big drops of rain began to patter on the sand, sending up volumes of dusty steam.

I got to my feet with joy unspeakable. Praise be to Heaven, my cry for help had been heard and answered! I was saved, saved from the vultures and the heaping sands. Man is an insignificant atom in the scale of the universe, yet easily believes himself the object of a special providence. Here were the streams of water in the desert sent for me and for me alone. I wept with awe and gratitude.

The rain came thicker and faster, first a shower and then a deluge. The sun was eclipsed, and the dome overhead seemed to be cracking and rending as at the blast of the last trump. And indeed to me it was little less than a resurrection. Here was water, and water was life. The thunder roared ever nearer and louder till worlds of wrecked matter seemed to be crashing over my head. My ears were tunned by the exploding bolts, and on my face I felt the hot smack of the forked lightning that made the wilderness as a sea of fire. But through it all the beneficent rain came down in sheets, drenching me not merely to the skin, but to the very marrow. With upturned face and open mouth I slaked my baking throat, and as I drank, with ten times the greediness of the fevered drunkard, I could see my horse with his nozzle turned to the pouring skies, as if he, too, were having a saving draught.

crouching forms, with eyes that matched the lightning, ready to pounce upon me, but somehow they never came to the spring. In the air, too, were wheeling things that would swoop down and then dart off, with a cry of disappointment at finding the expected corpse a living man.

In the early morning the storm died aweg, and the stars came out in a crystall e. dewy azure that was as the cool blue bosom of a summer lake. Not daring to sleep, I lay and looked up at them, meditating at the marvels they must have seen in the course of the countless ages. But though my thoughts were serious enough (and with good reason), they had not the gloom of the night before.

I had leisure to nonder many things besides the stars—such as the strange fate that had led me hither, the perils and hardships that were past, those that might still be to come, the fate of my late companions, and my own present condition. But as you may imagine the subject that was uppermost in my mind was the miraculous meeting with Donald Gordon, for I was convinced that the man on the black horse was none other than he. What in the name of all the wonders had brought him to this strange quarter of the globe, and how came he to be fighting for Yumen Yusel? These were questions I could not answer, perhaps I did not try very hard to answer them, for I was occupied with the cardinal fact that beyond all doubt Donald was in Arabla, that I had seen him face to face, had even spoken to him and got a hurried glance in reply. But for the sudden mishaps of war I would have declared myself to him, and he would have become my friend and protector. In the most unexpected way my mission came near a happy accomplishment, vet, exasperating to think, had failed as utterly as if we had been as wide apart as the poles. The total failure on the verge of so dram: c a success was another cruel stroke of that malicious fortune that pursued me so relentlessly. But with a spark of the fire that I had thought dead I told myself that I would not be conquered.

But for the sudden mishaps of war I would have declared myself to him, and he would have become my friend and protector. In the most unexpected way my mission came near a happy accomplishment, vet, exasperating to think, had failed as utterly as if we had been as wide apart as the poles. The total failure on the verge of so dram c a success was another cruel stroke of that malicious fortune that pursued me so relentlessly. But with a spark of the fire that I had thought dead I told myself that I would not be conquered.

Donald Gordon was in Arabia, and I would find him—nay, more, would carry him trium hantly back to Scotland and his friends. As this bold, high project stirred me, I had a vision of two sun-embrowned men, in strange, outlandish garb, arriving in the gloaming at The Elms, and of Isabel, after a moment's mistrust, rushing to greet and embrace them. The delectable imagination inspired me with such heart and energy that I must have expanded inches on the strength of it. The morning broke sweetly over the waste, with a rosy flush, and a sapphire radiance, and a balm that was as a precious cordial to mind and body. The sand sparkled and gleamed like the sea, and the distant mountains stood out a definite blue-black line against the pellucid western horizon.

Revived to a fresh interest in life, I began to consider the means of escape from this wilderness, and so, having dressed my wound with wet rags, I climbed, not without difficulty, into the

You may be sure we had each a multitude of questions to ask and answer, but before I would hear anything of Tebal's adventures since our parting, I insisted on looking to his injury. It was bad, he said, but not deadly. Baring his left shoulder very carefully, I found a shattered gunshot wound that gave the flesh a forn and broken appearance, different altogether from the clean cut I had got. I dressed it as gently and as well as was possible with the means at my disposal, a service for which poor Tabal was infinitely grateful.

"We are of different nations and religions, yet surely we are not strangers," he said, embracing me again. "Had I seen thee now for the first time I would have driven this lance through thee. But henceforth it will be turned against him who seeks thy hurt. Tabal, the son of Achmet, swears to me. "Thou art lucky," exclaimed Tabal, with professional pride, when I was stripped. "By my faith, the man who gave thee this hurt knew not his proce. That done, he played the surgeon to me. "Thou art lucky," exclaimed Tabal, with professional pride, when I was stripped. "By my faith, the man who gave thee this hurt knew not his business, or thou mightest cast away thy leg forever. Methinks if I had my weapon upon him as he had his upon thee he would now be food for the kites and hyenas."

"He was clumsy, Tabal," I said, "Clumsy," repeated Tabal, scornful."

Far into the night the storm boomed and poured. While it lasted I lay stretched full length on the soaking sands, slowly turning over and over, so that the blessed flood might enter at every pore. It was impossible to have too much of that, Heaven's gift, and I would not miss a drop of it Nor, while reveiling in the shower bath, did I forget to fill my water-skin against future needs.

Now and again I had glimpses of crouching forms, with eyes that matched the lightning, ready to pounce upon me, but somehow they never came to the string. In the air, too, were wheeling things that would swoop down and then dart off, with a cry of disappointment at finding the expected corpse a living man.

He had his way, and indeed it was exceedingly refreshing to be bathed, for I was still more than a trifle feverish. But more soothing and invigorating than the water werethe brother-in cartlaness and compassion of Tabal, rating than the water werethe brotherly gentleness and compassion of Tabal, who seemed to make himself responsible for my safety and comfort.

When we came to recount our experiences since parting I learned that he had passed the night like myself, alone. Like me, he had thought himself doomed, had been saved by the rain, and was looking for human succour when I spied him. We went through our perils again as old soldiers re-fight their battles, and embraced at the conclusion in pure exuberance of joy at being together once more.

and we knew the watercourses were not far off. It was midnight, however, ere we had climbed far enough to feel safe for the night, or perhaps the better way to put it is that at midnight I swore I would go no farther if the halt cost me my life. Tabal said be thought we might rest So. we had another drink, and threw ourselves on the ground to sleep.

We woke with the level sun beating in our faces, greatly refreshed though stiff and sore in the regions of our wounds. Our first act was to scramble to the top of an adjacent crag and reconnoitre the situation. We looked

The culvert crossing Wellington St. is entirely too small; also culvert ou St. Andrew's street and on the next street; therefore three, new culverts must be built, with at least one half more capacity than the old cores and the water. must be built, with at least one half more capacity than the old ones, and the water course then made deeper between them. Behind the gas property $5 feet of open drain, where sticks and all kinds of refuse is let in and causes overflow of drain and damage to cellars follows. Also culvert crossing Water St. is old and in a bad state and never was large enough for the flow of water in freshet times. This work will cost six hundred dollars. I have opened sewer at different points and had it cleaned; that is all that can be done until water lowers.

"Put up thy dagger, Ahmed!" I said.

"I am surely thy friend."

"Thou art no friend," he returned, savagely.

"A man does not spit, on his friend. Thou hast cast the rinsings of thy foul mouth into my face, a disgrace, for which thy blood will atone. I will fight thee where thou standest, dagger to dagger, but I will not let thee call thyself my friend."

With that he wrapped his torn mantle about his left arm, as a sort of shield, and put himself in a posture of defence.

"Let it be quick," he hissed. "Stand not dallying as thou wert afraid of thy fair skin." the fair skin."

"What thou sayest is impossible," I answered, drawing myself up just enough to show I was not held back by fear. "It would be a sin in me to fight thee. Thou art in the midst of grievous misfortune."

"Thou art right," he said. "But I will bear my grief as becometh a man, and desireth not any sympathy at thy hand. I was eager to meet thee alone, and, lo! here thou art, and we will fight."

This lucid reasoning seemed to weigh with Ahmed. "It may be thou speakest the truth." he said, turning to me.
"I will so take it. Only remember that, if thou put disgrace again upon me, wittingly or unwittingly, I will kill thee on the spot."

"I am warned and agree," I replied,
"and now what news hast thou of the defeat?"

The worst that tongue can tell. The troops of Abou Kuram are scattered as chaff in the wind, and my father is dead, as thou knowest. But his death shall not be unavenged. A son liveth after him. Look you here. The man on the black horse is a mighty warrior, but I will slay him if he were the very devil himself, and he were the very devil himself, and I had to hunt him to the ends of the earth. of the band in its recent enterprises.

When we arrived the cooking was held to be done, and the company, numbering at least 200, squatted to eat, Tabal, Ahmed, and myself being ordered to join. In appreciation, as he said, of my brave words, the chief did me the honour of keeping me close to himself, and we sat down beside the carcass of a gazelle, which had been roasted whole. As usual at such merrymakings, decency was thrown to the winds. Every man had a wolf's appetite, and took a wolf's ready method of appeasing it. The chief opened the proceedings by thrusting his hand down the gazelle's mouth and tearing out its half-raw tongue. Taking a huge bite himself, he requested me to folsite himself, he requested me to fol-

"Thou art right." he said. "But I will bear my grief as becometh a man, and desireth not any sympathy at thy hand. I was eager to meet thee alone, and, lo! here thou art, and we will fight."

"We will not fight," I returned. "Thou art famished with hunger and weak from fatigue and would be at a sore disadvantage. I will give thee a share of my food; it is not much, but it will strengthen thee, and when thou hast eaten thou shalt rest undisturbed. If after that thou be of a mind to fight, I may gratify thee. Meantime put up thy dagger."

He kept his blazing eyes on me for the space of perhaps half a minute, then sullenly thrusting the dagger into his girdle he threw himself on the ground without a word.

Tabal came down with the horses and the dates, and Ahmed was invited to eat. He accepted the invitation with an ill grace and a lowering plower. But he was in my power, and I would not let his net.

dition to him, what is he that he should cross my purpose? Come hear, thou dog, and bite," he added, addressing me. "Bite, or by our holy religion I will crush it down thy throat with the shaft of my spear. Nay, I may even widen the passage with the boint."

"My lord," I replied, in my humblest and most respectful manner, "I have already eaten and have no appetite."

"No appetite for such as that, thou mongrel cur! Thy vile stomach knoweth not what is good. Had I eaten a two-year-old camel, yet would I find appetite for such sweet bread as that. I sav to thee, stick thy teeth in it."

I might have perished in my refural, for the look of the thing sickened me, but just then my eve caught Tabal's, which gave me a hasty but earnest admonition. So I bit at the outer edge, where the meat was best done.

"A dainty bite, by my sabre hilt," cried Suleiman. "Twas but a pretence. Open thy jaws and try again, as thou valuest thy welfare. That is better. So, so," he laughed. "Now thou shalt fare as if thou wert a brown of the vultures to eat, but to-day thou shalt fare as if thou wert a brother. Take that," and he held up a goblet of coffee. "If thou say not it is the rarest mocha, I will tell thee to thy pretty face thou art a scandalous liar."

I drank, and the coffee was good, so good that my lips smacked of their own accord.

"Ha, ha! my gazelle hath the right taste in his mouth yet," cried Suleiman. "That is from the store of our beloved friend and brother Amood Sinn. Thou mayest have head of him. He is an unfortunate son of Ishmael, but a right good judge of coffee. Yet is it not better than his sherbet, which delighteth the soul as the smile of the houris? Amood Sinn is a man of understanding. He goeth forth to battle and leaveth his good things to the needy. My blessings on him. hold our peace and look death in the face.

By nightfall, after a ride that recklessly tore and joited the soundest joints and bones, we emerged from the range on a level dip on one of the spurs overlooking the plain to the west. Here we halted for supper, which was stealthly prepared and silently eaten; for the need of concealment had come. As soon as the meal was over, Suleiman and Abd el Mahsin held a brief but animated consultation, the result of which was an immediate order to mount and march. By daybreak we were at the mouth of a steep and narrow defile that issued on a piece of green sloping down to the plain, and here we rested in the shadow of some tall precipices, I managing to snatch perhaps an hour of sleep.

The east was blazing in all the glory of crimson and gold, when someone prodded me vigorously in the ribs, and I leaped up to find the company tightening girths for the road. Tabal, who insisted on being at once brother and servant to me, had my mare ready by my side. I had just time to take the roin when Suleiman gave the order to mount, and, like one man, the band stallwart of our band, who might be leaded up to find the company tightening girths for the road. Tabal, who insisted on being at once brother of the road servant to me, had my mare ready by my side. I had just time to take the robust in the rest of us, following the lead of Suleiman, and. like one man, the band sprang into the saddle.

At starting we divided, Abd el Mahsin, with Ahmed and the necessary guard, going southward with the captured horses and camels and other booty, and Suleiman and the rest of us striking out to the north-west.

Before parting I managed to get a word with Ahmed.

"We may never meet again, Ahmed," I said, "and I wish to assure the I am thy friend. Should you make thy way back to Abou Kuram, as I trust thou wilt, tell bim I shall not forget his kindness, and that I commend to him the son of the valiant Koor All."

"It shall be done as thou desirest," he answered.

"One thing more I would beseech of you," I added, "and it is this—that if thou fall in with the man on the black horse thou wilt not fight with him nor provoke him."

"It will slay him," returned Ahmed, flercely.

"Nay, Abmed, tempt him not lest he slay thee," I said. "As for avenging the death of thy father, thou canst not right the wrongs of battle. Koor Ali fell like a galiant soldier. Lay that to thy heart. Farewell."

"Farewell," answered Ahmed. "I will think of what thou hast said." And we parted, I turning to pressing interests of my own.

It was easy to see from the demeanour of Suleiman and his men that something big was in the wind, and presently an inkling of is character were bound for Amood Sinn's palace.

CHAPTER XXIII. We pushed on with the speechless haste of men who cannot afford to waste energy on words, neither heat of sun nor lack of water being allowed to detain us. In and out among drifting dunes, across shifting ridges, over fissures that would have swallowed us all without being aware of it, through black rocks and scraggy shrubbery, dipping into valleys, climbing hillocks skirting villages—on, on we went, with never an abatement of the pace and no hint of our burning impatience save what might be gathered from fiashing eyes and keen set faces. To me it was the old agony over again.

The pangs of thirst were upon me, and my hurt was paining me dreadfully. From his uneasy wriggling and his peculiar stoo. I understood that Tabal, too, was suffering. But as we had no desire to be stripped and left in the desert to console each other in native nakedness, no murmur of complaint escaped our lips.

Two days and nights this continued, with scarce a pause or remission. Our food was eaten in the saddle, and, as for prayers, heaven and the prophet would forgive a little present neglect in view of the urgency of our business and the amplitude of the after atonement. We did not think of eating, we had no time for devotions, and such momentary halts as were permitted were wholly out of consideration for the labouring horses.

By noon on the third day we entered upon a high plateau of tableland,

And the had proude shock himself, cassed his head pr

Though there was no path save such as could be picked among broken rational down breathless steeps, the progress was swift, for Bedouin horses leap and dodge and climb with the agility of goats. In trying moments when we three strangers were demonstrative from fear of our necks we were admonished to silence with the butt end of a spear, and so learned to hold our peace and look death in the face.

By nightfall, after a ride that recklessly tore and joited the soundest joints and bones, we emerged from the range on a level dip on one of the spurs overlooking the plain to the west. Here we halted for supper, which was stealthly prepared and silently eaten; for the need of concealment had come. As soon as the meal was over, Suleiman and Abd el Mahsin held a brief but animated consultation, the result of which was an immediate order to mount and march. By daybreak we were at the mount of steep.

The east was blazing in all the glory of crimson and gold, when someone prodded me vigorously in the ribs, and I leaped up to find the company tightening girths for the road. Tabal, who insisted on being at once brother and servant to me, had my mare ready by my side. I had just time to take the

and kicking open a stove that smoulder-ed in a corner, lighted it. Another and another followed suit, till twenty brands were shedding a red glare on the ghastly scene. In a swift glance we reckoned the multitude of demons against us; then, clustering once more about Studiesen, was recorded a rotation. about Suleiman, we reaped a path in-ward till we came to a battered stairward till we came to a battered staircase. Somewhere at the top of it were the secret apartments in which Amood Sinn's most precious possessions were kept, and we made haste to ascend, stabbing and tearing down all that blocked or barred the way. It would have saved much life and considerable trouble had the several bands agreed to combine and distribute the booty share and share alike. But no man thought of that, and probably would not have entertained the idea had it occurred to him.

For why? Because the good old rule Sufficeth them; the simple plan, That they should take who have the And they should keep who can.

So every-ruffish did that which promised the best and speediest return to himself.

We gained the top with the loss of only one man, who went down clutching his slaver and bellowing frightfully. Remarking that, everything considered, we had done very well, Suleiman paused a moment, trying to decide which way to turn. Labyrinths of passages ran like an intricate network in all directions. Anyone of them might be right, but the probability was that most of them probability was that most of them were wrong, and it was important to make the proper choice. As we were debating in our own minds which cor-ridor to take, and with the aid of our weapons endeavouring to maintain our fcoting, Suleiman caught a man who seemed to be a panel in the wall. The smext instant there was a crash of splintering wood and rending iron, and through the broken door came a gush of varm perfume. "The houris, my dove," said Suleiman. "The houris, The men at his back, shouting, wildly strained for paradise, all except the guide, who groaned dismally as if he were on the brink of the pit.

Surging forward, we entered a narrow passage heavy with incense and darkened by massy curtains. Then, bursting another door, we came to a tapestried chamber. Suleiman growled at flidding it empty and was turning to have satisfaction out of Baruk when a chorus of screams came ringing out of the remote darkness beyond. Baruk was let alone. There was fun ahead that prohibited dallying.
