he told me that at that time in order to get a contract you had to speak to the sitting member in the House of Commons for North Battleford. . . . I went there and inquired for a contract and he advised me the best way out of that was to see C. R. McIntosh. That is what he advised me to do.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 2, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

I have received with great pleasure the address you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament, and thank you for it sincerely.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. R. C. MATTHEWS (Toronto East Centre) presented the first report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce, as follows:

[Mr. F. R. MacMillan.]

The select standing committee on banking and commerce begs leave to submit its first report, as follows:

Your committee begs leave to submit the following recommendations:

1. That your committee have leave to print its proceedings and evidence taken, from day to day, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.
2. That the quorum of your committee be reduced from 15 to 10 members.

PRIVILEGE— MR. STEWART (EDMONTON)

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): On a question of privilege, yesterday in the course of his remarks on the motion then before the house the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) made reference to contracts that were entered into by the previous government during the time I was Minister of the Interior and had charge of the department. I notice that these remarks are supported by affidavits by one Mr. Marshall, and a number of names are mentioned which I will not take the time of the house reading. I simply want to state that, so far as my administration of the department was concerned, once in a very great while we had individuals who did not live up to their contracts. This questions the integrity of the officials who were in charge and makes rather grave statements with respect to the matter. It is asserted that the Department of the Interior, over which I presided at that time as minister, must have had some arrangement with the railway company. I desire to deny emphatically that I ever had any arrangement with the Canadian National Railways or anyone else with respect to the sale of ties. I wish also to deny emphatically that I was aware of the allegations contained in the statement made by the hon. gentleman and to say to him, to the house and to my successor that I hope every assistance will be given towards the carrying on of an investigation. This investigation would have to be conducted by the Saskatchewan government who are now in control of the resources mentioned therein.

DEBTS DUE TO THE CROWN

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 25, respecting debts due to the crown.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to secure statutory authority to confirm a practice which has obtained in the past whereby when sums of money are owing to the federal government by provincial governments, municipalities, corporations, public offices, companies or private persons who are entitled to receive sums of money from the government, the Minister of Justice, when he is of the opinion that such a body or individual who may be entitled to receive money under statutory authority is indebted to the Dominion government, may retain the amount of such indebtedness from the statutory commitment. The effect of this bill will be to take from the department the responsibility which it has hitherto exercised and will place it in the governor in council upon the recommendation of the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will this apply to income tax?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. RALSTON:

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure authorized in the province of Nova Scotia for federal public works to be paid for under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized, (b) the amount expended.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure for contribution to works being constructed or contributed to by the provincial or municipal authorities in the province of Nova Scotia under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized; (b) the amount expended.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure for direct relief in the province of Nova Scotia under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized; (b) the amount expended.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a return showing the pay sheets of men employed on the breakwater on the south side of Cape Sable Island, in connection with the expenditure of moneys during the last six months under the Unemployment Relief Act of last session.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a return showing the pay sheets and vouchers in connection with moneys spent in the last six months on the wharf on the west side of Port Dufferin, Halifax county.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a return showing the pay sheets in connection with the repairs of the breakwater at West Baccaro carried on during the year 1931.

Mr. SPEAKER: Numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 stand by arrangement.

Mr. RALSTON: Numbers 1, 2 and 3 were to stand. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) has, I think, no objection to allowing numbers 4, 5 and 6 to pass. They refer only to individual works and as I understand the situation, they are not matters that would be contained in the report which will be brought down as to the working out of the Unemployment Relief Act.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think the information which my hon. friend desires will be found in the return which will be tabled and will be very complete, so I suggest that he allow these to stand like the others, and if the information is not satisfactory I shall supplement it.

Motions stand.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, ST. HYACINTHE, QUE.

Mr. FONTAINE:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, letters and all other documents, exchanged between the Minister of Labour, all members of the cabinet or officials of any federal department and the city of St. Hyacinthe or other persons, in connection with the work to relieve unemployment and the help granted to unemployed, and especially as regards the construction of a tunnel under the Canadian National Railways, at St. Hyacinthe, since January 1, 1931.

Mr. GORDON: With respect to this motion I would ask that it stand until the return is made so far as the Department of Labour is concerned, because I feel that at least some of the information will be contained in the report that will be tabled, and if all the information is not there, then the department will be glad to supplement the return.

Motion stands.

WHARF AT BARACHOIS, N.B.

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of the pay sheets in connection with construction of a wharf at Barachois, Aboujagan river, county of Westmorland, New Brunswick, and a return showing: (a) the names of the men employed, and their respective wages since the work was undertaken to date; (b) the quantity of stone and lumber purchased, from whom purchased and the prices paid for such material; (c) the amount expended to date; (d) to whom cheques were sent in payment of wages and material; (e) whether or not the expenditure was made under the Unemployment Relief Act; (f) whether or not the work was done under contract or by days' work.

Mr. GORDON: The same observations that I made with respect to the previous notice of motion, apply to this one and numbers, 10, 13, 14, 35 and 36. For the information of the house, I believe I shall be able to table, before the end of this week or Monday of next week, the return required under the act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will that be before the legislation of which notice has been given is discussed in the house? So far as I am concerned there are standing in my name two motions for orders in council and regulations enacted under the statute of last session, which statute it is sought to extend. I think the house is entitled to have those orders in council. I am asking, not for any correspondence or reports or documents, but for orders in council and regulations.

Motion stands.

IMPORTATION OF OIL OR OIL PRODUCTS

Mr. YOUNG:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between any or all of the Canadian oil refining companies and any department of the government, since May 1, 1930, in regard to the importation of oil or oil products.

Mr. RHODES: There is no objection to this motion passing subject to this reservation, that, in conformity with the practice established in such cases, any letters, papers, documents or memoranda which are confidential in their character shall not be produced.

Mr. YOUNG: What are we going to consider as confidential?

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATIONS OF WOOD FOR MOTOR CAR MANUFACTURE

Mr. McGIBBON:

For a return showing: (1) The amount of lumber; (a) hardwood; (b) softwood, imported into Canada during the past year by the manufacturers of motor cars and trucks; (2) The number of motor car or truck bodies or frames, either wholly or partly made of wood, imported into Canada during the past year, showing the rate of duty, the amount collected, the kind of wood and the prices f.o.b. at the mills.

Motion stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

Mr. LAPOINTE:

For a copy of all orders and regulations of the governor in council made under the act, chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, for relieving distress and providing employment.

Mr. BENNETT: Just before this motion is declared carried, lest my hon. friend assume that his statement, not having been referred to, is accepted, I cannot say that all this information can be brought down before I move the resolution, because I apprehend it will be a very considerable task to secure all the orders in council, which are involved. Every time a payment was made to a province under the provisions of the agreement, an order in council was passed. There is a large number of orders in council with respect to every province in connection with these matters and

I cannot promise that they will all be brought down before the motion standing in my name is proceeded with. If there are any particular ones my hon. friend would mention, I shall try to see that they are sent to him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should like everything, but of course this depends on the explanations which my right hon. friend will give. May we assume he will give a full report?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall.

Motion agreed to.

WHARF, BAY DU VIN, NORTHUMBERLAND, N.B.

Mr. VENIOT:

For a return showing a copy of pay sheets connected with repairs to the wharf, Bay du Vin, county of Northumberland, as well as accounts for material.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I suggest that this motion and also numbers 18, 19 and 20 stand pending the bringing down of the return under the Unemployment Relief Act.

Mr. VENIOT: This is a motion asking for a copy of the pay sheets and the return submitted under the act will not contain that information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Perhaps it will contain the information the hon. member desires.

Mr. VENIOT: If the minister will say that it will, I shall be glad.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have no objection to allowing the order to pass and if the return covers it, all right; if not, I shall supplement it.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—KAMOURASKA COUNTY

On the motion of Mr. Bouchard:

For a return showing the various projects and programs, including pay sheets, if any, carried on under the federal unemployment relief work, at Ste-Anne-de-la-Pocatiere, Kamouraska county, Quebec, during the calendar year, 1931.

Mr. GORDON: I feel sure that all the information asked for in this notice of motion will appear in the return, and if there is not any special reason for supplying the information sooner I would ask that the motion stand so that the staff can devote their time towards the preparation of the report.

Motion stands.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

On the motion of Mr. Gobeil:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take the necessary steps to amend the Bankruptcy Act, and make provision so that the whole act shall not apply to wage earners, and to persons engaged solely in farming or the tillage of the soil.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order in regard to this motion. To my recollection this motion has been twice called during the present session and has not been proceeded with. Under the rule of this house, standing order 52:

When a private member's notice of motion shall have been twice called from the chair and not proceeded with, it shall be dropped, provided that it may be placed at the foot of the list on the order paper upon motion made after due notice.

I do not want to embarrass or inconvenience my hon. friend who seeks to move this motion, but there is the rule, and as I happen to be introducing within a day or two a bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act which will deal with this particular matter, I think we should follow the rule and that this order should be dropped from the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is a fact that the resolution has been called twice, and I take it that the Minister of Justice has satisfied himself on that point, it is improperly on the order paper and must be dropped.

Motion dropped.

Mr. GOBEIL: As I was absent at only one sitting on Monday I did not think the motion would be called, but as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has said that the question will be discussed later, I am satisfied.

Mr. SPEAKER: That does not make the slightest difference.

Mr. GOBEIL: As the hon. member—

Mr. SPEAKER: On the objection taken that the proposed resolution is out of order, the motion is struck off the order paper and is not now before the house, or debatable.

Mr. GOBEIL: I accept Your Honour's ruling, but I should like to say that as long as—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

CANADIAN CURRENCY

PROPOSAL TO ISSUE IN BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

On the motion of Mr. Boulanger:

That, in the opinion of this house, in order to well establish that the population of Canada is bilingual and that the country was settled by two great races, it is desirable that Canadian currency should be in both official languages of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: The same objection applies to the resolution now before us. It was on the order paper, called twice and dropped, and should not have been restored except in accordance with the provisions of the standing order just quoted in connection with the preceding motion. Standing order No. 52, subsection (1) is as follows:

When a private member's notice of motion shall have been twice called from the chair and not proceeded with, it shall be dropped, provided that it may be placed at the foot of the list on the order paper upon motion made after due notice.

In regard to this resolution and the one that has just been considered there has been no motion before the house, or agreed to by the house, to restore either of them to the order paper. Therefore they are improperly on the order paper and must go off.

Mr. BOULANGER: It is true my motion has been on the order paper twice, but I gave notice of motion in accordance with standing order No. 52, and my notice of motion appeared in the votes and proceedings of the house. The motion was restored to the order paper at the foot of the list, in accordance with the rules and after due notice of motion; the Clerk of the House can testify to the correctness of my statements.

Mr. SPEAKER: The notice was of the motion, but the motion never came before the house and never was dealt with. The Clerk of the House informs me that in the past when motions have been dropped the practice has been just to put them back on the order paper when the notice is put in the votes and proceedings. That however does not follow the rules of the house. No order has been restored to the order paper on my instruction by that method; it is an incorrect procedure, and must not be followed.

Mr. BOULANGER: I drafted a notice of motion in accordance with standing order No. 52, and followed closely its wording. I sent my notice of motion to the Clerk of the House, and if the rules have not been followed I am not at fault and should not be made to suffer.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret exceedingly that the hon. members who sponsored this and the preceding motion are inconvenienced, but I must say that the motion now before us does not comply with the rules of the house. It is undoubtedly true that the hon. member responsible for this motion did give notice, but that was as far as it went. There is no record of a motion to restore the resolution to the order paper; such a motion has never been submitted to, or dealt with by the house. Until the house has expressed itself in favour of restoring the motion to the order paper it cannot be considered.

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for the actions of an officer of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not pretend to hold the hon. member responsible, and it is still open to him or to any other hon. member whose resolution or motion has been dropped to have it restored to the order paper in the regular and proper manner.

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Motion dropped.

COOPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH

USE OF NATURAL RESOURCES IN THE INTERESTS OF THE PEOPLE

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

Whereas under our present economic arrangement large numbers of our people are unemployed and without the means of earning a livelihood for themselves and their dependents:

And whereas the prevalence of the present depression throughout the world indicates fundamental defects in the existing economic system;

Be it therefore resolved: That, in the opinion of this house the government should immediately take measures looking to the setting up of a cooperative commonwealth in which all natural resources and the socially necessary machinery of production will be used in the interests of the people and not for the benefit of the few.

He said: Mr. Speaker, that we are facing a serious depression, indeed a crisis, will I think be admitted by all hon. members in the house, and by the public generally. It is useless for me to say anything further in that regard. I suppose however that a great many hon. members are inclined to take the position that the present depression is very temporary; we have been told on all sides that prosperity lies just around the corner. A great many of our most thoughtful people however, and certainly many of our economists, are beginning seriously to consider whether or not prosperity is assured and whether there is any prospect of a return to what has been called normalcy.

It seems to me it must be conceded that whatever the future may be, at the present time our economic system is failing to function. There are hundreds of thousands of people in this country destitute, having to depend upon public assistance for the very necessities of life, and there are many business men at their wits end to know what to do next. Under such conditions we might very well spend a little time in considering whether the present basis of our economic system is sound. I quite admit that the fact we are passing through a depression does not necessarily mean that there are fundamental defects in our system. It may be that those defects are temporary; I should like to suggest however that since there are similar defects and similar conditions in almost every country of the world to-day there is at least a presumption that the same sort of disease is prevalent all over the world.

In the February issue of Harpers magazine a very interesting article entitled The Fallacy of Profits, by Henry Pratt Fairchild, was recently called to my attention. In this article, which I should like to have summarized, but for which I will not have time, there is a very clear presentation of the inherent difficulties of our present profit system.

Remember that after all the existing system is comparatively new. As many hon. members may not have read extensively concerning our economic history may I be permitted to point out that for very many centuries in medieval Europe the great majority of the people lived on small farms which they cultivated with comparatively simple machinery, managing thereby to earn a livelihood for themselves and their families. That was not a condition under which any could grow rich, but nevertheless they managed to exist. In addition to the farming or peasant population there arose a class of people engaged in small handicrafts, and in every district there would be a village in which would be located a blacksmith, a carpenter, a weaver, a shoemaker, and so on, who made sufficient goods for the immediate locality and exchanged these for the farm products of their neighbours. Then there came what historians know as the industrial revolution, when the larger tool—the machine—was discovered and mechanical power was applied to what to-day we call manufacturing. That machine has been expanded until we have the wonderful industrial plants with which we are familiar all over Europe and America.

On the basis of the machine there has grown up a very, very extensive organization through which we produce enormous quantities of goods and distribute them all over the world. As a later development or addition to the earlier machine of production and distribution, we have our modern financial mechanism. Under this new system we have the ownership and control vested very largely in the hands of a few individuals. That new system is coming to be known pretty generally as the system of capitalism. This system, as I say, is comparatively recent. We may say it is a hundred or a hundred and fifty years old as developed in England, it is a much more recent development in most of the other countries of Europe, and it is only beginning to come into operation in such countries as China and Japan.

Undoubtedly this capitalist system has a great many achievements to its credit. It has enabled us to produce goods at a rate and to an extent undreamed of in the earlier days. In fact I think it is generally conceded that under this system the problem of production is very largely solved. A few years ago we used to be greatly troubled with the thought that population was increasing far more rapidly than the means of subsistence. To-day we hear very little of that. We believe that at the present time we are able not only to feed the people born into the world, but more than that, to provide for them a great number of the amenities of life. Undoubtedly the general standard of living has been substantially raised under this system.

On the other hand, within the last few years we are beginning to question very seriously the foundation of this system, and to ask whether there are not some inherent defects in it. You may say that since the system worked for a hundred years it may be assumed that it will continue to work. I do not think we can take that for granted. Let me give an illustration. In the early days of the west when speculation was rife it was all very well for A to buy a lot for $100 and sell it to B for $200, for B to sell it for $300 to C, for C to sell it for $400 to D, for D to sell it for $500 to E. So the merry process went on, everybody making money and everybody happy, until it came to the end man, who could not unload. Suddenly that system of speculation came to an end. It worked for a while, but there came a period when it ceased to function. In my judgment that is about the position of the capitalist system to-day. As long as there were external markets a country like England, which was the first in the race, might dispose of her surplus goods. The system developed and the markets kept expanding, so the opportunities for disposing of the surplus product increased with the development of the system. The few people who owned the machine were able to pay back in wages to their employees only a part of what was produced; the balance was retained by them and put back into the industry. As Mr. Maynard Keynes says so well in the introductory chapter of his book The Economic Consequences of the Peace, it was understood that the capitalist was under obligation to put his profits back into industry.

The employers have been doing that, and it has worked for a while, but since the system has extended to other countries, we have now reached the stage where there seems to be a surplus of capital—that is, a surplus that awaits investment in the machinery of production. We have reached the stage where the great mass of the people do not seem to be in a position to buy back what has been produced. So our machine is very largely stalled at the present time. It is quite true that if we had another great war and had to send large quantities of goods in the form of ammunition, clothing and food to the soldiers at the front—these men, of course, having been withdrawn from industry—we might have a period of prosperity. That is what happened in 1914 when economic developments had almost put us in the desperate position of unemployment we occupy to-day. In one sense the war saved the situation and gave us a breathing spell, for our unemployed were occupied at the front, and those who did not become soldiers were employed in producing munitions, clothing and food for the army, a great impetus was given to industry, and its effect continued into the post-war period. Now we are back again to pre-war conditions and the whole world is suffering under this great curse of unemployment, due to overproduction and overdevelopment—or more properly underconsumption.

Speaking of war, may I remind the house that the unregulated competition in which private individuals and great corporations have been engaged is in itself probably the prime cause of modern war. When we cannot get rid of our goods at home we have to ship them to foreign markets, and so there has been a race all over the world for foreign markets and for the sources of raw material. I think that the struggle between nations for economic advantage has undoubtedly been one of the major causes of modern warfare.

In recent years we have proceeded on the supposition that the profit motive was essential in order to get the best results from those engaged in industry and finance. I am not sure that we can all continue to agree with that view. As a matter of fact a great many of our best citizens must carry on without the profit motive. Our educationalists do not work under the profit motive; they receive a salary, but they do not go into their academic work with the idea of making fortunes. Scientists are not influenced by any profit motive; they desire a reasonable salary, but they do their best work without any idea of building up a fortune.

Mr. POULIOT: Politicians are in the same class.

Mr. WOODSWORTH Certainly they cannot build up a fortune, although some may be promoted to the senate or to the bench. But undoubtedly a great proportion of our people have had to do their best work in the world without the hope of building up a fortune. Only one class of people, those engaged in business, have been inclined to hold the idea: If you will not let us have the incentive of building up a fortune, we will not play the game. I should not like to think that that is going to be a permanent attitude on their part. There seems to be no reason why men who are organizers of big concerns and responsible for the finances of this country should not be actuated by other than purely mercenary motives or a desire for the power which comes through the possession of wealth. As a matter of fact a great number of people engaged in industry and commerce, even under the present system, have no profit incentive to keep them going. When a man starts work in a factory to-day he knows he cannot be manager of that factory, at least the chances are very remote. A man engaged in any mercantile business to-day can hardly hope to be an independent storekeeper, nor can the man engaged in the banking business hope to own a bank. It is becoming more and more difficult, and so we find that the motive of private gain is not the one that induces most of us to go along from day to day.

There have been certain other results which I think are not quite so satisfactory as that of increased production. There has gradually developed throughout the whole of Europe and perhaps more particularly on the North American continent what might almost be termed industrial feudalism; a few of the great captains of industry or money barons practically control the whole situation. I wish I had time to describe the company towns which exist in some parts of the northern sections of Ontario and Quebec, but which I have seen in their most aggravated form in the province of British Columbia where there is one big owner or manager of one great corporation that owns the entire townsite. The plants or factories are in the centre—pulp works, let us say—and in addition the company owns the houses, the stores and everything else, and they alone can construct schools or churches. Such aggregations of people are known as one-man towns. The company controls the whole situation and they have a power such as was exercised by no feudal baron in the early days. There is no real freedom of speech in such towns, no real freedom of action; everyone is subservient to the one great corporation as represented in the manager of the town. But to a considerable extent our whole industrial life to-day is the same thing: that is to say, there are very few people who are absolutely free to speak out their own thoughts and to live their own lives. They are not economically free. That is not a desirable thing from the standpoint of society at large. It may be that we can produce largely, but if it means that we have degenerated into a race of well fed slaves, then I say it is not a good thing for the community.

Mr. BOURASSA: And not always well fed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As my hon. friend from Labelle observes, they are not always well fed. In the old days it was in the interests of the slave owner to maintain his slaves in good condition. To-day, the employer when slack times come turns his employees loose to browse for themselves, to find a living as best they can, becoming dependent upon the municipality, the province or the federal government. Certainly they are not well fed. So that we have a feudalism that lacks all the responsibilities which the feudal barons of old were accustomed to assume—feudalism without the corresponding responsibility. And in the larger world outside, that has meant international anarchy. It is a lamentable thing that most of the countries of Europe have extended their business interests into the various countries of the world, and with them the flag has followed trade. I think that has been the trouble. I should like to think that the time is coming when we shall not be held responsible as a nation for safeguarding the investments of individuals who go into any part of the country without any authority from their own government, and yet demand the protection of that government.

In that connection it is lamentable indeed that within the last few days some of our own men who have been engaged in the air service have been let out; and, finding themselves with nothing to do, they are now willing to sell themselves to almost any country that will employ their services. They simply become mercenaries; and since their trade has gone, of bringing sudden death to others —because after all, so far as the military aspect of it is concerned, that is what it amounts to when they drop bombs upon people—they are willing to sell their services to some other country. It strikes me as a horrible thing that our own, well brought up Canadian boys should be obliged to do anything of that kind.

One of the best statements I have come across of the present situation is contained in the encyclical of Pope Pius XI, and I shall read from this because I know that a very considerable number of hon. gentlemen belong to the Roman Catholic church. I am sure I could not quote for them a greater authority than the pope's encyclical. Let me read:

> Towards the close of the nineteenth century the new economic methods and the new development of industry had sprung into being in almost all civilized nations, and had made such headway that human society appeared more and more divided into two classes. The first, small in numbers, enjoyed practically all the comforts so plentifully supplied by modern invention. The second class, comprising the immense multitude of workingmen, was made up of those who, oppressed by dire poverty, struggled in vain to escape from the straits which encompassed them.
> This state of things was quite satisfactory to the wealthy, who looked upon it as the consequence of inevitable and natural economic laws, and who, therefore, were content to abandon to charity alone the full care of relieving the unfortunate, as though it were the task of charity to make amends for the open violation of justice, a violation not merely tolerated, but sanctioned at times by legislators. On the other hand, the working classes, victims of these harsh conditions, submitted to them with extreme reluctance, and became more and more unwilling to bear the galling yoke. . . . The immense number of propertyless wage-earners on the one hand, and the superabundant riches of the fortunate few on the other, is an unanswerable argument that the earthly goods so abundantly produced in this age of industrialism are far from rightly distributed and equitably shared among the various classes of men. . . . In the first place, then, it is patent that in our days not alone is wealth accumulated, but immense power and despotic economic domination is concentrated in the hands of a few, and that those few are frequently not the owners, but only the trustees and directors of invested funds, who administer them at their good pleasure. . . . This accumulation of power, the characteristic note of the modern economic order, is a natural result of limitless free competition which permits the survival of those only who are the strongest, which often means those who fight most relentlessly, who pay least heed to the dictates of conscience.

I have given an authority that may appeal to members of the Roman Catholic Church. One of the most outstanding utterances among the Protestant bodies is that which has come from the Alberta conference of the United Church of Canada. I believe it was read in 1930, and I shall now quote three or four paragraphs from it:

> We believe that in harmony with the teachings of Jesus, we should proceed as rapidly as possible to the creation of an order based on cooperation and service, which would displace the present competitive, acquisitive social order.
> In the centre of the thinking of Jesus was "Man and his needs"; as a contrast, up to the present, the central feature of the economic system is profit.
>
> The present system has now been under trial for a sufficient period to lend itself to fair criticism, and the present unhappy condition of overproduction, underconsumption, unemployment and attendant uncertainties, is its condemnation.
> We are convinced that in the Father's world there is sufficient abundance of necessary commodities to meet the needs of his children. The demand of our day is to bring these commodities under Christian control and distribution; a result which finance under private control as a connecting link between production and consumption, has failed to secure.

There you have leaders in both the Roman Catholic Church and one of the outstanding Protestant churches coming out flatfooted to question the very foundation of our present economic order and to suggest a change along the very lines which I have included in my resolution—indeed the wording is almost identical. The attitude of labour is well known. I have tried to give it on other occasions but I will not discuss it at length to-day. Labour has wakened up before some other bodies, not because labour necessarily has more brains but because labour has been the under dog and has been first hit. More recently, during these times of depression, the farmers are waking up; the small business men are waking up; the professional men are waking up, and we are having protests from quarters heretofore silent. I have mentioned the farmers; some of them here can speak for themselves. I have before me a copy of the minutes of the last annual convention of the United Farmers of Manitoba, held in Brandon, November 17, 18 and 19, 1931. The following is one of the resolutions passed at that convention:

> That the ultimate objective in the opinion of the United Farmers of Manitoba, the present economic crisis is due to inherent unsoundness of the capitalistic control of production and distribution that involves the payment of rent, interest and profit, we recognize that social ownership and cooperative production, for use, is the only sound economic system.

Another resolution is in these terms

> Resolved that with a view to security of land tenure this annual convention of the United Farmers of Manitoba adopt the principle of nationalization of land.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

When we have a convention of farmers talking about land nationalization, it seems to me that it is high time that some other sections of the community give consideration to these radical social proposals.

Mr. WILLIS: Was that resolution adopted?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was moved by W. S. Gable and seconded by R. Doyle, and was carried.

Mr. MULLINS: Who seconded the resolution?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. R. Doyle.

Mr. MULLINS: I would advise the hon. member that this man Doyle comes from my constituency and he is an absolute radical.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I congratulate the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) on having a radical in his community.

Mr. MULLINS: I am a member of that organization and I did not have anything to do with that resolution.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was quoting from the official minutes of that convention. I come now to Saskatchewan and I find that the united farmers of that province have adopted a provincial economic policy to the effect that no more provincial lands or resources be alienated and that no more homesteads be granted or farm lands sold, but that "use leases" be instituted and that all land and resources now privately owned be nationalized as rapidly as opportunity will permit.

The farmers of Alberta are fairly well represented in this house and can speak for themselves, but I notice that in a report presented at their last convention, at which I had the privilege of attending, they give a definition of the cooperative commonwealth. This definition is as follows:

> A community freed from the domination of irresponsible financial and economic power, in which all social means of production and distribution, including land, are socially owned and controlled either by voluntarily organized groups of producers and consumers or—in the case of the major public services and utilities and such productive and distributive enterprises as can be conducted most efficiently when owned in common—by public corporations responsible to the people's elected representatives.

This is the definition given by a great body of Alberta farmers. When we find leading people in the churches, leading people in the great farming bodies as well as in labour, urging some sort of change in our present economic system, the representatives in parliament cannot very well refuse to take the proposal into serious consideration.

Our problem may be reduced to very simple terms. In production we need natural resources; we need the equipment to work those natural resources and under our present financial system we need capital; we need labour, whether muscular or mental, the labour of hand or brain.

Mr. YOUNG: Does the hon. member distinguish between the second and third factors, equipment and capital?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I referred to financial capital; under our financial system we need financial capital.

Mr. YOUNG: Would not equipment be considered as capital?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is in the strictly economic sense but it is not what we call financial capital. This brings in the money question. Let me illustrate for the benefit of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) and other hon. members who may be interested. If we want to produce anything out in the country, we need good soil; we need some equipment, whether spade or plough, and we need the labour of the man at the other end of the plough. Then we need something which will tide us over until our crops are matured. In the old western days this used to be called a grubstake. If we want to go fishing, we must have the fishing areas, be they ocean, bay or lake; we must have our equipment, such as nets and so on, and we must have the labour of the man who has some knowledge of fishing. Then, in addition, we need advances which will enable us to carry on until the fish are caught.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And we need the fish.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The same thing is true of our coal mines. We must first have the coal areas, then the labour and the machinery, and under our present financial system we must have financial capital. The contention has been raised by the hon. members for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) that there is a scarcity of this financial capital.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We know there is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think that is a sufficient answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Weyburn.

We have these four necessary factors in abundance in Canada. Every after-dinner speaker, every one who goes over to the old country boasts of our wonderful timber lands, our wonderful mines and our minerals and fisheries. These men wax eloquent in a description of our resources, but I shall not take up the time of the house in attempting to follow their example. We have the equipment and we have the mining machinery to produce almost three times the amount required for consumption. We have great sawmills and we have the railroads to carry our material. Roughly speaking, I should say that we have the equipment available to produce almost three times what we are producing to-day.

Mr. BOURASSA: And to transport it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have this machinery of production and distribution, but yet we are in trouble. Our present system has developed to the point where a comparatively small number of men, either directly or indirectly, control the natural resources, the equipment, and the financial capital and labour is unable to get at these things. Our private ownership has developed from the small beginning where many men were in control to a point where one man is able to control great corporations and direct the destiny of hundreds and thousands of his fellow employees. In the old days finance was in the hands of the many; our savings used to be kept in a stocking or hidden away behind a brick in the fireplace, and when our friends needed a little assistance we were able to give it. To-day our system of banks has developed to a point where everyone makes his deposit in the banks, and the man requiring a loan is forced to go to these institutions who have control not only of the actual deposits but of the credit of the people based thereon. We have available a marvellous system of production but we cannot use it to its full capacity. Indeed, many cannot gain access to it at all.

I sometimes think it is like a vacant lot. No one is using it and it could be utilized to grow raspberries. There are plenty of spare raspberry canes but the man who owns the vacant lot will not permit it to be used and the man who possesses the extra raspberry canes will not hand them over. They are afraid that the raspberries grown on the vacant lot will enter into competition with their product. We have got into the habit of thinking that our productivity is limited and we continue to economize, whereas the resources of this great machine which we have built up are almost unlimited. Instead of denying our people the right to eat, or at least to eat as much as they need; instead of denying them the right to wear respectable clothes, because we say we cannot pay dividends; we are too poor, and so on, we should be pouring out these things. Then we would start the machinery going again. I would urge: This productive-distributional machine has to be socialized. You ask: How? There are those who say: Go and seize it. That is a rather crude way of dealing with the situation, but it may come to that if it cannot be taken in any other way. There are many proposals as to how the transition to the new order may be made. I hold in my hand a book published thirteen years ago by Sidney and Beatrice Webb—a Constitution for the Socialist Commonwealth of Great Britain. This is the plan for a proposed British socialist commonwealth. If anyone wishes to see the steps whereby this could be brought about in Great Britain, I would recommend that he read this book by Lord Passfield who has outlined the developments by which this might be brought about. But unfortunately men are not always actuated by reason and they do not act step by step, so we do not know just what the next development will be.

I want to devote myself for the few minutes that remain to me to some of the objections that are constantly being raised. For example, we are told that the new arrangement would interfere with the rights of private property. I go back to the papal encyclical, in which I read:

> It is rightly contended that certain forms of property must be reserved to the state, since they carry with them an opportunity of domination too great to be left to private individuals without injury to the community at large.

Surely that is clear and the position a reasonable one. Another quotation:

> History proves that the right of ownership, like other elements of social life, is not absolutely rigid.

Anyone who knows anything about the way in which the crown lands of this country have been alienated, will understand that those who now hold them have very slim rights, so far as ethics are concerned, to the lands which they now occupy. Anyone who knows how the great water powers of this country, including Beauharnois, have been obtained, will not be very sure that the present owners are the rightful ones. Anyone who knows how railway charters were obtained in this country a few years ago may very well question the foundations of present ownership of private property. If anyone wants to take the trouble to find out how the private fortunes of Canada were created I think he might read what is now an old book by Gustavus Myers, History of Canadian Wealth, which was written some time ago and was suppressed during the war, which shows how the private wealth of the earlier wealthy people of this country was built up.

Then again we are warned that anything in the way of socialization would mean the banishment of private initiative. As a matter of fact I doubt whether the majority of our people, under our modern industrial system, have very much chance to exercise private initiative. They are simply hewers of wood and drawers of water. Under our present system we shall always have men who can never be anything else; but if we establish a cooperative commonwealth, they will play their part; they will have their share, and there will be a greater opportunity for the development of their initiative.

The question may be asked: Will such a plan work? That can be determined only by trial. What I want to point out is that the present system is not working and the onus of proof rests upon the apologists for the present system. What I want to do is to urge upon the house that we give serious consideration to developing another system. I do not say that this can be done overnight, but every time we develop the cooperative principle in industry, we go one step towards bringing about a cooperative commonwealth; every time we allow public ownership to replace private ownership and to be operated under democratic auspices, we take another step toward a cooperative commonwealth; every time we allow more authority and control to be given to employees, we come one step nearer a cooperative commonwealth. Every time we take wealth away from the superwealthy and thus make a more equitable distribution, we are bringing about a more stable state of affairs and are taking a step towards the cooperative commonwealth.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, anyone who has worked on the farm or in the factory or in the office or, for that matter, in any vocation in life, knows that in order to make a success of any line he may enter, he must adhere to proven, practical principles. We have before us to-day a resolution which states:

> And whereas the prevalence of the present depression throughout the world indicates fundamental defects in the existing economic system.

After stating that, it continues:

Be it therefore resolved: that, in the opinion of this house the government should immediately take measures looking to the setting up of a cooperative commonwealth.

And so forth. If this resolution be adopted, it will of course revolutionize the present economic system, and therefore some other economic system would have to be substituted for it. When I was a boy going to high school —and I suppose other hon. members have had similar experiences—every now and then we would have debates, and I remember one debate in which the resolution was: "Resolved that the higher we get, the fewer." Whatever that means or whatever it meant when I was a boy, I do not recall. We have had in this house and out of it debates that have not had much more behind them than that resolution.

In every period of economic distress—and I rather think the term "economic distress" is a misnomer; there is nothing wrong with the economic system and I think the term should be "economic dislocation"—there have not been found wanting men here, there and everywhere throughout the land who will advocate what might be called social reform or social revolution or upheaval of some sort. Like most businessmen I have had something to do with the building up of the economic fabric of this country. I have made a study of economics for many, many years, and from a long period of practical experience I have learned this, that if men are to succeed they must first be willing to work hard. I do not necessarily mean working hard with your hands any more than with your heads. But men must apply themselves diligently. Another requisite is that they must spend less than they earn, and lay by something either to provide for the rainy day or to make it possible to project themselves still further ahead in life.

Recent issues of Nation's Business have carried some illuminating articles on the economic dislocation—I will call it that—of the period around 1837, of the economic dislocation of 1857, and of the prolonged economic dislocation of 1873 to 1879, and I believe that the next issue will give an equally illuminating account of the troublous times from 1893 to 1897. There has not been anything said in this debate so far which has not been said in each one of those troublous times. There were just as many parades then as there are to-day or as there will be, and I have no doubt that there will be parades, and more of them, of one kind or another. These accounts in the Nation's Business tell of the slogans that were carried at the head of the parades in those days. In 1873 there was a great meeting held at the Cooper's Union, New York City, and there were placards reading as follows: "Civil rights are passed. Now for the rights of work."—"Freedom for labour. Death for Monopolies"—"We demand suspension of rent"—"When workmen begin to think, monopoly begins to tremble." We hear those same slogans to-day and will likely hear more of that kind in the future. There is nothing new in this whole agitation. But in every one of these depressions in the past the economic system overcame its dislocation and the world went on with its business again and prospered. I predict, Mr. Speaker, that the present economic dislocation will also end, and that the world will get on with its business in a businesslike manner.

Let me try and touch on a few of the causes of the economic dislocation as I see them and as I have read of them, because there have been many searching inquiries into the causes in different countries of the world for some time past. To a business man it is as clear as ABC, and when I say business men I do not confine myself to industry but take in the whole ambit of business, the professions, agriculture, in fact, the entire economic fabric of this country.

During the period of twenty years from 1899 to 1919, we find that the productivity of industry increased at about a normal rate. I am not now speaking of agriculture because I am not conversant with its productivity, but during that period the productivity of industry increased approximately ten per cent. That is, a man working in industry during that period was able to produce ten per cent more than a man working in industry prior to 1899. Prior to 1914, if I may refer to Europe for a moment, the great nations of Europe—Germany, France, Austria-Hungary, Great Britain and other countries, were all great producers of textiles, iron and steel, chemicals and other allied and additional lines. Not only that, but the great countries of Europe were exporters in all these lines. Germany, for instance, was not only a great exporter of manufactured goods in these and allied lines, but was a large producer and exporter of sugar. Likewise Russia was a large producer and exporter of sugar. Now what happened in 1914? When the war broke out, the great countries of Europe, instead of being exporters of all these lines of goods and scores of others that it is not necessary for me to mention, became importers. They could not produce enough for themselves; they had neither the equipment nor the man power to produce their requirements, and so they went out into the world and appealed to the farmers of America, north and south, to Asia, Africa and India, India being a part of Asia, and to Australia, and begged them to produce to the limit the different food commodities that Europe required, and further they asked the industrialists of all the world outside of Europe to go ahead and man their plants to the limit, to experiment, investigate, call in experts, produce the highest powered machines possible. Why? Because Europe required the equipment and could not produce her requirements herself. The result was that during the period from 1914 to 1918, and the reconstruction period following 1918, the world saw the greatest expansion of productivity in its history.

Reverting for a moment to the war period itself, America, as every member of this house knows, erected plants the like of which the world had not seen before. I have in mind a plant erected in Chicago for the turning out of steel plate. That plant turned out plate 120 inches wide. The demand was so great for the product that the people financing the industry formed a tandem association of plants consisting of ten plants whereby they were able to start their ingot at plant No. 1 and bring it out at plant No. 10 in any thickness desired. Any one familiar with the steel industry must know that heretofore the ingot had to go back and forth through the rolls until it was reduced to the desired thickness.

In 1918 the war ended and through necessity Europe returned to the production of its own requirements. Very quickly European plants overcame domestic demands and became exporters. So great were reconstruction requirements, however, after the year 1918 that all of the world plants were required to produce the necessary amount. There had to come an end, however, and that end did come. When it came, in January, 1929, the world found itself over-equipped, so far as the turning out of its requirements was concerned. That however was not a fault of the economic system; the system had nothing to do with that result. The war was at the root of the trouble. That great disaster clearly demonstrated that the best possible way to preserve the equilibrium of the world is to have no war; war itself is the greatest of destructors, and our present distress is a result of it. If we could but learn to follow the great admonition of the Prince of Peace, to live in harmony and peace together, we would go a long distance in preventing future economic dislocations.

There were other causes correlated with those I have enumerated. Never in the world's history, so far as the studies of chemistry, physics and mathematics were concerned, did men rise to the heights they attained from the years 1914 to 1929. The result was that from the standpoint of employment certain industries did not increase in demand. First let us consider the musicians. Every hon. member knows that only a few years ago it was difficult to secure the services of a musician; the demand was great for bands and orchestras. But along came the sound films, and the musicians found themselves out of employment. Certainly the economic system is not to blame for that; the change was brought about by an advance in physics and chemistry.

Let us consider the moulding industry, with which I am more familiar. I can remember very well when a plant in which I was particularly interested employed approximately 700. Along came the moulding machines, with the result that instead of 700 men only 125 were required. The same effect was found all through industry; yet the economic system cannot be blamed. Industry has advanced; we all know it must advance. Productivity in this country, if our industry will compete, must equal the productivity of other countries. Let us consider the painters who have been displaced through the use of the paint gun. To-day we see men painting fences and buildings with an apparatus which sprays the paint all over the surface to be covered. What about the carpenters? Probably they have not been largely displaced, but certainly the demand for their services has been considerably reduced because the windows for large buildings are made of steel, and the partitions of concrete. In other words, the advance in the use of steel and concrete as a direct result of chemical and physical research has displaced many carpenters throughout the world. Then, the stone masons were displaced through the use of the concrete mixing machine; bookkeepers and other factory office helpers have been displaced through machines which subtract, divide and keep correct accounts. We cannot tell where the end will be.

In these days we use automatic telephones. Consider the hundreds and thousands, and probably millions, of girls who have been displaced through the use of these automatic machines. On the other hand, many men and women have as a result of inventions been given employment. As I said before however, and now repeat, I do not think for one moment that anything like the number displaced have been reengaged in other lines. Certainly we know that many of them are not.

Two other reasons occur to me as at least partial causes for the present economic dislocation. Every hon. member knows that during the last ten years we have experienced an almost unbridled reign of stock speculators and high pressure salesmen who loaded the populace with investments, giving opportunities to pay over long periods of time. Such selling of stock was unsound, but our economic system had nothing to do with it. Such things can be regulated, but when a collapse occurs we must not blame our economic system. If one cared to review conditions as they are depicted in the New York press of the years 1873 to 1879 he might learn of the economic dislocation which took place in the United States at that time. I have heard men older than myself say that Canada suffered accordingly. Unfortunately the Canadian records are not accessible; at least I have not been able to find any. Nation's Business, however, contains a record of the appalling situation which obtained in the United States. Hundreds of thousands of men were thrown out of work; there were riots in the great cities. In Martinsburg and Pittsburgh, the militia called out joined the rioters, and regular troops had to be called into service. To-day no such condition exists. Thanks to the enactments introduced by the present government to relieve unemployment we have no such conditions in Canada, and I repeat, I do not expect they will become so acute. I do not expect we are going to have anything like the conditions which prevailed from 1873 to 1879—conditions worse by far than anything we are familiar with at the present time. But Canada recovered from that very serious depression, the world got back to business again, and we shall see a similar recovery from the present depression. To hasten that recovery we must have courage and do our best to keep business going and maintain the unity of the country.

The mover of the resolution did not specifically suggest any other system to overcome the present depression, but as I listened to him I could plainly see the cooperative commonwealth to which he referred was but another name for collectivism or the system now in operation in Russia. The Toronto Star Weekly of December 5 contains a very illuminating article on conditions in that country. It is written by a very able man and I am going to read a few extracts under the three or four heads into which the article divides itself. I do not for one moment contend that the condition depicted in the extracts I am now about to give to the house is the result of the economic system now functioning in Russia, nor would I say that the depression through which the world is now passing is the result of the fiscal policies which the various countries have in force. This, according to the writer, is what is taking place in Russia under their so-called cooperative system.

> Our first experience of things Russian was far from pleasant, though, having survived, we are inclined to think that in no more effective way could we have been brought into contact with the realities of Russian life.

The tourists having arrived in Russia, the writer says:

> We shall not soon forget the endless delays in securing tickets and the contradictory statements made by the various officials. Evidently untrained and inefficient people were running things.

How far are the new rulers equal to their tasks?

> On every side there are evidences of inefficiency. The purchase of a railway ticket is little less than an ordeal. The writing, the stamping, the cutting-off with scissors, the consultations, the being sent back and forward from one official to another—it is all most exasperating. Half of our time seemed to be spent in waiting—waiting for arrangements that did not come off; waiting for meals that were poor when at last they did arrive—such wretched service and at such outrageously high prices.

Now as to the stations: what were they like?

> About two o'clock in the morning we found ourselves and our baggage on the platform at Orscha. To our consternation we learned that the next train for Leningrad would not leave until noon. There was no hotel in the place. The floors of the large rooms and hallways of the station were simply packed with men and women and children and babies, lying huddled together or stretched across their huge bundles and boxes. They slept as best they could, awaking to change positions or to eat some of the black bread and sausage which they fished out of dirty-looking sacks. The air was stifling.

This is the writer's description of the trains:

> Two Austrian friends, with the help of a porter, undertook to secure us seats. They fought their way through a struggling mass of humanity and pulled and shoved us into a compartment. This compartment had seating accommodation for six people, but eleven of us were squeezed in, and others came in at intervals. We were fortunate, as many could find only standing-room in the corridor which runs along one side of the carriage.
> Above us were stacked the innumerable bundles and baskets that probably contained the food and bedding necessary for a sojourn in Leningrad. The windows and the door were kept tightly closed. We thought of the Black Hole of Calcutta, and wondered whether we could possibly survive the night. The sight of lunches being eaten under these conditions was almost too much for Canadian stomachs.

Here is his description of the street cars:

Then there were the over-crowded street cars. Sardines were never packed so tightly, and sardines do not hang out of the sides of the tins! It is a fight to gain a foot-hold on the lowest step. It is like a continuous rugby scrimmage to work one's way to the front of the car, and then there is a final fight to get through the exit doors.

As to the food, the writer says:

Everywhere, too, the long lines of people waiting for food, standing for hours and then likely only an insufficient supply.

With respect to waste the writer tells us:

These minor inconveniences and hardships are nothing to the enormous wastes of which every engineer complains. It is so often impossible to get materials and men when they are needed, even though there may be congestion at other points. There is often lack of coordination, endless red-tape, and all the other evils of a bureaucracy, and an untrained and doctrinaire bureaucracy at that.

In case it may be supposed that this was a trip taken at random, let me give this quotation:

It may be that to some extent we were "guided," shown only the best. We may even have had the wool pulled over our eyes, but we did visit various factories and houses, sometimes without a guide. We tramped many miles of dirty streets, poked up into alleys, used all the faculties we possessed, and the overwhelming impression was that here was a vast people on the march. True, their standards of living are low—so low as to be for Europeans almost unbearable.

As to the collectivist organization, the system suggested in the resolution, the writer says:

One journalist who knows Russia intimately said to me: "This collectivization of the farms is a tragedy—

I thought a moment ago I heard something about collectivization on the farm.

—for most of the people, to whom it means an entire overturn in their whole manner of life, a sacrifice of all that they have held dear. But it seemed inevitable, and another generation is coming on."

Now the last item:

One of the most noticeable things is the absolute equality of women with men. In Europe, of course, peasant women have always worked in the fields, and since industrialism has developed they have worked in the factories. Still, one is almost appalled to find women working side by side with men digging drains, or repairing buildings, or driving trucks, or sweeping the streets.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

The dictatorship of the czars has been replaced by that of the communistic party. The traditions of the secret police have been carried on by the O.G.P.U. Central authority is everywhere in evidence. Reliance seems to be placed on edicts, and then poplar slogans. Hence development instead of being all along the line, is spotty, or perhaps I should say, "streaky." At present there is a drive in Moscow for the reconditioning of houses. Every energy seems to be bent in that direction. Tomorrow the drive may be for roads or school buildings.

I stated that a very able man had written the article from which these extracts are taken—none other than the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I admire his great ability and when I hear him address the house I feel sorry that that ability has not been directed to the upbuilding of the country instead of—as I see it—pulling it down. I do not want him to think that I am speaking unkindly, I always respect another man's views, but I cannot help expressing that opinion. I am going to invite the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his supporters to turn over a new leaf and to see what can be done to build up Canada.

The hon. gentleman spoke of our natural resources and of how they are being developed to give labour employment, and he is correct. I think that perhaps something might be suggested whereby more employment might be afforded. We have in Canada to-day in most of our industrial centres what are called industrial commissions. I cannot name offhand the cities in which these commissions function but there is one in the city from which I come and one of the ridings of which I have the honour to represent. That industrial commission has done a good deal of splendid work. During the several years it has been in existence it has been successful in establishing in Toronto at least one hundred industries of one kind or another. I give an arbitrary number, but it is not too high; if anything it is rather low. Each of the great railways also has an industrial commission, and these commissions have likewise done good work. I am sure that through these commissions cities and towns throughout Canada have been benefited by the creation of industry in these centres. The Department of the Interior has also a very small branch engaged in the same business, and it too has done notable work. If I am correctly informed, the rayon mills in the city of Cornwall which cost some $10,000,000 and give employment to about 1,200 operators—the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver) informs me that they number 1,300; I am glad he is at such pains to see that his grand old county receives due recognition—and I have recently read that the new mill which it had been intended to erect at Three Rivers is now to be located at Shawinigan Falls, and they are about to manufacture cellophane, if they are not doing so at the present time. At any rate, when it is in operation that enterprise will give employment to several hundred men. These industries and the plant at Kippawa which turns out their raw product are largely the outcome of the splendid efforts of a small branch in the Department of the Interior, which has followed the lines suggested, in the creation of industry in the country. I submit that we should continue our efforts in that direction.

To the business man it seems that we have too many commissions of one kind or another, and it would appear desirable to have them coordinated under one head. In Germany, for example, there is a Department of Industry and in France a Department of Economy. At any rate, considerable good would result from a department whose sole purpose would be the creation of industry through the development of our natural resources. I have no doubt that, under a capable man, it would result in employment for hundreds of thousands of Canadians. Anything suggested along that line will receive my support; I will support anything that will give Canadians legitimate employment. Indeed, that is the only reason I came to this house, to do what I could to increase the demand for labour through an increase in industry itself. Possibly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has advocated something of this sort; if he has then I think he has done something worth while.

As regards unemployment, unfortunately there are periods all too frequent, when men are laid off temporarily or finally. They are laid off before the time they should be, and I think there is a great field there for those who set their hearts and minds on increasing employment in the country. Between 1919 and 1929, the world's productivity had increased 50 per cent, a larger increase than had taken place between 1899 and 1919. What has been the result? The numbers employed in industry fluctuated—assuming 100 to be normal—between five below and three above. In other words, the average employment did not increase but was frequently below the mark. In consequence thousands of men were laid off from time to time. Let me give two or three examples that have come under my own observation, one just last Saturday. A man who had been employed in a certain industry for thirty-two years was dismissed. There is now nothing for him; he has no fund on which to draw. It would have been well for such a man if during the good years he could have laid by something by way of contribution. I am sure that hon. members in the far corner of the house, and indeed in every part of the house, are as anxious as I am to do something to tide people over a period of unemployment.

I am told that my time is up and I shall have to close. Let me urge in closing that instead of upheaval, instead of pulling down, we should try to create so as to give more employment. That would be a lot better for the country. The old economic system around which the empire has been built up is the same system on which this country has been built, and on which the great republic to the south of us and other great nations of the world have succeeded. We should proceed along those lines instead of pulling down the system.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. MacNicol) implied in his closing remarks that those of us who support this resolution and who are looking forward to a change of things to improve the condition of the masses of the people only want to tear the present structure down. The hon. gentleman is assuming far too much. It is because we want to build up and not to tear down that we are taking part in this debate. It is for that reason that we have introduced the resolution. We realize to-day that the present economic system is tumbling about our ears and that nothing is being done about it. In proof of this we can quote men in all walks of life who have never at any time taken part in social reform of any kind. To assume that we bring forward this resolution as a means of tearing down the present structure is to speak without understanding what we are trying to do.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat pointed out the many improvements which have been made in machinery and the great developments which have taken place in our present system. He mentioned that the worker had been displaced by means of machinery and then went on to say that that had nothing to do with the economic system. If it had nothing to do with the economic system I should like to know what is the cause of our present difficulty. Our present system must be held responsible for what happens under it.

Mr. BOURASSA: Or lack of it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Or lack of it, as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) points out.

In moving the resolution the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre points out as one of the indictments against the present system the fact that workers under present conditions have no scope for initiative; once they are workers they must remain so. While I agree with him in most other things I cannot agree wholly with him in this respect; there is one thing else open to them—they can become unemployed.

Part of yesterday afternoon and last evening was spent in the discussion of the unemployment situation, and the resolution now before the house points out that under our present economic arrangement large numbers of people are unemployed and without means of earning a livelihood for themselves and their dependents. Ample proof of this was furnished in the debate on the resolution moved a week or so ago by the hon. member for North Winnipeg. The figures furnished by the international labour office show that unemployment in Canada for the year 1931 increased by eighty per cent over 1930. With the exception of three other countries, this is the largest increase shown. The increases in unemployment in several countries are as follows:

	Per cent
Netherlands	92
Belgium	128
New Zealand	184
Australia	34
United States	30
Great Britain	12

This great increase in unemployment did not take place because of agitation carried on by labour radicals or any other body. All countries of the world had capitalistic governments when the depression first set in; they are still under capitalistic governments, and the depression is continuing. It is quite true that from 1929 to 1931 there was a labour government in office, but not in power in Great Britain. This government did not carry out a socialistic or cooperative policy as we understand it; it tried to administer the affairs of the country along strictly capitalistic lines.

We do not blame anyone for what has happened; we are not like the other political parties who blame each other. The Conservative party blames the Liberal party for the conditions which obtained from 1922 to 1930 while, on the other hand, the Liberals blame the Conservatives because conditions are not improving at the present time. Our contention is that the economic system is breaking down not because of a lack of efficient administrators but because of inherent defects in the system itself. We bring this resolution forward in an effort to provide wider scope for improvement and to better the welfare of the people in general.

I should like to quote from an address delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to the Empire Club in Toronto, on October 8, 1930. Hon. members who have been in parliament much longer than I have know that the minister always speaks very well when addressing the house, but my opinion is—I say this without wishing to give offence—that he speaks much more intelligently when he is outside of the house. This may be because he feels he has more freedom outside. After hearing him address the house last Friday I have come to the conclusion that he can speak with considerable intelligence even when in the house. The hon. minister's remarks to the Empire Club were as follows:

> While one-third of the human race, which might be termed western civilization, including Europe and North America, has so perfected its system of mechanised production that it has more goods than it can consume or sell, the other two-thirds of the human race, which can be classified as eastern civilization, is in dire need of those things which lie rotting in the possession of the other division, and over the whole human race hangs, like a funeral pall, want, poverty, idleness and social disintegration.

This is not the raving of a radical socialist or a soap-box orator, it is the considered statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce of Canada. I consider that he has treated the whole situation in a very concise manner. It will be noticed that Canada is included in what is termed western civilization; we are part of that civilization which has perfected its mechanical production to a point where we are able to produce more than we can sell or consume: It might be well to point out that there are many people in this dominion who could consume much more than they are consuming at the present time. The figures in connection with unemployment in Vancouver, part of which I represent, show that there are ten thousand people on unemployment relief. That is, they are either employed on relief work or receiving direct relief. I visited one or two of the refuges where workers are housed and fed, and in one building over a garage—and this is contrary to the by-laws of the city,—on a floor space of fifty by 120 feet there were beds one above another for 276 people, these beds being occupied at night. At another mission in the city of Vancouver there was a place four and a half feet by thirty-two feet where there were twenty-four people sleeping every night. And this is in a country where the Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us that we have so improved the mechanization of industry that we can produce more than we can sell or consume.

Of course the whole trouble is that under the present system production is carried on not to meet the needs of the people, but so that the products may be sold, and in order that that may be done, one must have the wherewithal to buy those products. If you have not the wherewithal to buy then, regardless of what the production of the country may be, you will be faced with conditions such as I have just outlined. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) tells us that in order to succeed we must work hard. If he will provide the work, I am sure I can provide the workers and they will be workers who will work hard.

I quite understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in making the speech in which these statements appear, was making a case for bimetallism, on which I am not going to say anything at the moment, because it is not germane to the question under discussion. Under our social system, as under all social systems, certain institutions spring up and at the present time we have at least one institution that is the subject of very much comment. I refer to banking. Again, on the same evening in the same speech, the minister said:

> The trade problem of the world is to move the surplus goods from those who have them in abundance into the hands and for the use of those who are in need of them, and surely it is not beyond the wit of man to devise a system which will accomplish this end.

So far it has been beyond our wits to devise a system that will do that. However, he goes on further and says:

> It is the business of the bankers of the world, through a proper monetary system, to achieve this objective, and the job is not being done.

First of all, I might say that if the job is not being done, governments have one function and that is to see that those things which are essential to the welfare of the state are carried out. If the bankers are not carrying out their function properly, no doubt the Minister of Trade and Commerce will take the matter up with the cabinet and see that something is done about it. But I do not agree with him that it is the business of bankers to provide a monetary system that will do the thing which he pointed out, namely, that will move surplus goods from those who have them in abundance to those who need them. Under our present economic system that is not the business of bankers; their business is to make profits for the shareholders of the banks, as it is the business of every industry in the country to make profits for the people who have invested money in those industries. Under capitalism that is the business of every institution and that is the reason why at the present time, while we have abundance, those who produced that abundance are living under conditions which are anything but what they ought to be.

It will, however, be noticed that he said that eastern civilization has not yet perfected its mechanism of production so that it can produce sufficient for its needs. But what particular difference does that make when our western civilization which has perfected that mechanism so that we can produce more than we can consume and the eastern civilization which has not yet succeeded in doing that, there hangs a pall of want, poverty, idleness and social disintegration for the one because it has been able to improve its mechanism of production and for the other because it has not? But what would the people of this country do if by some catastrophe China and India should be altogether removed from the trade of the world? Suppose, by some catastrophe, they were engulfed in the ocean; would western civilization continue starving amidst plenty because it had no place to sell its goods? Is this not proof positive to anyone that those goods were produced to sell and not for use? Supposing for instance, those countries had, like Russia, abolished private property in the means of production, in which case from our high moral altitude we could not trade with them, then we would be in a bad way indeed.

The mover of the motion made some reference to the beginnings of the capitalistic system and I agree that it is very difficult, if not impossible, to secure a clear understanding of the present system unless we go back to its beginnings, unless we go back at least to 1769, when Stephenson had so perfected the steam engine that it could be used in production. If we go back to that time and consider the development that has proceeded from then until now, I do not think we shall say that the Great war was the cause of our present difficulties. If, as I say, we go back to Great Britain in 1769, we shall find that she was the only country in the world that was producing commodities by steam motivation. At that time we would find a virgin world as far as natural resources were concerned. All the civilizations and generations that had gone before had only begun to scratch the surface of the earth so far as its natural resources were concerned. But something else happened at that time. Great Britain, manufacturing with steam driven machinery, began to sell her manufactured products in every part of the world, and she found a market because she was the only country producing in that way. But she sold, not only her manufactured products, but the machinery and engines with which those could be produced, first to the United States, then to Germany, and the result was that those countries also began producing industrially. As each country in turn became industrialized, the market for such goods became less; world markets became constricted. If you will consider the conditions of that time, you will find that industrialization in the various countries of the world was accelerated as the mechanization of industry increased, so that Japan, the last great country to become industrialized, has done in about fifty years what it took Great Britain 150 years, or the United States 100 years, or Germany seventy-five years to accomplish. This was not because the Japanese were any more clever than the people of the other countries I have mentioned, but because they received the benefit of the capital, skill and experience of those countries that had previously become industrialized.

Again, if you go back to that time, as the mover of the resolution pointed out, the agricultural population was largely predominant. As a matter of fact, while I have no exact figures, I do not think it is any exaggeration to say that in 1769 the population of the world was ninety-five per cent a peasant population. As far back as 1820, eighty-eight per cent of the population gainfully employed in the United States was agricultural, but in 1920 the agricultural population in that country had been reduced to twenty-five per cent of the whole.

I would like to put in as concise a form as possible what I believe to be the fundamental defects in our system, and the reasons for the distress that we are facing at the moment. We are dealing with the system of society under which we live. The basis of the capitalist system is private ownership of the means of wealth production; that is, private ownership of lands, forests, mines, mills and factories. The owners of these means of production operate them, as I have pointed out before, for one purpose and one purpose only, namely, to produce profits, and the propertyless wage earner can get access to these means of production, and consequently to the means of life, only on the understanding that he will produce more for the owner than he receives in wages. He produces, in fact, values greater than the values he receives. The employer's profits, then, arise out of the surplus values which the workers produce and do not get, and the greater the difference between the values which the worker produces and the values which he receives in wages, the greater the profits of the employer. In other words, the employing class who make their living by rent, interest and profit, make their profits by appropriating the values produced by the working class in excess of their wages, and as I have already pointed out, the greater the amount of the values produced which the employing class can appropriate to themselves, the greater their profits. It seems to me that it logically follows that because profit is the motive in all capitalist production, as the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) has pointed out, every possible means is taken to increase the owner's share of profit, such as the forcing down of wages, increasing the hours of work, improving machinery and thereby displacing the number of employees in industry, and increasing the intensity of labour. I read a statement that was made by Colonel Cockshutt, of Brantford, of whom we have all heard, when speaking at a meeting of the Anglican Synod in Toronto last September. He stated that from twenty-five to fifty per cent of the workers in certain industries had been displaced in the last few years through improvements in machinery. Of course, the workers resist as best they may, but regardless of what they do, when markets become glutted with the goods which the workers have produced and which they cannot buy, their living conditions become depressed. It seems to me that it ought to be fairly obvious to everybody that if the workers in industry produce more than they can purchase with their wages, unless the owners consume the surplus, which because of its magnitude they cannot do, the surplus must be disposed of somewhere else than where it is produced. That is the reason why every country in the world, Canada included, is looking for world markets. World markets are an absolute necessity.

With the increasing use of machinery in agriculture the position of the farmer is becoming more and more analogous to that of the industrial wage earner. Because of his seeming ownership of the land and the equipment with which he works it, also for the reason, I presume, that on occasions he engages hired help, the farmer for a long time was under the delusion that he was a man of property; his exploitation by the real owning class was not so apparent to him as it was to his fellow-worker, the industrial wage worker.

The wage worker sells his labour power direct to the employer by the day, hour, week or month, as the case may be, at its market value. The product he produces belongs to the man or corporation employing him, or purchasing his labour power. The labour power of the farmer is used in the production of the various commodities he produces, varying with the nature of the farming operations he carries on, such as the raising of wheat, fruit, cattle, poultry, and these products he tries to dispose of in the market, a market, mark you, over which he has no control. In fact the farmer has no voice whatever in setting the price of what he buys or in setting the price of what he has to sell. It is true that in the last few years, through cooperative pools and other agencies, the farmer has imitated his brother in the industrial cities, but not with any great success. When he takes his products to market he asks the buyer: What will you give me for it? When he comes to buy he asks the seller: What are you asking for it? He is at the mercy of a world market, and the surplus values that he produces go just as surely and just as completely to those who live by rent, interest and profit, as do the products of the wage worker which he,—the wage worker,—leaves in the factory when the whistle blows at five o'clock.

This system under which we are living at the present time did very well when the nations of the world were being transformed from a peasant and handicraft production to large scale industrial production, but it no longer suffices when that transformation is complete as it is to-day. Capitalism did very well when new countries were being opened up, when new frontiers were daily being pushed forward into new lands, when virgin forests were being replaced by industrial cities, but it no longer works when our civilization has become top heavy with huge cities as it is to-day. The function of government in the future, as we see it, must be that of organizing production. The policy of laissez faire in production is at an end, and whether we like it or not, the next step in successful and orderly government must be in planned production. The capitalist system we maintained has reached the limit of its usefulness, and it should now be replaced just as it replaced another economic system. The capitalist system functioned more or less efficiently in the past, when the surplus values produced could be reinvested as new capital, but to-day there is no place where these surplus values can be reinvested. While they could be reinvested, the workers in industry could be assured of a certain measure of the essentials of life. However, with markets clogged with commodities for which there are no buyers, industrial workers and large numbers of agricultural workers are, as unemployed, thrown on the state for the essentials of life.

The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) looks forward to a revival or new expansion of business. Were it possible that such a condition could come about and the wheels of industry move once more, what would happen? The capitalist would again open his factory and his workshop; again he would reap the benefits of industry, and when the next slump came the unemployed workers would again be thrown on the state. If the state is to provide for workers not needed in industry in times of depression, then it should take the profits of industry in times of prosperity. In other words, if the capitalist class cannot organize the resources of the world so as to give everyone a decent standard of living, then the organization will have to be done by the workers of the world, including the farmers. From my point of view, and I believe from the point of view of my colleagues in this corner of the house, that is the solution which sooner or later will have to be adopted, whether we like it or not. To this government I say: Why waste time and risk a catastrophe by attempting to work out remedies which will not cure and palliatives which will not palliate?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the importance of the resolution is of course recognized by all hon. members who have read it. This afternoon I have listened to a very elaborate dissertation on the subject. Obviously in the few minutes remaining before the adjournment I could not properly enter into the discussion, and perhaps the house would not think me discourteous, and would not consider that I do not recognize the importance of the subject, if at this time I moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, I must object to a motion for the adjournment of the debate. If the motion were accepted the resolution would drop to the bottom of the order paper. On the other hand, if Mr. Speaker would call it six o'clock the resolution would retain its place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I, too, would object to the adjournment of the debate, because I should like to speak to the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS: I had no idea of curtailing discussion because as a matter of fact I should like to say something myself.

Mr. HEAPS: Very well; why not call it six o'clock?

Mr. STEVENS: I had been looking at the clock and decided that obviously, the hour being so late, one could not sufficiently discuss the matter. If Mr. Speaker will call it six o'clock I shall be content.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 3, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*TRANSLATION SERVICE

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. Has any suggestion or report recommending any reduction or any centralization of the translation services in government departments and parliament been submitted to the government or to the Secretary of State?
2. If so, what suggestions have been made and from what department, official or other person were they submitted; and if there is any report to the above effect, will the minister concerned table same?

Mr. CAHAN: An arrangement has been made for the appointment of one official only in the department of the Secretary of State who is to take charge of the translation of foreign languages, that is, languages other than French and English, into French and English as may be required by the several departments of the government. I infer that this question does not relate to that appointment, but in direct reply to the question I would say that suggestions have been made orally and the government is considering the possibility of the organization of a bureau to have charge of translations other than the translation usually made in the different departments by their regular staffs. As no conclusion has been reached and no report is available I am unable to give a more definite answer to this question.

*UNITED STATES DUTY ON CANADIAN FISH

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What progress has been made in the negotiations with the United States government, referred to last session, on June 23rd, relating to the reduction of the duty on Canadian caught fish going into the United States?
2. Are negotiations in this matter going on between the two governments at the present time?

Mr. BENNETT: As this matter still is under consideration with the government of the United States obviously it would be impossible to make any statement as to the present position of the negotiations.

LAKE ERIE FISHING REGULATIONS

Mr. HEPBURN:

1. Has the Dominion government or the Ontario provincial government jurisdiction over fishing regulations on lake Erie?

2. Is the Dominion government the only governing body empowered to legislate a short limit for gill-net fishing on lake Erie?
3. Can such a regulation be made by the Ontario government as a condition of licence?
4. Is the Dominion government the only governing body empowered to legislate for the close season on lake Erie?
5. Can such a regulation be made as a condition of licence by the Ontario government?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think these questions are proper. They are all questions of law and I do not think the minister is bound to answer them. There may be some differences between the two authorities, the provincial and the federal, and it will be for the courts to decide whether the provincial authorities or the federal government can regulate certain things within the boundaries of Ontario.

Mr. HEPBURN: I think the question is a proper one. In any event it is a contentious question; the minister can answer it if he so desires.

Mr. STEVENS: It is answered.

4. Will the same officials be employed this year?

2. If so, how many pairs, and at what price?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Yes, to the Canadian Red Cross Society at Regina, Saskatchewan.

2. One thousand pairs free of charge.

[Mr. Gordon.]

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

Mr. MUNN:

1. Did the Vancouver harbour commissioners purchase a second-hand locomotive in the United States during the latter part of 1930 or during 1931?

2. If so, what was the cost of said locomotive laid down in Vancouver?

3. What plan was adopted in calling for tenders for reconditioning this locomotive, public notice or private request?

4. What firms or companies tendered for the job and what were the prices quoted by each?

5. Was the job let to the lowest bidder?

6. If not, why?

7. What firm secured the work and what was the total cost of the job including work done on the premises of the commissioners?

8. What period of time was specified for the completion of the work by the competing firms who failed to secure the job?

9. What length of time was occupied by the firm who secured the job before the locomotive was put into commission?

10. What was the cost to the commissioners for substitute locomotive service during the excess period used in reconditioning?

11. Was this locomotive originally purchased in Davenport, Iowa, in 1913 by a firm of railroad construction engineers for the sum of $12,000 and laid down in Vancouver, freight and duty paid, at $15,000?

12. What is the total cost of the locomotive to the commissioners including cost price, reconditioning and substitute service?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This question should stand as an order for return. This information is in the hands of the harbour commission and we shall file what we get from them.

Mr. MUNN:

1. Did the Vancouver harbour commissioners purchase a second-hand car ferry in the United States during 1930 or 1931?

2. If so, what was the cost laid down in the port of Vancouver including original cost, towage and insurance?

3. Did this car ferry require repairing before being put into operation?

4. If so, what is the cost of reconditioning and repairs to date?

5. Could a serviceable barge have been secured from the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National Railways at a much lesser cost?

6. Has the barge been giving steady and satisfactory service constantly since its first day of service?

7. How many cars have been transported in this barge since going into commission?

8. What was the cost of constructing a ferry slip for its accommodation?

9. What has the cost per car been, including cost of operation, interest and sinking fund on the barge and slip, repairs, etc?

10. What was the cost per car for transportation over the Second Narrows bridge when it was in operation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The same answer applies to this question: stands as an order for return.

AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT—VETERINARY SURGEONS

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. How many veterinary surgeons were temporarily employed by the Department of Agriculture in 1930 and 1931 respectively?
2. What are their names and in what localities were they employed?

MARINE DEPARTMENT—GASPE EMPLOYEES

Mr. BRASSET:

1. How many employees of the Department of Marine and Fisheries have been dismissed or resigned in the county of Gaspe, since August, 1930, up to the present date?
2. In each case, what was the date of his dismissal or resignation, the name and address of the employee, the reason for his dismissal and the name of his successor?

Mr. CAHAN: As this involves a reply from the Civil Service Commission, I ask that it stand as an order for return.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. J.-F. POULIOT (Témiscouata): I rise to a question of privilege. As reported in Hansard of yesterday at page 721, the following question was put:

1. What is the name of the postmaster at Pointe Lebel, county of Saguenay?

The answer is:

Henri Granier.

The next question is:

2. Is he a British subject by birth or by naturalization?

The answer is:

By naturalization, according to postmaster's statement.

I claim that as parliament is the high court of this country, such an answer by a witness would be considered contempt of court, and I ask the minister if he will give me a decent answer or if we shall press it further in parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. POULIOT: I want an answer. It is no joke.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has complained that the answer is not complete. It is within the right of the minister or the government to give a further answer or not. There is at present before the house no question requiring an immediate answer.

PRICE OF SEED WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): I wish to ask a question of either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture. I have under my hand a letter from Courval, Saskatchewan, stating that the farmers in that district are receiving fifty-two cents a bushel for No. 1 northern for seed wheat, whereas the elevators are being paid fifty-eight cents a bushel for the same wheat for seed purposes. The farmer writes to ask me why there should be this difference in price.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I shall look into the matter, but I do not think I have correctly gathered the point of the question. If the farmer can get more for his wheat at the elevator, I do not see the point.

Mr. DONNELLY: This man says that if a farmer has No. 1 northern wheat for sale, the commission pays him fifty-two cents a bushel to give it to another farmer for seed purposes; but if an elevator has No. 1 northern seed wheat for sale the commission pays the elevator fifty-eight cents a bushel. Why are they paying the farmer only fifty-two cents and the elevator fifty-eight cents a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat? I should like an answer to this question because it is of importance.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member knows this does not come under the jurisdiction of any hon. member on this side of the house. I shall be glad to gather any information I can and give it to him privately.

RADIO LICENCE FEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): I wish to ask the Minister of Marine a question based upon an article in the Evening Citizen which states:

It was announced to-day by Alfred Duranleau, Minister of Marine, that the fee on radio receiving sets would be raised from one dollar to two dollars.

I would like to know if this is correct and, if it is correct, whether I can be assured it is a departmental regulation from which I wish to dissociate myself.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The information is correct. The licence fee has been raised from $1 to $2 by order in council.

SEED AND FEED RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): On February 22 an order of the house was passed for a return of all correspondence between the federal and Manitoba governments in relation to providing seed for the farmers and feed for starving live stock. I should like to ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture or any other minister when I may expect this return?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I am sorry to say I did not hear the question of my hon. friend, but I shall see it in Hansard to-morrow and give an answer then.

NEW ZEALAND TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): I desire to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he proposes to table the New Zealand treaty. There are many in this country who may think our salvation will come out of New Zealand, and naturally they are somewhat anxious to know the contents of this document.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS: (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is under consideration and I trust when it is tabled, my hon. friend's calling and election will be sure.

LOBSTER FISHING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I should like to ask the Prime Minister what steps the government are taking to safeguard the interests of the lobster fishermen with regard to a bill which has been introduced in the United States congress to impose restrictions upon importations of Canadian lobsters?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I shall treat the hon. gentleman's inquiry as a notice of question and try to answer it to-morrow.

PROPOSED TREATY WITH GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): I notice a Canadian Press despatch which states that the German cabinet has decided to increase the tariff against Canadian and Australian goods owing to the fact that there is no trade agreement with these countries. What is the intention of the Department of Trade and Commerce as to a treaty with Germany?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The matter is under consideration.

[Mr. Brown.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BULWARK-AIRWAYS BRANCH LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): On February 23, I asked the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) what the possibility was of steel being laid on the proposed branch line from Bulwark, Alberta, to a point called Airways, where a grade has been made. This work is very necessary for the benefit of an area of about eight hundred square miles, and I should be glad to know whether there is any likelihood of its being done.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The other day I made some inquiries of the management with regard to that branch line, so far as their estimates for the coming year are concerned. It is very much in the same position as a number of other branch lines which have been inquired about. There is a small amount in the estimates, but it is not sufficient to lay rails or to put the branch line into operation. In view of the financial condition of the railways the management is not at the present time recommending any great amount of work on that particular branch.

UNEMPLOYED ON PARLIAMENT HILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): In view of the fact that Parliament Hill to-day has taken on the appearance of an armed camp, I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) whether his troops have been instructed to shoot the unemployed if necessary.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED DEDUCTION OF TEN PER CENT IN INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

The house resumed from Friday, February 26, consideration of the following proposed resolution (Mr. Rhodes):

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize deductions of ten per cent from the amounts of certain salaries or other compensations or indemnities payable by the government of Canada during the fiscal year 1932-33.

And to provide for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of all current contributions payable under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act in respect of the salaries payable during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933, of all employees who receive not more than one thousand two hundred dollars per annum.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I am sure every member of the house, with the exception of those who occupy the treasury benches, would much rather that we had before us for consideration some measure to provide for the relief of the unemployed than to provide a reduction in the salaries of those who are now employed; but inasmuch as the government has not seen fit so far to bring in such a measure, and inasmuch as this resolution is now before us, I have no alternative but to discuss it.

Last Friday evening when the house adjourned I was discussing the resolution and I pointed out at that time that the government was setting an example to private employers throughout the country to reduce still further salaries and wages paid by them. I said that hon. gentlemen opposite were setting this example by reducing the salaries and wages of government employees, and doing so in an arbitrary manner without any negotiations with those affected. The government, I pointed out, had already repudiated the principle of collective bargaining by refusing to negotiate on the question of reducing salaries and wages. I had quoted from order in council P.C. 1743 of July 11, 1918, and order in council P.C. 880 of May 1, 1919, in which the government had announced the principle of collective bargaining. Further, I had pointed out that the parliament of Canada had adopted the principle of collective bargaining and had endorsed and recommended the principle of establishing a civil service council to take care of just such matters as we have before us at the present time.

I was in the midst of my remarks at eleven o'clock on Friday night when the house adjourned, and I was reading into the record the provisions contained in order in council P.C. 970 of May 7, 1930. I do not think it is necessary to read any further, because the provisions of that order in council are well known. The order in council was the outcome of the assurance of the Liberal party to the civil service of this country that such a civil service council would be established, and it was as well the result of the deliberations of parliament. I need only tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in addition to what I have already read into the record, the order in council provides for the composition of the council, and how it should be called; and the last paragraph makes provision for travelling expenses incurred by the representatives of the civil service coming from different parts of the country. The eleventh or last paragraph reads:

> It is recommended that travelling expenses incidental to attending the committee's meetings incurred by those attending from points other than Ottawa should be defrayed by the government. It is further recommended that civil service organizations' representatives attending the meetings of the committee shall be accorded special leave of absence, with pay, for the purpose by their respective departments.

Now that provision has been entirely ignored by the present government. Indeed, I read in the newspapers that the government had indicated that they were not favourable to such a measure. I know that excuses can be made by the present government; they can say that they were not in sympathy with a measure of this kind. But it has been my experience that anyone who is not favourable to any principle can easily find an excuse for its repudiation. So that this reduction in salaries and wages now contemplated is being made without proper representations, or proper hearing or negotiations on the part of the parties affected.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his speech a few days ago read a letter from a lady in the civil service signifying her satisfaction with the cut in her salary. My experience has always been—and I have had a long experience along this line—that in every such movement, whether it be increases or decreases in wages, you will find the exceptional person, the one who is ever ready to signify to the boss that he or she is not like the others but is perfectly satisfied with the position they hold. But why does not the Prime Minister read all the correspondence he has received? Why does he not read all the letters he has had for and against the reduction in salaries, and give the names of those who have forwarded them to him? Then the house would be in a better position to judge whether or not the civil servants are satisfied.

The Conservative party when in opposition pretended to have great sympathy with low-paid civil servants. I can see their tears now, rolling down their cheeks, when they were sitting on this side of the house, over the poor and lowly civil servants. It would not be fair for me to say that at that time they were bidding for power; that would be unparliamentary. I would suggest that they were not playing politics at all. But we have examples. We find that on May 21, 1928, at page 3241 of Hansard for that year, Mr. Manion had this to say with respect to the lowly paid civil servants:

> One thousand and eighty dollars is $90 a month, and $90 a month is not sufficient for these men to live decently on and support their families.

The Mr. Manion of that time is the Hon. Mr. Manion now, a member of this cabinet who now appears on the floor of this house supporting a further reduction of civil servants' salaries.

Then, we have the utterances of the gentleman who is now Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett): I find that in Hansard of March 21, 1930, at page 858, Mr. Bennett is quoted as follows:

> I am sure the Minister of Justice will say that no man can live and maintain a family on $65 a month. That is the reason I have always favoured a minimum salary of $100 a month for the civil service.

The gentleman who uttered those words is to-day Prime Minister of Canada. He has it in his power to give the lower paid civil servants $100 a month, but instead of doing that we find he is cutting their present wage by ten per cent. This statement of the Prime Minister, the then leader of the opposition, was broadcast not only throughout Ottawa but throughout the country. It was an example of his instructions given to Conservative speakers during the last election, as shown by the speakers' hand book. This statement I have quoted was set out in large capital letters, and of course the civil servants of Canada were not supposed to read them.

Mr. GOTT: It is a breach of political etiquette for the hon. member to possess one of those books.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Speaker, I should like you to try to keep the hon. gentleman quiet over there, because I do not want to be rude to him.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to read to hon. members standing order No. 12 subsection (3):

> When a member is speaking, no member shall pass between him and the chair, nor interrupt him, except to raise a point of order.

Then, quoting from May, the English authority, I find the following:

> Silence is required to be observed in both houses. In the commons all members should be silent, or should converse only in whisper.

Continual interruptions when a member is speaking are most disturbing, and make it difficult to carry on the proceedings of the house.

Mr. HEENAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, your intervention saved me a great deal of trouble. I thought I was going to have to call the member to order myself.

The words I have quoted were those of the Prime Minister addressed to the civil servants in 1930. Let us compare his words on that occasion with his present views when Prime Minister of Canada. We find that Hansard of February 8, 1932, page 59 contains the following statement:

> But looking about us, realizing our obligations, and desiring that the people of this country should understand fully that the government is anxious to lead the way with respect to matters of economy, we have concluded that we will ask this parliament to pass a statute to reduce by ten per cent the indemnities alike of the Senate and of the Commons, and of the compensation paid to ministers and to every branch of the public service. That must be effected.

I am wondering where his sympathy for civil servants has gone, in view of the fact that in the year 1930 he declared that $100 was a minimum salary.

The government of Canada surely is leading the way towards salary and wage reductions, and those reductions quite evidently are having their effect throughout the country because we see, hear and read of wages being reduced in practically every industry. It is quite evident that the salary cut in certain circles has been well planned and well understood. The wages of railroad men including employees of the government's own railroad, have been reduced, and we have heard no protests from any members of the cabinet. Instead of protests, as a matter of fact it would seem that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways have approved of the action taken by the government railways. It is quite evident the government is satisfied. I needed no evidence to assure me however, because even before the cut took place I knew the government would approve of it.

Let us compare the attitude of the government with that of the mayor of the city of Toronto. In that city the question of salary cuts was before the city council and in that connection the mayor is reported in the Globe newspaper of February 27, 1932, as follows:

> "If we give leadership, are we not asking private enterprise to follow suit? The city will simply be giving the cloak of respectability to a wage-cut on the part of private enterprise," said the mayor. "I have a letter from a large employer of labour who is opposing the wage reduction."

I want to take off my hat to the mayor of the city of Toronto. The working men of Canada know now who is setting the example and leading the pace. In their minds and in mine there is no one to blame but the present government of Canada. Not only are they leading the way in the reduction of wages and salaries but also in the discharge of employees, and in that way they are adding to the numbers of unemployed. They are dismissing many public servants and reducing the salaries of those remaining.

Let us for example consider the recent dismissals, releases or whatever you wish to call them in the Department of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland). I am informed that 75 flying officers have been released. Where will those men find employment to-day? They will find themselves lined up with the boys we saw at the gate to-day looking for work. I am advised that 42 of those men served overseas in the great war, and that 38 of them are married with dependent children. At one time in their lives they offered to sacrifice their all for the defence of the British Empire, and I can well recall some of our politicians going around the country telling those boys that they were going to make Canada a place fit for heroes to live in. Now, when they are performing services of a useful character, their services are no longer required. Undoubtedly they could perform useful work; for instance, they could be sent into the Patricia district to see whether or not those Indians are dying, and whether their children are going blind as was reported in the press. It is not sufficient for this government to say that they have heard from some Hudson's Bay factor that the report is incorrect. Some of those flying officers ought to be used to ascertain whether or not there is need for assistance in that outlying country. But the government has discharged those flying officers and thrown them on the mercy of the world, not caring what will become of them. And if the British Empire needed them to-morrow they would be the first men expected to get into harness and defend it.

Mr. COTNAM: You mean armour, not harness.

Mr. HEENAN: The government undertook to provide work for all. Why, they are sitting on the treasury benches to-day, and they can only sneer and laugh at the unemployed of this country.

An hon. MEMBER: Cut that out.

Mr. HEENAN: They cannot even keep their own employees; they are adding to the unemployed.

An hon. MEMBER: Talk a little sense.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, because the habit has grown up to make statements which, because unchallenged, are said not to be denied, I should like to point out that there has been no sneering in reference to the unemployed from this side of the house. I think that that statement, at least, should be withdrawn. I rise to a question of order, Mr. Speaker, and direct your attention to it.

Mr. HEENAN: I direct your attention Mr. Speaker, to the fact—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. HEENAN: —to the fact that members elected to this chamber have just as much right to speak as the Prime Minister. I just wish to direct your attention to the fact that I was speaking of the sneers handed across to me just at the moment the Prime Minister arose.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HEENAN: Any time any one on this side of the house has got up to discuss the question of the unemployed there has been nothing but "ha ha's" from the other side of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HEENAN: In fact the unemployed of this country have not got anything from the other side of the house but "ha ha's." So I think I was well within my rights in saying they were sneering at any discussion of the matter, but if I have transgressed the rules of the house I withdraw the expression.

During the elections the Prime Minister as well as his party promised not only to provide employment but to ensure a higher standard of living. Where is the higher standard of living as proposed in this resolution? He said there was no excuse for any Liberal asserting that other countries were suffering worse hardships than this country, and he declared: If elected my job will be Canada—to see that Canadians are employed. And he is working at it right now—making as many unemployed as it is possible for any man to make. He is busy at his job, and is doing it in good fashion. But what I object to more than anything else, Mr. Speaker, is the example the government are setting to private employers throughout this country to reduce salaries and wages. It is a fact that the financial and banking interests were taken into consultation as to the revenues of the country and the rates of interest to be charged on the recent bond issues. Well, if it was right and proper for those interests to be so consulted, then it is equally right and proper that the employees of the state, whose living depends upon their salaries and wages, should be taken into consultation before their means of livelihood are reduced. Consequently, no matter what anyone else does, I shall put myself on record by voting against this reduction of salaries and wages.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I was amused the other day, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister in introducing this motion read a letter to the house purporting to come from some lady in the civil service to the effect that she was glad to take the proposed reduction. I do not know whether it is because I am a married man, but I have received no communications from any ladies in the civil service; I have received communications from many men and representatives of civil servants protesting against the salary cut. The other day I met a civil servant who said to me: I am getting $100 a month; out of this I have to pay 5 per cent towards my pension fund, and the proposed 10 per cent reduction will leave me only $85 a month to maintain my wife and six children. I do not see how any married man in the city of Ottawa can expect to do that on $85 a month. True, the Prime Minister has stated that in the case of the lower salaries the 5 per cent superannuation will be paid by the government, but still the salary cut leaves such men in a difficult position.

Last session during the debate on the budget, I made the statement that so far as I could see the only people the budget favoured were those of the wealthy class. Looking through the current estimates I find that the only people getting any benefit are those who are lending money to the government. As compared with the interest paid last year to the money lenders, this year the amount will be increased by something like $13,000,000. The Minister of Finance may retort: Well, many small bondholders are getting this interest; many widows and others who have invested $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000 in these bonds are getting a part of the interest. Probably that is so. But I venture to say that within six months or a year, if conditions continue as they are to-day, and if the government does not change its policy in order to improve conditions—and they will never improve until the government does change its policy—most of these bonds that to-day are in the hands of widows and other small investors will be in the hands of the big investors; they will have full control just as they secured control of the war bonds shortly after they were issued, especially the tax-exempt bonds. I submit that when the national service loan was floated it could have been floated easily at 4 per cent instead of at 5½ per cent, and thus the government could have saved the country a lot of money in interest payments.

[Mr. Heenan.]

The other day the Prime Minister stated that judges and army and navy officers were exempt from this proposed salary cut. How can you compare the position of a man who has to maintain a wife and six children on $85 a month with the position of a judge getting $9,000 a year and making no contribution to the pension which he gets on a very liberal scale when he retires? As a reason for this exemption it was stated that the judges' salaries are statutory. Well, this parliament is supreme, all-powerful; as it can make, so it can unmake; it can amend or repeal any statute. Last session we amended the Judges Act so that the Chief Justice of Manitoba by his acceptance of the chairmanship of the Board of Railway Commissioners should in no way prejudice his pension rights.

I am against this reduction unless it is graded, and unless it takes in the high-salaried officers of the army and navy, and the judges. I think the government will be ill-advised if they do not follow that course; I am sure it would be to their benefit, politically and otherwise, if they included everyone in this measure.

We have heard a great deal to the effect that conditions in Canada are better than in the United States, but the civil service of the United States is in a better condition than is the civil service of Canada. President Hoover said he would veto any measure proposing a reduction in the salaries of the civil service, but that he would approve of statutory increases being withheld. At the frontier ports between Canada and the United States, their men start at a salary of $2,000 a year, while ours start at a salary of $1,200. Their lowest paid clerk receives $1,700 a year. I know of one man who has been with the customs department for twenty-six years; he is a sub-collector, and he receives $2,340. Right next to him the United States sub-collector receives $2,900. So I do not think we should brag any more about Canada being in a better condition than the United States; we are paying smaller salaries and now we are asking these officials to take a cut of ten per cent.

Personally, if the Prime Minister had come to me and said, "We need $400 of your indemnity to help carry the country through," I do not think I would have refused to give that amount, but I do not think it fair that I should be asked to give $400 of my indemnity while people receiving high salaries are taking no reduction at all. They do not have to carry on elections; they have no expense of that kind; they are not at the beck and call of every charitable and begging organization in the country. I am not criticising those organizations at all; no doubt they do a good work, but surely there is as much justification for taking $1,000 from the salary of one of these men as there is for taking $400 from my indemnity. Unless the judges and the highly paid officers of the army and navy are included in this reduction and unless the reduction is graded so that the people receiving small salaries will be relieved and will have a chance to look after their families properly, I intend to vote against this resolution.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in the few observations I have to make I do not propose to attack the evident intention of the government to exercise principles of economy; rather I intend to discuss very briefly the practical application of the resolution to the members of the civil service receiving small salaries.

Naturally a proposal to reduce the salaries paid those in the employ of the government always will produce a clash of opinion. It is to be expected that those directly affected will object to the reduction, and in addition we have those, not directly affected, who believe that it is not a sound principle to make any reduction whatever. In fact, not only in this particular connection but in other relationships we have two schools of thought, the one contending that wages should not be cut at all and that we should spend more, while the other says we should spend less. I think those who argue that if wages are cut, purchasing power will be diminished, production will be lessened and unemployment increased are making a fairly good argument, though possibly the question is debatable. We have had the question discussed from many points of view in connection with unemployment, and I must say that I have sometimes envied some hon. members of this house who have very cheerfully and very profoundly given their opinions and their reasons for those opinions on such matters as the cause of the depreciation of our currency, the effect of the adverse balance of trade, the cause of unemployment, and all that sort of thing. For my part I have felt, and feel now, considerable reluctance to rush in where angels might very well fear to tread. I prefer to consider this resolution from one point of view alone, and that is this: Whether it will be possible under the resolution and the bill which will be based upon it for some of those affected to maintain a decent scale of living, and whether it will be possible for them to have what they are entitled to, a reasonably comfortable subsistence for themselves and their families.

I think, Mr. Speaker, most of the people of this country will now admit that both individually and as a country we have lived pretty high and pretty expensively until the last two years. We have created debts which ten or twenty years ago we would have thought it absolutely impossible for this government to carry. I think I am right when I say that the federal debt, added to the provincial and municipal debts, totals over five billion dollars, on which evidently the interest must be in the neighbourhood of a quarter of a billion dollars a year. To my mind that is a very serious situation. It may be that sometime I will be converted to the theory that the way back to prosperity is to spend more; I hope my mind is always open to conviction, but I am still old fashioned enough to believe in the principles of thrift and the policy of spending a little less than we earn or than we receive, and that applies to governments as much as it does to individuals. However, that is always predicated on the fact to which I referred a moment ago, that men must earn enough to make saving possible. There is an irreducible minimum below which no Canadian, whether he is in the service of the government or in the service of a private concern, should be asked to live.

I am entirely sincere, and I have no axe to grind—I think my hon. friends opposite as well as my hon. friends on this side will believe me—when I say that I have every sympathy with the government in its efforts to balance the budget. We are told, I think on pretty good authority, that this year the deficit will be very heavy, between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000, without taking into account the heavy loss on the national railways, and probably those deficits will continue. I am not a pessimist when I make that statement; it is very likely that we will find it very difficult to make both ends meet for some time to come. We cannot indefinitely take care of deficits by increasing the debt or increasing the taxes, or both; that would mean national disaster in the end. Sometimes I am tempted —and I say this also with reluctance—to say that if it could be done in a practical way it might be a good thing for all concerned if we made a capital levy to wipe out this incubus of debt, at once or over a short period of years. I do not offer this as a serious suggestion at this time, but perhaps some day it might be worthy of consideration. Perhaps we might introduce the practice which prevailed in days of old, in Palestine I think, where they had a year of jubilee every fifty years when all debts were wiped off. That might be not a bad principle to follow.

In order to balance a budget, the government has two methods at its command. One is to increase revenues, and I suppose in due course when the budget comes down we shall be able to note the measures to be taken to increase revenues by means of increased taxation. The other method is to decrease expenditure. The government is adopting to some extent this latter method in connection with the estimates which involve, as we all know, a decrease in the salaries of government employees. If I am any judge of public opinion I am inclined to believe that the country generally favours anything in the way of measures of economy. I am inclined also to believe that public opinion will support the government in making a reasonable reduction in the salaries of the higher salaried officials serving the country. The question is just where these reductions should end. I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken; I, too, have every sympathy with the man on a small salary whether he is serving the people of Canada or a private employer. To reduce the salary of a man who has to support a family on $60, $70, $75, $100 or even $125 per month does not seem to me to be consistent with the principle which I have laid down, that a Canadian is entitled to a respectable and reasonably comfortable living for himself and his family. This is where I take exception to the resolution.

There are those who have not very much sympathy with government employees. Some believe that there are too many of them, and in this I am inclined to agree but I think the efficient employee has not been too well paid in the past. It may be that a man living out in the country may think that a salary of $100 per month is large pay and that a man receiving such a salary could well afford to take a cut, but I think those who live in the city would say otherwise. Some reduction has taken place in the cost of living but I am afraid that a large proportion of that reduction has not reached the man who has a large family to support, at least it has not reached him to such an extent that he finds relief in the problem of making a living for himself and his family. There are those who believe that government employees are already well protected by reason of the fact that they are sure of their employment, but that is not true to-day because many government employees have been discharged from the service for reasons of economy. I am not a special advocate for those employed by the government, but I think I should point out that men have been attracted to the government service because of the sense of security therein even though the pay was small. These men received a small remuneration as compared with those in private employment only a few years ago; while they were sure of their jobs they had no opportunities to make a little extra money by means of investments or even speculation. If, during the period of prosperity these men had to bear a disability from which others did not suffer, it does not seem to me to be quite fair to take from them the little advantage which they had when the period of prosperity comes to an end.

The government is also cutting off the statutory increases. Some may say that a man cannot lose what he never had, but I think it is true that these employees relied upon their receiving the increase which the statute granted them from year to year. These employees made certain commitments—a man might purchase a small home or he might take out a policy of life insurance, and so on —obligations from which they cannot escape, and with this additional cut they will find things to be very embarrassing and difficult.

I think the government as well as the hon. members of this house desire to follow the wishes of the Canadian people generally in connection with this matter. There has been some suggestion made that we on this side are playing politics, but it happens that I have not very many civil servants in my constituency, and I can hardly be accused of playing politics in this matter. I have received representations from the letter carriers and the civil servants generally; I have had them from the Trades and Labour Council of my city, from the business men's association, from the ratepayers associations and from the Canadian Legion, and these representations have all been along the line of my own thought, that the government should not make a cut in the salaries of employees who are now receiving a remuneration just sufficient to keep body and soul together. I make the suggestion to the government in all seriousness, that they again consider this matter, if they have not already done so, and frame their bill in such a way that those receiving up to $100, or perhaps $125 per month be not subjected to any reduction.

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the question before the house has already been debated at length, however I wish to explain briefly the vote which I shall probably be called upon to register.

The government asks us to adopt a resolution the effect of which is to cut down the salaries of civil servants by ten per cent. It is true that the government has to meet serious financial difficulties of which it is solely responsible. There are two ways of levying revenues: First by increasing taxation and helping commercial enterprises; secondly, by decreasing the expenditure.

The government through its high tariff policy, has not only cut down its revenues but has almost exhausted its resources. The revenues are, to-day, much less. If for the last two years a reasonable policy, one identical to that of the Liberal party in 1930, had been resorted to, foreign trade would have maintained itself, imports and exports would have continued, and the government would have had sufficient revenues.

The government contends that it practises economy, but such is not the case. No matter where we turn, we discover that instead of economizing, the government displays extravagance in its administration. What is the situation? To quote only what took place in my constituency, the government appointed, since the last election, a large number of commissioners to hold inquiries, whose main work, in fact their only occupation, was to travel through the rural districts in order to ascertain who were the civil servants that sided with the opposition. There is not a post office to be found where the incumbent was suspected to be friendly to the Liberal party. These commissioners are still travelling through the country holding expensive inquiries. This government, sir, has also money to throw away to carry on inquiries as insignificant as the one relating to the travelling expenses of a certain Mr. Herridge. Although we must show respect to the Prime Minister of a country, however, one must not be led away to the extent of thinking that the honeymoon trip of Mr. Herridge or the Prime Minister's sister has such importance that we should have to spend enormous sums to inquire into events that are of no interest to the ratepayers of this country. If the government wishes to be extravagant in matters of this kind, I think it should not do so at the expense of our civil servants. In my opinion, the civil servants are not over paid, and furthermore, with the exception of two or three, I contend that they are not sufficiently remunerated.

Considering that the government should adopt other methods to increase its revenues, I shall be pleased to vote against this resolution.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I feel I cannot let this resolution pass without stating my position and I do so to-day more particularly because I was in 1929 as Postmaster General of Canada, the subject of one of the greatest onslaughts ever made upon a minister of the crown by the opposition of the day in an attempt to convince me that the lower salaried officials should have their salaries increased. At that time we saw the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), then in opposition, the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), then in opposition, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). then in opposition, as well as the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), then leading the opposition, appeal to the then government to increase the salaries of those who were employed at a salary of under $1,000 a year. For the information of the house and particularly of those members now here who did not occupy seats in this chamber at that time, I wish to call attention to some of the statements made on that occasion by the hon. gentlemen whom I have just mentioned. As reported on page 1874 of Hansard of 1929, I find the present Minister of Justice making this statement:

> When it comes to the higher grade salaries they are not niggardly, they are fairly generous; when it comes to a question of increasing the salaries of gentlemen of technical or professional knowledge, they take other means of getting round the Civil Service Act. . . . I believe that the lower grades of the civil service in Canada have been very badly treated by this government.

How are they being treated now, may I ask?

> They have sent those unfortunate people from pillar to post.

Where are they being sent now? There is not even a post for them upon which to rest their shoulders. They cannot find a pillar from which they may expect some solace. The same hon. gentleman continues on page 2180:

> I submit that the present salaries paid the lower grade officials in the postal service is a disgrace to Canada and to the public service, and should not be tolerated in this great country.

What has the hon. gentleman to say now when he is reducing those disgraceful salaries, as he called them at that time, to an even more disgraceful amount than they were in 1929? He continues:

> I would not suggest giving them a niggardly $60 increase as recommended by the Postmaster General.

No, but he suggests a niggardly decrease to them and the decrease is even blacker than the nigger to which he was referring when he spoke about the low salaries.

An hon. MEMBER: The nigger in the woodpile.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, that is the nigger in the woodpile that has come out. He continues:

I would give them something more substantial than that. I would see that a minimum was established of at least $100 a month.

An interruption took place at this point by myself and the present Minister of Justice, then in opposition, replied:

We will do it if you give us the chance.

After eighteen months of a chance given to him by the people of Canada he cuts the salaries by ten per cent.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was also a member of the house on that occasion, appealed to what he called the adamantine heart of the Postmaster General to let that heart of his be softened to his appeal, and to give those poor underpaid officials, not the $60 increase, which I had recommended to the Civil Service Commission, and which had been refused sanction by them, but an increase to $100. He stood in his place on this side of the house and pleaded with the then Minister of Justice, saying: "I appeal to the Minister of Justice to plead with the Minister of Finance and the Postmaster General." He then turned his gaze upon the Prime Minister of that date, now the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and appealed to him. He appealed to the then Minister of Finance; he appealed to each cabinet minister sitting on the front benches at that time, to attempt to soften the heart of the Postmaster General on behalf of those underpaid officials. May I to-day be permitted to appeal to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him to appeal to the new Minister of Finance, to attempt to soften his heart and not to make the ten per cent reduction against the men who were underpaid at that time. Oh, the answer will come back that living is cheaper to-day than it was in 1929 and 1930. The figures given the other day by the Prime Minister or some other minister showed a reduction of fourteen per cent in the cost of living, and the idea was that this reduction of ten per cent in salaries would be within the mark. Let me point out that the present Minister of Justice, speaking on one of the occasions in 1929 to which I have referred, stated that the cost of living at that time was $1,122.60 a year, and that for the mere necessaries of life for a family of five. That is a reduction of fourteen per cent, which leaves $965. Take the minimum salary paid officials in the Post Office Department, letter carriers and so forth. If you take ten per cent off what does it leave? It leaves them $972, merely five or six dollars above what the fourteen per cent reduction in the cost of living leaves them for the bare necessaries of life. And these are the gentlemen now occupying the government benches, whose tears flowed quite freely in 1929 on behalf of these poor, underpaid officials. There they sit to-day no doubt prepared to vote unanimously, as they have adopted unanimously in council, the reduction of ten per cent against these men. In the name of conscience, what reason can they give for it to-day? Let me quote the Minister of Trade and Commerce of to-day (Mr. Stevens) to show what his attitude was when he was in opposition in 1929. The hon. gentleman after appealing to the ministers of the government to be generous, said:

We have urged the government to take action. We have assured the government of our support, but we have failed up to the present to get any encouragement from them.

He was then appealing for an increase in salary for these men. To-day I am appealing to this same gentleman, now Minister of Trade and Commerce, to use his influence with the government so as not to have this ten per cent struck against the salaries of the lower paid officials. If in 1929 they could not live on a salary of $1,040 or $1,080 a year how can they live to-day with a reduction of ten per cent, which leaves them $972, according to government figures—an amount requisite for them to obtain the bare necessaries of life.

I believe in the principle that in times of stress such as the country is now passing through every man, according to his means, should bear his share of the burden; but let us not take from the pockets of poor families this ten per cent which they need so badly if they are to carry on. Let the reduction be graded. Let it weigh upon the shoulders of those best able to bear it. If the government will ask for a graded reduction I will support it on any amount above $1,200; but I do oppose, with all my soul and all my strength, a reduction of ten per cent to the man who is earning only $1,200 a year. Ten per cent of a reduction leaves him only $972, while the bare necessaries of life will cost $965.

At the time to which I have referred the then opposition went still further. I hold in my hand a circular issued during the campaign. When we on this side of the house occupied the seats to the right of Mr. Speaker we heard the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) wax eloquent in his appeal to the Postmaster General to pay a living wage to mail carriers and mail contractors. He wanted to place them on the basis of those under the Civil Service Commission, on a yearly salary. He claimed that those on contract were not receiving a living wage. I pointed out at that time the difficulty that would be encountered in an attempt to carry out that suggestion. Well, what do we find now? Lest someone should call me to order, let me say that I should be the last man in the world to impute political motives to the Conservative party when they issued this circular. I know they would not stultify themselves by doing anything from political or any other ulterior motive when they issued this circular to the mail carriers of the dominion. What do we find? Let me quote:

King and Veniot oppose relief. The King government, including both Mr. King and Mr. Veniot,—

They put me in very good company.

—voted down Mr. Guthrie's amendment for fair pay to the rural mail carriers, the vote being 160 to 70.

That was placed in the hands of every mail contractor in the dominion, and now my hon. friends opposite talk because we to-day undertake to criticize their actions and to defend the poor underpaid official, asking the government to carry out the pledges they made to the people with respect to unemployment. They say that because we do this we are playing the political game. I leave it to the public and to the friends of the Minister of Justice himself, sitting behind him, to judge whether he was playing politics when that circular to the mail carriers of Canada was issued.

There are several features about this question, and I was just going to forget one. I have a peach here and I do not want to miss it. I referred to the attitude taken by the present Minister of Justice and the present Minister of Railways—I see him taking copious notes and I hope I shall be able to soften his heart as he softened mine on that occasion.

Mr. MANION: I am taking notes on another matter.

Mr. VENIOT: I referred also to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. But I want now to refer to the gentleman who led the opposition at that time, and who now occupies the high position of Prime Minister of his native country. In one sense, Mr. Speaker, since the people have chosen the Conservative party to manage the affairs of the country for the time being, I am proud to see the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett as Prime Minister of Canada, because he comes from my own province. The upper sections of Canada, on the Conservative side especially, have had in the past very often to come down to the maritime provinces for the brains to try to run their party, and for that reason I am proud, since fate has designated that party to run the affairs of the country at the present time, that my right hon. friend is Prime Minister. But, with that pride in the right hon. gentleman's occupancy of the office, I must say that it is very difficult for me to agree with him in many cases, and particularly in the case I am going to cite now. He also took a hand in appealing on behalf of the civil service of Canada; he also denounced the then Postmaster General before all audiences for his hardness of heart because he would not consent to an increase in the salaries of lower paid officials. I have here a letter written by him to a certain employee in the civil service. He says:

Your night letters of the 5th and 9th dealing with reclassification of letter carriers reached me in due course. You will probably have observed from the press that the opposition as a unit urged that this matter be taken up at the present session. I really do not know how these men support themselves and a family on the meagre salaries they receive.

I would ask the Prime Minister of Canada to-day to put that very question to himself seriously before he reduces the salaries of these men by ten per cent. Is it possible that the Prime Minister was sincere when he wrote that letter? Certainly, if he was then he cannot be sincere now.

Mr. GOTT: What year was that?

Mr. VENIOT: The year 1928. And in 1929 and 1930, Hansard will show where he took the same attitude. I am reading this letter to show that the right hon. gentleman played his game not only on the floor of the house but by letters circulated throughout the length and breadth of Canada in which he tried to tell the lower-paid civil servants of Canada that the Liberal party was treating them in a niggardly way.

Mr. GOTT: I hope the surly look of the hon. member is not intended for me.

Mr. VENIOT: I would be wasting my good looks if I directed any such look towards my hon. friend. The letter continues:

I really do not know how these men support themselves and a family on the meagre salaries they receive. We pressed the other day that provision be made in the supplementary estimates for the letter carriers, and assured the government that they might take this action regardless of the Civil Service Commission, and promised them our united support.

May I in my turn say to the Prime Minister that if he will change his bill and not reduce the salaries under $1,200, but grade the reductions, I think he will receive the absolute and entire support of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: I appeal to him now, as he appealed to me then, to do justice to that class of civil servants. Then the letter continues:

> Just what will happen wo do not yet know, but Doctor Manion made our position very, very clear.

I hope that at this time Doctor Manion will be able to make the position of the Prime Minister and his government very clear. As he was put up at that time to make the position of the opposition quite clear, I hope he will possess the same ability at this time to make clear the stand of the government towards the civil servants.

I do not know what the proposed bill may contain, but in the meantime I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to what I believe will be certain injustices. I am told that the government will assume the five per cent—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, because I do not wish to be wrong—the five per cent taxed against civil servants for superannuation purposes. I want to ask the Minister of Finance now if that five per cent will apply equally to the retirement allowances?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend knows that to submit a question at this time is quite out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: Is it? I did not think the minister was so—

Mr. RHODES: If he will submit his question when we are in committee on the resolution I will be happy to answer him.

Mr. VENIOT: I am sure there would be no harm done if the minister would answer now.

Mr. RHODES: We would be committing a breach of the rules of the house.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, no, we would not be acting contrary to the rules of the house.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes we would.

Mr. VENIOT: It is against the desire of the government that the Minister of Finance should give the information which we seek to the house.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You will get it in plenty of time.

Mr. VENIOT: This is the stand I take: If the 5 per cent does not apply to the retiring allowance, an injustice is perpetrated against those who do not come under the superannuation but come under the retiring allowance.

Again I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the ten per cent cut. It would seem that the cut applies to those who have reached the maximum as well as to those who are grading up from the lower salaries to the maximum fixed by the Civil Service Commission. At the same time I understand the proposed bill will do away with the statutory increases, and in that connection I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to something which, if true, would indicate a great injustice to those men who would lose their statutory increases together with the ten per cent reduction as against the men who, having reached the maximum and not receiving statutory increases, will be reduced by only the ten per cent. Those who have reached the maximum have gone as high as they can go in their class. Is it fair that the ten per cent should apply against those who have not reached the maximum. I hope the Minister of Finance will consider what I have said, and ascertain if my statements are correct. In my view any injustice would be eliminated by a reduced or a graded reduction, giving special consideration to those who have not reached their maximum and will be deprived of statutory increases. Their reductions should be less, proportionately, than the reductions of those people who have reached their maximum salaries and therefore are not deprived of statutory increases.

These are matters of detail to which I think the Minister of Finance might well give his studied attention before the bill is presented to the house.

In conclusion allow me to state very definitely, as I did in the beginning of my remarks, that in these times of stress I believe every man should bear his share of the burden in proportion to his ability to do so. I am convinced that the man working for $1,000 a year cannot within reason bear any part of the burden of the depression. I believe further that instead of a straight ten per cent decrease there should be a graded decrease beginning at a certain figure, and going up. I believe further, sir, that the highly paid officials who, I believe, are to be exempt, should be called upon to bear their share. Referring a few days ago to lieutenant-governors the Prime Minister, stated that their salaries would not be touched, and that there was hardly a lieutenant-governor in Canada who, in order to keep up the dignity of his office, did not spend more than he earned in the position he occupied. Well, let us do away with a little of that dignity; let us have fewer receptions during these hard times. Surely on salaries of $9,000 per year they could place aside $900 to help the rest of Canada. Surely they will not witness the reduction in salaries of lower salaried men in the services of Canada, and be content to suffer no reductions themselves.

What about the judges? I am not a lawyer, and I have nothing to fear from them. I am free to express my opinion, and I say that a judge receiving $9,000 or $10,000 a year should contribute his share. The civil service have been told: You are protected; provided you behave yourselves and discharge your duties you are secure in your position and when you retire you get superannuation. Oh yes, civil servants are protected and they are entitled to superannuation on retirement —but they pay the greater part of that superannuation out of their own pockets; the government of Canada contributes only a minor portion. But, sir, if that argument is to be applied to the civil service generally, why should it not be applied to the judges? As I understand it, they do not contribute one dollar towards their superannuation, they are entitled to full superannuation after a certain period of service, and for any shorter period they get a pension based on the number of years of service. If because civil servants are protected they should not complain of carrying their share of the burden of this depression, then why should not the judges, who enjoy far greater protection and much more liberal superannuation benefits, bear their share of this burden also?

In these rambling remarks, Mr. Speaker, I have thought it well to state to the house and to the country where I stand before the vote is taken on this motion.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): It is rather deplorable, Mr. Speaker, that the house has had to listen to such remarks as those made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Brasset) on a matter that is now under investigation by a special committee of this house. Had the hon. member been present at the meeting of that committee to-day, he would have found that those who made certain allegations, instead of trying to prove them apologized for what they had said.

Mr. VENIOT: They were scared and had to do it.

Is it not against the rules of the house, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the doings of a committee before that committee has made its report?

Mr. GOBEIL: I absolutely agree with the hon. ex-minister, and that is exactly why I referred to the remarks of the hon. member for Gaspe. It is quite true that afterwards we had a speech from the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) in which he dealt with the question from the broad national standpoint. Of course, the house knows that he was not trying to derive any political advantage from what he said.

With respect to the proposed reduction of civil service salaries, I was rather surprised at the attitude taken by the official body representing the public service. I say "official body" advisedly. I know that a great proportion of the civil servants have accepted the reduction in the finest spirit, for they realize they are just as well treated as any other class of the community. Let me suggest that if the civil servants as a body had compared their position with that of wage-earners outside they would, through their official body, have taken a different attitude. For instance, all employees of commercial firms have had to accept a reduction of pay and all classes of business men have seen their revenues shrink during the last year and a half or two years. Had the civil service as a body made that comparison they would have come to the conclusion that even with this proposed ten per cent reduction they are still better off than their fellow citizens who have had to get along during the past two years with incomes reduced anywhere from 10 to 30 per cent. I realize that very likely within sound of my voice there are many civil servants who are ready and willing to accept this ten per cent reduction, knowing full well that they are getting justice at the hands of the government, but I would ask those who feel aggrieved to compare their lot with that of the farmers of this country, the largest class of our population, who for the last two years have seen their revenues diminished in many cases by 50 per cent. They do not work six, seven or eight hours a day, their hours of labour run from twelve to as high as fifteen or sixteen hours a day, but notwithstanding these long hours hundreds of thousands of our farmers to-day, at least those in the province of Quebec, are not receiving anything like ten or fifteen hundred dollars a year, in fact many of them are not receiving even eight hundred dollars a year.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to compare the farmers' situation with that of the judges?

Mr. GOBEIL: Not being a lawyer I will not undertake to answer the hon. member's question. I am told that the salaries of the judges cannot be reduced. Whether that is correct or not I cannot say, but I believe it to be the case. I may say to my hon. friend that I quite agree with him. And I might go a step further as he has raised the question: I do expect the judges will remit to the treasury at least ten per cent of their salaries.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I should like to ask the hon. member a question, just for my information. He knows that parliament is supreme in these matters. Would he not use his influence with the Prime Minister to have the judges included?

Mr. GOBEIL: That must be decided by those who have more legal knowledge than I have. Now just a further word about the farmers, as compared with the civil service. It has been said in this house many times that the farmers should not have automobiles, and I think in many cases that is quite so. I do not want to offend the civil servants, but if we are to judge from the number of automobiles around the public buildings of this city it is plain that the civil servants are better treated than are the farmers of this country.

Then I should like to remind the civil servants by whom they are paid. Do they realize that the men working on the streets of this city for $1.50 or $2 a day are contributing to their salaries? Do they also take into consideration the fact that labourers and other employees of commercial firms, who have seen their salaries reduced by from twenty per cent to thirty per cent in the last two years, have contributed during that period to the salaries of the civil servants, who received no reduction? For two years those whose salaries have been reduced by a great deal have contributed towards the payment of the regular salaries of the civil servants. I think if that had been considered by the organized civil servants they would have taken a different attitude.

[Mr. Gobeil.]

Many hon. members have expressed themselves as against the reduction in salaries. I say that salaries are not being reduced. Whether a salary is high or low is a relative matter, in connection with the salaries paid to others. My salary at $1,000 may be very high in comparison with my neighbour, doing the same work but receiving a salary of only $600. Another reason why I say salaries are not being reduced, in spite of what hon. members opposite have said and will continue to say until this motion is disposed of, is that every reasonable citizen of Canada knows very well that during the last twenty-four months the cost of living has gone down, and I am not exaggerating when I say it has gone down at least twenty per cent. Therefore during the last two years the civil servants were getting a greater salary, and now we are only asking that their salaries be made more comparable to those paid other people throughout this country. I suggest that the civil servants consider their fellow citizens, many of whom would be glad to receive a salary of $1,000 or even $800 a year. There are thousands of farmers who would be very glad to have a salary of $1,000 per annum; there are thousands of workers of all kinds who would be extremely glad to receive that amount.

Let me conclude my remarks by repeating that I do not want to be unfair to the public service. I do believe a great majority of the civil servants are accepting this reduction willingly, but to those who are protesting I offer the suggestion that they think twice before they talk too much. Let them think of their fellow Canadians who are not getting the salaries they are getting and who are not sure of employment for twelve months each year.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I object to the exemptions from the ten per cent cut. If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, those receiving less than $1,200 will be reduced by five per cent and those receiving more than $1,200 will be reduced by ten per cent. Then there are the exceptions: lieutenant-governors, judges, members of the military, naval and air forces, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I see no reason why those I have named should not be reduced ten per cent as well. I saw a table published in the Ottawa Journal of February 25, in which it was stated that in the Department of National Defence there are eighteen men receiving from $4,000 to $4,900; five men receiving from $5,000 to $5,900; one man receiving from $8,000 to $8,900, and one man receiving more than $12,000. With the rank and file of the defence forces so reduced I cannot think what these generals or colonels or whatever they are can be doing. It seems to me we have a general staff capable of handling an army of half a million men.

Mr. COOTE: They are holding the fort.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes, they must be holding the fort; at least they are getting very high salaries, and there is no sensible reason why they should be exempted. Then there is the navy. Of course our navy is not very large, but still we have a navy, and the officers and men are exempt from this reduction. One wonders whether, when this legislation was being drafted, the near mutiny of the British navy was recalled. The other day the Prime Minister told us how cheerfully the British civil servants accepted their reduction. I recall that there was almost a mutiny in the British navy, and possibly that had more to do with Great Britain going off the gold standard than anything else. No doubt the money lenders of New York and Paris thought that if the British navy was close to a mutiny it was about time to do something sensible, and they proceeded to do it. We all remember the demonstrations in Hyde park, so there is no use telling us such things as the Prime Minister told us, because after all, while we are very much under the domination of the Prime Minister, we are still intelligent and our memories are reasonably good.

Then the members of the mounted police are to be exempt also. We all saw the show put on to-day, with men wearing uniforms with expensive braid trimming standing at all the gates. I was not sure whether or not I could get in. There was also a detachment of mounted police hidden behind the buildings and in the courts of the different blocks. I suppose they need to be well paid for such arduous service.

In looking over the exemptions from the cut which have been granted to the judges, the army and navy officers and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, it would seem as though all the agencies of force had been exempt. Possibly the judges may thus have clearer vision in giving decisions on the cases likely to come before them in the months to come. I do not suppose there is any use in getting excited over this matter or in protesting further, but it does seem to contain all the elements of force. These classes are exempt from the cut, while the rest of the service must take a ten per cent reduction.

I think a sharply graduated cut would have been more equitable to everyone. A man making $10,000 per year will not be hurt very much by a ten per cent cut. I am opposed to the whole policy of contraction, to the lowering of salaries, the lowering of commodity prices and the general scaling down because the purchasing power of the people will be still further reduced. I am in a peculiar position representing, as I do, an almost purely agricultural constituency. The people in my constituency have had to take a cut, not of ten per cent but of sixty or seventy per cent. They feel very bitter about this and some of them cannot understand that to reduce still further the purchasing power of the people will not help them. Those who can scarcely get together the necessities of life are resentful of those who have enough and to spare.

I do not like losing money any more than anyone else but I am glad to share to some degree in the suffering of my constituents. This may give some moral support. But my purchasing power will be reduced by $400, and to that slight extent it will be detrimental to the general situation in Canada. When I returned $6,000 to the treasury I thought, and I still think that there is some moral value in suffering with those who have to suffer. This reducing of salaries and the slashing of commodity prices is economically unsound. We should have a different policy, one which would permit the issuing of more currency to be put into circulation without an accompanying burden of debt in the form of interest. I think that that should be done at once. I was interested in an article which appeared in last evening's Ottawa Journal, a reprint of an editorial of the Vancouver Sun. Dealing with the need of the reduction of wages which money receives, it says:

> But did it never occur to Premier Bennett how important to the masses and how important to business it is that the wages of money should also be reduced?
> In Canada, "money wages" are earned on the federal and provincial and railway debt, which amount to five billion dollars. An average interest rate of 5 per cent on this five billions means an annual interest charge or wage of 250 million dollars that the people have to carry.
> Instead of allowing the wages of money to increase from 4 to 5 per cent and up to 7 per cent, why does our premier not have the moral courage to get up on the floor of parliament and declare that the interest on Canada's five billions of debt shall be reduced to, say 4 per cent? Four per cent interest at to-day's commodity prices and to-day's wages actually gives a greater purchasing power than 5 per cent gave two or three years ago. True, the interest on capital must be protected, but no more than the wages of men.

I think that is quite true. Speaking of the currency issue, the article reads:

A much more constructive and, so far as outside security holders are concerned, honourable adjustment on money, would be for our Ottawa government to dilute Canada's five billion interest-bearing securities by adding two hundred or three hundred million dollars to the Canadian note currency.

I believe that that will yet be done, but it should be done now. That would be a far sounder policy than the present reduction. After all, this reduction means a saving of only $8,300,000; that is not a great amount and, as someone has said, it only hastens bankruptcy. I have begun to think that bankruptcy is the best thing that could happen. Those in control of finance will never see the light until we are face to face with bankruptcy. This business of scaling down salaries and increasing the misery of the people seems to be the only method being used by the government.

I am going to make a statement which to some may not seem to be reasonable—I intend to act as a representative of Southeast Grey. I am sure that a majority of my constituency would be in favour of a ten per cent reduction in salaries of $1,200, but I do not think they would agree to the same reduction being made on both small and large salaries—the reduction should increase as the salaries increase.

While I believe the reduction to be economically unsound I do not feel I would be representing Southeast Grey if I did not support this reduction. If I were voting for myself as an individual and not as a representative of my constituency, I should vote against the cut in the salaries of the civil servants in Canada, not because I think the civil servant should not suffer with the rest of Canada—Ottawa has been an oasis in the desert of depression—but because I believe that this policy of reduction will add to the misery now existing. While I am opposed to the policy, I will support it, and in making this statement I am being distressingly honest. In supporting this measure I am acting as a true representative of my constituency, and, after all, that is what we should be. The element of representation does enter into the membership of this House of Commons and one should not forget that as far as possible he should reflect the opinion of his constituency.

Mr. LUCIEN DUBOIS (Nicolet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention, being a farmer, to take a very active part in this debate, seeing that others better qualified have thoroughly gone into the matter. May I, however, humbly express in the house, my views on the question submitted to us. At the outset, I must state that the terms of this resolution hold no surprise for me, and the more I acquire parliamentary experience and the more I take part in the work of the seventeenth parliament, the more I become convinced that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was not in earnest in 1930. I shall repeat for the hundredth time, as my colleagues and the Canadian people have done, that the electorate was shamefully deceived at the last election. It is true that those who sit on your right, sir, are not fond of having the surgeon's knife pry into the opened wound of their extravagant pledges in 1930; they shun the sight of the quivering wound-flesh caused by their foolish political eccentricities; however, it is our duty to scrutinize in this house all their pledges, so as to show them up to the people under their true light, in such a way that they will not in the future deceive the electorate as they did in 1930. The right hon. Prime Minister then travelled over the whole country, and everywhere he pledged himself to remedy all the evils borne by the people. He promised everywhere a wonderful prosperity, everywhere it was the same singsong: he was to revive in Canada bountiful days and turn the country into a marvellous land of Eden. But, with bankruptcy staring his administration in the face and his powerlessness to relieve all the ills from which the country suffered, he now appeals, in 1932, to the people to bear up in order to help him to administer the affairs of the country and thus permit him to remain in power. He furthermore appeals to the small wage-earners, the humble, the working classes, that they bleed themselves to death in order to balance a budget which hobbled along after the first eight months under his administration, limped very sadly this year, and probably will be crawling next year. After having pledged himself to relieve the people's distress, he exacts a ransom for bread and hunger from those to whom so much sympathy was shown in 1930.

In 1930, the Liberal party was blamed for the economic crisis, my leader was charged with all the evils from which the country suffered, he was made the scape-goat burdened with all the responsibilities for the distress then existing. In 1932, the Government faced with the failure of its administration, and its helplessness to relieve the economic depression, endeavours to make amends, and instead of circumscribing the crisis, or viewing it as a national problem, it now describes it as of international character, as, after all, was the case in 1930. To-day faced with the impossibility of relieving the depression, the government states openly that this economic crisis in no way can be attributed to one country alone, but depends on uncontrollable circumstances, is of an international and world-wide character. Why did not the members sitting on the government benches acknowledge, in 1930, what they recognize to-day? Why did they not then view the crisis under its true aspect?

What did the Government do, after being placed in power, to relieve all the ills of which the liberal party was responsible, according to the conservative party? It called a special session, had $20,000,000 voted to relieve unemployment—an anti-social law in my opinion—it bungled up the tariff in all possible manner, once more neglecting agriculture for which so much sympathy was shown during the election. And to what purpose? To be followed by a general and much felt depression, an unemployment which spread in direct ratio of the square of the Government's incompetence. It ended in jeopardizing business and agriculture, and if there are here civil servants who hear me, allow me, sir, to tell them that if they are sacrificed by this government, agriculture had also its large share in these sacrifices. Last year, in the speech from the throne, four words were inserted on behalf of the farming class for which so much sympathy was shown; this year nothing was inserted, no allusion to agriculture is even made. I should like on this occasion to discuss agriculture at length, however, I shall have an opportunity to refer to it later on in the session.

Prosperity was to flourish again and unemployment was to vanish. What result was attained? There is more poverty than ever, the unemployed are more numerous and notwithstanding the hard times, hundreds of civil servants are thrown on the street.

After having long sought to relieve the present depression, the Prime Minister, who on the day before had been torturing his brains to find a solution to the deplorable financial situation of the country by morning suddenly awakes, a flash of lightning seems to have illumined his thoughts and with a loud cry of "Eureka," he calls for the civil service list, slashes right and left, and on behalf of patriotism he calls upon all civil servants to sacrifice 10 per cent of their salary to help him in redeeming his election pledges. I quite agree that all should accept their share of sacrifices in the country's interest, and personally, I think that each should contribute his quota to relieve the economic situation, but what I object to are the means adopted. This cut in salaries should be carried out not on the basis advocated, but on a graduated scale. As to the average and lower grades of civil servants, I agree with the Rev. Mr. Boileau, chaplain of the "Syndicats Catholiques" of Montreal, that the measure proposed by this resolution is anti-social.

It is the custom in this House, to bring in support of the statements made, one's own preferred authorities. To support my own statement, I shall not have recourse to a letter written by a woman, whose name it is deemed proper not to divulge, a letter written by a woman ready to sacrifice herself for the country when it chances to please the right hon. Prime Minister, but I shall quote from an untouchable, undeniable, and indefectible authority, the authority of Rome.

In his henceforth unforgettable encyclical letter "Quadragesima Anno" the Roman Pontiff took up social questions and the following is what he states, speaking of the requirements of public welfare:

> It is in the public interest that the workmen and employees should, after meeting the indispensable expenses, set aside part of their salary so as to build up a modest fortune.

And further he adds:

> The estate must be sufficiently large to meet the needs of an honest living and to give the people some degree of comfort and culture which, providing a wise use is made of it, places no impediment to virtue, but on the contrary singularly facilitates its practice.

Instead of having recourse to this system of taxation, I think the government should have raised the rate of the income tax and taxed government bonds. The Dominion loan bonds last year was taken up in a very short period. Within a week we were informed that already $650,000,000 had been subscribed. Have you ever wondered why these millions were subscribed so quickly? I believe that a number of capitalists were anxious to shelter their capital by investing in state bonds. Probably there are amounts of $25,000, $50,000 or $100,000 in this subscription which do not pay a cent tax to the government, because they are not registered. Why were the wealthy people living in luxury, that is those who can most afford to pay, allowed to escape taxation? Thus the opinion of the authority which I have just quoted would have been followed, for speaking of activities of the state in social welfare, the following is what the encyclical letter says:

> It behooves governments to protect the community and the individuals who form part of it, however in dealing with personal rights they must specially look after the weak and the poor.

The wealthy classes make a rampart of their wealth and have less need of public guardianship. The poor classes on the contrary, without wealth to give them protection depend especially on the state for such protection. Let the state therefore be full of regard and solicitude for the workmen who belong to the poor classes.

I can quite understand that cabinet ministers are not making a great fuss over this measure, they thought fit to have a $2,000 bonus voted to them last year, they who at present receive an indemnity of $16,000 per year. If they contribute to the treasury $1,600, they still have a salary of $14,400. It is $400 more than the ministers had under the King régime. While nobody suspected the plot, they so managed their own affairs that their salary was not affected, yet they are bold enough to place a tax of ten per cent on the small wage earners who are in receipt of $1,200, and on those whose income is $1,500, $1,800 or $2,000 per year. The employees who even now find it hard to get along with such salaries will be forced to contribute to the treasury $130, $140, $150 or $180 per year.

What effect will this measure have on the budget of those whose salaries put them in the average grade? A salary cut, that goes without saying, a decrease in purchasing power and therefore an upsetting of the family budget. Has anybody ever figured out what was the average cost of keeping a family of five persons? After consulting the Labour Gazette of February, 1932, at page 223, I find the following details, being the result of an inquiry held in sixty-nine towns of Canada: the following is the average cost per week for the upkeep of a family of five persons: food, including meat, butter, eggs, flour, peas, beans, sugar, vinegar, etc., $7.68 per week. No one will say that this is exaggerated. Heating and lighting $3.11 per week, rent $6.77 per week. Total expenditure per week $17.56. If you multiply this amount by 52 weeks you arrive at a total of $913.12 for the upkeep of a family of five persons per year.

Still according to the Labour Gazette one must further allow for clothes, underwear, and medical care or other unforeseen expenses, 50 per cent more, representing $456.53, which, added to the $913.12 brings up the total to $1,369.65. This is for the average class of civil servants. There still remains the lower grade to deal with. Let us suppose, for a moment, that the latter only spend 30 per cent of the family expenditure for clothes, underwear, medical care or unforeseen expenses, we arrive at a total of $1,187.05.

How can you expect that a civil servant belonging to the average grade and having to spend yearly $1,369.65 can possibly set aside savings for his old days? And yet, I repeat it, the following is what the authority I quoted, says:

It is in the public interest that the workmen and employees should, after meeting the indispensable expenses, set aside part of their salary so as to build up a modest fortune.

What is there that remains to these wage earners, to these employees to provide for the education and teaching of their children? Nothing. And yet,

The estate must be sufficiently large to meet the needs of an honest living and to give the people some degree of comfort and culture which, providing a wise use is made of it, places no impediment to virtue, but on the contrary singularly facilitates its practice.

Instead of taxing the small wage earner and the civil servant belonging to the average class, the government should increase somewhat the income tax, tax luxury but not the necessities, and ask those who can afford it, to contribute and not those who have already heavy expenses to meet.

It behooves governments to protect the community and the individuals who form part of it, however in dealing with personal rights they must specially look after the weak and the poor. The wealthy classes make a rampart of their wealth and have less need of public guardianship. The poor classes, on the contrary, without wealth to give them protection depend especially on the state for such protection. Let the state therefore be full of regard and solicitude for the workmen who belong to the poor classes.

Why does the Prime Minister seek with such stubbornness to introduce this arbitrary scale? He must have received protests from all parts of the country. To refreshen his memory, I shall quote a resolution adopted by the civil servants of Montreal, at a meeting held on February 22, 1932:

Whereas civil servants as a whole and particularly those whose salary is $2,000 or less did not draw remuneration proportionate to the increased cost of living when prosperity existed and everywhere salaries were raised.

Whereas the ten per cent will mean a greater loss, if the contribution made to the retiring fund (entirely paid by the employees) and the statutory increase which are to be cancelled, are taken into account.

Whereas this reduction will specially affect retail trade by decreasing the purchasing power.

Whereas civil servants have always been poorly remunerated.

Whereas the salary cut will affect the pensions.

Be it resolved that we request respectfully the government to modify its resolution relating to the cut of salaries by ten per cent, because it would not be fair that those who in no way benefited in prosperous times should be affected in such a radical way.

We understand the sad state in which the country's finances are, however, we believe that a decrease of salary is not a remedy to the situation, especially when it falls upon a class of civil servants who were unable, in heyday to economize owing to the insufficiency of their salary.

Furthermore, I shall draw the attention of the government to another resolution adopted by the Railway Mail Clerks' Association, of Montreal, which was forwarded to me on February 20 last:

Mr. L. Dubois, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Sir,—

Allow me to respectfully draw your attention to the following resolution adopted at the regular meeting of this association held in Montreal, on the 17th inst., and which resolution reads as follows:

"That this association protests against the general cut of ten per cent in all salaries without exception and requests that rather a graduated reduction based on the amount of the salaries be made, consideration being had for the smaller salaries."

Trusting that our request will receive your kind attention,

I reamain,
Respectfully yours,
(Sgd.) M. J. E. Blais,
Secretary,
Coaticook, Que.

I wonder, after all these protests, why the government still persists in adhering to the provisions of the bill. History must have taught them that a rash action of Napoleon caused the loss of thousands of lives in the steppes of Russia. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is endowed with exceptional qualities, I acknowledge it; but he has the defects of his qualities and those of certain small men. He realizes his perfections better than his failings. I would beg of him to act with care, and on the same score that he has requested this sacrifice from the civil servants, on behalf of patriotism, I also request him on behalf of the most integral patriotism not to disturb the small salaried men or those belonging to the average class; I further make this request on behalf of Christian justice, on behalf of Christian charity, on behalf of sound social doctrine.

As my good friend, the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) requested, I beg of him to introduce a bill in which humanism will predominate; and like the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I would advise him to be silent for a day, so as to prepare, in quietness and meditation, a more just and sound measure.

Mr. F. T. SHAVER (Stormont): It is my intention to take up the time of the house for only a very few minutes. I had not intended to participate in this debate; but after listening to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite which covered the whole range of argument from the calm and rather dispassionate address of the former Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) to the speech which was delivered with such evangelistic fervour by the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), I believe there is one aspect of the case which no speaker except the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) discussed at all.

In the discussion of a reduction of wages, there are always two sides to be considered—the opinion of the employer and the opinion of the employees. We have heard at great length just how the employees may feel about this reduction; that it may in some cases work a slight hardship; but it was the hon. member for Southeast Grey only who gave us the considered opinion of the employer. In this case who is the employer of the civil servants of Canada? Is it the government? Is it parliament? No; it is the ten million people of Canada who pay the taxes, who are the employers. The hon. member for Southeast Grey has told us that the people of her constituency are very much in favour of this reduction; that they consider it reasonable. I have gone to the trouble to ascertain the opinions of some of the representative citizens of my constituency, both in the rural part and in the industrial section, and I believe it is the consensus of opinion that owing to the present depression throughout the world and the existing condition of affairs in Canada when it is absolutely necessary that reduction in expenditure shall be made, this reasonable reduction of ten per cent in the salaries of the civil servants of this country, is something that should be put into effect without delay. There have been advanced during the course of the debate by speakers from the opposition side many, shall I say rather queer arguments. The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), who time and again has proclaimed himself in the house and in the country as the great champion of Liberal principles, who has told us time and again what the great Liberal party—and it has been a great party—has stood for, in the course of his speech argued in favour of a capital levy. After listening to that address I came to the conclusion that the hon. member for North Battleford should transfer his seat to the far corner of that side of the house.

I was rather surprised that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) should put forth the idea, I believe in all seriousness, that the various government houses throughout Canada should be closed at the present time and that all these great social functions which are held in different portions of the country—and I suppose the social functions in Ottawa would be included—should be dispensed with during the period of depression. To people who are out of work and others who are in receipt of low salaries this appeal, that these social functions engaged in by the wealthy, leisured class, should be dispensed with, sounds very well. But do you know that some of these gentlemen who in appealing to the people of the country are democrats to the hilt, can be on other occasions aristocrats of the aristocrats? It was my good fortune recently to be in my room in the house when I saw passing down the corridor the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) dressed in his Windsor uniform, and a fine figure he made; he might have been taken right out of the pages of some romantic novel of the middle ages. I am sure he may be proud that he has reached the place where he can wear that uniform. I do not in the least blame him for it, and I believe that the making of that uniform, the preparation of the material of which it consists, the employment of the men who made it, and the men who from time to time press it or repair it or keep it in good condition—all this provides wages and helps to give a certain number of people a living, or to contribute to that end. And so, when these social functions are held in various parts of the country, including the capital city, I suppose in the great majority of instances where beautiful gowns are worn the ladies who wear them can afford to do so, and we should remember that the making of the gowns has given work to hundreds of women who needed it. The retailing of the gowns has given reasonable profits to many merchants, and I for one am not in favour of having any of the social functions done away with, because it is one of the means by which people with money may be induced to part with it, thus providing work for those who would otherwise be unemployed at the present time.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The hon. gentleman speaks of the making or repairing of gowns. Does he realize that in the future the gowns will be shorter by ten per cent?

Mr. SHAVER: The hon. gentleman may have some inside information, and it is possible that in the course of time they may be shortened. Still they will provide a great deal of work for the seamstresses and others who are engaged in their manufacture.

There has been a considerable reduction in the cost of living; that question has been debated to a great extent. The civil servants in Ottawa and throughout the country are having their salaries reduced by ten per cent, although in the great majority of cases of those receiving under $1,200 the reduction will be only five per cent. But I have taken the trouble to ascertain from one of the leading merchants of my own county, a man who has been in business for a quarter of a century and who keeps a very accurate record of costs in every department of his business, what the average reduction in the cost of living has been from the year 1930 up to the present time. The figures he has given after a very careful computation are these: Foodstuffs 27 to 29 per cent; dry goods 22 to 25 per cent; and boots and shoes from 18 to 20 per cent. And these reductions apply all along the line in all classes of commodities. I am sure therefore that any civil servant whose salary has been reduced by ten per cent will find it easier to make both ends meet during the coming year than he could formerly with his salary as it was but with prices higher.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) made somewhat contemptuous allusion to the mounted police, the forces of law and order. As a citizen of Canada, I am proud of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and I think every other citizen of this dominion should be equally proud of them. There is no body of men holding similar positions and doing similar work in any country in the world more worthy of the support and admiration of all citizens of the country employing them than is this fine body of men. I am sure we should be glad that men who possess so much tact and common sense and so great an ability to get along with people in a reasonable way, men who are able to quell disturbances with a minimum of trouble, are in our midst, and on every occasion we should do all that we can to support and strengthen that organization.

The civil servants of Canada are just as reasonable as any other citizens of this country. I have had occasion to discuss this question with various members of that fine body and I believe that we have a civil service in Canada the equal of any other service of the kind in the world. In my own county there are a large number of civil servants employed in two or three departments. They are very efficient men and I believe that, as reasonable people, they will regard this reduction as fair. It has been announced that it is for only one year, and we know that if times improve and conditions are better, the civil servants will have their former salaries restored in course of time.

I believe that the civil servants of my own county will view the reduction as a reasonable one and will be ready to accept it in that spirit.

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull): I feel quite at ease speaking on this resolution as a member representing the city on the other side of the river. One reason for my discussing the resolution is that I was requested to do so not only by the Liberals of my riding but also by the organized Conservatives of the whole county. I have here a resolution passed by the Conservatives of my city at a meeting on February 24, requesting me to voice their protest against the motion now before the house. Being so close to the capital, and having in my riding so many civil servants, I think I can describe to a certain extent the spirit in which they accept reduction in salaries. The resolution which I am about to quote to the house was supported by a gentleman who was the president of the press gallery last year. He is in the gallery again this year, and I may say that he was speaking in the name of the Conservative member for Hull in the Quebec legislature. I will not translate the resolution but will read it just as it was reported in Le Droit of February 25:

(Translation)

Mr. Edgar Boutet also approved of the resolution. He asserted that he was authorized by Mr. Aimé Guertin, M.P.P., who had been detained elsewhere, to express the views of the member for Hull in this respect.

The following are the views of Mr. Guertin, M.P.P., conveyed by Mr. Boutet:

The proposed cut in the salary represents an economy of $8,000,000 while the deficit amounts to $300,000,000. Even if, adds Mr. Boutet, the government faces, at the end of the next fiscal year, a small deficit of $8,000,000, it will not prove a success. Why then force the small wage-earners to pay for abuses and extravagances of the previous regime.

Mr. Boutet states that he has no hesitation in censuring his leader (Mr. Bennett) on this question. He further censures Mr. King who approves of the principle of the cut in salaries from $2,000 up.

Further on—and this is where he requests me to raise my voice against the motion of his leader—

"No bad example is to be given to other employers." And for that reason, it behooves the Conservative club to request our member at Ottawa to vote against the principle of any reduction whatsoever.

The same evening in another hall a meeting of the Liberal association was held, at which a resolution was carried requesting me to oppose the measure now before the house. I hope I will not be charged with trying to create political capital out of this matter, but representing a riding where so many people are affected, I feel their protests should be voiced in this house. The reason given by the Conservatives for passing the resolution to which I referred was that the government were setting a bad example to merchants, industrialists and other employers. The Liberals gave the reason that the flat reduction would bear more heavily on the lower salaries than on the higher ones.

In my city I do not find the spirit described by the hon. member who took his seat just a few moments ago. I would suppose that in his riding there are practically no civil servants, whereas in the city of Hull there are about five hundred. Taking an average of five per family we find that in a city of 26,000 or 27,000 population, about 2,500 people must be affected by the reduction.

A few days ago, speaking on the question of unemployment, I stated that in Hull there were about 2,000 unemployed, and that in the month of February for direct relief the city council had authorized the payment of nearly $18,000. I said that every Saturday morning there are at our city hall about 700 or 800 people asking for jobs, doles, or direct relief. Under such conditions our people cannot act in the good spirit described by a few hon. members who have spoken.

Referring to the additions to the number of civil servants I quote the Fnancial Post of December 12, 1931:

While the government has done something to restrict the increase in expenditures, this gain to the taxpayers has been, in part, destroyed by the inability to enforce economy in the ordinary business of government. The statistics on the civil service, just issued, show that the personnel which stood at 44,175 in 1930 increased to 45,581 in 1931, or an increase of 1,406 persons. The cost of the service rose from $67,178,198 in 1930 to $70,196,311 in 1931. And these figures do not take into account the number and wages of non-enumerated classes. All told, the cost of the service in 1930 was $90,808,425 and this year $94,310,983. This addition of $3,500,000 is just one of the important reasons why the government is unable to make headway with economy. All of these additional 1,400 employees must be housed, must work, and the only explanation is that governmental activities continue to increase, rather than diminish.

Then the article goes on to explain conditions in the civil service in the year 1912. The figures I have quoted show that under this government in one year the number of civil servants belonging to enumerated classes increased to the extent of 1,406, bringing a further expenditure to the government in one year of $3,500,000. The proposed reduction will affect the revenues or expenditures to the amount of $8,300,000. I wonder why the 1,400 people were brought into the civil service during the one year. I was under the impression that they had reduced their staffs. I find however that instead of reducing they have increased the staffs.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member permit a question? Upon what authority does he say that 1,400 additional appointments have been made to the civil service during the past year?

Mr. FOURNIER: As I said before, I am quoting the Financial Post of December 12, 1931, as recorded by an Ottawa correspondent. I did not invent the figures I have quoted and, in fact, I find they agree—probably not exactly, but nearly—with the figures given by the Prime Minister a few evenings ago. He said the total expenditure for civil service salaries amounted to $83,000,000. In the figures I have quoted the amount is given at about $90,000,000. I am not sure however whether the Prime Minister referred only to enumerated classes and not to those receiving indemnities. I think if the minister compared the figures I have given with those given by the Prime Minister he would find very little difference.

Mr. CAHAN: I doubt very much whether 1,400 new appointments were made.

Mr. FOURNIER: I have given the figure of 1,406 new employees. That could be explained to some extent at least by the extra officials who were engaged to put into effect the operation of the 5 per cent bonus on wheat or other acts.

Mr. CAHAN: Of course, during the past year a considerable number of people were appointed census enumerators, but those appointments were only temporary and for the purpose of carrying out census work. Quite possibly there were additions in that connection, but as to permanent employees in the service, from my personal knowledge I am absolutely sure that the quotation my hon. friend cites is not correct.

Mr. FOURNIER: I did not say that those 1,400 people were added to the permanent staffs of the civil service; I said new hands were taken on. For instance, there is no permanent staff in connection with the Public Works department in Ottawa; in that department there are only temporary employees. I have known however of people who have worked there for the last twenty-five years. Additions of temporary employees might have been made in that department. Undoubtedly there were some civil servants employed in Ottawa for the census, but not 1,400. At least 80 people were engaged at one time to put into operation the 5 cent bonus to the western farmers. If the information I have quoted is correct, however, it will show that the number of employees was increased rather than diminished, and as a result the expenditure in the last fiscal year was $3,500,000 greater than it had been in the previous year.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FOURNIER: Before six o'clock I was stating that the constituency I represent is very much interested in this resolution, nearly five hundred people in my city being civil servants, and that the proposed reduction was opposed not only by supporters of the official opposition but also by supporters of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself. I recited a resolution passed by the Hull Conservative Association last week blaming the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for introducing this resolution. At adjournment the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) questioned the figures I had cited, which I had taken from the Financial Post. During the recess I went to the trouble of looking up the figures given by the Prime Minister last Friday while speaking on the resolution. I stated that there were 44,175 civil servants belonging to certain enumerated classes, and that in 1931 they numbered 45,581, being an increase of 1,406. I also stated that the salaries of those enumerated classes for 1930 amounted to $67,178,198, and for 1931 to $70,196,311. I find on page 562 of Hansard the Prime Minister stated:

> On January 18, 1932, we had 36,595 permanent employees and 6,058 on a temporary basis, making a total of 42,653 receiving salaries and wages amounting to $66,808,653.01. There are a large number of seasonal and casual employees not included in the list to which I have referred, receiving various rates of pay. These total about 1,820 computed on a permanent basis—the temporary basis fluctuating from day to day—and receiving remuneration amounting to $1,297,743.50, while the temporaries as of January 18 last, received $7,374,847.21.

On the same page he also stated that the total number of employees, including the seasonals and casuals, numbered 44,473, receiving $75,481,243.72. There may be a slight discrepancy between the figures cited by the Prime Minister and those I have taken from the Financial Post. I do not think the two calculations were made on quite the same basis; probably the correspondent for the Financial Post included the judges, the military staffs, and others not covered by the resolution, which would account for the difference in our respective figures. I believe the figures I quoted are substantially correct and stand uncontradicted by the figures given by the Prime Minister.

It was said by certain hon. gentlemen on the other side who have spoken on this resolution that the civil servants received the news of the ten per cent reduction in a good spirit. I do not know exactly where these supporters of the government obtained their information, but I have under my hand protests from various organizations in the city of Hull and from outside organizations too. The first protest I received is from L'Union des Employés des Postes du Canada:

> The members of the Hull branch of the postal employees union of Canada at a special meeting have requested us to forward you a copy of their motion protesting against the salary cut of the civil servants.

Evidently they do not accept the ten per cent reduction in such a "good spirit" as was mentioned this afternoon. Here is a protest from the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada:

> This organization strongly protests a ten per cent cut in the salaries of lower paid civil servants, but we regard the government's action in stopping statutory increases coincident with such a proposed reduction as ill-considered and something that could not be justified under any circumstances, in that it bears hardest upon those least able to afford it, and is discrimination of the worst type.

The Federated Association of Letter Carriers of Canada write me as follows:

> We the officers and members of branch No. 2 of the Federated Association of Letter Carriers of Canada desire to enlist your assistance in protesting against the proposed ten per cent cut in salary to all civil servants.

Then follows a table showing the effect of the reduction. A copy of this has, I believe, been sent to every member of the house. The Ottawa Journal of February 22, 1932, contained an editorial under the caption The Civil Service Cut, from which I quote the following:

> We are all only too well aware of the difficulties of the government. It must balance its budget. But isn't the answer to that simply that it is hardly fair to ask so much of sacrifice from one class—a moderately paid civil service class? The income tax exempts a married man up to $3,000. That being so, what is the justification of a demand that a civil servant getting $1,200 should contribute $60?

I believe there are over 60,000 civil servants in Canada, and in this city there are between 12,000 and 15,000. Certainly these people must have dependents relying on their salaries for a livelihood; in an ordinary family there are about five people, so if you multiply the number of civil servants by five you will find the number affected by this reduction. In Hull we have nearly 500 civil servants, which would mean about 2,500 people affected by this measure. A few days ago I explained how labourers and tradesmen in Hull have been affected by the unemployment crisis; if now we are to have another 2,500 people hit by this reduction, certainly they must be helped in some way. The best way to help them would be to keep their salaries at the same level as in the past. Since September, 1930, forty-five bankruptcies and assignments have been registered at the Hull court house, while five more from my district have been registered in other districts. One of the reasons for these bankruptcies and assignments certainly has been the lack of purchasing power of the people in my vicinity, and by this reduction we will not augment their purchasing power but will reduce it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does not the hon. member think the employees of those firms that have gone bankrupt would be glad to continue working at ninety per cent of their former salaries?

Mr. FOURNIER: If the people in my riding to whom I refer, could not get along with one hundred per cent purchasing power I do not know how they will do with a ninety per cent purchasing power. We never like to see salaries go down; of course that is only natural, but I do not see why the city of Ottawa or the city of Hull should be singled out in this way. The people in these cities submit to the same taxation as the people living in other parts of the country; these civil servants have their municipal taxes and their income taxes to pay when they receive salaries large enough, and now, after this reduction, they will have to go on paying the same taxes. An hon. member opposite said many farmers would like to receive a salary of $1,000, but I doubt if many farmers would leave their own homes to come to a city like Ottawa and live on a salary of $1,000, when we know that this salary is not enough for the upkeep of an ordinary family.

The protests we hear on the streets of both cities with regard to this reduction in salary might be summarized in this way: The flat reduction is unjust because it makes no difference between those receiving very low and those receiving very high salaries. A man receiving $1,200 or more is affected more severely in proportion than the man who receives $3,000, $4,000 or $8,000; while his family lives on a lower scale, nevertheless he must provide the primary necessities of life. It has been suggested that this reduction may mean that the civil servant who has been helping one of his own family who is out of work, or one of his relatives or friends who is in need, may not be able to continue to do so. If I am correctly informed, since last fall the civil servants have been paying so much a week from their salaries into a fund to help the unemployed, and they pay five per cent for superannuation also. Now they are to be reduced ten per cent, and they will not get their annual increases, so certainly they are suffering more than the farmers, who at least can grow many of the necessities of life. The income tax takes into account family charges; a married man with a family receives a much greater exemption than a single man or a married man without a family. This principle was applied to the income tax during the war, and it should be applied now in connection with this reduction.

The Conservatives in my riding stated the other night that certainly this reduction would set a bad example to provincial and municipal governments, private industries and merchants, who might follow the lead of this government and reduce the salaries of their employees, which are none too high at the present time. When the example is set by the federal government certainly it has more weight than it would have coming from a private corporation. Speaking in Ottawa in July, 1930, the Prime Minister expressed the view that he could render the civil service more efficient by keeping those who fulfilled the duties of their position most capably, paying them adequate salaries, and dismissing the others. But since that time no steps have been taken to attain that objective; the first thing to be done by this government is to make this reduction and to dismiss quite a number of civil servants.

When this resolution was presented to the house we heard on the streets the complaints of civil servants, but for the last few days members of the service have become shy and bashful, and they do not discuss the matter. They are afraid of losing their jobs. Right after the introduction of this resolution the Department of Public Works served notice on eighty-two temporary employees that their services would not be required beyond the end of this month. Now members of the public service are afraid to look around, in the fear that to-morrow morning they may find themselves in the ranks of the unemployed.

If this reduction were graded, starting at say $2,000, certainly there would not be such protests as we have heard. I find that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was told that only 805 employees of the public service were receiving salaries of more than $4,000 and that their contribution under this measure would be about $400,000. This means that some $7,900,000 will have to be contributed by civil servants receiving less than $4,000 a year. It has been stated that the average salary in the civil service is about $1,500 a year, so it will be seen that the lower paid civil servants will have to contribute the greater portion of the $8,300,000 which the Prime Minister said would be saved by this reduction. In 1929 it was stated in this house that there were 3,779 male civil servants in Ottawa receiving less than $100 a month, and at that time the average salary of civil servants in this city was $1,650.

This measure was brought in by the Prime Minister in order to balance the budget; he wants $8,300,000 from the civil service for that purpose. I do not know what will be the deficit, but certainly this amount will not cover it this year, and certainly the civil servants will suffer more than those employed in private industry. I desire to voice as forcibly as I can the views of the people in my riding and of the others who have written to me with reference to this subject matter. I trust the Prime Minister will reconsider his decision as to this ten per cent cut and draft a bill which will graduate the reduction to be made in the civil service salaries.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations in connection with the resolution now before the house. I should have thought that this would be the one question upon which all hon. members would be unanimous. The man or woman who is to-day receiving the same salary he or she did three or four years ago when the cost of living was so much higher should not complain about a reduction. Outside of those directly affected this is considered to be the most popular proposal brought before the house this session. Throughout the whole country there is nothing but commendation for this bill, and it should receive the sanction and support of every hon. member.

What is a cut of ten per cent? The farmers of this country have been obliged to take cuts amounting to fifty and sixty per cent, yet we hear very little about it. There is not a class in this country that has had to bear so heavy a burden during the present depression as have the farmers, and they have borne it very creditably. The farmers have not received any benefit from the money which has been voted by this house from time to time for the relief of unemployment; this money has been spent in the towns and cities. We are proud to know that our farmers have been able to shoulder their burdens and fight their battles independent of any public assistance.

In discussing economic conditions, we should always bear in mind that agriculture is the great basic industry of Canada and if it is depressed, then every other business is depressed. It is said that prosperity is just around the corner, but we will never get around that corner until the men engaged in agriculture receive a reasonable return for their labour and for the capital invested. When the price of wheat started to go up a few weeks ago new life was instilled into the whole country. Wheat had gone up and everyone was throwing his hat in the air; it gave a new heart to the people and industry started to expand. We should bend our every effort to better the condition of our agriculturists.

We can blame only ourselves for the position in which we are to-day. It is not the fault of our monetary or economic systems, it is the fault of our federal government, our provincial governments, and our municipal bodies who have lived beyond their means and spent more than they could afford to spend. The country has been saddled with a burdensome debt; we have been living beyond our means, and this depression will not be an unmixed evil if it teaches us to spend a little less than we earn. Where individuals or municipalities lived within their means, they do not find it difficult to-day to finance their business; it is those who lived beyond their means who find that they have not the wherewithal to meet present day demands. It is true that we are affected by world conditions, but most of the suffering we have brought upon ourselves.

We talk about assisting our unemployed when we have great fertile spaces waiting to be tilled. I have made several trips through northern Ontario and I saw thousands of acres of good agricultural land lying vacant. It is said that you cannot obtain very much for your agricultural products, but an independent living can be obtained from the farm. Our people are crowding into the towns and cities and expecting to be spoon-fed by the government.

If a man is hungry and naked he must be fed and clothed, but when a man refuses to go to work and says he wants the government to look after him, then it is time he should be told that this is a free country where every man must rustle for himself. Canada is a country where a man's power to possess is limited only by his willingness to work.

The reducing of wages and the cutting of salaries is never popular, but in this case I think it is a necessity and the government is to be commended for the stand it has taken. I am heartily in accord with the provisions of the proposed legislation and will give it my full support.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the civil service of a country, is the mechanism through which the government enforces its laws and collects the necessary returns for the good administration of the country. The civil service of Canada is the best medium under these circumstances to give the country a good government after the legislation we enact receives the sanction of the Governor General and the necessary regulations are passed by orders in council.

Our civil service, sir, is an excellent one. I rise this evening to champion its cause. We are aware that our civil service, copied on the English system, is not far from being perfect. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver) stated that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was a first class body of men. I state that the civil service also belongs to that class. I have the same admiration for the Royal Mounted Police as the hon. member has. On the other hand, if in India England can control 327,000,000 people with a civil service list of 11,000 employees and 55,000 soldiers, it only proves that we have in Canada a perfect system whose endeavours deserve to be recognized.

The service is open to those who are gifted. One must undergo a test. I have often seen, after the examinations, the questions submitted to candidates. It is as difficult, to-day, to pass the civil service examinations as it is to obtain a certificate in our business colleges. I shall even state that in certain fields of activity, for instance in the Trade and Commerce department, it is as difficult to pass the test as it is to obtain a bachelor's degree in our classical colleges. Many of our young people after finishing their studies in colleges enter the civil service and believe that they are filling lucrative positions, they believe that prospects are bright for their talents and that they will become experts. They pass the required tests and are given a fixed salary; they carry on with this salary and its statutory increases; they regulate their budget accordingly and work conscientiously, from the humble servant in the Public Works up to the officials of the Post Office Department, Marine, Customs and External Affairs.

We are asked, to-day, by this resolution to cut down their remuneration, their salary by ten per cent. It is the duty of the government to remunerate their employees. If we want the country to conform with the legislation we enact we must set the example. If the government does not sufficiently remunerate its servants or does not conform with the statutes which provide for salaries and statutory increases, I state that this is a very poor example to give to the industrial commercial and farming classes of this country.

These civil servants, as I stated a moment ago, have so regulated their budget, knowing that their limit had been reached, nevertheless endeavouring not only to provide for the necessary things but to afford some small luxuries during their lifetime. To-day, they are told: we cut you down 10 per cent from $1,200 up. An employee who earns $1,225, will have to pay $122.50 plus five per cent to the pensions fund; he would be better off if his salary was reduced by $25, so that he could be classed in the $1,200. He would then have only $60 as the government would also pay $60, to contribute to pensions fund.

Has this phase of the question been examined? I have not thoroughly studied the Civil Service Pensions Act, it however strikes me that thanks to this yearly five per cent, since its inception, millions must have accumulated in the treasury. Why does not the government come to an understanding with the Civil Service Federation of Canada? Why does it not borrow from the Pension fund? Why not borrow from that source the five or six million dollars needed to cover this year's exigencies, seeing that the Prime Minister stated the other day to the delegation that it would only be for a year?

Banks are being merged, anything can be done to-day through legislation or orders in council, except change a man into a woman! Why not borrow from the civil service pensions fund an amount equal to this salary cut, adopt the necessary resolutions, have regular meetings, bridge over the deficit and the spreads appearing in the year's budget. Desperate ills require desperate remedies! If, this year, it is found necessary to reduce the civil servants' salaries, why not take the equivalent from their pensions fund. It is better to borrow it to-day and not have them default their financial obligations, rather than pay them a pension in twenty or twenty-five years hence when perhaps they will not need it. This is the time to satisfy those who, by statute, have a right to their salary so that they may live as in the past and provide for their children's education. We must act in such a way that the tradespeople be not despoiled of their fair profit and the business community be not deprived of this ten per cent which civil servants spend either in clothes, food or even, let us be frank, as it is their right, for themselves and family, in pleasure resorts.

I read lately in an Ottawa newspaper that the amount deducted from the civil servants' salaries will deprive the tradespeople of $2,000,000. Two million dollars taken from the local trade, is an enormous amount. Merchants as well as manufacturers will have to bear the loss. If the purchasing power is lacking, less sales will take place and the people of Ottawa as well as of Canada will suffer from it, its effect will be felt in all fields of industrial and commercial activities.

I also read lately in an American newspaper —it is well to make contrasts for we are quite close to the United States border—that President Hoover gave out the following statement, he who has under his jurisdiction 600,000 United States civil servants:

> I have no intention to cut down the salaries; we must not reduce them; the purchasing power must not be lacking; we must not upset this service which is devoted to its work and needs the whole of its salary in order to give a good service to the state, help us to make of the United States a greater country and assist us in making the American republic a country of future still greater. However, owing to our heavy debts, if it is absolutely necessary, we shall reduce the number of employees but we shall maintain their salary on the level where it is to-day.

What is happening in Canada? By this resolution it is intended to cut the salaries, and pursuant to notices sent out the number of employees have already been reduced. On the one hand, the purchasing power of the permanent civil servants is decreased, while on the other hand, the temporary employees are dismissed, they that have, for the last few years, given the best of their life and energy in the hope of being taken in the service. In Montreal alone 120 are thrown on the street.

Under such circumstances, is this fair? I say no. The government must readjust its budget by applying, if necessary, to the magnates of finance. I am neither a communist nor a bolshevist, however, let those who have an income of $500,000 or $600,000, if necessary, contribute $400,000 to the state for a year, they still will have plenty to live upon with $200,000. Let heirs of estates who have never done a stroke of work to build up such fortunes and have thousands of dollars to spend yearly, let them, I say, contribute three-quarters of their wealth to the state for a year, let them follow the example of the right hon. Mr. Baldwin, President of the Council in England, whom I admire, and who generously gave to the treasury $625,000, representing the profits he made during the war, he handed over this amount to his country, saying that it was the price of blood. His son lately stated in an interview:

> My father's income is less than it was in 1909, however he can live on it; our family still lives in great comfort.

Let those who can afford to do so make contributions to the treasury! Let them help the government to put order in their finances, let them contribute in putting the administration on its feet; I trust they will be induced to do so, because if our country is prosperous, so will we all be. All classes of the community will benefit by it and an alleluia of joy will be heard throughout the country. But allow the civil servants to live in peace in the discharge of their duties. I am aware that this resolution will carry. I have no illusions. During the ten years of my parliamentary life, I have learned that majorities rule in this house and all measures are enacted through these majorities, otherwise they would amount to motions of non-confidence adopted by the ruling party. We, that belong to the opposition have very little influence in this house, however, we are on the watch like vestals, endeavouring to keep the fire of the Liberal party burning so that our friends all over Canada may see the flame through the window panes of this house: "Keep the fires burning." We do our best to keep our lighthouse continuously lit. There is not much oil left in the tank but the wick is good and the light is still bright. What I would suggest, under the circumstances, since I am convinced that this measure will carry: That the government make no cut in salaries under $4,000. From $4,000 deduct four per cent, if it so desires; $5,000 deduct five per cent; $6,000, six per cent; $7,000, seven per cent; $8,000, eight per cent; $9,000, nine per cent, and $10,000, ten per cent. That would be a fair and reasonable measure, and I think that civil servants would be satisfied and continue to live with the hope of meeting their obligations. I am not saying this in order to complain about the $400 which I shall, as a member, have to pay the state. No, sir, I shall graciously do so; I shall do my bit generously, under the circumstances, and contribute to the treasury. It will make me happier to think that I have contributed, in the opposition, to help the government in the administration of the country, by my humble subscription of $400.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with rapt attention to the words of wisdom of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson). It must be clearly understood that those who live in the cities of this dominion are not responsible for the industrial system under which they live. That system was brought into being by men whose chief motive was profit, and in a period of depression such as that through which we are passing, it is only natural in the sequence of events that those unfortuate individuals should suffer until such time as the government of this country assume the responsibility which is theirs towards the men and women who find themselves in their present situation under circumstances over which they have no control.

I know of nothing easier than to get up in a deliberate assembly such as this and suggest that the men and women who spend their lives working in the factories of this dominion should go into the vacant wastes of northern Ontario and, without any previous experience, without any capital and, in many instances, suffering from malnutrition, carve out a livelihood there for themselves. For many years organized labour, through the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, has made suggestions to the federal government along the same lines as those made by the hon. member for Lanark this evening. I trust that he will use his influence with the government of the day to see that such a policy is put into effect and carried out, so that those men who are fitted for a life on the farm can leave our cities, thus lessening the acute situation brought about by unemployment, and at least earn their sustenance on the lands of this country. I readily understand the position in which the farmers of the country find themselves. The first urge of life is to secure food, clothing and shelter, yet many thousands of the industrial workers in our cities are not in a position to obtain the necessaries of life in such measure as to ensure for themselves, and consequently for future Canadians, full bodily health and strength. I say this from my experience as a member of the hospital board in the city from which I come and a member for some years of the board of health of that city, where thousands of undernourished children pass through these two organizations.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the connection between that and this?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will come to that in a moment. Many of these civil servants are living in modern industrial and commercial cities; they are trying to get along on a thousand dollars or less per annum, endeavouring to bring up families. The hon. member who has asked that question will readily understand what bearing my remarks have on the question before us. The civil servants were not responsible for the condition that exists to-day. Had the government not made the twenty per cent discount in income taxation last year they would have been in a better position to-day, and this proposed reduction in salaries could have been largely avoided. From our experience, we of the labour movement know that every reduction in wages merely intensifies the present condition; it reflects itself in business, in industry and in agriculture, in the reduced consuming power of the people affected.

We have a paradox to-day in this, that the governments of this country are lowering the standard of living of their employees on the one hand, while on the other hand they are guaranteeing to the moneylenders increased returns on the money they borrow. The ramifications of this policy are felt far and wide. After all, what is the collateral of the money which is lent to the government of the country? It is the earning power of the men and women employed in industry and agriculture; and when the government in the midst of intense industrial depression offers to the moneylenders of the country rates of interest of five per cent and over in connection, for example, with the recent national service loan, the natural consequence is that when the provinces go to the country for money their interest rates are raised. The province of Ontario recently floated a loan bearing interest at the rate of over six per cent, and it was snapped up within three hours of the time it was issued. And why not? What better security can you have than the government of that province if you have the money to lend? But what chance have the municipalities to borrow money at lower rates than are offered by the provincial or the federal government? The cities throughout the dominion, those that can borrow money, are forced to pay more than the provinces or the federal government.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Then we come to the most important factor of all—the wage earners of the country who are trying to buy their own homes. These people are carrying mortgages at the present time at probably six per cent or a little better. What chance have they, in these circumstances, of renewing those mortgages at such figures? It is obvious that the security of the workingman's home or farm is not considered such a sound security as government bonds, and what is to become of these people? I predict that thousands of workingmen and women will lose their homes in the next twelve months or two years, and thousands of farmers their farms, and so the whole thing is being pyramided

At the last session of parliament an order in council was passed by the federal government dealing with unemployment relief, and there appeared in it the following provision:

> Unless a modification of this requirement is previously agreed to by the minister, the provincial or municipal authorities may fix rates of wages to be paid, provided that such rates be fair and reasonable and not in excess of the rates required to be paid by the federal government for the character or class of work in the district.

Now, if it is logical for the parliament of Canada to fix a maximum rate of wages for human labour, is it not just as logical in the interests of the country, in a national emergency, to fix maximum rates of interest demanded by the bondholders of Canada? You cannot make the man on the street believe that if increased demands on lenders is not made this country of ours will be ruined. We have to remember that the reduction in wages hits a body of workers in this country who in many instances have no means of defending themselves. Cutting the salaries of civil servants is like throwing a stone in the water from which the ripples pass on to places beyond the human eye. Naturally these servants live right up to their incomes because, in the majority of cases, the incomes do not permit of any other course. In this debate we have heard the suggestion many times that the people should save. When one surveys the wages paid the civil servants in this dominion one might conclude that in the great majority of cases it would be economically impossible to save very much. The effect of the cut will be that food will be cut down, doctors will lose, and dentists will lose.

Mr. SPOTTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: Somebody has said, "hear, hear." I do not think this subject presents very much to smile about, or anything upon which one might exclaim "hear, hear." These people are placed in the position that, through circumstances over which they have no control they have to deprive themselves of very necessary dental and medical treatment for their families.

Mr. SPOTTON: When I said "hear, hear" my hon. friend was speaking of doctors and dentists. Don't wiggle.

Mr. MITCHELL: You do not look as though you needed a cut in wages. We may find as a logical consequence of these reductions that the health of civil servants' children will suffer.

Mr. MORAND: Why exaggerate?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not intend to suggest what certain selfish manufacturing interests would do under present conditions, but I believe it is the duty of this government, and of every provincial and municipal government, to see that none of their employees works under salary scales below the minimum standard of civilized communities. I think my position is sound, and it is backed by the labour movement of Canada.

Another angle of the problem presents itself. While I freely admit that the price of food has declined, yet the major items in the ordinary family budget of one who lives in a city are coal, rent, insurance and other uncontrollable expenditures. In those items there has been very little reduction. We will see, therefore, that if any reduction is to be made in the family budget it will have to be made on account of the reduction in food prices. Some hon. members have spoken about the judges. I am not a lawyer, but I do not know of any British institution which does not control its own destiny. If the government of the day so desired, undoubtedly judges' salaries could be cut; there is no question about that.

Then, we consider the man who enjoys a large salary. In contrast we find the lower salaried employee who has to cut down his living budget to feed his family. Opposed to that we have the man who receives $10,000 a year who may have to curtail a few luxuries, and may not be able to make so many investments or put so much money in the bank, but whose real standard of living, so far as the provision of food for himself and his family is concerned, irrespective of this cut, will remain unimpaired.

Being a trade unionist of many years standing, and having passed through the struggle for the adoption of the principle of collective bargaining, I know of no reason why the government of the day should not have taken the same action as any other corporation or organization wishing to make savings. The labour people of Canada look with amazement at the present attitude of the government. This cut was made in a spirit of take-it-or-leave-it; the decision was taken without any regard for living conditions or salaries earned by the employees concerned. We believe that the government at least should have reflected the spirit of its own Labour department and referred the matter to a board of arbitration or conciliation, thereby permitting the various organizations of civil servants at least to endeavour to defend their own membership.

In conclusion, I think it is the general opinion of all hon. members that no person during the course of this depression should suffer want, whether he be engaged in agriculture, business, the professions, or industry. I know of no better way to ensure this condition than that the rate of income tax from those receiving, we will say, $150 a month and up, be on a graduated scale to supply funds to help maintain those who, through no fault of their own, to-day find themselves unemployed.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only a few comments in this debate before the vote is taken. Anything I have to say was inspired by some remarks made this afternoon. In the first place let me say that the proposed policy on the part of the administration is a direct and inescapable result of their failure to undertake to adjust the credit situation within this country, and to cooperate with other countries in adjusting credit conditions so that the depression might be lifted. I say quite frankly that there is little hope of any restoration of world conditions or of internal Canadian conditions so long as the present monetary situation remains unchanged. I do not ask you to take my word for that; I will refer you first to a gentleman who unfortunately has passed, one who in his comparatively brief career in banking circles in Canada acquired a striking reputation—the late Mr. C. E. Neill, vice-president and general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada. In his annual statement last year Mr. Neill faced the situation frankly and said that the primary cause of world troubles to-day, including Canada's, is, first, a wrong monetary policy which has resulted in a steadily declining price level. I quote his words from pages 3 and 4 of his report:

> Overproduction of agricultural products in relation to manufactured articles would justify a decline in the price of farm products as compared with the products of industry, but when the average of all prices declines this can only be explained by an undersupply of that in which prices are expressed, i.e., money.

Mr. Neill admits there is an under supply of money which accounts for the dropping of the commodity price levels and continues:

It would seem that if the effective supply of money is kept in right relation to production of commodities, the phenomenon of declining average price level will not occur.

I agree with him entirely, and I am satisfied from what research I have made in the matter that until we undertake to keep the volume of money in exact relation to the volume of goods production we will not have stability or progress. But I go a step further. There was an opportunity for this country and for other countries to have assisted the internal and external situation. Mr. Neill points that out:

If on the collapse of the stock market boom the principal central banks of the world had decided that drastic contraction of currency and credit was not to be permitted, a drastic fall in the price level could not have occurred.

Now, those words are very clear. As I say, it is because of the criminal failure on the part of governments—including this one—to recognize the necessity for regarding monetary policy as fundamental that now results in the introduction of this legislation. Nay, more, Mr. Speaker, it goes further. It results in a policy of dismissal of employees; it will result in a general lowering of the standards of living all over this country, and the continuation and prolongation of the present depression for possibly a generation.

I said a few moments ago, and I now repeat, in my humble opinion the only quick way out is by a process of anti-deflation. The government has declared itself to be definitely opposed to and is unwilling at the present time to introduce such a policy. I do not think it can take that stand long. I do not think it will remain long in power if it does. The people will not permit it to, if this condition of depression is pursued deliberately after the facts have been placed in front of their eyes—whether it is in front of their intelligence or not is a matter for them to decide.

I said a moment ago that general conditions depend entirely upon what I call a monetary policy. Let me quote again from the much quoted Macmillan report. At page 196 will be found the following:

It is not easy to see how we can expect a revival in our foreign trade, on a sufficient scale to be of much value to us, by any other means than through a revival of world demand. To meet the immediate problems, arising out of the world slump, a policy intended to direct increased purchasing power into the right channels, both at home and abroad, with a view of restoring equilibrium at the present level of costs, would, therefore, be much wiser, in our judgment, than a policy of trying to cut our costs faster than the rest of the world can cut theirs.

The world has launched itself on a policy of cutting costs. Great Britain announces today tremendous cuts. We have already announced our intention as a government to cut right and left, to fire more into the ranks of the unemployed, increasing the problem of unemployment, and prolonging this depression to an indeterminable length. I wonder how many hon. members are seized of the fact that in this very policy the principal guiding factor, whether intentional or not I cannot say, is unquestionably the sacrifice of the masses of the people to the interests of our creditors. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that under an emergency of this kind we might far more readily ask our creditors, external as well as internal, to await a time for their payments rather than attempt to maintain them at a cost of ghastly suffering to the masses of the people of this country. There are times when balancing budgets may be wise and sound policy, but there are times when balancing budgets is not wise if it means pressing down further into the bog of debt and misery the people of the nation. In my opinion the policy at this time is not wise, but it is the inevitable one that must follow the steps that have already been taken by the administration.

Mr. MANION: Might I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): With pleasure.

Mr. MANION: I made inquiries the other day and find there are over 200,000 people each holding less than $2,000 worth of bonds. How would he treat such bondholders when cutting down the rate of interest?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Coote) has just suggested to me, the cost of living in their case has already been reduced also. That is the protestation of the ministry in support of the ten per cent cut in civil service salaries. Why not apply that principle all the way round? Why not let those bondholders take the cut too, if it is equitable in the other case? That is my answer in passing; I know that it is not the answer the hon. minister would like me to make to his inquiry. But, as the last speaker has suggested, I say we can tap the sources of wealth by direct taxation. That must be done this year, or this government stands utterly discredited in the eyes of the people of this country and in its own eyes.

An hon. MEMBER: Will that hurt your own feelings?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, but I am afraid it will not help my hon. friend's. I say to the ministry, this policy is a policy of despair, it is a policy that is not constructive, it is a policy of continual depression. There is no prospect of improvements under a policy of this kind. If anybody in the ministry has any hope for me in that regard, I trust he will disabuse me in this particular instance. I have no desire to anticipate greater misery or gloom for our people than we are already facing, but unfortunately I happen to see the suffering around me and appreciate it at its value. I cannot, like so many hon. members, disregard with one sweep of my hand as a great patriotic effort the sacrifice of ten per cent of the income of persons receiving $70 a month, for I happen to be able to appreciate what $70 a month must mean to those people.

But without stressing the sentimental aspect, let me deal with the subject of remuneration in the civil service. The average wage paid in the whole civil service of Canada, including all the high salaries as well as all the low, is between $1,500 and $1,600 a year. It is not a difficult thing, then, to make a rough estimate of the vast numbers that must be receiving miserably below-cost-of-living incomes. I take a statement just presented today by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to one of my colleagues, giving the total salaries of all classes in the civil service. The grand total, as given in the statement, according to the Beatty commission report of October 1, 1930, is 47,561. The total salary paid is $72,728,120.

Now I will ask you to take the first class mentioned; 16,408 people are receiving $13,573,030. That sounds splendid in the aggregate, but you analyze it you will find that it means an average annual income of $827, or less than $70 a month, for that number of persons. In all humanity I do appeal to the administration not to affect in any way, by any reduction, incomes of that class. I appreciate that these people cannot live under a decent standard, educate their children and buy the necessities of life on those wages.

I come to the next class, those receiving salaries of from $1,201 to $2,000. A total of 22,745 persons receive $36,147,750, so in that class the average income would be $1,580. I have hastily estimated these figures; they are not absolutely exact, but they are at least approximate. Taking the two classes together we find about 39,000 civil servants out of the total of 47,000 receiving an average salary of $1,203. I wonder how my hon. friends opposite, the rent of whose homes or apartments alone is in excess of that sum, would like to have to carry on their entire living and educate their children on this sum of money.

Mr. McGIBBON: How many of those are single and how many have families to support?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Fortunately I am in a position to answer the hon. gentleman. It happened that a few years ago the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) was interested in the Beatty commission which was about to make an inquiry into this matter, and he made a request for a return showing the facts. The information given him, which I am glad to furnish my hon. friend, is that of the 3,761 employees in the public service receiving less than $100 per month, 2,376, are men with dependents.

Mr. McGIBBON: That was not the question I asked; probably the hon. member did not understand me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, it really does not matter. Even for single persons $70 a month is not any too much, even under present conditions. If the hon. gentleman has any illusions on that matter I suggest that he turn to the report of the committee on industrial and international relations for the session of 1926. He will find some splendid evidence given there as to a budget for a decent standard of living, and for a poverty standard as well, in Canada. I turn to page 19 of this report, and ask the hon. gentleman to listen to the words of the official of the Department of Labour who was giving evidence. He said:

> The investigation was confined to average families; that is, families with about three children. They found that when the income fell below $1,400 the family did not get enough to eat.

I will continue further; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre interjected some questions, and the answer was:

> The budget published in the Labour Gazette conforms practically to the third one mentioned by Paul Douglas,—about $1,650 per year.

That is the moderate standard of Paul Douglas, the labour economist in the United States. Again, on the same page, he says:

> I mentioned the United States investigators in 1918 found that when the family income was less than $1,400 the family did not get enough to eat. They found they economized on their food to such an extent that they were not getting a healthy diet, they found they did not have enough rooms to live in; there would be perhaps five people living in four rooms; they might be living in a six-roomed house and renting two rooms and that is a very common basis for economy,—many people whose income is low and rent is high, rent part of the house. Another plan is to keep boarders, which is equivalent to the same thing.

Then he is asked:

In a case of malnutrition—

Such as is implicated here.

—who pays the bill?

A. The death rate is usually high.

Q. Is it in direct ratio with the amount of malnutrition?

A. It affects the community indirectly in every respect.

I have been talking about a moderate standard of living, and now I turn to the budget prepared by the Department of Labour of this dominion. This budget covers the yearly expenditure of an avergae family of five, with an income of $1,400, which, as I have just pointed out, is very much higher than the income of most of the members of the civil service. I leave out of the question for the moment, although hon. members would find it very interesting, the budget provisions for the man; and because most of the members of this chamber are married men I ask them to turn to that section which deals with provision for the wife. I will not give all the items, though they are very interesting to read. The wife, under this budget, is provided with one skirt worth $4. You go home and tell your wife that you are going to live on a budget of $1,400 a year, and that she will get only one skirt, and see what she says to you about it. The budget provides two wash dresses, worth $1.50 each. It also provides material for a hat. It does not provide the hat, but it provides materials for a hat at a total cost, for trimming and everything, of $3.50, and that is all. I do not mean that is all the clothes provided for the wife, but these are some items picked at random to indicate how closely pared must be the clothing comforts of the wife in that family with an income of $1,400 a year.

Let us even make provision for the reduction in the cost of living that has taken place since 1926. It is alleged by the Prime Minister that this reduction amounts to about ten per cent. Take $140 from $1,400, and you still have an income producing a standard of living so low that I doubt if any hon. member in this chamber would wish it for himself or for any member of his family.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mention has been made of the condition of the farmers. I represent a constituency in the southern part of which we have had almost constant drought for three years. In the northern part we had moderate rains last year but a very light crop, and a heavy hail storm destroyed the crop over a large area. The farmers in my riding are as poor as any farmers in western Canada, particularly those in the south half of my constituency, but I venture to say that no considerable percentage of them would want me to stand up in this House of Commons and vote to drag other already underpaid people in Canada down to their basis of living. But I will tell you what they do not want; they do not want the Sir Herbert Holts, the Gundys and the other millionaires in Canada to escape carrying their fair share of this burden. I am satisfied that my people will not ask that civil servants who are receiving less than $1,500 a year should be asked to accept any reduction. I do not believe my constituents will criticize or censure me if I reject this resolution, first on the basis that it is inequitable, and in the second place because the salary of $1,200 is too low a point at which to start the 5 per cent reduction. The salary adjustment should be on a sliding scale; I could offer proposals to the government in that regard, but I will wait until the bill comes down. Then there is another reason: Much has been said about the cut of ten per cent, but very few hon. gentlemen on the government side have been frank enough to admit or to point out that there is actually more than a ten per cent reduction. In addition to the ten per cent cut, the statutory increase is to be eliminated. A man receiving a salary of $2,000 has a net salary of $1,900, after the superannuation is deducted; the proposed reduction of ten per cent amounts to $190, the elimination of the statutory increase means a further $120, making a total reduction of $310, or fifteen and a half per cent instead of ten per cent. I regard the abandonment of the statutory increase as a breach of contract. If the Prime Minister gives as a reason for exempting the judges from this cut the fact that their salaries are set by statute, I ask him how he can justify the elimination of this amount also provided by statute in the case of the civil servants?

While I am discussing this point, I ask the house if it realizes that after the embargo was placed on the shipment of gold from Canada the government continued to purchase gold from the mines, and I am informed in addition to paying the stated legal value in terms of Canadian currency, paid a premium sufficient to bring the price up to that which would have been received in the United States. Would it not have been fair in a crisis such as this to eliminate that premium? The gold producer has the price of his product fixed by law and no other producer is in as favourable a position as he. When the price of wheat was advancing on the foreign markets during the war the government brought into being the federal wheat board to keep down the price of grain, but in the case of gold, they put on an embargo and then paid an extra premium. That may have been a necessary and equitable policy, but if it was fair in that case I contend it is utterly unfair to break the contract with the civil servant without reducing all contractual salaries.

It might be interesting to know what men like the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna—who is, with all due respect to the Ottawa Journal, a little more than a theorist—have to say in this regard. Mr. McKenna is a practical banker of considerable reputation and at one time was Chancellor of the British Exchequer. No man can reach that office without having had a thorough and real experience in banking circles. He is not a faddist or crank, in fact, in my own humble opinion and in no way making an invidious comparison, he is the equal in financial matters of any hon. member in this house, including the Prime Minister of Canada himself. Mr. McKenna and several men associated with him in discussing changes in salaries and incomes, had this to say:

> We consider that a change of this character cannot, with equity, be concentrated on salaries and wages, but should apply to every category of income alike, including those protected by contract. The benefit of an increased value of money is just as fortuitous in the case of the rentier as in the case of the wage-earner, and the burden of enterprise and on the budget of having to pay the same amount of money as before to meet interest charges, though the value of money is greater, is similar in character to the burden of having to pay the same money wages as before. Moreover a great social change of this kind cannot be carried through except by general consent.
> This view is reinforced by a consideration of the monetary history of recent years. A large part of the national debt was incurred at a price level much higher than that which now prevails. The long period of deflation which culminated in the return to gold at the pre-war parity had the effect of increasing the burden of this debt.

This remark might well be applied to Canada. The statement continues:

> The fall in world prices which has occurred more recently has caused a large further aggravation of the burden. In view of the fact that the increase in the value of sterling was deliberatedly intended—

Just as it was deliberately intended that we should go back to the gold standard in 1925.

> —it seems difficult to require a reduction of salaries and wages without proposing any modification of the uncovenanted blessings which accrued to the holders of the national debt and of claims on money generally and to other classes whose incomes have remained unaffected.
> Our conclusion is, therefore, that if a substantial change should become necessary, it must be a general change and apply, so far as possible, to every class of income alike.

The Prime Minister in pleading his case in this house the other day—no, I should not say pleading; he does not plead anything—in directing the house in regard to his opinion, quoted a letter which he said stirred him to the very depths of his being, or words to that effect. He said that he would not forget this letter to his dying day. It was a letter from a lady who expressed joy at the opportunity being afforded to her of making the sacrifice of ten per cent to Canada during this crisis. I have nothing but congratulation for that lady, but I should like to know her income and whether or not she has any dependents. The disclosing of that information might have given greater force to the illustration. In answer to the Prime Minister I should like to quote from one letter picked at random from many, and I ask the house to compare these two letters and decide upon which one the policy of the administration should be governed. This letter is dated Vancouver, February 27, and reads:

> Dear Sir:
> As the wife of a Canadian and civil servant and a mother of three small children under seven years (three boys), I am taking the liberty of writing you in regard to the wage cut. I am putting before you the bare facts. How in heaven's name are parents to bring up children with such a small salary as $75 per month, as that is what it will be if this cut takes place. We have made terrible sacrifices as it is to buy two quarts of milk and oranges for our babies. What of rent, insurance, fuel and clothes? If the government want healthy population for pity's sake try and get a decent wage for parents, as the children at present are not getting the proper nourishment. How can they? Please do your best to stop this cut if it is in your power. I thank you in anticipation.

I submit that that letter offsets absolutely the letter quoted by the Prime Minister. This is a letter from a woman who is burdened with the carrying of the load of budgeting for a family on $75 per month. In all decency, in all humanity, do not touch salaries of that kind. Hit the salaries over $2,000 if you must, but do not cut the very low wages. I urge upon the administration the necessity of taking into consideration a most serious and drastic cut in the incomes of the millionaires of Canada.

Mr. JOHN T. SPROULE (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but after listening to the previous speaker (Mr. Garland, Bow River), I feel it my duty to say a word or two. The previous speaker mentioned the fact that he came from an agricultural district. I also come from an agricultural constituency, and I venture to say that if the average farmer in my constituency, were to sell every bushel of grain and every head of stock he possesses he would not realize $750, the figure mentioned by the hon. member. When he got that he would still have to pay taxes and interest, or he would be sold out.

I was interested in the remarks this afternoon of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). She said that she would follow the views expressed by her constituents and vote in favour of the resolution. I do not think many hon. members opposite know how the people in the agricultural districts live. The hon. member who preceded me referred to a letter he had received from some woman, stating that on account of the cut in salary they would not be able to buy oranges and milk for the children. That may be true, but in the agricultural districts there are many people who have not seen an orange for a long while and are not likely to do so for some time to come. I often wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite believe all they say, or whether they are speaking on behalf of their own salaries. I have every respect in the world for those returned soldiers and nurses, and I have every reason to believe they are broadminded enough to take this cut in a philosophical way, as we should all take it. While I am not a firm believer in the Globe, I noticed in that paper a statement that the agricultural people more than a year ago had taken a forty per cent discount, and they were not asked to take it.

Mr. McINTOSH: What is wrong with the Globe?

Mr. SPROULE: My hon. friend no doubt reads a paper a little stronger than the Globe. The people in the agricultural districts will be very fortunate if they do not have to take more than a ten per cent cut, and the same thing might happen to other classes. I have every sympathy in the world for the returned soldiers, who voluntarily went to fight in defence of this country, but many men and women in the agricultural districts worked day and night to provide food and money during the war and many a mother sat up until midnight thinking of her son who was over there. I am sure those soldiers who have been fortunate enough to return to Canada are sufficiently big, knowing the present situation, to be willing to accept this ten per cent cut.

I do not think there is really half the complaint that we hear from the other side of the house. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen on this side are not very anxious to make this cut; it is not a thing any of us want to do; but we have all to share this burden together, and by doing so we shall live through it.

While I was listening to the speeches to-day, I was reminded of a trial that took place on a certain occasion, when a young man was charged with stealing a suit of clothes. There did not appear to be anybody who had seen him steal the clothes, but they tried to convict him and they employed such clever lawyers as there are on the other side of the house who are trying to convict us on this side. The young man's answer always was: "No, I did not steal the clothes." But just before it was all over, the judge turned to the accused and said: "Young man, you stole the clothes; you had better own up to it and we will make it as light as we can for you." The young man replied: "I did not steal the clothes, but after listening to these clever lawyers I am commencing to wonder whether I did or not."

Mr. MARTIAL RHEAUME (St. John-Iberville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate, I have no intention to protest against the ten per cent cut in the members' indemnity. However, I wish to register my protest against the manner in which the government is treating the civil servants. This afternoon, when the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Brasset) alluded to the foolish expenditures the government is making in the Gordon inquiry, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) contended that the government was justified in spending that money. I entirely differ with the views of the hon. member for Compton. I state that if the right hon. Prime Minister's pride was wounded he could have applied to our courts to obtain redress. When Canada is passing through a crisis, I consider that it should not be called upon to make considerable outlays for such trivial things. I am anxious to see the government's counsels' bills in this inquiry.

The hon. member for Compton stated that within the last years the farmers' returns have considerably dwindled. I ask the hon. members on your right, sir, whether in making a ten per cent reduction on all civil servants' salaries, they will not also suggest to large concerns and departmental stores to cut down the salaries of their employees. I think the government has given a bad example, and I can state, according to my information, that here in the Capital, since the government announced this ten per cent cut, owners of departmental stores have reduced the salaries of their employees by ten per cent; yet the sale price of goods has not come down ten per cent. I know that a number of concerns in my own county have taken advantage of this measure to cut down the salaries of their employees by ten per cent, giving as an excuse that it was to meet the competition of rival companies; yet I am in a position to state that I paid, previous and after the crisis, the very same price for goods that I bought from these manufacturers. However, the dividends as well as the salary of the managers and president of the company were not affected. This afternoon, the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver), speaking of the Royal Mounted Police, stated that he had a great admiration for that body of men which I admire as he does. However, there exists a class of employees whose work is unknown by members. Namely the post office employees, and I have a number in my constituency. I notice that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) is in his seat. In the Quebec Legislature Assembly he once was the champion of the workmen and farmers. I trust that the hon. Postmaster General will take part in this debate and champion the cause of the civil servants whose salary amounts to only $1,080 to $1,500. These employees, namely letter carriers, are obliged, during seven or eight hours per day, to walk the streets of cities such as Montreal, Ottawa and other large centres; they must carry on regardless of weather, rain, wind or snow; whether it is fine or not it matters little. Yet, they are the very men who are the least remunerated. I trust that the hon. Postmaster General will champion their cause here as he did in Quebec.

Now, sir, there is a certain class with which no one dares to interfere, because their salary is supposed to be statutory. Namely the Lieutenant-Governors who receive a salary of $10,000 per year and cost the provinces over $100,000. Well, when the Canadian people are taxed to balance the budget, I contend that we should begin by taxing those who are in receipt of larger salaries. Salaries of $10,000, per year to Lieutenant-Governors and expenses amounting to over $100,000, for receptions, travelling, teas, etc., while the people are starving, I say that it is more than time, before we clip the salaries of employees receiving $1,200, to begin by these high officials.

I now come to army officers. I have some in my constituency and I state that if there are people who do not earn their salaries, they are the army officers. This afternoon, the hon. member for Grey Southeast (Miss Macphail) stated that there are 18 employees who earn between $4,000 and $5,000, 5 who earn more than $5,000, 1 earning over $8,000 and 1 over $12,000. I wonder what is their occupation. I suppose they are busy doing pretty much the same thing as those in my county: a little riding jolt of one or one hour and a half in the morning, and the day's work is over.

There is another class: the judges. Their salaries are as follows: Superior Court, from $9,000 to $10,000, and for the Supreme Court up to $15,000, and a pension when they become invalids or reach the statutory age. I wonder whether the judges' salaries should not be reduced by twenty per cent.

We find, in the estimates which were brought down for this year, that the budget of the National Defence last year amounted to $13,000,000 and this year $10,000,000, in round figures, namely a reduction of $2,500,000 or one-fifth. If there is money spent uselessly, it is for the National Defence; I do not think that there is a cent spent more carelessly.

The budget of agriculture for 1931-32 amounted to nearly $10,000,000; this year it has been cut down to a little more than $3,000,000, that is one third. The hon. members for the province of Quebec shed many tears, they were greatly moved over the lot of the poor farmers; I trust that, when the budget of that department comes up, they will stand to their guns and try to fulfil their pledges of 1930.

Last year the government had $2,000 voted to compensate the ministers for the loss of their motor cars. I understand that they made use of the government's cars for a period of over seven months last year; I am unaware whether they drew their $2,000, but I do know that this amount was voted when the supplementary estimates came up for consideration. I think that the government could not show a better example this year than striking out this $2,000 allocation. Let the government prove its sincerity. It is all very well to advocate economy, but let the government first set the example. This $2,000 is equivalent to $40 per week of motoring between the Chateau Laurier and the Post Office or Marine department. I am assured that for $5 this service can be had, for 5 or 6 days per week, from the Landreville Motor Co., that is, it would only cost between $250 and $300 per year instead of $2,000. I trust that the French Canadian cabinet ministers will avail themselves of this advice and give the example by declining to accept this $2,000.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Until a short time ago it was not my intention to say anything in this debate, but I feel that I must compliment the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), as one of the greatest interrupters in this house, upon the gentlemanly way in which he receives interrogations from this side. I want to compliment him also on the innumerable great people in the world with whom he agrees. Nearly every speech he makes is one largely of quotations of men whose opinions he always agrees with; but I have never, in my time in this house or in my reading outside the house, ever found very many of these great men who agreed with him.

The debate on this question has extended far afield. But after all the question is a simple one—a ten per cent reduction in the salaries of the civil service of Canada. Everything from Dan to Beersheba has been brought in, but I want the house to come back for a moment to the real question at issue, and that is whether the civil service of Canada should or should not take a cut along with every other man and woman earning wages in Canada to-day. That is the question, and I hope the government will see to it that every member of this house votes upon it, so that the public will know just where each of us stands. That is a duty that we owe the people of Canada at the present time.

The hon. member for Bow River is always quite eager to lecture the house. He sets himself up as the great defender of the poor of this country, but I venture to say that I could pick out at least a dozen in the house who do more for the poor of the country in a year than he does in a lifetime. I repeat that, and it can easily go on record. I know men in this house who have contributed, not from their revenue but from their earnings, and therefore it is a deduction from their revenue, eight to ten thousand dollars a year looking after the poor of the country. I get tired of being lectured by people who would rather play the demagogue than discuss the issues that come before parliament and the country.

This cut is either right or wrong. If it is right, then the people who are affected were receiving adequate compensation for their services two or three years ago, because the cost of living has fallen at least to that extent. And if the civil servants were not getting adequate salaries at that time, the fault lies not with this government nor on this side of the house but with hon. gentlemen opposite. But, sir, I rose to say this, that there are people in this country besides the civil servants of Ottawa. Ottawa seems to think that it is the whole Dominion of Canada, but as I said the other evening it is the people outside Ottawa who pay these salaries. Let me observe in passing that if the civil servants of Ottawa do not wish to take the cut of ten per cent they have the same recourse that every other wage-earner in the country has: they have the alternative of resigning. And if they did resign at the present time there would be such a rush for their positions that it would make the bombardment of Shanghai look like artillery practice.

There is, however, another side to the question, and I wish to present it to the house and to the people of Canada. These salaries and wages are paid by the people outside Ottawa. I represent a workingman's riding, and I take second place to no man in standing up for the working class; and I venture to say that not two per cent of the wage earners of the district I represent earned in the last year half of $1,200, the amount at which the exemption is fixed. What does that mean? It means that if they are going to keep up their contributions to these salaries their tax is doubled, and in my present position I am not in the frame of mind to go back to my people and ask them in this time of depression to double their taxes to pay the civil servants of Ottawa. I will not do it.

I say, what every man knows, that there is no one in the Dominion of Canada to-day whose wages have not been cut. I do not care whether he is living on an income or working for a salary, or is in business or in a profession—every man has suffered a reduction. The professional man's income to-day has not been cut ten per cent but sixty and seventy per cent; and the professional men are doing the same work to-day as they did two or three years ago. I therefore wish to voice my opposition to the speeches that have been made against the reduction. These speeches are not consistent with the times. Pick up any newspaper you like and see what it says. Here, for instance, is to-day's Globe announcing a ten per cent cut in telegraphers' wages; and both railways have done the same thing. A large number of industrial concerns have done not only that but worse: they have dismissed their men. In many places people are taking a cut not of ten per cent but of one hundred per cent. Ask the member for Essex or the members from the border cities, and what will they tell you? Then we come to the great city of Ottawa. These people are protected from the day they enter the service until the day they die. They get wages in good times and bad, in good weather and foul; and when they are too old to work they go on pension, to which the government contributes so long as they are in the service. I fail to see any reasonable ground for objection to the cut. In fact, I say that the opposition to this measure is, outside of the cities of Ottawa and Hull, the best electioneering campaign that the Conservative or any other party could imagine, because the action of the government is fair and honest. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in my riding there are many men who do a half day's work before the civil servants in Ottawa begin theirs, and those same people do another half day's work after the Ottawa employees leave their offices at four or five o'clock in the afternoon. Yet the party opposite would ask me to go to the people who are now on half pay or less and say to them. "Double your taxes; work a little harder and a little longer so that you may keep the civil servants in Ottawa in ease and luxury like they had a few years ago."

It is time some one spoke in this house, Mr. Speaker, for the taxpayers of Canada. Their burden is heavy and, I think, is getting almost to the breaking point. It would seem that we have to come here, sir, and be lectured because we ask the civil servants of this city to accept a meagre ten per cent cut. The people outside of the city of Ottawa are not grumbling about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to correct the hon. member on that point.

Mr. McGIBBON: Probably the people in Vancouver are, but those in the decent cities of Ontario are not.

An hon. MEMBER: Ontario is not all of Canada.

Mr. McGIBBON: But we pay a big part of the taxes of Canada. I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) that the civil service is in a preferred class; there is not a class in Canada to-day which has been riding as easily and smoothly through this storm of depression as the civil servants of Canada. I should like nothing better than to have someone come into my riding and say that when we made the ten per cent cut we did wrong. I should like nothing better than to have someone go into men's camps and make that statement. I was surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell); apparently he thinks that the civil servants compose the whole working class of Canada. I should like to take him back to some lumber camps where the men work from 3.30 or 4 o'clock in the morning until 8 o'clock or 9 o'clock at night for $25 or $35 a month. In the spring they get into the cold water of the rivers when ice remains in them and drive the logs down. They are there not one hour a day but eight or ten hours, and get out of the water at night and sleep on the banks in their wet clothes.

Mr. COTNAM: They do not grumble, either.

Mr. McGIBBON: No, no grumbling there. Hon. members opposite ask this house, and they ask me, to go to those men and say. "You are earning only half what you earned before, but we want to double your taxes so that the poor overworked civil servants at Ottawa will not have to stand a cut." Oh, it is a beautiful doctrine.

Then the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) gets up, and with all his Irish eloquence pleads an imaginary cause. We must remember this: The hon. member for Bow River lives only in a hurricane or a storm. The peaceful atmosphere never suits him; contentment and happiness never suit him, and if there is not a storm he will make one. And he is pretty good at it, too.

It seems, Mr. Speaker, that every time the civil service question comes up in the house members flock from all corners to speak. The other day I went into an office where there were five civil servants. Not a single one of them was doing a thing,—not a single one. I think that statement pertains to the civil service in this city generally. Their main object is to get on the pay-roll; they want to let the country keep them. Let me say that the civil service offers a career to any man or woman who has the grey matter to take advantage of it. That opportunity would have meant a great deal to some of us who were brought up back in the country with very few advantages, and no school training except what we managed to get ourselves. Then, when they ask me to bow down and worship this golden calf which is set up as the civil service of Canada, I say, "Oh Lord, where dost Thou lead me?"

As I said earlier in my remarks, I hope every man in the house opposed to the measure will put himself on record so that he may go back to the farmers to-day who are receiving between 4 and 5 cents per pound for their pork, practically nothing for their grain, the housewives who are trying to keep things together on less than half the incomes they had a few years ago, and tell them to double their taxes so the civil servants of Canada may escape. I would have no fear of the result.

Mr. T. M. CAYLEY (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address only a few words to the house concerning the matter now under discussion. Coming from the county of Oxford, one of the fairest agricultural districts in the whole of Canada, "fair as the garden of the Lord," I can say we have some of the greatest, most tenacious and patriotic farmers to be found in the dominion. I want to state, however, that to-day they are carrying on with fear and foreboding, but are putting up a wonderful fight. They are heavily burdened by taxation of one kind and another, and I have received many sad tales of their heroic efforts to hang on. I want to tell hon. members that those farmers are expecting that every Canadian who is highly favoured in this country will do his or her part in this national emergency. I agree with the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Sproule) who held forth on behalf of the farmers of his constituency. What applies in his constituency applies equally in the fair county of Oxford. I know of the sad conditions there, and I can say that those farmers are expecting—in fact, I believe civil servants are expecting—to come across and to do their share willingly in this time of stress. I am sure the civil servants appreciate the seriousness of the present emergency. I do not doubt for a minute that they are ready to do anything they possibly can to help meet it. It is like a war-time emergency when every man and every woman must do his part. And they will do their part, but they want fair play.

The hon. member for East Lambton said that the greatest depression is on the farm, and that we must bend every effort to benefit the farmer. I did hope that if any one thing more than another would be emphasized this session it would be the necessity for solving the great problems confronting our farmers to-day. I do not see any signs on the order paper, I do not see much of a program, I do not see so very much indication that the farmer is going to get anything beneficial out of this session. Perhaps the emergency is so great that we cannot do anything. But I tell you the farmers are expecting something. They were promised something, and they are looking forward to the fulfilment of those promises that were made to them in such a convincing way. They want greater markets. The hon. member said that a farmer could sell all his cows, horses and everything else and they would not bring him $750. Of course, to a great extent that is true. Undoubtedly our farmers are in a very difficult position. A lady came to me not many days ago. She and her husband are on two hundred good acres of land.

She said to me: "What are we to do? They are going to foreclose the mortgage on us. We cannot meet the payments. We have already borrowed on my husband's life insurance policy, we have raised every last dollar, we have scraped together and borrowed money to pay the taxes, and now we have reached the limit of our resources." She and her husband had devoted years and years of hard effort to cultivating their farm and developing herds of cattle—and there are no herds like the Oxford herds. They have done their very best, and now they are asking the rest of Canada if they will not join in an endeavour to relieve them of the burden of taxation; they are asking the great crowd throughout Canada to get off their backs and give them a chance.

This, I understand, is an interim appeal to meet a great emergency. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if I recall his words aright, implied that it was a great patriotic appeal. Then, sir, that appeal should stir the hearts of every Canadian. But when I go back to my people and tell them that in this great patriotic appeal for a ten per cent cut—and they are all for a cut, so am I; there is no justice unless we all do our part—when I tell them that this ten per cent cut will apply to everybody in the civil service, from those getting from $35 a day down to those getting a couple of dollars a day, what will they say? And what will they say when I tell them about the poor lad who came to me and said, "I get only $95 a month. They are going to cut off $5, and out of the $90 left I have to provide for my wife and seven children and pay $25 a month rent." Do you mean to say the good farmers and the workingmen of Oxford county will think this is a fair deal all the way down the line? No, I can imagine them saying: "That is what we have had to put up with all the time. There is a favoured class in this Canada of ours, and there is an unfavoured class." Then worse than that, what will be their reaction if I have to tell them: "Here is a body of public servants who are exempt—they are the great 'untouchables'; you must not touch their salaries." Yet we are appealing to the patriotism of all these great Canadians! It seems to me, and I know many of these gentlemen well, that they will resent being left out in the cold in this way. Now, in this great emergency why not call upon these men of the army and navy and the bench? Let the Prime Minister go out and in that convincing way of his ask them to make their contribution in this great national emergency. It is only an interim shift to balance our budget. Let us all work together. The farmers are doing their part, they are hanging on; and after all they are the foundation of this great dominion. They are doing their part. If they can only make ends meet you will not hear any grumbling from them. But I do believe there is a great deal this government can do to relieve these farmers of the oppression that is now upon them. The agriculture committee should get together and show greater interest in the problems of our farmers and do their best to help them solve their difficulties.

The other day the Prime Minister, speaking of the merit system, exclaimed: "If we had only some way by which we could ascertain real merit!" Is there any real merit in a ten per cent cut in salaries ranging all the way from $35 a day clear down to $2 a day? Let us bear this burden in proportion as we have strength to bear it. Then the farmers of Oxford county and the workmen throughout the whole dominion will say: "At least they were fair."

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to intervene in this debate, but after hearing so many members offering apologies for a ten per cent cut it is well nigh impossible for me to keep my seat, for I have had over a fifty per cent cut. My constituents also have had a heavy cut, they are backed up against the wall, fighting conditions in an endeavour to bring back this old country of ours, this country Canada, to a condition of prosperity. If they are let alone by the agitators they will bring back this country into its rightful position.

While I listened to the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) I thought of a little pamphlet that was left at my farm some years ago at a time when I was paying my man $100 a month and giving him the very best on the farm. Some gentleman came around with a pamphlet called "The Slave of the Farm," in an attempt to get my man discontented. I have the pamphlet before me. It was printed in 1914. Ever since 1914 they have been agitating in various ways, sowing discontent throughout the country. This pamphlet was got up by the socialist party, not the communist party at all.

So far I have heard no practical suggestions to help the farmer. The farmer has a lot to contend with. I have made up a statement of conditions on the farm when the farmer was getting a dollar a bushel for his wheat, and I am going to place it on Hansard. I have no doubt it will be subjected to criticism by my friends of the United Farmers of Alberta. I am going to place it on Hansard because I know it is correct; it is based on fifty years' experience on the farm. The farmer has had more than a ten per cent cut; in my constituency he has been cut twenty per cent, thirty per cent or forty per cent, but he is not discouraged, and I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that this is the wrong time to try to shake the foundations of this old country of ours. My constituency is purely agricultural, and I made up this statement for the benefit of those who lack any knowledge of agriculture.

The other day I made a statement which I am going to repeat—and I do not refer to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) at all—that education without brains is the cheapest commodity on the market, but that education with brains is scarce and hard to get. I have listened to some hon. members who have had lots of education but very little practical knowledge. I am proud of my constituency, and one reason is because Sir John A. Macdonald represented it at one time. It has been represented by some outstanding men; the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Hon. Doctor Roche, represented it for years. There are real men in that constituency, and they sent me back here with a majority of nearly 2,700. We had a few agitators running around the country, men with hyphenated names, calling themselves Liberal-Progressive, and Progressive-Liberals. One of them who called himself a Liberal-Progressive, should have cut off one part of that name. I said I was a progressive Conservative, and they could not understand it.

I want to congratulate the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) on one thing. I do not think any other man in Canada could have held possession of parliament, as he held it in 1925 and 1926, with the various occupational groups with which he had to contend, made up of men with such a variety of ideas. He held them together; they flocked from all parts of Canada to get behind him; they came back here at all hours to support him, and I must congratulate him on that.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, what about to-day? I see the hon. member from Battle Creek—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: —or is it Battle River (Mr. Spencer), in his seat. He made the statement, which appears in Hansard, that I farmed the farmer, and made my money in that way. I emphatically deny that statement on the floor of this house. I am retired and out of business now; I am giving my services and my knowledge of farming in western Canada for the benefit of the farmers, and I am proud to say that I paid every man one hundred cents on the dollar for everything I agreed to pay him. I never misled the farmers; I never farmed the farmers, as the hon. member stated.

I am supporting this resolution because my people in Marquette wish me to do so. They have suffered, and by this statement I am going to show that even with wheat at $1 a bushel the farmer cannot make a dollar on a 320 acre farm under present conditions. They must have lower freight rates, but not one hon. member opposite said a word about that. I was a member of the local legislature in Manitoba when the freight rate was 20 per cent lower that it is to-day, but that was taken away from us in 1917. In order to obtain a lower freight rate we put the name of the province on the back of the bonds, and it did not cost the province of Manitoba one dollar. We had a ten cent rate on wheat; we secured a lower rate on cattle, and through the actions of the government of Manitoba, of which I was a member, we were able to get the products of the farm to the seaboard at a reasonable rate. Did I farm the farmer then?

We must have less agitation; we must have outstanding men to get behind the farmer and bring conditions back to where they should be. I do not want to see our country crash; I want to see prosperity come back, and the only way that can be done is to help the farmer to get his commodity to market at something like a reasonable rate. No man can farm at a profit under present freight rates.

We must have a little economy also. I wonder how many of these civil servants, who are getting a ten per cent cut, went to see Jack Dempsey box in Winnipeg. I saw several of them there, sitting in the $3 seats. A short time ago I was asked to go to the Maple Leaf Gardens in Toronto to see a hockey match. There were 15,000 people at that match, and the seats cost from $1 up to $3. I see all the luxuries of the city, and I think of the hardships and struggles of my people in Marquette, who are fighting with their backs to the wall. These men who have all the luxuries of city life, who can afford to pay $3 to see a prize fight in Winnipeg or a hockey match in Toronto, are complaining about a ten per cent cut. I asked the gentleman who took me to see the hockey match what he paid for the seat, and he said he paid $3. He bought three seats, and I told him he was pretty fortunate, since he was on a salary. Let me tell you what you must get down to. I walked from Stouffville to Toronto, with one cow on the end of the rope, and made $8 out of it. When we get down to work and start off again we might get somewhere.

We must have economy and we must work. Talk about work; I see so many people earning money so easily, and it makes me think back over my life. I have worked, and I have every sympathy for the worker. I would be the last to go against the worker, but this is not a normal year, as hon. gentlemen opposite know very well. We all must make a sacrifice, I am making one just as much as any other member of this house is making one. I say that if we get back to work and practise economy we will save this country from getting into a worse condition than exists to-day. This statement I have referred to, showing the operating costs of a 320-acre farm in the province of Manitoba, discloses that under the best of conditions the lady of the farm cannot buy even a four-dollar skirt.

We hope to get Churchill opened up to bring Manitoba nearer to the seaboard, and with the prospects of the St. Lawrence waterway we hope to be able to ship from the prairie provinces at something like a reasonable rate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) has mentioned putting something on Hansard, but I would advise him that nothing goes on Hansard which has not been either read or spoken in the house.

Mr. MULLINS: The statement is rather lengthy and I did not want to tire the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. MULLINS: I spent some time in the preparation of these figures, and they may be received with some criticism. They are as follows:

Balance net revenue over, for services owner and wife		1,050
Total		$ 2,480

Note:—Nothing is left over for interest on capital invested, or if balance over be treated as interest on capital invested, yielding 7 per cent, nothing will be left over for services of owner and wife.

With the above figures of cost of land. buildings, implements, horses, etc., any farmer can readily figure out the profit of farming. If, from his experience, his grain will yield more or less of an average per acre over a ten year period, then he can add on or deduct from as the case may be but, when these prices and yields of grain were prepared the farmer was given the benefit of any doubt.

It will be noted in computing the revenue that I have allowed $1 per bushel for wheat. I did that because I believe wheat will come back to $1 per bushel, and I am looking for us to get that price this year. The compilation of these figures took some time but I thought they would be interesting to hon. members who may not understand the operation of a 320-acre farm in western Canada.

This proposed cut of civil service salaries is not a large one and it will be in effect only for this year. It will not fall heavily upon them to make that sacrifice as compared with the sacrifices that others are making, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite not to be too critical and not to be continually finding fault with this side.

I know the right hon. gentleman who is piloting the ship of state; I have known him for over thirty years, ever since he came to Calgary. I do not know of one dishonourable move he has ever made. I have watched his career during the last thirty-two years in western Canada. Thirty-two years ago I had the privilege of standing on the platform with him in southern Alberta when he was first branching out, and I have watched him all down through the years. I know he will, if at all possible, bring this country back to prosperity, and it is a godsend that he is at the helm.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: Hon. gentlemen smile and laugh at that remark, but while they were doing so I was thinking of an old ship called Canada on which I left the Prince of Wales landing dock in Liverpool to come home. How she did rock and pitch and roll all over the ocean, setting in the trough of the sea. At present Canada is in the trough of the sea and we are working to get her out, just as they did with that old ship Canada that ran for so many years across the Atlantic. They put her into dry dock. They took the top decks off her and put her on an even balance. That, from my knowledge during the past thirty-two years of the right hon. gentleman who is leading this party, is what he will do for Canada.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the house only for a couple of minutes. We all join in the hope that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) will, thirty-two years from now, be again standing on the platform with his chief of whom he thinks so highly. I say that with all good wishes and sincerity.

As regards the subject of the debate, I am willing to agree to the cut not only in the civil service salaries, but in the indemnity as well. But I am strongly of the opinion that the cut should have been extended to all branches of the civil service, including the judges, also that it should have been on a graded scale so that the money forfeited should have come rather from money that would ordinarily be spent on luxuries than from money that would otherwise be spent upon necessities. I am also very much in favour of the suggestion that has been made that there should be a total exemption of the ten per cent cut as regards those having a salary of $1,200 or less. Further, I would point out that the announcement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that on salaries under $1,200 a concession would be made by the government paying the contribution of those civil servants towards the superannuation fund, is not a contribution in this regard; that a large number of civil servants do not contribute to the superannuation fund, and if they are receiving less than $1,200 a year, they will get no rebate whatever, so that they will be heavily penalized. To suggest that the burden be taken off only those who happen to be paying superannuation, is unreasonable.

My real object in speaking was to make some comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) who I am sorry to see is not in his seat at the moment. He said that he had visited one of the departments lately and had seen five of the employees doing nothing. That, in his opinion, was the condition that prevailed generally throughout the civil service in Ottawa. When an hon. member or, indeed, anybody enters an office, it is natural for the employees to look up. Perhaps they were arrested by his striking personality and possibly they did what is recorded of the people in Goldsmith's Deserted Village:

> And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew
> That one small head could carry all he knew.

They may have been arrested by some such thought as that. At any rate, we do not know the reason why they were doing nothing at the moment. I must, however, enter my protest against the statement that idleness is the prevailing condition in the civil service. These people in Ottawa are not able to speak for themselves. I should have been glad had some member more directly associated with the service taken up the cudgels, but perhaps this comes with more force from one who lives a long distance away and who has no personal interest in these people. I have had business at many of their offices and I have found them obliging, courteous and for the most part painstaking and willing to work. I wish to enter my emphatic protest against the suggestion of the hon. member for Muskoka that the conditions that generally prevail are those of doing little or nothing for their salaries. Of course there are defections in all ranks, but for the most part they are a hard working, industrious, decent body of people.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to listen to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins); he always entertains the house for a time. But perhaps the best thing he has done since he has been a member of parliament has been to put on record, for the benefit of the house and the country, what it costs to carry on a farm in western Canada. The hon. member has done just what some of us have been endeavouring to do during the last ten or eleven years, namely, to show what the real cost of carrying on farming in the west is and how little profit the farmer is able to make under present conditions. If, however, I may say so without offence, I am glad the hon. member is now clothed and in his right mind, for we can readily recall how he has told the house what wonderfully prosperous conditions have prevailed in the constituency of Marquette. Probably the hon. member has been receiving letters from home.

Mr. MULLINS: Will the hon. member allow me to explain that?

Mr. BROWN: Yes, if the hon. gentleman does not take too long.

Mr. MULLINS: It was to keep the mortgage companies from bothering any of the men who had loans from them, and I did not want to keep on wailing and crying.

Mr. BROWN: That may be so; but after reading some of the wonderful statements made by the hon. member for Marquette in regard to his constituency, I had an incident reported to me of an agent for a machine company who was fired from his firm because he was unable to collect more from those very prosperous farmers. As a further indication of the conditions that prevail in Marquette, the other day I received information that in one municipality there were 271 parcels of land listed for tax sale, most of them quarter-sections as well as some town lots. I had the amount added up on an adding machine in one of the departments and the unpaid taxes amounted to $29,000.

I was interested also in the hon. member's reminiscences of the session of 1926. I do not think any of us who were here at that period will ever forget the hectic time we had. I was interested in the tribute the hon. member paid to the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) on being able to carry on under such circumstances.

Mr. COTNAM: He should have paid it to the hon. member.

Mr. BROWN: I am not unwilling to take part of it. Perhaps if hon. gentlemen opposite knew of the tremendous efforts that were made by those now sitting on the other side of the house to wean us away from our allegiance, they would realize something of the pressure we had to bear.

Mr. COTNAM: The hon. gentleman was weaned anyway.

Mr. BROWN: Before I come to the resolution itself, while I have been listening to the debate that has been carried on from one side of the house and the other, two questions have arisen that are clamouring for an answer. One is this. How did it come about that conditions which in 1930 were entirely the fault of the then government were, six months after, and still are, the result of world wide conditions? Another is, how the present plea for economy in this particular direction can be reconciled with the declared efficacy of the policies which this government has put into effect. We will leave the solution of these problems to a later date; probably when we have nothing better to do we shall try to answer them.

With regard to the matter before us I want to say this. Representing as I do a rural constituency, representing people who have seen not only a ten per cent reduction in their income but the whole equity in their holdings wiped out in the last two or three years; knowing as I do that to-day a letter and yesterday a telegram have come from home reminding me that the farmers are losing their horses and every day or two are compelled to draw one out into the field; knowing that, and knowing that I can get no satisfactory answer from this government as to what they propose to do, and believing as I do that the farmers have borne their full share and more than their share of the burden, I can offer no objection to the general principle of a reduction in salaries. I do believe, however, that the proposed reduction, if made along the lines indicated so far, will not give fair play all round. I believe that the people of this country should bear the burden in proportion to their ability to bear it. If I were discussing this question theoretically I would say that all men, from those receiving the highest salaries to those receiving the lowest, should bear some share of the burden; and if we find it not practicable to levy contributions upon the smaller incomes it is only because the cost of collecting it would be greater than the amount that would be received. So that for practical purposes it is probably desirable that there should be a minimum amount fixed below which there should be no reduction. I do hold, however, and very strongly, that when the government is attempting to levy this burden upon the people of Canada they should try to levy it as equitably as possible, and I want to endorse all that has been said in regard to the exemptions proposed. I see no reason why judges and military and naval officers should be exempt from the burden; I see no reason why they should not be asked to carry a share of the burden which the other people of Canada are being called on to carry. If the bill when it comes down is framed along those lines I shall have no hesitation in supporting it; if there is any indication that there is an attempt to distribute the burden fairly among the different classes in the country. We all realize that it is not a pleasant thing to reduce salaries, but we are face to face with an emergency such as prevailed during the war. At that time we felt that we were under obligation each and all of us to carry what share of the burden it was possible for us to bear. Some accepted the burden freely and gladly, while others made the war an occasion for piling up wealth for themselves. While we should like to think that all men are willing to bear their share of the burden we must not forget that there are possibly those who will be only too glad, if they are able, to escape their share. I trust that the government, now that they have taken this step to balance the budget, will realize that this is only one of a number of possible means that might be taken; and I hope that the Minister of Finance will not pay any attention to a letter he has received, a copy of which came to us to-night, from some commercial bureau protesting against any increase in the income tax. That to my mind is the one source from which we could receive large sums of money that would help us to balance the budget.

While accepting the general principle of this bill, that is for reductions in salaries, I should like to see it along a graded line, so that the small salaries would not be burdened while a heavier tax would be laid upon those who are much more able to bear the burden. Let us remember that after all it is not so much what is deducted from our incomes that counts; it is what we have left; and we have good reason in this regard for bearing in mind the commendation of the poor widow who gave her two mites to the treasury. She had given all that she had, and had nothing left. We must therefore judge the measure of sacrifice not by the amount deducted but by the amount left.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I regret to have to speak on this resolution at this hour. I did endeavour to get the floor earlier in the debate but did not succeed. I want to say at the outset that I do not intend to oppose the resolution, but at the same time there are features about it that are objectionable. I believe that if we had in Canada an intelligent and scientific monetary system there would be no need of putting wages up and down every few years, nor should we hear ministers making any reference to "normal depressions." If we are to have normal depressions then I suppose wages at such times must be reduced, and we cannot at the present time help ourselves. We have this system. It seems as though the majority of people are willing that it shall continue, and that being the case I think we must submit to a reduction in salaries at this time.

Most of the people outside the civil service have had a reduction in wages or salaries; at least that is the statement I understood the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to make, and he goes on to justify the cutting of salaries of civil servants because of the fact that in foodstuffs there has been a reduction of thirty per cent; in fuel cost, 5.8 per cent; in rents 7/10 of 1 per cent; in clothing, 23.6 per cent, and in sundries, 2.2 per cent, or an average reduction of 14.4 per cent. Then to-night some speakers on the other side of the house have stated that the farmer has taken a reduction in his income amounting in some cases to sixty per cent. In view of all this, I feel that in a great many instances the civil servants can have no valid objection to a reduction in salaries. But I think it is to be regretted that the reduction which is being introduced was not made on a fairer basis. I believe that some of the smaller salaries are too low at the present time and should not be reduced at all; on the other hand, some salaries, particularly those over $5,000 might stand a reduction of more than ten per cent to make it equitable. But one thing I cannot understand—I do not think it is just—is that while the cost of living in some cases has been reduced as much as 14 per cent; while the salaries and wages of civil servants are being cut ten per cent, and while there has been a general cut in wages throughout Canada of about ten per cent, interest rates have been raised. That is, the wages of money have been increased. I believe this matter should receive the serious attention of the house, and at this time we are justified in bringing it to the attention of hon. members. The people of Canada should not be compelled to accept reductions in their wages, and reduced incomes from the sale of their products, and at the same time have the wages of money raised. In so far as it is within the competence of parliament, interest rates should be reduced in the same proportion as wages and salaries.

Exemptions from the reduction form another objection to the proposal now before us. My first objection will be directed towards the exemption given to lieutenant-governors, and next comes the exemption given to judges. I can see no reason why lieutenant-governors and judges should be exempt from the reductions. They are drawing high salaries, and surely if there is any equity in this country we should begin at the top and reduce the big salaries. Judges hold their positions for life and retire on substantial pensions. To my mind there can be no justification for exempting these people when civil servants, some of whom receive less than $100 a month have their salaries cut.

Next I come to the case of the officers of the National Defence department. I can see no reason why they should be exempt from the reduction of salaries. Mr. Speaker, would you call it eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 4, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

FEDERAL STATE MEDICINE

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface) moved:

That the following resolution, namely: That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration steps which would: (a) provide for periodic medical examination of the Canadian people; (b) afford medical relief for those suffering from disease, be restored on this order paper under the provisions of standing order 52.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN CURRENCY

PROPOSAL TO ISSUE IN BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, in order to well establish that the population is bilingual and that the country was settled by two great races, it is desirable that Canadian currency should be in both official languages of Canada, be restored on the order paper under the provisions of standing order 52.

NARCOTIC DRUGS

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION LIMITING MANUFACTURE AND REGULATING DISTRIBUTION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the international convention for limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotic drugs, Geneva, July 13, 1931, signed on behalf of Canada by the plenipotentiaries named therein, and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: In moving the resolution which stands in my name, I desire to make a short explanation inasmuch as this convention is a matter of considerable importance to the dominion. It was drawn up by an international conference held in Geneva, from the 27th May to the 13th July, 1931, in which fifty-seven states participated. Thirty-eight have now signed the convention.

The convention was signed for Canada by Dr. W. A. Riddell, Canadian advisory officer accredited to the League of Nations, and Colonel C. H. L. Sharman, chief of the narcotic division of the Department of Pensions and National Health, who represented this country at the conference.

The convention will become effective ninety days after the secretary-general of the League of Nations has received the ratificaton or accessions of twenty-five members of the League of Nations or non-member states, including any four of the following: France, Germany, United Kingdom, Japan, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Turkey, and the United States of America, which, of course, is not a member of the League.

Seven of the eight named states, that is all except Turkey, have already signed the convention, and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom has introduced legislation which is now before the British parliament to give effect to the provisions of the convention.

The convention supplements and develops the earlier efforts for the international regulation of the traffic in narcotic drugs which were embodied in the Hague Convention of the 23rd January, 1912, and the Geneva Convention of the 19th February, 1923, to both of which the Dominion of Canada is a party. Under the provisions of the conventions now in force a fairly effective system of control of international trade in narcotic drugs has been worked out, and I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that there are few matters of more universal import to this country than the trade in narcotic drugs. The main lines of this system of control are probably familiar to the members of this house, for on more than one occasion we have debated the matter. They are embodied in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act and the regulations made by order in council to give effect to that act. In substance, they require that all imports of narcotic drugs into this country should be accompanied by an official import certificate issued by a competent government department, which has satisfied itself that the consignment in question will be used solely for medicinal purposes. Within the limits of the earlier agreements this system has worked satisfactorily, but it was obvious that no system of control of trade could be completely effective if no restrictions of any kind were placed upon the manufacture of drugs whose distribution was regulated. It will be recalled that on more than one occasion the medical doctors who are members of this chamber have discussed that phase of the situation, and the difficulty of adequate control based upon restrictions was apparent when no control or restrictions were exercised upon manufacture. That discussion, I think, will be within the memory of most members of the chamber.

The task of inducing the manufacturing countries to agree upon restricting their output of habit-forming drugs has been an extremely difficult one. The kernel of the convention before the house is Article 6, which stipulates:

1. There shall not be manufactured in any country or territory in any one year a quantity of any of the drugs greater than the total of the following quantities:

(a) The quantity required within the limits of the estimates for that country or territory for that year for use as such for its medicinal and scientific needs including the quantity required for the manufacture of preparations for the export of which export authorizations are not required, whether such preparations are intended for domestic consumption or for export.

(b) The quantity required within the limits of the estimates for that country or territory for that year for conversion, whether for domestic consumption or for export.

(c) Such quantity as may be required by that country or territory for the execution during the year of orders for export in accordance with the provisions of this convention.

(d) The quantity, if any, required by that country or territory for the purpose of maintaining the reserve stocks at the level specified for the estimates for that year.

(e) The quantity, if any, required for the purpose of maintaining the government stocks at the level specified in the estimates for that year.

An extensive illicit traffic in such drugs as morphine, heroin, and cocaine is carried on in many parts of the world. In fact, almost every day one reads in the newspapers of efforts that are being made to convict those who are so engaged. We in this country are neither exempt from the operation of these habit-forming drugs nor yet from the illicit traffic in them, but our efforts to repress the traffic have been marked with a certain measure of success. The effectiveness of regulatory action has, however, been limited by the fact that narcotic drugs are being manufactured in quantities vastly in excess of legitimate requirements for medical and scientific purposes. The restriction of manufacture to these requirements is the primary object of the convention before the house. Its prompt ratification and rigorous application promise the ultimate eradication of a wretched and evil trade.

The importance of securing a satisfactory solution of this problem of manufacture to a country like Canada, which is technically a "victim country" cannot be over-emphasized. We do not manufacture narcotic drugs but depend for our legitimate requirements upon the countries in which these industries are already established. It is, therefore, a source of great satisfaction to all engaged in preventive work in Canada that an agreement has been reached on such a measure of limitation as this convention represents.

I may say that our representatives at the convention at Geneva were confronted with many difficulties in securing assistance from countries similarly situated and lending assistance to other countries determined to suppress the traffic. The result is the convention now before the house. It will be necessary to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act of 1929, and notice to that effect stands upon the order paper. That will enable the ratification of the convention, which will take place immediately, and the bill, as I say, will give effect to the provisions which the convention provides.

It may be pointed out that if this convention is approved and the government authorized to proceed to its ratification Canada will be the first country to complete ratification of the convention.

The attached report may be of some interest to members of this house who have been following these matters, for these words were used at the fifth committee of the assembly of the League of Nations on September 18, 1931, and give a fair indication of public opinion as represented by the delegates there assembled. The language is as follows:

The convention marks an entirely new and highly important development in international cooperation, since this is the first time that an industry has been brought under international regulation and that manufacture in its economic aspect has been wholly subordinated to higher humanitarian and moral aims. Thanks to the system established by this convention and the Geneva convention, there will be at the headquarters of the league itself a sort of central counting-house for the world traffic in drugs. . . . The new convention covers a far larger number of drugs than preceding conventions. It brings codeine under control, whereas for many years morphine converted into codeine has to some extent escaped all supervision. It prohibits the export, except on very strict conditions, of a substance which has in the past bulked very large in the illicit traffic—diacetylmorphine—and raises the question of its replacement by less dangerous substances. It contains stipulations relating to reserve stocks and surplus stocks, which will be gradually brought into use for legitimate consumption by a corresponding reduction in output or will be disposed of under the sole responsibility of the government.

Above all, through a system of estimates furnished by governments, the convention enables a world total of the quantities to be manufactured to be fixed, and sets up a supervisory body to examine those estimates. . . . The new convention strengthens the powers of various league organizations, especially the advisory committee and the permanent central board. The fifth committee emphasized the importance that attached to the provisions instructing the advisory committee to draw up a model administrative code to serve, as it were, as a body of regulations for the application of the convention, and as a pattern for national laws and regulations. Furthermore, the system of annual reports and reports of seizures, which forms an essential part of the committee's work, is for the first time effectually incorporated in an international convention. The powers and responsibilities of the permanent central board are also enlarged.

Those are the words used in submitting the convention to the assembly in September last. I have, therefore, Mr. Speaker, the greatest satisfaction in moving the approval of this convention which has been entered into and in connection with which I should like to say that the Canadian representatives, and especially the chief of the narcotic division of our own Department of Pensions and National Health took a very important and at times not indecisive part.

Motion agreed to.

PRICE OF SEED WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) yesterday asked for information arising out of a letter he had received as to why the elevators were receiving 58 cents a bushel for wheat, and the farmers receiving only 52 cents for the same grade of wheat. My information is that the elevators are receiving only 52 cents a bushel.

LOBSTER FISHING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) yesterday asked me a question. Previously he had sent a note to my office which I did not receive until I had left the office and the chamber had assembled. His inquiry has been forwarded to the State department.

[Mr. Bennett.]

SEED AND FEED RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) yesterday asked a question with respect to an order for a return which was passed a few days ago. Upon inquiry I learn the return involves the work of several departments. Undoubtedly my hon. friend is aware of the procedure in such cases. The information from the several departments is forwarded to the Secretary of State, who, in turn, submits the return. Speaking only for the Department of Finance, I can say that I shall undertake to expedite the answer.

CANADIAN SETTLEMENT IN COLOMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon), I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I have in my hand an Associated Press cable from Colombia to the effect that the government of that country intends to expropriate 1,000,000 acres of land and to place thereon 20,000 Canadians and 30,000 Europeans. Is the government aware of that movement?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I would ask that the question of the hon. member stand as a notice for the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon). I have heard that some Doukhobors from Canada were contemplating removal to Colombia. During the last few days, however, I have not had occasion to look into the matter.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES AT SPECIAL SESSION OF ASSEMBLY IN GENEVA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister who is representing Canada at the special assembly of the League of Nations now sitting at Geneva?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Canada's representatives are the Right Hon. Sir George Perley and Hon. Maurice Dupré.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What about the lady?

Mr. BENNETT: She is not a member of the government.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I noticed that my right hon. friend, replying to a question addressed to him by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) mentioned that the lady representative at Geneva had not been appointed as a delegate to the assembly because she was not a member of the government. I should like to ask my right hon. friend if there is any new ruling which governs representation at the assembly of the league, because I have always understood the government was free to name any delegate it wished, whether the delegate was a member of the government or not.

Mr. BENNETT: I dare say Hansard will indicate that is not what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what we understood.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not responsible for that. The ex-Minister of Justice asked a question, "What about the lady?" And I said that she was not a member of the government. That is a statement of fact; that is all. There is no rule that I know of which compels the appointment of a member of a government, or that does not leave the widest discrimination to appoint anyone. I named two members of the government and that, I thought, answered the question which was asked. I did not think it was necessary to say why someone else was not appointed, and I gave my answer in that way. Then the ex-Minister of Justice, thinking this a matter of importance, when his question as to who had been appointed had been respectfully and courteously answered, asked a question and received an answer. Then he volunteered something which had nothing to do with the question. I said "She is not a member of the government" in the same sense as he had asked the question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was a most improper answer, because the fact that she is not a member of the government is no reason why she should not sit at the assembly of the League of Nations. My right hon. friend himself has appointed people who were not members of the government to go to the assembly of the league. Other governments have done so, and I am quite sure that at the present assembly there are many delegates, in fact a majority of delegates, who are not members of any government. I cannot see why the lady from Canada has been singled out to be left out of the delegation.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED DEDUCTION OF TEN PER CENT IN INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

The house resumed from Thursday, March 3, consideration of the following proposed resolution (Mr. Rhodes):

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize deductions of ten per cent from the amounts of certain salaries or other compensations or indemnities payable by the government of Canada during the fiscal year 1932-33.

And to provide for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of all current contributions payable under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act in respect of the salaries payable during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933, of all employees who receive not more than one thousand two hundred dollars per annum.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night at eleven o'clock I had stated I felt it was inevitable that this resolution should be accepted by the house. I did urge the government however to reduce interest charges on money or, as it is commonly known, money wages. I do not think there is any justice in reducing the salaries and wages of 90 per cent of the people of Canada and at the same time increasing money wages. We are moving in opposite directions.

I then proceeded to protest against some of the exemptions proposed in the resolution. I can see no reason why lieutenant governors' salaries should not be reduced, or why judges' salaries should not be reduced. They are the very highest paid officials and in such times as these their salaries could very well be reduced. I wish however particularly to refer to the military officers whose salaries under the proposed resolution are exempt. I can see no reason for such exemptions. It would seem that military men are being exempted while the salaries of civil employees are being cut; thousands of civil servants are to receive cuts in their salaries. Some of those servants were in the forces overseas; some of them served four years in the great war, and made great sacrifices. For that service they received the handsome salary of $1.10 a day, after which they returned to Canada and were placed in the civil service. Now they are to receive a ten per cent cut, while the military officers, the generals and colonels who drew high salaries during the war are to be allowed to maintain their regular salaries. I can think of no reason for such discrimination. Particularly do I feel that there is an injustice when I consider what is happening in the air force. Recently we learned that some of the men in that force who have been laid off sought service under a foreign government. I think they cannot be blamed for adopting that course. In most cases they have wives and children dependent upon them for support. Some of the very finest men I have known in Canada have been members of that force, and it is not necessary to remind this house that in every branch of military service Canada's soldiers were second to none among those who took part in the great war. I do not wish to make any comparison between the different branches of the Canadian military forces, but certainly I can say that Canada's air men were second to none. I believe every member of this house must admit that.

Recently a statement was made in the house that 70 officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force had been laid off. I believe 42 of them are ex-service men, and nearly 40 are married. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, this is a discrimination against married men who are also war veterans, when by common consent of all parties in this house war veterans, and especially married men, should at all times receive the greatest consideration. Forty-two returned men and dependents would number about 100 souls. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot let this resolution pass without protesting against the proposed cut. If these men are to be let out of the air force Canada is going to lose the services of her most experienced flyers. These men have flown over northwestern Canada and have charted air routes across that great country. They charted the air routes over Labrador, they laid out the routes for our air mail service. If they are to be dismissed now Canada is going to lose the very cream of her flying men. As a matter of general policy I think the government is making a mistake in reducing the civil service at this time. I realize that perhaps a cut should be made in the amount that is being spent on the civil service, but with hundreds of thousands of people unemployed surely it is not good policy to add to their ranks by discharging men of this type. I think a much better way of dealing with the matter would be to keep these men on the pay list at reduced salaries, that is, by cutting down the number of days' work so that nobody need be laid off. This would involve no increase in the appropriation for the civil service, and all these men could be taken care of as vacancies occurred in any of the departments. We are only adding to the number of unemployed when we discharge civil servants at a time like this. I think most of us realize that there are no other jobs available for these people, which means that within a short time some of them will be in need of direct relief.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why should the taxpayer be burdened?

Mr. COOTE: What I am proposing will not add to the burden of the taxpayer. Under my proposal the reduced hours of labour would enable these men to be continued in the service without additional cost. I urge that this method be adopted to take care of these men now forming part of Canada's air force. Why should these men feel compelled to seek service under some foreign government—to provide as a matter of fact a fighting air force for that government in order to provide for their families? Flying is the only work these men are fitted for, and there are no positions in civil aviation to which they can turn now. They served in the war when they were young, in the very best years of their life, the formative period as we term it, and they are not fitted for any other work. For the work of our air force, however, they are better qualified than any other men whom we could put in their place.

Again I urge the government to adopt my suggestion that these men be retained in the service at a reduced salary. I am sure they would not object to a reduction in salary. Naturally they feel that they are not being treated fairly. A reduction of ten per cent applied to the salaries of all the officers of the National Defence department would take care of the salaries of these forty married men, all of them ex-servicemen, under the proposal which I am now putting forward. If the government will not consider such a reduction in the salaries of the personnel of the National Defence department, I suggest that these men be retained, and the total amount which is provided for the air force after the proposed ten per cent cut is put into operation be distributed among all the men who belong to the air force; let them all share in the reduction.

I suggest that the government abolish the lieutenant-governorships. The saving thus effected would more than take care of these forty married men and their dependents, and I am sure the service rendered Canada by these flying men is far more important than any service rendered to the country by our lieutenant-governors. Any judge of the supreme court in each of the provinces could very well discharge the duties of lieutenant-governor. Surely there is no question as to which is the more necessary national service. I might also point out that a reduction of ten per cent in judges' salaries would provide far more than is being saved by the discharge of these flying men.

May I say in conclusion that these men have done the most dangerous work of any branch of the civil service. But what is the reward they are receiving? They are not being asked to submit to a cut of ten per cent; they are being retired, in most cases at one month's notice. If they return to civil life it is impossible for them to get jobs as flying men, the activities of civil aviation being now at a minimum. In a word, these men are facing unemployment—a most distressing prospect for their wives and families. These flying men have given Canada their best. Is Canada now going to let them be turned out in the cold? I do hope the government will take some action to see that these men are retained in the service.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before this debate closes, I wish to add a few comments with reference to this resolution which does not do honour to the government. It is useless to refer to the numerous pledges made throughout the country by the Conservative party in the last election; pledges of charlatans, made with the view of capturing the people's confidence, pledges according to which the serious problem of unemployment was to be solved in three days, and an opportunity would be afforded to farmers to sell their products at better prices and secure new markets for our manufactures. It will soon be two years since this government has taken over the affairs of the country. The economic depression which existed at the last election far from abating has become worse. This is a clear proof of this government's incompetence and shows up their lack of ability to govern the country.

In order to balance its budget, it asks this house through a resolution to cut the salaries of civil servants by ten per cent.

The principle upon which rests this resolution, that is a horizontal cut applied to all salaries is no surprise to me. Ever since this government has been in power it has always been the poor, the small wage earner and the humble citizens who were called upon to contribute and in the same measure as the wealthy, the millionaires that sit in large numbers on your right, sir. They are responsible for the present state of our finances through the enforcement of a high protective tariff.

The quota of the civil servants who receive $1,200 per year, in justice should be less than that of the official who is paid $5,000 or $10,000. In fact, those receiving $1,200 should be entirely exempt from contributing to the treasury. As to judges, it would only be fair, during this depression that they do their bit in helping the state, they should not be exempt. The same may be said as regards gold lace officers who travel around the country and who perhaps have not even won their spurs on the battlefield. And these millionaires who sit facing us and have never known the sweat of labour, should also contribute on a larger scale than the wage-earners in order to relieve the present economic depression. It does not behoove the latter to open their purse, but those who have large fortunes and surpluses they cannot spend should contribute largely.

For these reasons, sir, I am opposed to this resolution, and not because I am called upon to contribute $400, as my share—I can well afford making this sacrifice—however, I strongly protest against this resolution which forces the small wage earner to contribute in the same ratio as those who can better afford it.

Yesterday, I heard the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) state: "Those who should be taxed for the administration of the country are those who have inherited millions through estates." I shall add that is also those who during the war—and they are friends of the present government—built up fortunes by selling horses, bacon, drugs and scrap iron, and, to-day, travel over the country displaying the millions they accumulated at the expense of the poor soldier who on the battlefield shed his blood to uphold freedom. Let the millionaires who accumulated their wealth during the war open widely their purse, and let us not allow the government to put through a resolution which asks the small wage earners, the lower grade civil servants to contribute equally with those who are in receipt of $10,000 or over $15,000 per year. In this contribution, one must not forget those who, last year, voted themselves $2,000 in prevision of this ten per cent cut which they are called upon to contribute in order to help the country out of the hole where this government has placed it, an administration directly opposed to the true interests of the Canadian people.

This is why, sir, I am strongly opposed to this resolution. If the situation is so bad that civil servants' salaries must be reduced, let it be at least in proportion to their earnings. I trust that these few remarks will be received in the best of spirit by the government and they will realize that if they wish to truly serve the people, and have at heart to do justice to all, they will, when the bill comes before the house, have it drawn up in such a way as to deal fairly with the small wage earners and that the latter will only be called upon to contribute in proportion to their earnings. In closing my remarks I would ask the government to exempt not only those who earn $1,200 but to also include those earning $1,500 and even $1,800. Should they grant my request I shall support the resolution. Otherwise, should they persist in being unfair to the small wage earners, I shall oppose it, and publicly I shall say: Stop! Do not ask from the humble and small wage earner the same contribution as you ask from those who are high up, rich and millionaires. The former are entitled to be fairly treated and as legislators we should see that they are.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word in endorsation of what has been said by a good many of those who have already spoken. I believe that I, together with every other hon. member of this house, should express my candid and non-partisan convictions in regard to this matter. I do not propose to refer to the remarks of those hon. gentlemen who have already spoken in this debate. I do not know that there are very many civil servants in my constituency, and I have no thought of making any political capital out of the action of the government or the criticism of the opposition.

This is a very important matter, Mr. Speaker, touching the lives of many thousands of Canadians, and I believe that inasmuch as the government is the executive council of this house, it should endeavour to lend an ear, as it were, to the sentiments expressed with regard to this matter, and should shape its actions accordingly. I believe, as a matter of fact, that the country generally views this measure with favour; I think every right thinking Canadian feels that something of this nature should be done at this time and I am sure, sir, that the hundreds of thousands of people who have lost not a portion but all of their salaries because of this depression, and the hundreds of thousands of farmers who have nothing left now but a little hope and a lot of courage, together with the many thousands who would be starving to-day if it were not for the intervention of various governing bodies, all feel that some action of this kind should be taken at this time.

However, Mr. Speaker, I do not think they look to the men who at present are barely getting enough to live on to fill in the breach and come to their relief. Just how a man can live on less than $100 a month, keep a roof over his head and look after his family is something I cannot understand. I certainly do not think men who are paid on this basis should be asked to contribute anything but I do feel, sir, that there are a great many others, not only in the civil service but in all walks of life, who should come to the assistance of those who are suffering because of the depression at this time.

So far as civil servants are concerned I must say that I agree with a great many others who have already spoken, and I believe there is no sane reason why men receiving salaries of $8,000, $10,000, $15,000 and perhaps more should be exempted from this reduction. I think they should not only pay a percentage; I believe their percentage should be greater than that of the people receiving smaller salaries. I think the reduction should be on a graded scale, so that those who have smaller salaries will give less than those who are better off. I understand that in England about one-third of the total national income is absorbed by the government by way of taxes. This bears very heavily on those better off, the wealthy, the old nobility and the aristocracy. So much has this been the case that many old estates have had to be dismembered and disposed of. Our aristocracy and nobility, if we have any in this country, are not as old as those of England, but I do not see why they should not make a fairly large contribution at a time like this.

I would not for a moment make any suggestion as to what the scale should be, but I do believe that men receiving less than $1,200 per year should be exempted. Perhaps those receiving from $1,200 to $1,800 could contribute in a small way, and after that the percentage could gradually increase. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe a measure of this kind would meet with the endorsation of the entire Canadian people.

The house went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the categories of employees to whom the ten per cent reduction does not apply?

Mr. RHODES: The Governor General of Canada, the lieutenant-governors of the several provinces, the members of the judiciary, the members of the military, naval and air forces, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will it apply to employees who are working by the hour?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are certain classes of employees whose wages have just been reduced. I have in my hand a list which was issued on March 1, giving the new rates of pay for men working on the Lachine canal maintenance. These rates will be effective from February 16 of this year. For instance, a blacksmith first class was paid 82 cents per hour and will now be paid 65 cents; second class is reduced from 69 cents to 55 cents; helper first class from 62 cents to 50 cents; helper second class from 55 cents to 45 cents; assistant carpenter foreman from 82 cents to 70 cents; carpenter foreman from 89 to 75 cents; carpenter first class from 75 cents to 65 cents; carpenter second class from 62 cents to 55 cents; carpenter helper from 55 cents to 45 cents. There are many other classes. For example, there is labourer foreman who has been reduced from 75 cents to 60 cents; labourer from 48 to 40 cents; machinists foreman from 96 cents to 75 cents. And so on. They are all reduced. Now it would be most unfair, after having already reduced these men by a good deal more than ten per cent of what they were earning, to take off a further ten per cent from the rates which will now prevail as from the 16th of February.

Mr. RHODES: When the bill is introduced I think my hon. friend will find that apparent inequalities such as he refers to will be taken care of. It is not the intention that there should be a double reduction in salaries or wages.

Mr. MANION: In reply to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) may I point out that these reductions of which he speaks are reductions which have been made throughout Canada not only on the Lachine canal but on canals in every other part of the country, under the prevailing rates of pay. In other words, there were a number of these men who were out of alignment with the prevailing rates of pay in the sections of country affected; they were not in line with the prevailing rates as paid by contractors, private corporations and so forth. Prior to this discussion of a ten per cent reduction this whole matter had been taken up with the Department of Labour and the prevailing rates of pay had been decided upon in different parts of Canada. And so far as these revised rates are concerned, the men in the different sections of the country were notified that they would be put into force as the prevailing rates acceptable throughout the country. So that this is not a cut in wages but a realignment.

Mr. VENIOT: What is it then?

Mr. MANION: It is not a reduction below the prevailing rates; it is simply a readjustment of wages. Laying aside the ten per cent, these men are getting now what they should have been getting previously. Let me give the information that was submitted to me by my officers. This was done on recommendation of the officers, and I am not blaming them; I am assuming responsibility. After I had gone into the matter I agreed with them. Some time before the last election these men had their time cut down to 44 hours per week and they retained their pay at the old rate per week, so that a number of them were out of alignment with the prevailing rates in the sections concerned, and this was merely to put them on the same rate of pay as was given in the different sections of the country by private corporations or contractors or any concern hiring the same class of labour.

Mr. MARCIL: I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question. My chief reason for voting against this resolution is that certain classes are exempt under the proposed bill. Will the minister tell us why the judiciary and military and naval officers as well as the others are exempt?

Mr. RHODES: Because in all these instances the relationship is one of contract.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask whether the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) still holds good after the remarks of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion)? The Minister of Finance intimated that when the bill is introduced these men will be taken care of so that they will not be subject to a double reduction, because according to the rates which I have read they have been already reduced by a good deal more than ten per cent. It amounts to twenty-five or thirty per cent, and I do not think it is fair to these men to add to that another ten per cent.

Mr. MARCIL: Following up that question—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I want an answer first.

Mr. RHODES: I have nothing to add to nor to subtract from the statement I made a moment ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend puts me in the dark.

Mr. DUFF: If I understood the Minister of Railways correctly, he said that these reductions of which the hon. member for Quebec East spoke were made in order that the people affected thereby should be in line with the same class of employees on canals in other parts of the country.

Mr. MANION: Not on canals particularly.

Mr. DUFF: Or any other work in his department. Prior to that the Minister of Finance said that when the bill came down these men would be looked after and not affected because they had already taken the reduction. May I ask either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Railways what will happen if the statement made by the former is correct? What is going to happen to the men outside those whom the hon. member for Quebec East spoke about, men in other parts of the country who are working in the Marine department, in the minister's own department, and so on; will they receive now the amount of pay which, as the Minister of Railways has said, is intended to bring the men referred to by the hon. member for Quebec East into alignment with other classes in the country?

Mr. MANION: I should say that the matter is a detail which will have to be considered by the government in applying the cut. That is the answer.

Mr. DUFF: That is not a satisfactory answer to me. The Minister of Finance, in reply to the hon. member for Quebec East, said that because the men spoken of by the hon. member for Quebec East were mentioned in the reduction, they would be provided for in the bill. If no further reduction is made in the wages of the men referred to by the hon. member for Quebec East, is there going to be a reduction in the wages of the other employees all over the country, in whom the Minister of Railways is interested?

Mr. RHODES: My statement made a moment ago will appear in Hansard and I adhere to it. May I submit, with all deference and without the slightest desire to curtail discussion upon the resolution itself, that we could to far better advantage discuss questions of this kind when the bill itself, with its provisions, and the machinery which it intends to apply, is before the house.

Mr. DUFF: Is the minister in that statement referring to the Minister of Railways?

Mr. RHODES: I am referring to the whole house.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It will be altogether too late then. Now is the time to discuss this or not to discuss it at all. It may be as the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance have said with respect to the prevailing rates of those who have already received a cut, that those rates may be adjusted; but what will happen to those who are to-day working under prevailing rates and whose prevailing rates will be decreased on the first of April, after this legislation has gone into effect? If this goes through, and if there are certain regulations to be made, the ten per cent cut will, I understand, affect all those who are on prevailing rates, whether or not they have already been reduced to the existing standard of prevailing rates. If after this goes into effect, their wages will also be cut, then they will have to suffer a second cut when the prevailing rates in this district are readjusted on the first of April. They will thus have to suffer two cuts and it will be too late to talk about the matter then; the legislation will be already in operation, and therefore the situation must be cleared up now. The answer of the Minister of Railways is no answer, much less the intended answer given by the Minister of Finance.

[Mr Duff.]

Then there is this other aspect of the question: clearly all these people receiving under $1,200 will be affected. The answer is that all those who contribute to the superannuation fund will have to pay only five per cent. How many of those receiving less than $1,200 contribute to the superannuation fund? When the minister has answered that, so that nobody may intervene, I shall ask him this: Do these dispositions apply to those who pay into the retirement fund? They do not apply to them at all. Those are the questions to which we must have answers before we allow the resolution to pass. The question is: How will the minister adjust the prevailing rates of those men who will suffer another cut on the first of May?

Mr. RHODES: In view of the remarks of the senior member for Ottawa I would hesitate to answer the question, because I submit that to the best of my ability a moment ago I gave a correct reply, which my hon. friend says is not a correct answer at all. Therefore I do not know why he addresses a question to me.

Mr. CHEVRIER: To whom then can I address it? Will someone else answer it on behalf of the government?

Mr. RHODES: What particular question is it that my hon. friend has in mind at the moment?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I ask the minister or anybody else on that side who can understand it and who has the ability to answer it: What will happen to the men now working under prevailing rates who will suffer this ten per cent cut and who will suffer an additional cut when the present prevailing rates are readjusted downwards on the first of April?

Mr. RHODES: I have nothing to add to or to subtract from the statement I made.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I trust the hon. minister will have something to subtract from the cut.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let the minister answer. I am prepared to stay here until I get an answer.

Mr. HEENAN: While the minister is figuring out what answer he will give to the senior member for Ottawa, let me offer him my sympathy because at the present time he is in charge of a resolution the meaning of which his own colleagues of the cabinet do not understand. If there was no other justification for the opposition to this horizontal cut, it is now quite manifest that the members of the cabinet themselves do not know what it means. The Minister of Finance, I think, took the right and fair position in the matter when he answered the ex-Minister of Justice that any irregularities—

Mr. RHODES: Inequalities.

Mr. HEENAN: —and inequalities—it is all irregular anyhow—would be taken care of when the bill came down. The Minister of Railways, however, disagrees on that point—

Mr. MANION: I did not disagree at all.

Mr. HEENAN: —because of the fact that he has in his own department allowed or acquiesced in a reduction already even before the introduction of the bill. Is that not a justification for those on this side voting a few minutes ago against a horizontal cut? For the information of the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Labour in particular, if they do not have it, I might give it to them now. When they reduced the wages of those men whom the ex-Minister of Justice mentioned a few minutes ago, they did an injustice to them.

Mr. MANION: I deny that.

Mr. HEENAN: In doing so they violated the law of this country. When the fair wage and eight-hour day bill went through, it provided, if I remember rightly, not only that the prevailing rate of wages should obtain but that the prevailing rate of wages should obtain only if it was a decent or reasonable rate of wages. Therefore it is not necessary that the prevailing rate of wages should obtain if the Minister of Labour deems it not fair or reasonable. Consequently, when we put the eight-hour day into effect, in some instances we increased the wages of the lower paid men so that they would receive as much for an eight-hour day as they did for a ten-hour day. In other words, the then Liberal government—and I have never before been so proud of belonging to a Liberal government as I am at the moment—

Mr. ERNST: But the hon. member does not.

Mr. HEENAN: I mean that literally. When we put the eight-hour day into effect we adopted the principle that the wages that the men were then receiving for ten hours should prevail. There was no man in the civil service whose hours were reduced from ten or nine to eight hours a day, who lost a proportionate amount in his wages or salary. That was why the Department of Labour in some instances increased the wages in particular of the lower paid men. Now the present government—and it seems to me the Minister of Railways quite approves what he did in the matter—actually stole, according to the laws of this country, so many cents an hour from these men. The Minister of Labour sits smiling behind the Minister of Railways and yet the other day he stood up on the floor of the house and said that he represented the great body of labour men in this country. When at the next election he returns to his constituency and travels throughout the length and breadth of the country, he will not be regarded as a gladiator on behalf of the labour forces of Canada, especially after the present exhibition of the Minister of Railways in glorifying the fact that he reduced the wages of these men and that now apparently, according to his own words, he is satisfied that they should take a further cut. I do not know how to discuss this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: I admit it. There are many gentlemen on the other side who are giving that egotistical "ha ha" who simply do not know what they voted for recently. Even the members of the cabinet who are bringing in this legislation do not understand it.

Mr. SHORT: We voted to cut $400 off our salaries, and you did not.

Mr. HEENAN: There may be some excuse for us. The members on this side may need that $400 while the members on the other side may not. Mr. Chairman and Mr. Finance Minister I approve of the decision you have taken in the matter. I will vote for the resolution and take off my hat to the minister if he is able to maintain the position that he has taken at the present time with respect to any who have had cuts, that if inequalities show up the bill will cover such cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Finance minister replying to the hon. member for Bonaventure said that exemptions were made in the case of the judges, the army and navy, and lieutenant-governors because in their case it was a question of contract. Does the minister seriously suggest to this committee that parliament cannot break any contract? The government themselves with regard to the members of the House of Commons and the Senate are breaking a contract by this legislation.

Mr. RHODES: Parliament is, of course, all-powerful and can break any contract if it wills to do so, but it does not follow that if parliament does an unethical thing it is right. So far as those who are asked to make a contribution in virtue of this bill are concerned, there are no contractual rights.

Mr. POWER: Does the minister think that there are no contractual rights in the case of a civil servant when it is specified in the government's advertisement for the position that there shall be an annual increase of $120? Is not that a contractual obligation just as much as any contract with the man who enters the army and does not really know what he is going to be paid?

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I say one word? I do not want to enter into this discussion because I do not think it should be permitted at this stage, but in the case of the police, and the army and navy, these men are recruited. They cannot leave. They are there for three years, and if they leave before that time they are arrested as deserters. The civil servants are not in the same position. They can leave to-morrow if they so desire, if they can better their condition or they do not wish to carry on; but not so with the other class.

The point I was going to state, Mr. Chairman, was this: This is a general resolution. There are no exceptions mentioned in it. The bill is not before the committee, and the discussion must be general and in the terms of the resolution. When the bill is brought down, if there are exceptions, and I assume that there will be, there will be full opportunity in committee or on the first and second reading of the bill, to discuss them. The practice is pretty clearly laid down, and the extract I give is from May, thirteenth edition:

> Debate on money resolutions is confined to the terms of the resolution and must not be extended to the bill.

We have a right to discuss the general terms of this resolution. We have already discussed them; we did so when the resolution was moved. The resolution is that there shall be a ten per cent reduction in the salaries of the service. There are no exemptions mentioned here, and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the discussion must be on the resolution as presented. If the bill contains other material, it will then be open to hon. gentlemen to discuss it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am quite prepared to discuss these matters as they arise.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am only quoting the rule of procedure in this house, and I am going to ask the chairman to rule on it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am going to discuss the terms of the resolution just as it is.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): I rule that the hon. member must confine himself to the terms of the resolution.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am going to read a portion of the resolution. I am trying to help the Minister of Finance out of his difficulty. Now that the minister is in the hole, see if he can get out of it. I knew exactly where he was heading for. The resolution reads, in part:

> And to provide for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of all current contributions payable under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act in respect of the salaries payable during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933, of all employees who receive not more than one thousand two hundred dollars per annum.

I asked the Minister of Finance if this applied to prevailing rates men, and I was told, yes, it did. Now if it does apply to the prevailing rates men, how will it affect them? I certainly have the right to ask that question. I have pointed out to the minister the difficulty. There are some who have already been reduced in salary, but there are others who will not be reduced until after this measure goes into effect on April 1 or thereafter. I have asked the minister in plain English, how is he going to take care of those cases? Has he thought of them? That is my question, and if he cannot answer it I am sorry, but I want to get an answer from someone who can answer it.

Mr. RHODES: I am not going to take exception to the lecture from my hon. friend from Ottawa, but I submit in all deference, and I suggested it a short time ago, that he can discuss the details to much better advantage when the bill itself is under discussion. However, my answer to the inquiry which my hon. friend has just put to me is precisely the same as my answer to the question put to me by the hon. member for Quebec East. I have precisely the same answer to give to him.

Mr. CHEVRIER: All right, but that is no answer at all. If the Finance minister cannot give me an answer, then probably somebody else on the treasury benches can. I am going to put this question to the Minister of Justice who is now leading the house, and I would ask him to answer it or let anyone on the other side who can answer it do so.

Mr. MANION: I do not think I can let the remarks of my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) go by without some correction. The hon. gentleman has a habit of rising in this house and making speeches and not only in this house but outside, which contain more irresponsible statements than those of all the rest of his party put together. He has been frequently corrected during the last few years since he came into this house, and shown on innumerable occasions to have made statements which were not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: He has been disowned by the people of his own riding. Within the last week in this house statements which he had made regarding unemployment in his district were declared to be false by the town council of Kenora, his home town where they know him best, and as well by the Canadian Legion of the town of Kenora, which also knows him well, and by the board of trade of Kenora. If he were at all sensitive, if he were not so thick-skinned, after the showing up which he got here from the Minister of Labour the other evening he would have been ashamed to open his mouth in this house for weeks to come. The hon. gentleman is a great boaster of what he does for labour. He is always standing up as a great champion of the labour people of this country, and yet for years he was in this house as Minister of Labour and he talked all over this country of old age pensions and while he was talking of them in London, his leader the then Prime Minister was saying in the city of Ottawa that they would not have them. Despite all his talk of old age pensions in London and elsewhere throughout this country he never made any move to bring them into effect.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MANION: But it was associated—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, you ruled, and quite properly so, that we were to discuss the terms of this resolution, and I confined myself to the resolution. I have had no answer yet to the question I put to the minister, and I submit that the remarks of the Minister of Railways and Canals are far afield, that they have nothing at all to do with the resolution.

Mr. GOTT: In answer to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would ask an hon. gentleman who knows more about procedure—

Mr. GOTT: I know something about onions; I assure the hon. member of that.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CASGRAIN: Let the chairman decide the point of order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I submit, sir, that on the point of order you should rule that we confine ourselves to the terms of this resolution, and not refer to what happened in Kenora.

Mr. MANION: I shall now direct my remarks to the resolution—now that I have said what I had to say in reply to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. That hon. member made the statement that I gloried in cutting the—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: I am dealing with a clause of this measure.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must speak to the resolution.

Mr. DUFF: I should like the chairman to decide on the point of order which has been raised.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MANION: I accept the ruling of the chair. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, dealing with the so-called cut in wages on the canals—because that is what promoted the discussion—said that I gloried in what he called a cut in wages. I did nothing of the sort. I justified what he called a cut in wages. I can think of no reason in the world why the employees of a government should be paid a greater hourly rate than the employees of private corporations. On that ground I stand, and it was on that ground that the officers of the department drew to my attention the fact that these men, under the prevailing rates of wages, were receiving more than men working for private corporations doing the same class of work. After consultation with the Department of Labour the recommendation was made to me that those men should be put on the prevailing rates of wages for the districts concerned. I agreed with their recommendation, and the change was made. I did not glorify it. I have no desire to cut anybody's wages, but on the other hand I can think of no reason why employees of a government, whether they be carpenters or any other type of employee, should receive more than men doing similar work for private corporations. That attitude I took, and I do not withdraw any word or part of it.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, it is quite evident that the Minister of Railways and Canals is glorying in the position he has taken regarding the cut in wages of the men on the canal because he has no apology to make. He has the kindliest words for the employees whose wages he cut—but who could expect anything else from a gentleman who says he can see no reason why government employees should not receive any more than those employed by private concerns. Even if the private concerns ground their labourers down into the mud the government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: —is prepared to follow in the same footsteps—

An hon. MEMBER: Cheap.

Mr. HEENAN: —and the Minister of Railways and Canals sees no reason why such action should not be taken. The minister stands in this house and tells hon. members that the representative from Kenora-Rainy River goes around the country making statement that are not true.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: At the same time he was talking about something about which he knew nothing. He took as an example an occasion when the former Minister of Labour spoke in the city of London concerning old age pensions—

Mr. MANION: I was ruled out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Please keep to the matter under consideration.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You had your innings.

Mr. MANION: But he had his first; however, I shall have another.

The CHAIRMAN: Confine your remarks to the resolution.

Mr. ST-PERE: Take your medicine.

Mr. HEENAN: The former Minister of Labour was talking in London about the old age pensions when the then Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, was discussing something to the contrary. I want to tell the minister that I was not talking about old age pensions at all. I was referring to unemployment insurance—but I do not think you ever read that word in your life.

Mr. STEVENS: Order; address the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must confine his remarks to the subject matter.

Mr. MANION: May I say that I meant unemployment insurance, instead of old age pensions. The use of the term "old age pensions" was a slip of the tongue, because I meant unemployment insurance.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HEENAN: I quite understand that the Minister of Railways did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. MANION: Well, I am glad my hon. friend understands something.

Mr. HEENAN: The Minister of Railways, together with some of the gentlemen who sent the telegrams a few days ago to say that I was not telling the truth, came over into my riding during the last election campaign and told my constituents what an untruthful man I was.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: Notwithstanding that, I was elected.

Mr. MANION: Not by very much.

Mr. HEENAN: At that time the present Minister of Railways and Canals said I was a member of a cabinet—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: —that was talking all over the country about old age pensions—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: —and yet did nothing about those pensions. Does the Minister of Railways and Canals not know that the Liberal party brought in—

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that under this resolution he must not discuss old age pensions.

Mr. HEENAN: I am replying to the Minister of Railways.

The CHAIRMAN: Your remarks are out of order.

Mr. HEENAN: Why did you not rule the Minister of Railways out of order?

The CHAIRMAN: He went too far, too; but he was ruled out of order.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, will you please tell me why our Minister of Railways and Canals does not know that there is an old age pension system in Canada at the present time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not a point of order.

Mr. HEENAN: Will you permit the minister to tell me that?

The CHAIRMAN: Please stay within the resolution; the hon. member surely must know he is not conforming to the rule.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps I may be permitted to answer the hon. member. I confess I used the words "old age pensions" instead of the words "unemployment insurance," but the mistake was made merely by a slip of the tongue. As the hon. member must admit, while in London he referred to unemployment insurance. By a slip of the tongue however I used the words "old age pensions."

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, are you going to permit the Minister of Railways to discuss unemployment insurance and old age pensions, but forbid me to do so?

The CHAIRMAN: I shall not allow anybody.

Mr. HEENAN: I quite accept the minister's statement; I knew he was making a mistake, because he makes them all the time. I wish to point out however that the Minister of Railways is taking a position different from that of the Minister of Finance, so far as this resolution is concerned. The prevailing rate of wages in Canada to-day is protected by law. The eight-hour day and fair-wages on government contracts and government works must be accepted; it is the law of Canada, and is not a regulation of the Department of Railways and Canals. The law provides that if the prevailing rate of wages is fair and reasonable, such rate will obtain. However the Minister of Railways and Canals, in fact the whole government, evidently has decided that it makes no difference whether or not wages be fair or reasonable, those wages must be the prevailing wages paid by private contractors. I am in all kindness trying to prevent the Minister of Railways and Canals from—

Mr. MANION: I do not want kindness from you.

Mr. HEENAN: I am elected to try to keep my hon. friend straight, and if I cannot do it—

Mr. MANION: You are too busy trying to be crooked yourself, to keep anybody else straight.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. VENIOT: Withdraw.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has pointed out that he is trying to keep me straight. I think he was getting pretty close to the line, and probably his remark was as objectionable as my statement that he was busy trying to be crooked. However, I bow to your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members will please keep within the resolution.

Mr. HEENAN: I understand the minister has withdrawn his statement; it does not matter to me whether he did or not, because any time—

The CHAIRMAN: That has nothing to do with the subject before us.

Mr. HEENAN: Any time anybody on the other side of the house talks about being crooked—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: Do you think I am going to stand and allow that statement to go on Hansard without telling you this, Mr. Chairman?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: Any time any man sitting on the other side of the house says that someone is crooked, I want to reply to it.

Mr. STEVENS: It was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, the statement was withdrawn.

Mr. HEENAN: I am elected to this house to try to keep the Minister of Railways and Canals, and the remainder of the government, straight on these matters, so far as the interests of the working men in Canada are concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: When they reduced the prevailing rates of wages in order to bring them down to a level with those that were paid by private interests, they were robbing the workmen of whatever reduction took place.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: They were robbing them because the laws of the country provide that the workmen shall get fair and reasonable rates of wages—not the prevailing rates altogether. I want to say to the Minister of Finance that if the bill is to contain a provision that those who already have received a reduction in wages shall not be affected, I will support the bill—I take that back.

An hon. MEMBER: You do not know what you have said.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not know whether to support it until I have seen the other provisions of the bill; but I will support that particular feature. I am sorry that some of the minister's colleagues, not knowing what they are talking about, have introduced the subject of some petty patronage in Kenora by some defeated candidate and his henchmen, for by so doing they have thrown a monkey wrench into the machinery and made his position far worse than it was.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Can the minister say how many of these people who earn less than $1,200 will be affected by the resolution?

Mr. RHODES: I am not sure that I have the exact figures before me.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I understand the minister's difficulty.

Mr. RHODES: I shall be able, I hope, to get accurate figures before the bill is disposed of in committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the minister implement that information to this extent? Some months ago a certain number of civil servants earning less than $1,200 were retired or released. Have there been any further dismissals or retirements of this class who will be affected by the disposition of the five per cent?

Mr. RHODES: I submit that this has no bearing whatever on the resolution, but I shall be glad to get the information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister admitted that there would be inequalities when he stated they would be dealt with by a provision in the bill. As I recollect, the Prime Minister when introducing the resolution intimated that the bill would leave the adjustment of inequalities in the hands of the governor in council. Might I ask my hon. friend if that is a correct impression, or can he tell us what will be the provision in that regard?

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend will see at once the difficulty of attempting to discuss the bill while we are discussing the resolution. Under the circumstances I can best answer him by saying there will be a provision in the bill whereby the treasury board can make rulings with respect to inequalities which might arise in the administration of the act. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. That is practically what I thought the Prime Minister meant. I may say quite frankly that this is one of the reasons why I am inclined to take exception to the measure. After all, it seems to me that a body such as the Civil Service Commission would be much better qualified to deal with irregularities and inequalities than would the treasury board, which is a committee of the cabinet. This gets back again to placing everything in the hands of the government by order in council, even to the adjustment of admitted inequalities. I confess I have not quite the confidence in the administration that I should like to have, and that has a bearing on the point of view as presented here.

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend's remarks bear out the suggestion which I made some time ago as to the hopelessness of our attempting to discuss a bill which is not before us. Admitting that what my hon. friend has just stated is a fair subject of discussion, perhaps some other machinery might be set up for the purpose of ironing out inequalities which might arise in application of the act, but we can only discuss that feature when the bill itself is before committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared not to press this aspect of the matter further at present. I wanted, however, to clear up the one point as to whether the inequalities were to be dealt with by the ministry or by such a body as the Civil Service Commission, which has been constituted by parliament to deal with all civil service matters. May I ask my hon. friend a question, too, in regard to the exempted classes. As I understood, he gave as a reason why certain classes of public servants were not included in the proposed ten per cent reduction that their position was one of contract. Later on he or one of his colleagues mentioned that members of the civil service were free to leave the service whenever they desired to do so. Is not that equally true of our judges, who come within the exempted classes? Is there any contract which obliges a judge to remain on the bench if he desires to withdraw?

Mr. RHODES: I do not think the cases are comparable at all. If my right hon. friend will refer to his colleague on his left (Mr. Lapointe), who for some time occupied the distinguished office of Minister of Justice, he will find that a judge is not free to retire from the bench at will, not by any means.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He may resign.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He may resign at any time.

Mr. RHODES: And his resignation may or may not be accepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to know any cases where resignations have not been accepted. Are not the indemnities of members of parliament fixed by statute, and to that extent are they not in the same position as the salaries of civil servants?

Mr. RHODES: I would say that it is quite competent for us to deal with our own indemnities. I would put them in a class entirely apart from the salaries of civil servants. But I would think that every member of the house without question would wish to make a contribution to the treasury under the conditions that exist at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to concede that at a time like this members of parliament as such will wish to set an example that will be appreciated by the country at large. But the point I want to bring out is this: My hon. friend says they do that of their own volition because they are here assembled. This proposed bill does not assume they are doing it of their own volition; it assumes that parliament is going to do the will of the ministry.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. Have the civil servants been given any opportunity to act in a similar manner? Before this resolution was placed on the order paper was any approach made on the part of the government to any organization of the civil service to consider the question of voluntarily making a percentage deduction from their salaries in order to meet the present situation? In other words, in the matter of a voluntary deduction why should not the public service of Canada be put in precisely the same position as members of parliament at this time? Has any attempt been made to allow the service itself to express what it will do voluntarily?

Mr. RHODES: With respect to the last question submitted by my right hon. friend, of course there was discussion with any number of civil servants. My right hon. friend will realize that while there is a civil service federation, a highly reputable and very representative body, it by no means represents the whole body of the civil service of Canada. We heard, as a government, a deputation from the civil service federation, as well as any others who cared to make representations to us, so I think it is a fair statement, without the government being called upon to consult every individual civil servant in Canada, to say that there was a reasonable and fair canvass made of the situation prior to this resolution being brought in.

Now I must take exception, quite deferentially, to my right hon. friend calling in question the procedure of the government in bringing down a bill of this character and assuming that parliament must pass it. My right hon. friend knows full well that it is the responsibility of the ministry of the day to initiate legislation touching financial matters, and we followed the procedure which my right hon. friend has followed and which of necessity all governments must follow. The answer to the objection he raised will be found in the circumstances as to whether or not parliament in its wisdom sees fit to pass legislation which has been initiated by the government. If it does so then his question will be answered, and in that case I can see no force in the suggestion he makes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that in speaking of the civil service being given an opportunity voluntarily to make a contribution to meet the emergent situation, similar to the way in which members of parliament are doing at the moment, I had in mind what I observed during last year and this year, that members of the public service had made a very considerable voluntary contribution to unemployment relief. I understand that a collection was taken up in the different departments and that members of the service contributed very generously towards unemployment relief. In doing so I think the public service showed that if given the same opportunity it was just as ready to make its contribution to meet an emergent situation as are members of parliament.

In that same connection I should like to ask another question. Did the ministry, before it brought in this measure, confer with the Civil Service Commission as to whether or not, in their opinion, a horizontal cut would be a wise way of bringing about this deduction, or whether in the interests of the public service of Canada it would be better to have a graded deduction?

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend has referred to the civil servants having made contributions towards the unemployment relief fund. They did so, and they are to be commended for their action in that respect. I have always found that civil servants, wherever they may be, are splendid citizens, and as citizens and not as civil servants they made a contribution to that philanthropic object, together with other citizens. But my right hon. friend must bear in mind that the contribution was made from the salary which they had received in full. If this bill passes, the contribution for which we are asking will be made out of the amount of the salary which they will receive for the next year, and therefore it has no bearing upon the suggestion he has just made with respect to their already having made a contribution, unless he takes the ground that having made a contribution this year they are to be absolved for all time from making any further contribution.

Then with respect to the other question, so far as I am aware the Civil Service Commission was not consulted as to whether it would be wiser to make a straight reduction of ten per cent or whether it would be better to have that reduction graduated. The commission may have been consulted, but so far as I am aware it was not. However, my right hon. friend knows that whether the proposed method is the right one or the wrong one, after all it is a question of governmental policy, for which the government must assume the responsibility. It may be that my right hon. leader consulted the Civil Service Commission upon that point; I cannot say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I have said very frequently, if there is a wrong way of going about anything the Prime Minister is apt to take it in preference to the right way. I repeat that the Prime Minister's method is very arbitrary. It is not the method, before taking a particular step, of bringing into consultation and conference those who may be affected. What the Minister of Finance now says bears out the truth of that statement. Apparently the minister personally has not been consulted, nor does he know whether or not that step has been taken with the Civil Service Commission; I venture to say there is not a member of the cabinet at this moment who can say whether or not the Civil Service Commission was consulted. The steps that lead up to the formation of government policy is something with which every member of the cabinet ought to be familiar; what has been done ought to be a matter of common knowledge on the part of the ministry,—the ministry should have full knowledge,—before a step of this kind is taken which affects the entire public service of Canada. Every member of the government should know whether the body appointed by this parliament particularly for the purpose of having supervision over the public service in matters of salary deductions, salary increases and so on, had been consulted.

That is one of the very serious objections to the measure as framed, that apparently there has been no consultation with the service itself. The minister has just said that the government received a statement from the civil service federation. I think it was admitted, on a day when my hon. friend unfortunately was prevented from being in the house, that when the delegation came to present their views this resolution was already on the order paper, and the bill itself, I understand, drafted. I do not think they were given any real opportunity to present any views in a way which would permit of their careful consideration, and I do say that if that opportunity had been given I believe the ministry would not have brought in a horizontal cut. It is the horizontal cut to which we take exception. We do not take exception to the public service being asked to make a contribution at this time, but we are opposed to a horizontal, arbitrary cut of ten per cent instead of a graded deduction. That is the whole point of our opposition to this measure; the vote just taken was registered on that account, as I made very plain when I spoke at the outset.

I do think that if the ministry had approached this matter by conference, by conciliation and by negotiation, the main object namely, that of getting a very substantial contribution from the public service of Canada, might have been attained, but it would have been obtained with good will, and with an appreciation of the fact that all those contributing were joining in the performance of a patriotic act. The civil service of Canada is just as patriotic as any other body, as my hon. friend has just said, and civil servants are just as much entitled to an opportunity to disclose their patriotism to the country as is the Prime Minister. They were quite as much entitled to be given an opportunity voluntarily to show what they were willing to do as the Prime Minister was entitled to say what should be done, whether they wished it or did not wish it done. That is the point I desire to impress on my hon. friend.

Now I should like to ask another question. There has been a civil service council established by order in council. I do not know whether or not hon. gentlemen opposite have seen the order in council, or whether they are aware of it. I think I may take it for granted that this body was not called into conference either. If I am mistaken in that, perhaps my hon. friend will correct me. That body was formed for the very purpose of helping to meet situations of this kind. It was brought into being by the previous administration, as being in character similar to the joint councils which for some time past have been in existence in England, and which have had to do with these very questions that arise between a ministry and those who are members of the public service. I submit that this body should have been brought into conference with the government and given an opportunity to make representations. I believe that, if such a body had been consulted and the whole situation carefully placed before it, the ministry would have been able to come to parliament and advise us that the public service of Canada and the government had arrived at a graded basis of deduction from the salaries of civil servants, which the civil servants themselves were prepared voluntarily to make, and which the country would be pleased to know they were ready to make. But the government have not taken that course; they have assumed the arbitrary attitude of—"Take it or leave it; we are in authority; we are in power and we are going to cut your salaries no matter what you say about it. And we are going to cut them all alike regardless of how long you have been in the service, whether you are married, no matter what the extent of your family responsibilities, or whether or not you are contributing to certain funds, or what your other obligations are, or whether you have served your country overseas in the great war?" The arbitrary method is what I wish to stress, the way in which the government has gone about this business, however laudable the object may be. That is one point.

The second point is this. My hon. friend mentioned a list of those who are exempt, and at the head of the list he placed His Excellency the Governor General. As we all know, and as the country appreciates, His Excellency has himself voluntarily made a ten per cent contribution to the treasury at this time. Can my hon. friend tell us whether any of the lieutenant-governors or any of the judges of Canada have voluntarily made a contribution?

An hon. MEMBER: They would not do it anyway; they are Liberals.

Mr. RHODES: I must respectfully take exception to my right hon. friend's position. He assumes that the action with respect to this measure was the arbitrary and high-handed action of the Prime Minister. Now the proposals may be good or not; they may be sound or not; but I wish to assure my right hon. friend that they are the proposals of the ministry as a whole and we are all equally responsible. We must share equally in the responsibilty. My right hon. friend would have it appear—and perhaps from his point of view I cannot take exception to his having done so—that the action of the government is arbitrary and high-handed, a take it or leave it attitude. Well, I submit that such a view could be taken of every government proposal that is brought down following constitutional practice. As I have already said this afternoon, money bills must of necessity be initiated by the government and upon message; there is no other way whereby they can be initiated. Therefore the same argument would obtain with respect to every similar measure which has been introduced not only this session but in previous sessions, and that will be the case until some other method of procedure is devised which in the judgment of British parliaments is more satisfactory than the one that obtains at the moment. My right hon. friend has put a query to me as to whether others have followed the example of His Excellency the Governor General. So far as I am aware none have.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is just one further point I wish to refer to and that is the conception of contractual obligation which my hon. friend has put forward—that there are certain statutes governing the salaries of some officials in the public service, and that these statutes being in existence places those to whom they refer in a different position from the others. May I ask my hon. friend: Is it not true that every man or woman who enters the public service does so because of certain advantages which the service offers to them, of permanency, the possibility of promotion, statutory increases, retirement and the like, in consequence of which they are prepared to accept a much lower rate of remuneration than very many of them would receive if they were in the competitive world, and taking their part in the general business of the country? That being so, is there not an implied contract, if there is not also an actual contract, the terms of which as understood at the time of entering the service they have a right to expect will be carried out, and have they not also a right to expect that they will not be subjected to anything unforeseen without at least having some opportunity of making their own representations in advance?

Mr. RHODES: I do not take exception to what my right hon. friend has said with respect to civil servants, although he did not enumerate all the advantages. But I do take exception to this, and it is an attitude which hon. gentlemen opposite have almost invariably taken. They assume that by this measure we are introducing a salary reduction. Now, I submit that we have not interfered with the salaries of civil servants as such. We propose by this resolution the deduction of a stated sum which ought to be regarded as in the nature of either a contribution or a tax as the case might be, depending upon whether the method is agreeable to the civil servant or whether it is not. My right hon. friend has spoken of an implied contract with the civil servants. Admitting that this may be so with respect to the question of salary, surely he does not take the position that we should regard the civil service as a class sacrosanct and apart from the citizenship at large. If that were so my right hon. friend could not have been a party to the application of the income tax to the salaries of civil servants, because to the extent that the income tax is applied to the salary of a civil servant, to that extent does he make a contribution, and to that extent is his salary reduced.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That applies to all Canada.

Mr. RHODES: I am dealing with the point made by my right hon. friend that inasmuch as there is a contractual relationship between the state and the civil servant therefore the civil servant's salary should not be reduced. That is not a sound ground, because we do the same thing when we ask him to pay income tax to the federal treasury.

Mr. RALSTON: But you do that to everyone else.

Mr. RHODES: According to my right hon. friend, there is an implied contract that the salary shall remain as it was when the individual entered the service. I am not admitting that there is a contract; I am taking his argument that one is implied.

Mr. VENIOT: There is a contract.

Mr. RHODES: Let me come back to the argument I was making a moment ago. If my right hon. friend were to establish the proposition that by this act we were reducing the salaries of civil servants, there would be virtue in his argument. But what we are doing is this. We are asking that, while the country is in dire need—

Mr. CHEVRIER: You are not asking.

Mr. RHODES: —of a contribution from all its citizens, the civil service shall make a fair contribution for one year only. The bill will provide that it shall apply for one year only, and at the end of that year the salaries of civil servants will be precisely what they were but for the intervention of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must take exception to my hon. friend's contention that the government is not interfering with salaries. Civil servants in this city and elsewhere have obligations to meet—premiums coming due on insurance, rent to be paid and so forth; can they be excused from payment simply by saying to those who present them with the accounts that their salaries are not what they have always been? Will they not be obliged to say that their salaries are not what they were before and that they are, therefore, unable to pay? Once accounts have to be met we shall soon find out whether salaries have been interfered with by the government. How can the civil servant say his salary has not been interfered with, when it has been cut ten per cent for this year? It is only playing with words to say that salaries are not interfered with. It is a cut of ten per cent this year. If every citizen of Canada who has not already suffered a reduction in wages or salary or income were being asked to forego ten per cent of his income, then we would have a ten per cent cut which was general and which did not single out a particular class. But the way in which this measure is presented amounts to the conscription of ten per cent of the wages of the civil service throughout Canada, to the exclusion of the salaries of these belonging to other classes. If that be a just basis of procedure, I should like to hear the minister defend it, but it is the position.

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend has referred to the fact that in requiring the civil servants to make this contribution the contracts upon which they entered the service will be interfered with.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By the reduction in the amount.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. But I think the same argument applies to everyone in this country. I do not know anyone else who has not been subjected to a reduction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is in addition to that.

Mr. RHODES: Unless my hon. friend is prepared to take the position that civil servants are to be placed in a glorified class by themselves—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am taking the other position.

Mr. RHODES: If we admit, as I think it must be admitted, that the treasury requires a greater revenue, to the extent that the civil service fails to make this contribution, the other citizens of the country must have an additional burden of taxation imposed upon them. That is the argument. When my right hon. friend says: You are asking a contribution from the civil service and you are not asking it from the other citizens of the country, I say to him: The other citizens are sustaining a cut of ten per cent and perhaps a little more.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say this, that any application of an income tax will apply to the civil service in precisely the same manner as to any other class. I do not think my hon. friend intends to exempt the civil service from the income tax.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They will have to meet the same obligations in respect of taxation as anyone else. If the government would say: We shall have a one per cent levy on the salary of every citizen of Canada, they would not have to make a ten per cent levy on this particular branch of the public service. That is where the discrimination comes in. As I see it, it is a most unfair and unjust discrimination, and I think the minister, when he considers the great body of citizens at large, will see the matter in the same light. There is a discrimination between members of the civil service, who have limited salaries, and lieutenant-governors, judges, members of the army and the navy, the air force and the mounted police. How can my hon. friend defend a discrimination of that kind? He began by defending it upon statutory grounds. But that is not what he is arguing now. His last argument is that, if the civil servants do not pay this, all the other citizens will have to pay it. Why should the civil service have to make a contribution on behalf of the other citizens? It is singling out one particular class in the dominion and making it carry a burden which ought to be distributed generally over the citizens at large.

Mr. BROWN: I do not like to enter into the discussion of what seems to be a legal problem, but some hon. members have been considering the question of the judges. It has been indicated from the other side of the house that they are to be exempted on statutory grounds. The question of statutory grounds was raised on this side only because it was first raised on that side. Some of us who are not lawyers feel that if the argument in regard to statutory grounds holds good as to judges, it holds equally good as to civil servants.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think this makes very much difference, but in my first answer to an inquiry that was submitted as to why there was a distinction, I said it was because of contractual rights; I did not mention statute. I said it was a matter of contract.

Mr. VENIOT: I hold in my hand a copy of the Civil Service Act, from which I wish to correct a statement made by the Minister of Justice that judges could not resign, could not get out of the service at will.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I made no such statement.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, the hon. member did. He said that their resignation need not be accepted.

Mr. SPENCE: Then why did the hon. member not say that?

Mr. VENIOT: I was not given time to say it.

Mr. SPENCE: My hon. friend tells part of the truth all the time.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend thinks he is at present in the good roads convention. He has wheels in his head.

Mr. SPENCE: I have as many as the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. VENIOT: While the judges have the privilege of resigning, the civil service does not have it. No member of the civil service may resign except under regulations of the Civil Service Commission. That is statutory. Section 53 of the act reads:

> The commission shall by regulation prescribe what shall constitute a resignation of a position by an employee.

Therefore they are in a worse position than the judges. Let me point out further that section 13 of the Civil Service Act states, in part:

> But no appointment shall in any case be made at less than the minimum nor at more than the maximum rate prescribed for a class.

Is that not a statute and binding? Is that not a contract? Let me go further. Subsection 4 of section 11 states:

> No permanent employee who was appointed before the tenth day of November, 1919, shall have the salary of his position on that date reduced by reason of the classification of his position, and if any such employee is placed in any class where the maximum salary is smaller than the maximum salary of the subdivision or grade in which he was before classified he shall be entitled in the same manner and to the same extent as heretofore to increases until he has reached the maximum fixed for the subdivision or grade in which he was previously classified.

That is even more binding than any contract for the judges of the supreme court or the lieutenant-governors of the provinces. The statute distinctly states that there shall be a minimum and a maximum. That minimum and that maximum are rated when the employee is engaged; he is under contract; the government is under contract with him that he shall go from that minimum to the maximum as the regulations prescribe, and those regulations have the effect of a statute. Therefore, when our hon. friends opposite try to make a distinction as between judges and other branches of the civil service—because after all the judges are only a branch of the civil service, and so are the lieutenant-governors—they are merely drawing a red herring across the trail of the injustice they are doing to one class of the civil service of this country.

Mr. DUFF: There is one class of citizens in Canada who will be affected by this legislation and for whom nobody has so far said a good word. The Minister of Finance has told us that the judges and some others have contractual rights so far as this legislation is concerned, and unless the statute is amended the cut cannot apply to them. He referred particularly to the judges. There are several other classes of people who have contractual rights, but I am going to refer to only one. Under the statutes of Canada the members of this house have contractual rights with the Canadian people. I was elected in my constituency in 1930, and I accepted the nomination thinking I was to receive $4,000 a year for the term of this parliament.

Mr. GOBEIL: The hon. member voted against the resolution.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, my hon. friend did not have spunk enough to vote against it. I voted against the resolution for several reasons. One is that I consider that as a member of parliament I shall, before the end of the session, have earned the $4,000 which I am supposed to get from the people of this country. If we had the proper spirit in this parliament we would get up and say that we are entitled to the $4,000, and that we should not have had this cut made without the government at least consulting the members of parliament as to whether they wanted the cut made or not.

Mr. SHORT: We consulted them this afternoon when the vote was taken.

Mr. DUFF: You consulted them? Not you. The member for Digby-Annapolis is opposed to this cut, I know.

Mr. SHORT: I take it willingly, and I want to say to my hon. friend that it is the second cut of ten per cent that I have taken since the first of January.

Mr. DUFF: You deserved them both. I have taken seven since the first of January.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. SHORT: I am employed by only one other concern.

Mr. DUFF: I say, Mr. Chairman, that we were not consulted about this. I say that this parliament was assembled and that the government had no right even to bring in this legislation without consulting parliament. But what they did was to bring down the estimates, and in those estimates, with regard to both members of parliament and to the civil service, they deliberately, without consulting parliament at all, made a reduction of ten per cent. The reason they did that was to endeavour to show the people of this country that they were making a reduction in their expenditure this year of $23,000,000. What they should have done, I contend, was not only to consult the members of parliament with regard to the reduction in indemnity, but to introduce a resolution before they brought down the estimates or made the cut which the estimates show. There is no question that that was the proper thing to do. I agree with those who say that the action of the government in putting this ten per cent cut in the estimates was an arbitrary action; and every member of parliament would agree with me if he spoke his mind.

Mr. SHORT: No. We wanted to make a contribution to the country. We did it willingly, every member of us.

Mr. DUFF: I say to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis that he was not consulted about it at all. Will he tell me that he was not consulted about that other reduction which he spoke of as having received since the first of January?

Mr. SHORT: No.

Mr. DUFF: I say, Mr. Chairman, that if this reduction is to be made, if the members of parliament are to lose $400 from their indemnity, the judges of this country have a right to be cut ten per cent as well as anybody else.

Mr. SHORT: I agree with you there, my friend.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend and I usually agree. Let us see what are the conditions affecting the judges and those associated with the judges. I have no particular reason to discuss the judges' salaries. In fact, to be quite candid, and I want to say this before I go on; that as far as I am concerned I believe this whole thing is a mistake and that the government by reducing any salaries is creating a feeling of unrest all over the country.

Mr. SHORT: No. It is the most popular thing that ever happened.

Mr. DUFF: Very good; we will see in the next election. Why should the judges in the supreme court here in Ottawa, for instance, be allowed to retain their full salaries while the registrar of the supreme court, who has to do just as important work as the judges, takes a reduction of ten per cent? And remember, his salary is mentioned by statute too. Why should the law reporters, the clerk of process, the librarians, the assistant librarians and the secretary to the chief justice, all receive cuts while the judges retain their full salary? The chief justice is getting a salary of $15,000, while the secretary to the chief justice, with a salary of $2,220, has $222 cut from his salary. Is that fair? Take my friend who is the president of the exchequer court, and who gets $10,000 a year. Is it fair that he should get his full salary and make no contribution to this country's exchequer, while the employees in connection with his court are all cut ten per cent? For instance, the deputy registrar, drawing $3,720, is now to receive $372 less than before. The total salaries for the exchequer court officials amount to $18,840, which are reduced by $1,884, while the chief justice receives his full salary. These men are doing just as important work as the judges, and yet they have to take the ten per cent reduction.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a good argument.

Mr. DUFF: Of course it is a good argument. Is it fair, Mr. Chairman, that the charwomen working in this building and the boys in the elevators should have to take a reduction of ten per cent while the lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia does not take it? Is that fair? Is that right? Can any government go before the people of this country and justify that position? I say that they cannot.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: Is it fair for the gentleman in charge of the mounted police in this country not to be affected by this ten per cent cut while all the clerks and officials of the Department of Justice have to subscribe ten per cent of their salaries to the revenues of this country? Is that fair or is it not?

Take the militia. Somebody talked the other day about the brass hats in the militia. Is it fair that the stenographers and clerks in the Department of National Defence should have to pay ten per cent of their salaries into the coffers of this country to help us out of this mess while the brass hats and the admirals—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF: I am an admiral without salary. The brass hats and the admirals and the commodores and all the rest of them get away with their full salary. That is not fair, Mr. Chairman. It is not right. I am willing if it is necessary, in the interests of this country, but I say I am absolutely opposed to the cut, whether it is on my indemnity or on yours, Mr. Chairman, or that of any other member of parliament. I am opposed to the whole ten per cent reduction because I do not believe it is good business. I believe it will be reflected all over this country and that when we next meet here after voting to reduce the salaries of the service by ten per cent, the country will not be one iota the better off; on the other hand, in my opinion as a business man, the cut will make conditions worse than they are to-day. But I do say that if we are going to reduce anybody's salary by ten per cent, then every man who gets a salary from this federal government, whether he be a lieutenant-governor, a judge, a commodore, a general or anybody else, should take the same reduction, and the legislation should be amended to make the cut general throughout the whole service.

Mr. POULIOT: A distinction should be made between those who are able to pay and those who are not, and then perhaps we might easily come to an agreement with the government. I entirely agree with the Minister of Finance that in this democratic country, according to law and custom, money measures are always brought into the house by the government, but this resolution has been presented to the committee to-day to give members on both sides of the house the opportunity to submit their suggestions to the government, and as has been said before, the government can either accept or reject those suggestions.

I have a suggestion to make to the government. Why not begin the cut, if it is necessary, at the figure of $4,000, and leave aside those civil servants earning less than that amount so that they will not be subjected to the cut? I would recommend that all other salaries, including those of judges, lieutenant-governors and ministers of the crown, be cut to the extent of the amount they are in excess of $6,000. I do not know if hon. members understand the position I take, but it is this:

I feel that it is well to practise the cut on ourselves, to show that we are setting a good example. At a later time I may have the opportunity to discuss whether or not any cut is necessary.

Admitting however for the moment that it is necessary, we must adopt the cut ourselves. I do not share the view of the hon. member from Nova Scotia who said that hon. members should not suffer a cut. If such action is to be taken, it should become operative right here in the House of Commons and in the Senate. My idea would be that a cut of ten per cent would be made in salaries ranging between $4,000 and $6,000, and that salaries in excess of $6,000 to all others, including judges, lieutenant-governors, ministers and so on, would be depreciated by the amount they are in excess of $6,000, to compensate for the special consideration given to the poorly paid servants. Would not such an arrangement be fair?

First of all, however, the special allowance given to ministers should be taken away. I was very much surprised a few days ago to learn that the estimates show no cut in that special allowance, and I cannot understand the attitude of the government in that regard. I have to apologize to the house for having made the mistake of saying that the ten per cent cut applied in that particular connection. I wonder if the ministers of the crown have taken the trouble to consult the estimates and see if the allowance is still operative. I should like to remove not only that allowance, but to correct the whole discrimination against members of parliament and others in the civil service of Canada who are suffering from the cut.

At this point I am led to say a few words about the judges. My regard for the bench is high, and I know that at all times that body of men has set an example of self sacrifice. Many outstanding lawyers who were earning high fees in their practice as legal counsel have made sacrifices to go on the bench at lower salaries. Hon. members must have noticed that the judges who came to Ottawa asking the committee then sitting for increases in salary were not all the most prominent figures on the bench. There is one point, however, which has been overlooked by those who have spoken, and it is this: The statement has been made that judges' salaries are statutory. True, but they were also statutory when some years ago they were increased.

I can think of judges who accepted their offices at salaries of $5,000; in the meantime, however, their salaries have risen to $9,000.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

May I compliment the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) upon the stand he took concerning a particular case I have in mind. He granted leave to an old judge 83 years of age. That judge was appointed when he was quite old at a salary of $5,000. His superannuation, if taken now would be $6,000, being two-thirds of his regular salary of $9,000. His personal wealth brings him a very substantial annual income. He has not yet resigned. Why? Is the reason that after having completed twenty years on the bench he might receive $1,000 more superannuation? At the same time other judges who are sane in mind and body are overworked. I compliment the Minister of Justice upon forcing the judge to take his leave, but I am sorry a resignation has not been recommended so that he might be succeeded by some other judge, who could do the work.

Judges when appointed to the bench receive certain salaries, which they accept. On account of representations made to the then government judges' salaries were increased; so much the better for them. To-day however we are in different circumstances, and I do not see why the judges would refuse to accept the cut. I am sure no member of the cabinet has received representations from judges to the effect that they would refuse a cut; I am sure neither the Minister of Justice, who holds as high regard for the bench as I do, nor the Prime Minister has received such communication. Then, why not give the people the right impression, and if a cut has to be made adjust it so that those receiving the higher salaries will be affected as much as the low wage earners, les gagne-petit, as we call them in French, who have so much trouble in their attempts to make both ends meet.

I wish now to address my remarks to that part of the subject concerning lieutenant-governors. I have a high respect for those special representatives of the crown in each of the provinces, but I wonder if they are very necessary. In the province of Ontario we have an example where the office of lieutenant-governor, which was vacated a few months ago, is held by the chief justice of the province. A few years ago I addressed a question to the leader of the Labour party (Mr. Woodsworth), who was speaking about curtailments which were to be made, asking him if it would not be feasible to replace lieutenant-governors by the chief justice of each province. Some weeks ago Mr. Georges Pelletier, a former president of the press gallery and a prominent newspaper man wrote in Le Devoir that such action should be considered, that a great saving would result to the federal exchequer, the provinces and the lieutenant-governors themselves. The practice being now followed in Ontario has been tried in other provinces between the death or the dates of resignations of lieutenant-governors and appointments of successors. The duties of a lieutenant-governor are by no means onerous; he has only to sign bills, letters patent and orders in council. For the time being at least I can see no necessity for the appointment of new lieutenant-governors, and believe the chief justice of each province could perform the offices more economically to all concerned. This is a suggestion which I respectfully submit should be considered by the government in due course.

Many generals and officers of the army and navy are chiefly has-beens, and serve no practical purpose at this time. They carry swords and wear what we call full regalia; of course they look very splendid and picturesque but the people derive no benefit from them. Those who should receive as great consideration are the privates, the non-commissioned officers, and the lieutenants who fought under shell-fire in no man's land. Many of them are to-day in the civil service and receiving small salaries. They risked their lives when some generals and other higher officers who receive higher salaries were in the rear. But these fighting men instead of being given that consideration which the nation owes them for their sacrifices at the front in defence of their country, are now penalized to the extent of a ten per cent reduction of their comparatively low salaries, while the generals and other high officers who were safe in their dugouts are still quite safe, they are still away from all danger—their salaries are not cut. It is the man who risked his life in the front line trenches who has to pay for the general who remained safe in his dugout. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this treatment is most unfair and most unjust.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to conclude the remarks I rose to deliver before the dinner recess. There have been two kinds of exaggerations. The first, in my humble belief, is that according to the resolution the poorly paid civil servants are to suffer a cut, while the other is that a drastic cut is not made in the salaries of those receiving the larger amounts. I would suggest that the government consider the middle course, so that the lower paid and the better paid grades will contribute in a graded proportion. As I said before, many civil servants are returned soldiers who fought in the great war, and they are to suffer a cut. This point has not been mentioned before, although no doubt many hon. members have thought of it. Here a distinction should be made also between parade generals and officers of high rank who had no war service, and others who have performed useful services for this country; there should be a distinction between those who deserve the thanks of the country for the help they gave during trying times and those who have done nothing, who have only a title which they obtained in some way or other.

I should like to make one further observation. It would be wrong for the public to get the impression that members of both houses of parliament are contributing only ten per cent of their indemnity. I suppose the experience of hon. members opposite is the same as my own; when we go to our constituencies we meet people who are needy and who come to us for assistance. We give them a quarter, a half dollar or a dollar; we give them what we can, and we are sorry we cannot give them more. I am sure this has been the experience of hon. members on both sides of the house. Even here in Ottawa, while we are attending our parliamentary duties, when we walk home from the parliament buildings very often we meet people who may be fairly well dressed but who ask us for something to eat, and no one refuses them. This is one kind of assistance that is not mentioned; I refer to it only so that people may have a better understanding of what the members are doing, and may know that we are not neglecting our duties as citizens when we come in contact with unfortunate cases of distress and misery.

Before I resume my speech, Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that a cut affecting so many people is economically unsound. Economists have told us that in the last few years wealth has been concentrated in the hands of a few; a certain number of men get richer by many thousands of dollars, but that money comes from a great many people, so when we come to a time of depression the purchasing power of these people is naturally lessened. Consider a man who is very rich; even if he spends his money lavishly he cannot eat as many potatoes or as much beef or mutton or bread as ten families can eat; even if he dresses very well and spends a great deal of money on his wardrobe he cannot spend as much as would be required to clothe ten families. This must be taken into consideration; the fact that the cut affects so many people brings up a very grave problem. Those people who have less money will buy less, and instead of the burden being placed entirely on the state, which would mean that it would be borne by rich and poor alike, it is borne in the greater part by the people of small means.

I bring these matters before the committee in all sincerity, in order to show the government that there are two sides of the question to be considered; it is not at all a matter of party politics. In conclusion I hope the government will be impressed by the different remarks which have been made by all the members on the subject.

Mr. RHODES: Prior to the dinner adjournment the senior member for Ottawa asked me a question which at the moment I was not in a position to answer. The total number of civil servants in receipt of salaries of $1,200 per year or less is 16,408.

Mr. NEILL: I want to ask the minister two questions, but before doing so I must deprecate very much the acceptance by the chairman this afternoon of a point of order raised by the Minister of Justice. I believe, sir, you accepted his point of order without looking into the authorities, perhaps because no one on the opposition side pointed out where that would lead us. As I understood the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice, it would confine the discussion of this resolution in committee entirely to the terms of the resolution itself. This affords very narrow scope indeed for discussion, and if that is the view held I would ask, what is the use of putting these resolutions into committee of the whole? We have already discussed its principle on the motion to go into committee, and if we are to be confined now strictly to the same subject matter then the committee stage is merely a farce. I understood, and certainly it has always been the practice in the past, that the discussion in committee would be allowed to range, if perhaps not into the details of the bill itself, at any rate into the details of the principle, so to speak, allowing the committee to explore and canvass every angle of the situation as revealed by the resolution in its broad sense. The theory has been, and I can recall occasions when it has been acted upon by the government, that some valuable information might be gleaned from the views expressed by members in the committee and that the government might, in the light of those views, moderate or change the bill which would afterwards be brought down. If my memory serves me rightly the government last year did somewhat modify a bill which they were going to introduce, after representations had been made by the opposition while it was in committee of the whole. I notice that in spite of the point of order the debate has been allowed to extend in the usual way all over the subject, but I wish to protest now, not only as regards the matter at present before us but in view of what may happen in the future, against the position that has been taken. It would be very inimical to the best interests of the subject under discussion if it became the practice.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): I would point out that May, at page 507, lays down that debate on such a resolution must be confined to the terms of the resolution and must not extend to the bill itself.

Mr. NEILL: Yes; but May is only our last resort when we do not know what to do ourselves. I think that in these days when precedent is so largely followed I might point to the precedent of a good many years' standing, under which we have been allowed to discuss the subject in its broadest aspect. However, I will confine myself for the moment to the terms of the resolution. It was suggested this afternoon—and this illustrates the need for allowing the fullest range of discussion—that we must not discuss exemptions because they are not mentioned in the resolution. I would point out, however, that in his very first remarks the Minister of Finance mentioned half a dozen exemptions. But in any case an exemption is mentioned in this resolution, because the second paragraph declares that the purpose is to provide for the payment by the government of contributions due under the Civil Service Superannuation Act in respect of those members of the civil service who receive $1,200 or less. That is certainly an exemption and it is upon that point that I wish to base the question I am about to ask. I do not know how many, but there are a large number of civil servants both in Ottawa and outside who are not eligible to pay into the superannuation fund. If I mistake not there are many of them in the Finance department and also in the soldier settlement branch, and I know that in the outside service there are quite a number. I will illustrate by one class that comes into my mind just now. I refer to employees on government fishing patrol boats and boats used in connection with the lighthouse service, and also the men on lifeboats. They get a miserable salary, $65 a month, I believe, supplemented by a small living allowance; and of course many of them are married and are therefore obliged to maintain homes. They live on the boats but they have to keep their homes, and while the allowance is sufficient to feed them there is nothing left to provide a separate home, to pay rent and so forth. These men are not eligible to pay into the superannuation fund; it has been so decided. Assuming the allowance to be equal to $25 a month, that means that they receive $90 a month, or $1,080 a year, and because they are not eligible to pay into the superannuation fund they do not come under the second clause of this resolution. Therefore they will be docked ten per cent, or $108 per annum, which is equal to $9 per month, whereas the man getting $1,200 per annum will get off with five per cent, if he pays into the superannuation fund. In other words, the man with $100 a month gets off with a reduction of $60 while the man receiving only $90 a month has to pay $108. There is absolutely no justice there, and I would ask the minister whether he will not make some provision for those members of the service who are getting less than $1,200 and who, because they are not eligible to pay into the superannuation fund, will be reduced ten per cent. I should like to know whether he has made or will make provision to take care of this class.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member in his opening remarks would lead the committee to believe that the Minister of Finance had been responsible for having enlarged the discussion by discussing exemptions. The fact is, it was only as a matter of courtesy that I did so, a question having been asked by the other side; that was the only reason that the exemptions were specifically stated. I might properly have sheltered myself behind the resolution and requested that we wait until the bill was introduced. I mention this merely for the purpose of having the record put straight. With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I would rather reserve until the bill is in committee the answer with respect to lower salaried officials. Whatever the answer might be, it would have no bearing on the resolution itself.

Mr. NEILL: I submit that it is certainly pertinent to this resolution. I must accept the minister's decision although I regret it, because I think this is the place and time to discuss that phase of the matter. I want to ask another question and I hope I shall be more successful this time. What about the so-called revenue postmasters, not those who are paid a fixed salary in large cities, but those who get a commission of so much per cent on what they sell. Will they be docked? They are not getting any fixed annual salary, the amount they receive varying according to the sales of the previous year. They certainly do not pay into the superannuation fund and I should like to know what attitude will be taken with regard to them.

Mr. RHODES: They would be affected by the terms of this resolution as it stands.

Mr. NEILL: On the percentage of what they have sold? That is tough on those getting only $200 or $300 a year.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to refer particularly to some remarks made with regard to the military phase of the subject. I refer to what was said by the Minister of Justice with regard to the suggested contract or obligation whereby it was impossible, he rather intimated to the house, to alter the terms of service under which military officers and men are serving. I want to be clear in the first place as to what the Minister of Justice intended to convey. I understood him to say that owing to some rule, which I have not before me at the moment, the country was under some legal obligation to those who are employed in the military service, which obligation it could not alter as to either the term of service or the rate of pay. I understand the Minister of Justice was the one who referred to the matter this afternoon. Does he think either officers or men cannot either have their pay reduced or be discharged at the will of the crown?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; I know the crown can do so as it sees fit. Whether it should do so is another matter. When a man is definitely enlisted for a certain period, no one knows better than my hon. friend that he is bound to serve for that period if the crown so desires, and if he does not do so and leaves the service, he may be treated as a deserter. I grant, however, that the crown can change any regulation or contract or ordinance as it sees fit. Whether it should do so is another question.

Mr. RALSTON: That is just the point I want to bring out. My hon. friend will remember that there are certain airmen whose services have been discontinued, and they are enlisted men just in the class of which my hon. friend speaks.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is in the power of the crown.

Mr. RALSTON: The crown has taken the position that it should not even reduce the salaries of some, whereas others who are in exactly the same position from a legal standpoint may be dismissed or retired.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On reasonable terms, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The matter of terms remains, I hope, to be discussed. So far it has not been. With that in mind I want to make this statement with regard to those in the military service: I have heard a good deal in the committee and in the house with regard to the officers and men who are serving in the military forces of Canada, and I am glad I cannot concur in a good deal that has been said which questioned their necessity in this country. Those men are performing just as useful and necessary a service as anyone in the public service. They are required just as much and are giving just as loyal and faithful attention to their work as any who serve this country. I would be the last to concur in any deprecation of their service or to agree that they are not rendering full value for everything that is being paid to them. At the same time I regret that we have not so far heard from the government side of this house—and it is the government which is bringing down this resolution—the reason why these men are to be exempt from the general cut which is being made in the service. Unless there is some good reason of which I am not aware—and if there is one, the government should give it to us—I find it difficult to justify to men like lighthouse keepers, who have been mentioned to-night, men on government boats, and men on the fishery patrol boats, who are not even getting the benefit of the five per cent superannuation payment, why they should have their salaries cut, while those in the military and other branches of the service to which reference has been made are not asked to contribute in the same way. If, as has been suggested, there is to be a sort of income levy upon those in the service of Canada, simply because the government feels it has this money in its treasury and can therefore easily collect it by deducting it from the cheques; if this is to be the method of collecting taxes in this country and a special class is to be picked out, namely, the government servants, I say it is all wrong; but if the government is determined to do it then is it fair to apply it just to one class of government servants and to leave others out. Let me say further that in any case the idea of keeping some public servants on full pay and dropping others entirely is something which should not be done under existing conditions in Canada. All I want to ask the Minister of Finance is this: In view of what the Minister of Justice has said, that it is within the right of the crown without legal obligation to alter the term of service or the rate of pay of those in the military service, why is it that these men are not being included in the cut?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. RHODES: I answered the question this afternoon, and I do not know that I can change the answer which I gave then. I said that the reason for those exemptions was that we regard this as a matter of contract. I admitted at that time, as the Minister of Justice has done to-night and, I think quite rightly, it would be proper for the crown to ignore that contract if it wished and to include all of those.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not do so?

Mr. RHODES: Because we have regarded it as a matter of contractual right and have not thought fit to do so.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know of anyone in the house or the country who is less inclined than I to even suggest that anything should be done to the detriment of those who are engaged in the military forces of Canada; but we are discussing a bigger question, one which affects the whole public service, all over Canada, and the only thing which could possibly commend any such cut to the country will be if it is fairly applied. With that principle in mind, and in view of the answer made by the Minister of Justice, I do not see how the Minister of Finance can rely any longer on the matter of contract. I have under my hand the civil service classification with every salary in it; it is provided in the Civil Service Act that civil servants are to be paid those salaries and they are appointed on those terms. In the military service, the men are enlisted for three years; officers are taken on under their commissions, but they are not taken on for life any more than are civil servants, and to say there is a contract does not quite answer the point which has been raised not only from this side but from other quarters of the house with regard to these exemptions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does my hon. friend not realize any distinction in this: when a man is enlisted in the military or naval or air service or the mounted police, he is there for a definite period; he cannot leave if he wants to do so, whereas a civil servant, if he is dissatisfied in any way, can always leave the service?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend was not in the chamber when that point was discussed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was and I heard what was said. I know from experience and a pretty long one, that any man in the service who desires to resign, can do so. That is not the case in the military or naval service and if the government chooses to change the contract with a man who is enlisted, he has to put up with it. It is the right of the crown to do that. But if in the civil service terms are imposed which, in the judgment of a civil servant, are not satisfactory to him, he can retire and do something else.

Mr. EULER: Cannot a judge do the same thing?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A judge would be practically out of business.

Mr. RALSTON: If what the minister says is so, how is it that the government takes another stand in regard to men who are enlisted in exactly the same way, namely, the men of the non-permanent air force? My hon. friend says the government takes one position with regard to men who are considered permanent and another with regard to those who are non-permanent, although they are in exactly the same situation. The Minister of Finance is rather ingenious, as he can be—and I take him at his word—in suggesting that, after all, this is not a reduction of salary, but simply a deduction for one year.

Mr. RHODES: That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: If that be so, there can be no question about the right to make a deduction from any salary in just the same way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has been done in England.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend suggests that it has already been done in England so far as the army and navy are concerned. The minister assures us that no one will sustain any reduction in salary; far from it; that a man will get $60 less a year and will have that much less to spend, but that that is not a reduction; it is simply a deduction, and there has been no change in his contract. If there has been no change in his contract I submit that the deduction, not the reduction, can be made from all salaries just as well as from certain classes. I once more say that I am only suggesting this because of the fact that the government seems determined to make some deduction and some special levy upon those who happen to be, in this case, so unfortunate as to be in their service, but I say that if there must be a general levy of this kind and I say it is all wrong, the only way you could do it so it could possibly be justified to the country as fair, would be to apply it all around, not simply taking some classes in and leaving others out.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If I understood the Minister of Finance correctly in his statement this afternoon, it is possible that when the bill is introduced in the house the horizontal reduction referred to in the resolution may not be adhered to but may be departed from.

Mr. RHODES: No, my hon. friend did not understand me correctly if that is his understanding of what I said. The principle of the horizontal reduction will be adhered to, but what I said was that where there were inequalities and where there was a double deduction, there were special provisions in the bill to provide for such a case.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What my hon. friend meant, then, was that there would be special provisions only in the case of a double deduction such as that to which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River referred, where the salary had already been reduced. Is that correct?

Mr. RHODES: It was to take up inequalities, not necessarily that one.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I take it that I am correct, then, in assuming that the principle of the resolution providing for a horizontal reduction of ten per cent will be adhered to in the bill?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If that is so, may I point out to my hon. friend that we have here a provision for a five per cent reduction in the salaries of those who are receiving $1,200 or less. Now where does that get you? Take the man who is now receiving $1,200. He is deducted five per cent and he will get $1,200 less $60, or $1,140.

Mr. RHODES: No. He will still be deducted ten per cent, but he will not be called upon in addition to pay his superannuation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: He will be reduced ten per cent, but he will be allowed five per cent of that ten per cent. That will give the $1,200 man a salary of $1,140.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the long run that is what it will mean. Let us have no misunderstanding about it, because I want to get the matter clearly into my head as far as I can from the resolution. Either we are going to adhere to that cut, or we are going to depart from it. If we adhere to it, then the man who gets $1,200 and is allowed five per cent gets in the future $1,140. Take the man who comes next, the $1,240 man. He gets a deduction of ten per cent, or $124. That leaves him with a salary of $1,116. So the $1,240 man, after this horizontal cut is made, gets $24 less than the $1,200 man.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is referring to an incidence that is bound to happen in border line cases. If you have a graduated cut, when you come to the border line you are going to find cases just beyond the border where the man on the one side will have an injustice as compared with the man on the other. That is inescapable. There is no system whereby those apparent injustices can be remedied.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then I take it that my hon. friend has no remedy for what he says will be the case.

Mr. RHODES: There will be inequalities on the border line. They are bound to occur.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When my hon. friend has done the very best he can do in what he says he has decided upon, we will have this inequality, that after this cut goes into effect a civil servant now drawing $1,240, will be drawing $1,116 while the man now drawing $1,200 will receive $1,140. That is, the $1,240 man will receive $24 less than the $1,200 man. That, I submit, is one of the things that comes as an inevitable result of the government not having considered the matter with a view to a graduated scale of reduction.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend had a graduated scale, he would simply multiply those instances by the number of steps up in the graduation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That might be so if my hon. friend was trying to see how ridiculous he could make it. I want to discuss this matter with the resolution before us clearly in mind, and I want to point out to my hon. friend before the bill is introduced just where this is going to lead. This is the inevitable result of taking a ten per cent slash at all salaries without any consideration of where you are going to land. I submit that with the greatest courtesy possible in dealing with a resolution as ill-considered as this resolution appears to me to be.

Take the principle of a graduated scale. Is there anybody in this house on either side or in any corner who will deny the equity of that principle? My hon. friend has practically admitted the equity of it by allowing a deduction of five per cent from the man drawing a salary of $1,200 and less. Is not that correct? Why was the deduction of five per cent made in that case instead of ten per cent?—because that is what it amounts to. The reason was that it was not considered equitable that a man receiving $1,200 or less should get as high a percentage cut as the man receiving above that figure. There can be no question about that. The $1,200 man is being given consideration because he receives a low salary, and the principle of a graduated scale is admitted when the government pays five per cent towards the superannuation fund in respect of that man's salary. Having started out that way, how on earth can my hon. friend justify leaving the man between $1,200 and $2,000 with exactly the same percentage of reduction as the man between $6,000 and $8,000? Why not continue to follow the same line of reasoning that my hon. friend apparently has commenced? Why not give to that low salaried man between $1,200 and $2,000 the same consideration you give to the man who is receiving $1,200 or less? That is what appeals to me very strongly.

I want to say this further to my hon. friend, that so far as I am concerned I opposed this resolution just because I was afraid that the very result would ensue which the Minister of Finance now tells me will follow from its adoption. I opposed it because I believe in a graduated scale of reduction, similar to that in effect with regard to income tax, succession duties, and so on. I submit the proposal now before us is contrary to the practice which has been followed in the various provinces and by the dominion in regard to matters of this kind. My hon. friend may answer, "oh, no". My reply is however, in the words of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), that the proposed cut is not a reduction but really constitutes an impost or tax. If the proposed cut is in the nature of an income tax levy, then are we to understand that to that extent the people affected will not be subjected to income tax? I think we may dismiss any such considerations from our minds, because undoubtedly they will be subjected to the operations of the income tax, just as other people who are receiving salaries.

I want to say also that I am not opposed to the cut, but I think it should be graded.

I am opposed to the exemptions, I do not think they can be justified before the people of Canada. I say frankly to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that there are a great many people in Canada to-day who are in a much worse position than those civil servants receiving salaries of $1,200. But the greatest indignation will be felt throughout Canada if the high salaried persons are cut to no greater extent than those receiving the smaller salaries. There will be further resentment against certain civil servants who may suffer no cut at all. I think any such arrangement is ill considered, and the minister would do well, when the bill is introduced to try to make up the required revenue by taking a higher percentage from the higher salaries. I agree that money must be had for the public treasury, and it is the duty of my hon. friend and his colleagues to raise it, a task which is by no means easy. Surely, however, it will be much easier for him and for those associated with him who are charged with the responsibility, to raise the money in a more equitable fashion so that the burden may be placed upon the shoulders of those able to bear it rather than upon the shoulders of the lower paid civil servants.

There are many low salaried people who are finding it difficult to get along without reductions; and then there are certain classes, I must admit, who are even worse off. Unfortunately the farmers, who receive no salaries at all and who at the present time are getting no returns on their investments, are suffering more than any other people in Canada. Everything they have to buy is priced altogether out of proportion to the amounts they receive for the goods they have to sell. Nevertheless they are not being helped by an injustice perpetrated upon some other class.

I am bound to submit to my hon. friend that a bill such as he has described, which will follow rigidly the terms of the resolution now before us, will be most unjust. When the bill is introduced, if it be found that an amount equal to that anticipated can be raised by instituting cuts on a graduated scale, I submit such changes could be made constitutionally and with the approval of Canadians generally.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I must call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the resolution now before us contains no reference to exemptions.

An hon. MEMBER: What about "certain salaries"?

Mr. RHODES: That the discussion has turned towards exemptions is due to the fact that I answered—and I am not sorry—a direct question this afternoon. I submit the question of exemptions is arguable and debatable, and a subject for discussion when the bill is presented. I have, however, some comments to make in connection with my hon. friend's objection to any inequality which might arise in respect of what might be termed border line cases. I refer of course to salaries of $1,200 and less, where the deduction of ten per cent ceases to operate and in effect becomes five per cent. If one were to follow my hon. friend's logic, the only proper procedure would be to have a straight ten per cent cut all along the line. The inequality to which he has referred arises merely because an attempt was made to temper the wind to the shorn lambs who were in receipt of salaries of $1,200 or less. Where deductions are taking place, inequalities are bound to occur on one side or the other of the border line, and a graduated scale would serve only to multiply the inequalities by the number of graduations allowed.

My hon. friend may not agree with me, but I submit to him in all deference that the horizontal cut is fair and equitable, and I believe I should tell him my reasons for thinking so. If we proceed upon the assumption that a salary is commensurate with the services rendered, then all men are being paid on the same basis. It is a fact that one can get thousands of men in the lower grades of the civil service at low salaries, but sometimes it is very difficult to obtain the services of high salaried men. In fact I have known instances in the government service where the highest paid men are the hardest men to get and to hold. If we proceed upon the assumption that civil servants are paid fair salaries for the work they perform, whether they receive $2,000, $4,000 or $6,000 per year, then I say that a horizontal cut of ten per cent is fair in each individual case. In addition to that, we must remember that the higher salaried servants pay federal income tax and some of them pay municipal income tax, as well. Bearing these factors in mind, we would be unfair to the higher paid men in the service if we called upon them to stand more substantial reductions than those of the lower grades.

Mr. RALSTON: Put it the other way.

Mr. RHODES: It is not pleasant for me to be the sponsor of a proposal which means the reducing of salaries, for the period of one year, of civil servants. Only the stern necessities of the case force us to ask them to make a contribution. My hon. friend has mentioned other people in the country who have suffered reductions. May I say that I know of many God-fearing, honest, hard-working people who to-day, through no fault of their own, are in receipt of no salaries at all. We must admit that civil servants are in a very much better position than that, small though some of their salaries may be. Furthermore, to the extent that we exempt the civil servants from making their contribution in this time of stress, just to that extent do we place the full burden upon other classes in the community who must raise the sum of money the treasury needs.

My hon. friend may not agree with me, but may I say to him that the resolution now before the committee has received the utmost consideration, and in my judgment, for the reasons I have given, amongst others, I believe the horizontal cut is in the circumstances fair and equitable. If any of those in the higher grades receive remunerations higher than they should receive, that is an act of injustice which can be remedied only by creating an equality in the amounts of pay they should receive for services rendered.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend knows that I did not for a moment intend to suggest that he or anybody else gets any pleasure out of imposing salary cuts.

Mr. RHODES: I was not suggesting that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know that quite well. But it appears to be necessary to make this salary cut in order to obtain the requisite revenue to carry on the business of the country. That being the case, I submit it should be done in a way that I think would be much more equitable than the way now proposed. When my hon. friend says that it is quite impossible to reconcile these inequalities, I do not think he could have given the matter the consideration that I think it will get before the bill passes this house. There is no question that the inequality to which I referred is something which probably always will arise when you come to a certain point where you change the rate. But does not my hon. friend propose to remedy a case of that kind by an appropriate provision in the bill?

Mr. RHODES. It cannot be remedied.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It cannot be remedied if my hon. friend is determined that there shall be no departure from the resolution.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: I am not suggesting for one moment that it is not competent for the committee or for the house to amend this resolution and the bill in any manner they see fit. What I meant was, there is no actuarial method whereby you can assign a series of border lines at which there should be a variation in rates without at the same time creating these very inequalities of which my hon. friend speaks. It cannot be done.

Mr. DUFF: It is done every day; take the income tax, for instance.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I thank the Minister of Finance for the information. The 16,408 received a salary of what?

Mr. RHODES: Twelve hundred dollars and less.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Amongst those how many contribute to the superannuation fund?

Mr. RHODES: Under the retirement fund 510; under the old Superannuation Act 3; under the retirement fund 550.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The resolution says that those who have paid into the superannuation fund will receive the benefit of five per cent from the consolidated fund. But the resolution does not say anything with reference to those 550 who paid into the old retirement fund. Will the same benefit be extended to those?

Mr. RHODES: I answered a similar question from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), or rather I gave a partial answer. It was not satisfactory to him.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. RHODES: I said I would prefer to give a final answer when the bill is before the house. As the resolution now stands they would be affected.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I go back to the statement of the hon. minister that what is being done now is not a reduction in salary. I am prepared to admit that it is a deduction, which in the long run amounts to ten per cent less salary. We are all agreed on that. But the Prime Minister has changed the wording since his declaration in the house. Then he said the salaries would be reduced. That meant that the range of the salaries would be disturbed. But, as I understand, this resolution does not reduce the range; it simply takes ten per cent away from salaries within that range, for this year. Nevertheless it is an arbitrary deduction; you cannot get away from it. This afternoon the Minister of Finance said there had been some consultation with some representatives of the civil service. But the civil servants apparently were not consulted, because the delegates came to represent thirty-five of the affiliated associations, covering something like 62,000 members of the service. When some time in 1923 or so a reduction was made in the bonus of the civil servants, a consultation took place. We on this side of the house consulted with the civil service. Of course, they objected to having a reduction in the bonus, but they were heard. They presented memoranda, they had interview after interview with the Minister of Finance, to whom I had the pleasure of introducing those deputations. Of course, the cut was made, but only after full consultation with representatives of the civil service. Nothing would have been easier than to have followed the same practice this year. No doubt a ten per cent cut would have been made, but the same result could probably have been arrived at by means of some other arrangement. That is why I say this is a purely arbitrary deduction.

The minister asserts that a straight or horizontal cut is the only way in which to produce equality of treatment. Well, here is a contrast: a minister of the crown in receipt of $14,000 a year has to pay $1,400; a civil servant who earns $1,200 a year, and does not contribute to the superannuation fund or the retirement fund, will have to pay $120. Surely the minister will not argue for a moment that the $14,000 man is not better able to suffer and bear his reduction in salary than the man who suffers a reduction of $120. The minister sees at once the difficulty. So long as you keep within the high range of salaries the cut is not so felt. He who is in receipt of $21,000 can easily suffer a reduction of $2,100. The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) smiles.

Mr. CAHAN: I was wondering how often the hon. member had been cut in that way.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have never received $21,000 a year.

Mr. CAHAN: Then why mention it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Now that the Secretary of State has raised the point, I submit that in the very nature of things I must feel a cut of $400 in my indemnity to a far greater extent than the Prime Minister will feel a cut of $2,100 on his salary of $21,000, supplemented as it is by his private income. The moment you get to the lower range the pressure is harder. That is why it is so difficult for the lower salaried civil servants to view this shrinkage in their income with any degree of satisfaction. The Prime Minister said that they ought to be enthusiastic; well, I do not know how they can be expected to become enthusiastic over a loss of $120 on a total salary of $1,200. If this is to be treated purely and simply as a deduction, then why should not the same deduction apply all through? Surely it would not be a breach of contract to apply it as well to the high salaries of the judges and military and naval officers. There is a contract of employment between the civil servant and the crown, or there is not; there is a contract between the judge and the crown, or there is not. There is a contract between the civil servant and the crown in so far as contractual obligations can exist between the crown and its servants. Proof of that is undoubtedly to be found in the statute and in the form of contract used by the Civil Service Commission. The Civil Service Commission advertises these positions; there is the offer and then the acceptance, and that is a binding contract, or I know nothing about it. Just taking an ordinary form circulated by the Civil Service Commission, the offer made by the government through its agent the Civil Service Commission is in these words:

> In the event of a permanent appointment the initial salary of $2,280 will be increased—

There is the promise.

> —upon recommendation for efficient service at the rate of $120 per annum until a maximum of $2,700 has been reached.

That is the offer, and the civil servant accepts, so the contract is binding. He is given the position, and under the statute it is ratified. If the Minister of Finance can find a better form of contract, including the offer, the acceptance, the ratification by statute and the binding obligation on the crown to continue to employ that man as long as he fulfils his part of the contract by good conduct, I do not understand anything about the law on contracts. The crown also promises by statute, through the advertisement which is accepted by the applicant, that upon good conduct the civil servant will be entitled to and will be paid a statutory increase.

The contract from which I read was dated November 23, 1931, and so much did the government recognize that it contained a binding contract that in the new form of notice sent out by the Civil Service Commission and dated March 4, 1932, we find these words, offering another contract:

> The salary is, however, subject to such temporary reduction or subsequent increase—

Let us hope there will be a subsequent increase, since we are sure there is to be a temporary reduction.

—as may be authorized by parliament.

These are no idle words; there must have been a reason for saying that from and after a certain date there shall be a new form of contract; there must have been a contract previously. I cannot see how the Minister of Finance, even with his high attainments, can get away from it. But there was a statement made by the Minister of Justice that should not be allowed to go by. The Minister of Justice endeavoured to differentiate between the contract applying to a judge and the contract applying to a civil servant. So far as judges are concerned, the Minister of Justice says they cannot be retired, while if a naval or military officer wants to retire before his term is up he may be arrested. But the Minister of Justice added, "If terms are imposed upon the civil servants that are unfair, he can resign."

That is a statement which cannot be allowed to go unchallenged. If I understand the Minister of Justice correctly, he means that, obligations being imposed and contractual relation having existed, if unfair terms are imposed what is the remedy? The employee may resign. That is a most extraordinary statement, that the crown may force one of its employees to resign by imposing upon him unfair terms. With all deference to the Minister of Finance I cannot see how he can escape the binding obligation, the contractual relation between the crown and the civil servant.

As I have said, this new contract is dated March 4, 1932. Whoever advised the Civil Service Commission, or whoever cast a legal eye over this contract, knew very much more about it, apparently, than the person who drafted this resolution, because at once they saw the objection that there is this responsibility upon the government to respect the legal relation, the contractual obligation that has been made with the civil servant, in view of the fact that he is entitled to a permanent position at a stated annual or monthly salary, and that such is to continue as long as he conducts himself properly.
