BOOT AND SHOE FACTORIES, QUEBEC

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. How many boot and shoe factories were there in the province of Quebec, in the years 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923 and 1924?

2. How many of the said factories were there in the district of Quebec during the above mentioned years?

3. How many, in the district of Quebec, failed during above mentioned years, and what were the liabilities of each respectively?

4. How many boot and shoe factories, in the district of Quebec, closed their doors and ceased to carry on business during the years 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923 and 1924?

5. How many people were employed by said factories at the time of these failures?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. In 1920, 93 establishments; in 1921, 98; in 1922, 100; in 1923, 101. Information for 1924 not yet available.

2. In 1920 there were 36 establishments in the district of Quebec; in 1921, 37; in 1922, 37; in 1923, 35. The district of Quebec includes Quebec city, Ancienne Lorette, Indian Lorette and Loretteville.

3. No information regarding failures.

4. Two establishments in the district of Quebec ceased operations in 1920; 2 in 1921; 4 in 1922; and 2 in 1923.

5. There were 38 persons employed in the establishments which ceased operations in 1922. Similar information cannot be given for 1920, 1921 or 1923 as there were less than three establishments which ceased operations in each of those years.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

In view of the special committee's report re old age pensions, is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation this session granting these pensions, or what will be done in the matter?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter is under consideration.

GRAVES OF CANADIAN SOLDIERS IN FRANCE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the action of the French government in proposing to remove the bodies of two hundred Canadian soldiers buried in the Canadian cemetery at Lieven, near Loos, in France?

2. Is this action not in direct violation of the agreement in existence that no cemetery containing more than forty bodies will be moved, as this cemetery was carefully selected, and what action has been taken by the Government, or the Canadian and British War Graves Commission, to regulate these matters?

3. Has the Canadian government any check in the matter, and are they aware of these removals before they take place, and is the Canadian government consulted in the matter, and what action has or will be taken?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD:

1. It is presumed that the question refers to Corkscrew British cemetery which contains the graves of some 200 soldiers of whom however only 36 are Canadians.

2. The government is unaware of any such agreement. The permanent establishment of cemeteries is subject to the French law of hygiene and the consent of communal authorities. There has however always been an understanding that cemeteries containing less than forty bodies must be moved.

3. Under agreements with the French and Belgian governments the Imperial War Graves Commission, on which Canada has her own representative, is qualified to act in these matters. Very few removals have been necessary and these have been made only in cases in which the sites for uncontrollable reasons have become definitely unsuitable. In the case in question it is understood that the burials were originally made among the coal mines and that the site is surrounded by railway lines. It became apparent that the graves could not be preserved in proper permanent honour in the original situation. The French authorities have insisted on removal and have refused in this instance to give to the commission a perpetual concession of the site. The new location is in Loos British cemetery which is being made into a very beautiful cemetery where the bodies will rest in peaceful and dignified surroundings. Notification of such removals is given by the commission to relatives direct.

PUBLIC SERVICE EXAMINATIONS

Mr. DOUCET:

1. Have examinations taken place since May 1, 1924, for the following positions: (a) Inspector of Penitentiaries; (b) Immigration Agents

2. If so, what are the names of those who obtained positions by virtue of said examinations and do they speak the two official languages?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. (a) Yes.

(b) No. Examinations have been held since May 1, 1924, for Emigration Agents, Grades 1 and 2, in;

1. Great Britain, Ireland and United States.
2. New England States.
3. Hamburg, Germany.

2. (a) Lt. Col. Eric MacDonald. Speaks English only.

(b) I. Appointments have not yet been made to positions in Great Britain, Ireland and United States.

II. Emigration Agents, Grade 2, New England States were G. J. Charette, J. B. Riordon, and L. A. Delorme, all of whom speak the two official languages.

III. No successful candidate was obtained in the Hamburg competition.

EXPORTATION OF CANADIAN GRAINS

Mr. CLARK:

1. What percentage of the total production of Canadian wheat was exported for each year during the past five years

2. What percentage of the total Canadian production of Canadian wheat flour was exported during each year of the past five years?

3. What percentage of the total Canadian production of oats and barley was exported during each of the past five years?

4. What percentage of the total Canadian production of barley was exported during each of the past five years?

5. What percentage of the total Canadian production of rye was exported during each of the past five years?

6. What percentage of the total Canadian production of corn was exported during each of the past five years?

7. What percentage of the total Canadian production of flax was exported during each of the past five years?

8. What percentage of the total Canadian production of buckwheat was exported during each of the past five years?

9. What was the value of the total production of agricultural products in Canada for each of the past five years and what percentage of this total was exported?

10. What quantity of Canadian wheat has been shipped to the United States, in bond, for milling purposes, to be re-exported by U.S. mills during each of the past five years.

11. What quantity of Canadian wheat has been shipped to the United States, in bond, for export through U.S. ports during each of the past five years?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce):

DUMPING DUTY ON FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

Mr. STIRLING:

1. What amount of money was collected from brokers, wholesale fruit and vegetable jobbers or commission merchants during the calendar years 1923 and 1924 for dumping duty on fruits and vegetables?
2. What are the names and addresses of the persons or companies from whom dumping duty was collected during this period?
3. What was the date of each payment and the kind and origin of the product upon which the dumping duty was paid?
4. How many and upon what dates were claims made for the repayment of the dumping duties collected?
5. What was the amount of each claim paid?
6. What are the names of the persons or companies making the claims and what was the reason given for the claim in each case?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

Statistics of dumping duty collected are not recorded under the different items of the import classification, but only as total amount collected, there is therefore no separate departmental record showing dumping duty collected on fruits and vegetables.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SALARIES $10,000 AND OVER

Mr. DOUCET:

1. How many officials of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of a salary of $10,000 and over per annum?
2. What are their names?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: This is a question similar to others asked and which, in the interest of the Canadian National Railway Board, it would not be in the interest of the railway to make public.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Dropped.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, answered.

REQUESTS FOR COPYRIGHT LICENSES

Mr. RINFRET:

1. How many requests for license have been received by the Registrar of Copyrights, at Ottawa, for republishing Canadian works, under the provisions of the Act of 1921?
2. By whom have these requests been made, on what dates, and for what works?
3. Were the licenses granted, and to whom, and for what works?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

1. No application for licenses to re-publish works of Canadian authors under the provisions of the Copyright Act, 1921, have been received.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MR. H. H. BREWER

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Was Mr. H. H. Brewer, assistant general manager of western lines, Canadian National Railways, superannuated during the past year?
2. If so, for what reason and at what annual retirement allowance.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.
2. (a) On account of ill-health.

(b) Was granted a retiring allowance by the board of directors which, in their judgment, seemed proper.

TRANSFER OF NATURAL RESOURCES TO THE PROVINCES

Mr. CLARK:

1. Has an agreement been arrived at between the Dominion government and the province of Manitoba for the transfer by the former to the latter of certain natural resources within the boundaries of Manitoba, belonging to the Dominion of Canada?
2. Have the people of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island an interest in the natural resources referred to in paragraph one hereof, and, if so, what is the interest of each province herein?
3. Have the provinces of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island been consulted as to the terms upon which said natural resources will be transferred?
4. Has approval been received from any of the last-mentioned provinces to the terms upon which a transfer shall be made, and if so, by whom has such approval been given?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The answer to the first question is no. That, I think, will answer the other three questions.

Mr. CLARK:

1. Has an agreement been arrived at between the Dominion government and the province of Saskatchewan for the transfer by the former to the latter of certain natural resources within the boundaries of Saskatchewan, belonging to the Dominion of Canada?
2. Have the people of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island an interest in the natural resources referred to in paragraph one hereof, and, if so, what is the interest of each province herein?
3. Have the provinces of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island been consulted as to the terms upon which said natural resources will be transferred?
4. Has approval been received from any of the last-mentioned provinces to the terms upon which a transfer shall be made, and if so, by whom has such approval been given?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The answer to this question is similar to that given to the last question. To the first question the answer is no, and that will answer the other three questions.

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether the hon. member who placed this question on the order paper is present, but the answer "No", to the first question does not answer the other three.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume the other three questions have reference to an agreement having been entered into with the provinces concerned; if there has been no agreement entered into the other questions would appear to be irrelevant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The irrelevancy is not for the government to decide. It is for the member who has asked the questions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection to permitting the question to pass as an order for return. That is question 45 I understand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was referring to question 44, not to question 45. I had not time to get my eyes down to No. 45.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the same thing, only it relates to the province of Saskatchewan instead of to Manitoba.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it is just the last kind of question that should be made an order for return. Let the matter stand until the hon. member returns. The whole four questions might be allowed to stand, and perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow them to be dropped.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was trying to oblige my hon. friend by allowing the question to pass in the form of an order for a return. I still think the answer given to the first question is the correct one—that no agreement has been entered into between the Dominion and the provinces named, therefore the other questions are irrelevant. There is no objection however, to allowing the three questions, 44, 45 and 46 to stand.

Mr. CLARK:

1. Has an agreement been arrived at between the Dominion government and the province of Alberta for the transfer by the former to the latter of certain natural resources within the boundaries of Alberta, belonging to the Dominion of Canada?
2. Have the people of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island an interest in the natural resources referred to in paragraph one hereof, and, if so, what is the interest of each province therein?
3. Have the provinces of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island been consulted as to the terms upon which said natural resources will be transferred?

Questions Nos. 44, 45 and 46 stand.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—COLONIZATION DEPARTMENT

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. What was the cost of maintaining the colonization department of the Canadian National Railways in Europe in the years 1923 and 1924, respectively?
2. What was the size of the staff employed in 1923 and 1924, respectively?
3. What salary was paid to the manager of the colonization department of the Canadian National Railways in Europe in the year 1924?
4. What sum was paid to the manager as expenses, travelling and personal, in addition to this salary?
5. How many lecturers were in the employ of the Canadian National Railways in the winters of 1923 and 1924 in Great Britain, and what salaries were paid to these lecturers?
6. How many families have settled in Canada under the agreement made between the British government and the Canadian National Railways to settle British families on lands owned by the Canadian National Railways in Canada?
7. What expenses were incurred in securing the said families in Britain and settling them in Canada?
8. Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to settle any additional families under the said agreement?
9. How much money has been spent by the Canadian National Railways in connection with the scheme to settle British boys under the age of 17 in Canada?
10. How many boys have been brought to Canada by the Canadian National Railways under the said scheme?
11. How much money has the Canadian National Railways spent in Great Britain in connection with its correspondence lecture course on Canadian farming?

RESTIGOUCHE—MADAWASKA—APPOINTMENTS

Mr. JONES:

1. How many persons of the electoral district of Restigouche-Madawaska have obtained employment in the inside service of the civil service, since January 1, 1906?
2. What are their names and date of appointment?

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPHS—RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton):

1. What were the revenues from each of the following Dominion government telegraph offices, for each year, 1910 to 1924: Peace River, Waterhole, Dunvegan, Spirit, Sexsmith, Clairmont, Grande Prairie, Beaverlodge?
2. What were the expenditures in connection with each office for the years 1910 to 1924?
3. What salaries have been paid to the operators for the years 1910 to 1924?

MANUFACTURE OF BEER OR LIQUOR

Mr. FANSHER:

1. Are the licenses granted to breweries and distilleries issued annually?
2. How many brewery and distillery licenses were granted or renewed in the province of Ontario in the years 1922, 1923, 1924, and the present year to date?
3. How many of these licenses were granted or renewed without the consent of the Ontario government?

4. Are permits or licenses granted annually to persons in Ontario giving them the right to manufacture beer or liquor to be consumed in their homes?

5. If so, what was the number of such permits or licenses granted or renewed in each constituency in the province of Ontario from January 1, 1924, to December 31, 1924, and during this year to date?

6. How many ships or boats were given clearance papers for Cuba and Mexico, from ports in the province of Ontario in 1924?

7. How many of such ships carried liquor?

PASSENGER TRAFFIC BY PROVINCES

Mr. DECHENE:

1. How many passenger trains were run each week in each province during 1924?

2. What was the average number of passengers on each of these trains per province?

3. What is the average cost per passenger per train per province?

4. What is the average cost of these passenger trains per mile per province?

DOMINION LANDS—TRANSFERS TO ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Mr. CLARK:

1. Since confederation, how many acres of land belonging to the Dominion of Canada have been transferred to the province of Ontario, and on what dates were transfers made?

2. What consideration was paid by said province of Ontario for said transfers?

3. What was the cost to the Dominion of Canada of administering and developing said lands prior to the date of transfer?

4. Since confederation, how many acres of land, belonging to the Dominion of Canada, have been transferred to the province of Quebec, and on what dates were transfers made?

5. What consideration was paid by said province of Quebec for said transfers?

6. What was the cost to the Dominion of Canada of administering and developing said lands prior to the date of transfer?

7. Were the rights of the other provinces of Canada to compensation reserved when the boundaries of Ontario and Quebec were extended?

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND RUPERT'S LAND

Mr. CLARK:

1. On what date and by what authority did the Dominion of Canada acquire the Northwest Territories and Rupert's Land, and at what cost to the Dominion of Canada as a whole?

2. What has been the total cost to the Dominion of Canada as a whole in administering and developing said Northwest Territories and Rupert's Land?

3. What portion of the Northwest Territories and Rupert's Land is still owned by the Dominion of Canada?

4. What portion of the Northwest Territories retained by the Dominion of Canada lies within the confines of each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

5. What has been the total cost to the Dominion of Canada of administering and developing the last-mentioned areas?

6. What portion of the lands referred to in paragraph four have been sold or otherwise disposed of since same were acquired by the Dominion of Canada?

7. What have been the proceeds from (a) sales of said lands mentioned in paragraph four; and (b) revenue derived thereon from all other sources?

[Mr. Fansher.]

RULES OF THE HOUSE

MOTION BY MR. IRVINE FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER REVISION

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a revision of the rules is desirable, and that for this purpose a special committee should be appointed to consider and report upon such revision at this session.

He said: In rising to speak to this resolution may I assure the House that I am in agreement with what I take to be the general consensus of opinion, that in the main the rules and practices of parliament achieve the ends for which they were instituted. Coming to us as they do as the wisdom of long experience, they provide in some way or other for almost every contingency which might conceivably arise in the conduct of public business. Amongst other things they ensure a free discussion; they make for despatch and efficiency in matters of business; they ensure against snap verdicts; and in a very comprehensive way regulate the deliberations of parliament with a degree of speed, efficiency, fairness and harmony which is on the whole very satisfactory. But, in thus paying what I trust is due respect to parliamentary rules, I am not prepared to admit the improbability of improvement. By the very nature of the British constitution which we follow in our Canadian parliament, current necessities are the parents of precedents, and there are times when even parliamentary rules are more honoured in the breach than in the observance. I will give at a later stage of my argument some of these instances in which parliamentary rules seem to work against the best interests of parliament. If it be admitted that there is even a possibility of improving to any extent any rule of parliament, then I contend that the means of making such an improvement should be provided for by the appointment of a committee, such as is proposed in this resolution. In recent years the desirability of revising the rules of parliament and in even going so far as to renovate the whole machinery of government has been apparent both in Canada and Great Britain. The British government in 1917 appointed a committee under the chairmanship of Lord Haldane, which included within the scope of its reference the question of revision of parliamentary rules. It is true the inquiry undertaken by Lord Haldane's committee was very much more comprehensive than is suggested in this resolution, covering as it did the whole governmental institution in all its phases. The reference to that committee was as follows:

To inquire into the responsibilities of the various departments of central executives, and to advise in what manner the exercise and distribution by the government of its functions should be improved.

That parliamentary practice and rules were included in this reference is proved by the fact that in a section of the report of that committee under the heading of Parliamentary Control, recommendations are made regarding alterations in parliamentary practice that would provide for a larger measure of control by parliament, especially in the matter of public expenditure. Then a select committee on procedure of the House in the British parliament in its ninth annual report in 1918 recommended radical departures from present practices, especially in dealing with the estimates in committee of the Whole; but these are not the only instances where inquiries have been made with a view to revising parliamentary rules and procedure. I would draw the attention of the House to the Murray report on the reorganization of the public service of Canada which was made in 1912. This also includes a rather severe criticism of parliamentary practice in some very important particulars. Then in 1919 our Senate appointed a special committee to consider and report on the "possibility of bettering the machinery of government". The scope of that reference, it will be seen also, was very much wider than I am proposing in this resolution, but nevertheless it also includes what I am asking, namely; a consideration of the question of a revision of the rules. The committee of the Senate made use of the report of Lord Haldane's committee of the Murray report, and also made reference to the select standing committee of the British house to which I have referred, and seems to have agreed in the main that the recommendations of these bodies were desirable for Canada. I make reference, Mr. Speaker, to these investigations by committees of the British parliament and of the Canadian Senate to show that the desirability of revising the rules of parliament, is not merely a whim of my own or of some few members of the House.

Not only do these reports that I have mentioned, coming from these committees, indicate the need of modification and alteration in parliamentary practice, but they emphasize the need of improvement in matters much more fundamental. So far, all I think will be prepared to admit that no rules, whether they be parliamentary or any other kind of rules are perfect, so that I will begin by placing my request for a committee on the very lowest basis, which is this, that no rules are perfect, our parliamentary rules are not perfect, and that there is at least a possibility of improving them.

The attention which has been given to the whole question of government and parliamentary control by the aforementioned committees tends to show that a revision of the rules is advisable. I desire to point out some examples which, I hope, will appeal to all members of the House, as they are certainly familiar with the practices to which I will draw their attention. In pointing out some rules of parliament that, in my opinion, could stand revision, I do so without attempting to make any distinction whatever between rules and practices of parliament. If there exists any such distinction, I shall have to leave it to some legal mind to show where that distinction lies. So far as I am able to observe, the rules and the practices of parliament both seem to be one as regards the conduct of the House. The present practices of parliament prohibit to a very large degree parliamentary control over public expenditure. I should like, in this connection, to summarize the Murray report. It says that control of parliament over expenditure is negligible; that the theory of control is very complete, but the practice is of little value. Few, it seems to me, will assert that control of parliament over expenditure is anything more than a formality. It is not a real control. We have, of course, full liberty to criticize expenditures, but we have no control over what they shall be. Mr. Lloyd George, on this question, has something to say which I think is worth quoting. Speaking in the British House of Commons, he says:

I do not think the present methods of parliamentary control are efficient, but that is not a change which has come about through the new administration. I have always thought that the methods of parliamentary control, and I speak here as a fairly old parliamentarian, rather tended to give undue prominence to trivialities—my right hon. friend and I have talked over this matter many a time—and on the other hand that it rather tended to minimise and ignore realities. Whether you can improve upon that I personally have never had any doubt, but I have always thought—I do not know whether I carry anyone with me on this except my hon. friend who sits there—that the French system was a more effective one—the system whereby ministers have to appear before parliamentary committees.

A select committee of the British House framed a questionnaire which they sent out to the leading minds of the nation and they received a reply which would seem to bear out the view of Mr. Lloyd George which I have just quoted. I quote now from the report of that committee:

The replies show, with few exceptions, a consensus of opinion that the present system of parliamentary control over expenditure is inadequate. In that view we concur. Indeed our terms of reference themselves, inviting proposals to render control more effective, indicate that the House is not satisfied with the existing procedure.

How, then, does the present practice in our own parliament affect control of parliament over public expenditure? This brings me to one of the examples of parliamentary practice which I regard as capable of amendment which I want to place before the House. It is a well known practice in this parliament that private members cannot move an increase to an estimate. That is so well established that I need only mention it. Not only can a private member not move an increase to an estimate, but he is not permitted to introduce for discussion a question which involves expenditure. On that matter, I have a rather interesting correspondence between the Clerk of the British House and the Clerk of the Legislature of Manitoba. It appears that there had been some dispute in the Manitoba legislature over this very question. I think, perhaps, I had better read the main parts of the correspondence which passed between the Clerk of the Manitoba Legislature, and the Clerks of the British and Canadian Houses so as to make the point quite clear to the House. This letter was written by the Clerk of the Legislative Assembly, and a copy of it was sent to the Speaker of this House and another copy to the Speaker of the British parliament. The letter reads:

A decision by the Hon. Mr. J. B. Baird, Speaker in this legislature, has been under a good deal of discussion. The matter has now been disposed of, but I have Mr. Speaker's approval of my referring the matter to you with the request that you could look it over and be good enough to inform me whether or not in your opinion his decision was in accordance with British parliamentary practice.

The circumstances are these: A special committee had been appointed by the House to inquire into and report upon conditions relating to unemployment. The committee brought in a report which is contained at length on page 2 of Votes and Proceedings No. 18, following which is Mr. Speaker's decision and a division of the House upon it.

Subsequently a motion was made that the Speaker's decision and the division sustaining his ruling be expunged from the Journals as contrary to parliamentary practice and this was done. At the time Mr. Speaker made same remarks at length on pages 3 to 7 Votes and Proceedings No. 23.

I would appreciate it if you could spare the time to give me your views on these and as to whether Mr. Speaker's decision is in accordance with the practice in the British Commons.

The reply from the Clerk of this House, at that time Mr. Northrup, was very brief, and the purport of that reply will be gathered from the following sentence:

Unless you by your legislation have altered the procedure the ruling was unimpeachable.

Turning to the reply which came from the Clerk of the House of Commons of Great Britain, I shall have to quote it a little more fully because he goes into the matter very carefully. He said:

[Mr. Irvine.]

In connection with this principle perhaps I may direct your attention to the account given in May's Parliamentary Practice 9th edition page 652 of the petition of Messrs. Fourdrinier. The passage is as follows:

Reports recommended by the Crown

"So strictly has this principle been enforced, that the House has even refused to receive a report from a select committee, suggesting an advance of money, because it had not been recommended by the Crown. On the 15th June 1837, notice was taken that a report on the petition of Messrs. Fourdrinier 'contained a recommendation for public compensation for losses incurred by the patentees, and that the same has not been recommended by the Crown' and the report was recommitted in order to remove this informality. Such an objection to a report would seem to have been premature, as no motion had been founded upon it, and none could have been made unless recommended by the Crown: but it proceeded upon the same principle as that observed in regard to petitions, and is a good example of the strictness with which the rule has been enforced. In several cases, committees have escaped from an infringement of the rule, by a more guarded phraseology; and of late years, a less strict interpretation of the rule has prevailed."

I have quoted this passage at length as the case referred to would seem to support the view taken by Mr. Speaker Baird, but the comments of Sir T. Erskine May show that a less strict rule obtained even in his day.

The select committee on East Indian Finance in 1873 made a recommendation to the House that a sum of £10,000 should be devoted to the payment of the expenses of native witnesses to be called before them, while the committee on House of Commons Ventilation also advocated specific expenditure. The present practice is stated in May 12th edition page 437 as follows:

Select committees are able to consider and to report to the House resolutions recommending an outlay of public money for the purposes therein specified, without the previous signification of the royal recommendation, because such a resolution is classed among those abstract resolutions by the House in favour of public expenditure, which are in the nature of suggestions, and are not in themselves binding upon the action of the House.

These cases would appear to me to show that Mr. Speaker Baird's ruling would not be supported by recent practice in the House of Commons. Considerable latitude is allowed in motions advocating expenditure. The opinion of the House as to the payment of members was taken in 1911 upon a motion declaring the expediency of the payment of a salary of £400 a year to members. This motion was made without the royal recommendation and, when it had been carried, an estimate was presented and a vote agreed to in committee of supply to give effect to it.

The terms of reference to the Select Committee on "Luxury Duty" in session 1918 show how far the House of Commons has been prepared to go in relegating questions of finance to a select committee.

The correspondence which I have just quoted establishes the fact that private members have no power even so much as to move a motion looking to the expenditure of public moneys, but it also indicates that there has been a growing tendency to get away from that restriction. And the fact is that at the present time in the British House of Com- will no doubt appreciate that the committee of the whole as a strictly business institution affords great room for improvement. I see that there is a question on the order paper dealing specifically with the manner in which estimates are dealt with in this parliament. mons committees are permitted to make recommendations involving financial outlay. The next fact that interferes with the control of parliament over public expenditures is the feeling on the part of the ordinary member that he is not free to move even a reduction of expenditure for the simple reason that such a motion, according to our tradition, is or may be taken by the government as a vote of censure, which might lead even to their resignation and the plunging of the country into a general election. With such momentous results hanging over the head of the private member he is very reluctant indeed to move any reduction unless he happens to be sitting on the opposite side where he wants to make use of such a motion for purposes of propaganda. But certainly if he did move such a motion there is really no likelihood that private members on the government side would hasten to support it, no matter how much they might agree with the policy behind the motion and with the necessity for the reduction in the case concerned. The principle on which it is considered that the motion to reduce an estimate is tantamount to a vote of censure of the government practically renders parliamentary control over public expenditures a farce. To substantiate this I should like to quote from a report of Lord Haldane. What he says will I think bear out the statement I have just made. I submit the following to the consideration of the House:

> But a so-called committee of 670 members cannot effectively consider the details of finance. The time at its disposal is closely restricted. It cannot examine witnesses. It has no information before it but the bulky volume of the estimates themselves, the answers of a minister to questions addressed to him in debate, and such facts as some private member may happen to be in a position to impart. A body so large, so limited in its time, so ill-equipped for inquiry, would be a very imperfect instrument for the control of expenditure even if the discussions in committee of supply were devoted entirely to that end. But those discussions afford the chief, sometimes the only, opportunity in the course of the year for the debate of grievances and of many questions of policy. In the competition for time, those matters, of greater interest and often of greater importance, usually take precedence, and questions of finance are crowded out. And even if all these obstacles are overcome and some rare occasion arises on which the House of Commons discovers and debates a case where a reduction in an estimate appears desirable, and would be disposed to insist upon its view, the present practice, which regards almost every vote of the House as a vote, not only on the merits of the question but for or against the government of the day, renders independence of action impossible.

Let me now refer to the practice of bringing the estimates before a committee of the Whole, which I regard as another instance that affords some opportunity for a desirable change. I do not think it is necessary for me to labour the point at all; hon. members I do not wish to anticipate that resolution, and I am not going to do so; I merely refer to the point at this stage as an instance in which I think it would be of great practical value to bring about some change in the procedure. I suppose there are some business men in this House; I do not profess myself to be a business man or to know very much about business. I do profess, however, to know a little about organization for efficient work, and I question whether any business man in this House would recommend that his own business be conducted in the way we try to do public business here.

As was pointed out by Lord Haldane, it is almost absurd to think of doing public business efficiently in committee of the Whole; it is inefficient by the very nature of the situation. Adequate information on any item could scarcely be expected, and the minister is almost worked to death in trying to answer the questions put to him, many of which no doubt are frequently removed from the item under discussion and are asked chiefly for purposes of political propaganda. In my opinion to bring the estimates before a committee of the whole is not only an inefficient but a useless procedure and a great waste of time. I may be asked: "What would you suggest; have you some panacea to offer for this grievance?" Even if I had one, Mr. Speaker, this is not the time to offer it. I am merely citing an example of a parliamentary practice which might be improved on to the advantage of the conduct of the country's business. But I would say, surely it would be a better procedure if the estimates were allocated to the various standing committees of the House; then you would get fuller information, you would be able to handle the business more efficiently, and you would save a great deal of time, for all these committees could sit concurrently. But as to the merits of that or any other suggestion that might be made at this time is not the point. What I want to make clear is that under our present practice the business of the country is not handled efficiently, and if the House agrees with me in this, I think it would surely be well to take a step towards improving the present practice by adopting this resolution and appointing a special committee to consider and report upon the advisability of a revision of the rules.

I might refer to one or two other rules which do not meet present day conditions. It is well known that only one amendment can be moved to the budget. Hon. members will recall that last session a good deal of consternation was caused when the leader of the Labour party (Mr. Woodsworth) forestalled the leader of the official opposition and moved an amendment to the budget—the only amendment that could be moved. Without debating the advantages which might accrue from a change in that respect, I draw the practice to the attention of the House in the hope that this is another instance where hon. members will agree that a revision might well take place. Surely it will be agreed that the Progressive party, the Labour or any other group has just as good a right as the official opposition to move such an amendment; and I think it will be also generally agreed that the present rule in limiting the amendment in this instance to the official opposition, forbids the fullest expression of opinion.

Then let me take one other illustration, the appointment of committees by the government. The government is always careful to have a large majority of its own supporters on each committee. This practice, of course, arises out of the two-party system, but in my opinion it might very well be dropped. Surely it might be better for the government to leave such committees more or less free from domination, and by so doing it is possible that ideas more favourable to a higher type of legislation might at least be reflected in the recommendations of these committees, even if such recommendations should be killed later by the government party on the floor of the House.

I think I have perhaps drawn the attention of the House to a sufficient number of cases to show the advisability of appointing a committee to inquire into the whole question of the revision of the rules, and I hope that what I have presented in support of my resolution will indicate the nature of the inquiry which I propose. If the House is of the opinion that no change is desirable or possible, then my speech will be at least a protest against its judgment. If, however, it agrees that improvements may be effected in some of our parliamentary practices, this resolution should be adopted and the committee asked for forthwith appointed. Such a committee might not bring immediate results, but by taking this step we would be at least ready to move forward when the proper time came, for the House would be in possession of all the information necessary to deal intelligently with the subject. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that my views will be favourably received by hon. members. No harm can possibly come by a committee of this House going into the question of a revision of the rules. If such a committee should find there is no basis for any alteration, that there is no room for improvement, no harm would be done by the information being placed before the House. I hope, therefore, that this resolution will be adopted and the committee asked for appointed at this session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has no objection whatever to a committee being appointed to consider a revision of the rules if there appears to be substantial grounds for taking such a step; thus far we have had only the views of my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) in support of the motion. It would, I think be inadvisable to reach a hasty decision at any rate at this stage of the debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the government satisfied with the rules as they are?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government feels there is room for revision, but it also feels that the time of the House is precious, and that the appointment of additional committees just for the sake of revision, be it revision of the rules or revision of anything else, is not a wholly wise procedure. If members of the House generally feel there are strong reasons for a committee to consider a revision of the rules, the government will not oppose such a committee, we are hoping, however, this session to avoid as far as possible any unnecessary extension or duplication of work.

Mr. BUREAU: The rules are not the rules of the government, but the rules of the House.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I gladly accept the invitation of the Prime Minister to express my views on this question. Ever since I came here I have had a growing conviction that our procedure makes for inefficiency and waste of time in several fairly important respects. I do believe, of course as the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) has so well said, that most of our rules, having been based on long experience, are most excellent; that the worthy objects of freedom of speech, the saving of time, and the prevention of surprises and snap verdicts are very well provided for in the rules as at present existing; but I should like to submit very emphatically to the House that these rules have been built up when conditions were very different from what they are to-day, and very different from what they are likely to be in the near future. We ought to adapt our machinery to existing conditions, and not to conditions that have passed, and the time has arrived now, I think, when a revision of the rules, or at least some of the rules, ought to be undertaken.

Reference has been made to several matters which, in my opinion, are worthy of serious consideration, and I sincerely hope that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) will join with those of us who are in favour of the resolution in order that he may be prevented in the future from being caught as he was last year. I think we ought to provide the greatest liberty to all the various groups in this House for the expression of their opinions.

There is another reason why the resolution ought to pass, and I wish to bring that before the House very briefly. There are three resolutions on the order paper which refer either to the work of committees in general, or to the rules of the House. They are No. 2, No. 6, and No. 14. No. 2 is as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, one full day a week for the whole session should be set aside for private members, on which day notices of motion shall have precedence over other business.

This is a motion which will probably be debated shortly in this House, and it occurs to me that after a preliminary debate here, the subject matter of it might very fittingly be referred to the same committee which, if it is appointed will be charged with the revision of the rules.

No. 6, standing in the name of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), refers to the consideration of the estimates, already referred to by the mover of the resolution before us. This is also a matter of a very similar character and might be more particularly inquired into by the special committee which is being asked for.

No. 14, standing in my name, refers to the size of committees. I have been collecting some information on this point which in due course I propose to submit to the House, and in that case too it seems to me that after a preliminary discussion here the best plan would be to submit the matter to a committee for further investigation.

There are, then, at least three resolutions already on the order paper, in addition to the one now being debated, which might very properly be turned over, after a preliminary discussion in this House, to committees. It would seem to me, then, entirely the part of wisdom that in view of these four different resolutions, which might be all solved in the same way, the government and the official opposition ought to agree with us to have this committee appointed. Let us not be afraid of undertaking a little extra work. Nothing will be done worth while unless we are prepared to do some work and to put in some time here. It may be very nice for us to come down here and sit for a short time and get home again as quickly as we can, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the country is going to suffer if that is to be the attitude of hon. members. In that connection I heard a little story the other day which might be worth repeating to the House. I hope it will not give offence to any hon. member. It is the story of a couple, I do not know just where they lived but at all events they were Canadians, and were notorious for their idleness. A friend asked Joe one day how he and his wife managed to put in the time. "Well," he said "sometimes we sits and thinks; sometimes we just sits." I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we shall not be guilty of the last practice in this House.

The Prime Minister has already intimated that the government has no objection provided there is a reasonable demand from this House for the appointment of a committee. I have submitted to the House that there are three other resolutions which, after a preliminary discussion in this House, which will come I dare say in the near future, might be very properly turned over for further inquiry to that same committee. It seems to me, then, that there is every reason why this demand should be acceded to and why the resolution should be passed, and no good reason that has been advanced, at all events so far why the request should not be granted; and I hope that in further response to the Prime Minister's invitation a number of members in various parts of the House will express their views.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I notice that we have 120 rules in this House, and that the British parliament gets along with 95 rules. I think it is just as well that we do not have too many rules, or rules too binding. That may enable us at times to get over difficulties in regard to procedure. I would not be in favour of having rules invariably strict and binding covering all the proceedings that take place in this House, because that might hamper freedom of speech, and restrain members from taking action that would really be in the interest of the whole country. We want to have the rules of the House broad enough and wide enough to make for the efficient conduct of our business, rather than to restrict the members to rigid rules. While it is no doubt absolutely necessary that we should have rules to guide our procedure in this House, it is undoubtedly true that the rules have a sort of stifling effect upon new members and often prevent them taking action. Many a time they might feel it in the interests of their constituents to speak, but they do not do so just because they are afraid they are not sufficiently well acquainted with the rules of the House.

Two years ago the leader of the Progressives, then the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) moved an amendment to the amendment to the budget which was ruled out of order. I think it was very desirable that such a thing should have been allowed, if it was deemed necessary to do it. The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) also referred to the methods followed in criticising the estimates. I do not know whether any rule to improve the present method can be adopted, but I am prepared to say that those now in vogue are very unsatisfactory. I cannot but feel that very often the whole procedure is something in the nature of a farce. It cannot be argued that we do criticise the estimates in any intelligent manner, and I should like to see some improvement inaugurated which would bring about better results.

There is another custom that I should like to see changed and that is the practice under which the government feels bound to look upon it as a motion of want of confidence if any recommendation they bring forward is voted down by the House. I think that practice has a stifling effect upon hon. members on their own side, and that it is possible to have a free expression of opinion, and even an untrammelled vote, without it being construed in any such manner. It is quite a common thing, even upon some very trifling matter to hear the assertion, "If this is rejected we will have to go to the country." As if going to the country were a very trifling matter. It is a serious thing.

Mr. SHEARD: Yes, surely.

Mr. FORKE: I am not at all afraid of any such appeal. I want to tell my hon. friends who are interjecting irrelevant remarks that I am quite ready to go to the country at any time.

Mr. HOCKEN: How would June suit you?

Mr. FORKE: Any time will suit me. Whenever the government is ready I am sure I am equally prepared, so there need be no trouble in that respect; in fact I should like to know as soon as possible what the circumstances are going to be. There need be no compulsion about going to the country as far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. HOCKEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member says "hear, hear." Probably he feels just as independent and just as happy as I do?

Mr. HOCKEN: Just a little more so.

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. FORKE: In regard to the question of a majority in the different committees the present system might be justified when there were only two parties in the House. But I am perfectly confident that in the future there are going to be more than two parties—there will be three parties, and perhaps more. I think it is rather too much that the government should have a majority on all the different committees of the House. I think there would be a greater likelihood of obtaining an unprejudiced opinion, one of more benefit to the country, if the different parties in the House were more equally represented in the different committees. I am not going to take up any more time, I merely say that I am prepared to support the resolution of the hon. member for East Calgary.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) appears to have overlooked the fact that I also had a resolution on the order paper dealing with the orders. It is No. 22.

Mr. GOOD: I beg your pardon.

Mr. NEILL: It differs in some respects from the present resolution, but possibly it might be combined with that of my hon. friend (Mr. Irvine). The difference consists in this; that while my hon. friend's resolution seeks to refer the matter to a special committee, I am proposing to have a reference to the select committee on Standing Orders. That is the committee, I understand, that is presided over by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin). We all know that hon. gentleman's thorough grasp of the rules of the House, and it seems unnecessary that another committee should be appointed. There are plenty of committees already, and the hon. member for Shefford very efficiently presides over the select standing committee which now is the body appointed to deal with such matters.

My resolution deals with the proposed changes in an entirely different aspect from that of the present motion. I do not ask for, nor do I approve of, what I might call the fundamental changes that he suggests; for example, in proposing to allow hon. members in committee of the Whole to move for the increase of a vote. That would produce chaos more or less; it would lead to what is called log-rolling. A section on one side of the House would agree with another section, perhaps on the government side, for an increase of a certain vote. The man on the government side of the House dare not vote against a motion in the interest of his own constituency perhaps, and yet he might be acting contrary to the settled policy of the government. Whatever administration is in power ought to be in control of the finances of the country; otherwise it would practically be impossible to carry on the government. I think it would be a great mistake to do away with that provision.

The hon. member also spoke about the impossibility of having a resolution of a certain character presented because it would be out of order, inasmuch as it would pledge the government to expenditure of public money. That also, of course, is objectionable for the reason that I have already given. Under the change proposed we should find members of the House who bear no responsibility for Canada's finances, voting for untold expenditures. Besides, the difficulty complained of is not so serious as it would appear to be because it can easily be overcome by asking the government to inquire into or take note of a particular situation. So that there is no hindrance in any sense to a full debate in the House on any given subject.

Another suggestion of the hon. member was that we should do away with the government majority on committees. Well, I do not think the leader of the opposition, or any hon. member who has had any experience in the cabinet, would agree to a suggestion of that kind. A government must have some measure of control over a committee corresponding with the control which it exercises in the House.

Now, turning to my own resolution I propose to deal primarily with three separate conditions, although I have also embodied a general clause. The first one governs the rule under which these regulations are formed and presented. I sent this resolution in to the Clerk early in October, and yet it bears the number 22. I have another one that I sent in in December, and possibly it may never be reached. I quite understand that the Clerk must maintain some order of precedence, and he takes the notices of motion in the order in which he receives them. I do not quarrel with that either; there must be some way of establishing precedence in placing the notices of motion on the order paper. But what I sought to change was the method by which past governments, or the government of the day, arbitrarily say in the House "There will be no more private members' days", which kills all the resolutions then on the order paper. I do not think that is a fair or desirable position. What I suggest as a substitute is of a two-fold character. We know that many of these resolutions are put on the order paper more or less as an expression of opinion, and really are not intended to be taken up. We can easily conceive of a case in which the government itself might have a notice of motion put on the order paper dealing with a matter which they did not want discussed and by the compliance of the member in whose name notice was given it would be passed on every occasion when it was called. In this way it would be possible to prevent that subject being discussed in the House. There is something wrong with rules which make that possible. I do not say this is being invoked to-day by the present government, but it is possible to do it. Now, my suggestion is that the resolutions should be placed on the order paper as they are at present, but that when a motion is called and the member in whose name it stands is not prepared to go on with them, the motion should be dropped from the order paper. That does no injustice to the member concerned; he can give two days' notice and the resolution is restored to the order paper again but at the foot of the list. But it does ensure that a member who puts a resolution on the order paper in a bona fide manner and with the desire to go on with it will have some chance to proceed. Last year I had a resolution on the order paper but it was never reached because batches of these resolutions were called again and again, in some cases as many as six times, and the hon. members in charge of them did not take them up. Then, along about the time when he saw his opportunity was lapsing a member would get up and speak. My suggestion would be that if a member was not prepared to go on with a motion he has given notice of from two to three months, and even as long as four and five months beforehand, he cannot very well complain if his motion is dropped and he has to begin all over again. That would ensure whatever member was ready at least a decent chance to present his resolution. The suggestion I was going to make in that regard is this: Instead of saying that on a certain date all members' days would be cut off I would have it provided that, one month, if you like, or two months, after the opening of the session, no more notices of motion should be accepted. We should then know what to expect; but the motions that were then on the order paper would be afforded one opportunity at least of being dealt with. That would ensure that every motion could be heard; and yet it would not prolong to an extreme degree the period within which those motions could be discussed. I merely throw this out as a suggestion to be discussed by the committee.

I wanted to call attention to the necessity for the other change which is set out in my resolution:

2. Consider the advisability of changing the rules of the House to permit of debate on a motion to accept or reject an amendment made by the Senate to a Bill passed by the House.

I am aware—at least I am informed—that debate is allowed on a question of that kind provided it is what is called an order of the day; that is to say, if a day has elapsed between the time the message has been received from the Senate and the time when it is discussed in this House, then it becomes an order of the day and can be debated by any hon. member. But we well know that the most of these amendments made or rejected by the Senate come into this House in the very closing days of the session, when all rules are practically suspended, and nine times out of ten they never become an order of the day. I have a distinct recollection of a case a couple of years ago when a most important bill dealt with by the House and of great interest to many hon. members was rejected either in whole or in part by the Senate, and it was brought down not as an order of the day but simply as a message, and the minister in charge had the alternative of moving the acceptance or rejection of the amendment, and his speech was the only one allowed; the matter was not open to debate. I think that practice should be changed.

Those are practically all the precise amendments I propose, but I have a clause in my motion which would allow any question in connection with these subjects to be considered. If the government would allow the amalgamation of the resolution of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) with my motion it might be a settlement of the whole question. Perhaps the hon. member for East Calgary would agree to the matter being referred to the select committee on Standing Orders instead of a special committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Possibly the views of all hon. members would be satisfactorily met if the government were agreeable to the appointment of a special committee, associating with the work of that committee his Honour the Speaker of the House. If hon. members are prepared to accept the following amendment, I would be prepared to move:

That the said resolution be amended by striking out the words "a revision of the rules is desirable, and that for this purpose", in line two, and substituting for the words "and report upon such revision at this session" in lines three and four, the words "jointly with Mr. Speaker the desirability of revising the rules of this House and to report to this House this session".

[Mr. ...]

Then the motion would read:

That in the opinion of this House a special committee should be appointed to consider jointly with Mr. Speaker the desirability of revising the rules of this House and to report to this House this session.

It would seem to be appropriate that Mr. Speaker should be a member of any committee that is called upon to consider a revision of the rules.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): It seems rather anomalous that a motion to amend the rules should be moved by an hon. member who in moving it is out of order in violating the rules as they exist. I may take occasion to offer a few remarks on the rules as they are, and on some of the observations that the mover of the main resolution has made, as well as on some observations made by other hon. members.

The last revision of the rules of parliament took place in 1910. I believe that revision was made by a special committee acting with the Speaker of the House of that time. There was a subsequent change of the rules in 1913, but that change was specific and did not involve any general revision. The rules therefore as they stand in substance are of fifteen years' duration, and it would be indeed surprising if in that period of time there were no way in which they could be improved. I am not one of those who feel that our rules are fundamentally wrong or that there is any grave injustice liable to be done to any section of this House on account of any of the main rules, or indeed minor ones, as they exist today. The mover of the motion bases his attack upon the existing state of affairs upon the inability of the third or fourth party in this House to move a sub-amendment in the budget debate; that is, to the motion to go into Ways and Means for the purpose of discussing the budget. This has already received some attention at the hands of parliament. Perhaps I cannot add to what I said at the time it was under discussion before, but I must say, as representing one of the three major parties here, that I have never felt in any discussion disability because of the rule as it exists, and I would deprecate a change in this respect; because a change allowing a second motion on an amendment to Supply, or Ways and Means, will undoubtedly lengthen the session of parliament and cause a loss of time. I do not know really what is going to be gained. It is true that in that special debate the exact position of each of three or four parties cannot be stated in the form of an amendment, only the position of two, the mover of the motion —that is the Finance minister—and whichever party chooses or has the opportunity to advance its amendment. I presume it would probably be the decision of Mr. Speaker that if the official opposition choose to avail itself of the occasion, it alone should have that privilege. I think only on one occasion in the three years that now have elapsed since this government came into power has the official opposition chosen to avail itself of the occasion. This has meant that other parties have exercised the right. Now last year, when the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) chose to move an amendment, I was favoured with a great deal of sympathy from the press of the country in having been out-manoeuvred by one of the newer members of the House. But I must frankly say that I felt myself wholly unworthy of that sympathy, and that it was unnecessary. There are numerous appropriate occasions when the position of any party in this House on the budget or on any other subject can be stated in the form of a resolution or amendment. The House goes into committee of Supply scores of times each session and on each motion for Supply it is open to any member representing a party, or any member representing only himself, to move such an amendment as he may choose; consequently there is really no disability. There is nothing gained by having them all on the one motion; they can come again. But the opportunities for delay are multiplied if amendments, sub-amendments, substitutional motions, and so forth, are allowed upon a motion for Supply. May I add, that I do not want to take any step—I hope I will be considered as sincere, especially as I am in opposition—I do not want to take any step which gives encouragement to multiplication of groups in this House of Commons. That may be an unpopular assertion, and I will give my special reasons for saying so. I do not think the group system is consonant with the British system of parliamentary government. I know I am powerless to prevent it; I do not pretend to stand at the shore and with a wave of my hand drive back the billows; but I think my influence and that of those who have regard for our institutions should be exerted to the utmost of our power toward this end. I do not think the multiplication of groups is consonant with the British system in any country; I do not believe it has worked successfully at all in France where the British system has been copied; but of all countries in the civilized world where there is embodied in it real peril to the state, none is so conspicuous an example as this Dominion. The group system in this Dominion is almost inevitably certain to become a system of sectional representation. I do not think the liability to sectional representation runs nearly as dangerously in the direction of occupational division as in the direction of geographical division. Speaking at this time I put myself in the judgment of hon. members when I say that after the next general election, this House of Commons, in so far as it is a collection of groups, will, in the main, represent geographical divisions. Here we have a country whose portions are widely separated, consequently, the points of view of whose peoples are widely different. We have a country further separated in its sections than any other country in the world to-day, and I do not exaggerate when I say that group representation on geographical division in this House spells more than difficulty, it spells very grave danger to this Dominion. Consequently, merely to accommodate the situation and to encourage representation by groups is no argument to my mind for amending the rules in this respect.

The hon. member further urges that there should be more latitude in the way of permission to private members to move for the expenditure of money. To this I am wholly and decisively opposed. Were I in the government I certainly would have offered much stronger objection than I have so far heard from any member of this government. I do not believe the confidence of the solid people in the country can be preserved if the right of private members of committees is to be countenanced to come into parliament and put parliament in the position of voting against appropriations here and there when they know that the vote itself does not mean commitment of the government, does not mean commitment of the treasury. It is inherent in our present system of government, if it is to be a success at all, if there is to be anybody at the helm steering the ship of state, that the government and the government alone should initiate expenditure. When I say "initiate expenditure", I mean to take such a step as commits the honour of parliament to that expenditure. You cannot beat the devil around the bush by having a committee come in and declare the moral liability of the nation, to be followed by a hasty motion to accept, with the government thereby finding that parliament has given it a mandate. This simply means the undermining of governmental responsibility. If we are to amend the rules further than we have done, I am certain this is going to result in an impairment of confidence in parliament, and, indeed, in the management of our country generally. I go further. I think the rule as it exists has been interpreted too generously. In fact, I feel that the interpretation already given goes far to impair the efficacy of the rule, and that accounts for much of the difficulty into which we have been plunging; accounts, indeed, for the general losing of control of the financial policy of this House.

Another argument urged by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) is this, that there should be, on the part of the House, power to move amendments, especially in the estimates, without involving the fate of the government itself. That power exists. I do not think I differ at all from the viewpoint of the Prime Minister, if I understood correctly his utterance of some months ago, when I say that an adverse vote in committee of this House on any estimate does not involve the fate of the government. If it did, the government would not be here today. I do not find fault that the government chose to ignore the vote. It merely means this, that it put on the government—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was the vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A vote of last session. I do not recall at the moment just what it was. It put on the government the consideration of the question whether that vote properly interpreted meant a withdrawal of the confidence of the House of Commons. The government of the country alone must be the judge whether it should so interpret the vote as a want of confidence on the part of the House or as something of minor consequence. This is the function and prerogative of government, and if you attempt in any way to circumscribe it, then you withdraw from government the right to determine when, and when not, it enjoys the confidence of this House.

Mr. HOEY: That was the procedure followed by the Labour government without changing the rules.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) is quite right. In fact, the Labour government very frequently in the short course of its existence chose to ignore adverse decisions, especially on estimates, and to conclude that it still enjoyed the confidence of the House, and in the course it so pursued, I do not recall that it was subjected to criticism by either section of its opponents in the Commons in England.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend must have had the Labour government in England in mind when he referred to an adverse vote on estimates. I do not think this government was subjected to any adverse vote.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not absolutely positive that it was in estimates, it might have been on something else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should be pleased if my right hon. friend would give it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can locate it. It was last session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope he will. I do not think it occurred.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It occurred all right, and I think hon. members of the House remember it as well as I.

Now I come to the suggestion by the hon. member for East Calgary that the rules should be amended so as to provide that the government should not have a majority on all committees of this House. If I were a member of the government I would feel bound to oppose the suggestion, and consequently I could not consistently support it now. I do not want ever to be a party to the withdrawal from any administration of the measure of responsibility that an administration only can carry, and when I do not want to be a party to that, I must be a party to giving the government such rights as will enable it properly to carry that responsibility. Consequently it seems to me right and proper that any administration should have a majority on the committees of this House. What I complain of under present conditions, and I am not sure that it can be remedied, is this. Under the group system as we have it to-day the opposition not only is in a minority but it is almost extinguished in all committees of the House. There is only one opposition; hon. members to my left stand in holy horror at the mere intimation that they are an opposition of the government. So that so far from having nine-twentieths of the membership of a committee we are reduced to three-twentieths, and the government virtually has the other seventeen.

Mr. CALDWELL: What about the want of confidence motion moved by the Progressive party in 1922?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the Progressive party ever moved anything which this government would interpret as a want of confidence motion.

Mr. CALDWELL: But that motion was an amendment to the budget.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be; but even the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is authority for the statement that an amendment to the budget is not necessarily a want of confidence motion.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the right hon. gentleman include the Banking committee in that general statement he makes? Did we not find in that instance the government and the official opposition lined up against the rest of the House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I would include anything so far as the present situation in this House is concerned. Of course, it sometimes happens that when hon. members opposite me, and hon. members to my left, start out down the same path, with the same catechism and looking to the same goal, hon. members to my left, being still bereft of responsibility, pursue the path on which they set out while hon. members opposite retreat and join our ranks. That has very frequently occurred. But that does not make hon. members to my left the opposition, for they are always quite content that their cousins across the floor shall remain in power. And the last designation that could ever be applied to them would be to call them a section of the opposition. This is a disability under which we suffer by reason of a conjunction of affairs which is in no way creditable to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. FORKE: Is it the duty of an opposition always to oppose?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Always to oppose misgovernment, yes; and that is all we do. Hon. members to my left had an opportunity to become the official opposition and to choose when they would oppose, but memories of the days of old and of gallant battles together prevented their assuming any position of the kind. But what I refer to is a disability which I do not know that it is in the power of the government to cure consistently with that measure of control which appertains to and should be enjoyed by all administrations.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) takes a much more moderate stand, and in the main I agree with what he says. I do not contend that the rules are perfect in every respect, but it seems to me that there might be an amendment to ensure better expedition at times. The feature of the rules to which the hon. member refers as admitting of judicious amendment is one that might well be considered: that is to say, the presence of a motion standing in the name of a private member precludes the debate of another motion covering the same ground, and consequently it may be used, as I myself am suspicious it has been used, as a means not of ensuring but of preventing debate on that very subject. I hasten, however, to assure hon. members to my left that in respect of my resolution now on the order paper the government has not asked that it be put on to ensure that it shall not be discussed. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggests this remedy: First of all, he would prevent a private member's resolution being retained after, I think he said, two months; and secondly, he would have a resolution automatically dropped after it had been twice passed without being debated. I am not sure that either method would appeal to me as the best. The refusal of a private member to take up a resolution on the order paper does not seem to me to be necessary at any stage of the session; I think he should have the right to go on, and if he fails to do so it is his own fault and he should take the consequences of any criticism that might ensue. And the compelling of a resolution to be dropped after being called twice without response would only put the member in this position, that after two days' notice he could put the resolution on the order paper again and then assert all the autocratic power which he exercised before.

Mr. NEILL: But at the foot of the list.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, at the foot of the list, but he would have attained his end. I would suggest this as preferable, namely, that after a resolution had been called once or twice then it could be open to any member of the House, when the same motion was called again, to proceed to discuss it, whether in support or in opposition of the subject. This would prevent its acting by way of estoppel, as otherwise it would do. As respects the amendment. I have no objection to it; but it is not because I have faith in the primary and fundamental proposals of the hon. member for East Calgary that I take that position.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Anyone who takes even a casual look at the architectural structure of this chamber must conclude at once that it was dedicated to the medieval superstition of a two-party government. It is a two-party chamber, and the conception underlying its arrangement arises out of that idea, an idea that dates back to the time when the two parties composing parliament were so destructive to each other's policies and so bitterly opposed that they actually had to have a club lying on the table to keep anything like peace between them. And not only the architecture of the chamber, but the arrangement of its furniture as well, points to the same fact. I think it is a mistake that the arrangements of this House should condemn the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition to the uncongenial task of looking each other in the face all the time. It seems to me that for the expeditious passage of business through the House it would be more reasonable for the Prime Minister and his colleagues to be further down the chamber. And when we come to the rules and practices, and the traditions of the House, some improvement might also be effected. But the really serious thing about parliamentary practices such as those with which we are encumbered is that they defeat the very purpose of parliament, namely, the transaction of public business in the interests of the people. We are the representatives of the people here and our business is to transact the public business in the interests of those people, and it would seem to me that the rules of the House are not conceived at all with that end in view. In fact, if I rightly judge the procedure of the House, the rules are meant to foster a procedure which in its working out obstructs public business instead of advancing it. In the passing of the estimates so far this session we have had examples of that. No impartial observer could honestly say that the passing of supply so far has redounded to the credit of the rules and practices of this House. There has been a lot of time wasted already by frivolous questions put to the minister, not with the object of eliciting information regarding his department, but obviously in an attempt to hamper him. The passing of Supply is one of the principal reasons for our being here—to superintend the expenditure of the people's money; and any change in the rules that will make our superintendence more thorough is, I think, greatly to be desired, therefore to my mind the resolution of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) is a timely one.

It seems to me that the objections raised against it are all based upon the assumption that we are destined for all time to be pinned down to a two-party system. Even the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) appears to desire—almost unbecomingly as an independent—to bolster up that system. I do not propose to pay unreasoning deference to the two-party system, notwithstanding the view of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). He reminds me somewhat of a certain lady with a broom, when he says that he is going to stand against the emergence of the group system. I think that is a rash challenge. After all, what does the group system signify? It signifies the futility of the system that preceded it. It means that the system which has obtained hitherto has been ineffectual in giving expression to the will of the people. Apparently there are a good many hon. members who do not realize that the government of this or any other country is an exceedingly more complex thing than it was when the old-party system was first started, that immensely complex character of our civilization to-day necessitates a variety of economic and political expression, and that it is certain, especially in a country like this, that we shall have in the future groups in this House. As to the prediction that the group system will lead to sectionalism, I would say that sectionalism as it obtains in Canada to-day is the fruit of the system that is being superseded. The group system has not yet been given a trial in this country. There are three groups in this House.

An hon. MEMBER: There are five.

Mr. BIRD: Well, there are numerous nascent groups as well as the actual. That is significant too, for a lot of those little buds and sprouts may eventually reach full development. But it is futile for the leader of the opposition to blame on us what is evidently the outgrowth of the effete two-party system which has been trying to run this country. He says that it is contrary to the British system. Well, so much the worse for the British system. But what is the British system? It is a conception that exists in the right hon. gentleman's mind as regards the best kind of parliamentary government which will further the peculiar political ideas for which he stands. His so-called British system has no other existence. It is purely a figment of his imagination, something that in all its traditions and rules and practices is the best fitted to bolster privilege in this country. The greatest political genius could not evolve a party system better designed to uphold special privilege in this country. I repeat, if the coming group system is contrary to the British system, then so much the worse for the British system. But it is not contrary to the true British system, because that system is born of a spirit which always proves itself capable of the fullest adaptation to the changing conditions of the people; anything that shuts its eyes to developing conditions is antiquated and is contrary to the British system. And the aspersion cast upon the group in this corner of the House that we are always kowtowing to the party opposite ranks with the assertion that the group system is contrary to the British system. Our purpose in being here is to prove that the differences and distinctions that are supposed to exist between the parties under the old system are purely make-believe, and

I think the interruption of the hon. gentleman was a timely one. You have to get back into our committee rooms to find out just where the kowtowing is done. After all, the people are not interested in knowing just how many times we vote with the party opposite or with the party on our right; but they are interested in the fidelity with which we try to carry out their will, and no matter whether in the banking or any other committee where we have been face to face with the machinations of special privilege this group has never been found wanting yet. The distinctive thing about this group is that it has stood four square many a time against special privilege in opposition to the solid support given to special privilege by the old two-party system.

Therefore I think the resolution is a timely one. The present development of our parliamentary system has been through the gradual accretion of rules and practices that had been adopted for some particular reason or another, but it is only rational to suppose that periodically this growing tree should need a certain amount of pruning in order to serve its purpose—that of facilitating the business of the people.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the rules of this House have been founded not on imagination but on practice, and have come down to us in the main from the Mother of Parliaments. It will be found that every rule, though it may not be perfect, is based on experience, and nearly every session we discover additional reasons for certain rules that we had either lost sight of or were not aware of before. So they cannot be altered lightly, and I do not think this House has any idea of altering them lightly.

My hon. friend (Mr. Bird) who has just sat down spoke of group government, in reply to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen); but I suppose the people will say whether we are to have group government or not. Personally I am in favour of the two old parties, or of two parties at all events, not the "old" ones because I think they are as young as those that are called younger; but I am in favour of two parties as the best system of government. But that is for the people to say, not for me.

Mr. FORKE: Of course, you mean your own party to be one of them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was just going to make an explanation. So far as the interests of the country are concerned the group system would not make very much difference so long as the Liberal party had a majority over the other two.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is probably one reason why you feel better about it than the leader of the opposition.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am closer to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just the same, exactly.

Mr. GRAHAM: The suggestion has been made that the Progressive party has favoured this government. Well really I do not see how they could help it, and I am in earnest in that. The progressive measures of this government, though called Liberal, are still Progressive, a great many of them, and although on occasions the Liberal government and its supporters could not see their way to go all the distance with the Progressives, sometimes perhaps only a short distance, at all events the government went further than hon. gentlemen opposite, and consequently if the Progressives voted at all they would have to support those who came nearer to their ideals. I do not see how a Progressive could go home and ask Progressive electors for their support if he had done anything else.

I just want to mention one or two other matters, and first as to sectional discussions. I agree with the leader of the opposition to a large extent that all over Canada, even among members of the two former parties there is a disposition to form ourselves into geographical units. Deputations come to the government every day from different parts of Canada, with sectional views; I am not using the word in any derogatory sense, but we seem to have got away from the idea of the old Fathers of Confederation that we are to make a great Canada of this country by, if you will, a policy of compromises, so far as that is necessary, between the different parts of this country. I think we are making a mistake; I do not say it is the Progressive party that is doing it, but day by day ministers of the crown are approached from the angle of only one part of Canada. This is right in a sense, because each part of Canada has its own difficulties and peculiar problems, but after all, the government and parliament ought to do the same thing, and that is to take into consideration all these sectional viewpoints, and then arrive as closely as possible at a common working basis for every province in the Dominion of Canada. That is the only way we can manage to make Canada great and bring prosperity again to this country, and when there is prosperity in a country, contentment follows. I do not want to go any further along that line except to relate a little incident that occurred eight or ten or eleven years ago. Three gentlemen —I think I have repeated this in the House before—were sitting in a car, one of them the late Sir Wilfrid, and each was asked to suggest what might be a difficulty in the future in Canada. Sir Wilfrid thought that the great desire of Canadians, and it was a question they would be called upon to deal with practically, ought to be to get a united people, free from prejudice one against the other, throughout the Dominion of Canada. Another suggested that our problem of the future would be our Imperial relations. I had the honour to suggest that I thought perhaps one of the things we would be called upon to discuss in a few years in a practicable way would be the differences that might arise in this Dominion between the east and the west. These are all practical questions, and we cannot approach any of them from an absolutely sectional viewpoint. If we do we are doomed for failure. I would like in the years that I have to be in public life, and they may be a great many—

Mr. BELAND: We hope so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: —I would like if we all could broaden out a bit and try and see the other fellow's viewpoint on these great national questions.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): With the government giving the lead.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is what this government is doing strongly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A lead downhill.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are trying to look at every part of Canada with a vision that will not hide the other parts of Canada. As to questions, for instance, affecting the west particularly, I believe the people of Canada will say that we have not looked on those questions with a narrow vision; and the same with the east and the same with the centre. Perhaps everybody is to blame by having a slightly sectional view, and if you will allow me to say it, I think perhaps we have been doing it in the last year or two more than ever before, that is, getting up and defending not Canada with all her works but that little part of Canada in which we live. While that is necessary, the vision will have to broaden out if we are to have a greater Canada.

Perhaps I am getting away from the rules a little. As to the responsibility of the government, I have always taken strong ground. I do not know whether I am an old Tory in doing so or not, but I have always taken strong ground on the responsibility of government, to a large extent, for what emerges from parliament. True, I would not interfere with the right of parliament to be supreme, even though a government can be put out by parliament under our constitution, which cannot be done in the United States.

The leader of the opposition has referred to committees bringing in reports. I am free to admit that we ought to be more careful with those reports.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: We get a number of men on a committee, and I put myself in with the rest, and they work on a certain question day after day and become absolutely enthusiastic over it, perhaps to the neglect of other questions, and then bring in a report which will meet the views of the men who have been pursuing this one question in which they have become enthusiastically interested. Now this House should not approve of that report without the closest scrutiny, because it might involve something that would be of detriment to the entire Dominion of Canada.

As to referring the estimates to a committee, that is a question that is debatable. You will say: You have done it yourself. Yes, we are trying an experiment, but, remember, that experiment is not with the general affairs of Canada, but concerns only two institutions, mercantile enterprises upon which Canada has entered. They are not quite in the same class with the ordinary expenditure of a government. The government has to take a stand in the House as to what will be considered a want of confidence motion. I do not say that defeat in Supply, unless it might be on a vote involved by some large question of policy on the part of the government, ought to be taken as a want of confidence vote; but if it involves defeat on a large question of policy for the government, for which we are asking money, I would say it ought to be taken as a want of confidence motion. There is this point to consider. Put a government in a position such as I have indicated, and if you were to take the view that no vote in committee or even in the House should be taken as a vote of want of confidence, unless the mover should so declare, it would be impossible for any government to carry on its business. The position of that government before the country would be so humiliating that they would have to resign. And the mere fact that a member says "I am going to move this resolution; I am sorry to put you in a predicament and humiliate you before the country but I do not mean it as a vote of want of confidence" does not relieve the situation. In the great majority of instances my own view, as the result of years of experience, is that we cannot help but regard the vote as one of want of confidence.

Now, I would suggest that one or two amendments might be made, not to the rules but to the standing orders. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) suggested the point that in committee of Supply there should be nothing placed in the way of hon. members getting all the information that is necessary. But perhaps we all overstep the mark sometimes by prolonging discussion without getting any information. I am not sure that there might be two ways of curtailing that practice. One would be to not have any Hansard at all in committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: The other would be to limit the number of speeches a member could make on any one item.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: It might be said that that would be curtailing the existing privileges, seeing that the discussion in committee is meant to be conversational rather than oratorical; but we are getting into the practice of delivering long speeches in committee of Supply without getting the information we want. That is just a thought that I throw out—that the number of times a member could speak on any given item might be limited.

Mr. MANION: Sometimes long speeches are made by the minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am coming to that. There is no special rule for the minister. I am the greatest sinner in the House in regard to lengthy speaking. I have made the longest speech that was ever delivered in the House of Commons, so I can talk freely of myself. I am not sure that the work of parliament would not be expedited if the length of our speeches even with the Speaker in the chair were limited. There is no question to my mind that if parliament were deeply interested in any question it would admit of exceptions being made to this rule unanimously. If there was some subject demanding a longer period than that named in the rules parliament is not critical to that extent, but by unanimous consent either the leader of the opposition, or the Prime Minister, or any member who had some topic that required quite a length of time to develop would get permission from parliament to speak at greater length. But this change would curtail the amount of time we use in discussing some of the minor questions at least.

I want to conclude with this other reference: I am a kind of ritualist, I would not want to get away from any of our rules lightly because there is reason for them all; and unless some good reason could be given for any deviation I believe that making as little change as possible in the general rules will conduce to our conducting business with decorum. It is true we cannot get away from the fact that conditions have changed. The rules were largely made,—some of the sections at any rate—with the idea of there being only two parties in the House. There may be some reason for having a number of minor changes because nothing develops the need for changes like experience, and experience may have shown that we ought to have some changes. I am quite willing for a special committee to look into the rules of the House and advise with Mr. Speaker to see if there be a necessity of revising the rules in some respects; but I would suggest to the committee that they do not enter upon the work of revision with any idea that they are going to tear the rules of the House all to pieces and substitute new rules, because the old ones have done splendid service. With the exception perhaps of needing some slight revision I would not like to see the principle of those rules altered very much.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not intend to delay the House more than a few minutes in replying. I think the discussion has perhaps taken a course that would have been more appropriate in a committee that had met to consider the revision of the rules but that was doubtless due to the method of presentation which I adopted. It was necessary for me to give some indication of what I understood to be the possibility of revising a rule of the House with some definiteness. I therefore presented my own ideas on those matters, but not with any hope that hon. members would agree with my particular suggestions. I only used those in the way of illustration in trying to establish the need for a special committee. Some hon. members, however, appear to have concluded that the debate is on the nature of the amendments that may be made, rather than being as it is a debate on the advisability of appointing a committee. My object in using those illustrations was merely to set forth the need for the committee.

had no intention of course of introducing that idea in proposing the argument, but I can see how it is certainly relevant to the discussion. The right hon. leader of the opposition does not believe that the group system is going to have any future, and he does not think that it ought to. I do not know, of course, that it is going to have any future or not, I hope that it will. But there is one way of getting rid of some of the groups in this House, and that is for the Conservative party to join the Labour party, or for the Liberal party to join the Progressive party.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not hear the Conservative party very loud in their expression of willingness to come over here and join the Labour party. They cannot expect that we will go over there and join the Conservative party or cross the floor and join the Liberal party, because whether we have an idea or not we think we have and that is the same thing, so far as the reason for the existence of a group is concerned. As to the sectional idea and the geographical ideas, which have been mentioned, these exist whether you have one party, two parties or one hundred parties; and I venture to say that one of the problems which the government party have to deal with at the present time, is that very sectional problem. That would be no more difficult to deal with under fifty groups than under one group. We do not create any sectionalism by merely representing it. If it were not there it could not be represented. To try and hush those things up by maintaining, through artificial means, the two-party system is not, in my opinion, the way to meet the situation.

I want to make one remark in reference to what was said by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). He very properly pointed out that there was a reason for every one of the rules of this House. I am sure I never doubted that, but it is just possible that some of the reasons which once existed for those rules are not very relevant now, and it is also just possible, as was pointed out I think by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), that some of the reasons for these rules might be very much opposed to the best interests of the people to-day. But it certainly was not my intention to give the impression that I looked upon those rules lightly, or that I had sought to slight them in any way whatsoever, nor do I look forward to any tearing up of these rules on the part of the committee which I hope will be appointed. I certainly doubt whether any committee would be prepared to go very far beyond what was suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I agree with the proposals that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni made. I would be willing to go much further myself, but I do not expect the House will accept my leadership in such a matter. If it did, it would certainly go much beyond the stage marked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I have been very much pleased with the discussion as far as it has gone. I certainly am prepared to withdraw my motion in preference to the amendment which was moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I think his amendment covers thoroughly what I was seeking to establish. Therefore, in favour of the amendment of the hon. Prime Minister, I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I desire to make a few remarks from the point of view of a young member coming into the supposedly complicated maze of parliamentary procedure, coming here as a freshman in knowledge of the procedure and in knowledge of the parliamentary difficulties which I suppose we will be confronted with. From my personal experience—and I have taken some part in the activities of parliament—I have not found that the rules fetter one's activity. I have not found that there has not been almost every opportunity offered for any proposal or any idea which I had wanted to place before parliament, or that I was confronted with any serious obstacle. I believe, however, that a committee such as outlined by the Prime Minister to look into this question and to inquire into the problems and matters which the various speakers have referred to would be advantageous to the members of the House and to the procedure in the future. But if this committee approaches its task with the idea of enabling the government and the Progressive party to carry on before the country the appearance of being opposed to each other, while at the same time they are conducting the business in the House, in the corridors of the buildings and in the policies of the government in a way which finds agreement, but which, in the idea of the party in this part of the chamber, is opposed to the proper procedure of parliament, then I would not be in favour of very serious activities on the part of the committee. In other words, it would appear from the remarks of members of the government and some of our friends to the left that the real intent behind this resolution is to enable these parties to join more closely in that matrimonial relationship which does not seem to have a legal status. When it comes to the encouragement of sectional or group representation in parliament, I would be opposed to it. I do not think that my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) can claim to be entirely a representative of labour. Over one-half of my constituency is largely labour, and I believe I have the honour of representing labour in the House of Commons and of speaking in their best interests. This idea of representing a class group in my judgment is a mistaken one. A member entering parliament has the obligational responsibility of representing all classes in his constituency, and the truth of the matter is that the two old parties are non-class, and they attempt to, and in fact do, represent their constituents as a whole, and are open in mind and conviction to the interests of all the sections of the constituency, with the idea of harmonizing these interests and expressing the will of the majority of the people in their ridings. But if this committee carry on their work in such a way as to make more easy the co-operation between the government and my friends to the left, or if they carry on their work with an idea of developing group government or sectional interests, then I say that history has proven that the policies and practices of the old party system really are the best for the advancement of our democratic institutions. There is no doubt about that. Some constitutions are made specially for group governments. Take France or the United States for example; there the constitution is framed in such a manner that members stay there for a certain length of time, and no matter how a vote goes in congress in the United States, or in the Chamber of Deputies in France, no matter whether adverse or favourable, the government continues and remains in power, subject to certain methods by which governments are changed; but they are not the same principles as we have here. In fact, in my judgment we have the most democratic method, the most efficient method of enabling the will of the majority of the people to be made effective immediately in policy and in legislation; and so I repeat, in carrying on the work of this committe so far as the rules of the House are concerned, I hope that the committee will have regard for experiences of the past, and that they will be imbued with a solemn and strong conviction to maintain the principles, the rules which we already have, and that they will not take any action which will tend to develop a group system of government.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to.

Motion as amended, agreed to.

MOUNTAIN FREIGHT SCALE

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the mountain freight scale should be abolished in so far as it is reflected in standard mileage rates, class rates and commodity rates.

He said: We have in Canada five rate territories. For the purpose of our discussion this afternoon three of them are important: that is the Atlantic territory, which includes territory from the Atlantic to as far west as Sudbury; the prairie territory which begins at and includes Port Arthur and reaches west to points just east of the Rocky mountains and the Pacific or mountain territory which commences at the western boundary of the prairie territory. The other two territories are the Superior territory and the British Columbia lakes, but these two latter are not so important for the purpose of our present discussion. All articles of freight in Canada fall into the general Canadian classification of ten classes. There are six additional classes, running from one and one-half times the first class up to four and one-half times first class, and all articles of freight in Canada come under those sixteen classes. Of course, as there are different rate territories with rates varying in one territory as compared with another, it will be seen that even with a uniform classification freight rates in one portion of Canada are higher or lower, as the case may be, than in another. Generally speaking, freight rates in the Atlantic territory are lower than freight rates in the prairie territory, and freight rates in general in the mountain territory are higher than in the prairie territory.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the hon. member estimate that per mile, or how?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): During the discussion I want to give to the minister and the House my reason for thinking that there is that difference. I am not going to rely upon mileage comparisons of rates because mileage comparisons are somewhat tricky, but I will take the declared opinion of the Board of Railway Commissioners over the last twenty years. I also intend, in the course of my argument, to develop reasons why the Board of Railway Commisisoners cannot deal with this question satisfactorily and really give us the equalization that we ought to have in Canada.

Various protests have been made from time to time with regard to this discrimination between the different territories, but the discrimination has been allowed to continue. The Board of Railway Commissioners has dealt with the question time and again, and in connection with various rate cases it has declared that unquestionably in its opinion, there was discrimination, but it was not unjust nor unfair. The Railway Act, of course, states that there shall be no unjust nor undue discrimination, and the board in its investigations and findings has found that although there is a lower rate in eastern Canada than in the west and a lower rate on the prairies than in the mountains, the discrimination was not unjust nor undue because of conditions obtaining in those various territories. The mountain scale, until recently, has been looked upon as distinctly a British Columbia handicap or problem, and it may be that prior to a few years ago, before the Panama canal was opened and elevators were constructed at Vancouver and before the trade on the prairies began to move more directly through British Columbia, out on to the Pacific, to the Old Land and to the Orient, it was not such an important question for the prairies. The prairies right through to the Peace river country had been looked upon largely as tributary to Fort William, Port Arthur, Montreal and eastern Canada generally. But the development during the last years, the opening of the Panama canal, the elevator construction at Vancouver and making possible thereby the shipping of grain by that route, has made this question one of vast importance for the prairie provinces as well as for British Columbia. So within the last two years, we find Alberta associating herself with British Columbia in a protest against some at least of those mountain rates. The western rates case began in 1911 and judgment was delivered on April 6, 1914. The complaint was:

1. That the tolls charged in the provinces of western Canada, (Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta) are higher than those charged in eastern Canada, (Ontario and Quebec), and

2. Of unjust discrimination by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in tolls from Vancouver, British Columbia, to interior points in the western provinces as compared with the tolls charged to the same points in eastern Canada.

The Board of Railway Commissioners delivered its judgment, and on page 156 of Canadian Railway Cases, volume 17, we find this:

On the issue of discrimination there is no doubt whatever that disparity of rates exists. While the railway companies plead a greater diversity of traffic, better traffic conditions and return loads, and a lower wage schedule in the east than in the west, there is to my mind no question but that those different factors and their effects are of necessity mirrored in the companies' returns, and are more than compensated for by the long average haul and lower terminal expenses that obtain in the west.

Practically the same thing was said afterwards in the judgment delivered by the board in eastern rates case on June 6, 1916. The reference is to Canadian Railway Cases, volume 22, page 41. The judgment states:

While, as has been set out at greater length in the western rates case, differences of conditions do exist between eastern and western Canada, and while western freight rates have already materially been reduced, the general schedule there obtaining is still higher, notwithstanding the fact that certain western rates that may be instanced are lower. There is no doubt but what the act requires and the general public interest of the country as a whole demands, that, if practicable, eastern rates should be advanced so that the different schedules may more nearly approach a parity.

I am aware that an absolute parity is impracticable, but, as conditions become similar, a reasonable parity ought to be obtained.

The next case to which I refer is the 40 per cent increase case. During 1922, before the committee on railway transportation costs, it seems to me that the railway representatives made a strenuous effort to convince the committee that rates after all were very nearly equal as between eastern Canada and the prairies prior to the 40 per cent increase. In the 40 per cent increase case, the judgment, which was delivered in December, 1920, has this to say:

Allowing for the undoubted fact that a very large proportion of the traffic both east and west is on the commodity basis, I am still forced to the conclusion that the rates in western Canada average considerably greater than in the east, possibly around 15 or 18 per cent.

In coming to this conclusion I am stating nothing new, as this fact has always been recognized and particularly by Sir Henry Drayton, the then chief commissioner, in the Eastern Rates case, so called In re Eastern Tolls, 22 Can. Ry. Cases, at page 41, where the following statement appears:—

"While, as has been set out at greater length in the Western Rates case, differences of condition do exist between eastern and western Canada, and while western freight rates have already materially been reduced, the general schedule there obtaining is still higher, notwithstanding the fact that certain western rates that may be instanced are lower. There is no doubt but what the act requires and the general public interest of the country, as a whole, demands, that, if practicable, eastern rates should be advanced so that the different schedules may more nearly approach a parity".

As a 40 per cent increase was given in eastern Canada and a 35 per cent in western Canada, that still left, in the opinion of the board, a considerable difference. Previous to this increase the difference in the two rate scales was approximately 15 or 18 per cent. Since that time there has been some reduction in rates both east and west. We had a reduction in grain rates after the committee had reported to parliament in 1922, and then we had other reductions in the east which brought the rates down to within 17½ per cent of what they had been previous to the 40 per cent increase, and in the west to 12½ per cent above the rates in existence previous to September 1920.

The committee on railway transportation which considered the question whether or not it was advisable to reinstate the Crowsnest pass agreement had strong representations made to it in 1922, when it was pointed out that in the event of the rates being lowered on grain the Canadian Pacific Railway might be unable to pay its dividends. I submitted figures to the House last year to show that notwithstanding the reduction the Canadian Pacific Railway had better earnings in 1922 and 1923 from grain in western Canada than it had the previous year. This was no doubt due in part to the fact that we had splendid crops in western Canada during those two years. Figures were submitted, taken from the files of the Board of Railway Commissioners, relating to the net and gross earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the west. Going back to the years 1916 to 1922 we find that the operating revenues in the east amounted to $226,500,000 while in the west they amounted to $356,500,000, the west being 57½ per cent higher than the east. The operating ratio in the east was 73.3 and in the west 57, while in the prairie west it was 54.5. The net earnings of the west were $92,500,000 greater than those of the east, or 154 per cent; that is to say, the net earnings in the east amounted to $60,000,000 and in the west to $152,500,000. From the years 1916 to 1920, before the period in which the increase took place, the operating revenues were, in the east, $370,000,000 and in the west $442,000,000; so that the west was $72,000,000 more than the east, or 20 per cent. And this embraces the prosperous manufacturing war munition period in the east. I have not the division of operating revenues for the years 1922 and 1923; I have already stated that during the grain moving months there was a higher gross earning and a higher net profit than in the summer months for the year 1921.

I have here a statement for the year 1924 of the operating expenses and the net revenues of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I want to put this statement on record because some people seem to think that there was something unholy done to the rest of Canada in the reinstatement of the Crowsnest pass rates on grain and that it wiped out forever any discrimination between eastern and western rates. This statement shows that for the months of January, February, March, April, May, June, July and August the Canadian National Railways, except for the month of March, had a very small net revenue; March was the only month in which they had a net revenue of over $1,000,000. In February they had a loss of $768,000; in May they had a loss of $433,000; in June there was a loss of $974,000. In September, however, they had a revenue of $1,515,000 and in October, $4,161,000, while in November there was a net revenue of $3,367,000. I shall now give the Canadian Pacific Railway's net and gross revenues for the eleven months of 1924; I am simply going to give the totals, and if the House has no objection I shall hand the statement to the reporter afterwards, because I should like to have it inserted in full:

Month	Gross revenue	Net revenue
January	$13,000,000	$ 709,000
February	12,000,000	938,000
March	14,000,000	2,000,000
April	13,000,000	1,000,000
May	14,000,000	1,000,000
June	15,000,000	2,000,000
July	14,000,000	2,000,000
August	14,000,000	3,000,000
September	15,000,000	4,000,000
October	19,000,000	7,000,000
November	17,000,000	6,000,000

The grain traffic represents about 45 per cent of the total business of western Canada, according to Mr. Lanigan of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If you segregate the month during which the grain traffic moves, you will find there is a tremendous increase in the total revenue and in the proportion of net to gross revenue. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in the various judgments handed down by the Board of Railway Commissioners we have the proof that the prairie west has been paying more than its share of profit to the railways. That the Canadian Pacific has a greater mileage in the three prairie provinces is not in itself an explanation of the fact that its net revenues are greater, because we know that the cost per mile of construction in eastern Canada is very much higher than that in the west. In the eastern rates case the railways applied for a general increase in rates, and the Board of Railway Commissioners decided they would have to take into consideration the position of the Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk was an old-established railway, and the board decided, in a general way, that they would accept the valuation of the Grand Trunk as a basis on which to fix rates, and let the newer railways take their chance, as they would not have come into the territory unless they were willing to compete with the railway already established there. It was admitted that a remunerative rate scale for the Grand Trunk would be all right for the Canadian Pacific, because the Canadian Pacific was in fact in a more prosperous condition at that time than the Grand Trunk. The claim was made that the capital charges of the Grand Trunk were no less than $131,395 per mile of line. This value was not accepted by the Board of Railway Commissioners, and they made a comparison with various other lines to ascertain what might be a fair valuation. They found that the Glen Tay-Agincourt line of the Canadian Pacific cost altogether $13,144,685, or $71,547 per mile; the Intercolonial, according to the government statistics of 1915, cost $75,066 per mile, including equipment and terminals; the National Transcontinental cost $76,632 per mile; the Ontario Hydro-Electric line from Toronto to Guelph cost $100,000 per mile, including terminals. In its judgment, which will be found in volume 6 of the board's judgments, pages 153 and 146, appears the following:

> If the cost of the National Transcontinental were applied to the Grand Trunk mileage, adding a conservative estimate of $10,000 a mile for equipment, a vaule of $86,632 per mile is arrived at.

When we compare that with the general cost of lines on the prairies, we find that the government guarantees ranged from $13,000 to $20,000 per mile. We know that was not the total cost, but we know also that when the government had something to do with building the mountain section they had to give a higher guarantee altogether. When the Grand Trunk Pacific bill was put through the guarantee for the prairie section, which was supposed to cover 75 per cent of the cost of the line, was $13,000 per mile, but in the mountains the guarantee was $30,000 per mile. I understand that this limitation regarding its mountain section, was afterwards wiped out. It is recognized that there is no comparison between the cost of building railways on the prairie territory and in the mountain territory, or the railways east and west of the prairies. So I submit that the tremendous earnings of the Canadian Pacific on the western prairie lines, is not explained by a greater mileage. This is offset by the fact that the cost of construction is much lower. This bears out the statement, which has been made time and again by the Board of Railway Commissioners, that in general the rates are higher in western than they are in eastern Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not arguing for the moment that there was anything unjust in this, but I do say that so far as that portion of the prairies is concerned which is so situated geographically that it ought and does use the Pacific coast ports, if in the past it has been impossible to give that section rates based on the local cost of construction and of operation, it is absolutely unfair to continue charging us the mountain scale of rates—rates which are in excess of those on the prairie territory—where the grades are better and the cost of construction no higher than the maximum in eastern Canada. In 1907 when the British Columbia coast cities applied to the Board of Railway Commissioners to have the mountain scale wiped out, one of the arguments used in rebuttal was this: Vancouver and the Pacific coast cities have certain advantages due to water competition, they have low through rates westbound, and they should not complain if they have the disadvantages of their geographical position when they are shipping inland, over mountain grades that cost more to construct. But so far as the province of Alberta and parts of western Saskatchewan are concerned, we are not allowed the advantage in our rates of the lower cost of construction and the lower cost of operation of the prairie lines, and we have heaped upon us the disadvantage of the mountain scale rates when we want to do business with that part of the country that our geographical position puts us in a position to do business with.

I should like to call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I had just finished giving some proof that the prairie provinces had been paying their share of railway profits, and possibly a little more, during the past twenty years or so. I should like to supplement that evidence by quoting an article from this morning's Ottawa Citizen:

> New York, Feb. 22.—Over sixteen hundred members of the New York Traffic Club, and the largest gathering in the history of the organization, were present at the annual banquet in the Commodore hotel here last night, where E. W. Beatty, K.C., president and chairman of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was the chief speaker. The guests included the executives of many of the larger United States railroads. W. A. Schumacher, president of the club, was in the chair.
> Mr. Beatty was accompanied by W. R. McInnes, of the C.P.R., Mr. Beatty largely devoted his remarks to a review of Canada's railway history, which was, he said, the story of great achievement, mistakes, failures and political and economic complications ending with the most unique situation existing in the world to-day. He traced the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and said that the success of the company had provoked similar but over-ambitious enterprises. He referred to the Canadian Northern which, he said, while a great conception, carried to physical completion, had failed because it was built before its time and could not be operated successfully through the dislocation of war time.

"If," said the speaker, instead of turning its prairie lines into a portion of a transcontinental system, the owners had been content to make as their termini the mountains on the west, and the Great Lakes on the east, they would have been the wealthiest men in Canada, and Canada would not to-day be facing the railway burden it is compelled to bear."

The mountain scale, Mr. Speaker, is somewhat higher than the prairie scale. In 1907, by the judgment in connection with the British Columbia Pacific Coast Cities versus the Canadian Pacific Railway, the mountain scale on part of the mileage was reduced to within 100 per cent higher than the prairie scale and to about one and a half times the prairie scale on about 500 miles of the mountain mileage. At the time of the western rates case in 1916, the mountain scale was reduced to from one and a half to one as compared with the prairie scale on its full western mileage. Since that time, in 1922, I think it was, the mountain scale was reduced somewhat nearer to the prairie scale, but it still is somewhat higher than the prairie scale. As I have pointed out because of the development of trade routes via the Pacific coast and through the Panama canal, and the development of trade with the Orient, we are face to face with a problem where the prairies, being denied rates equal to those in the eastern part of Canada, where the cost of construction and operation is lower, have to pay higher charges when they want to ship over grades just as favourable as those in the east.

Of course, it is to Alberta's advantage to do business with British Columbia. The provinces of Alberta and British Columbia are largely complementary. We in Alberta grow wheat and produce cheese, butter and other commodities for export, and British Columbia requires a great many of these commodities. British Columbia manufacturers on the other hand, are able to cater to the market on the prairies, and if there is anything in the home market idea, and I think there is, it is to the mutual advantage of British Columbia and Alberta that they have favourable interprovincial rates, and thereby each helps in the development of the other. I think that the main hindrance to getting an equalization of rates has been the attitude taken by the Board of Railway Commissioners, that the railways must have their dividends. That principle broke down when they sought to apply it to the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern. Though some compromise had been made in 1916 between the rates that were absolutely necessary on the Canadian Pacific and the rates necessary to keep the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern afloat, the railway commission were not able to save those railways from the financial difficulties into which they finally drifted.

Professor MacGibbon, of Edmonton, has written a book entitled Railway Rates and the Canadian Railway Commission, in which he says:

The fundamental holding of the board is that there shall be a fair return on the funds actually invested in the enterprise. This position is emphatically taken in The Dawson Board of Trade vs The White Pass and Yukon Railway Company case.

The board had ordered certain reductions on the Yukon Railway, and the Yukon Railway appealed to the Privy Council. The Privy Council granted a rehearing. The company also applied to the board for the rescinding of its order providing for a reduction in rates until such time as the rehearing was completed. The board in granting a stay until the rehearing said this:

The board never intended to deprive those carriers of the opportunity of earning, first, not only enough to pay the interest upon their bonds, but, secondly, to pay a fair return upon the actual capital that went into the road and that is now outstanding in the form of stock. No controlling commission has got, it seems to us, the right or the jurisdiction to make an order that would have the effect of destroying the earning power of the capital that honestly went into the facility—

And so on. A little further on in the judgment we find this:

Had the management been as economical then as now, with the large earnings in those days, no doubt substantial reductions could have been made without hardship upon the stockholders; but this matter can be dealt with only upon conditions as they exist to-day.

In connection with the same principle in the western rates case we find this:

The whole question is or should be what rates are fair? In considering this question of course surpluses earned by past operations may be evidence to the facts that the rates under which they were earned were exorbitant. Any industrial enterprise has the right to a reasonable surplus over and above its fixed charges and dividends. A railway is also entitled to a reasonable surplus. . . . To my mind it is quite impossible for the board to deal with rates in the west on the hypothesis that the Canadian Pacific is the only railway that should be taken into consideration.

Subsequent to that, however, in 1920 order No. 308 already referred to, was issued, in which the same position was taken that rates should be fixed and guaranteed that would enable the Canadian Pacific to pay 6 per cent, and then a surplus of 2 per cent to cover what might be called contingencies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who made that order to which the hon. gentleman refers?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): It was ruling No. 308 of the Board of Railway Commissioners in connection with the 35 and 40 per cent increases.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member is mistaken. I remember the order of 1920 or 1921.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): In connection with the 40 per cent increase?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I remember a reference back by the Governor in Council in which the railway commission was instructed to disregard the Canadian National Railways, and make rates only on such a basis as they felt fair to the Canadian Pacific, but there was no stipulation that there should be a definite earning capacity.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): It is true, however, and has been stated a number of times. I was going to read the order in council to which the hon. leader of the opposition refers. The idea in the western rates case, as well as in the 35 and 40 per cent increases, was to enable all the railways to carry on. However, an appeal was taken to the Privy Council in this case and on October 6, 1920, the Privy Council, in order No. 2434 dismissed the appeal, but in doing so expressed the following opinion:

> What constitutes a fair and reasonable rate should not be arrived at without reference to the requirements of the Canadian National system, and your committee recommends that the order in this case be referred back to the board to be corrected in its findings in such manner as to determine what are fair and reasonable rates without taking into account at all, for the time the order shall be in effect, the requirements of the Canadian National system.

As far as I can find out that is the first time that principle was applied. Previous to that an attempt was made to ascertain the breaking point between the needs of the three systems. Now, I want to say this—it may be heresy to some but it seems to me to be common sense—I do not know that any railway corporation, or any other kind of corporation, should have its dividends guaranteed at the expense of the people of the country. I am willing to admit the importance of the Canadian Pacific, and the importance of the other railways of Canada; but when we find the president of the Canadian Pacific to-day contending for his dividends and his surplus I must say I cannot see that that concern is of any more importance to Canada than the industry of agriculture or the manufacturing industries of the Dominion. Such treatment might be justified under normal conditions, but during the last few years conditions have been abnormal; and if the Board of Railway Commissioners tries to fix rates on a basis that will guarantee its dividends and a surplus to the Canadian Pacific, it can only do so at the expense of the other industries of Canada. And what condition are these other industries in? I know that agriculture is not in a position to stand it; and I am told that in the case of a great many other industries not only are they earning no dividends but that through the deflation of the last few years they have experienced a loss of from 50 to 75 per cent on their capital investment as well. Therefore, as far as I can see railway dividends should be no more sacred than dividends on capital invested in agriculture or in manufacturing concerns.

I have here a copy of the U.F.A. published in Calgary on February 2, 1925, on page 15 I find it stated:

> Canada's railways must have a living profit.

Then it is stated in an advertisement:

> No greater catastrophe could overtake Canada than the weakening of the present strong position of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

That seems to me an extraordinary statement. When you place dividends on one corporation representing an investment of less than a billion against those of all other industries representing almost twenty times that amount I say it is an utterly ridiculous statement. I believe we have to get away from the idea that the dividends or the interests of any corporation are to be held sacred. I am willing to give the Canadian Pacific—and any other corporation in Canada for that matter—all that we are entitled to as agriculturists and nothing more. I believe that we ought to have equality in so far as our treatment by the government of the country is concerned. I do not believe the Canadian parliament has any right to hand over authority to a commission of any kind, be it a railway commission or a tariff commission, to especially look after one industry when that can only be done at the expense of the rest of the people of the country.

There is another objection that I have to this mountain scale: It has overflown into the prairies. I suppose if we had never had the mountain scale through the Rocky mountains and out to the coast we should not likely have had it in the territory between Edmonton and the Peace river country. But we have a railway there built some years ago, and its grades are just as low as the grades of the Canadian National railway through the Yellowhead pass, 4/10 of one per cent grades, except crossing to the Smoky river and the Peace river. The grades are heavier there but only for a distance of ten miles in each case. I would like to see the rates of this railway come down also. I know there are difficulties in connection with this matter, but I do not think it is fair that we ought to guarantee, before rates are reduced in any particular whatever, that the railways are going to be taken care of in every instance.

The evidence taken before the committee on railway transportation costs in 1922 seems peculiar. The Canadian Pacific representatives were there arguing that they could not accept certain reductions without a loss of dividends. One gentleman came from Saskatchewan and argued that he had done his last year's work without any wages, and his sons had done the same; they had nothing to show for it so far as dividends were concerned. An hon. member from Nova Scotia said that every other industry in the country was just in the same position and yet in spite of that we had the argument that the dividends of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be guarded. I read a few days ago a declaration,—I think it was an enunciation of the policy of the Conservative party,—by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), in which he went on record as favouring subsidies for the railways in order to take care of the long hauls and the difficult rate situation in Canada. Well, I am not very fond of the subsidy question, though it may be necessary. I would rather see the rates reduced and then have the question dealt with after we saw the result, than to start in with an offer of a subsidy in order to get the rate reduction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have said nearly enough on this question. Possibly I have brought the few points I had in mind before the House, and no doubt some other hon. members have something to say on the subject. In view of the fact that it has been found difficult to equalize the rates between the western provinces and the east, owing to water competition in the east, and because of the difficulties of these provinces to-day, it is imperative that we should get the advantage of the favourable rates through the Yellowhead pass to the Pacific coast. It might have been all right to hold the rates up somewhat in days gone by, when we had grades of 2 or 2.2 per cent through the Rockies, but the country has borne that long enough, and I think it is time to wipe out the mountain scale altogether in the mountains and on the prairies.

The resolution calls for the abolition of the mountain scale in so far as it is reflected in commodity rates, class rates and standard mileage tariff. I have argued that we ought to have the same rates west as east on commodities moving from Alberta, be it grain or butter, or whatever the commodity may be. If it is justified in this instance, then it seems to me to be justified all along the line. If it is not justified all along the line, it does not seem to me to be justified in that particular instance. Therefore, I have framed the resolution as it has been framed, that we ought to have a writing down of the mountain scale to the prairie scale at once, and as rapidly as possible get to a complete equalization of rates from east to west.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is a fact that the through commodity rate from the western coast to the east is lower than the prairie scale, would the hon. member be in favour of raising it up to the prairie scale?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): I did not quite catch the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is a fact that the through commodity rate from the Pacific coast in the mountains to the eastward, covering the principal part of their traffic, is lower than the prairie scale, would my hon. friend be in favour of having it raised to the rate in the prairie section?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): I think the hon. gentleman refers to the rates going right through, where there is water competition. No, they cannot raise it. The railways would lose the traffic.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is in favour of discrimination against the prairies on that point?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): No, that is not the position.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I was going to ask the question my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition has just asked.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I helped you out.

Mr. GRAHAM: This question of freight rates is most embarrassing and most technical. Although I have been in the Railway department at different times for a great many years, I profess to know mighty little about it. It is something any person can take up in his own locality and feel that the rate is not fair. At the present time railway rates are not in a satisfactory condition—everybody admits that. The Railway Act says there should be no unjust discrimination, and it is claimed there has been discrimination.

That matter is before the courts now. I think it is a serious mistake at this moment for any member of parliament, or parliament itself, to take too severe an attitude towards the railways. As far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned, there can be no question about there being no dividends on that road, and I want to call attention to the fact that every man in this House is a joint proprietor of the Canadian National Railways. I might add further that the revenues of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as well as those of the Canadian National Railway, all come out of the impost on the traffic, whether it be passenger or freight, so that there is not so much difference between the upkeep of the railways as some people sometimes imagine. Although one is under private control or private ownership, yet it has no source of revenue except the pockets of the people who patronize it, and the Canadian National Railways is in the same position. I am in favour of great corporations only as they remain in their places, but railways are as essential to this country as anything else; we cannot do business without railways, and we ought to approach this question with an open mind and consider how best to bring about a situation which, while it will be fair to the people, will not be unfair to the railways. In the case of some companies it has been suggested that no dividends should be guaranteed. With that I agree to a certain extent, but it must be remembered that the railways with which our railways have to compete are largely in a place where they are guaranteed certain rates on the capital invested. I would not mention any rate of interest, but their rates are higher than ours. I do not mean the rate of interest, but the railway rates are higher than our railways charges. I hear there is a prospect of the freight rates in the United States being again raised very shortly. In fairness to the Canadian railways, I may say that they have this handicap that their fuel costs them more in a large section which they traverse than does fuel in the United States, and still on through traffic they have to compete with United States railways that can be run more cheaply. It has been said that Canadian railways should reduce rates of wages and other conditions have been mentioned. Rates of wages for men engaged in any employment in Canada will never go back to where they were before the war, and it is not in the best interest of the country that they should, because the standard of living for men who work with their hands must be kept at a point where they will be able to live in comfort. We cannot do much in the line of reducing wages. Further than that, even if that was desired, Canadian railways and American railways are so interlocked in their traffic that what applies to one side of the line must of necessity apply to the other. and I see no way of getting around that.

Mr. FORKE: I cannot quite understand the last statement the minister made, that wages of working men must be kept up to the level that they can have the same comfort as other people who are extravagant.

Mr. GRAHAM: When you get beyond the point of comfort you go into extravagance.

Mr. FORKE: Luxuries.

Mr. GRAHAM: The man who has enough for his family and himself to live on and to educate his children, is comfortable. When he has more money than that he is apt to become extravagant and thinks he needs for his comfort things he does not need. What I was trying to point out was that we cannot look to a reduction in freight rates through any great reduction in the wages of the men who are paid to operate the trains.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Henry Ford pointed that out the other day.

Mr. GRAHAM: Conditions have changed, and the men of to-day, no matter in what employ they are, must be considered as co-workers and not servants as heretofore. That is the basis on which we must work.

As regards the mountain scale, my hon. friend has put his case pretty strongly; but no matter what the judgment of the court may be, this parliament must deal during this session with the whole question in some manner or another, when every angle of the freight rate situation will be viewed and discussed and every part of Canada will have an opportunity, through its members, of placing its views before the House. In fact, even if we so desired, I see no way of obviating a discussion, and, indeed, more than a discussion in this House on the great question of railway rates. At the present time there is an embarrassing situation. Crowsnest pass rates are in force in some localities and not in others. That is a discrimination between cities in the east and cities in the west, between localities in the west and localities in the east. What will be done, I am not in a position to say at the present moment; but in my humble judgment, this parliament, before this session closes, will have to deal in a Dominion-wide discussion with the whole railway rate situation and arrive at some decision, because business is disturbed and will not right itself again until we arrive at some basis by which the people will know what the freight rates are to be and who is to control those freight rates. Does my hon. friend not think it would be a mistake for us at this moment to express opinions as to what we ought to do with freight rates piecemeal? This question affects the Maritime provinces, the central provinces. It is of vital interest to the prairie provinces and of interest to British Columbia. If we decided now that we were going to begin to arrange rates, a section at a time, my hon. friend would see that that would not be satisfactory and it would bring forth a set of resolutions from every part of Canada through the members for those constituencies, suggesting particular legislation—I do not mean particular favours —for their districts. Is it not wiser,—having had this discussion and possibly there may be more,—for us to wait for a complete discussion of the whole situation which will take in every condition of Canada, and then we may hope to decide something, perhaps not unanimously, which we trust will be in the interest of the entire Dominion and set at rest the question of freight rates which so vitally affects every part of this Dominion?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has the minister in view a uniform rate for transportation generally, whether by rail or water or otherwise

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not like to say that.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Does the member who makes the motion propose that?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is meant in the Speech from the Throne by "equalization in freight rates between provinces?" That is stated to be the programme of the government. If the minister would outline what he means by that, he would illuminate the discussion.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would rather omit any attempt to define the meaning of the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne until that is embodied in a bill that will be before parliament in all probability for discussion in detail.

Mr. LADNER: I did not quite catch how the minister related the mountain scale rate to problems similar in other parts of Canada. The mountain scale rate seems to be something distinct by itself and it would have to be separately considered. I propose to speak on it and I should like to ask the minister this question.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know that I have a right to speak so many times.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister has not taken his seat yet.

Mr. GRAHAM: Again, I would not care to give any definition of what these rates mean. I prefer to leave that until we have a discussion of the whole broad question. My hon. friend immediately takes the ground that he has a special case. The members from the Maritime provinces take the ground that they have a special case. The members from Ontario insist that they have a special case because some of their towns are discriminated against. The same thing is true of Quebec. Every province in the Dominion thinks it has a special case on freight rates, and that is why I say that we shall not get anywhere until we are prepared to take the matter up in a practical way, so that the whole field of transportation can be discussed with a hope of arriving at some method of devising a freight rate structure that will be at least comparatively satisfactory to the people of Canada.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this question of such grave and important consequences to British Columbia. I cannot agree with the minister that this is one of those problems which are common to other parts of Canada. It is distinctly a western question and one in which an unjust discrimination has been put upon the people of British Columbia and, indeed, the people of Alberta, without any principle, without any merit, and the proof of that lies in the fact that only a short time ago, after an inquiry by a committee, the mountain scale rate was reduced by 50 per cent. Now if the principle is established that it is an unfair discrimination, for what reason do they reduce it only 50 per cent? Why could not parliament reduce it to an equality with other parts of Canada? That seems to me to be the purpose of the proposal.

Mr. GRAHAM: Was it parliament that made that reduction?

Mr. LADNER: If it was not parliament, at any rate the inspiration should have come from some quarters of parliament.

Mr. KELLNER: Do you not mean that the excess was reduced by 50 per cent, and not the rate itself?

Mr. LADNER: But the mountain scale rate is nothing but excess. On this point I would refer the House to the opinion of an expert, Mr. Symington, K.C., who represents the three prairie provinces. This gentleman says that in the prairies the same rate is charged for 150 miles as is charged in British Columbia for 100 miles, and the reduction was made from 150 to 125, the basic figure being 100. The mountain scale rate was originally imposed on the province of British Columbia for the alleged reason that the capital expenditure in that section of the country was larger than it was elsewhere and that the cost of operation and maintenance of road was also higher. Anyone who has read the evidence which was given before the special committee in 1922, as well as evidence that has been submitted at other inquiries, great and voluminous in their nature, will have seen that these contentions have been exploded; they no longer exist. And if you look at the matter historically you will find that British Columbia at the time of confederation gave in land subsidies, in order to assist in the completion of this railway, nearly 23,000,000 acres of land and about $2,000,000 in cash. The Dominion of Canada contributed about $62,500,000 and the road was built largely for confederation purposes, just as the Intercolonial railway was built to fulfil similar obligations. While the people of Canada paid $130,000,000 or $140,000,000 for the Intercolonial railway the government of Canada paid $62,500,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the connection of the western section. Yet British Columbia in addition to her proportion of the contributions was called upon to give this huge extent of land as well as the cash to which I have referred. In the terms of union as well as in subsequent legislation our province presumably was protected with respect to freight rates. We were to have equal and fair rates without any discrimination. Now, from the very inception of things, on no grounds of merit and for no real reason, a discrimination has existed in the mountain scale rate. The purpose of this resolution is simply to elicit from the members of this House an opinion as to whether or not they sincerely and frankly believe, in view of all the information which has come into their hands, that the mountain scale rate, this arbitrary imposition, should be placed against the western provinces. I do not agree with the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) that it has any relation to any other problem so far as railway transportation is concerned. The question of the classification of freight rates, the question of the readjustment of rates on different commodities, and all matters of this kind can properly come before the Board of Railway Commissioners and for general discussion. But the question of the arbitrary imposition of the mountain scale rate which the people of western Canada have been paying for many years is an isolated matter that calls for independent and separate consideration. In my opinion it is a good test to ascertain where hon. members stand in relation to British Columbia and the western provinces and whether or not they have in their hearts a sympathy with the province of British Columbia for the unfair treatment to which she has been subjected so long.

Mr. John Oliver, the Premier of British Columbia, though professing to keep the question of railway rates and freight rates out of politics, has made it a great source of political benefit to himself by standing always as the champion of freight rates in British Columbia. The fact of the matter is that for 19 years, that is to say, from 1906, that province has carried on a continuous fight against this very thing; it has contended for not only equalization but also against the unfair discrimination in the mountain scale rate. The fight started under the premiership of Sir Richard McBride; and whether a Liberal or a Conservative premier has been in office—and the same would be true if a Progressive premier were possible there—the leader of every government in the province has always advocated the same thing, because the people of British Columbia stand as a unit behind the demand for an alleviation of the conditions under which they have been labouring for many years past. In a telegram of June 25, 1924, from Premier Oliver to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), Mr. Oliver, among other things, said:

> Responsibility for the existing discrimination as well as those which will be added must lie with the government and parliament of Canada.

That is the charge of a Liberal provincial premier against a Liberal government in Ottawa, and I say that this is an opportunity for our friends in the government, yea, in either opposition, to express themselves as to whether or not they are sympathetic on the question of a rate which is recognized on all hands as an unfair discrimination.

The evidence before the special committee also discloses that the apple producers, the lumbermen and the manufacturers pay from 10 per cent to 170 per cent more for the same service than is paid elsewhere in Canada. And all through that evidence we find innumerable facts and arguments supporting the claim of the west in this matter. The question of freight rates in Canada has been discussed and re-discussed and argued at considerable length before committees of parliament, and it has also been threshed out in the lobbies and fully considered by delegations, so that most people are pretty well fed up with it, to use an expression of the street. They know most of the facts and most of the arguments, and it is difficult to understand why there has been any delay in dealing with it. For the last two years it has been actively before the public and has been well to the forefront in parliament. The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) introduces here a simple resolution, very clear in its terms. It declares that in the opinion of this House the mountain freight scale should be abolished in so far as it is reflected in standard mileage rates, class rates and commodity rates. What are the arguments against this? The Minister of Railways, in the responsibilities of his office, has tactfully and diplomatically contended that this is a matter to be considered at some other time. That has been the contention for nineteen years. If I understand the temper of the western people, they do not want promises; they want action, they want some indication from members representing other sections of Canada whether or not in their opinion this unfair discrimination—because no one to-day will argue to the contrary—should continue. As I pointed out to the minister (Mr. Graham) at the outset, this is an isolated, detached case of unjust freight rate discrimination. What objection therefore have hon. members to express themselves on the merits? If any member will advance a logical reason against this proposal, I will be the first to acknowledge the soundness of his reasoning; but all the evidence I have heard of experts and others who understand the question establishes beyond a reasonable doubt in my mind that the merits of this claim cannot be denied, and my suggestion is that the resolution should be brought to a vote so that hon. members present may express their sympathy and their sense of fair play towards the west. I know that over half a million people will be reading this debate in to-morrow morning's papers, and I hope they will find that other parts of confederation represented by members loyal to our institutions and friendly to every section of the country are also concerned with this mountain scale discrimination and are sensible of the justice of our case. I hope we may hear from the Maritime provinces. If you have the mountain scale of rates we would like to know about it.

Mr. CARROLL: They are mountainous.

Mr. LADNER: Well, we have never had anything else. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this question will not be treated by the government as of only academic interest or to be set aside because of any complication that may result from its adoption, although I feel there is an inclination on their part to so treat it. I repeat, the subject matter of the resolution constitutes a distinct freight rate problem, detached from all other similar problems, and affords an excellent opportunity for hon. members to express themselves affirmatively or negatively concerning the principle involved.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to endorse the sentiments of the member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Ladner) in support of this resolution, and I share his hope that we shall have an exhaustive discussion of the whole mountain rate structure. I too appreciate the futility of any such hope, when I look at the government benches and observe only three or four ministers present, two or three of whom I notice are watching the clock very closely and apparently intend to leave shortly. In my estimation parliament obtained the right at least to share in the fixing of rates away back in 1881 when certain subsidies were granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Since that time the country has entered into various undertakings with one railway company and another which I think beyond a shadow of a doubt consolidated our position, and it is worth while for us to seriously consider why the government from time to time undertook to pay subsidies and to make land grants to various railway companies. It will not be seriously argued that there was any desire on the part of the country to make somebody a present by this means; undoubtedly a substantial consideration in return was involved. It was the opinion of the rank and file of the people that that assistance would eventually be a factor in reducing freight rates. I do not think there is any question that it was understood, if it was not expressed, that at a period of financial stringency, such as we are passing through at the moment, those money and land grants would be treated by the railway companies as being in lieu of dividends. But from the very start the policy seems to have been unsuccessful. Those who have studied the situation back in 1896 find that the western farmers at that time were actually hauling their grain much further than should have been necessary to reach the Northern Pacific in Manitoba, and there are numerous resolutions from boards of trade and other organizations and from private citizens protesting against the high freight rates and lack of transportation facilities that then prevailed. It was apparently the opinion of the country that the subsidy proposition had not been a success in bringing about low freight rates, and a new theory was advanced. It was suggested that the only way to control freight rates was by competition, and an agitation sprang up for the building of more railways, with the result that the country subsidized and bonused the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. But the coming of these railways did not bring about lower rates. I do not think there is any question that the cost of construction was deliberately made sufficiently high so that low freight rates would never be enjoyed in our day and generation.

Allow me to deviate for a moment to the election of 1911, which our friends to the right take a great deal of credit to themselves at having won against the other old party on what was to all intents and purposes a tariff question. But in western Canada I do not think the tariff entered into the election at all; the people there by their votes desired to protest against the method which had been used in financing the building of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. At any rate this was the case in my section of the country. When what are to-day our National lines were projected we were promised very much better grades across the mountains than the Canadian Pacific ever had, and were led to believe that that company's engineers had made a terrific blunder when they selected the southern route through the Kicking Horse pass; and as a corollary we were promised lower freight rates. We have got the easier grades, and on what used to be the Canadian Northern our National railways can draw as heavy loads east as they can west across the mountains, but we have never seen any reduction in our rates. I do not think that the railway commission or any other body that has ever investigated the situation has argued that the present mountain scale of rates is necessary so far as the Canadian National is concerned. In fact I think I am safe in saying that the president of our National system has admitted that the mountain scale of rates is not necessary for his road, but that if he lowered his rates in that section the Canadian Pacific management would probably retaliate in some other section. If that is to be the line of argument advanced—

Mr. GRAHAM: Was that advanced?

Mr. KELLNER: I cannot say definitely, but I have been informed it was. Probably the minister would care to deny that it had been advanced?

Mr. GRAHAM: Any man can say he has heard a rumour and ask some person else to deny it. That cannot well be done. I do not know, but I would think it would be more unlikely that the president of the National railways said so than that he did not.

Mr. KELLNER: I take it then that the minister never heard the rumour?

Mr. GRAHAM: Never.

Mr. KELLNER: Whether the president of the Canadian National railways stated it or not, there is no question that it was the general opinion among those who are more or less versed in the situation as it exists in the west. Now if the rates which we are paying in the mountains are not sufficiently high for the Canadian Pacific to make at least a fair profit on the business, I cannot for the life of me see why they should be so anxious to get as large a portion of that traffic as they are handling. Take the business, for instance, from northern Alberta. A survey of the situation will convince anybody that the Canadian National Railway should have practically all that traffic. The distance is much shorter, and the grade unquestionably is much better; but if you will look over the freight returns you will find that the Canadian Pacific are handling approximately about one-half of all the business that is going out that way. It is necessary to go down to Calgary and then west from there. Certainly they are getting an excessive freight rate, or they would not carry that freight over such a circuitous and extremely difficult grade as compared with the grade on the Canadian National. If we are going to have competition for lower rates, and that used to be the theory, that competition was the only way to lower them, we have the railroads now, we have the grade, and it seems to me that now is the time to enforce competition. If that is not done, by all manner of means let us quit trying to deceive ourselves and admit that competition is not a factor in railway rates. A few years ago, for instance, when our friends to the right here were in office, they undertook to lower ocean rates by using the merchant marine. The present government has altogether discarded that idea of using the merchant marine for lowering rates, and it is going to subsidize ships. As far as railroading goes, both these methods have been tried and neither has been found any good. So it seems to me, whether or not it is worth while to discuss this question, that we must have something different from what has already been tried, for both the methods tried up to date have failed. This whole question is one of outstanding importance, not to western Canada alone, but to the country at large.

At the time we discussed the Crowsnest pass agreement in 1922, the railroad companies put up a terrific howl about the amount of money they were going to lose if that agreement came into effect. As we look over the returns of the railroad companies since then, we find that their predictions have not come to pass at all. The railroad companies, especially in 1923, had a much better year than they had in 1922. Of course, it is only fair to state that we had an exceptionally heavy crop that year. But 1924, with a light crop, compared very favourably indeed with 1922. I do not care what question comes up for discussion, if it is of international importance at all, wheat will eventually be a factor in it, and if it is the desire of Canada to move wheat cheaply so that we can compete with other countries in the world, I do not think we can afford to ignore this mountain scale rate. I think it is also worth while to remember that wheat is not the only factor that enters into the situation. Alberta has practically an unlimited amount of coal. They also have considerable forests, and a good fur business. All these are materials which not only produce new wealth but which, if developed, will produce tonnage for our railroads.

When the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) was speaking to-night, he dwelt on one of the findings of the railway commission in which they said that in the prairie section, the long haul and the low cost of construction were some of the factors that should offset the lower rates in the east. That is only part of the situation. Certainly it must be much cheaper to get coal for the railroads in Alberta or anywhere in the mountains than in the eastern part of Canada, for it matters not where you have a depot in the west, there you have a coal mine practically beside it. Certainly it is much easier to get water for your engines in the mountains than it is in practically any part of the east. I have been told by engineers that you can get a better quality of water, water that works better in the engine and that gives no trouble in the boilers through corrosion, than you can in the east. I do not think anywhere through that mountain section they have any trouble with the engine boilers corroding. But that is not the case in the east. These are all matters which enter into the cost of railroad operation.

As far as railroad construction is concerned, I doubt if there is any part of Canada where the road was built as cheaply in the first place, and was got into as good a condition so quickly as it was across the prairies.

In conclusion, I would ask the minister not only to give this matter his attention, but to try and get the ear of his colleagues in the government and try and do the fair thing by eliminating this mountain scale in its entirety.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I would like to say just a word or two on this question in the way of trying to reach what the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) has stated. My recommendation is this: Let us get rid of these discriminations, more or less local, more or less physical, one after the other, and when we have cleared a lot of them out of the way it will be easier and smoother to deal with the wider problems stated by the Minister of Railways, namely, to create a freight rate structure fair to all; and one of the first duties of parliament is to achieve, if possible, competition between the two roads, after they have been compelled to give up unnecessary services.

I think that is a solution. We must not put this question over, but try and deal with it now, taking up one difficulty after the other, first, the mountain rate, then the others, with the end in view of achieving a real freight rate structure. Now that might take some time, but the first thing to do is to tackle the problem at some point and begin to remove the difficulties one after the other.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I feel that it is my duty to say a few words in regard to this resolution introduced by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy).

As I read the resolution, its intent is limited to an expression of opinion by the House that the mountain scale should be abolished. That is very simple, it is true, but I also appreciated the observations of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) when he pointed out that this is simply one of many problems. I cannot quite reconcile, however, what the minister has said in regard to this question and his inability to give the House any opinion upon the stand the government purposes taking, with a despatch I read in the press to-night, in the Ottawa Citizen, which carries a statement from Vancouver, by Mr. McGeer, who is counsel for the province of British Columbia on this very question and the allied question of freight rates in general. Mr. McGeer in the interview, which I shall read in a moment, states that he has just returned from the capital where last week he was assured by the highest authority that the government purposes to bring about a measure of equalization of freight rates which will eliminate the western discrimination. In other words, he states that he has assurances that the government will equalize rates. I do not know just what that word "equalize" includes within its meaning. Mr. McGeer also refers, as will be noted, to discriminations. But he also referred, as will be noticed, to western discrimination. The western discrimination complained of by the people of British Columbia, and by Mr. McGeer in particular, is, of course, this mountain scale. That is the main discrimination which Mr. McGeer complained of. Now then, he tells the people of British Columbia, who have retained him as counsel, that he has these assurances from the government.

Mr. GRAHAM: Did he say "the government"?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I will read the despatch. Virtually nothing else can be meant but the government unless this is simply a deliberate effort to mislead the public. I will quote it exactly as it is here, and it is here quoted as if it were given by Mr. McGeer himself. It is dated Vancouver, February 23 and Mr. McGeer is speaking:

> "I am satisfied from assurances received from the highest sources that it is the intention of the government to bring about a measure of equalization of railway freight rates that will eliminate western discrimination", stated G. G. McGeer, K.C., British Columbia counsel in the freight rates case, upon his return here last night from Ottawa.

Now, I do not know any higher source than the illustrious and benign Minister of Railways. So I am bound, in my respect for the Minister of Railways, my knowledge of his influence and his power, and also his deep regard for Mr. McGeer to come to the conclusion that Mr. McGeer would not have dared to ascribe "the highest source" to any other individual than to the Minister of Railways. So I say I have difficulty in harmonizing this statement—

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not surprised.

Mr. STEVENS: —of the counsel of British Columbia, with the minister's statement a moment ago that he was unable to give an utterance to the House regarding equalization. I want to say to the minister that I feel he ought to give to the House quite as full information as to the intentions of the government as he would give to Mr. McGeer.

Mr. GRAHAM: I hasten to say that he has.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Then am I to understand that this statement is moonshine?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know what moonshine is.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not like to ascribe to the minister such absolute innocence as that. At any rate, joking aside, am I to infer that this is an inaccurate statement and not a statement of fact?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not pass judgment on it. I would say if I am "the highest authority" it is inaccurate.

Mr. STEVENS: I thank the minister for his statement, I think that is perfectly fair. I appreciate and to the full the complex nature of this problem. The question of freight rate structure is perhaps the most intricate problem in all the realm of economics. I know of nothing more intricate and nothing more complex, and I want to say further while we have this subject before us—that in my opinion, after fourteen years of intimate study as a layman of the problem, and after repeatedly bringing it to the attention of the House as I have for many years, I have come to the conclusion that this parliament, sitting as a body, can never expect to unravel and determine what is exactly the correct scale of freight rates to be charged in various parts of the country. I think it is an utterly hopeless task for a body of this kind, but I do believe that a solution will be found only when the people of this country at large entertain in the railway commission, or some other body erected of that character, complete confidence and give to it the problem for its decision. Now, I apprehend this: That a large portion of the dissatisfaction through Canada arose, perhaps, four or five years ago because of an agitation against certain utterances of members of the railway board. I am not passing any judgment in the matter; the gentleman who was particularly charged with giving utterance to unfair or prejudiced views is now dead—I refer to the late Hon. Mr. Carvell. I am not for one moment joining in the hue and cry that went on in this country against the chairman of the railway commission, the late Mr. Carvell, but there is no doubt that that hue and cry, the attacks made upon him—attacks made by men of very high standing within certain limits perhaps, such as the Minister of Agriculture—attacks that were made in many sections of the country against him, did undermine confidence in an institution that hitherto had held the unbounded confidence of the people of Canada at large, and from that time extreme difficulty has been experienced in connection with this question. You meet the public and suggest to them that the proper body to decide this technical subject is the railway board. The immediate reply is "We have no confidence in the railway board", and I recall, Sir, and I know other members of the House will recall, where, time after time, resolutions were passed by boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and various public bodies, expressing a lack of confidence in the railway board. This I think was the most unfortunate, the most disastrous thing that has happened in recent years in connection with the administration of affairs throughout the country. However, we have that condition.

At the same time we have a deep rooted conviction in the minds of a large section of the public that they have grievances. For instance, taking people in British Columbia, nothing in the world would persuade them that a grave injustice is not being done in connection with this mountain scale. They have a deep rooted conviction on the subject and, I may say, based upon very sound grounds. Then our friends from the Maritime provinces, consider, and I have a good deal of sympathy with their view as well, looking at railway freight rates from their particular angle, that they also have a grievance—that rates have been increased, and increases in recent years have been made, beyond the point which they consider as justified by the arrangements under which they entered into confederation, and so we have criticism.

As an illustration, of the complexity of the problem, and also of the futility of public agitation in dealing with this problem, I have a most illuminating statement before me showing in the case of a number of articles, some seven articles in all, the fact that by the Crowsnest pass rates the consumer got absolutely no benefit at all. These are the chief articles affected by the westward rates. For instance I have here statements regarding barbed wire, bar iron, building paper, common ploughs, nails, spikes and window glass, and of course the same thing applies to innumerable other articles. The reason I am bringing this forward is because certain sections of western Canada claim, to use the language of Mr. Symington, that the Crowsnest pass agreement is "the charter of the prairie provinces." I think he describes it as "a charter of liberty." I should like this illuminating statement to appear on Hansard. It is as follows:

During the time above noted the Crowsnest reductions were in force from 7th July to 27th October, inclusive. On June 30 and October 30 the ordinary rates prevailed.

It will be observed that at Calgary the price of the article remained constant and did not drop during the period of reduced freight rates, showing that the reduction was of no benefit to the consumer. It is believed the variation in price at other points was due to other factors than freight rates.

The above computations of freight cost are based on a roll of Lyman 4-Point Barb Wire, 80 rods, weighing 85 pounds, and taking the freight rates from Fort William to points named.

During the time above noted the Crowsnest reductions were in force from 7th July to 27th October, inclusive. On June 30th and October 30th, and subsequently, ordinary rates prevailed.

At Winnipeg the price did not drop when the reduced rates became effective; there was a reduction Sept. 30th which has been maintained subsequent to the restoration of the higher ordinary rates.

At Regina the price remained constant and did not drop during the period of reduced rates, showing that the reduction was of no benefit to the consumer. Since the reduced rates were cancelled the price has dropped.

At Calgary the price has remained constant before, during, and subsequent to, the period of reduced Crowsnest rates, showing that the reduced rates were of no benefit to the consumer.

It is very evident from the Edmonton figures that the reduction in price July 15th had no relation whatever to freight costs as the price was reduced 95 cents per 100 lbs., while there was no reduction in freight rate.

It will be further noted that the prices at Regina, Calgary and Edmonton bear no relation to the Winnipeg price (including freight cost) plus the additional freight cost over Winnipeg to these points.

The above computations of freight cost are based on 100 lbs. of $\frac{3}{4}$-inch round bar iron, and taking the rates from Fort William to the points named.

During the time above noted the Crowsnest reductions were in force from 7th July to 27th October, inclusive. On June 30th and on October 30th, and subsequently, the ordinary rates prevailed.

The variation in prices at the different points would indicate that they apparently bear little or no relation to differences in freight costs. At Regina the price of the article remained constant and did not drop during the period of reduced freight rates, showing that the reduction was of no benefit to the consumer. Note the fluctuations at Calgary as compared with the lower prices at Edmonton, where the Crowsnest rates were higher; also that the price at Edmonton was only 5c. per roll over Winnipeg, although the difference in freight cost was 21c.

The above computations of freight cost are based on a roll of Marshall & Wells "Anchor" Building paper, weighing 25 pounds, and taking the freight rates from Fort William to points named.

During the time above noted the Crowsnest reductions were in force from 7th July to 27th October, inclusive. On June 30th and October 30th, and subsequently, the ordinary rates prevailed.

It will be noted that at Winnipeg, Regina and Calgary there has been a reduction in price since the reduced Crowsnest rates were cancelled and the higher ordinary rates restored. The reduction in price of 15c. per keg at Winnipeg between June 30 and July 15 was in excess of twice the difference in freight cost resulting from the lower Crowsnest rate. At Calgary the price of the article remained constant and did not drop during the period of reduced rates, showing that the reduction was of no benefit to the consumer, although subsequent to the cancellation of the reduced rates, and the restoration of the higher rates, the price at Calgary has dropped 10c. per keg.

The above computations of freight cost are based on a keg of 2½-inch wire nails, weighing 107 lbs. and taking the freight rates from Fort William to the points named.

During the time above noted the Crowsnest reductions were in force from 7th July to 27th October, inclusive. On June 30th and October 30th, and subsequently, the ordinary rates prevailed.

At Winnipeg there was only one price change during this whole period, i.e. a reduction of 90 cents per case between June 30th and July 15th, but this was materially in excess of the difference in freight cost resulting from the reduced freight rates, and it will be noted there has been no increase in price since the reduced rates were cancelled.

At Regina, Calgary and Edmonton the price changes have not synchronized with changes in freight costs. It will be further noted that the prices at these points bear no relation to the Winnipeg price (including freight cost) plus the additional freight cost over Winnipeg to these points.

The above computations of freight cost are based on a case of double diamond, 60 united inches, window glass, weighing 155 lbs. and taking the freight rates from Fort William to the points named.

Mr. KELLNER: Referring to the comparative prices and rates on barb wire as set out in the first table, at the time the Crowsnest pass agreement came into effect July 7th, did this commodity suffer a decrease in price?

Mr. STEVENS: No, the fact is exactly as I have stated.

Mr. LUCAS: With reference to the comparison of jobbers' prices to retailers for common ploughs who got the benefit of the reduced rates?

Mr. STEVENS: It was secured by the jobber, I presume. Neither the consumer nor the retailer derived any benefit.

Mr. CARROLL: What are these prices the hon. member has been quoting?

Mr. STEVENS: Jobbers' prices to retailers.

Mr. FORKE: Would the hon. member mention binder twine?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not it here.

Mr. FORKE: Would you permit a statement as to that?

Mr. STEVENS: Permit me to say this: I am not presuming to cover all the cases. I am giving certain cases and I certainly have not under my hand the item the hon. member mentions.

Mr. FORKE: I cannot prove this, but a certain dealer told me he saved a hundred dollars on an order of twine from Fort William to Pipestone under the Crowsnest pass rates.

Mr. STEVENS: All the jobbers saved that. The hon. gentleman has struck the point. All of these jobbers saved the freight rates, but when the commodity was passed on to the retailers the prices were sustained and there was no reduction. That is the point. So that the consumer, who after all is the one we must consider, obtained no advantage from the rate reductions.

Mr. MORRISON: These jobbers obtained the heaviest part of their supply early in the year, and they could not reduce the price till they disposed of their stock because it cost them a higher rate.

Mr. STEVENS: That may be. People speak of the value of the Crowsnest rates, and argue about the freight rates, and I am offering these items as striking examples of the futility of the argument to which I have referred.

Mr. BROWN: You would not like to assert that the increase or reduction of freight rates does not ultimately redound to the disadvantage or the benefit of the consumer. If the argument means anything it means that these changes have no influence at all.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is unfortunately following a course that others have pursued; when a statement is produced—and I am producing such a statement—they try to put in my mouth a line of argument I am not seeking to make at all. I understand that undoubtedly the amount of the freight rate on an article ultimately affects the price of the article; but I want to point out that sometimes people attach a great deal of importance to and make almost a national issue of some secondary point as to the application of rates here and there, and wake up to find that no distinct advantage has accrued from it at all. That is all I was seeking to argue.

I want to impress upon the House that this whole problem is such a complicated one that it would be far better if this House could address itself to the necessity of restoring confidence in a body qualified to deal with the whole technical situation and direct that body. I believe absolutely in the railway board and without reserve in the railway board, and I think that we should restore confidence in it. If we have not confidence in that railway board, then we should erect a body in which we would have confidence and place this great problem of railway freight rates in their hands.

It is claimed and claimed correctly that the Railway Act is the guiding power, that is it controls and directs to a degree, and, shall I say, limits the power of the railway board. I realize that and I think perhaps this is the point that must be determined by this House; that in the Railway Act parliament declares that there shall be no unfair, unjust or unreasonable discrimination, and from these adjectives, these qualifying words, "unfair, unreasonable or unjust," arises a great deal of the trouble. Parliament is asked sometimes—indeed I recall a few years ago I asked parliament myself, by presenting a bill in this House—to declare that there shall be no discrimination at all. But I realize, after more complete study of the problem, that parliament could not fix it with safety in that form, because, if you fix the rate structure so that there will be absolutely no discrimination, you lead gradually into these schools of thought in regard to railway rates who hold to this, that the rate on a ton of silk should not be more than the rate on a ton of coal, because the weight carried on the railway is the same.

For instance, to put it, perhaps, not in such an extreme manner, there are certain grades of ore high priced, or, let us say, carrying values of gold or copper that call for a higher rate than a low grade type of ore, and the argument is advanced sometimes: Why should this more valuable product which weighs exactly the same as regards a ton weight, as the less valuable ore, carry a higher rate of freight? But these differences in classification must occur if we are going to function as a country at all, and everybody knows that. I do not know how many classifications there are. When you separate them into their atoms, they run into thousands, so that it is an utter impossibility for this House to determine exactly what rate shall be charged here or there or upon this or that article.

It might be claimed by some that my argument is against the resolution. It is not against the resolution. I stand behind this idea, that when a given arbitrary rate known as the mountain scale is shown to be inequitable and unfair, it should be removed, just as I say, in regard to other sections of Canada where it can be shown that a rate is unfair, then that rate should not be sustained. But I do not think it is the part of parliament to decide what is fair or is not fair in the question of rates. I do not want to be too critical of the government. This is not a motion in regard to which we can assume, as we often do, the role of a harsh critic of the government. I do not say this unkindly, but I am a little disappointed that the minister has not given to the House a somewhat fuller and more complete idea of the mind of the government in regard to this and kindred subjects. We have a somewhat nebulous suggestion in the Speech from the Throne that if we are good boys, we may expect at some time during the session an utterance by the government. I do not know of any better time than on this resolution. We are intensely interested and worried in British Columbia over this problem. I could go into detailed figures, but I do not wish to do so. Suffice it to say this: let us take, for instance, the movement of grain; the export rate on grain from the prairies to the coast is about double the same rate eastward. I cannot, for the life of me, see the justification for that, and these are things that are alarming, disturbing the people, that are worrying the people in business who are seeking to take advantage of natural and geographical situations. I know that the officers of the two great systems of railways, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, are intensely concerned over this whole question of railway freight rates. It is unwise that we should drift along much longer without coming to some definite conclusion.

Before I sit down, let me repeat very briefly what I said a year ago with regard to this question. This structure that we call the freight rates tariff is the growth of probably half a century going through various phases of development, but I have discovered, in my study of the problem, that it has largely been directed and influenced by a desire on the part of those who have fixed the rates, to develop Canada. What was a good thing for the development of Canada, say twenty-five years ago, when the prairies were sparsely settled might not be an equitable or fair or proper thing to-day. Another point is this, that when our present system of freight-rate making was not inaugurated, but like Topsy, just grew, there was a distribution from the east westward and no distribution from the west eastward. With the construction and completion of the Panama canal in 1915, there was thrust, shall I say, into the whole problem an entirely new factor, in fact, an element that completely changed the principle upon which freight rates should be fixed. What do we find now? We have now the opportunity of distributing freight from two seaboards inward. What I want to suggest to this House is this: Whether we undertake a very detailed consideration of the problem or not, I believe this principle must be adopted in Canada for the fixation of freight rates, and that is the distribution of freight from the two seaboards inward. That, I think, is a basic, underlying, fundamental principle. If it is, there is no doubt that there will be vast, radical and almost revolutionary changes in some of the rates that are charged. But while I give utterance to this principle in, perhaps, a very general manner, I also realize that when I say there must be a revolutionary change in our freight rates structure, I am touching a very delicate and complicated question. It is a question too delicate and complex for this parliament to deal with. I hope I have made my position clear. If this resolution comes to a vote, I certainly am in favour of it as it stands, but I agree in a large measure with the minister that this whole question must be considered. For instance, I am faced with this possibility —and I want my hon. friend who proposes the resolution to recognize it—if you bring about a lowering in given rates, for example in British Columbia, we are at present enjoying certain other rates that are very much below that horizontal line to which we would like to bring these higher rates and it is only reasonable to expect that others will want to bring those lower rates up. I am not unreasonable; I cannot expect, if we are going to lower certain rates, that we are going to retain at the same time the lower and advantageous rates that we have on other commodities. So, while I do support the resolution in lowering or removing the mountain scale, I would like to put the rider on it that in doing that, we are not going to raise the commodity rates, for instance, on fruit, lumber, fish and some other commodities upon which we enjoy very favourable and advantageous rates. That again injects into the consideration of this problem its very complexity and difficulty. I rose simply to declare my general position in connection with the proposal before the House.

Mr. AIME DECHENE (Montmagny) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, we have been listening, for the last few hours, to the views on freight rates expressed by our colleagues from the west. As it was so lucidly stated by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) there also exists a question of freight rates in the eastern provinces. Unfortunately, the members from the Maritime provinces are not here to-night, to air their grievances. However, the government is perfectly aware that the province of Quebec asks for a readjustment of freight rates. When the Prime Minister paid a visit to Quebec, about a month ago, at a banquet given in his honour, an hon. legislative councillor in proposing the health of the Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King) reminded him that there existed in a number of districts in our province, discrepancies of freight rates absolutely unjustifiable which had to be done away with as soon as possible. For instance, there is on the south shore below the Quebec bridge, two railways almost parallel: the old Intercolonial line which extends from the Maritime provinces to Montreal, and, further inland, at a distance of fifteen to twenty miles, the Transcontinental railway. These two lines are under the management of the Canadian National Railways.

What do we find on the sections of these two lines between New Brunswick and the Quebec bridge? Two railways in two different valleys.

The old Intercolonical railway which extends along the river as far as the Quebec bridge, has in a number of localities quite steep grades to climb and especially between Levis station and the Quebec bridge. There also exists quite a perceptible grade from the town of Montmagny on, in the direction of St. Charles, in the county of Bellechasse. There are practically no grades on the Transcontinental. Nevertheless what do we find? That the rates are much higher than those of the Intercolonial, and this for the same distance. Therefore, a discrimination exists which is to the disadvantage of the parishes occupying the centre of the counties of Temiscouata, Kamouraska, L'Islet, Montmagny, Bellechasse, Dorchester and Levis. Why this difference? It is evidently based upon a decision—probably fair—of the railway commission. This difference, however, should disappear at the same time as the high freight rates of the mountainous regions of British Columbia and Alberta.

Our farmers and settlers north of Quebec, along the Transcontinental, who have established themselves near the railway passing through Cochrane and Amos and reaching the Quebec bridge, a line which requires little traction, have also to suffer from freight rates that are not proportional to those of the railways which run close to the shores of the St. Lawrence. Therefore, a discrimination exists which paralyzes the development of the northern part of the province of Quebec.

If we now cross to the other side of the river, this discrimination against the Transcontinental, in the five or six counties surrounding Levis, also hinders the development of a number of thriving parishes. It is impossible to open up the centre of Montmagny, Bellechasse and L'Islet, if the freight rates are not lowered to the level of those given to our competitors along the Intercolonial railway, where these two lines are hardly fifteen miles apart. Why?

Should the government come to the conclusion that there exists sufficient ground to readjust the freight rates for the west, we, from the province of Quebec, ask to be as fairly dealt with.

Why two different rates for the same distance, on two parallel lines in the same counties?

We have noticed that, within the last years, under the plea of economy, some passenger trains had been discontinued on the Canadian National railways running through the counties on the south shore. The present service is so defective, so far as passenger and baggage are concerned, that it is almost impossible to travel. This is what, for instance, business men do who have to reach the parishes in the centre of these counties: They travel by the old Intercolonial line and hire cabs to bring them to the various places at which the Transcontinental stops.

We requested better service from the management of the National Railways, but without success, we were told that we had to practise economy.

On the other hand we notice, in certain neighbouring provinces, that the passenger service is better than in the province of Quebec. However, it is very costly. The relative number of passengers carried by these trains from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or from Ontario is less than that of the province of Quebec. There are, Sir, two provinces which by themselves alone supply the greatest part of the country's traffic: the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. They supply almost forty per cent of all railway traffic.

We, from the province of Quebec, living on the south shore, if we consider the traffic service of the old Intercolonial or lines making up the Canadian National railway system, find that this part of the system from St. Rosalie to Campbellton brings in millions of dollars in profits, while there is a deficit in the service between Campbellton and Halifax. Shall we allow the spending in other provinces which have a better service than ours, of the profits realized in our own province?

I say there is a flaw in the service, and when the time comes to fully consider this question, when the time comes to submit our claims to the government, I can assure you that we, belonging to Quebec, shall have our eyes open. If rights and privileges are claimed, we shall equally request what we shall call rights or rather what will be mentioned throughout the country as privileges; but we do not think that, so far as we are concerned, one can call this privilege, because we dig down into our pockets so to maintain our lines, and, if we supply the freight, the least that we can expect is that this money be spent at home.

Now Sir, the hon. member (Mr. Stevens) who has just preceded me in this debate has hinted at a state of things which we are too often apt to forget. These gentlemen from British Columbia are at a disadvantage—I quite believe it—in some localities, in certain trades, owing to the existing high freight rates; but they have not admitted as frankly as the hon. member has just done that they have freight rates on certain items which are much below those we pay in the east.

Since the question of better readjusting the railway freight rates will soon be taken up, we shall insist on having these rates put on the same basis as those we pay in the east. It is all very well, Mr. Speaker, to talk of lowering the freight rates, it is all very well to say: We shall urge on the goverment our just claims, we shall endeavour to unite, province by province, section by section, so as to assert certain rights however, we must not forget one thing which to me seems the most important part of the question of railway freight rates: if we further lower our railway rates, what problem shall we have to face? We shall be deprived of a few million dollars owing to the rates which this present resolution before the House demands, another few million dollars owing to the readjustment of rates in the west, a few millions in the north of Ontario, a few millions in the north of Quebec, perhaps some millions in the Maritime provinces,. a total, Sir, that we shall have to add to the already enormous deficits of the country's railways. Where shall we raise the money to meet these deficits? Borrow? All very well. Pay the interest? Shall we always borrow to meet the interest, or shall we impose taxes to meet the payments? We shall have to choose between these two methods.

On the other hand, we are asked to lower the taxes; everybody clamors for it. It is impossible to lower the taxes and the railway rates at the same time. We must either pay one way or the other. Should we be forced to lower our rates, we shall, on the other hand, be obliged to levy taxes.

There is no escape; the burden of taxation falls upon the consumer who eventually finds himself in such a plight that he cannot make any further purchases, the wheels of commerce stop, and we shun Scylla to fall into Charybdis.

I think that the suggestion made by the hon. Minister of Railways should be adopted by the House. The discussion brought out, until now, the grievances and rights of our fellow citizens of British Columbia, Alberta and other western provinces; at this late hour, I humbly put before the House some of the problems which Quebec has to deal with in regard to this railway question, and if the hour was not so late, we would certainly hear from our friends and fellow citizens from the Maritime provinces. Would it not be more expedient, in view of this situation, not to further press the point, but to thoroughly consider the question and allow the government to add, perhaps, to this resolution the other questions which it might wish, in this connection, to submit to the House and to leave this question, for the moment, in abeyance. I agree with pleasure to the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Railways, and I think that the whole House will share these views, in order to ensure to the country more equitable railway rates, fairer to the west, but also to the east.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): So far as I am concerned, this question of freight rates is too complicated for me to vote on a resolution of this kind. This matter has been argued and reargued in this country from coast to coast for many years now and we have had legal experts such as Mr. McGeer and Mr. Symington as well as railway experts from the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern Railways, all of whom have taken different attitudes both before the press of the country and the Board of Railway Commissioners. I am sure, therefore, that no ordinary member of parliament, like myself, and certainly no ordinary reader, could come to a decision on the justice of a question of this magnitude. If the resolution had merely stated that an unfair discrimination should be eliminated I should unhesitatingly support it. But I must point out that those who have taken part have naturally spoken from a sectional point of view; I do not intend this in any critical sense whatever, because in the very nature of things this is bound to be the case; but the fact is that those who have contributed to the debate have spoken from the standpoint of their own sections. Now, if I spoke from the standpoint of my section I should probably oppose the resolution; and that I do not wish to do. If the resolution were adopted and its principle put into effect it would probably injure the part of the country which I represent. I do not intend to explain that point because I am sure that it will be appreciated by those who understand the freight rate question as it affects the west. But what I say is true, nevertheless. I do not choose, however, to oppose the motion. Whatever I might do on any other question, I have no desire to take any stand in this matter which might be injurious to the rest of the country although helpful to my own district, and I flatter myself that my constituents are big enough to view a question like this from the point of view of the welfare of the whole country. At the same time I do not feel capable of deciding by my vote a matter that is so complicated. There is in this country a body which, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has pointed out, should be the proper judicial authority to settle any matter of this kind, and that is the Board of Railway Commissioners. And I agree with him that if that body has not the confidence of the Canadian people then we should certainly either endeavour to restore the public confidence in the board or get a board constituted in whom the people will trust. If there is anyone in this House who should know the question a little better than anybody else, it would be a member of the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who ought to know.

Mr. MANION: Yes, who ought to know; for the members of the government as a Privy Council have been listening to appeals and dealing with the question for at least a year or two, perhaps for three years. They have had all these questions submitted to them, and if there is to be a decision by the House, then at least we should hear from those who recently have had to deal with questions of this kind. I do not feel capable of voting on the question if it comes to a vote, so that as I could not vote intelligently I should refuse to vote at all. When I say that I cannot vote intelligently on the question I think I am speaking for a large proportion of the House. There may be some who have given a great deal of study to the question, but even they, I venture to suggest, have not sufficient knowledge to enable them with confidence to pass an absolute opinion on the resolution, which demands a reduction in mountain rates,—rates which both railways contend are fair. I do not say that they are fair; I do not take that view. But I do take the attitude that I do not know enough about the question to vote either pro or con, and so far as I am concerned, if it is pushed to a vote I shall be unable to see my way to vote either way.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): The resolution introduced by my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) is a phase of probably one of the most intricate questions with which this parliament will have to deal this session. As a representative from the province of British Columbia, it is not necessary for me to state that I am thoroughly alive to and know something about the handicap under which that province has suffered during the past and at the present time. But knowing the condition as I do, and knowing the efforts that have recently been made by the people of British Columbia through the government of that province, who have employed trained counsel and made an exhaustive study of the question, extending over a period of years, and who have appeared before the tribunal which was considered the proper authority in matters of this kind—and created by the Parliament of Canada—I would hesitate to-night in disposing of this matter summarily. In fact, I should be very much perturbed if that were done. I am absolutely satisfied of the sincerity of the hon. gentleman who has submitted the resolution. He lives on the border of British Columbia and this question affects the province of Alberta almost as greatly as it does my own province, and I believe entirely in the hon. gentleman's sincerity and in the genuineness of his motive in bringing forward the matter. But I would ask him whether he thinks it wise to allow the question to go to a vote on the evidence that has been submitted this evening or on such evidence as might be brought forward to-night during this debate, even if it went into the hours of the morning. I do not believe we are qualified to dispose of the question on the evidence we have. As a matter of fact, from my own information on the subject, it seems to me that it is only by the most complete and exhaustive study of the question that one would be capable of coming to a sound judgment on the question. After the appearance of counsel for British Columbia before the railway commission some two years ago, there was an appeal from the commission and this question was argued before the Privy Council, the argument extending over two or three days. I listened to it with the greatest interest and fully realized the intricacy and difficulty of the question. As I have said, the resolution of my hon. friend deals only with one phase of a great problem which is to be dealt with by parliament; in other words, it is anticipating action which is foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne. Let me quote from that document.

> It is the opinion of my advisers that the attention of parliament at the present session should be directed more particularly to the desirability of effecting freer movement of commodities through an equalization of railway freight rates as between provinces and localities and through a lowering of carrying charges upon shipments by water.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. minister tell us what the government intends that to mean?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Well, I think we will have to "wait and see", as we say nowadays. That is what I am trying to advise my hon. friend from West Edmonton. Rather than jeopardize a good case, which I believe will appeal to the members of this House and to the people of the Dominion, I think it would be wise to allow it to stand until the whole question of freight rates can be brought before parliament. Then in the course of debate the case can be again brought forward to see if the government cannot suggest ways and means whereby it may be properly dealt with at this session. There can be no question of my entire confidence in the case that the province of British Columbia has made, but as a member from that province who has followed the question with great interest, I think it would be inadvisable for parliament to take action this evening, and in view of my remarks, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no right to speak on the motion, but I had intended to express my views before the minister moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): With the permission of the House, Sir, I beg to withdraw my motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to withdraw his motion?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, what I have to say in the way of a general enunciation of views on this subject I have already stated in this House on more than one occasion. It is this, that following the erection of the railway commission and the delegation to it of defined powers, the function of parliament is only to declare the principles upon which that commission shall act and which it shall apply to all the varied schedules of railway rates and all the varied phases of that complex question. The Railway Act now embodies the principles which parliament in its wisdom up to the present time has thought fit to pass to the commission and to declare its faith in. The government appears to be of the view that some new principles must be enunciated. What they are it does not for the life of it know. Consequently it resorts in the Speech from the Throne to language which means nothing whatever. For the first two sessions the Speech from the Throne rang the changes on co-ordination and co-operation. Those vanished into thin air; they became so grating to the ear that last session was substituted the word "equalization." It was applied in two or three ways in the Speech from the Throne a year ago, notably to flour; there was to be equalization of the rates on flour. What that meant no one in the House was advised, and finally by effluxion of time we learned that it meant nothing whatever. We are now told that there is to be equalization of freight rates as between provinces and localities. I asked the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) what the government had in mind in that sentence. He declines to tell us. I asked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King)—he who asserts that he is thoroughly convinced of the merits of the case of British Columbia, but who does not like to declare he is convinced in this resolution—I asked him what was in the mind of the government in that phrase, and from the question be backs gallantly away. The only conclusion is that the government had nothing in mind at all. Their object in putting the phrase in the Speech from the Throne was to convince hon. gentlemen who were deeply interested that the government had the subject under attention and hoped some time to declare something specifically to this House.

Now, if it is a fact that our duty is to impress into legislation the principles upon which the rate structure itself must be framed by the railway commission, then such a resolution as this has no place here at all. This is a matter of the application of a principle. Undoubtedly no one desires British Columbia to suffer under any unjust disability, under any discrimination taken in the whole; but it is a question whether or not you can remove a certain mountain scale of rates and at the same time leave all the rest of the rates and not discriminate in favour of the province. Consequently it is for the railway commission—a body of experts—to find whether or not there can be fairness, equality, to all the provinces, and this resolution put into effect. For that reason I am in favour of the adjournment of the debate, I am in favour of this matter going to the railway commission. If the government wants to declare some new principles, let it come down with its policy and we will act upon that policy; but my own opinion is this,—and while it is pretty close to the event one should not perhaps venture a prophecy—I venture to think that after we get this new declaration of principles we will find it is just a prolonged circumlocution, a mass of verbiage, resulting in a merely circuitous repetition of the principles that are in the Railway Act to-day. I fancy that after the whole thing is down we will find it is just a restatement in language akin to that so often employed in recent Speeches from the Throne—a restatement of the law as it is now.

Why is it, though, that we have these resolutions? Is it not just because this government has invited them by its own course?

Mr. GRAHAM: Are they new to this government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Pretty new. I have never followed any of them, in power or in opposition. I do not recall being bothered with them before. This government, by attacks on the railway commission in opposition, has undermined confidence in it, and none is more guilty than the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), who sits now with his head down and does not like this discussion; none is more guilty than he. They have undermined confidence in the commission; they have encouraged agitation against it; they have encouraged an agitation to throw into the maelstrom of parliament a task parliament is unfit to perform. Two sessions ago, in order to gain the favour of hon. gentlemen to my left, they took a course they knew was based on no sound principle at all. They undertook to declare for a policy of restoration of a certain definite scale of rates which has landed this country in chaos, which to-day has us in a position from which we can scarcely escape. All this they did in order simply to maintain a majority in parliament and themselves in the sweets of power. From this they must escape. When they took this course I told them these things would come upon them, that if they answered to the demand of the prairies for a certain definite scale they would have to answer the demand of the Maritime provinces, and has not that demand arisen? Is it not ringing through the Maritime provinces now? Has it not been ringing in the ears of the government every month since? And they cannot answer it. Now they are called on by British Columbia to step in and do the work the railway commission should have done, and should have done with the confidence of the Canadian people. They could expect nothing else. All last summer the Prime Minister of Canada went on the stump throughout the west and declared the policy of his government was to restore the Crowsnest pass rates, and behold! he says, we have done it.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If that is the policy of the government, it is the policy of the government to answer this resolution now, and to say yes or no. If it is the duty of the government to restore specific rates to one part of the country, it is its duty to say yes or no to this resolution, and not to hide behind the commission. The fact of the matter is the government took the course dictated by political expediency for the moment, and to-night it is paying the penalty. A government cannot stand to that course. It has to reverse itself. Whatever the humiliation may be, whatever the contortions may be, that reversion is going to take place this session.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): I wish to say a word or two before this resolution is finally dealt with. I am heartily in favour of the principle of the resolution.

The people of British Columbia have been suffering for many years, and are suffering yet, from the mountain scale, which we feel is an injustice to-day west of the mountains. At the time of the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, owing to the extra cost of construction through the Rocky and Selkirk mountains, large subsidies were granted to the company to offset the extra cost; and when they began to operate their lines, to offset the extra cost of transportation between the prairie and the coast, this mountain scale was allowed. At that time the volume of freight and passenger traffic was very small, but since then it has increased very materially. Since that time, too, something more important has happened; that is, we have had a railway constructed through the Yellowhead pass, where the grade is very much better than it is on the Canadian Pacific. I have been informed by engineers that we have a better grade from Edmonton to Vancouver than is to be found from Edmonton all the way to Fort William; that is, the grade through the Yellowhead pass at the highest point between Vancouver and Edmonton is lower than the grade from Edmonton to Fort William at its highest point, indicating that they can handle their trains through the Yellowhead pass at a very reasonable cost indeed. But has it had any effect? No. The mountain rate still prevails, based on the cost of operating over the Canadian Pacific railway, and that is why British Columbians feel to-day that an injustice is being done to them.

There is one other point I feel is more important than this mere matter of trade in British Columbia, and that is that we have, lying west of the Great Lakes, one of the largest areas of agricultural land in the whole of Canada. Much of that territory can ship with a profit by way of Vancouver. I think we can all agree on this principle: that if we are going to be able to compete in the markets of the world with our agricultural and other products, we must have as easy access as possible to tidewater, and we must be able to ship these products at the very lowest possible rate. I do not propose to take up any more time except to say that I endorse the principle of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy).

Mr. L. W. HUMPHREY (West Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make my position clear in regard to this resolution, as it involves a very important question for British Columbia. I do not wish to be accused of giving silent assent in any way to the position taken by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) on this resolution. This question of the elimination of the mountain rate is a very important one for British Columbia, but I would like to point out to the House that it is not the whole question as it affects freight rates for British Columbia. I have the honour to represent the southeastern district of the province of British Columbia. We are agreed upon the principle of the elimination, to some extent, of the mountain freight rate scale where there is discrimination, but the people of the West Kootenay district are also interested in another freight rate problem. They have their own local problems, and if this resolution came to a vote I would be compelled, under the circumstances, to vote against it. I have always believed that it is impossible for parliament either to tear down or build up a freight rate structure. In my opinion this is a question to be referred to some tribunal which is in a position either to eliminate or build up a freght rate structure. I cannot vote for this resolution because I do not know what the consequences would be so far as the southeastern part of British Columbia is concerned; I do not know what the effects would be regarding other parts of British Columbia. I want to do what is fair and right by my province, and I must also keep in mind particularly the views of my own district. I feel that by voting for this resolution I should be giving practically a blanket vote for the elimination of the mountain freight rates without knowing what the consequences would be to my own district and to other parts of the Dominion. Therefore I cannot support the resolution as it stands.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): I think the House will agree, in view of the importance of the issues involved in the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) that further consideration of those issues should be had. The House is asked to express an opinion that the scale of freight rates in force in the mountain section of British Columbia should be abolished. Hon. gentlemen from every other part of the country, who are interested in the question of a proper adjustment of freight rates, must realize that this matter cannot be dealt with piecemeal—that it would be very imprudent for this House to express an opinion as to what should be the freight rates in one particular part of the country without taking into consideration the whole problem of the earnings of the railways. This is the greatest problem which confronts this House and it has been, I do not hesitate to say from my long parliamentary experience, the greatest problem that has confronted the Canadian people in the last quarter of a century. Now it is very well understood there is before the Supreme Court of Canada, and no doubt a decision will be rendered in a very short time, the question as to whether or not what is known as the Crowsnest pass rates are in force to-day. Upon the effect of that decision will depend very largely the conclusion to which this House or the railway commission may come as to what ought to be the rates in any part of Canada, and I think the House will agree with me that it is the part of wisdom for us to await that decision before we attempt, so far as the House is concerned, to express any opinion as to how this question should be dealt with. I therefore, Mr. Speaker, beg to move the adjournment of the debate, so that before the matter comes up again, or before the government deals with the question in a general way, we may have the advantage of further information.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Graham, the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Tuesday, February 24, 1925.

The House met at three o'clock.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. G. G. COOTE ((Macleod) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9 to amend the Indian Act.

He said: This bill, Mr. Speaker, is intended to amend subsection 3 of section 90 of the Indian Act, which gives power to the Superintendent to lease Indian lands without the consent of the band.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MINERS AND STEEL WORKERS

NOVA SCOTIA LABOUR CONDITIONS DISCUSSED ON MOTION TO ADJOURN

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg) asked leave under rule 39 to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, to call attention of the House and the government to the acute distress existing among the coal miners and steel workers of Nova Scotia, many of whom are actually on the verge of starvation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before I put the motion to the House I may say that I have some doubts as to the regularity of the proceeding. I ask myself if this is not a matter which is more provincial in its character than federal. However, I am quite willing to give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt and leave the matter to the House. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to make his motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is very clear and states that twenty members must rise in their seats before leave may be granted.

The Clerk Assistant having stated that more than twenty members had risen:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I move that the House do now adjourn. I had hoped to be able to discuss the situation in Nova Scotia in connection with the motion now on the order paper, but within the last few weeks, and especially within the last few days, the situation there has become so acute that it seems only right to take the first opportunity of bringing the serious condition to the attention of the House. I trust that to-day we will not look at this matter from a partisan standpoint—indeed I cannot see why partisanship should enter into it at all—but rather that we should look at the matter from the standpoint of the welfare of our citizenship at large, and emphasize more particularly the humanitarian side of the question. My decision to bring this question before the House was precipitated by a telegram that I had a day or so ago from the relief committee of one of the local unions of Sydney Mines which reads as follows:

> Distress very acute at Sydney Mines; ask immediate relief from the government; people destitute; reply at once.

How should I reply to such a telegram as that? I might very readily escape responsibility by simply saying that it was not the policy of the government to give relief. I might even go further and say that that policy was based on a certain interpretation of the British North America Act, but I am quite confident that an answer of that kind would give no satisfaction to men who are half desperate at the present time, and I fear that I myself, occupying as a member of this House a position of some influence, have no right to take the easy course and to shelve responsibility in that way. I am well aware of the fact that negotiations are now in progress. According to the press, the provincial government has offered some new proposal of which we have not yet the details. I know it has been suggested that Nova Scotia might possibly take action in the direction of appointing a royal commission. I know it is generally held that the municipalities or the provinces ought to have first responsibility in caring for the people, and yet it seems to me that when an appeal comes from people who are in dire straits, we ought to give them, at least a hearing.

As regards the provincial situation, the men themselves are very doubtful whether the existing provincial government can be expected to do anything that will afford them any great measure of relief. I do not say whether they are right or wrong, but I know a large number of the men have lost their faith in the possibility of the government, as it now exists in Nova Scotia, helping them very much. Many of them are firmly convinced that that government is altogether too closely associated with the company in whose employ they work to be in a position to afford them any large measure of relief.

Had I replied to that telegram as I felt half inclined to do, I would almost have had to say: You men in Nova Scotia will have to do something desperate in order that you may, in some dramatic way, bring your case before the public at large. I do not want to have to say that, so I decided to make an appeal to this House and to the government that they would not force the men to resort to other means of trying to bring some relief to themselves and their families. The federal government has, relative to the peace, order and good government of Canada, certain powers that make it possible, nay, obligatory, that in circumstances of this kind action should be taken.

I would point out that need of a serious character knows no boundaries, provincial or even national. When an earthquake occurred in Japan a few months ago, expressions of sympathy and material relief came from all parts of this country. When there was an explosion at Halifax some years ago, we all know that from every side there came help. We, in the west, have known years when, owing to very bad crops, there was dire distress, and the government came to the assistance of the people and certain settlers were afforded relief. If there is the need that we are told there is, it seems to me that the government ought not to hesitate.

It is not my privilege to suggest in any detail what might be done. I would, however, urge action along two lines: First, that some immediate relief should be given to these miners and steel workers. Their wives and children ought not to be allowed to starve or to suffer extreme privations. Further than that, this government ought not to delay longer in instituting a very definite, impartial and full inquiry into the whole circumstances as they exist to-day in Nova Scotia. This is not a new question; we have had it up year after year. I think it is three years ago that, on representations from the mayors in some of the towns in Nova Scotia, my colleague (Mr. Irvine) moved the adjournment of the House in order that we might urge the necessity of the appointment of a royal commission.

A great deal has happened during those three years. Every year we have had industrial troubles. Every year we have had either a commission or a court of inquiry. Things seem to be worse now than they ever were before. It is quite true that there is no strike at present in existence and it is hoped that there will be no strike. It is quite true that there is no definitely declared lockout. The situation is that the agreement with the men has run out; that it has been impossible to effect a working arrangement, and that whether or not working arrangement is arrived at, there has not been for a long time sufficient work for the men. Many of the steel workers at Sydney Mines have been out of work for the past six months; many of the coal miners have been working short time for the past six months and their reserves are sadly depleted.

Let me give a few facts in this matter, because it is, after all, upon the facts of the case that we must form a judgment. A few days ago I called attention to statements made by Premier Armstrong when he was here heading a deputation from the Maritime provinces. According to press despatches, he is reported as having made this statement:

> That at the Sydney Mines in one of the coal towns, so acute is the situation that people were suffering from hunger and some were actually living on mushrooms picked in the woods. Such a situation, he said, required action by the government. There were 23,000 people unemployed and more than 100,000 dependents affected.

I do not know that that statement published broadcast through the press has ever been challenged. Personally, I am not in a position to say whether or not those figures are correct, but that is the information which has gone on record. I have had some personal knowledge of the situation within the last few months. Shortly after the new year I visited most of the mining camps in Nova Scotia, especially in Cape Breton. I lived for a week or ten days in the miners' homes. I talked with scores of the men. I learned something of their stories. I learned something of the struggles that they were having in trying to make a living for their families.

I talked with some of the women and learned how they were trying to feed and clothe their children. I am not surprised, after what I heard a few weeks ago, that the situation should have become well nigh desperate at this time. We have confirmation of that from several quarters just within the last few days. Let me read a report, from the last issue to arrive here of the Sydney Post—February 20. Under the heading "Industrial life of Sydney and mining towns in south is rapidly disintegrating," we have the following:

The presbytery of Sydney in common with other public bodies viewed with the gravest concern the present conditions prevailing in the industrial life of this community and believes that some immediate action is necessary if business and social life is not to disintegrate entirely.

An unprecedented situation has developed where many of our industrial workers are in direct want and compelled to accept charity in order to subsist; some 300 families in Sydney alone receiving aid from the relief association, while living conditions among the miners as evidenced by a statement published by the committee at Dominion No. 6 reveals a similar or worse state of affairs. The steel plant has been practically idle for the last six months, notwithstanding a drastic wage cut taken by the employees, and, though we are credibly informed that there are sufficient orders on the books to warrant its operation at the present time, it is still practically shut down. We therefore submit:

(1) That a royal commission of competent and disinterested men with full powers, be appointed at once to investigate thoroughly the organization, financial methods, and operations of Besco, including wage conditions and cost of living among the workers.

(2) That while suspending judgment on the question of the wage which the Besco is able to pay its miners, we believe that the 1924 rate should be continued until such time as the royal commission shall have reported.

(3) That the steel plant should begin operations immediately since we are convinced that there is no justification whatever for further using the idle steel workers as pawns in the game of industrial strategy.

There are just two observations in that article to which I should like to call attention. In the first place, there is the statement on the part of this clergyman in the district that immediate action is necessary if business and social life is not to disintegrate entirely. That, I think, is a most serious statement, sufficient in itself to warrant my bringing the matter to the attention of the House. And there is the second statement, that there is no justification whatever for further using the idle steel workers as pawns in the game of industrial strategy. It seems to me that whatever else we do we must bear in mind the human values, and I take it that the highest task which this House could set itself would be to defend the rights of the workers under these circumstances.

Let me read further from the Labour Herald, the organ of the labour men of Glace Bay:

One of the largest meetings ever held in Glace Bay took place last Sunday in the Savoy Theatre. The meeting was called by the idle miners of Nos. 2, 4 and 6 mines, for the purpose of laying the terrible conditions of want and starvation being endured by the workers at these collieries before the public, and to protest against the action of Besco in keeping these mines idle. The hall was packed to the roof with some 1,500 people when Mayor Morrison took the chair. Many of the doctors and clergy of the town took part in the meeting, telling of the terrible conditions found by them in their daily visits to the homes of the workers.

The miners employed in the above named mines have worked less than half time since January, 1923, and since the 15th of November last year have only got in 15 days' work. One clergyman, who evidently had given some consideration to the amounts that the miners were forced to live on, pointed out that families in his district for the year 1924 had actually lived on four cents a meal. He told of families where the children were clothed in discarded flour bags and where the only bed clothes were old feed bags.

In another column I find an account of a recent meeting of one of the locals of the miners. I quote the following:

The terrible distress existing in the Sydney Mines district was brought vividly before this meeting. The miners were feeling good, as they realized their strength in staying the greedy hand, when the door of the meeting place was pushed open and a little girl not more than ten years of age entered. She had a slip of paper in her hand which she gave to the president. It appeared that the father of the child could not leave home because his wife was sick and could not be moved or left alone, another child was dying and there was not a crust of bread in the house. The father had been idle two months. A committee was at once appointed to visit the family and give them relief.

The foregoing is from an account of a meeting of the local. I was informed two months ago that there were many cases of this character in this particular locality, but the gravest that I met with was at Sydney Mines among the steel workers.

Mr. FOURNIER: What is the paper from which the hon. member is quoting?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Labour Herald of February 21. My eye catches another contribution in this same paper which I think perhaps I might well read on this occasion. It is a little poem, not by some leader who is supposed to be very "red" in his tendencies, not the work of a bolshevist nor of any man commonly known as an anarchist, but one of the works of the English poet Shelley. Some of us read in our youthful days the ode To a Skylark, but possibly not so many of us read that other group of poems, The Masque of Anarchy, and others of a similar character which Shelley wrote. And I suppose that even when we read them we imagined that since Castlereagh had passed away, with the reactionaries of his period, the conditions depicted in this little poem could hardly be again found on English soil. Yet we have these miners resorting to the poems of Shelley, written at that time of great distress in the history of England one hundred years ago, in order that they may find in them some expression of the position in which they find themselves to-day:

WHAT IS SLAVERY?

'Tis to work and have such pay
As just keeps life from day to day
In our limbs as in a cell,
For the tyrant's use to dwell.
'Tis to be a slave in soul,
And to hold no strong control
Over our own will, but be
All that others make of ye.
So that ye for them are made,
Loom and plough and sword and spade,
With or without your own will, bent
To their defense and nourishment.
'Tis to see our children weak
With their mothers pine and peak.
When the winter's winds are bleak—
They are dying while I speak.
'Tis to hunger for such diet
As the rich man in his riot
Casts to the fat dogs that lie
Surfeiting beneath his eye.
And at length when you complain,
With a murmur weak and vain,
'Tis to see the Tyrant's crew
Ride over your wives and you.
Men of labour, heirs of glory,
Heroes of unwritten story,
Nurslings of one mighty mother,
Hopes of her and one another;
Rise like lions after slumber
In unvanquishable number;
Shake your chains to earth like dew
Which in sleep has fallen on you—
Ye are many—they are few.

As I have suggested, the reproduction of a poem of this character in the ordinary issue of a labour paper under these circumstances gives a sidelight into the pyschology of these coal miners and steel workers which we cannot very well disregard. If I wish to find further corroboration of the actual conditions that exist I might quote, not from any of these articles by clergymen or by workers themselves, but rather from a report presented to this government, the Winfield conciliation report. Although it may be true that the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council may have rendered the action of that body practically of no avail, I suggest that their findings are worthy of consideration.

The board is unanimously of the opinion that, due to the unfortunate relations existing for many years between the operators and the employees, as set forth in the statement of the employees submitted to the minister, and further elaborated in the statement submitted to the board, no permanent improvement in industrial relations can be expected until complete confidence is established between the operators and the employees, which may possibly be brought about by a fair and impartial inquiry by a competent authority with a view to ascertaining the actual necessary cost of mining, transporting and selling coal, the ability of the companies to pay a rate of wage satisfactory to the employees to earn a fair return on the capital invested, and the bearing which the attitude and action of the employees have in relation to the efficient and profitable carrying on of the operations.

And again:

That under prevailing conditions many of the employees are unable to obtain more than meagre part-time employment in the winter season, entailing serious far-reaching hardships, and that this deplorable state of affairs can probably be remedied by the companies being able to secure remunerative outlets for their products when access to the markets in central Canada is cut off by the closing of navigation, prohibitive railroad freight rates and other causes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly well aware that the situation in Cape Breton is an extremely complicated one. I recognize that there are more factors to be considered than could be dealt with under a motion of this character. I am not here to-day to censure any one particular group. I recognize some of the difficulties which this government might have in dealing with the matter. And yet it does seem to me that, whilst the government might give some immediate relief in the way of food and clothing, it should go further and make a general inquiry into the underlying conditions that have so frequently provoked actual industrial strife and led to the expenditure of large sums of public money in attempts to keep the peace, a state of affairs which its own committee says can be remedied only by a very exhaustive inquiry, an inquiry not merely into the working conditions and wages, but also into the financial side of the company's organization. Perhaps I cannot do better than read part of a statement recently submitted by the men themselves as the reason why they would not appoint a representative on the conciliation board. The statement is carefully drawn and puts into a very few pages the entire situation as the men see it.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend permit a question there? The Industrial Disputes Act having been declared ultra vires by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, what would be the use of the men appointing a representative on the conciliation board?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I quite agree that there was very little use in the men appointing a representative on the conciliation board. As a matter of fact they refused to do so before we knew the decision of the Privy Council with regard to the Lemieux Act. But my point in reading the statement of the men is that we may understand something of the underlying difficulties as they are seen by the men themselves. This is their statement:

To the Chairman and Members of the Conciliation Board and to the Honourable, the Minister of Labour for Canada.

Sirs,—We have been asked by the British Empire Steel Corporation to accept a cut in the wages of the employees in and about the corporation's coal mines, for the following reasons:

(1) The steel trade is so depressed that the Sydney steel plant cannot operate at a profit.

(2) The coal trade has become unsatisfactory, owing to the ability of United States producers to undersell our coal in the Canadian markets.

The Steel Trade

We cannot permit the condition of the steel trade to control the rates of wages for employment in the mines of the corporation, for the following reasons:

(1) The various coal companies are operating under charters of their own. The condition of the steel company is as foreign to the present wage dispute as is the state of affairs existing at the Halifax ship-yards, except in so far as the wealth and resources of the coal companies may have been diverted out of their proper channels to sustain the steel company and other stricken units of the corporation, to the detriment of the coal companies and their employees.

(2) During the war, when the steel company made profits, these profits were not sufficiently employed in rejuvenating the plant and bringing its constituent units up to date. Too much was paid out in dividends on common stock, and on unprofitable projects. The result to-day is that the steel plant is in many of its essential departments far behind the rival plants in America and cannot successfully compete with them. The employees of the different coal companies are not responsible for this mal-administration, and yet it is proposed to cut our wages because of it.

(3) During the period of normal operations, the steel plant carried a top-heavy staff of highly-paid officials, unjustified by its operations. Even yet, with its operations at a very low ebb for many months past, its over-staffing may be judged from the fact that it carries a general manager and general superintendent, with high salaries, as well as a vice-president of the merged companies, all in charge of operations which are not perceptible.

(4) The steel plant for years has carried out a policy of low wages, long hours and non-unionization, that drives many efficient young men to seek employment outside Nova Scotia. Those that remain generally do so because their interests are so centered that they cannot get away. Annually, the employees of the steel works are skimmed of a high percentage of their best men, who go to foreign plants, and their places are taken by low-grade European immigrants. We believe that a profitable industry cannot be run without paying wages that will attract the most proficient men in the trades concerned.

(5) We believe that the steel company has lost trade because it has marketed a lower grade product than that called for, and that some potential customers will not deal with it for that reason.

(6) The system of appointing foremen and the general treatment of employees on the steel plant is so defective that it has made the employees antagonistic to the welfare of the plant, and we believe that an industry cannot succeed in the face of the antagonism of its employees.

(7) We believe that the sales department of the steel company is peculiarly inefficient and unsatisfactory.

(8) We believe that large sums of money are injudiciously spent in the operation of this plant or its connections, in giving contracts of one kind or another to concerns in which directors of the corporation or their friends are interested.

(9) We were not consulted when the steel plant, which was unprofitable and had been kept alive for years before that time by government relief in the form of bounties and by tax exemptions was merged with the coal mines, which always were profitable. Since that time the profits or losses of the one as compared with the other have not been submitted to the public; but we believe that, with the exception of the years of war, the profit has been made by the coal mines, and that the steel plant has been carried on at a loss. It has not been able to pay its way, and it would be interesting to know who paid its way, and under what authority. The employees of the coal companies believe that they contributed heavily for this purpose; and that the reduction of wages now—

Mr. MARTELL: If my hon. friend will permit me? I am thoroughly in accord with what the men say in that regard: coal has paid for everything in Nova Scotia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I continue:

The employees of the coal companies believe that they contributed heavily for this purpose; and that the reduction of wages now proposed by the president is intended to be used for the same purpose. Figures have been given which show that the coal companies made money last year, and we have been assured that any cut in our wages will not reduce the selling price of coal. The reduction to be made in the miners' wages, therefore, will go to pay the debts of the lame-ducks of the corporation.

(10) Since the amalgamation of the Dominion Coal Company and Dominion Iron & Steel Company, the latter company has consumed annually between 500,000 and 1,000,000 tons of coal. We believe that the coal company has been credited with a price for this coal considerably under its contract value. Upon this item alone many millions of dollars have been taken from our wages for the benefit of the steel plant, and this improper practice still continues.

They pass on to consider the coal trade:

We are unable to consider costs in the coal trade as a ground for reducing our wages, because:

(1) The company has supplied us with figures showing that the cost of labour in only 40 per cent of the average selling price of its coal.

(2) We know of Dominion Coal Company coal sold in the province of Nova Scotia, in which the labour cost is nearer 20 per cent than 40 per cent.

(3) Accepting the company's own figures for the sake of argument, we are not allowed any control of at least 60 per cent of the price of the coal.

(4) Into this 60 per cent, which is controlled exclusively by the company, enter very many items which we know to be improper or inefficient.

(5) Items similar to the payment to members of the Newfoundland government find their way into the cost of coal.

(6) Heavy expenditures on construction and equipment augment the cost of coal though many of them are long overdue and are not entitled to appear in recent costs at all. If the money of the coal company had not been spent in other directions, there would be adequate funds for all the necessary requirements of the coal company at the right time, which would mean in itself a great reduction in the cost of producing and marketing the coal. For this condition we are not responsible.

They give an illustration of that, which I shall not read.

(7) Men about Cape Breton draw money from the company's funds and return no perceptible value other than to influence legislative or public opinion in the company's favour, irrespective of merit.

(8) The coal sales department of the company appears far from satisfactory.

(9) Offices at Montreal and London are carried at unjustifiable expense; and payments made thereat are a heavy burden on coal costs. Further, these offices tend to remove the supervision and control of the industries from Nova Scotia.

(10) We come in contact daily with officials of the Dominion Coal Company receiving high salaries, who, to our own knowledge, contribute little or nothing towards the efficient and profitable production of coal.

(11) If we should ask that all favours be withdrawn from members of the local legislature, and others of public standing, we would receive no satisfaction, or be told none were being given; while we have known some of the recipients by name.

(12) We do not receive true and correct statements of cost from the Company; nor have they throughout our lifetime, which has been spent in working in the coal mines, done other than continuously to attempt to deceive us regarding expenditures that are responsible for coal costs, and, in a similar fashion they have deceived the members of previous conciliation boards. That is their settled policy.

Wages Our Only Consideration

We find ourselves, therefore, in the position where we are permitted by the company to deal with no item in regard to coal costs other than the wages of the members of our union. In looking over these, for instance for the past year, we find that an appalling number of our members have drawn, in actual money, less than one-half of the wage necessary to maintain a decent standard of living as set out in the Labour Gazette.

We find that expensively equipped collieries have worked through the summer months in some instances only six or seven days a month. Other expensive ones are abandoned. The Scotia collieries and steel works have been largely dismantled. We have no confidence whatever in the ability of the president and directors successfully to manage or direct coal operations. We have come to consider the frequent watering of stock which has been going on in this corporation since 1892 as a financial operation that allows of stock market manipulations, but which is detrimental to the economical production of coal, and renders unstable the direction and administration of the industries, according as which group of stock market manipulators secures control. In fact, the financial aspect of the company has come not merely to overshadow, but actually to interfere with the technique of the industry it conducts. We are consulted only in regard to the wage cost and our stand in regard to it is that it is already too low to give our men a decent standard of living. It is now proposed to lower it further to pay for what we consider inefficient direction, unsound financing and poor management. If the corporation desires to indulge in extravagance, incompetence and stock market jobbery, we are apparently unable to prevent it. It does not appear fair, however, that the money wasted in that manner should be made a burden upon the already inadequate wages of our workers.

We have refused to take a cut in our wages and a conciliation board has been applied for by the corporation to assist in bringing that cut upon us. We do not doubt the sincerity or honesty of purpose of any such board, and we mean no discourtesy to it, but we have been through this experience frequently and the procedure is familiar to us. The board will be confronted with cost sheets and statements that are either deliberately untrue or which are so misleading as to be valueless. They may even be presented by officials who believe them. The board will be told, and the statement supported by figures, that we must take a cut or the coal mines cannot mine coal at a profit. We were told that about three times in one year, and each time in regard to a successively higher proposed wage rate, and each time equally untruthfully. And eventually we will be confronted with the batons of the provincial police and the bayonets of the Canadian militia as the final reason for us to accept a cut, when we ask for no more than humane treatment for our workers and their women and children. Many children cannot attend school owing to lack of food and clothing, and whole families face starvation at the present moment.

All the talk about costs of coal, and their introduction for the purpose of lowering wages, presupposes that we are in some measure interested in them. Yet, as we have said, apart from the labour item, which is less than 40 per cent of total cost, we are not only not consulted upon the subject, but we are not given truthful figures in regard to it. When this corporation so mends its ways and purifies its expenditures that it dare adopt a system of open accounting with us as has been done in parts of the Old Country, we shall meet it at least half-way. But, until that time, we can do no more than fight to maintain the all too miserable standard of living of our members and their families, and we have to conduct that fight in the face of the opposition of the press, the provincial and Dominion governments and the public at large, all of whom are forced to misjudge us by the false propaganda of this corporation.

One more paragraph relating to the corporation's propaganda standard of honesty:

About a year ago some officials of this company testified before a royal commission that no spy system was maintained by the company; while for several weeks, one of the weekly papers has been printing columns of the actual spy reports, with names and dates covering a period of several years, showing we are subject to espionage in our locals, at our work and in our homes. Yet whoever criticizes this corporation is termed "Red" and he must walk with great circumspection to avoid the jails of our country and the batons of provincial police; and false reports concerning our actions, the wages we receive, and the conditions of our employment are sent broadcast throughout the world without the slightest possibility of our ever overtaking these calumnies, or of our obtaining a fair hearing.

Mr. Speaker, it was an appeal of that kind that led me to decide to make this presentation in the House. I felt that I should do my utmost to give the men's side of the case to the public; and I felt also that if it was given a fair hearing we might at least hope that the government of this country would take some action in the way of setting on foot an inquiry which would finally determine whether there was any ground for such statements as the men are making, and, if not, what was the real reason for the continued industrial disturbance in this province.

It seems as though there is little more to be said. I am not here to make a speech; I am here simply to present a case, and I have confined myself almost exclusively to reading these documents. Evidently the men feel that they are not understood, and are opposed by almost all in authority. The latest report to the government was that there was no hope whatever of putting the industry in Nova Scotia on a proper basis until there was some sort of mutual understanding. I am sure that all members of the House will agree that individually these men are absolutely helpless. We are facing a situation which cannot be solved by individuals; I am not quite sure whether it can be solved by the corporation itself. It does seem as if the highest legislative body in the land, this parliament, is the body that ought to consider a matter of this kind, and I urge that action be taken, first of all to see that no Canadian child suffers, and secondly that we know the facts in the case.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that I voice the sympathy and regret that every hon. member feels that it should be possible in Canada for an hon. gentleman to arise in parliament and refer to the conditions existing at Sydney, Nova Scotia, which the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has just recited. I have followed carefully all that he has said in regard to the conditions of distress existing among the mine workers at Sydney, Sydney Mines and other places in that vicinity. I do not believe that he has exaggerated in any particular the actual conditions of distress that have been in evidence in that locality during the past few months—yes, during altogether too many years. For more than twenty years there has been industrial unrest, never settled, in Cape Breton. There has been conflict between the employers and the United Mine Workers' organization, representative of the employees, and, before that came into existence, other organizations representing the employees; and still it seems as though it has never been possible to settle satisfactorily the conditions under which the men work in the mines and in the steel mills of Cape Breton.

The hon. gentleman referred to telegrams, as I understood, which he had received from Sydney Mines as to the distress existing there. I want to assure him that the Labour Department, as well as ministers of the present government, have received recently, yes for the past two or three years, similar intimations of distress existing and similar requests for assistance. If it were possible, having regard to the trusteeship which members of this House owe to those who elected
4 p.m. them to sit in parliament, for this government and this parliament to deal in a consistent and proper way with the conditions to which my hon. friend refers, I would hope to be the loudest one in clamouring to assist him in dealing now, once and for all, with some of these conditions, and in wiping them out of sight forever. But the facts are that there is another government having distinct and definite autonomy, having exclusive jurisdiction over certain conditions which are in evidence in Nova Scotia relative to the company and the employees of the company which we are considering here to-day. Nova Scotia as a province owns the coal mines of that province; Nova Scotia as a province leases those coal mines; Nova Scotia as a province in the past several years has received in royalties on coal mined the following sums:

1919	557,456 02
1920, including royalty on salt	608,364 51
1921	556,385 12

I do not desire to cite these figures for the purpose of waving entirely to one side any dictates of humanity that might naturally come to us in a consideration of this matter, and to say that we should not give sympathetic, yes or other proper consideration to any claims made; but I do with all respect say that here is involved, and has been for many years past, a situation that the province of Nova Scotia, having exclusive authority to deal with it, should have dealt with or should now deal with, rather than that my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) should rise here in this parliament and ask us to go outside of our authority to take cognizance of it, and if necessary take drastic steps for the purpose of relieving a situation over which we have no direct or proper control. I would that it were otherwise, but if we are to be consistent, I think we must recognize the actual facts.

Let me now go for a moment into what has been the habit down in Nova Scotia. I do not for a moment suggest that it is inspired, but it has been the habit just the same. The habit has been to always try and see what could be secured from the federal government.

Mr. HANSON: Oh, oh.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) laughs, but those are the facts, and the records will disclose that when the former government, which he supported, was in power the same condition existed. While we are talking about that habit, let us here and now intimate that another concern, a part of the same corporation, the steel part of it, has received in the years gone by ninety millions of dollars of money out of the federal treasury in one way or another. I think that pretty nearly constitutes a habit of assistance from the federal government. And during that time men, women and children were suffering under conditions of hardship which all too often they did not deserve under the British flag and in this Canada of ours.

That was just merely an aside, on account of the sarcastic laugh of my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson).

On December 5 last, we received a letter from the town clerk of Sydney Mines which stated:

> At a meeting held in the council room, town of Sydney Mines, the town clerk was authorized by vote to make application to the federal and provincial governments for aid to assist the town to give relief to the poor and distressed cases. This meeting was presided over by the poor committee of this town. All the churches had by pulpit notices invited their people to be present at this meeting and to assist by sending in clothing and eatables. Some relief has already been given. The meeting asked that the amounts asked for would be as follows: Federal government, $5,000; Provincial government, $2,500; Town of Sydney Mines, $2,500.
> The immediate poor and distressed are the dependents of men who have been out of employment for a long time.
> Your favourable consideration is solicited.

More recently, or on the 17th day of this month, we received a telegram from Glace Bay reading:

> Destitution here account of idle mines, 2,000 employees and their dependents on verge of starvation; mass meeting of citizens demanded to know why no work; McCann held out no hope to relieve distress unless the Canadian National Railways, largest consumers, gave orders to buy banked coal; citizens implore order to relieve present distress.
> M. T. SULLIVAN, Chairman.
> A. M. MACLEOD, Secretary.

This telegram was replied to in a letter of February 18 in part as follows:

> As you know the province of Nova Scotia owns the coal mines and secures a royalty on every ton of coal mined while the province has exclusive jurisdiction over questions affecting property and civil rights within the province, and it would therefore appear that your representations should be made to your provincial government in so far as the relief of distress growing out of unemployment is concerned.
> Noting your reference to the C.N.R. giving orders for and banking coal, would advise that while I shall be glad to transmit your message to the Minister of Railways, you, I am sure, must be awere that the Canadian National Railways are operated independently of government interference in any way, and we could therefore use no more pressure on the Canadian National Railway in this matter than we would feel disposed to use in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

A number of telegrams and letters have come from time to time trying to impress upon the government or ministers of the government the necessity of compelling the Canadian National Railways to buy more coal than they say they need and to bank that coal for future use. The railways have taken the position that they do not desire to use banked coal in many cases, and that it is not necessary to use banked coal which deteriorates, and as a matter of fact at some of the coal mines, at least two of them at Sydney Mines, my understanding is that the coal could not be banked in any case, and that the only time those mines can work is when there are orders for the product and it can be shipped directly to the buyer.

Now the reason that I am reciting these facts is to show that we have had this contention that my hon. friend has brought before us to-day, yesterday, and for many months past and even during the past two or three years; I do not think that it is any exaggeration to say that it has been to a greater or less extent before the federal government for the past twenty years.

Let us look for a moment at the figures of employment down there, which I want to assure my hon. friend do not appear to be very much worse right now, so far as the operation of the mines is concerned, than they have been during the past year. During the year past the mines have not worked anything like continuous time, and as a matter of fact the average time, according to my advice, that miners work in Nova Scotia is from 173 days a year to 202 days a year. If they can work 202 days a year, my advice is, they think they have had a fair amount of work, and they think they have been pretty well taken care of. Personally I do not believe many hon. members of this House would think they were in very good shape as workmen if they were permitted to work for only 173 or 202 days a year. But the working days have not been even that good during the past year. We find that the Dominion mines at Glace Bay, for the week ending February 14, worked 67½ days. That is 6,117 employees in 12 mines worked 67½ days for the week; that is almost full time—a little better than five days' work per week per man while over at Sydney Mines two collieries with a working force of 2,106 employees only worked 5½ days which would amount to less than three days' work per week per man; and in other mines the conditions have not at times been that good. When the miner's committee and the various coal companies decided on December 31 last that they could not reach an agreement on a new wage scale, they did agree that the present wage rate would continue until the board of investigation had investigated the then existing situation and had filed its report. The company on their part agreed to work all the mines for which they could get orders, and so far as the department is aware that has been done. The men have worked all the days when there were orders for the mines to fill, but that has not been sufficient to give full time either during the period that has elapsed since January 1 last, or for many months prior to that time. The conditions, so far as I know, are almost identically the same now as they have been for many months past. And so, Mr. Speaker, it is popular for certain individual labouring men, their wives and their families, not only in Nova Scotia but in Alberta, in British Columbia, and in other provinces, whenever they are in distress or want, whenever they think that something should be done and that something must be done to alleviate certain conditions of which they complain, to make a claim on the federal treasury, to make a demand that the federal government come to their assistance and provide the wherewithal with which to change their existing situation.

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? Had not the miners of Cape Breton, apart from the steel workers, the majority of whom are native-born Cape Bretoners, as much right to come to this government and demand that they be protected and that things be done for them as the people of the west have to demand that we give them the Crowsnest pass rates at the expense of the rest of the Dominion?

Mr. MURDOCK: I think it has been said that every British subject has a right to approach the foot of the throne, and they have hardly got there when they have come to this parliament. The point that is here involved is whether, having regard to the individual citizen or a body of citizens in any province of the Dominion,—whether they be farmers in destitution in some part of Alberta or Saskatchewan, or lumberjacks in hard luck in some part of British Columbia, or miners down in the Kootenay district or elsewhere in distress,—it is consistent and proper that this federal government should undertake to vote money in order to take care of the situation that may be complained of.

Before closing, I want to say just one word about the proposals for arbitration that were set forth by the Winfield board. As the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has said, the miners indicated about January 1 that they would not have anything to do with a board of investigation; that they had no confidence in the company's request for a board, and that they had no confidence in the intention of the company after the award of the board had been filed. They have maintained that position very consistently and respectfully from that date to this. In my judgment they were justified in taking and maintaining that position, for the simple reason that their experience has been that investigations by boards supposed to make inquiries into questions affecting their conditions have never been what they should be, nor as definite, deep and searching as they should be to get at the truth and the facts involved. The Winfield board on 9th February arrived at what was a unanimous expression of opinion. And the House will please follow me by recalling that when this board was asked for, no decision had been rendered that the federal government had no right to appoint this board; that decision, which came later, on the 20th day of January, made the action that had been previously taken indefinite as to the final result. But we went ahead and the board agreed to function in order to see what could be done. Later, on February 9, it expressed the unanimous opinion indicating what, in its judgment, should be done in the matter of further investigation.

Mr. MARTELL: At the time that this board was appointed and before it had begun to take evidence, a decision had been rendered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that the federal government had no jurisdiction in these matters. These men were then simply in the office of mediators. The miners were not represented and the native-born Nova Scotian who was a miner was absolutely right in not accepting the judgment of this board or any other board. Mr. Winfield is a corporation man in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend is correct in stating that when the board was finally constituted the decision of the Privy Council had been handed down. The fact remains that the Winfield board went ahead and expressed certain unanimous opinions as to the constitution of a real board of inquiry to go into all phases and causes of the now existing dispute and the disputes that have existed and occurred from time to time during the past many years. It must be remembered that the Winfield report was only being despatched from Halifax to the Labour Department on the 9th day of February; but a peculiar co-incidence is, that on the same date there started from Halifax to Sydney from the vice-president and general manager of the companies to the miners a considerably different proposal as to the formation of a board of inquiry to go into this controversy and, if possible, reach a settlement. As I think the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg placed on the record the report of the Winfield board, I want to place on record the proposals of the company of the 9th day of February. This was addressed to J. W. Macleod, president, and Alexander A. McKay, secretary-treasurer, district No. 26, United Mine Workers of America, Glace Bay, N.S. It reads:

In our letter of even date we have explained our objections to the propositions involved in the resolution therein referred to and why we think an attempt to work out your suggestion in any concrete form would not result in a satisfactory settlement.

We now submit the following proposition, namely:

That the company and the U. M. W. of A. enter forthwith into a contract to continue until the 30th of November, 1926, providing that,

(1) An impartial committee of investigation be constituted by either one or two members being appointed by the representatives of the employees and the same number by the company. These representatives to appoint a chairman and if they fail to agree on such appointment such chairman to be appointed by either the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, of Canada, the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, or the Acting Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec, at the option of the representatives of the employees.

(2) Such committee so constituted to have power to investigate:

(a) All matters in respect to the company relevant to the question of what rates of wages the company can reasonably be expected to pay under existing conditions:

(b) All matters relating to the U. M. W. of A., district 26, in so far as such matters may affect the present situation.

(3) Such committee to have power, after such investigation, by its report to establish a scale of wages to be effective from the date of the acceptance of this proposal until November 30, 1926, and the company and the employees to respectively obligate themselves to accept such a scale of wages.

(4) Pending the report of the committee and from the date of the acceptance of their proposal the company to pay the 1924 scale of wages less ten per cent. After such report such wages to be readjusted to conform to the rates thereby established.

(5) All evidence given before the committee shall be treated as confidential and the committee shall make public its findings only.

(6) If the committee deems it desirable that evidence be taken under oath it may apply to the Governor-in-Council to be constituted a commission under the Public Inquiries' Act of the Province of Nova Scotia.

(7) The report and recommendations of a majority of such committee shall for the purposes of this agreement be deemed the report of such committee.

That is the proposal now from the company to the employees. Personally, I do not blame the miners of Nova Scotia if they do not accept any such proposal as the basis for appointing a board of inquiry, because I do not think such a board of inquiry would get any further than many boards somewhat similarly constituted have in arriving at true and actual facts as to the composition of the company, its stock, whether actual or watered, and many other things that should be considered in arriving at the true facts.

Some one may say that I should not say these things, and if they do, I shall not take issue with them. It may be that someone under our constitutional rights, yes, and our constitutional restrictions, might observe very curtly, "That is none of your business". As I pointed out in my opening remarks, Nova Scotia owns the coal mines; Nova Scotia leases the coal mines; Nova Scotia secures a royalty on every ton of coal mined from those coal mines; Nova Scotia issued the charter to the company which operates the mines; Nova Scotia has exclusive jurisdiction over property and civil rights within the province. And all these things being so, if anyone unkindly, or for any reason at all, informed me that I had no right to criticise a proposal for investigation, that it was none of my business, I suppose I should have to accept that without protest. But I think, indeed I hope, that this discussion may go far enough for us to get right down to brass tacks and determine whether this canker on the industrial life of Canada should be permitted to exist any longer. Personally, since taking this seat in the House, I have felt much more strongly on this particular situation than may be indicated by anything I have expressed to-day. At the same time, however, I recognize some of the things involved in the partnership of authority entrusted to us as representatives of several autonomous governments carrying on the public business here in Canada. In this particular situation which my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) brings up to-day, the federal government has no direct authority although of course it can give ear to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman to vote out of the treasury of the Dominion any amount necessary to provide relief for those who may be in distress in the vicinity of the mines of Nova Scotia.

Mr. ARTHURS: Would it not be just as logical for the government to vote the $5,000 requested by the municipal associations of Sydney Mines—I am simply quoting what I have heard in this regard—as to afford relief to the extent of millions for seed grain in the west, or relief to Home Bank depositors?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend may be right, but if I were to follow that line of argument I should have to consider this fact, that the federal government has considerable latitude of authority in dealing with questions affecting agriculture. The federal government spends millions of dollars each year in the improvement of agricultural conditions from one end of Canada to the other, and it might be very properly held, although I have not gone into the point, that the particular seed grain transaction to which my hon. friend refers was directly in keeping with its authority in agricultural matters.

Mr. MARTELL: I would ask the minister this question right here and now. Why does the Department of Agriculture persist, through the Civil Service Commission, in calling for applications to fill various vacancies while the people of Cape Breton are left to starve?

Mr. MURDOCK: I must ask the hon. member to refer that question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell).

Mr. GOULD: Is it not a fact that the moneys that have been advanced in the interests of agriculture in regard to which complaint is made were a loan and not a gift? It has to be repaid.

Mr. ARTHURS: It was never repaid.

Mr. GOULD: It is secured by mortgage.

Mr. MURDOCK: Somebody is next, I do not know who. However, if I may be allowed to continue, I have just a few more words to say in conclusion. If there were any consistent way in which, having regard to our authority, we could do something in the way my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg suggests, to alter existing conditions in Cape Breton island, I would be one of the most pronounced supporters of just such action. But I would add this, in no disrespect but with all consideration for what is involved in the question, if ever the old adage was true, that charity and assistance begin at home, surely it is true in this instance, when we find an autonomous government receiving some $600,000 a year in the way of royalties on the mining of that coal, and having complete jurisdiction over the questions that are here involved. Is not that government the proper body to receive representations for assistance and such action as may be necessary to ensure, if possible, that never again shall similar conditions of unrest occur? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this view should be recognized by my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg as well as by others in this House.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): During the past three sessions of parliament I have moved in this House resolutions relating to a national coal supply for the mines of Nova Scotia and Alberta, and in all of those resolutions I have suggested a remedy for the present unfortunate state of affairs described to-day, namely protection and bonuses. Three years ago I offered a cure for the ills of Nova Scotia particularly, so far as the mining situation is concerned. For the unemployment that exists in connection with those mines and unemployment generally in Canada someone is certainly responsible, but quite evidently there is a desire on the part of all who are concerned to evade that responsibility. We are told by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) that the provinces and municipalities are responsible for unemployment—under the British North America Act—while they in turn disclaim the responsibility. The government is charged with the work of bringing immigrants to this country to the large centres of population, and although it has control over the tariff the Minister of Labour claims that the province of Nova Scotia should take care of the situation. It seems that there is, as the military men say, a general passing the buck. The fact of the matter, however, is that at the present time the government of Canada is affording relief to the mines of Nova Scotia. Last session there was placed in the estimates some $200,000 as a bonus for the carrying of coal from Nova Scotia to central Canada, the object being to enable the mine owners to keep open and to encourage the government of Nova Scotia to give what assistance it could towards the relief of the miners and secure a market for Nova Scotia mines in central Canada. That bonus served the purpose of keeping some of the mines open and of encouraging the owners to pay their men more liberally and work some mines better than they had done before, so that it did a great deal of good in those places. It seems to me that one way in which the government might meet the present situation would be to extend the bonus principle. By putting an embargo on coal we would soon find that every pound of coal used in Canada would be mined and coked under the British flag—it would come from the Maritime provinces, from Alberta and from Wales. In that way the government would be doing something to solve the unemployment problem and develop a national coal policy.

The condition of affairs in the coal industry of Cape Breton is not a local one by any means; there is unemployment all over the Dominion, and it is at its worst in some of our cities in central Canada, particularly in the city from which I come. I am not interested in propaganda on behalf of any party, but I am interested in finding work for the unemployed in my riding. The government declares that it has nothing to do with unemployment, that it is purely a provincial and municipal matter. Well, the fiscal policy and the immigration policy of the government are largely responsible for the economic condition of the country to-day, and I submit that the federal authorities should shoulder their share of the burden of solving the problem of unemployment. Allow me to repeat a few paragraphs from an address on protection during the last budget debate May 5 1924.

outlining what I believe to be the cure for the economic ills with which the maritimes and Nova Scotia are afflicted at the present time:

> The principles of the good old National Policy should also be applied to join the coal fields of Alberta to the furnace and kitchen stoves of a great section of Ontario. The coal fields of Nova Scotia should also share with Alberta the benefits that would follow an attempt to apply the principles of protection to the problem of Canada's coal supply. My motto is Canadian coal for Canadians. The principles of protection should fast be organized into an economical system that will ensure an all-Canadian or other all British supply of fuel to take the place of the almost 3,000,000 tons of American anthracite and almost 11,000,000 tons of bituminous coal consumed in this country. The exact figures are 2,814,650 tons anthracite and 10,583,396 tons bituminous coal imported from the United States in the last year of record. Let the supply of all-Canadian or other all-British coal be assured, and then put on a duty that will not permit a ton of American coal to be sold in Canada. Canada's money now goes out in payment for $24,705,536 worth of American anthracite, and $39,281,245 worth of bituminous coal, every year. These figures mean that Canada's coal bill pays $32,000,000 in wages to 15,000 United States workers every year. These figures mean that Canada's coal bill maintains United States workers and their dependents almost equal in number to the population of Ottawa. These U.S. workers and their dependents should be Canadian workers and their dependents, earning good wages around the coal mines of Alberta and Nova Scotia, and helping to supply a home market for the products of Canadian agriculture. The distribution between Nova Scotia and Alberta of the $64,000,000 that now goes to pay Canada's yearly coal bill to the U.S. would help to spread prosperity beyond the bounds of these provinces.

Now, what did Hon. Mr. Armstrong the Premier of Nova Scotia say in reference to this policy? He came up to Ottawa a few weeks ago and advocated a policy of bonuses and protection for the Nova Scotia mines; he even asked that an embargo be placed on United States coal for the maritimes' benefit. This is a concrete case; there are others. As I have already said, unemployment is not confined to the coal industry of Cape Breton, and probably no province is suffering more from industrial depression and unemployment to-day than the province of Ontario. The Rev. Canon Vernon of the social service department of the Anglican church of the diocese of Toronto delivered a sermon recently on the hardships which the unemployed of our cities and towns are suffering in Toronto and elsewhere. Let me remind hon. members that the Anglican church minds its own business; it is not interested in the propaganda of the Minister of Labour or any other minister; it is interested in solving the unemployment problem and other social problems, and that problem concerns primarily the government through its immigration policy, its fiscal and transportation policy and its banking and trade and commerce policy, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) may say with respect to the responsibility of the provinces and municipalities in this matter.

]Mr. Church.]

The unemployed question is the most difficult problem we have. It is one for the federal government who should be assisted by this parliament and by the provincial governments, by the municipal authorities and by the churches to alleviate the distress arising out of unemployment.

It is only by enlisting the ability, the heart, the intelligence, and patience and energy and courage of every citizen that we may hope to improve the present condition of affairs of unemployment in Canada, whether in the coal mines of the Maritime provinces or in any of the other industrial activities of the Dominion.

We were told by the Minister of Labour last session—for this is not the first time the subject has been brought forward in this House—that the government's contribution for the relief of unemployment had decreased from over one million dollars in 1922-1923 to only four thousand dollars in 1923-24.

Mr. MURDOCK: Might I ask my hon. friend if he does not know that that four thousand dollars was for unemployment relief of returned men?

Mr. CHURCH: No. Mr. Speaker, I have lived in the city of Toronto and know something about conditions there. The Minister of Labour may have his agents, his subagents, his filing clerks and the regular retinue of a standing army on the payroll supposed to take care of unemployment, and he does nothing; but when it comes down to the depth of winter, when in December and January immigrants from the Old Country are being dumped on the city of Toronto, the time has come for the government to do something. The city of Toronto, which contributes over $100,000,000 to the exchequer, and receives only about all told $281,000 in return, in the estimates, does not want to sponge on the federal government for the relief of her unemployed or for anything else; it will pay its part but not take care of all Canada, and our city does object to having 4,500 unemployed from the harvest fields of the west and other districts dumped on the streets of Toronto The various civic and charitable organizations all help the cause. Also the St. George's and other societies, the churches and other charitable organizations do their part, while as a matter of fact the government of Canada is responsible primarily for the conditions which have brought about such widespread unemployment, and therefore should contribute towards its relief. I have many cases of distress brought to my notice every day when I am in Toronto, and some of these people from the Old Land, new immigrants, I find were told by the immigration officers and the agents of the transportation companies that there was plenty of work for them in Canada. Surely such misrepresentation should be checked up and those responsible summarily dealt with. I am not interested in propaganda either for or against the government, but I do plead with the government to give assistance to those unfortunate people who are out of work and in distress through no fault of their own. In days of stress and strain like these a little heart is wanted and a united effort to solve this great problem between the federal, provincial and municipal authorities all acting in unison. As one who has been in touch with unemployment in the city of Toronto I submit that it is the duty of the federal government to co-operate with the provinces and with the municipalities. Premier Ferguson of Ontario told his legislature the other day that unemployment was not a matter for the province but was a matter for the Dominion. He said, however, that he was driven to taking some action, so he brought down legislation, along the line of a measure passed by the Union government in 1917 or 1918, of aiding municipal works on a difference of cost basis to aid unemployment and so the Ontario Legislature voted $200,000 for this purpose. I do not say that the Minister of Labour is to blame for the condition of affairs here, but I do think he might show a little more heart in dealing with the problem, especially when conditions are as they are to-day. The minister told the House last session that he was going to call a conference of all the provinces and municipalities on the question of unemployment, but that conference was a farce and broke up without any tangible result; the minister took one stand, the provinces another and the municipalities still another, and the representatives of the municipalities went home very much disappointed. This question is one of the most important that parliament has to face to-day. Recently the House dealt at some length with an academic question relating to the British North America Act which, by the way, is now being held up by the federal government as a justification for its not taking any part in the matter of the relief of unemployment. But any measure of temporary relief, while it may tide the unemployment over the difficult period of a month or two will not by any means solve the final question of unemployment for the future. It is not a question of propaganda; it is not a political question, it is rather an economic question and there should be united effort on the part of the Dominion, the provinces and the municipalities, the church and the nation, to deal with it in some effective way and employing the best intellect, heart and intelligence to solve it one and all.

I understand that a deputation was to meet the government with regard to unemployment to-day from western Ontario; for there is considerable suffering from unemployment in London, Hamilton and in many other cities in western Ontario. I am informed, however, that the deputation was headed off by telegrams in which they were told not to come by the Minister of Labour, otherwise they would get the same answer that had been given on a previous occasion, namely, that unemployment is not a matter for the Dominion government. Public opinion is not satisfied with the way this parliament has dealt with the question of unemployment. It has been made a football of and has been kicked about to and fro from the municipalities, the provinces and the Dominion, while in the meantime many men, women and children are in dire need and want and are being kept by the municipalities. In Toronto this winter $800,000 of the taxpayers' money was used in relief to the unemployed. What else can they do? They cannot let these people starve on the street. In Toronto they maintain a house of industry and almost every church and charitable organization in that city has its social workers' organizations all doing their part and trying to look after their own unemployed. A large number of the population are out of work; of some we know nothing about, because many people are too high spirited to report to an employment bureau that they are out of work. In my whole experience as a resident of the city of Toronto I have never known of as much suffering from unemployment as there has been during the past winter. I refer to Canon Vernon in this connection; he preached a sermon a week ago last Sunday morning in the St. Simon's church, Toronto, and speaking of the dire state of affairs in that city he said:

> The relief of the unemployed alone can never meet the needs of the case. . . . The nation, the province, the city and the church must consecrate their best in intellect, heart and conscience towards the solving of the problem of unemployment.

The medical health officer of the city of Toronto, Doctor Hastings, a man of conservative views who is at the head of a large staff, has reported to the city council, through his social workers, that conditions with respect to unemployment have been worse in many phases this winter than ever before. There are always three views to a question, your own, the other fellow's and the right view. The Minister of Labour evidently thinks there is on the question of unemployment only his view, but I ask him not to forget the other fellow's view—He asks for bread and you give him a stone. I suggest to him that instead of blaming the British North America Act for all the diseases this country is heir to, including unemployment, he should remember as I again repeat that there are three views on this unemployment question, your own view, the other fellow's view and the right view. I hope the minister will not fail to consider all these views and that he will give consideration to the representations of the municipalities and provinces.

References to this matter have appeared in the government organs and in the press generally; and here is an article which appeared in the Globe last week complaining about the unemployment in Toronto. They appear often in the daily press there.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to criticize anyone or to curtail debate, but I would point out that the rule is very clear with regard to the debate on motions of this nature. It says:

A motion to adjourn (except when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) shall always be in order.

I have stated that I had some doubts as to the right of the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth to bring this matter up in the form of a motion to adjourn the House to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. That doubt still exists in my mind, but I have given the hon. member the benefit of the doubt and the House has agreed that he discuss the matter. But I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the question at issue, namely, the distress prevailing at Sydney Mines. Any discussion of unemployment in Toronto, Montreal or elsewhere is not in order on this motion. The matter involved is a matter of definite public importance; it is specific, and the debate must be restricted to what is dealt with in the motion. I would therefore ask hon. members to respect the rule of the House in this regard.

Mr. CHURCH: Thank you; I have just about finished, Mr. Speaker. Your ruling is fair and correct. I am quite willing to confine my remarks to the situation in Cape Breton. But the problem of unemployment in Cape Breton will never be solved unless we apply a national policy with bonuses and a tariff wall—unless we have a system of national fuel supply. And this national policy should take care of the owners of the mines, the workmen in the mines, the labour problem in the mines, wages and production in the mines and their development along national lines. I have here a clipping which shows that out of 5,000,000 tons of coal shipped into the province of Quebec last year, 3,000,000 tons came from the United States and only 2,000,000 tons from Cape Breton. Under a national policy all the coal Canada needs should be mined and coked under the British flag and secured from Nova Scotia, Wales and Alberta and not a pound from the United States. I firmly believe that if the government would apply the National Policy to the mines of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia, it would get rid of the labour difficulties there, and get rid of unemployment. It would be doing something in a practical way to meet the situation. I am not unmindful of the difficulties of the government regarding unemployment, and I am quite aware that a policy that has been followed for sixty years cannot be changed in the twinkling of an eye, but I do believe the policy I advocated for the past four years, the National Policy, is right and that Premier Armstrong, of Nova Scotia, is quite right in coming to Ottawa and asking this government to sit down and consider what shall be done for the coal miners and the coal operators in his province, along bonus and embargo lines.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as you have just remarked, the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) moved the adjournment of the House to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, and you, Sir, expressed the view that there was some doubt in your mind as to the wisdom of permitting the motion, having regard to what I assume you considered as the local nature of the issue which was being brought before the House. I think the wisdom of your doubt in the matter, if I may say so, has been very emphatically disclosed by the despatch which has just been sent out to the country by the Canadian press reporting the action of Premier Armstrong, of Nova Scotia, this afternoon, in reference to the matter here under discussion.

The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), in replying to the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg, stressed the point that inasmuch as the government of Nova Scotia owned the mines of Nova Scotia and, inasmuch as matters respecting mining come under the jurisdiction of the province of Nova Scotia, doubtless the Premier of Nova Scotia would himself be more familiar with the situation and the adequate means of meeting it than any other person, and that it was a matter essentially and primarily for the province of Nova Scotia to consider.

The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg stated that his object this afternoon in making the motion he did was to give publicity to the men's side of the case, and to urge upon this government that a commission of inquiry be appointed to inquire into the facts. Now, Mr. Speaker, if we had accepted what the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg suggested this afternoon and had agreed to appoint a commission to inquire into the facts, what would have been the consequences? The consequences would have been that while this House had agreed to appoint a commission to inquire into the facts, we should have discovered that the government of Nova Scotia had also agreed to appoint a commission of inquiry, and had so notified the parties at the very time the discussion was taking place in this House. I mention this matter in the form in which it has come before me at the moment as an illustration of the importance in this parliament of clearly distinguishing between the matters that properly come within the scope of discussion here, and those which more properly belong to provincial jurisdiction. A great deal has been said about unemployment, questions of local distress and the like. The government has no desire in any way to ignore any situation that may be of consequence to individuals or localities in different parts of the country, but so far as the business of government is concerned, those who have had to do with the framing of the constitution of the country have thought it wise to suggest, and in some cases to define very clearly, a division of labour between the federal government and the governments of the several provinces, and I submit, without going into a discussion of legal rights under the British North America Act, that the more one views these questions in a broad way, the more one will see the wisdom of leaving to local governments, to provincial governments, questions of local and provincial concern, and of confining the discussions of this parliament to matters that are essentially of national concern.

Here is the communication which has been sent by the Premier of Nova Scotia this afternoon to the parties who are immediately concerned in the difficulties in the 5 p.m. mines there. I think it grants all that the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg has requested to-day in the way of investigation into conditions and also points a way to a possible solution of existing difficulties. The communication is addressed to J. E. McLurg, Vice President, British Empire Steel Corporation, Limited, Sydney, N.S. and to John W. Macleod, President, District No. 26, United Mine Workers of America, Glace Bay, N.S. It reads:

Dear Sirs:

As the result of recent conferences with you individually, we had an opportunity of quite fully considering the difficult, and in many respects delicate situation with which you are now confronted. Permit me to express my personal appreciation as well as that of the government to you both for your very frank presentation of your respective attitudes. In view of the public importance of the issues involved, and with the earnest hope that the present involved situation may be more satisfactorily solved, I beg to submit for your respective and joint careful and early consideration the following:

(1) I am advised and convinced that the British Empire Steel Corporation is about to take such immediate action as will put into effect a decision of that corporation to reduce the present or 1924 miners' wage scale by at least 10 per cent. It would further appear that the method of giving effect to the above decision on the part of the corporation will be the posting of a notice to that effect at the various collieries affected.

(2) It is quite apparent from the correspondence exchanged between you:

(a) That the miners under circumstances as now existing will positively not accept any reduction in present wage scale.

(b) That if such a notice is posted it will result in cessation of work on the part of the workmen. The situation would then resolve itself into a contest of endurance, involving loss and privations to both parties, and great injury to the public interests. It might, and probably will further estrange the parties directly interested, the corporation and the employees. This is a plain statement of a situation which I am convinced both sides to the dispute wish, if possible, to avoid.

(3) Having given the best possible consideration I can to what has been stated by you and to what has been made public to date by way of correspondence between your respective selves and those you represent, and with a view of using our good offices to bring about some means whereby:

(a) Cessation of work may be averted,

(b) The future may be regarded with more hope,

I am therefore submitting herewith to the British Empire Steel Corporation and the constituent companies interested, viz: the Dominion Coal Company, Limited, the Nova Scotia Steel & Coal Company, Limited, and the Acadia Coal Company, and urge and recommend its acceptance, that they agree with their employees, being members of District No. 26, United Mine Workers of America, to continue the present rate of wages during the inquiry to which I shall hereafter make reference, and for such time thereafter as shall be necessary for the findings of such an inquiry to be made public or as such an inquiry may direct. I make this recommendation because I am satisfied that the proposed reduction in wages is the outstanding impediment at present to be removed.

(5) On the understanding that the foregoing suggestions are mutually acceptable and agreed to, I beg to respectfully recommend and urge upon the workmen and their representatives that the workmen agree to work at their regular occupations at the present rate of wages during the time intervening between this proposed agreement being entered into and the report and findings shall have been rendered.

(6) In view of the fact that both parties to the present differences apparently agree upon the common ground that an inquiry is desirable, and in view of the fact that the Winfield Conciliation Board so-called has unanimously expressed the opinion that a fair and impartial inquiry by a competent authority, with a view to ascertaining the actual necessary cost of mining, transporting and selling coal, the ability of the companies to pay a rate of wages satisfactory to the employees, to earn a fair return on capital invested, and the bearing which the attitude and action of the employees have in relation to the efficient and profitable carrying on of operations and without which no permanent improvement in industrial relations can be expected until complete confidence is established between operators and employees.

And that such a result may possibly be brought about by such an inquiry, on behalf of the government if the above proposals are agreed to or, as an alternative, unless you in the meantime intimate to me that you have mutually agreed upon another method. I propose at the earliest possible date to recommend to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor to cause such an inquiry to be made under the provisions of the Nova Scotia Act of Inquiries concerning Public Matters, chapter 13, Revised Statutes 1923. It seems scarcely necessary to point out to either of you that the person or persons so commissioned or appointed by the lieutenant governor have the same power to summon and call for witnesses and enforce attendance of witnesses, to compel the giving of evidence and the production of documents and things as is vested in any court of law in civil cases and of requiring such witnesses to give evidence on oath, etc., and generally to do all things that the person or persons so appointed deem requisite, "to the full investigation of the matters into which he or they are appointed to examine". I need not intimate that inquiry under such a commission must be undertaken, conducted and concluded without delay.

(7) It is confidently anticipated that, as you have each respectively intimated your desire to the public for an inquiry, you will each facilitate in every reasonable manner the work of such an inquiry and furnish such witnesses, documents, etc., as may be essential to make it full and complete.

(8) It must be further agreed that the rate of wages determined by the person or persons so appointed shall be paid by the corporation from and after such date as shall be fixed after all the evidence shall have been heard and considered, and the corporation will be requested and required to give assurances that the findings of the inquiry in the above respects will be accepted and the wages paid in accordance with the terms of such findings.

(10) Should the parties fail to mutually agree as to the period of time the rate of wages fixed and determined by the inquiry are to prevail, the government or myself would be pleased if necessary to use our good offices in discussing them with you.

This letter is going forward to you both by the same mail, and is respectfully submitted for your careful and let me hope favourable consideration. Both the government and myself will hold ourselves in readiness at any time to render any assistance we reasonably can. I must, however, impress upon you both that in the public interests, as well, I trust, in your own, that you advise me without delay of your respective decisions.

I have the honour to be,

Very truly yours,

E. H. ARMSTRONG,

Premier.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.[

Mr. IRVINE: When was this document issued?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I have just read to the House, as I intimated at the outset, is a Canadian press despatch, which came this afternoon from Halifax, Nova Scotia, and which may possibly appear in the evening papers. It came to hand during the course of the debate, and I thought it advisable to read it to the House immediately, because it illustrates effectively the point which the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) was seeking to make a moment ago, that this is a matter primarily for the province of Nova Scotia to deal with. It makes clear that the province of Nova Scotia itself has so regarded the question and that the Premier and government of Nova Scotia, as the communication states, have been in active communication with both parties during the past few days. They have agreed to appoint a commission to go fully into the existing situation, and have worked out a solution, or rather what they hope may prove to be a method of solving the difficulties which exist. I submit, as far as our service in the matter is concerned, that we can best help this situation at this time by not interfering in it at all. When the government of a province is seeking to deal with a difficult question such as this controversy in Nova Scotia at the present time it would certainly appear a part of the duty of all other organized governments when requested so to do at least to lend as much co-operation as they can in a friendly way; but unless requested to refrain from interfering in a situation which the parties more immediately concerned are doing the best they possibly can to remedy.

I know that for some time past Premier Armstrong has been doing his utmost in an endeavour to have the difficult situation in Nova Scotia satisfactorily met. He did, as the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) mentioned this afternoon, come to Ottawa some little time ago to request the government to use its influence with the Canadian National Railways to place orders for coal. I told Premier Armstrong perfectly frankly that our policy was to leave the Canadian National Railways to the direction of its president and its officers and board of directors, that we could not interfere in the management of that road, and that the government could not bring pressure to bear on the management of the road to purchase coal which might not be regarded as necessary by the railroad, or to do what has been suggested in some communications here, to bank a quantity of coal which would deteriorate over a course of time. I made that perfectly clear to him, but I said at the same time that I would not feel that I was in any way infringing upon the policy of the government in the matter if, when I saw Sir Henry Thornton, I were to place before him what he, Premier Armstrong, had said and were to ask him to take this matter into his consideration and have it considered by the directors of the railway. I did see Sir Henry Thornton subsequently, and I expressed to him what Premier Armstrong had stated to me about the situation which was developing in Nova Scotia and about the possible help the Canadian National Railways might render if they could see their way clear to place orders for coal at this time. Sir Henry Thornton told me he was just as much alive to the situation as Mr. Armstrong was, or as this government was, and that naturally he would do what he could to help meet the situation and go just as far as he could, but that he had to consider the interests of the railway, and he did not propose to take a course he could not justify to his own directors, and which they would not be in a position to justify to the country.

The different parties who have had a chance to deal with this matter at all, have all appreciated, I think, the seriousness of the situation and all have been ready to co-operate and to help to the extent of their ability and opportunity; but I submit to continue this discussion longer, in view of what we now know, namely, that the government of Nova Scotia itself has offered to-day to appoint a royal commission to go very fully into the whole matter, is not at this stage to render a helpful service, but may possibly serve only distinctly to impede the very promising result that we all trust may be achieved.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Notwithstanding the suggestion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this debate close with his address, I am going to venture to offer a few remarks upon the motion. An hon. member has not the right to comment either adversely or favourably on a decision of the Chair. I only make this remark, that I am very glad indeed that the rules of the House are not such as to prevent a case of distress extending over thousands of people and carrying them to the verge of starvation from being debated in this House when presented bona fide by an hon. member. The allegation in the motion is that large numbers of men are on the verge of starvation in the district of Cape Breton. The facts in support of it go to show that there are but two, and indeed that there is possibly only one, cause for this distress. The main burden of the contention of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) was that there was an acute shortage of work and that there had been for many months in this district; and he complained as well—and seemed to attribute to the complaint some importance—of friction between the company who employs these men and the men themselves. I would not gather from the facts he adduced that there was any evidence that any part of the difficulty was a friction between the company and the men, or at least such friction as the action of this government or the action of the local government of Nova Scotia could, by investigation or any other similar means, remove. Digging down deeper into the whole substance what was it? What was the case the hon. gentleman presented to parliament? Was it not a case of men hungry for toil? Was it not a case of men wanting a chance to earn their living by the sweat of their brow and not able to find that work? Was it not a case of a company not being in a position to sell the goods that they might produce in order to give work to the men? What is the history of the whole subject? I know that in years gone by, extending back for at least four or five, there has been friction between the British Empire Steel Company and its men. I know that even in days of fairly satisfactory employment there have been numerous strikes, the company contending that they were paying a fair wage, the men contending the opposite, and that these strikes have been submitted for arbitrament, the result of none of which has been wholly satisfactory. On the one side it was argued very vigorously throughout the whole of Nova Scotia that this company was over-capitalized, that it is a great aggregation of a long series of successively watered stocks, and, as well, that it is overmanned in its higher official service. I heard to-day an allegation that I had not heard before, that it was engaged in the bleeding of its assets by letting contracts to companies in which its directors were interested. I do not stop to comment at any length on the correctness of any of those allegations, and I will later explain why. I make only this comment: That the company is highly capitalized, there is no question. I do not know whether it is overmanned or not. I have heard just lately in the House that there has been a reduction, and I think there would have to be, considering the state of business. I know nothing whatever as to whether it is bleeding its assets in order to give unjust benefits to its associates. But I think all will realize this, that you cannot attribute to watered stock at this time the difficulties which now prevail. When watered stock is used as a basis of a claim for dividends, then it certainly becomes a question whether it should be allowed to remain so watered. But when there are no dividends and no question of dividend arises, the difficulty cannot be laid at the door of watered stock. Incidentally may I say that if any blame is attributable anywhere for over-capitalization of this concern or its authority so to capitalize, all members of this House know now, though one did not know just a few years ago, that that blame cannot be laid at the door of any government of Canada, that it lies at the door of the present government of Nova Scotia which gave the company its charter.

Why do I say that other questions really do not arise? Because it seems to me that from the facts presented not only by the hon. member, but from communications which have reached me from the mine workers, signed on their behalf, from communications which have reached the government from the provincial authorities of Nova Scotia, from communications that appear with much prodigality throughout the press, the real core of the whole matter is a want of work, a want of industry; and when you have that condition then you could appoint all the commissions that any government, whether provincial or federal, could find paper to issue commissions upon, and you would be only dishing out palliatives that get nowhere. How is it possible to adjust the dispute if the actual state of affairs is that, on account of paucity of orders, lack of industry, lack of work, you cannot arrive at a medium between the two parties which is not unjust to both? I ask hon. members if that is not the real situation. I ask hon. members to read this really pitiful petition of the United Mine Workers of America. I do not doubt that many in this House have read it. I ask them to read this presentation, not by a Tory reactionary, not by any of those vicious characters who, in the words of the Prime Minister, seek to get power in order to over-lord it over the masses—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never used such an expression in my life.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is reported in the report of the right hon. member's speech in Hull.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like my right hon. friend to produce the report. He is in the habit of making statements he cannot prove.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. When was the last one?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING. The last one was yesterday when he said that there was a vote in this House last year against the government on the estimates. Let him produce it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said I thought it was on the estimates; that I knew it was against the government, and he contradicted me. I have the vote now in my possession and, perhaps, the right hon. member will be a little slower in making his contradictions after this. I have been challenged pretty frequently, but I do not know yet of a case where the Prime Minister made good. What I had reference to was the vote on the 31st March, 1924, a vote on a motion which the government supported, announced its support of, moved and seconded by the two hon. members for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll and Mr. Kyte), in which vote the government had an adverse majority of 82 to 81. I told the Prime Minister I thought it was a majority of one adverse.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend's reference was to a government measure and a government defeat. Now he is trying to twist it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the right hon. member will read Hansard he will find that it confirms every word I said. Now I am contradicted that I have attributed to him the language of "overlording it by the Conservative governments."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated was that this was the report of the papers which I read and which I can produce.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish the right hon. member would produce it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will produce it tomorrow on the orders of the day. The Prime Minister will be just in the position that he is in with relation to this other motion.

Now, perhaps, I may proceed with my speech. I stated that the memorial, which, I think, can be taken as revealing the true nature of the trouble in Cape Breton, was presented not by any government of Tory reactionaries. I wonder what would have been the language of hon. members in this administration in this dispute if there had been a Tory government in Nova Scotia—

Mr. McMASTER: Perhaps things would have been so much worse.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member's imagination is losing none of its elasticity if he can imagine a condition worse than described to-day. The memorial presented is now condensed into a booklet, the introduction for which is written by Mr. Armstrong, Premier of Nova Scotia. In the course of the introduction he says:

Those who constituted the delegation represented the various cities, towns and sections, as well as the boards of trade that are directly concerned in the coal and steel industry of Nova Scotia. Among the delegates was one from the steel workers at Sydney.

It may be assumed then that the voice here heard is the voice not only of the authorities of Nova Scotia, but of the very steel workers affected and referred to in the motion of the hon. member:

You will note, therefore, that the delegation was thoroughly representative. Let me further assure you and personally impress upon you the idea that none of those who constituted the delegation were actuated by any other desire than to lay before your government and yourself the existence of facts that, in the opinion of the delegation, are very disturbing and alarming, and who genuinely believe that conditions exist that not only require a remedy but can be remedied. May I be permitted also to add my further personal endorsation to the views expressed by the delegation, and to reiterate them and to urge upon you such relief as may be afforded at the earliest possible time.

Accompanying the delegation were several hon. members from the district. Whether they were members of it or not I could not say, but I refer to the hon. members for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll and Mr. Kyte), who were referred to a moment ago. Now, what is the real essence of the difficulty in the Cape Breton district as revealed here?

The allied coal and steel industries of Nova Scotia have been for some years in a depressed condition. At the present time unemployment and consequent distress among those dependent—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some years?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, this government, unfortunately, has been in power some years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And it will be in power some years yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps so; but I do not think that the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) will look forward to such a prospect with equanimity.

At the present time unemployment and consequent distress among those dependent upon the industries for livelihood is more serious than in any recent period.

The prospect for the future is that there may be even more serious depression and resultant poverty.

The province of Nova Scotia is largely dependent upon these industries which are the main, and in some instances, the sole support of the population in important centres.

This will be easily understood when it is considered that from 20,000 to 25,000 men are employed in the mining of coal and its associated industries—the actual number depending upon the degree of activity that may be possible—and that directly dependent on these there are not less than 100,000 to 125,000 people, or more than one-fifth of the population of the province. The last census returns—

These would be the returns showing the census improvement or otherwise from 1911 to 1922.

—show that only in the towns and cities where there has been a development of coal mining and steel manufacture has there been any increase in population. But for the existence of these industries the population of Nova Scotia would have shown a decrease, from which fact the serious nature of continued unemployment in these centres may be understood.

I call particular attention to the next two sentences:

At no previous time has employment been so scarce and insecure, the future so unpromising and the industrial community so discouraged, as at this date.

If any immediate explanation had occurred to the mind of any hon. member opposite it would have been interjected at this point. The next sentence is this:

Faced with a disappearing livelihood, large numbers of skilled artisans may be forced to leave Nova Scotia unless relief is forthcoming. The deputation therefore asks the government to give careful consideration to the following conditions and the suggestions made for remedy:

The memorial goes on to recite the difficulties under which the coal mining industry labours; the handicaps it endures in comparison with its competitors in West Virginia and Kentucky; it recites as well the fact that because of the large enlistment during the war of these coal miners, and because of other war contingencies—at any rate, because of these conditions—there was under-production and loss of markets during the war period, at a time when in the United States, who were not then in the war, there was a large increase of production, a large expansion and a conquest of markets. The memorial then goes on to show that in 1916 the importations of round and run of mine coal were 6,949,540 tons, which had risen in 1924, through absorption of the St. Lawrence markets by competitors in the United States, to 11,544,184 tons; that the value of importations of that kind of coal had risen in the same time from $7,908,125 to $34,341,956; and that as respects slack coal the increase was less, being in tonnage from 2,678,000 to 3,823,000 and in value from $2,302,000 to $8,912,000. The memorial proceeds to illustrate the suffering which had ensued from this condition of affairs and to plead that the labourers were not injured because of the failure of the local parliament to pass proper humanitarian legislation. Here I may be permitted to call the attention of the mover of this motion (Mr. Woodsworth) to the premier's claim that although the men had the eight hour day as well as a Workmen's Compensation Act, and other aids which a local legislature could provide, they were experiencing the worst hardships they had ever endured.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did they have the eight hour day in the steel works?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think he claims that; no, in the coal mines but not in the steel works. The memorial then presents to the government a suggested remedy and argues vigorously for that remedy. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) told us the remedy suggested was the giving of orders for coal by the Canadian National Railways. If such was the only remedy urged I think the Prime Minister took the right course. But unfortunately I do not see at the moment any reference to such a suggestion among the five presented. I had better read them, and the House at least will observe that if this was one of the things urged it was not all, nor was it the burden and great central object of the delegation which came down to this administration. Here is the resolution which they urged on the attention of the government and which they declared was passed by a unanimous vote of the whole legislature of Nova Scotia:

(1) Resolved, that in any readjustment of the federal tariff to be taken into consideration by the federal parliament at its present session, this House is of the opinion that proper consideration should be given—

(2) To so increase the tariff on American slack coal as to preclude it from entering into this country in unfair competition with slack coal from the Nova Scotia mines.

(3) To so re-adjust the tariff that this slack coal will not be sold as run of mine coal without paying the customs duty which run of mine coal is entitled to.

(4) To place some duty upon the importation of American coke with a view to encouraging the manufacture of Nova Scotia coal into coke for the purpose of supplying the Quebec and Ontario markets, and as a substitute for anthracite.

(5) Further resolved, this House is of the opinion that the coal mining industry of this province would be encouraged and developed if proper and equitable consideration were given to such fixing of railway freight rates on coal as will assure its economical transportation to the larger centres of population in central Canada.

In a word, we find here recommended a tariff on coal and a reduction in coal rates. This is what the delegation representing the workers who are suffering, on whose behalf the hon. member appeals, and representing the province of Nova Scotia, headed by its Liberal premier, and accompanied by its Liberal members, urged on this government as a cure for the very things disclosed to this House this afternoon. Now, I did not get time to read the whole resolution over again, but it may be—

Mr. CARROLL: That is the resolution passed by the legislature of Nova Scotia?

Mr. MEIGHEN: And endorsed by this delegation.

Mr. CARROLL: There is a further request.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And further on they do ask for steel orders and coal orders?

Mr. CARROLL: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that is likely correct. But this is the great central purpose of the delegation. As hon. members know and everybody knows, undoubtedly any national railway board will give all the orders for steel and all the orders for coal that it possibly can justify and perhaps even more. There will never be any difference of opinion about that. I venture to say there is not an hon. member of this House who for one minute suspects in his heart of hearts that either the management of this railway now or the management that it supplanted, ever declined going the utmost limit they could justify in providing orders for coal and for steel. The contrary was charged against my government, but it was never properly or righteously charged. I would not charge it against this government. I do not think this government is wholly without brains and patriotism. I would not think that any government or any board would not advance to their own workers all the orders possible for coal and steel to be used by themselves. That has been done constantly; but along that line nothing in the way of a permanent or substantial solution of this trouble can be looked for. But while all this is being done these conditions are generating and this suffering is endured.

I know that in this debate we cannot really decide anything, but surely we had better get under the surface to the heart of the subject and understand really what we are talking about. The question comes up: Has this government any responsibility in respect to relief? Now, there have lately been several announcements by the administration, and some constitutional law has been argued this afternoon by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). I am not going to speak contemptuously of his law. If he is wrong he has certainly been misled by one who ought to know better. But there is no question of constitutionality in dispute, none whatever; there is no more question of the British North America Act arising in the matter than of the Criminal Code or Magna Charta, not a whit; nor does anybody suggest that the Parliament of Canada is precluded by the British North America Act from affording relief to suffering Canadians. Well, I hope he does not suggest it.

Mr. MURDOCK: That has never been contended so far as I have heard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, this pronouncement will settle the question. We will accept it now as the position of the government—that they are in no way whatever estopped, that the British North America Act has nothing on earth to do with the matter at all.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Speaker, I decline to let the right hon. gentleman continue his policy of misrepresentation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MURDOCK: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MURDOCK: The statement has not been taken or made as the right hon. gentleman persists in stating it. If the right hon. gentleman would quote the facts and the truth, I think it would be fairer for those whose interests we are discussing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. Minister of Labour comes forward with such a tramp and beat that one is almost frightened at his approach, but the difficulty is that while he is all emblazoned with swords he cannot use them.

Mr. MURDOCK: You started to misrepresent—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MURDOCK: You started your misrepresentation last year, and you cannot get away with it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Labour, as I understood him, said that nobody had claimed he was forbidden by the British North America Act to give relief.

Mr. MURDOCK: That this parliament was forbidden to do what it likes. If it wants to vote its money, of course it can.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then I assert, and I propose to stand by it, that the British North America Act has nothing in the world to do with it. If the British North America Act does not prevent the government granting relief, where does the act come in?

Mr. MURDOCK: Is that a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is. I hope some one will answer who knows more about the act than the hon. minister.

Mr. MURDOCK: The British North America Act specifically and definitely places upon the provinces the responsibility that is here involved.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry, I was listening to my colleague.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will repeat it. The British North America Act specifically and definitely places upon the provinces the responsibility that is here involved and under discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see. The answer is not very illuminating. It would be if the hon. gentleman would quote the act. The British North America Act does nothing of the sort. Now, when I assert that I put myself in the judgment of every lawyer here and of everyone who can read and write. The British North America Act does not fix the responsibility at all. Certainly in matters of civil rights the act gives the provinces jurisdiction and denies it to the Dominion. But this is not a matter of civil rights at all. Why, time and again the Parliament of Canada has voted money for relief—relief for seed grain, relief for food supplies, relief to the west, relief to the east, relief to San Francisco, relief to China, relief to India, relief to Japan—relief everywhere on earth. Does anybody suggest that we have for fifty-seven years been living under a constitution which permits us to give relief to the suffering in China and India and Japan, and forbids us to give relief to the suffering in our own country?

Mr. MILLAR: Might I ask the right hon. leader of the opposition if the relief for seed grain was not almost entirely confined to those on Dominion lands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it was general. It was limited for some years, but when the distress became so great as to be beyond the power of the local authorities, the Dominion stepped in and assumed general responsibility. Later we shared it with the local authorities, not only in respect of seed grain but in respect of unemployment and every character of relief where distress was great. In such cases the Dominion has never before shirked its responsibility or declined to come at least in some way to the assistance of the local authorities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend a question to clear up this matter? If an appeal were made to a provincial legislature to vote relief to Indians, would my right hon. friend contend that the legislature would be wrong in asserting that the duty was by the British North America Act assigned primarily to the federal government, and therefore wrong in declining to give relief?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would say there have been cases where even provincial legislatures have voted relief of this kind. But I was coming to the point which the Prime Minister has in mind. I do not dispute the correctness of the assertion that primarily this responsibility is local.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all that is contended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a constitutional question in any sense whatever. It is more convenient and serves the public interest that local authorities should look after relief first; but the British North America Act does not so dictate, it is only common sense that so dictates. When, however, the suffering spreads beyond the range of the local authorities, when it becomes so general that it is no longer fair and reasonable to ask the local authorities to look after it alone, then this parliament has power, and always has had power, to do anything that it thinks right, and there is no more a constitutional limitation on its action than there is on any other of its day to day activities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all that is contended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why then quote the British North America Act? That act has nothing to do with it; it is merely a matter of convenience amongst ourselves. Possibly I should point out that not only did the late government, in co-operation with the municipalities and the provinces, on a distinct basis set out in writing, contribute in the days which followed the war to the relief of returned soldiers and those dependent on them, but also to general relief. Not only did we do it, but this government did the same itself the first year it was in power, I have not been informed, Mr. Speaker, of any amendment to the British North America Act since 1922; I have not learned of any shifting of our constitution—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend knows very well that the action this government took with respect to unemployment relief was taken because of an obligation put upon the federal government in matters respecting defence and war. Parliament has interpreted its obligation in a generous way. Where difficulties have arisen out of the unemployment due to the war the government has said that as defence is part of the obligation of the federal administration the act should be interpreted in a broad way. It is in the spirit of the act that this matter has been discussed, and not otherwise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can only repeat that it is not the British North America Act at all; the act has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It still remains the spirit of the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to be in the position of simply contradicting my right hon. friend. I am trying to make my own contention clear. The whole thing has no relation to the British North America Act; it has relation only to convenience as between the Dominion, the provinces and the municipalities. Certainly because of the war our obligation became greater; the war was our responsibility, therefore we felt there was greater obligation than there otherwise would have been. Not only did we look after those suffering from the war directly or indirectly; but because of the immensity of the question we went further. Not only did we go further, but hon. gentlemen opposite, not content with the distance we went, assailed us in the country for our parsimony and after they got into power passed an order in council going further still. So it is only talking beside the question —worse, it is misleading the people of our country; still worse, it is misleading those whom we have the least right to mislead, those who are suffering and oppressed—to indicate to them that because of constitutional limitations, much as we would like to do so we really cannot help them.

Now, there are other circumstances in which the responsibility of the government may be greater than usual—I mean the federal government; that is to say, when the policy pursued is responsible directly and indirectly for the dire result. But I do not want to be led into a tariff discussion as such, further than to say that responsibility is traced right to the door of this government, traced not by a sleuth of the opposition or of the Tory party but by the premier in the oldest Liberal government this country ever had. It does not meet the situation for this government, when presented with a motion which delineates the results of the course it has itself pursued, to meet it merely by an assertion of the Prime Minister that "investigation" is the cure; that the investigation ought to be by the local government—and behold, the local government has started an investigation! I have not very much faith in the result of this investigation. I have no objection to its taking place—not at all, and I do nothing to impede it. But I do remember—and I put myself in the judgment of these very critical hon. members opposite when I say that it is not many months since we had an investigation. If my memory serves me rightly there was an investigation a little more than a year ago, an investigation into which this government itself ventured. I cannot remember who the investigators were; in the long dreary roll of investigators and commissions of this government I could not be expected to remember every name. But I do recall that Doctor Robertson was one, and he investigated—I am subject to correction—the very cause of difficulty which confronts us here, the position of the one side, the position of the other, the possibilities of both. In a word, he investigated in substance just what the Armstrong government propose to reinvestigate now.

Mr. MURDOCK: That investigation was in relation to steel; this is in relation to coal.

An hon. MEMBER: There is not much difference, anyway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there any real difference there? I heard some hon. member opposite say there was not much difference. I do not think there is. These two industries are closely interrelated. Every ton of steel produced, as I am informed, entails the production of four tons of coal. When steel production goes down coal production goes down. I want to ask, has steel production gone down? I sent for some data and have them before me—and I had not intended to read these but for the interruption of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock); frequently valuable fruit comes from his interruptions. Here is a table compiled from the Survey of Current Business, a periodical which has the imprimatur of the Prime Minister himself. In this table the pig iron production is taken as 100 per cent in the United States and 100 per cent in Canada in 1913, and the production each year since is given. Corresponding figures are given regarding the steel ingot production. The percentages start as I have said, at 100 in the United States and 100 in Canada in 1913. They became 75 per cent in the United States and 69 per cent in Canada in 1914. I do not need to read them all down the line. Suffice it to say that all through these years up to 1923, and inclusive of that year, the United States percentage kept higher than Canada in their pig iron production relative to the production of 1913, save in one year, 1921, when it was 54 per cent in the United States and 60 per cent in Canada.

Now, coming to 1924, we find that there was not any very great variation from the proportions—however, there was some—for the first four months. The percentages with respect to pig iron for the year, month by month, are as follows:

	United States	Canada
January	118	76
February	120	71
March	135	93
April	126	100
May	102	101
June	79	68
July	70	55
August	74	27

Certain policies were now getting under way.

	United States	Canada
September	80	27
October	97	35
November	98	27
December	116	27

I hope the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) gets an inside view into the basic cause of the distress which he so justly laments.

Let us take ingots and trace them from the month of April—I would give the figures for a longer period back only for the time which would be taken:

	United States	Canada
April	132	120
May	104	124

Canada's banner month for the year:

	United States	Canada
June	81	79
July	74	60
August	101	26
September	112	21
October	123	23
November	123	26

One-quarter in the one case and five quarters in the other as compared with 1913 production.

December	141	40

This is the story in simple arithmetic. Now I want to speak in relation to the remedy, and I shall use but one sentence. I have always had great doubt whether it was possible to take one single article of such widespread consumption as this and cure the difficulty by a mere advance of duty. That same doubt I have to-day. But what I assert is, and I do not intend now to argue it further, that an advance and an advance alone is the real remedy, but it must be done as part of a general policy to enable such a remedy to be widespread and effective.

I am prepared in conclusion to read the quotation which some moments ago I had in mind, my reference to which the Prime Minister challenged. It has just been put before me. It is the quotation with reference to that much-objected-to word "overlorded" I read from the Ottawa Journal of February 19—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I call to the attention of the Ottawa Journal and its many admirers, even of the Liberal press, throughout Canada the derision with which its name is received by hon. gentlemen opposite. I did not assert what paper the report was in; I asserted I had read it, and it was that assertion which the Prime Minister seemed to doubt.

Mr. MURDOCK: Is its author the candidate for Gaspe?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it is a news item, but if it were the candidate for Gaspe the day will come when the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) will hold his name in a great deal more respect than he does to-day.

Mr. MURDOCK: Not until he starts to tell the truth about Canada rather than reviling it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think, Mr. Speaker, it is not amendment to the rules we need so much as some knowledge of them. This is dated February 19:

> The Right Hon. Mackenzie King, speaking last night at the banquet tendered to Dr. J. E. Fontaine, M.P., by the Young Liberal Club of Hull at the Windsor Hotel, said that it was ever the privilege of the people to declare if they wished to be overlorded by the Conservative or to entrust their destinies with the Liberal party.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to leave to the records of Hansard as to whether what my right hon. friend said in his remarks was not that I had used the specific language of "overlording over the masses." He used the word "masses," not "Conservatives." I said I had used no such expression as overlording over the masses. So far as the Tories are concerned, I am prepared to let them go their own gait.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On behalf of the Conservative party I accept the apology.

Mr. McMASTER: As the hour is almost six, perhaps I might be allowed to continue my remarks after the adjournment.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has referred to what he calls an apology, I would say to him I very much regret I am unable to see that his remarks were in accord with the truth.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): I would like in my first remarks to-night to compliment the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) on the very able address with which he favoured the House this afternoon. I feel that those whom he represents in this chamber are to be congratulated upon the strength and moderation of his remarks. He disclaimed any intention of making a speech. He merely placed the case before the House; but I take it, Mr. Speaker, you are at one with me when I say that very often the plain unvarnished facts of any case are the most powerful speech that can be addressed in regard to it. When the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg began his remarks he, as well as all the other members of this House, were unaware of the despatch which, during the course of the debate, came into the hands of the Prime Minister, to the effect that the government of Nova Scotia had acted along one of the lines indicated by the hon. member, and I would support the view taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that under the circumstances it would be proper and fitting for this debate not to continue. That might have been an attitude accepted by all, but it was not, and there have been some remarks made this afternoon which I would like if possible to answer.

When one is possessed of a single recitation one is likely to offer it when called upon to oblige a social gathering. When one knows only one song one is apt to render it when called upon to help in an evening's entertainment, and the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), it seems to me, has one panacea and one only, for the ills of the country, no matter whether those ills present themselves in the centre or at the extremities, and that panacea is more taxation and more restriction.

> This is his story, this is his song,
> Praising protection all the day long.

I always like to listen to the right hon. leader of the opposition, but I cannot congratulate him to-night on his subject matter for a panegyric upon the benefits of protection; because the British Empire Steel Corporation, formerly known as the Dominion Iron and Steel company, formerly composed of the Dominion Steel Company and the Dominion Coal Company, which separated, and then joined together with stock-mongering manœuvres too numerous to mention, is perhaps of all others the most striking example of the failure of protection, to bolster up and protect what might have been a sound industry. Because Mr. Speaker, this great industry in the Maritime provinces started with great natural advantages. They had easily accessible resources in coal. They had iron ore which they were able to bring, from a certain distance it is true, but by water, a cheap means of transportation, from the neighbouring island of Newfoundland. They had the ability, the industry and the character for probity of the people of Nova Scotia to manage the work and to work in the enterprise. These are the great advantages with which they started. But they represented an industry which has been forced on, beyond a natural pace, and which presents for a quarter of a century the effect of interference with the free course of trade and commerce, combined with the prejudicial effect of government pap and government bolstering up. It is just a quarter of a century since the Dominion Iron and Steel Company obtained a charter from the government of Nova Scotia, and they obtained a charter which gave them great advantages. First of all, the town in which they were going to start their business was given the right to bonus, to relieve them from the burden of taxation, and to give them a free site. I stand corrected if my facts are not as I state them. Hon. members from the Maritime provinces will be able to correct me if I am wrong, but I think I am right when I state they obtained exemption from taxation for a very long term of years.

Mr. CARROLL: Is the hon. gentleman speaking of the Dominion Coal Company?

Mr. McMASTER: No, the Dominion Steel Company. They obtained exemption from taxation for a very long term of years, and if I mistake not they received a free site for their plant. They were also benefited in this way, as has been pointed out by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) this afternoon. The government of Nova Scotia owns the resources, as governments should own such great natural resources as coal, and it imposes a reasonable royalty on coal that is mined there. The royalty at that time was 12½ cents a ton, but, in favour of this steel company, it was reduced to 6¼ cents per ton on all the coal mined for the purpose of being used in the production of steel, or for the bunkering of ships which carried the steel away from their works. Very substantial benefits were thus given to this big enterprise. Not only that, but privileges of more doubtful utility were given to this new company. The directors were given the right to contract with the company because they were very closely interwoven with the Dominion Coal Company, and the new steel company was given the right to pay dividends on its preferred stock while the plant was in course of construction. Anything which could stimulate, which could galvanize this industry into life, was given by the Nova Scotia government. Then the town of Sydney implemented its part in the arrangement, as I have said, by giving a site and exemption from taxation for a number of years.

But that was not sufficient. The Dominion government cast a beneficent eye on this enterprise and it was given assistance. First of all, it was helped by the tariff. To hear the leader of the opposition speak this afternoon, one would have thought that this industry down in Nova Scotia was suffering from the absence of a tariff; but I see that steel billets are protected from $1.50 to $2.50 a ton; rolled iron or steel angles, from $4.25 to $7 a ton; bar iron or steel, rolled, from $4.25 to $7 a ton; rolled iron or steel plate, not less than one-quarter inch thick, from $2 to $3 a ton; rolled iron or steel plates or sheets, not otherwise provided for, from $4.25 to $7 a ton; iron or steel railway bars for railways, from $4.50 to $7 a ton; switches, frogs, crossings and intersections, 20 per cent British preference, 30 per cent intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent general tariff; nails, bolts, spikes and so forth, 20 per cent British preference, 30 per cent intermediate tariff and 35 per cent general tariff.

Therefore, the benefits, if benefits there be of a tariff, were given to this industry. But that was not all. It was bonused directly from the state. That was not sufficient. People who wanted to build railways in this country were directed that if they wanted to have the subsidies which the building of railways would entitle them to receive from the government, must buy their rails from rail manufacturers in Canada and that meant either manufacturers at the Sault or manufacturers at Sydney. Therefore, there was no means known to the protectionist mind which was not taken for the purpose of helping on this industry. What was the result? The result was that every favour given by the Canadian people to this industry was capitalized by the promoters or the management by a watering stock, capitalization against the consuming public of Canada. There is no question of that. The leader of the opposition in regard to the watering of stock seemed to have a sneaking view in his mind that probably there had been more or less humidity about the organization and development of this company than there should have been. But, he said, the watering of stock does not have anything to do with the matter. I take issue with my learned and right hon. friend in that regard. It has a great deal to do with the matter. First of all, if an administration pays dividends on watered stock, what is it doing? Nobody wants to deny to capital a fair return. It is a short-sighted policy that wishes to deny to capital a fair return; but if dividends are paid on watered stock, that means merely this, that profits which should go to building up reserves for a rainy day or to labour, are paid to people who have no right to get them

Some months ago I had the pleasure of a conversation with a gentleman who attended the conference at Genoa on behalf of the government as one of its technical advisers. He told me that he had discussed watering of stock with many labour leaders from all parts of the world, and he found them, as a rule, most reasonable men, as convinced as he was himself that capital should be allowed to earn a fair return, but having the conviction that one of the things which keep labour and capital apart, which caused a rankling sense of injustice to be in the breasts of labour people throughout the world, was this watering of stock, the payment of dividends on fictitious capital. Even when dividends are not paid, it has a bad effect on the company. It destroys the morale of those who are responsible for the company's success. They see supposedly invested in their industry vast amounts of capital on which they cannot earn a dividend, and they are therefore discouraged. It also lends its influence to stock jobbing, to the going up and going down of stock on a stock exchange until the stock becomes a method for gambling, and until honest and prudent investors do not want to touch it at all. That is another effect of the watering of stock and I think it has a great deal to do with the matter.

Another argument advanced by the leader of the opposition was that coal production has gone down. He says: Why?—because iron production has gone down and therefore we want a higher duty on iron. I should like to carry that investigation just one or two steps further. I am not sure whether iron production has gone down or not, but for the purpose of the argument, let us assume that iron production has gone down. Why has it gone down?—because the demand has gone down. Why has the demand gone down?—because the buying power of the people has gone down and if—and this will come in immediately with a further argument which he advanced—by raising prices generally all along the line, you reduce the purchasing power of the people, you will reduce the demand and you will reduce the demand for iron and for coal. If you ask a man to pay more than he should for his boots, his clothes, his hat and all the other things that go into the maintenance of himself and his family, he will not have so much money left to erect a barn that he desires to build, and if he does not build it, the demand for steel, iron or wire nails goes down to that extent. That is the way in which the whole thing happens. The idea that you can get this country into a prosperous condition by increasing the cost of living, by making it more expensive to do business, is about as wise an idea as the one that you can raise yourself by taking a firm grasp of your own boot straps. I would have the House note this. My learned and right hon. friend says that this raising of the duty on iron and coal should not be a thing taken by itself—he spoke similarly in regard to freight rates the other night—it should form part of the structure of a general enhancement of duties. Where does the consumer come in if there is a general enhancement of prices? If you are going to advance the price of iron and coal, then you are going to advance the price of articles which go into the manufacture of nearly everything that is used in this country, and if you do that, you are going to make living in Canada more expensive. We talk about taxation in this country. We do not want to see taxation raised. We are quite right in that. We ought to try to reduce taxes if we possibly can, but to reduce taxes, you must reduce expenditure. There is, however, other means of taxing people than through a direct impost by the government. There is the indirect way by increasing the price of what the people have to buy. If you make living generally more expensive in this country, people will not stay here, they will go where living is less expensive and wages just as high or higher.

I should like to end on this note. For men who, in their heart of hearts, must know better, it is inhuman, it is cruel, to pretend that the lot of these miners and steelworkers can be bettered by raising the cost of living and by increasing taxation. I cannot think of anything more cruel, when one comes to think of it, than to hold out to men who are suffering like these poor miners and steel workers in Nova Scotia, that hope, and to try to place the responsibility upon the failure to apply further a system which twenty-five years has shown in their own special case not to be a success.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Cape Breton South and Richmond): With the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) I desire to congratulate the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) upon having brought this subject to the attention of the House. I am especially interested in the matter inasmuch as I represent in this House the constituency concerned, and possibly I have some shreds of local information which may prove more or less valuable in this discussion. Unemployment, I regret to say, was not confined to the island of Cape Breton during the year 1924; it was a world-wide condition. But the unemployment that prevailed throughout Nova Scotia during the year does not by any means exceed other periods of unemployment in that province. The period in which there was the most distress and the greatest unemployment among the steel workers and the coal miners of the island of Cape Breton was in the year 1913-14. That is an historical fact which I am sure no hon. gentleman, having a knowledge of the conditions as they existed at that time, will controvert.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it not controverted directly in the memorial signed by Mr. Armstrong?

Mr. KYTE: I have not read the whole memorial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I read it.

Mr. KYTE: Mr. Armstrong stated that there was great unemployment; perhaps he said that there was more unemployment—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Than ever.

Mr. KYTE: Perhaps so; but notwithstanding that statement, I repeat the assertion I have made, that the greatest degree of unemployment existed in the years I have mentioned, when we had bread lines and soup kitchens, and when miners were endeavouring to support their families upon employment one or two days a week. In 1914 the world war came and changed labour conditions; it had some advantages in respect of the change it brought about in the condition of the people throughout the industrial centres of Canada. The demand for coal immediately increased enormously. We all remember that the harbour of Halifax and the harbour of Sydney were both filled day by day with large numbers of warships and transports, so that these places presented the appearance of a great naval review. The transport of munitions and troops brought large numbers of these ships to our shores and they had to be supplied with bunker coal. Then there was the activity in the steel plant arising from the enormous amount of steel required for the various munitions of war. We had good times and prosperous conditions in Nova Scotia from the commencement of the war in 1914 up to 1920. Then again unemployment set in; and it is strange that our Conservative friends, who were in office for ten years and applied the principle of protection which my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) lauded this afternoon, had not the virtue to prevent unemployment in these centres. In 1921 the government of which the right hon. gentleman was then Prime Minister found it necessary to anticipate the requirements of steel rails for 1922 by giving an order to the steel plant at Sydney for the purpose of providing employment. This was in the fall of 1921, and in 1922, after parliament had met, a delegation came here from Sydney, headed by the mayor of that city, and on which there were representatives of boards of trade and of the Steel Workers' Union. Their purpose in coming to Ottawa was to seek relief for the unemployment conditions existing in Sydney and the collieries at that time. Surely my right hon. friend will not argue that conditions existing in February or March, 1922, were due to the advent of the present government to office a month or so before. Well, the present government relieved the situation by repeating what was done in 1921; that is to say, they gave an order to the steel plant at Sydney which anticipated the requirements of steel rails for the year 1922-23.

I desire to point these things out lest the impression gets abroad that the conditions existing in the mining towns of Nova Scotia to-day, and in connection with the steel plant, are unique, or exceed the conditions of unemployment that prevailed in any previous period of our history. That, I repeat, is not the case. Unfortunately we have had periods of unemployment from 1912-13 down to the present time, and a good deal of criticism has been directed towards the British Empire Steel Corporation. Now let me say that I have no object in representing their side of the controversy; but the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg read a resolution from the town council of Sydney Mines, describing the harrowing conditions that exist there, I think it is only fair that I should point out that in that respect the British Empire Steel Corporation is not entirely to blame. Sydney Mines is situated on the north side of Sydney harbour. For 150 years coal was being mined and shipped from Sydney Mines. Originally the property of the Duke of York, it was afterwards owned by the General Mining Association; and in the course of all those years the mining that had gone on there compelled the men to travel further and further underground and under the sea until it became exceedingly difficult and expensive to reclaim the coal. At the present time the coal mines situated on the north side of Sydney harbour extend some three miles under the sea; they are entirely submarine areas, expensive to work, and it is difficult to carry on the mining operations. The British Empire Steel Corporation has been confronted with very severe competition in the price of bituminous coal in Nova Scotia. It is a fact, as everyone knows, that in the last few years bituminous coal has come from the United States and has been sold in competition with the coal produced from the Nova Scotia mines. If, then, the British Empire Steel Corporation is to keep up the competition which is now so keen, it is surely necessary that it should mine the coal at the lowest possible cost. And that is why there is unemployment in Sydney Mines and in the mining towns on the north side of Sydney harbour. The British Empire Steel Corporation cannot carry on their mining operations at these mines at such a cost as will enable them to compete with the United States coal coming into Canada, so that they have been practically obliged to close down the mines. But there is another side to this picture. If the British Empire Steel Corporation has been obliged to close down its mines on the north side of Sydney harbour, it is a fact at the same time that in the last year it has expended $3,000,000 in opening and equipping a new mine within the Glace Bay area. This new mine is the largest and most complete coal mine in the world to-day in point of equipment. It is the best equipped mine there is, and I am assured by officials of the British Empire Steel Corporation that the coal produced by that mine can be put on the market at a cost considerably less than the coal produced in the other mines of the company.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is that No. 26?

Mr. KYTE: I do not remember; I think it is No. 1B. It is a new mine; the equipment was completed and the mine opened a few months ago. That is a large sum of money for the British Empire Steel Corporation to expend on one mine, but they felt it was necessary to do so in order to give continued employment to those in their service and enable them to sell coal at a price to meet the competition of coal from the United States.

Unfortunately we have had a considerable amount of unrest in the coal mining areas of Nova Scotia during the last twenty years. It is not for me to say who may be responsible for it; perhaps a little fault might be attributed to both sides. The fact of the matter is that the relations existing between the leaders of the mine workers and the officials of the British Empire Steel Corporation are not as they ought to be, and I think the Premier of Nova Scotia had that fact in mind when he offered to appoint a commission to inquire into the whole controversy between the two parties. But we can go back a little in our history and ascertain what has been the attitude of our Conservative friends with regard to promoting the steel making industry of Nova Scotia. In 1912, a few months after they came into office, the then government remitted to the Algoma Steel Company duty on 75,000 tons of rails equal to $294,000, which rails were sold to the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Pacific Railways. If hon. gentlemen sitting opposite to us had always the desire to build up the great steel industry in that province that they profess to have at the present time, they would not have prevented the Dominion Steel Company from supplying those steel rails by remitting the duty to a rival company. The Algoma Steel Company had all the rail orders that it could handle, but it was not content with that, it was not willing that the Dominion Steel Company should have any part of those rail orders, and it prevailed upon the then government to remit the duty in order that it might import rails from the United States and sell them in competition with the products of the Dominion Steel Company at Sydney.

The right hon. leader of the opposition spoke of the presence of the Premier of Nova Scotia at the head of the delegation which came here some months ago to interview the government on the coal and steel duties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman give me the year when that duty was remitted? I should like to make some inquiry with regard to it.

Mr. KYTE: In 1912. The matter was discussed in the House of Commons in the session of 1913. The right hon. gentleman read a portion of the address delivered by Premier Armstrong on the subject of steel and coal duties when he interviewed the cabinet last November. I am bound to say that the well-reasoned, courteous and illuminating observations which the right hon. gentleman read from the Nova Scotia premier's address were in very striking contrast to the original portion of his own remarks. The Premier of Nova Scotia is naturally interested in everything that pertains to the welfare of his province. The right hon. gentleman said that Premier Armstrong had stated that there was more unemployment in Nova Scotia at that particular date than there had ever been in the history of the province. Let us assume that that is correct. Well, I would also remind you, Mr. Speaker, that on the very day Premier Armstrong made that statement there were 1,300,000 men unemployed in England, principally steel workers and coal miners. That number is very much larger in proportion than any unemployment figures for Nova Scotia.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Free trade; they are going up in proportion.

Mr. KYTE: Well, if my hon. friend wants my opinion, I desire to say, the freer the trade the better, and the less unemployment there will be. But why is there unemployment at the Sydney steel plant? We have the same tariff that was current during all the years that our Conservative friends were in office. There is unemployment at Sydney because of the competition which they suffer from the manufacturers of steel in Europe. This competition is due to the depreciated currency. Since the war the Canadian Reconstruction Commission, as they call themselves, have carried on an active propaganda, their cry being: The way to reconstruct Canada after the war is to build up Canadian industry; and in order to build up Canadian industry we must put on more duties—increase the tariff. If increasing the tariff increases the prices of Canadian products to Canadian consumers, the Canadian Reconstruction Commission say: "Be patriotic; buy Canadian goods." Let us see how these gentlemen apply that gospel to themselves. The members of that reconstruction commission are also members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. They require steel and iron in their factories. Are they patriotic enough to buy these products from the British Empire Steel Corporation at Sydney? No, Mr. Speaker. They say: Inasmuch as we can buy steel and our other raw products in Europe cheaper than we can buy them at Sydney, we are going to fill our requirements in European markets. It is only up to the great consuming masses of Canada to be patriotic; the spirit of patriotism does not apply to them. That is the reason why we have had dull times in Sydney. The depression has nothing whatever to do with the tariff; it is the condition of the currency in European countries which enables the friends of the right hon. leader of the opposition to sacrifice Canadian production in their eagerness to take advantage of the lower prices in Europe.

But happily the picture is not as black as it has been painted by the right hon. leader of the opposition or by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). I am inclined to think that the right hon. gentleman imported a little bitterness into this debate because he felt it was the last time that he would be able to preach blue ruin to this House in respect of the steel and coal industry of Nova Scotia. I have before me a copy of the Montreal Star of yesterday's date.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What is its name?

Mr. KYTE: The Montreal Star of yesterday's date.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Then it must be all right.

Mr. KYTE: Well, it is not engaging in whispers of death at the present time, but in aspirations of life. I find in big headlines the following:

> Opening of six hearths will give employment to 1,800 men in March.

Then in smaller capitals we are told:

> Blooming mill of British Empire Steel Corporation will begin operations on double shift about March 16, official declares.

The despatch reads:

> Sydney, N.S., Feb. 23.—(Canadian Press).—Opening of six additional open hearths, the rolling of a 35,000 ton Canadian National Railway rail order and a concurrent big increase in the operations of the Sydney steel plant were announced here at noon by J. E. McLurg, vice-president of the British Empire Steel Corporation.

The statement says:

> "On August 5 last No. 1 blast furnace was blown out and has since been re-lined. The stoves of this furnace were lighted on Saturday last, preparatory to lighting the furnace itself on the 28th instant, and this furnace will begin producing basic iron on March 1. During this month we have been operating six open hearth furnaces, but during the week of March 1 six more open hearth furnaces will be put in operation.
> The blooming mill will continue operating on double shift about March 16, and the rail mill begin rolling an order of rails for the Canadian National Railways. This order is for 35,000 tons, not 50,000 as has been reported.
> "The billet mill, bar mill, rod, wire and nail mills will operate on double and single shift intermittently as required."

Amplifying his written statement, J. E. McLurg said that it means that 100 per cent production of steel will be under way early in March. Most of this steel will be needed for the rail order. The number of men employed at the plant to-day, exclusive of officials is 1,661 (this would make the total staff on the job something over 1,800).

The expansion of operations forecast in this statement means a marked increase in employment during the next two or three weeks.

There, Mr. Speaker, is a statement of the conditions as they exist in Sydney to-day. They are not the conditions that existed two weeks ago when the resolutions read by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) were drafted; they are not the conditions that existed when the articles from the Sydney Post and the Labour Herald in the town of Glace Bay, read to the House during this discussion, were written.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I may say that the telegram that I read was sent to me on Saturday.

Mr. KYTE: This telegram was sent yesterday to the Montreal Star.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I read the article, or one to the same purport, nearly a week ago. I do not think it is surprising that if the government gives orders for rails there should be some work.

Mr. KYTE: I think the right hon. gentleman is mistaken; he is thinking of a similar despatch he read with regard to steel plants in Hamilton which are running on double shift.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no; that telegram appeared in the papers a week ago.

Mr. KYTE: Knowing the conditions in Sydney at the present time I accept the statement attributed to Mr. McLurg in this despatch; there is no doubt or question about it. But my right hon. friend and his friends will doubt it, and I question whether they will be very highly elated when they find that the statement made here is true. The question of unemployment, therefore, is about settled so far as Sydney and Glace Bay are concerned. If this despatch is true, and I believe it is; if the steel plant will soon be working on a basis of one hundred per cent production, then there will be employment for every steel worker in the city of Sydney and for every coal miner in the county of Cape Breton. That is the happiest solution of our difficulty, and I think the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg might very well allow the matter to drop with the assurance given in this despatch that unemployment will cease entirely and that the plant will be working full time by the sixteenth of March.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, the discussion so far has, I think, established a few basic facts: First, that there is acute distress in the Cape Breton district. I took the trouble to wire a friend of mine at Sydney Mines Saturday night in order to get confirmatory evidence as to certain reports I had heard, and I have the following wire from him:

Much distress and suffering in all industrial centres of Cape Breton owing to long continuation of short time at mines and steel plant. Many people unable to get bare necessities of life. Writing.

Mr. KYTE: No doubt that is true, but on March 16 there will be no unemployment and no suffering.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For how long?

Mr. CARROLL: May I ask who sent that wire?

Mr. GOOD: Yes; this wire comes from the manager of the British Canadian Co-operative Society at Sydney Mines, a man who is respected very highly in the whole district. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the predictions of the hon. member who spoke last (Mr. Kyte) will be fulfilled. But I desire a little later on to call attention to a condition of affairs down there which would indicate that as things stand at present a permanent solution or settlement of the problem is very far from being within sight.

The second basic fact that I think has been pretty well established in this discussion is this: Although the propriety of action or interference on the part of this government might be questioned, its right to act is, I think, not questioned. Certainly I do not think anybody will dispute its right to grant relief, and I hope that we will have a little more light upon the right which this government may have to make an inqury. I shall certainly be very grateful for further information upon this point. Perhaps the Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) or some other lawyer here might enlighten us.

In the third place I believe it has been pretty well established that the remedy suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) is vain and foolish. The facts and arguments that have been submitted to this House within the last hour or so should leave scarcely any doubt in the minds of at least the majority of those present that there is no solution in that particular direction. I grant that we might tax the whole people for the benefit of a Cape Breton industry, but is it a sensible policy to put five times as great a tax upon the Canadian people as the subsidy or assistance that will thereby be given to the steel and coal industries in that particular territory? I think it would be very much more sensible, if we determined upon a policy of direct subsidy, to give it to the company outright in the form of a cash payment; and if the necessity can be established I would support such rather than anything in the way of a tariff. As has been pointed out, the tariff method is vicious and mischievous all through. We are simply loading upon the people generally a great burden, and the ultimate result will be disastrous even to the particular industry which it is planned to help, because the demand for its products in Canada will inevitably be curtailed.

I am afraid that what is wrong down there —at least, one thing that is wrong—is of long standing and deep-seated. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) stated this afternoon that there had been trouble down there for twenty years. I have been amazed and depressed upon reading the Labour Herald, and I think other gentlemen who have at heart the interests of this country cannot but be troubled very much at the evidence of antagonism and hostility that is found in its pages. I am very much afraid that the proposed investigation by the provincial government will get us nowhere. I doubt whether the mine workers will accept it and even if they did accept it I doubt whether they would accept the award made under that proposal, as it is practically compulsory arbitration. I gather from what information I have been able to pick up—and I do not profess to know a great deal of the situation, although I was down there once—that the trouble is too serious and deep seated to be remedied—although it might possibly be helped—by a committee of inquiry. I have in my hand two recent copies of the Labour Herald, and I find this paper filled with charges, some of them I think fairly well substantiated, against Besco. There are letters published here of a very serious character regarding a spy system that apparently has been in operation in the industry for years. I have here also as hon. members can see some of the originals which came from Sydney Mines, with a notation by the spy himself, as follows:

> Please show to superintendent, and then destroy.

These are the original reports, Mr. Speaker and many of them have been published, showing a very, very serious state of affairs, which so far as I can see will render this industry wholly unable to compete with any other decently operated industry of a similar kind on the continent Unless this relationship between the management and owners of Besco and the miners can be altered, what hope is there for the industry? I would like to give hon. members just one sample of the sort of report that is made. This one is dated January 16, 1918, that is seven years ago. We have recent letters of the same kind published in the copies of the Labour Herald which I have already mentioned. Here is a sample of the stuff that is reported by this secret spy agent:

> Attended meeting of Local No. 11. President Barrett was at the meeting to-night; his remarks took up most of the time. Hand pick miners made a complaint about the overmen informing them that in future they would not be paid for extra timber, and that they would not put up any timber in working places. Mr. Barrett told them to put up all the timber that they wished if they considered it necessary to protect their lives, and he would see that they would be paid for it. He said, to hell with the cost to the company, that they want safety. Then the men complained about the kind of timber they were getting. The ordinary pit props are about six inches in diameter, but the timber they are getting now are 14 inches to 16 inches in diameter, and the managing committee were instructed to demand 25 cents each for this work. James Smith made a complaint about Walter Donovan, overman on south side; that the other day Mr. Chew, safety first inspector, was down in the mine, and that while on No. 8 landing south he asked the drivers how they were getting on.

An so on and so on. The report is full of this sort of information, which was reported to the company through one of its secret agents. I do not know whether the reports are true or not, but you can imagine what the result is when a system of this sort has been going on for years, and is exposed now, with all the evidence to the miners; and further all the allegations mentioned by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) this afternoon as to lobbying, bribery, incompetence, and so forth. What can we hope for, what does my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) hope for by putting on a tariff when such a condition of affairs exists internally? I do not think you can touch it by a tariff, subsidy or any kind of special help, if that were advisable. Surely that is not getting at the root of the trouble!

I do not wish to prolong the debate. I wish merely to call attention to a most deplorable and difficult situation that has developed in that district, and I must confess that I do not see any very easy or any very quick way out of the difficulty. I think that perhaps relief ought to be granted. I think that perhaps this government might, if it has the power, make an inquiry; I wish we had more information on that point. If the commission proposed by Premier Armstrong is not accepted, then where are we? We are no further ahead at all, and this "canker," to use the word of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), is still there polluting and weakening and there is going to be no solution and no remedy until we get to the seat of the trouble.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words to what has been said already on this matter. I wish to join with those who have congratulated the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) in bringing this matter to the attention of the House, and to give as my excuse for speaking, if one be needed, the fact that I am not wholly sure that the proposals read by the Prime Minister to the House, the alleged despatch from Premier Armstrong of Nova Scotia, will meet the situation at all. Especially will they not meet it in connection with the immediate relief that is necessary.

At the outset let me make it clear that I cannot exonerate myself as one of the members of this House from the responsibility that I feel when I read of distress of this kind. In answer to a remark of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) on this question, who asked, "When we consider our trusteeship, how can we act?" let me inform him that so far as my trusteeship is concerned I will vote for and support any measure of reasonable relief which this government would now propose, and go back to my constituents feeling satisfied that they will endorse that action. Perhaps hon. members who are accustomed to paying from $75 to $150 a month rent for an apartment in Ottawa might be surprised if I read to them one or two of the pay sheets, of the unfortunate miner in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CARROLL: Why not read a few relating to the Alberta mines?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I will do that if the House wishes me to delay it to do so. But we are dealing with the situation in Nova Scotia at the present time. This pay envelope bears notations as to the number of tons that may be mined by the miner, and the price he receives. We then have the notation showing tons of rock or cap rock the miner may have to move. He is allowed so much for a certain weight, and then is allowed something for timber. After all that is added up you find a small weekly wage, from which must be deducted supplies which are usually bought at the company's stores, rent, which is paid to the company, coal, which is purchased from the company, water, secured from the company, sanitation charges, and I see attorney charges are put in here, in order to provide a way for the company to get around the Truck Act of Nova Scotia.

Mr. CARROLL: Does my hon. friend presume to say that in the pay sheets of the miners a deduction is made for attorneys? If he does, I want to tell him he has not read a pay sheet of the miners of Nova Scotia.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a pay envelope of the Dominion Coal Company, Limited, Dominion No. 2 Colliery, form No. 17, and it contains a provision for deductions for attorney. I investigated this and found that the attorney referred to in it is not perhaps an hon. gentleman like my hon. friend who has just interrupted me (Mr. Carroll), but it appears to be the power of attorney which the miner gives to the company at the store so that the company will be able to get around the Truck Act by deducting the cost of goods purchased, in other words, making payment in kind.

Mr. VIEN: Does the hon. member realize that all that he has said now touches the conditions of the miner's civil contract, over which this parliament has no jurisdiction whatever?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I trust the hon. gentleman will elucidate the constitutional aspect of this question later. I am dealing with this case because I feel that I may add a little to the sympathy that has already been generated by the speech of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth).

Mr. VIEN: You cannot increase our sympathy.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps I can get some measure of action on it.

Mr. VIEN: Not by that means.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The checkmen's fees are deducted, the doctor's fees, the United Mine Worker's fees are deducted the relief fee is permitted to be deducted and the church fee and the hospital fee. On this particular sheet I hold in my hand, 25 cents is deducted for church, 25 cents for hospital and 30 for relief, and so on.

I went into this matter a little more deeply than simply to examine the pay envelope of these men, and I find on communication with the men that the following situation exists. During the calendar year 1923 the Dominion No. 6 colliery worked 207 shifts. Then 142 datal men were employed at wages ranging from $2.33 to $3.75, or an average of $3.20. An illustration of the position of a married man with six children is then given:

Income for 207 days, at $3.30..		$683 10
Expenses house rent, etc..	$ 84 00
Coal..	92 00
Light..	28 80
Sanitation..	3 00
Doctor, hospital and relief.. ..	49 40
Total deductions..	$257 20	257 20
		$425 90

That leaves that man with six children and his wife a total net earning of $425.90. Out of that he must provide all the necessities in the way of clothing, food and so forth for his wife and family. The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) quoted from Shelley on "What is Slavery?" This is slavery. During the year 1924 this colliery worked 173 shifts: 181 datal men were employed on a scale of twenty different rates, ranging from $2.63 to $4.90, or an average of $3.94.

The largest number employed at one rate was about 45. They were paid $4.45. For our purpose we take this figure and calculate for a man with six children as his family working 173 days without any loss of time, every working day permitted during that year, he made a gross earning of $700.65. Deduct from that rent, light, doctor, relief, hospital, coal and so on he has a net of $443.77. Out of that net he must provide himself with his working outfit. The ordinary outfit would be as follows:

Three pairs of shoes at $3.50..	$10 50
Four suits of overalls at $2.75..	11 00
Three suits of underwear at $2..	6 00
Five pairs of socks at 40 cents..	2 00
One belt, one cap..	1 00
Lunch can..	2 00
	$32 50

Deducting this amount from the net income as above, we have $443.17, less $32.50, leaving a balance of $411.27. Out of this amount the wage earner has to provide for himself and family. While he has earned this sum in 173 days, he and his family must exist for 365 days or 52 weeks of the year and do not let hon. members forget that. That fact if no other would impel me to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister the attitude of the company with regard to the present situation that now exists there. The miner certainly cannot afford to accept a reduction of 10 per cent, even if he is on full time. He would still not be getting what the minimum wage board of Ontario would consider a decent living.

We come now to the attitude of the operator. I would refer to the Glace Bay Gazette of January 5, 1925, in that issue a semi-official or inspired article appeared and it reads as follows:

> That the Dominion Coal Company will adhere strictly to its demand for a ten per cent cut in the wages of the mine workers, the Gazette is able to state to-day on reliable authority. The company, it is informed, will not deviate one iota from its position as stated on the adjournment of the wage conference.
> Preparations are even now under way for placing the collieries in a position for a prolonged shut down, and arrangements are completed for the taking care of the horses in the event of their being taken out of the pits. The pits will also be stripped of pumps.

By the way, I remember two years ago there was a tremendous outcry in all the orthodox press of the country, among the respectable people, against the horrible attitude of the miners in quitting the pumps. If you believe this despatch which is semi-official, the company itself is going to pull the pumps out. With what result? The article proceeds:

> The pits will also be stripped of pumps, all movable machinery and equipment, and calculations are being made as to what collieries are likely to be lost through a long stoppage of operations.

Hon. gentlemen will note that—

> As to what collieries are likely to be lost through a long stoppage of operations.

Property is more sacred than human well-being when you can blame destruction of it on the unfortunate employees, but property is not so sacred when the employers take it upon themselves to help in the destruction. The article continues:

> While it is true that the company has applied for a conciliation board, the company itself feels that it is but a useless prolongation of the deadlock, as it knows its own position in the matter and has no intention of making any new departure from its announced policy. Its object in applying for the board is to demonstrate beyond peradventure that what it has said as to its position and its impossibility of paying the present wage rates, is absolutely correct.

And so, Mr. Speaker, we find that the Premier of Nova Scotia in proposing the conciliation board or commission to which the leader of the government referred to-day is going to have a very difficult if not an impossible task upon his hands. Both sides have declared the absolute impossibility of accepting any moderation of their present demands. Referring momentarily to the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition to-day may I suggest that the opinion of the workers down there is not the opinion expressed by himself. We find in their organ that they state that the American firms are selling coal in Newfoundland, in spite of Nova Scotia's nearness, an amount of coal far in excess of the amount of coal sold by Nova Scotia to that island. In Newfoundland the coal consumed is increasing every year, but instead of that increase being filled from the nearest coal field, which is the Nova Scotia coal field, it is being filled by United States coal, thirty cents higher than the price quoted by the British Empire Steel Company. I am not sure whether that is due to inefficiency or lack of business methods or anxiety to earn tremendous profits to pay interest on watered stock. The hon. member from one of the counties down there, the Liberal whip (Mr. Kyte) referred to mine No. 1 B. This despatch mentions that mine also and also mentions facts that corroborate what he said. It can produce coal cheaper than any other mine down there. The production cost down there is $2.76. Why is the price of coal in Halifax $11.50? Surely the tariff does not enter into that? It must be very difficult to sell coal there. As a matter of fact coal dealers in Halifax are selling American coal at ten dollars a ton and at that price they are actually underselling Nova Scotia coal in the city of Halifax.

Mr. HUGHES: That just brings up a point that I was not quite clear on, the statement which the hon. member made a moment ago. Did he not say that American coal was selling in Newfoundland at thirty cents a ton higher than Nova Scotia coal?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, my statement was that coal that was being sold in Newfoundland was largely, not entirely of course, United States coal, and that the trade had increased recently, but that increased trade, instead of being filled from Nova Scotia, was being filled with United States coal at thirty cents per ton higher than the tender of the British Empire Steel Company for this trade.

Mr. HUGHES: Then the British Empire Steel Company were willing to supply coal at thirty cents a ton less than the price of American coal?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, that is true, but they did not get the trade because they did not look after it. The other people came in and took the trade away from under their noses.

An hon. MEMBER: Perhaps they supplied better coal.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That might be so.

Mr. HUGHES: I think there must be a mistake, because the hon. member said a few moments later that American coal was sold at a lower price in Halifax than the Nova Scotia coal.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): So it is.

Mr. HUGHES: The two statements do not tally.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They are two different parts of the country; one is Newfoundland and the other is Halifax. I might as well read the balance of the reference to Halifax. It is as follows:

A week or two ago we were in Halifax and asked a coal merchant who it was that got the difference between the production cost at No. 1-B—

The mine to which my hon. friend referred.

—of $2.67 and the sale price of $11.50 paid by the people of Halifax. "Not the coal merchants," he replied, "am selling American at ten dollars and can make more money for myself than I can by selling Cape Breton coal at $1.50 more. The American operators leave us a fair margin to work on, while Besco will only allow us half the margin allowed by the American firms. American firms are delighted with a fifty cent profit, Besco scorns such profits and refuses to sell coal on such returns." "Yes, yes," we said, "but what about this $8.83 of difference between the cost at the mine and the price in the city, who gets that?" "Well," he replied, "deduct a dollar for the city dealer and another for transportation and the balance goes to Besco."

Again I should like to call the attention of this House to a question asked by Mr. Joe Steel, a member of the provincial legislature last session in reference to the purchase of coal by the government for public buildings. The reply which he received to that question was that the government was purchasing coal from the Inverness mine which is a bankrupt concern, at as low a price as $4.60, and from the British Empire Steel Company at $11.75 a ton. Why the spread, the coal is equal in quality.

To return just once more to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), I wish to ask him to pay attention to the miners' position with regard to the tariff. He argues, of course, as he usually does, that the tariff is the one thing that is going to help everybody and everything. There is no need for me to repeat the splendid argument of the hon. member for Brome or that of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), but they have not referred to the attitude the miners are likely to take in the matter. I, therefore, have pleasure in quoting the following:

When Besco was organized it was to cut down production costs. She has done so without one moment's regard for human sufferings by laying off miners and over-crowding the mines that did continue to operate; but that did not end the cheapening process by a jugful. New cutting machines were introduced into the mines, which resulted in pushing up the death rate among the miners and the profits of the corporation and greatly cheapening production costs. Then there was the opening of No. 26 mine, and here the labour cost for datal labour was more than cut in half by the new improved haulage system. No doubt this

"improved" haulage system is likely to prove a terror to the miners employed in that mine. Besco is producing coal landed in the cars at No. 26 mine at $2.67 per ton; she can ship this coal to Montreal for 87 cents a ton and sell it in large lots for $6 per ton and at higher rates for smaller quantities. There is no coal from the United States that can be brought to Montreal over the long rail haul and compete with this price. Besco always puts up the price to the point where it allowed her to ship in just under the price asked for American coal, and the price asked by Besco bears no relation to the cost of production and transportation but is exactly the twin brother to what the trade will bear. Besco could sell her coal cheaper in Montreal than she does to-day and still have a very good thing, for the financial year of 1923 on her mining operations Besco cleared nearly three million dollars. This is the same whining, lily-fingered bunch that is getting the Sydney Board of Trade, headed by their man Friday, Armstrong, to go to Ottawa and jabber their heads off about the tariff and "everybody sacrificing something to get business going." All of which means that the miners will be advised to take less wages and have Besco's impudent request for a cut sanctified by King, Murdock, Armstrong and the other flunkies of capitalism. However, the miners in their convention showed the Tory press that they did not fall for the Tory bunk and clap-trap about the "tariff" and Besco's well laid scheme with their flunkies on the Sydney Board of Trade and join in the mock parade to Ottawa.

Mr. MURDOCK: What paper is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The mouthpiece of the labour people of that district, the Labour Herald.

Mr. MURDOCK: The Maritime Labour Herald?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes; at Glace Bay, December 6, 1924. I have, therefore, laid before this House two despatches giving both sides of the case, one from, perhaps, my hon. friend's paper, certainly that of the Armstrong administration, and one from the labour people. I do not think I would be doing justice to myself or my constituents if I did not join with the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) in an earnest and urgent plea to this government to take into consideration the desperate position of these men now. There is no use waiting for that indeterminate time when, we are informed, a commission may be appointed by the Armstrong government. I do not know when that will be. We certainly know it is going to be very difficult to get these two opposing forces together. In the meantime, what is going to happen to the Canadian women and children who are there, to those people who have nothing whatever to do with this industrial strife but who must suffer because of it? I must earnestly plead with the government and my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) who told us that we could bring our troubles to him as to the foot of the throne, to consider this question seriously. I am perfectly willing to give my sanction to an expenditure of this character, far more willing than I would be to voting $100,000 for a stone monument to war. Again, let me suggest to the Prime Minister not to be carried away or become too excited over the despatches from Sydney. Mr. Armstrong may have a harder job on his hands than he thinks he has, and it may take a long time to get these industrial matters settled while in the meantime some relief is urgently needed. That prosperity which we are continually being told is just around the corner, and which I am just as anxious to see as anybody else, seems to me to be as many corners off to-day as it was a year ago.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Before commenting on the very splendid address of my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), I desire to say a few words with reference to some of the other remarks that have been made this evening. I must say that my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) and my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland), as well as several others who have spoken on the question, have given evidence of a very large fund of very inaccurate knowledge concerning coal mines and coal mining in the island of Cape Breton. Touching the point raised against the British Empire Steel Corporation by the hon. member for Bow River, that hon. gentleman produces a pay sheet of that company and reads off a whole list of what are known as "off" taxes, the purpose of which in this connection I do not see. Every one of those off taxes, with the exception of the one regarding credit in the stores, which is given by power of attorney, is a matter of agreement between the United Mine Workers of America and the British Empire Steel Corporation; it is a contract between these two parties whereby these taxes are taken out of the sheets. And even the fees which the members pay to the United Mine Workers of America are deducted from the wages of the labourers every Saturday night, or at least once a month. With regard to the article which the hon. member read from the Glace Bay Gazette, I agree with him that it had a very great deal to do with the falling down of negotiations between the company and its employees a fortnight or three weeks ago.

Mr. IRVINE: I understood the hon. gentleman to say a few minutes ago that the pay sheet quoted by my hon. friend from Bow River was not from Nova Scotia. Whose information is correct?

Mr. CARROLL: I told the hon. gentleman that if he was reading anything from a pay sheet which showed cost to attorneys, as he put it, then it was not a pay sheet of the British Empire Steel Corporation. The hon. gentleman made an explanation and no doubt the sheet to which he referred is one that properly belongs to the company. I repeat, that article, which my hon. friend says was inspired by the agents of the British Empire Steel Corporation, did more to cause a breakdown in the negotiations between the company and the men than anything else that occurred. I do not know whether it was an inspired article or not, but if it was inspired, then the man who inspired it is not a Canadian citizen and should not even be allowed to do business in this country. Who inspired it, I say, I do not know; and my hon. friend, although he lives three or four thousand miles distant from that section of the country, seems to know more about the situation than I do. Whether or not the Glace Bay Gazette is the mouthpiece of the company I do not know and I do not care; I do know it is no friend of mine politically.

As for the argument of my hon. friend with reference to the royal commission which will likely be appointed by the Armstrong government, I do not quite follow him in what he says in that direction. He agrees with everything said by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg; and that hon. gentleman suggested and strongly urged that a royal commission should be appointed to go to the root of the troubles in Nova Scotia between the United Mine Workers and the company that operates there. I am afraid my hon. friend is a doubting Thomas. I have great hopes that if the Armstrong government appoints a royal commission composed of good substantial citizens their labours will be satisfactory. And, when I say business men I do not care from what walk of life they come—whether they are miners or steel workers or men in any other vocation. But if the Armstrong government appoints men who the people will feel are just and fair they will go into the question in the way the miners of Nova Scotia and the steel workers want the whole thing probed; and if that is done then I say that the commission will be a success. The whole situation will depend on whether or not the men will receive an increase of wages if the British Empire Steel Corporation can afford to give it to them, and that question of wages will be probed by the commission, as I hope, when it is appointed by the provincial government.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would ask the hon. gentleman whether the condition under which the commission is to be appointed, namely, that the men will be forced to abide by its recommendation, has not really been already refused by the miners in their reply to the company's proposal.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not know whether the miners have accepted it or not, but they will be given an opportunity of either taking or rejecting it. Of course, there may be a middle course; there may be an amendment to the letter which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) read to-day. There is always compromise; and the great trouble not only with the people of Nova Scotia but with hon. gentlemen in this House is that there is not sufficient compromise. If there had been more compromise in Nova Scotia in the last six months on the part both of the men and of the company we should not have the trouble that exists there to-day.

With regard to the coal industry of Nova Scotia, I would point out that the telegram which the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg read to-day comes from Sydney Mines in which I think there are three operating collieries. And these are the people who are looking for relief from this government or from some quarter. But that is a very small proportion of the mining area in the island of Cape Breton. We have, operated by the British Empire Steel Corporation in the island of Cape Breton alone, 26 or 27 collieries, and my hon. friend receives a despatch from the centre asking for relief where there are, I believe, only 3 collieries operating. The other 23 collieries are not mentioned in this despatch at all, and that is a very important point for the House to note. Coming to the other 23 or 24 collieries, I may say that they are all contained in the county of South Cape Breton which I have the honour to represent. I do not say that things are ideal in those 24 collieries; they have never been ideal, and I hope that they will improve in the future. But there is only one particular section of these 24 collieries which to-day actually needs relief, and that embraces No. 2 and No. 9. No. 2 is one of the largest collieries in the world, and it and No. 9 are on the same shaft, the one overlying the other. In that district during the last three months there have been only two or three days work per fortnight.

I had a telegram the other day which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) read to the House. It was from the Rev. A. M. Macleod and Dr. Sullivan, who were chairman and secretary respectively of a meeting held in Glace Bay to which my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg has referred. Those people did not ask me to go to the government and seek monetary assistance. They did suggest that the Canadian National Railway management should be approached to give an order for bank coal so that the operators could go ahead and mine it, thus giving employment and helping them out of their difficult position, the railway to take delivery in the spring. They also suggested that I should see the railway management as to a rail order. I knew that a rail order had been given three or four weeks ago—the order to which reference is made in yesterday's Montreal Star. That is the only source from which I have had complaints since I came to Ottawa this session. I know there is difficulty in the Sydney mines as mentioned in the telegram to my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth). The cause of that difficulty has been explained by my colleague from Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Kyte).

As requested, I went down to Montreal last Thursday and saw Mr. Wolvin, president of the British Empire Steel Corporation, and Mr. Vaughan, purchasing agent of the Canadian National Railways. It has been suggested to-night that the Canadian National Railways would not buy bank coal because it deteriorates. Let me say that the Canadian National has been buying and using bank coal for the last twenty-five years. There was, I believe, a little difficulty because last year the coal was not mixed with newly mined coal. It must be remembered that it is only in the summer months that we can ship our coal satisfactorily from Cape Breton; in the winter time the railway rates are prohibitive. Those two gentlemen were unable to take action because nobody knows where he is at, to use a colloquial expression. The British Empire Steel Corporation do not know what freight rates they will be charged on their coal. My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) suggests that they were asking all the trade could bear. Is my hon. friend so charitably disposed that he would sell his grain to-day for $1.10 a bushel when the market price ranges from $2.00 to $2.05? I presume the British Empire Steel Corporation is in the same good company with my hon. friend in this regard: they get what the trade can bear, and so does he. The Canadian National cannot contract with the British Empire Steel Corporation because the trade is in such an unsettled state; the corporation do not know whether they will be forced to pay ten per cent more than the present rates, or whether they will be allowed by the commission to put into effect a ten per cent reduction. I am in hopes that there will be no decrease in the miners' wages. I believe that if the miners get steady work they are practically satisfied to continue at their present wages. I repeat, I am in hopes, and those hopes I believe are well founded, that there will be no reduction in the miners' wages, especially in Cape Breton. Those are the only two mines out of twenty-six from which I have had any complaints. Of course, everything is not satisfactory. In the other mines they are only working three and four hours a day. But may I point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) that if he turns over the front page of the Sydney Post from which he read the horrible picture there painted, he will find on the next page a glowing picture from the town of New Waterford, where their four collieries have been working for the last month or more. There are always two sides to every question.

My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) may talk about the spy system and so forth, but the trouble originated during the war. Previous to 1914 we never had any difficulty in selling all the coal we could mine in Nova Scotia; we had a splendid market in Montreal and Quebec. At that time the British Empire Steel Corporation—then the Dominion Steel and Iron Company—had a magnificent fleet of coal ships plying between Sydney and Montreal. Those ships, I venture to say, carried coal cheaper than any other transportation line in America. The company also owned well-equipped piers both in Sydney and in Montreal. Soon after the war started practically every one of those ships was commandeered by the British Admiralty, and as a result we lost the Montreal market, which was captured by the Americans. They hold a great part of it still, but we are gradually coming in again and I am hopeful that a few years hence the British Empire Steel Corporation and the other coal companies of Nova Scotia will have completely regained that market.

To show how much a very slight reduction of freight rates will benefit our coal trade, I may mention that through the action of the Minister of Mines (Mr. Stewart) a bonus of one-fifth of a cent per ton per mile was granted by the government last year on all coal from Nova Scotia mines destined for points west of Riviere du Loup. This enabled the British Empire Steel Corporation to ship 100,000 tons of coal to markets which they were never able to reach before. There is one of the difficulties which the coal trade of Nova Scotia has to contend with. We may talk about tariff and other things, but the cost of rail transportation is the great underlying difficulty confronting the coal trade of our province.

The steel industry has been at a low ebb throughout the world for the last year, but we have not been in such very bad condition in Sydney. Some portions of the city are in bad straits, of course, but the first of this year the British Empire Steel Corporation was able to capture a very large share of the Australia and New Zealand markets. When I left Sydney the first of this month a steamer was clearing from the port of Louisburg for Australia laden with products of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company. I do not think the outlook is so very bad. I am hopeful that the proposition put forward by Premier Armstrong will be accepted both by the British Empire Steel Corporation and by the workers, and that they will be able to get to work on their summer contracts in April. If so, I feel that the whole trouble of the coal and steel industry in Nova Scotia will be at an end.

I am not going to argue, Mr. Speaker, whether we had harder times under the Conservative government than we are having under the Liberal government; I am not going to argue that the tariff would or would not be a cure for our troubles in Nova Scotia; but I do say—and I think it was pointed out by my hon. friend from Bow River—that the miners themselves think that the tariff is not going to help them, because when the delegation from that province went to the United Mine Workers and asked them to appoint delegates to go to Ottawa to interview the government in order to obtain an increase of tariff, those mine workers absolutely refused to do so.

The right hon. gentleman speaks about the tariff being the trouble with us. I do not think it is. The tariff on run of mine coal remained at 53 cents a ton from 1911 until 1917 and on slack coal at 14 cents a ton from 1911 until 1921. If my hon. friends on the other side, who were then in power, thought that an increase in the tariff would be beneficial to the coal trade in this country, why did they not put that policy into effect and give us a higher tariff? That is something I am unable to understand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish the hon. member had put the question to me when I was on my feet.

Mr. CARROLL: Well, I presume that when the right hon. gentleman brings down his budget he will explain to this House—

[Mr. Carroll.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member will read the memorial of his leader in Nova Scotia he will find the explanation very complete.

Mr. CARROLL: Well, I know Mr. Armstrong very well and if he has done this it is the first time in his political history that I have known him to make apologies for the Conservative party. I read the memorial very carefully and I do not see where Mr. Armstrong gave any explanation on behalf of the Conservative government of why there was no increase in the duty upon coal from 1911 until 1921. If a duty on coal will benefit—

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, the memorial explains very fully that on account of the increased value of coal, a specific duty, while a sufficient duty in 1916, is an insufficient duty to-day. The memorial shows the rate of increase since 1916. In fact, that is the whole burden of the memorial.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes, but my right hon. friend must not forget that coal was never so costly in Nova Scotia as it was from 1915 to 1917 or 1918.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not according to the memorial.

Mr. CARROLL: I have not the memorial before me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have.

Mr. CARROLL: I venture to say my right hon. friend will not make the statement on his own account—and if he does he will not be backed up by the memorial of the Premier of Nova Scotia—that coal did not cost more between 1915 and 1918 than at any other time in the history of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just a minute; I will have that.

Mr. CARROLL: I have good reason to know it, Mr. Speaker. In 1915 coal prices to the householder in the city of Sydney and the town of Glace Bay went up some 85 per cent. In November, 1918, the price was cut one dollar a ton, and it has remained there ever since. I think that is a fair index of the market value of coal in that particular part of the country.

As to the other phase of the remarks of my hon. friend this evening, that is, the relief he prays for, I have said to the House that I have had no requests from the coal miners of my part of Nova Scotia for any monetary relief from this government. They did ask me to do certain things, which I tried to do and failed, except, of course, with reference to the steel order. I do not think the miners of Nova Scotia want doles. They are being looked after fairly well in the city of Sydney—and the city of Sydney suffered more last year than any other part of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me? I have the figures now, taken direct from the memorial. The memorial states that 6,949,540 tons imported in 1916 were of the value of $7,908,125 and that in 1924—

Mr. CARROLL: What year was that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was 1916, right between the two years the hon. gentleman named, 1915 and 1917. In 1924, according to the memorial, 11,544,184 tons were imported at a value of $34,341,956.

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend must be mistaken, because we did not mine 11,000,000 tons of coal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, these are importations.

Mr. CARROLL: Oh, well—

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the coal imported was more valuable in 1924 than in 1916 I would think the local coal would be the same.

Mr. CARROLL: The strange thing is that it was not the same. I can understand very well the argument of the gentleman who prepared or who presented the memorial. That is in regard to United States coal, but they are producing coal very much cheaper down there than we are. They can get it into the Montreal market—and they got it there last year, notwithstanding what has been said in this House; the same grade of American coal came into Montreal last year from the United States at a price from 14 to 18 cents lower than that of the Sydney coal, notwithstanding the cheaper transportation from Sydney.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At far higher prices than in 1916.

Mr. CARROLL: Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes, twice as high—three times.

Mr. CARROLL: My right hon. friend did not catch the weight of my argument. He is trying with his usual cleverness to get away from what I said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I caught it exactly.

Mr. CARROLL: The point I was making—and I will return to it—is this: it is a marvel to me as well as to friends of the right hon. gentleman in Nova Scotia that there should be so much talk about tariff to-day when the same tariff exists in relation to Nova Scotia coal that existed from 1911 to 1921. My hon. friends made no move when they were in power to increase the duty on coal. Why? Because a howl would go up from every manufacturer in Ontario and Quebec if they dared to lay unholy hands on coal and place a little higher duty upon it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Even if they were in power now they would not do it.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not believe they would. There is only one way to judge a party, just as there is only one way to judge a man—you must judge his future by his past. If on this question of coal we judge the future of the Conservative party in this country on their past record, then I say the duty on coal will never be increased by them.

Mr. LADNER: Should it be increased?

Mr. CARROLL: What does my hon. friend think?

Mr. LADNER: I am asking him the question.

Mr. CARROLL: What does my hon. friend think? I am an Irishman.

Mr. LADNER: If you are Irish you should have more courage.

Mr. CARROLL: I never lacked courage when it was necessary. With regard to some of my hon. friends who seem to think that no good has come out of conciliation boards or out of royal commissions as regards the coal trade, may I say that there has never been a royal commission or a conciliation board dealing with the question of coal in Nova Scotia that did not give the miners of that province an increase? I think under the premiership of the present leader of the opposition a royal commission was sent down to Nova Scotia in the summer of 1917 or 1918, and I remember that Rev. Clarence McKinnon was one of the members of that commission. As a matter of fact it may have been later than that; it may have been in 1919 or 1920. They went down there to investigate the coal industry in Nova Scotia, and without getting the two parties together, without going into the question at all they got the operators to agree to give the men a ten per cent increase. The same result has followed from two or three different conciliation boards. I am not going into the question of who should appoint a royal commission to investigate coal conditions in the province of Nova Scotia or any other province, but had Premier Armstrong refused or neglected to appoint a royal commission in this instance, I was prepared to move the adjournment of the House here on some occasion in order to ask this government to appoint a commission of inquiry. But Premier Armstrong has appointed a commission, and there is therefore no necessity for this government to jump in at the present time.

A royal commission was asked for in 1921, I think, and a delegation came up here. At that time I said I was opposed to this government appointing a royal commission until they had found out whether anything could be done under the conciliation act. A great deal has been said in the debates this session as to the action of the Privy Council in declaring ultra vires of this parliament the so-called Lemieux Act. May I point out that on the statute books of Nova Scotia there has been since 1890 one of the best arbitration and conciliation acts for the settlement of disputes between employers and employees that exists on the statute books of this country. It is contained in chapter 21 of the old revised statutes of Nova Scotia, 1900. There may be some phases of that arbitration act which do not suit present day conditions, because it has not been brought up to date; but in every instance where trouble has occurred between employer and employee in Nova Scotia we have fallen back on the conciliation act of the federal government. The coal industry in Nova Scotia is not disturbed by the fact that the Privy Council has declared that act ultra vires of this parliament. It is unfortunate that that has happened, but we are not badly off in that respect in Nova Scotia. So far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned, in order to show you that they intended to look after their poor and distressed, the Assembly of the province twenty-five years ago delegated to the municipalities power to look after their poor and distressed. I do not pretend to know what the conditions are in other provinces, but obviously twenty-five years ago Nova Scotia intended the municipalities to look after the poor and distressed in that province. I do not say that the time may not come—the time has been in this country—when this government should alleviate the suffering of the poor in any province. There may come a time when that will be necessary; it may be now; it may be that before this parliament rises dire necessity may exist in some part of this country which this government should relieve. But I do not think that time has come. There is a board of trade in my part of the country, in South Cape Breton, which has asked this government for relief, and those are the only terms upon which I would support this government giving monetary relief to any part of this country, when and only when the parties who are responsible for the relief of the poor should come to this government and ask for help. But not one city board in my county has asked for help. They are doing what they can, and our business men are also contributing to the relief of the poor and unemployed. I do not know just how they are getting along, but I do know that up to the present time not one of our city boards has asked this government to come to their assistance in that regard.

I have taken a little more time than I intended. As a matter of fact, I did not intend to say anything on this subject at all.

In conclusion, I would say that there is only one way in which the coal industry can become substantially successful in the province of Nova Scotia or anywhere else, and that is when you have harmony between the operators and the men. A great deal of the propaganda which has been read here to-day—I am not alluding to my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth)—does not tend to bring about that harmony which should exist between employer and employee in the coal trade as well as in any other. I believe in the importance of that factor, and I have not in my political life ever done anything to injure that harmony in any way. So long as I am in public life I am not going to criticise the British Empire Steel Corporation, just for the sake of criticism, and I am not going to criticise the men who work for that company, just for the sake of criticism. That does no good; it simply widens the breach. The man who does good is the one who tells both sides simply and frankly: You have a function to perform, and you also have a function to perform. I would tell the British Empire Steel Corporation: You must pay the people in your employ not only a living wage, but a wage on which they may have some title of comfort above the mere standard of living. I would say to the men: Having received that wage you should do everything possible to make the works which your employers have undertaken successful, not only from a business standpoint but from a national standpoint, for the coal industry in this country is a national asset and we should so look upon it. I am hopeful that notwithstanding the foreboding outlook of some of those who have spoken on this question to-day, the British Empire Steel Corporation and its employees will get together and that we shall have within a few months a repetition of some of the good times we have had down there. Hon. gentlemen talk about twenty years of stress and strife in Nova Scotia. Why, I can go to Montreal and show you where there have been forty years of strife right in that city.

Mr. MARLER: Whereabouts?

Mr. CARROLL: I am not speaking of Montreal particularly, but the same is true of any industrial centre, Toronto, Winnipeg or any other city. Labour troubles are as old as any city. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) spoke to-night with an overabundance of hope of the good that may come out of this inquiry, but let me tell him when he talks of twenty years of stress and strife in Nova Scotia that we have had no more stress and strife between employer and employee in that province than there has been in any other part of Canada. I could point to the constituency of my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland). What has been going on out there in the last few years? Has there been contentment, has there been happiness, has there been harmony between employer and employee in that part of the country? It seems to me that a great many who have spoken on this subject to-night are trying to focus attention on the troubles between the British Empire Steel Corporation and their employees in order to keep clear of their own troubles. Has all been contentment in the constituency of Brant? Have there never been strikes there? If there have not, it is a poor place to live in, because the people are not progressive.

Mr. GOOD: In referring to the twenty years, I was merely quoting the statement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). I might ask the hon. member how he can expect this harmony which we all desire if the facts that I stated exist, and continue to exist?

Mr. CARROLL: Will my hon. friend vouch for all the statements he has made here to-night? Will he vouch, for instance, for the statement made in the telegram that he read from Sydney Mines that there was much distress and suffering in all industrial centres at Cape Breton and that it had existed all summer?

Mr. GOOD: I can only say I have great confidence in the man who sent the telegram to me.

Mr. CARROLL: I have better confidence in myself, because I know conditions there. I have lived there for forty-four or forty-five years, and I expect to live there another forty years anyhow. I say again I hope—and I use the word "hope" very often—I am in great hopes that the difficulties are going to be overcome for a time in any event in the coal and steel industry, so far as those industries are concerned. Give us one year such as the years between 1904 and 1909, just one year with such employment as we enjoyed then, and we will be the happiest and the most contented people in the whole Dominion of Canada.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): In rising to make a few remarks I can scarcely hope to add any new information on the subject under discussion; nor is it my intention to attempt to criticise to any extent such policies as may have been advanced as a remedial measure for the situation which is reported to exist in the Nova Scotia mining and steel industrial centres. I rise rather to see whether I cannot bring the matter to some practical head, to see whether, after all the threshing of straw that has continued throughout the day, there may not have been a little golden grain somewhere for those hungry people in Nova Scotia. I have heard it said that while Rome was burning Nero fiddled, and it is just possible that while we have wrangled here in parliament in political gymnastics and spent the whole day discussing constitutional trivialities, there are some children in Nova Scotia starving. So that if there is going to be any point to our discussion, if we are at all justified in occupying the attention of the House for the last six hours, I surely am now justified in making a plea that the government of the day, having recognized the facts in the case before us, will proceed to give some immediate relief to a situation which is stated in the motion as being urgent—something that has to be dealt with immediately. In making my plea for this relief I want first of all to enumerate the salient facts of the case; I want to recall the attitude of the government as expressed on the issue, to point out the policy that has been advanced by others and repudiated by the government, and to ask if the government is prepared to take some practical action that will relieve the situation.

The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) presented the case for the Nova Scotia miners. He has been complimented on his presentation from all parts of the House, so that I gather from that circumstance that he was fair and did not exaggerate the facts. Now the facts which I wish to enumerate at the moment, and which are relevant to the plea which I wish to make are that there are distressful conditions existing in Nova Scotia at the present time. These conditions are of long standing but at present have reached unprecedented intensity. These alarming economic conditions which are said to be chronic by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Kyte), and which are admitted to be very serious at the moment, have been brought about partly by industrial disputes between the men and the company, and partly by very undesirable economic conditions which are not confined to Nova Scotia, but which are widespread throughout the Dominion of Canada, but which seem to have reached a more alarming proportion in that province than in some other provinces.

In connection with this condition an appeal has been brought before this House asking for relief. That appeal was inspired by a message sent by the relief committee of Nova Scotia to the effect that there were a great many people there who were suffering from great distress and were in danger of starvation. We were told by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) of some of the conditions that existed there, and I must say that while some of the conditions which he portrayed seemed to me to be almost unbelievable, still I must recall the fact that the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) acknowledged that there had been no exaggeration and that the case had been stated very fairly. We hear from the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg that a great number of people were living on meals which cost about four cents each. We hear that some children had no clothing except old flour bags. We hear that some of the children did not perhaps have very good flour bags, and some of them were very hungry; so much so that people had been known to gather mushrooms in the field in order to keep them from starvation. I hope hon. members from Nova Scotia will not think for one moment that I am trying to throw a slur at that province when I mention these facts. I venture to say that to some extent these conditions can be found all over Canada. I think the Minister of Labour possibly has in his possession at the moment a message by the mayor of my own city informing him of the conditions in our city in regard to unemployment and also informing him of the suffering of men and women brought into Calgary this year as a result of the immigration policy of the government. This shows it is not only Nova Scotia alone that is suffering, but it happens at the moment that the conditions are more acute there than anywhere else.

These are the conditions and the question is what can this parliament do. We have not helped the miners of Nova Scotia, nor have we helped the people of that province, nor have we improved the business conditions of the company by the discussion which has taken place to-day. The only way we could expect to improve conditions down there would be by giving some relief to the people actually suffering. What then can we do about that? I turn to see what is the attitude of the government, and in order to find the attitude of the government I must refer to the utterances of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The Minister of Labour as already pointed out acknowledged the facts as stated by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). He expressed his sympathy for the suffering people and he also added his regrets that such a condition existed. But while he was sympathetic, as I am sure we all are, and while he regretted the situation, as I am sure we all do, he confessed the impotence of the government to do anything in the matter. According to him it was not possible for parliament to take any action in this case. I am very glad Mr. Speaker for one thing at least in this discussion, that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has, I hope, forever torn the covering of the British North America Act from the shoulders of the government and exposed the nakedness of their policy to the Dominion of Canada. With regard to labour policies and labour difficulties, ever since I have been in this House, the minister has rolled himself up in the British North America Act. I am glad, I say, to hear that this issue has been completely and finally separated from the British North America Act, at least as regards the plea for relief which I want to make now to this government on behalf of the starving people of Nova Scotia. We are asking for a sympathetic consideration which, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has pointed out, has been granted by this parliament in many instances prior to this. We are told that ninety millions of the people's money, that is ninety million dollars from the pockets of the Canadian people, have been donated to the company that is at the present time largely responsible for the starvation conditions in Nova Scotia. I wish that some British North America Act had stood in the way of those donations.

Mr. MURDOCK: To permit the use of the word "donate" would be rather improper. I did not say "donate." Ninety million dollars of the people's money have been expended in bonuses or for the products of the company.

Mr. IRVINE: In using the word "donate," I was using it entirely on my own account and was not putting it into the mouth of the Minister of Labour. But you may modify the word, if you wish; you may call it "expenditure" if that sounds better. We have expended ninety million dollars of public money on this company, and I say there was no British North America Act then to stand in the way of that. If I mistake not, both historic parties have to accept responsibility for that expenditure. Whether that expenditure was justified or not, I am not now discussing; but if the Canadian government has, without hesitation, spent ninety million dollars of the people's money in building up a company, surely we can make a small donation to save from starvation some children that are suffering at the hands of that very company which we have so handsomely bonused.

I must express surprise that the Minister of Labour should have deplored the fact that labour men, not only in Nova Scotia, but throughout this country, are so ready to make their appeals to the government for aid. I would warn him that if they receive no better reception than they are likely to receive today, it may be that they will get tired of having hopes in the government and may cease to bring any appeals whatsoever to it. Where should they come for relief, but to this government? Has this government not power over the financial institutions of this country which are more than anything else responsible for the conditions which we are now discussing? Has this government not full charge of the immigration policy of this country and does it not persist in still bringing in people when it has no work for the people that are here? Has this government not full control over the whole fiscal policy of this country which has an immediate effect on employment and working conditions of the people of Canada? Then, shall the labour men who may be the victims of any one of these policies of the government, not make their appeal to this government? Where else would the Minister of Labour have them go? Would he suggest that they lose all hope in this government of interfering in their interests and take direct or industrial or some other kind of action? If the Minister of Labour is not prepared to listen to their plea, it seems to me there is no other action for them to take than some such action as he would characterize as unconstitutional. It must not be forgotten that even this government found no act to stand in its way when it wanted to find some steps that would lead to the sending of troops to fight labour men when they made their appeals. I hope that the situation which we are discussing now will not be permitted by the present administration to go on until it is necessary to spend more money in sending troops to quell disturbances than it would to keep these people from starving at the present time.

Mr. MURDOCK: I know my hon. friend does not want to be unfair, and he will, therefore, admit that troops, whenever sent, were requisitioned in accordance with the law.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not trying to place any blame on the present government in the sense that they did something that was illegal. I simply said that they did not try to look for any British North America Act to stand between them and that kind of action, but they are looking for a British North America Act to stand between them and the taking of relief measures in regard to the miners of Nova Scotia. That, I think, is a fair criticism from the facts.

The Prime Minister, speaking also for the government, brought forward a document which came over the Associated Press wires, I believe, purporting to be a proposal advanced by the Premier of Nova Scotia. On the grounds of that the Prime Minister expressed the opinion that the discussion might very well be dropped in this parliament. I do not know whether it would be in order to discuss that proposal, for it may well be that a discussion of it here might stand in the way of the use that it might otherwise be. I will, therefore, say very little about it beyond remarking that it is too remote to be of immediate assistance in a situation that is termed as urgent; there was not anything in the document read by the Prime Minister which I did not read in the proposal which came to me this morning in the shape of the Besco Bulletin which was the actual proposal of the company itself; and further there was in that document a clause which I do not think any group of organized labour anywhere could possibly accept, so with these observations with regard to that, I cannot see how this parliament, after having discussed this question for a day, can presume to drop it on the grounds that the document presented holds a solution for the problem of the people of Nova Scotia that are represented as in a condition of starvation.

Mr. PUTNAM: What clause does the hon. member refer to as necessarily unacceptable?

Mr. IRVINE: The clause which makes binding upon the labour men to accept the wage scale which might be decided upon by a committee that has not yet been appointed.

Mr. PUTNAM: That is, if they freely choose to go into it.

Mr. IRVINE: Certainly, but I am pointing out that they are not likely to go into it. If, however, they do, it is not an immediate thing. The Prime Minister also was very careful to throw from his shoulders the responsibility in this matter of granting relief and pointed out to us that local governments must be responsible for unemployment and all suffering that arises therefrom. Let me add in that connection that it is just possible that unemployment and suffering which result from the policy of the present administration may, some day, become such a burden on local governments that they may not only not be able to carry it, but rebel against it, and consequently the solicitous care expressed by the Prime Minister to protect the British North America Act may become the means of its final overthrow.

I do not think that we can possibly hope to get anywhere by trying to throw the responsibility on the shoulders of somebody else. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) brought forward his policy; and let me emphasize the fact that it was a policy. It is not my business to criticise it at the moment, although some hon. members have felt it their duty to do so. But at any rate the right hon. gentleman did have a policy which in his opinion would have some effect on the situation. But the government so far has advanced no policy at all. It is true that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) took the leader of the opposition to task and refuted his arguments in the orthodox free trade manner. And he did it well. If he meant to contribute anything to the discussion, he meant inferentially that the cure for the Nova Scotia difficulty lies, not by any means in the raising of the tariff but rather in a lowering of it. But I notice that he did not speak for the government in that regard, for the government made no response to indicate their willingness to lower the tariff to meet the demands of the hon. member for Brome. So far as advancing a policy is concerned, however, to meet the immediate situation or to meet any situation in a more remote period, the government if it has a policy has been quite silent on the matter. True, the hon. member for Brome emphasized the point that watered stock, which seems to have increased in great volume in the case of Besco, has a definite connection with the present situation there. But I should like to refer that problem back to the hon. member for Brome and I would ask him to use his influence as a good Liberal with the provincial government in Nova Scotia, which is also Liberal, in an endeavour to induce them to bring in legislation as speedily as they can to make it impossible for watered stock to remain in the stock of any company. That would, perhaps, be a step in the direction of a partial remedy.

Now, there are two things to be done. The first is immediate relief in the way of a donation, or a subsidy or an expenditure, or whatever the Minister of Labour chooses to call it. At any rate, some form of concrete assistance can be given to the people that are suffering. I believe that the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Kyte) prophesied that by the middle of March, I think he said the 16th, the whole trouble in Nova Scotia would be overcome for good, and all, although he did tell us in his introductory remarks that the situation was of very long standing and had almost become chronic. Well, if he is so sure in his prophecy, which he makes on the strength of an announcement in a newspaper that he would not have quoted a year ago with any degree of authority, that by March 16 there will be no trouble nor hunger any longer in Nova Scotia, then I want to ask the government, on the strength of that prophecy, added to somewhat by the optimistic expressions of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, whether they will not guarantee that no child shall die of starvation in Nova Scotia nor suffer from cold between now and that date, when the panacea which the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond advances will be put into operation. That is surely a very reasonable demand, and there is not a voter in Canada who would object to anything of the kind; nor is there any British North America Act which would be broken if the government took such an attitude. I have already mentioned the fact that the government of Canada, having made such enormous donations in times past to this company could not very well hesitate to make an expenditure now on these people who are the victims of that company in need.

It may be said that if the government made advances in relief of the miners of Nova Scotia they would be asked to do the same for people in other provinces. Very well. If that is so the government will have to meet the situation; they will have to reap the fruits of their lack of policy with regard to the industrial conditions of Canada. When all is said and done, the fact is that the economic conditions in this country account for such a situation as this, and to the lack of policy of this government in meeting those economic conditions must be attributed the present state of affairs. There is no amount of argument, no amount of prophecy, no length of debating,, that can brush aside that point. What is required in Nova Scotia is what we need in Alberta and in British Columbia and in all the other provinces as well: it is purchasing power. That is what we are asking for, and the government has lost its control over purchasing power by its own action; it has placed the control of purchasing power in the hands of financiers. So that the government must now reap the fruits of its policy. They are bitter and numerous, and they are to be found throughout the whole country; and merely to rise and say that there were hungry people in Nova Scotia in 1908 or in some other year does not get away from the situation. Even if I could take the prophecy of my hon. friend with any degree of confidence, would he be prepared to guarantee that no person will suffer from hunger or from cold from now until March 16? Would that hon. gentleman be willing to live on four-cent meals from now until that time, or without any meals at all? Here, frankly, is a situation from which, it seems to me, we have so far vied with one another in our endeavour to step aside. I have noticed a tendency on both sides of the House to try to get away from responsibility and to try to blame somebody else for industrial conditions in Nova Scotia. I do not care who is going to evade the blame, but I certainly am anxious that something definite shall be done at the present time. I therefore conclude my remarks by urging the Prime Minister to give some assurance to this parliament before this matter is finally dealt with, and some assurance to the distressed people of Nova Scotia, that this government will see to it that no one shall actually starve in that province between now and the time when this document, which it is said contains the solution of the difficulty, shall have demonstrated to Canada whether or not it can meet the situation.

Mr. F. L. KELLY (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I had determined not to take part in this debate, but in view of the telegram read by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), as representing the constituency of North Cape Breton I think it is only right that I should add a word or two to the discussion. The telegram is rather a surprise to me, because when I left home about ten days ago there were no such conditions obtaining as we have had described to-night. In fact the collieries in that section during the three months preceding my departure had been busier than for any winter during the last six or seven years. I know there are hardships, especially in the coal district of Sydney Mines. Unfortunately last year it became the painful duty of the British Empire Steel Corporation to close one of their collieries in that district because it could be no longer worked at a profit on account of economic conditions then prevailing. Consequently eight or nine hundred men became idle and had to be absorbed by the other two collieries still operating in the locality. When I left the district early in February one colliery was working a little over half time, and the other colliery was working only one day a week. At one colliery there was a loading machine for loading the coal into box cars for transportation to winter customers, but the absence of such a machine at the other colliery virtually closed it down.

I would only too gladly welcome the sending of relief to Cape Breton if the government could consistently see the way to do so. In fact conditions all over the colliery area, as I pointed out a year ago in my maiden speech, are chaotic, and at that time I suggested ways and means by which conditions could be bettered. At that time it was understood that a coking scheme was to be put into operation that would give us a better market for our Cape Breton coal. The rate subvention on our coal west of Montreal helped us to extend our market. We asked for other assistance to improve the Cape Breton and Nova Scotia coal industry, but as yet this further assistance has not been granted to us. The difference between prosperity and the lack of it in the coal industry is dependent on the extra market for a million tons of coal. When such a market is secured the company will be able to operate their mines at nearly full time, thus giving the men steady work and full pay, and this will materially help to settle the present unrest.

I was surprised when I heard the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) cast doubt upon the outcome of the proposal made by the Premier of Nova Scotia to settle the differences between the employees and the operators. I think it ill became the hon. member to make such a gloomy forecast. There has been too much of this gospel preached in the coal fields of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia, and it is largely responsible for the evil conditions existing there to-day. Labour, when unagitated, has no wish to be tearing down its employers. I give the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg credit for his very fair presentment of the men's case. There are a thousand contributing causes that make it hard for the operator to successfully mine coal in Nova Scotia, and particularly in the Cape Breton district. These mines, as has been already stated, have been operated for a long time, and now extend to a great distance under the sea, which makes it very costly to bring the coal to the surface. Having to win the coal against the grain, it all falls away from the miner, and worse than all, for every ton of coal taken out they must also take out six tons of water.

I should be delighted if the House could devise some way of helping coal production in Cape Breton. One method, it seems to me, would be to extend the rate subvention over a period of five years, so the company will have a solid basis upon which to formulate their plans for securing wider markets for their coal. And when the government puts the coking scheme into effect, this will still further assist us. We have suggested having the duty on slack coal levelled up with that on round coal. It is apparent to everybody that round coal is being brought in from the United States and mixed with slack coal to the great detriment of our coal industry. Some reasonable means can surely be devised to put an end to this circumvention of the spirit of our tariff law.

If hon. members knew the conditions at Sydney Mines from the company's standpoint, they would not be surprised at the mines being idle at this time of the year. This is simply because we have no way of getting our coal out in the winter time to supply the central Canada market, for the freight rate from Sydney to Montreal is $3.60 a ton, against 50 cents a ton in the summer time. Consequently as soon as winter comes on the operators must of necessity curtail their operations. At the present time there are 25,750 tons of coal on bank from last year at Sydney Mines. This coal deteriorates very quickly when it is thus exposed to the weather. Every ton of coal which the British Empire Steel Corporation places on bank in the winter means a dead loss of from seventy-five cents to a dollar, besides the deterioration of the coal itself. Nobody wants bank coal. When the controversy began a year ago between the men and the operators, the operators asked the men to take a wage reduction during the winter on coal that had to be banked. Disinterested people thought this a very reasonable proposition, but it unfortunately did not appeal sufficiently to the spokesmen of the miners. The operators came to the conclusion that under these conditions they had not much encouragement to bank coal and lose 75 cents a ton on it. I am telling this only because some members may not know what is going on in connection with coal mining in Cape Breton, and in view also of the exaggerated remarks which have been made in the House to-night about the prices charged for coal by the British Empire Steel Corporation in Halifax and some other places. The British Empire Steel Corporation have no control of the price of coal in Halifax. They sell their coal at the wharf at Sydney harbour for $6 a ton and anybody who wants to import coal and deal in it commercially can buy it at Sydney at that price and send it to Halifax either by steamer or by sailing vessel at a rate of from 75 cents to $1 a ton. Any excess profit on that coal at Halifax is made not by the British Empire Steel Corporation but by the middlemen who keep the price of coal up. It is not right that anyone should be deceived by statements made in this House which are not true. I would not have taken any part in the debate—the subject has already been covered from every angle—had I not heard the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) making a forecast of what was going to happen in respect of the well-intentioned proposal of Premier Armstrong. It was really a species of inciting the reasonable miners not to meet the operators and have a conference and endeavour to have the difficulty settled as it should be settled in an amicable spirit on both sides of a long-standing difficulty.

Motion (Mr. Woodsworth) withdrawn.

TREATY RATIFICATIONS

FURTHER TREATIES SIGNED AT WASHINGTON

On the notice of motion being called for the approval of a certain treaty between the Dominion of Canada and the United States—Hon. Mr. Copp:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would like this motion and the following one to stand until the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) returns. However, this might be a convenient moment to intimate to the House that two additional treaties were signed to-day at Washington by the Minister of Justice on behalf of Canada and by Secretary of State Hughes on behalf of the United States. The first is to define more accurately at certain points and to complete the international boundary between the United States and Canada. The second regulates the level of the lake of the Woods in order to secure to both countries the most advantageous use of the waters therein and of the waters flowing into and from the lake on each side of the boundary. This last treaty is based on the recommendations made by the International Joint Commission on the reference concerning the lake of the Woods submitted to it by both governments. The treaties will be tabled as soon as the Minister of Justice returns.

RURAL CREDITS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Have any plans been formulated for the further consideration of Dr. Tory's report on rural credits?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): No. I am awaiting some further correspondence from Dr. Tory.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the government care to give any information as to when the report is expected?

Mr. ROBB: No, I could not give my hon. friend that information to-night. I will look into the files to-morrow morning and will try to let him know something about it to-morrow.

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY OUTLET

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he has any report from the conference between the heads of the two railway companies in Canada with regard to the building of the proposed railway into the Peace River?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I may say that I have information which leads me to believe that some communication will come to me in a very few days concerning that matter.

SUPPLY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is almost eleven o'clock. What does my right hon. friend intend to do?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We would like to make a little headway. It was announced last night that we would go on with the estimates of the Department of Customs this evening, and I think we might devote a short time to them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Have the estimates of the Customs department been already before the committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, and that is one of the reasons we are anxious to go on to-night. If we do not take them up to-night we shall not be able to go on with them this week.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

Civil government—Customs and Excise, salaries, $585,755; contingencies, $48,000.

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU: (Minister of Customs and Excise): The estimates are the same as last year except that on account of the increase of the work and the various taxes that we have to collect we have found it necessary to add a junior departmental solicitor. That is the only change.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does this cover the cost of the income tax department?

Mr. BUREAU: No, the fusion has not yet been completed. It is engaging the attention of the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suggest to the minister that there should not be a fusion of the costs of the collection of taxes which are entirely different in their character. It is necessary for the House to know what the costs of the collection of indirect taxes are on the one hand and of direct taxes on the other. I am not now discussing the question of the minister using in any way he proposes the staffs of either department, but if we are to know where we are, if we are to know whether a tax conforms to the general principle which should govern all taxation, namely, that the cost of collection should not exceed the amount of revenue from the tax, then there should be a separation of the costs of collection. I do not want to detain the minister, but I would like him to give his view—affirmatively, I hope—on that point.

Mr. BUREAU: The only thing I can give my hon. friend now is the percentage of the cost of collection of the revenue so far as customs and excise are concerned. I do not think we have made any distinction as between excise and customs. They come under the same head; the same officers perform duties in both branches of the department. For 1923-1924 the revenue for customs and excise was $298,721,419.55, and the expenditure $7,435,931.59, or a percentage of 2.49. As to the income tax, I cannot say. As I have told my hon. friend, we are trying to bring these tax collecting branches under the one head, and although there has been no change made so far, it is contemplated that when the changes are made an economy will be effected. For instance, if we can get all the income tax officers in the same building with the customs and excise officers, rent will be saved and the overhead be less. The plan—I will not call it a fusion—of bringing together all the collecting branches of the department so far as that is possible has not been completed yet, but is still under consideration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to unduly press my hon. friend. I am going to ask him, however to remember one fact when he is considering the bringing together of the different branches under one roof and saving overhead. That, of course, is a very good thing. But it would be a very wrong thing, and something which would work against the efficiency of his own department, if there was no check kept at all of the expenses of operating the different branches. I forget now what was the exact cost of collection of the income tax, my hon. friend will know that better than I do, but my impression is that it cost a trifle under 2 per cent to collect the tax. We were not then in as expensive a building as the department is in now, and it may be costing a little more today. I think my hon. friend will agree with me, when he comes to do it, that if there is one thing that ought to be done it is to let the country know what the cost of these services is. The country cannot know that if the cost of collection of customs and of excise, indirect taxes, is mixed up with the collection of the income tax, which is peculiarly a direct tax. I think my hon. friend has the point all right, and I am going to ask him to bear it in mind.

Mr. BUREAU: I cannot give the cost of collection of the income tax, because I have not the figures. It is very difficult to separate the cost of collection of customs from excise because the same officers are performing the two duties; that was the object of the fusion. The total cost of collection of customs and excise for 1923-1924 was 2.49 per cent. I understand that my hon. friend wants us to keep the income tax separate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The cost of collection, that is all.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a matter I suppose that will be discussed when we come to reorganize.

Mr. STEVENS: There is apparently an error here. The resolution on page 8 reads exactly the same as last year, but the details on pages 73 and 74 show an increase of about $12,000. It is either a misprint, or one or the other is wrong.

Mr. BUREAU: The amount is exactly the same as last year, but on account of men having been let out at their maximum salary and new men coming in at a lower salary, a saving has been effected of $11,425.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are there any cases here of the same man getting two remunerations, perhaps under a different name? That is the usual way it is done.

Mr. BUREAU: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know if this is the time the minister would like to do this or not, but in connection with all the civil government votes, while on the one hand we know what it costs to run the different departments, that information is really not correct unless we know the amount of superannuation that is also being paid on account of retirements under the act of last year. In other words, it would be quite easy for example to retire twenty or thirty or forty employees, at a great cost to the state, while making an apparent saving in the cost of running the department, through taking on others at lower salaries. We are really not in a position to know how we stand unless we know what the retirements are and the charges on the superannuation fund.

11 p.m.

Mr. BUREAU: Of course, the amounts paid for superannuation and retiring allowances do not come under our department, but under the Department of Finance. Those pensions are paid by virtue of the statute.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I fully agree.

Mr. BUREAU: The department recommends the retirements, but no books are kept for that purpose.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not quite get my point. I am not saying for one minute that it is a charge against his department, but these retirements are a charge against the taxpayer; the taxpayer has to pay the cost. Superannuation is granted on the recommendation of the accredited minister of the department from which the employee is retired, and every department had, and I think to-day has a list of every retirement that it recommends. I do not think there is any doubt about that. I do not want to bother my hon. friend about that now, but I think we ought to have that information in connection with all of these votes. I think the members of the government without any trouble will agree that that information could be given.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand my hon. friend wants a list of all these superannuated or retired under the Calder Act during the fiscal year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With the amount of salary in each case.

Mr. BUREAU: I will bring that down.

Mr. STEVENS: I have already been trying to get that very information, but I was told by the Civil Service Commission, I think, that some of the departments had not turned in a report to them. I think the government ought to give a complete list to the House of all these retirements and superannuations from all departments during the year, and it would be far better if the whole list were tabled at one time than to worry each minister for a statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: There should not be any trouble getting the information from the Civil Service Commission. The commission recommends all these retirements, and they must have a list of every one of them themselves.

Mr. STEVENS: They have not.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is peculiar, because the minister recommends a superannuation, and it then goes to the commission, from them to the Treasury board, and from them to council. It is no trouble to get the list, but I am surprised the commission would not have it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice the addition of another solicitor. I know a demand was made not very long ago to get rid of all these law branches in the different departments, and have all their legal work attended to by the Justice department. Apparently the minister is proceeding in the opposite direction. He is adding to the legal staff. It would look to me a retrograde step.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not share my hon. friend's opinion. Here is a department which stands by itself, so far as legal work is concerned. We have all sorts of legal cases cropping up in connection with the seizure of stills, automobiles and smuggled goods. We have more legal work to do than any department outside of the Justice department, and these legal details have to be dealt with in the department before the case is handed over to the Justice department. We have always had one departmental solicitor and one junior departmental solicitor. Until the work began to be as heavy as it is now, we thought we could do without further assistance, but on account of the increase in the work we found it was a great handicap.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid the hon. minister does not make many seizures. The door is wide open apparently.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. gentleman's understanding is not absolutely correct. There is smuggling going on. I do not believe that any human being could stop it. You can decrease it and do the best you can. We have made lots of seizures—more than ever before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of liquor?

Mr. BUREAU: Liquor and cigarettes—seizures of smuggled goods and of illicit distilleries and all these things which are carried on in violation of the Inland Revenue Act. Wherever we have been able to find these things we have made a seizure.

Mr. CALDWELL: Just in line with the suggestion made by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) as to a list of those superannuated from this department during the year, I would like also if the minister would supply us with a list of those, if there are any, who have been superannuated and re-employed after being superannuated. I see in the last Auditor General's report a statement made that persons employed in some of the departments have been re-employed after they have been superannuated. I do not think it is a sound practice, if it is being done. The Auditor General's report would indicate it has been done in some cases. I would like to know if it has been done in this department, and I will inquire as to other departments when they come up.

Mr. BUREAU: I have been informed that there have been no cases of this kind in the Department of Customs and Excise.

Item agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Marine and Fisheries—salaries, $484,720.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This proceeding is not justified. The idea of the rule which provides that the estimates of any department must be opened first on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday is to give any member of the House an opportunity of moving a general amendment in criticism of the item, or in reference in some way to that department. Now if the practice which was adopted the other night is to be followed again, of a minister coming in and putting through one item, retiring from the scene, and another minister coming on and putting through another item, of course there is no opportunity for amendment or criticism and the purpose of the rule is gone. What I mean is this; on a Monday, Wednesday or Friday the committee should rise before any minister goes on with his estimates, so that this opportunity of amendment can be given. In a word, if a minister enters upon his estimates, he ought to proceed with them, and the committee should not go from one department to another, thus depriving members of an opportunity of moving an amendment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the Prime Minister wants this item called at all. I asked him the idea of going into committee, and unless my ears failed me he told me it was to open the estimates of the Minister of Customs and Excise; because if he did not introduce them to-night he could not go into them later on in the week. Therefore I waived all objections.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is quite true, I mentioned that we wished to open the estimates of the Minister of Customs and Excise to-night. What I would like to draw the attention of the House to is that last night it was stated that we would endeavour to take up some estimates both of the Department of Customs and of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I agree with what the right hon. leader of the opposition states about going from one department to another, if the work of the session is at all advanced. I think my hon. friend will understand that unless we take up certain departments Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday, it limits us, because we cannot discuss any estimates on Thursday or Friday that have not been opened on previous days. The Postmaster General will not be here on Friday, and unless we take up these estimates to-night, then the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture would be the only estimates that could be taken up later on in the week.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are three departments in already.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The estimates of the Minister of Customs have come up to-night. I think if the hon. leader of the opposition will allow us to call the one item of the estimates of the Department of Marine and Fisheries it would facilitate matters. We will not proceed with it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is only for the purpose of enabling the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to come in on Thursday and Friday, I do not object.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then I do not object to it.

The CHAIRMAN: The item before the committee is item 24, Marine and Fisheries, Salaries, $484,720. Shall I report progress?

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Wednesday, February 25, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT

SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the special committee appointed on Thursday, February 19, to consider and report upon Bill No. 2, to amend and make operative certain provisions of the Copyright Act, 1921, be composed of the following members: Messieurs. Chevrier, Healy, Hocken, Hoey, Irvine, Ladner, Lewis, McKay, Prevost, Raymond, and Rinfret.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Who is the representative of the Labour Department in Cape Breton?
2. Is he in the employ of the British Empire Steel Corporation. or of any of its subsiduaries?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK:

1. The department has no representative in Cape Breton other than the correspondent to the Labour Gazette?

2. No information.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many prosecutions have been held under the Combines Investigation Act from the passing of this act to date?
2. What are the names of the trusts and combines proceeded against, and the action which resulted?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK:

1. No prosecutions have under the Combines Investigation Act 1923 taken place. It is, however, understood that one action has been taken by the Attorney General of British Columbia on information resulting from inquiry under this act.

2. Investigation requested and inquiry instituted into alleged combine (a) Fruit Distribution; (b) Coal Dealers; (c) Marketing of Potato Crop.

Interim report on alleged Fruit Combine was laid on table of the House February 23. Further action not determined.

Report on alleged coal dealers' combine will, it is expected, be laid on the table of the House within a few days.

Inquiry into alleged combine in potato crop marketing not yet completed.

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. How many applications have been made to date under the Combines Investigation Act?
2. If any, by whom and when commenced?
3. Has a registrar been appointed? If so, who, and what is his salary?
4. Has the Department of Labour or any minister or officer of the crown made any request for investigation into any alleged combine during years 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925? If so, what?
5. If any investigation has been held, what is the finding and what action has been taken in each case?
6. What is the total cost or expenditure to date under the Combines Investigation Act from date of its passage to date?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK:

1. Applications made in accordance with section 5 of act, three.

2. The three applications referred to in answer to No. 1 were made in accordance with the statute in each case by six persons. British subjects, resident in Canada, of the full age of twenty-one years. It is not in the public interest to publish the names of the applicants. For date commenced, see under No. 5.

3. Yes, Harry Hereford, who was appointed to the department by the Civil Service Commission in 1918 and who is classified as an industrial engineer, was on August 25, 1923, appointed under section 4 of the act to be registrar. From the date of his appointment to March 31, 1924, he received the salary attached to his classified position at the rate of $3,480 per annum; for the year ending March 31, 1925, he is being paid, in addition to the salary attached to his classified position, at the rate of $1,000 per annum, as provided in the estimates.

4. Not understood.

5. (a) Alleged combine in the distribution of fruit and vegetables in western Canada. Formal application was received June 13, 1924. The commissioner made an interim report on February 18, 1925, which was laid on the table of the House February 23, 1925.

(b) Alleged combine among the coal dealers at Winnipeg and other places. Formal application was received October 18, 1924, and commissioner appointed to investigate October 23, 1924. The commissioner has just rendered his report but the exhibits and transcript of evidence have not yet been received.

(c) Alleged combine in connection with the marketing of the New Brunswick potato crop. Formal application received December 4, 1924, and investigation commenced December 14, 1924, and still proceeding; no report has yet been made.

In each of the above cases representations had been made prior to the formal application for investigation, and as a result the registrar had, in accordance with the act, instituted preliminary enquiries. These preliminary enquiries were commenced by the registrar as follows:—(a) February 22, 1924; (b) October 8, 1924; (c) November 14, 1924.

(d) Other investigations of a preliminary nature have been made as a result of informal complaints, but (a), (b) and (c) listed above are all the investigations that have been, or are being held as a result of applications made in accordance with section 5 of the act.

6. $20,987.03.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MAIL SERVICE ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt):

1. Are district superintendents, employed by the Post Office Department, furnished with lists of publications authorized to carry mail service advertisements?
2. If so, who compiles these lists, and on what basis are they formed?
3. If such lists exist, what publications are so authorized for use in the province of Saskatchewan?

NEWSPAPER POSTAL REVENUE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What was the gross postal revenue derived from newspapers for the last two years of record?
2. What is the estimated expenditure for the same year, as far as can be arrived at, in so far as newspapers are concerned, and what bulk of the mail do newspapers make up?
3. What is the average daily weight of newspapers carried in the mails and the estimated deficit to the country in delivery of newspapers in the mails?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' DAYS

On the motion of Mr. Shaw:

That, in the opinion of this House, one full day a week for the whole session should be set aside for private members, on which day notices of motion shall have precedence over other business.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): In view of the fact that the House proposes to appoint a committee for the purpose of revising the rules, I am prepared to drop this resolution in the expectation that the matter referred to therein will be considered by the committee.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): May I, in view of what the hon. member for West Calgary has said, move an amendment in accordance with the suggestion which he has just made? I think it would embody his views and he is not permitted to move an amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will read the motion if the hon. member will move his amendment.

Moved by Mr. Shaw:

That, in the opinion of this House, one full day a week for the whole session should be set aside for private members, on which day notices of motion shall have precedence over other business.

In my judgment, the motion ignores rule No. 25, which provides that there shall be two days a week, Mondays and Wednesdays, for private members. But, if I correctly interpret the words used, the hon. gentleman has in mind that the government shall be asked not to take away this privilege, but to have at least one day a week during the whole session allowed for private members' business. Is that the meaning?

Mr. SHAW: That is the intention. I agree with your Honour that the resolution is not very well worded.

Mr. GOOD: I move in amendment:

That all the words after "House" in the second line be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The question of providing more adequate opportunities for private members be referred to the special committee which by resolution of this House, is to consider the question of revising the rules.

I should like, if I may, to say a few words in connection with this amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GOOD: If it is the desire of the House that whatever I have to say should be stated to the committee, I am willing to wait.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried by unanimous consent.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

SCRUTINY OF ESTIMATES

MOTION BY MR. COOTE FOR REFERENCE TO SELECT COMMITTEES

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the estimates should be referred to select committees before being submitted to the committee of the Whole.

He said: In presenting this motion I may remark that I was prompted chiefly by two reasons. In the first place, I had in view a possible economy of the time of the House, and secondly, I hoped that we might effect some economy in expenditures. About a year ago there were published in the Ottawa Citizen several letters from a former member of this House, Mr. Davis of Neepawa, Manitoba, advocating a committee of parliament on estimates. I will not take the time of the House quoting extensively from these articles, but in the second one, dealing with the cost of public services, he refers to what has been done in Great Britain. He says:

In Great Britain reform is also proposed. It takes a different line, and as our practice is founded on theirs, it is germane to our conditions. There it arises out of the recommendation made by the select committee on national expenditure in 1902. That proposal was for a standing committee on estimates in the House. It was tried out in 1912, 1913 and 1914, and further elaborated and recommended by the select committee of 1917 so ably headed by Mr. Herbert Samuel.

I shall now quote briefly from another article by Mr. Davis on the work of this committee:

After a trial in the imperial house the committee on estimates, as an institution, disclosed one weakness; as it could sit only during a session, it was found that it could not get through the work. In 1912 it settled its procedure and reported on the office of works; in 1913 its work was on the navy estimates only; in 1914 its work was on the war office estimates, and it reported only the evidence taken because the outbreak of war made its findings valueless. The Samuel committee recommended that the estimates committee should be assisted by an officer of the House to be appointed for the purpose, with the title of "Examiner of Estimates."

Further on Mr. Davis says:

Thirdly, the convention that the government must consider every adverse motion carried in committee of supply, as a vote of want of confidence, should yield to common sense. There can be no financial or economical judgment exercised, if every criticism is met by a demand for a political decision. Under this convention the government can always evade financial criticism by calling on its supporters to vote through its proposal. These supporters, although convinced of the soundness of the criticism, will rather accept an extravagance of many thousands of dollars than vote their party out of power. Only when the government's policy is really challenged, should an adverse vote following upon the estimates committee's report, be construed as a vote of want of confidence. In this way alone can an unfettered economical judgment be obtained.

I drafted this resolution last year before I left the House and if I were preparing it to-day I would make the suggested change a little more sweeping than is proposed here. I think possibly the time to cut down estimates is before they are printed and given to the House, and it might be advisable for us to have a committee on estimates who would go over the estimates of the deputy ministers before they were printed and submitted to parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would there not be a difficulty, in that the estimates would then run a very great risk of being made public before they had got to parliament at all? One of the difficulties which the government and ministers have is in trying to keep the estimates secret before they are printed. The reason for that desire is quite obvious. Has the hon. member given any thought to the idea that a committee dealing with the deputies might lend itself to the estimates becoming public, so that they would then be liable to change before coming to the House? Not only might there be a reduction—and I am not objecting to that, for it is the object of my hon. friend's resolution—but there would be everlasting pressure on the committee to have the estimates increased in many ways.

Mr. COOTE: I must admit that I have not given a great deal of thought to that aspect of the subject, and possibly there is a valid objection there. However, I want to impress upon parliament at this moment the necessity for carefully examining our expenditures. We have been told repeatedly that two-thirds of the expenditures of this country are uncontrollable, and if that is the case it shows all the more necessity for exercising every possible care in the keeping down of all controllable expenditures. I should like to read—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am unable to hear what the hon. gentleman is saying, and I would ask all hon. members on both sides of the House in justice to him as well as to others to be silent.

Mr. COOTE: I shall now read from a short editorial taken from the Ottawa Citizen:

The House of Commons is supposed, in theory, to control public expenditure. In actual practice, it is a very blind control. False economy is practised generally without saving the country anything, while extravagant expenditures slip past session after session. As Mr. Fred L. Davis, a former member of parliament, says, "Every administration has extolled economy and practised extravagance."

The House of Commons is incapable of exercising effective control of national expenditure, because parliament is rarely given the necessary information in time to be of any aid to constructive criticism. The Auditor General's report, as it is tabled in the House, is of very little value to parliament, excepting for post-mortem purposes. The public accounts committee is rarely ever heard of, excepting when some particularly outrageous raid has been made on the public treasury. It is almost impossible for any private member to delve through the complicated mass of accounts so that they can be effectively checked up during the session.

The time to regulate public expenditure is before the money is voted and not after it is spent. Parliament should have sufficient information when the estimates are before the House to make it possible for members to give more intelligent consideration to routine costs as well as to proposed new expenditures.

The procedure outlined in this resolution, Mr. Speaker, has already been adopted in regard to the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and I believe it has worked very well. I do not see why it would not work equally well with respect to the estimates of at least some of our other departments. Take, for instance, the agricultural estimates,—I select this particular department because recently in this House we have had an example of how difficult it is to get information which is of value to the committee; nearly a whole afternoon and evening were taken up discussing the one item of dairying, under which it was proposed to expend $230,000. I do not so much begrudge the time consumed in discussing this particular item, but I do believe that the time devoted to it was not nearly so well spent as it might have been. Several members will ask the minister questions at the same time, the minister must consult his deputy who sits in front of him, the deputy looks through his books to find the answers, and by that time possibly three or four other members have put further questions. Naturally the minister answers those questions which he prefers to answer, and sometimes he does not get a chance to answer all the questions which he is quite willing to deal with. After going through this procedure for an hour or two, members get tired and leave the chamber because they are not able to obtain intelligent answers to their questions. Very often the information desired is not available. But if these estimates were handed over to a small select committee, the dairy commissioner could be called and the members of the committee could obtain from him the information they desired and they would be in a position to decide whether the expenditure was necessary or advisable; or possibly they would show him how the money could be better spent, or better results obtained from its expenditure. This procedure might be applied to the estimates of many other departments. I have purposely taken the Department of Agriculture because a year ago we had a very good example of how little information we sometimes get after spending hours and hours in committee of the Whole on one item. On the occasion I have in mind we were discussing the Health of Animals Branch and we spent practically two sittings in dealing with one item of $10,000, and after 11.30 at night we discussed the practical work in connection with that vote—the Health of Animals branch. I believe the total vote at that time for the branch was $2,000,000, but nearly all our time was devoted to the discussion of the one item of $10,000, the remainder of the vote going through at midnight at the request of the minister, who said in effect "We have sat so long on this item and got nothing done; please let it go through". I think that instance is typical of what happened last session in the discussion of the estimates of several other departments. I believe that economies might be effected if the method I now propose were adopted.

Some objection might be taken to my resolution because of the fact that it would require the formation of more committees. But we have now a number of select standing committees of the House, and I think it would be practical to refer to those committees the estimates of most of our departments. The standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization might very properly deal with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Immigration and Colonization, the Department of Indian Affairs, the Department of the Interior and the Soldier Settlement board. The select standing committee on Railways and Canals might be given the estimates of the Department of Public Works to report on. The select standing committee on Mines, Forests and Water Powers might be the proper body to consider the estimates of the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the Mines department. The select standing committee on Banking and Commerce might very well deal with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Customs and Excise, and perhaps the Post Office Department. The select standing committee on Public Accounts has done practically nothing for the last two sessions, and I think it might very well be asked to take up the estimates of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Pensions, National Defence and certain miscellaneous items. It seems to me that such a committee might well be instructed to inquire into the matter of the redemption of our public debt which, I believe, is one of the most important and difficult questions that this parliament has to deal with. We are raising money each year to pay interest on our national debt, and not only are we not making any provision for retirement of the debt, but we are actually adding to it almost every year.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be a much more effective way of dealing with our estimates if, as this resolution suggests, they were submitted to the select standing committees of the House to be inquired into and reported upon. That would not preclude discussion of any items in committee of the Whole, but as most of the details in relation to expenditure under these estimates would be thoroughly discussed in the select standing committees, it would be only on comparatively rare occasions that there would be any very lengthy discussion in committee of the Whole on matters of detail. Of course, matters of policy would likely have to be discussed sometimes at considerable length. I hope this resolution will receive favourable consideration at the hands of the government, for I feel certain it would result in a saving of time and of money, if the government adopted the common sense view of accepting recommendations by any of the select standing committees for cutting down of certain estimates. I believe it would be much easier to cut down estimates in a select committee than in committee of the whole House.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the observations of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) must convince hon. members that he takes his duties seriously and has made a careful study of the methods of handling business in this House. With some parts of his speech I quite agree. More than sixteen years' experience in this House has taught me that all parliaments are about the same; we waste hours and days wrangling over academic questions, sometimes over votes for one to five or ten thousand dollars, and in the last days of the session we allow millions to go through without very much consideration. But I would not like the idea to go out that under the Canadian parliamentary system—the British system—there is not a careful scrutiny of the estimates to be submitted to parliament. I have had fairly friendly relations with ministers under different governments, Conservative as well as Liberal, and I imagine the procedure is about the same all the way through: a minister has sometimes more trouble in getting his estimates through the council chamber than he has in getting them passed in the House. Under our system the estimates are first very carefully prepared in the departments, and I think every hon. gentleman will admit that when they are brought down there is disappointment to someone; items are left out that hon. members from some parts of Canada have strongly urged upon the department. Then they are scrutinized by the minister of the department. I do not know what the method of the previous government was, but I know that the Treasury board, a committee of the cabinet, spent about a month over these estimates—brought in the deputies, sometimes brought in the assistants to the deputies in various departments; and the Treasury board had to be convinced that this money was necessary before the items were passed. Then after they passed the Treasury board they came to the council chamber, really a committee of this parliament, where they were submitted to a very close examination. So that our estimates are fairly well adjusted before they are printed and submitted to parliament.

Following that idea, under our system we have the committee on Public Accounts, which makes a very close scrutiny of expenditure. We have, therefore, ample safeguards —safeguards in the preparation of the estimates, safeguards in the watching of the expenditure made under those estimates. But I repeat that we do waste time in academic debates and in long discussions of small items, while sometimes large items are allowed to go through without much consideration. If the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) would be prepared to amend his resolution along the following lines, it would meet with the approval of the government, and, I hope with the approval of the House:

That the resolution be amended by inserting in the second line thereof, after the word "House," the words "the desirability of having," and by deleting from the second line thereof the words, "should be," and by adding to the resolution the words: "should be referred to the special committee to be appointed to consider jointly with His Honour the Speaker the advisability of revising the rules of the House."

As amended the resolution would read:

That, in the opinion of this House, the desirability of having the estimates referred to select committees before being submitted to the committee of the Whole should be referred to the special committee to be appointed to consider jointly with His Honour the Speaker the advisability of revising the rules of the House.

If my hon. friend will agree to that amendment the government will offer no opposition.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the amendment is moved by the hon. minister?

Mr. ROBB: I thought perhaps my hon. friend (Mr. Coote) would like to amend it along these lines.

Mr. COOTE: I understand that I would not be allowed to amend my own resolution but I would have no objection to such an amendment.

Mr. ROBB: I would move it, then.

Mr. BRISTOL: Does that refer to one sub-committee?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BRISTOL: In that case some members might be well informed on one branch and others on another, and you would have that one committee handling the whole business of the country in that fashion.

Mr. ROBB: A resolution was adopted by the House on Monday that a committee of the House should consider certain proposed amendments to the rules, and this matter is referred to that committee.

Mr. BRISTOL: I understand that. A semi-legal or semi-business committee might be very useful for considering the rules of the House, but would it be useful for the rest of what you are proposing?

Mr. ROBB: The committee would submit its report.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I do not propose to discuss the resolution, but to express my admiration of the accommodating disposition of the hon. member (Mr. Coote) who moved the original motion and who has now expressed a willingness to accept an amendment which has exactly the same effect as though a line were struck through his whole motion. If motions are to be put on the order paper and when the House is prepared to discuss them amendments are made that simply mean the applying of a chemical to the printed page and wiping out the ink—well, it is trifling with parliament. If this motion as amended passes it leaves everything exactly where it was, exactly as if the motion had never been put on the order paper, because the whole of the rules are already submitted to this committee. The committee now is charged with the responsibility of offering to the House amendments which it recommends, amendments by way of excision, alteration or addition. I had thought the hon. member (Mr. Coote) was desirous of obtaining an expression of opinion on the part of parliament on a very important alteration of the whole system of submitting estimates. Parliament cannot express an opinion if the resolution is accepted as amended.

Mr. GOOD: Can parliament not express its opinion after the committee brings in its report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It can, but it could do that without this resolution being here at all; that is what I am trying to show. As soon as the chemical of the minister is applied, with the consent of the mover, we are in precisely the same position as if the motion had never been on the order paper.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not exactly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister suggest, before I give up the floor, where the difference is?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would rather speak a few minutes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He would rather suggest it after? Well, I do not wonder.

Mr. GRAHAM: Any time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The whole rules are before the committee now. So far as the committee is concerned it is charged with the wisdom of making a change, in accordance with the suggestion of the original motion. It was charged with that before we came to the House to-day—charged with it by the motion adopted on Monday. It is again charged with it if the amendment of the minister is accepted, so what is the difference?

Mr. HOEY: Does not this constitute a special reference?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The whole of the rules are referred anyway. You do not add to the committee's powers or duties by making a special reference. You may call its attention to something, but everything is before the committee now; in a word you are no further ahead by making a special reference. What is done is simply to clear the motion away from parliament; it is thrown out of the door; not negatived, not accepted, but it has just quietly passed away, and discussion on the motion as it is now accepted is worthless. Will anybody suggest to me what is the value of discussing whether it is desirable to refer something to a committee which has that thing already before it? How can one discuss an amendment in that shape? For myself, I cannot discuss something unless I can get my teeth into it and see a meaning in it. I leave the discussion to hon. members who are not so circumscribed.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I would not like my right hon. friend to put his teeth into it before he knows what it is. That would be prematurely testing, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) would say. As a matter of fact, if my right hon. friend's contention is sound, we need not refer anything in this House to a committee at all. If we are going to say that it is taking the matter away from parliament when we refer anything to a committee, then why refer a private bill to a committee? My right hon. friend said that it was taking it away from parliament and treating this resolution as if it had never existed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM: I maintain that if that be the case we might as well do away with all committees. A question comes before parliament and is referred to a committee. There is some discussion in the House, perhaps a good deal, sometimes very little, and then it is referred to a committee, for what purpose? For the purpose of going into details which you cannot get either in committee of the Whole House, or in the House itself.

Mr. HOCKEN: But it is not referred to a committee twice. This is being referred twice.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, no. I am afraid my hon. friend is getting mixed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is mixed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all. There was a resolution to refer the question of the desirability of a revision of the rules to a committee, and now this particular resolution is referred to that committee for particular discussion in the committee. If this House did not take that action, the committee might say: We are not going to deal with this at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has no right to say it.

Mr. GRAHAM: But if this amendment is accepted by the House, the committee is instructed to make special investigation into the question of whether or not we ought to submit the estimates to a committee. It perhaps does not bring in anything new, but it does place particular stress on a particular subject. Before that committee, details of information can be secured that we cannot get in the House. There may be much to be said in favour of referring the estimates to a committee; there may be much to be said against that practice. There is the experience of a partial reference at least to a committee in the Imperial parliament, and there is the experience in the United States of what they call the Budget commission. These things can all be brought before a committee in detail, and what this vote means is that the House sitting as the House with the Speaker in the chair is not going to attempt to decide whether the estimates ought to go to a committee or not, but we are going to ask the committee that is to revise the rules, if revision be found necessary to pay particular attention to this one question, which perhaps is one of the greatest questions that will come before it.

Mr. CLARK: Will that committee be obliged to pay particular attention only to those things that are specially referred to it by this House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not necessarily, but those things that are debated here and voted on by the House will surely receive very marked attention by the committee; but that does not deprive the committee of the right to give any other question equally marked attention.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): There are some observations I would like to make respecting this resolution which the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) has brought before the House. Before making those observations I might very candidly say to you, Mr. Speaker, and the other hon. members that it seems to me there is a great lack of interest shown in a very important resolution of this character. No one seems very anxious to debate this particular resolution.

Mr. FORKE: Give us a chance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not the resolution out of the road now? It is only the amendment which has been accepted that is before the House.

Mr. MARLER: I may be entirely out of order. Am I in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. MARLER: If I may continue, Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat astonished at the alacrity with which my hon. friend from Macleod accepted the amendment as put before him. This particular resolution, I repeat, is one of very considerable importance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: The resolution appeals to me in very many ways. Since I have been here, not many years, but a number of years, I have noticed particularly the manner in which estimates were put through this House, not with a lack of consideration from the ministers, because I know the ministers in the cabinet have given the estimates full consideration, but there has been a lack of consideration given by hon. members to the estimates, a lack of knowledge even of the purpose of different expenditures, and at times there has been a very prolonged discussion on very trivial expenditures indeed, while at other times large amounts are sometimes put through this House with a lack of consideration. Now would not a committee of this description be able to divide the important expenditures from the smaller ones, and ask for such reasonable information relating to the larger expenditures that when the items came before the House we would know precisely what we were voting for? Perhaps it is due entirely to lack of experience on my part, but I am free to admit that on many an occasion votes have passed through this House that I for one have not understood. Perhaps on this side of the House I am looked upon as a black sheep or a yellow dog if I dare to suggest to the minister that I would like certain information on a particular item. It is extremely unpleasant to ask ministers on your own side of the House for particular information. It is a most unheard of action on the part of any member on this side to dare suggest that a certain vote be cut down, or that certain action be taken with regard to it, or dare even to suggest that he should exercise his own intelligence in voting the money of the people. Well, if we are all to take that attitude, what is the use of being members of parliament at all? If my attitude was such, then, as far as I am concerned, my usefulness here is worth very many times less than $4,000. I can assure you of that, Sir, most sincerely. It is regarded by members as an attack, and as many hon. members on this side would say a direct attack, though there might be no such intention, upon a minister of the Crown to suggest that a certain vote should be diminished. It is a different thing for any man on this side of the House to do.

The hon. member for Macleod has brought a substantive resolution before this House which, in my opinion, is well worthy of debate; I think it is worthy of the consideration of hon. members, and that we should be given an opportunity in this House of saying yes or no as to whether we wish this particular matter discussed in this House before the Speaker, and decided on, or whether we want it shelved,—because that is what the amendment means. But hon. members sit quietly in their seats and say: No, we will let this amendment go through; we think the resolution is of no great importance; we think the members' votes in this House are of no particular importance and that the information which should be put before us is of no particular importance at all.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member is drawing upon his imagination.

Mr. MARLER: Well, perhaps I am, but if my hon. friend will tell me how I am drawing upon my imagination I shall be infinitely obliged to him; I am seeking information.

Mr. FORKE: I noticed that the hon. member himself made half a dozen attempts to speak before he succeeded in getting the floor. That being so, how are the rest of us to get the opportunity of speaking?

Mr. MARLER: I humbly apologize to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). I know when he gets on his feet he will agree with me; he always does agree with me on most questions.

Mr. Speaker, the finances of this country at the present time are such that hon. members of this House will have to take the responsibility of saying what payments should be made and what payments should not be made, and the only way they can take that responsibility is with the knowledge of what expenditures are to be made on behalf of the country, and whether those expenditures should or should not be made. I repeat that when estimates come before us for discussion hon. members are not in a position to say whether the expenditures should or should not be made because they have not sufficient knowledge, in many cases, to debate those expenditures intelligently on the floor of the House. I am heartily in favour of this resolution as moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), and I say again I regret he has agreed to the amendment.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). I am glad to have an opportunity of agreeing with him occasionally, and I concur in his view as to the importance of the resolution which has been moved by my hon. friend (Mr. Coote). If I thought that the amendment was shelving the issue I certainly would not agree to it, but I believe the matter is going to receive serious consideration. If the House passes the amendment I do not think that any committee would for a moment ignore the resolution and refrain from giving it the consideration which its importance deserves.

I have scarcely ever spoken here in regard to expenditure without expressing my dissatisfaction with the present method of criticising the estimates as submitted to us. At the same time it is perhaps rather difficult to suggest any change in the present system, or any other course, that would not be open to objection. I am well aware that the House would never surrender the right of criticising estimates as they come before it, and therefore even after estimates have been passed by a select committee they would still be open for consideration by the House as a whole. I agree with the statement of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George that we have never been in a position to criticise intelligently the estimates that have been submitted to us. I have felt that again and again, as we sat here hour after hour, and night after night, just wasting time nibbling at these estimates.

The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) has informed the House exactly how the estimates are prepared, but I must say this: we are always fond of our own offspring, and when ministers have brought down estimates that have been carefully prepared they are not in the frame of mind to see them meddled with very much, and consequently they will defend them to the very last stage. Now, it has often occurred to me that those who could make a really satisfactory reduction in appropriations, particularly those for the civil service, would be the deputy ministers and heads of the different departmental branches. I think I have mentioned once before that when a minister assumes control of a department—containing, perhaps, hundreds of employees and in some cases even thousands—in many instances it is almost impossible for him to familiarize himself with the details of the proposed expenditures and he must, to a very large extent, be at the mercy of the deputy minister or the heads of branches. I cannot but believe, therefore, that if we had a select committee for the purpose of examining into these estimates, departmental officials could be summoned and examined, and in that manner information obtained that we are never in a position to elicit in this House. I attach no particular blame to any of the ministers for defending their estimates, because, as I have already stated, they give those estimates careful consideration before bringing them down and therefore they are not likely to look very kindly upon any severe criticism that may be drawn out in this chamber. There is no doubt of the truth of the statement already made that sometimes we will spend hours upon the consideration of a few thousand dollars while it occasionally happens that as much as a million dollars—and in one instance that I recall as large an amount as $5,000,000—was voted after very little more than one half-hour's consideration. That sort of thing must not continue. Something must be done to limit that state of affairs. I think I am somewhat conservative in a great many of my attitudes, but at the same time I do not believe that because a certain state of affairs has been customary in the past it must continue for all time. We are making changes continually, we are constantly adapting ideas and new methods to new conditions; and I think that the time has arrived when some change must be made whereby there may be more efficient criticism of the public expenditures.

I do not know whether any severe criticism can be directed against the government on account of the present system, I am not sufficiently acquainted with the facts; but I do know that the expenditure of this country is growing, that the people are asking: "Whither are we going?" "What is our present course going to lead to?" Something must be done to curtail the public expenditure, otherwise we shall face disaster. No doubt a large proportion of the public expenditure at present is uncontrollable, but as far as the balance is concerned there is ample margin for the practice of economy and economy must be practised. I could have voted for the resolution as it stood, but seeing that an amendment has been moved and the mover of the resolution has agreed to it I will support the amendment.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with those who take the ground that it is shelving the resolution to adopt an amendment to refer it to a select committee. I do not think we are debarred from discussing the merits of the resolution at the present time. If such is the case it is news to me.

Mr. SPEAKER: The resolution itself is embodied in the amendment.

Mr. CARROLL: There cannot be an amendment unless the resolution itself is before the House. Now what happens to the resolution in consequence of the amendment? It goes to a special committee which was appointed the other day. If that committee attends to business it will of necessity consider the resolution and give it special attention. What transpires then? The committee reports to the House, and if that report is not satisfactory it is up to hon. members to discuss it and make it so. There would then be ample opportunity for discussing the resolution, and even under more favourable circumstances because there will be greater information available when the resolution returns to the House after having been considered by that committee.

With respect to the matter of the estimates I am not one of those who entertain any fear to ask a minister questions regarding any particular item that I do not understand. If there are hon. members who do not understand items in the estimates—and I am free to say that I am in that class myself occasionally—I think they have only themselves to blame for neglecting to obtain an explanation or the necessary information. There is only one way to properly understand the estimates and that is to study the Auditor General's report for the previous year and thus to grasp the exact nature of the expenditure involved. No hon. member can discuss the estimates intelligently without being a close student of the Auditor General's report for at least the preceding two years. It is open to every hon. member to refer to that book and acquaint himself with the details of public expenditure. I must say that since the advent of the members of the Progressive party more attention has been paid to the Auditor General's report, with special regard to the necessity of particular appropriations, than used to be the case. That is showing a proper spirit and working in the right direction. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) thinks a member should be termed a black sheep who gets up in this House and asks a minister certain questions about estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM: If that is so, there would be plenty of black sheep.

Mr. CARROLL: If that is so, I am very black, because whenever there is before the House an estimate in connection with which I have any doubts, I have no hesitation in asking the minister what it means, and I have always received courteous treatment. When I was in opposition, I always received courteous treatment from ministers of the crown who happened to be politically opposed to us at the time. The only item this year that I had any real grievance about was one of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and he treated me very decently. He did not throw me out of a window or say to me: "Shut up, you black sheep"—or "gutter-snipe." He explained the situation very well from his point of view and I am not saying that he is not right. But the idea that a man who asks a minister questions in regard to estimates is thereby thrown into a class by himself is, to my mind, absolutely absurd.

As regards the point raised by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) as to large estimates going through without very much consideration, there is a reason for it and the reason is this: The other day, for instance, when the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) had his estimates before the House, we voted over $1,300,000 of estimates for civil government in that particular department. Why did we go over that so quickly? Because certain expenses are included in that which we must have and which we all know about. There are the expenses of the inside service and the outside service, and it is only when a large increase is made in these items that members begin to ask questions as to the necessity for the increase. If there is a decrease, of course the minister explains it. He may not explain the matter so fully if there is a large increase. The same thing may be said of all the other departments. If, however, for example, the item is for a wharf in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Nova Scotia costing $1,000—yes, there are wharves and dredging in Manitoba, and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) need not shake his head.

Mr. HOEY: Very little.

Mr. CARROLL: There are wharves on the Red river built and maintained by this government. If something of that kind comes before the House and it is new, there is more talk about it than about an estimate of $2,000,000 for civil government appertaining to any department of the government, because it is something new; and our friends on the other side, the Conservatives and the Progressives, if the project is brought forward by a Liberal government, think there may be something mysterious about it, that it may have something to do with elections. I presume that if we were in the place of the opposition we would be as persistent in ferreting out these things as are our hon. friends on the other side of the House. That is simply to show why large votes go through apparently in a hurry, but are really well understood by hon. members who are giving the business of this country any particular attention.

I do not intend to discuss the merits of the main motion of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I have my own ideas about it. It will come back to this House, and we shall be asked, with some direction, to vote upon it. I am not one of those who think we should continue along a certain line of action, because our predecessors in this House thought fit to go along that line. If this House meets, as it has been doing for the last five or six years, in January or February, and if the government want to get estimates through before the end of the financial year, I would advise the House to go very slowly in appointing new committees to deal with questions of estimates. This committee may be composed of ten, fifteen or twenty-five members, and I do not care how minutely and how much in detail a committee on estimates may go into those estimates in the committee, there will be in this House practically the same discussion on estimates as there is at the present time. If we meet here the first of February, we are going to have a great deal of difficulty, with this committee, in getting through any estimates before 31st March.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that true of the special committee on railway estimates last year?

Mr. CARROLL: Railway estimates, I understand, are put into a category by themselves, especially this year. But it might become true of them too. That is only one estimate; but we have ten, fifteen, twenty departments, and if you divide the departments into their subdivisions, we have perhaps forty or fifty different lines of estimates and we cannot get a report on all those estimates by a committee in time for this House to put them through for the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the hon. member forget that the hon. member for Macleod recommended that the estimates for the different departments be referred to different committees?—for instance, that the agricultural estimates be referred to the committee on Agriculture. I admit that one committee would have difficulty in dealing with all the estimates.

Mr. CARROLL: I did not notice that. I am not making an objection; I am simply throwing out this hint to the House. Supposing all these committees are appointed after the estimates are brought down in this House as they were three or four days ago, how long would it take a committee to get through one set of estimates? It would take them a week or a fortnight, and if they give the estimates the attention which some people think they should receive, it would take them four or five weeks to get through one set of estimates. I am not objecting to the main motion, I am throwing this out as a suggestion. When this committee brings in a report on this particular resolution, we shall have ample opportunity of discussing the merits of the substance of the resolution, notwithstanding the fact that there is an amendment to send it to a special committee of this House.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a great pity that the hon. member who introduced this resolution accepted the amendment, because in the first place this House cannot now express its opinion upon the merits of the resolution as drafted. Second, the acceptance of the amendment means that the committee which has been appointed to revise the rules of this House will not ignore, as the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) says, the amendment, but if this House specially recommends that the committee consider a specific thing, the committee will consider itself limited to consideration of those subjects which have been specially referred to it by this House.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. CLARK: Because this subject in itself is big enough for one special committee to consider over a period of weeks. In my opinion, a select committee might well be chosen from this House with the idea of improving the business methods that are in vogue here, and unquestionably those methods can be improved. For instance, the length of any session of parliament is largely due to the length of time that we consume in considering estimates. And what do we gain by consideration of the estimates? As the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) says, the estimates are carefully considered by the cabinet before they are printed. But even if they are carefully considered, after they are introduced into the House they must be passed. A member supporting the government may ask a question and may receive a courteous answer, but he dare not oppose the passing of the estimate.

Mr. CARROLL: Did the hon. gentleman not hear me opposing an estimate the other day? I dared to do it but did not get any satisfaction.

Mr. CLARK: But there is no such thing as voting against or throwing out the estimate once it has been introduced by the government. Having been introduced, the estimate goes through. Can my hon. friend mention one case of any government since confederation which has fallen on a money vote, or any question of an estimate before the House?

Mr. CARROLL: What does the hon. member mean by "fallen"?

Mr. CLARK: I mean the government being defeated in the House.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not know of any government that has resigned on that account but I do know of governments, through pressure either on the part of the opposition or on their own side, having reduced estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I remember that myself.

Mr. CLARK: Suppose the opposition effectively criticised an estimate which was introduced by the government. What chance is there of that estimate being reduced by the government unless the cabinet were afraid that the opposition might be stronger and might vote them out of power? That is the only possibility of a government considering the revision of an estimate. On the question of time consumed, it seems to me obvious that no man can stand for parliament unless he either has sufficient money to make it possible for him to devote his life to this work or is prepared to become a professional politician and use the indemnity for his livelihood.

Mr. ROBB: Or lives in Toronto.

Mr. CLARK: At any rate, he must have someone who is prepared to carry on his business while he is away. The sessions are so long, and unnecessarily long as a rule, that a young man faces one thing and one thing only—his business will go to the four winds if he continues in public life. Surely it is obvious to the members of this House that there are business methods that can be introduced into parliament that would shorten the session and at the same time enable us to deal effectively with all business problems that come before us. For that reason I regret very much that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) has accepted the amendment, because in so doing he has effectually made it impossible for the House to express its opinion on the advisability of having the estimates referred to select committees before whom officers could be summoned and thoroughly examined. He has, I say, effectually precluded that system which I am sure would prove better than the farcical method now pursued of asking the minister questions about some matter about which he is absolutely uninformed except the information he can get from his deputy before him, who has in his book certain written answers.

Mr. PUTNAM: In what way does the hon. member think that the leaving of the estimates to a special committee would expedite the business of the House?

Mr. CLARK: To-day we ask questions of ministers who cannot possibly be fully informed on the subjects in question. No minister can of his own knowledge give such a concise explanation as probably would be accepted by every member in the House. I do not say that the minister should be fully informed of the questions that arise, because it would be impossible for him to have all the knowledge that is available on the subject. The result is he flounders about and it takes us hours to get the information out of him. Under the present system I might ask a minister some question on a subject which he does not fully understand and I might want to follow it up with further questions. Before I get an opportunity, however, to ask another question members in other parts of the House go on to something else, and finally I have to bring the minister back to the matter I was pursuing before, and in that way time is wasted. Furthermore, under this system there is a tendency to string the thing out, because members unnecessarily play with the minister. If we got down to business, however, in a committee sitting around a table, there would be no occasion for this sort of thing because we should have experts to deal with, men who had made a special study of the particular item under discussion. I have no hesitation, therefore, in saying that the time consumed under such a system would be not more than one-half the time now taken up in considering the estimates. On that point I think it is of particular importance that the members of the House should be given an opportunity of examining and cross-examining the officials, who are necessarily better versed than the minister in the whole subject and could give more satisfactory answers regarding any special item in the estimates.

Mr. FRANCOIS J. PELLETIER (Matane): Unlike my hon. friend (Mr. Clark), who regrets that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) should have so readily accepted the amendment submitted by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), I agree with the amendment, for these reasons. To begin with, the resolution itself states that in the opinion of this House estimates should be referred to select committees before being submitted to the committee of the Whole. It has been fully explained by the Acting Minister of Finance how the estimates are dealt with; they are carefully studied and scrutinized by the Treasury board and the Privy Council, and when the estimates come before the House they are, to my mind at any rate, simply here to be confirmed. As for submitting, let us say, the argicultural estimates to the agricultural committee and the railway estimates to the railway committee, and so on, I think I am quite safe in saying that frequently the members of the committees that now investigate various matters have to send messengers and pages to call the members in in order to have a quorum, only a few remaining to do the work. You know, Mr. Speaker, as well as I do that at week ends a number of our hon. members take time off to go preaching, or to attend political meetings, or prayer meetings, or whatever other meetings they see fit to attend, so that they are absent from Ottawa. As a rule they leave on Friday and do not return until Monday afternoon or Tuesday. Now, supposing the committee met on Fridays, Saturdays or Mondays, and there was no quorum? I fail to see why we should not adopt the amendment, because the committee to be appointed to consider the revision of the rules will certainly have ample time to study this question and give it all the consideration it deserves. Therefore I am absolutely in favour of the amendment, and I do not regret that my hon. friend from Macleod has accepted it.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am very heartily in favour of the principle embodied in the original resolution, not because I believe it would greatly expedite business in the House, for undoubtedly a great deal of discussion would still take place in committee of the Whole, but because it would enable many of us who are comparatively new members to at least understand the business that was passing before us. I may take my own case, and I imagine it is typical of the majority of members. I believe in economy, but in intelligent economy; in other words, I desire to vote for reductions when those reductions can be made without imperilling the public good.

I am a prairie man; save by hearsay, I know nothing for instance, of the problems of the Maritime provinces or of British Columbia—the problems peculiar to a seagoing people—and yet I am desirous of being fair to those people. What do I know of the merits of the case when estimates are brought forward for the construction of wharves and breakwaters on the coast of Nova Scotia? Nothing. By supporting such estimates I may be party—unwittingly—to an arrant piece of jerrymandering, of graft, given for the sake of getting votes; by opposing them, I may be depriving the people affected of an essential public service. In a word, I am voting with an absolute lack of knowledge, and consequently with an absolute lack of intelligence. I object to being put in that position.

By referring the various estimates to committees as proposed, some members in the House besides those directly interested in the constituencies in which the expenditure is to take place—whose word naturally is not always to be accepted at its full value because of their desire to have as large an estimate as possible for their riding—some independent members, would have an opportunity of gaining accurate knowledge, and the discussions carried on in committee of the Whole, led by those members on the special committee, would bring out the information essential to an intelligent understanding of the estimates. This, I believe, would enable us to deal with national expenditure in a more businesslike way.

I am not in favour of having all the estimates sent to one select committee: partly because that committee would be overwhelmed with work; no one committee could possibly deal intelligently and adequately with the whole mass of estimates. And, moreover, the educational benefit derived would be confined to a very small percentage of the House, but by dividing the work among various committees, each of which by its very nature is peculiarly adapted to deal with the particular estimates assigned to it, the educational result would be spread among a far greater number of members and the House as a whole would understand more thoroughly what is being done.

It has been stated, and I suppose with absolute correctness, that before the estimates are brought down they have been gone over most carefully by the different ministers and by the cabinet as a whole. But what does this mean? Simply that they understand the estimates and must take the sole responsibility of passing them. Carried to its logical conclusion, we might as well dispense with parliament altogether so far as our national expenditure is concerned.

Mr. CAHILL: Who has the responsibility if a committee does the work?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: This House in voting the estimates must accept some measure of responsibility, and we are accepting it now blindly and without knowledge.

Mr. CAHILL: Not at all.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: To a large extent. We can ask questions here, but the difficulty is that a lot of us know so little of the subject under discussion that we cannot even ask intelligent questions. A member must know something of the nature of any particular item of the estimates before he can put intelligent questions, otherwise he may be altogether wide of the mark and obtain no adequate information whatever. We have all found ourselves in that situation.

I do not think the amendment is altogether satisfactory; on the other hand, I am not satisfied that it necessarily kills the substance of the motion. What will happen? In the first place, without this amendment, without the reference of this specific subject to it, would the special committee which is to be appointed discuss the matter at all? Has this matter direct relation to the rules of the House? Is it a rule of the House that estimates shall be treated in this way, or is it merely custom?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a rule of the House.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: But, in the second place, this committee can elicit information and in their report will give their reasons for or against the adoption of the proposal contained in the resolution, and at that time, if we are not satisfied with their conclusions, we shall have the opportunity to again discuss and, if necessary, decide on the principle itself. That, of course, is what I intend to do, to treat the proposal on its merits after the committee has reported on it, when perhaps I shall be able to discuss it more intelligently than I can do at the present time. I wish to impress on the House the feeling of those hon. members who are honestly desirous of discharging their duties intelligently and conscientiously, but who are unable to do so at the present time through sheer ignorance. I think this proposal would help us to deal with the estimates more satisfactorily because we shall know what we are talking about, and we shall present to the country the spectacle of a House of Commons better equipped to discuss one of the most important subjects brought before it—the expenditure of the money which the people have to pay.

Mr. ROBINSON: How will those who are not on the committee have this knowledge, or have more knowledge than they have at the present time?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In this way; on all sides of the House there would be men qualified to lead the discusion, men who could bring out the essential information required, and from them the rest of the House would learn something of the estimates under discussion.

Mr. PELLETIER: It would be hearsay.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: No, it would be intelligent discussion led by those better informed members, and through that intelligent discussion other members not upon those committees would receive information. We had a splendid example last year of what we may expect. When the branch lines were being discussed in this House no member outside of those representing the constituencies affected knew anything about the question. We either sat silent or discussed the question in ignorance. When it was referred to the special committee, engineers were summoned, maps were produced, and each branch line was discussed, and later on the floor of the House the bills were intelligently discussed before they were passed. I believe we would find the same thing happen with regard to the estimates, which is perhaps one of the most important subjects with which we have to deal.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the discussion on the proposal to submit the estimates to a special committee. I have had some experience both in the preparation of estimates and also in trying to answer the numerous questions that were put to the poor minister on the floor. I have been very forcibly struck by the proposal which is now before the House. But one thing seems to have been forgotten; at any rate it has not been mentioned by any of the ministers or by others who have taken part in the debate. If you submit all the estimates to a special committee for consideration, it is tantamount to this: you might as well ask each minister to have printed and submitted to each member of the House the detailed information that is prepared for him in book form by the officials of his department. That is the information that will be given by officials of the department if the estimates are discussed in a special committee. Why not have this information printed before the estimates are discussed in the House and distributed to each member? By this method we would avoid not only the discussion in the special committee but the second discussion that is bound to take place when the estimates are again submitted to the committee of the Whole?

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it does seem to a tyro in parliamentary practice like myself that with the exception of two or three contributions this discussion has taken a very illogical range. Some hon. gentlemen seem under the hysteria that unless they can discuss this very question here and this afternoon the opportunity will never recur. As I take it, if the amendment proposed by the hon. Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) prevails, in due course of a brief time there will be a report from a committee and nothing under the firmament of heaven can then prevent this House from having a discussion, whether or not the finding of that committee be in favour of the submission of the estimates first to a committee. The hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark), with a fear not worthy of his intelligence, made the direct statement that unless the discussion proceeded now it would be impossible ever again to have the discussion on its merits, before this House.

Mr. CLARK: I beg to differ, if I may rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I said no such thing. I said that if the amendment is accepted by the mover of this resolution (Mr. Coote) it is not possible for the House to express its opinion on this subject to-day.

Mr. PUTNAM: The hon. member did not say "to-day"; he put it absolutely. But I freely and willingly accept his statement of what he really meant.

Mr. CLARK: Read it to-morrow.

Mr. PUTNAM: Oh, my ears are sharper than my tongue, and I am giving what the hon. member said.

The mover of the resolution presupposes that at least in some circumstances a committee to deal with a given matter in its first stage would be above the ability of the House of Commons, and I can reverently say that the amendment carries out better and more logically the purpose of his motion than the motion itself. The motion says in effect that to have a committee of the House review the recommendations of the cabinet is better than to have the House do so; that a committee should take the first shock of handling the estimates before they are discussed in the House. He has urged the principle of exalting a committee over the House; of making a committee a shock absorber in the matter of the estimates. Then, Mr. Speaker, we have gone on record as desiring a committee to report on the revision of the rules, rather than having that matter of revision taken up initially by debate in the open House. The committee to be thus charged with a revision of the rules is obviously the place where any and all revisions of those rules should first be dealt with.

What the mover of the original motion and the mover of the amendment both have in view is a potential change in the rules. We are on record as referring to a committee all rules which may be susceptible of change; let us refer this one also to that same committee or assert that impliedly it is already so referred. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) seems to think that the motion is in effect wiped out mechanically or chemically by the amendment. It seems to me that the right hon. gentleman should show why an exception should be made of this proposed change of rule by discussing it in the open House first rather than having it initially dealt with by the committee to which the whole question of the change of rules has already been referred. I think a burden of proof stands squarely against him. In fact, the House has already expressed its sense as to the method by which this matter of qualifying the rules should be dealt with, and I think it is good sense.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I have listened with much interest to the discussion of this motion and to the amendment which has been moved. I have been endeavouring to locate the cause for any such radical movement as is suggested in the motion and also in the amendment, and I say that I think the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) has touched upon the real reason for the bringing up of this discussion. If we had submitted to us by each minister as he brings on his estimates a detailed statement of what the money was being used for, it would not only facilitate the passing of the estimates but it would avoid any such discussion as we have here and the moving of such motions as we have had this afternoon. I have a very vivid recollection of attempts on the part of ministers to smuggle their estimates through the House; I have even made that statement on the floor of the House and have not been rebuked for it. With such a scheme as is proposed by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) it would be impossible for anything of that kind to happen. A committee such as is suggested in the original motion would review the estimates submitted by each minister and hon. members would have a pretty well defined idea of what the money was being voted for. We have seen ministers submit their estimates to the House and deliberately withhold information to which the House was entitled before an intelligent vote on the items under consideration could be given. That has occurred time and time again. I have also noticed that many estimates of a questionable or suspicious nature are held over until the last days of the session, and millions of dollars are fired through at the last minute, late at night or early in the morning after an all night session, without very much consideration. I think it is high time that some better method should be adopted than the one that has been in effect here during the last two or three years.

Mr. ROBB: In what regard have the last two or three years differed from the other fourteen that my hon friend has spent in the House ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If my hon. friend desires that information I will endeavour to illustrate it by something that happened in this House in 1923. While in committee of the Whole on the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), information was asked with regard to a particular matter. Upon my submitting a question on the subject the Chairman informed the committee that that matter came under the head of civil government and when I attempted to discuss the matter referred to I was ruled out of order. I think it was the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) who asked where the payment came in for a man who was known to be in the employ of the government. After the item was passed and the question was put directly to the minister he quietly informed the committee that the matter came under the item which had just been passed and Hansard does not show that the item he claimed was passed, was ever submitted. I was in the House all the time and followed the passing of these estimates carefully. My attention was closely fixed upon the item referred to and I never heard that item called.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will allow me, the question I asked him was in what regard it differed from the experience of the other fourteen years. My hon. friend will recall that he was once before ruled out of order in 1918 when he was finding fault with the ministry he was then supporting, with Dr. Tolmie, when he held up the House four or five hours.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not recall that incident, but it is just possible, because I insist on getting information that I think I am entitled to have. In this instance, the chairman of the committee informs me that the matter came under the head of civil government. I looked over the items under civil government, and I could not find it. Then another item comes up, and the minister quietly informs the committee that it was in the item which had just been passed. He was asked to reopen the question, but he would not do anything of the kind. I am referring to the money that was paid illegally out of the treasury of this country to the organizer of the Liberal party, Mr. Duncan Marshall, and I believe that is the thing that is more responsible for this discussion coming before this House to-day than anything else—the obvious lack of common ordinary courtesy on the part of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and his effort to conceal from the committee the moneys that are being voted by this House. If the estimates were submitted to a committee of the House before they came up for consideration in committee of the Whole, or if the suggestion of the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) were adopted and each minister came down with a detailed statement showing what the money he was asking parliament to vote was for, I think there would be no necessity for a special committee. But hitherto we have had to extract information from some of the ministers by a long and laborious process, particularly from the Minister of Agriculture, and that same process had to be gone through here on Friday night. It seems to be a habit with him to bring up his estimates on Friday night. After I left the House on Friday night I noticed in Hansard that someone requested that the particular item then before the committee with regard to live stock should be left over until more members who had left for home late Friday night should be here, and the minister informed the committee that possibly I would be back again on Monday when these items came up, and he was anxious to get them through before I returned. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that a proper way of voting the money of the people of this country? I say that the practice that has been followed here during the last two or three years is responsible for the protests which have been made here this afternoon, and if the government would adopt a reasonable method of presenting its estimates and have each minister give a detailed statement as to what the moneys voted were to be used for, I think there would be no request to have the estimates referred to a special committee. I do not like to refer to these things in this way, but it has come to the stage where I must protest against the methods that have been adopted and followed in voting money without the knowledge of what it is to be used for being in possession of members of this House.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the subject which we are discussing, you will recall, was discussed very fully in the parliament preceding this one, in the session of 1921, on a motion that was introduced by your Honour, then occupying a seat on the floor of this chamber. You suggested the appointment of a committee to scrutinize estimates before they were submitted by the different ministers to the committee of the Whole. As I listened to the discussion this afternoon, my mind wandered back to the debate that took place on this subject four years ago. I recall that your Honour introduced that resolution in a very effective and forceful speech. You set out in much more detail than is contained in the motion of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) the means that should be taken to effect the purpose you had in view. I recall that after you had spoken, my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who was then occupying the position of Minister of Finance also spoke, and while he did not disagree with the principle that you, Mr. Speaker, had enunciated and supported in your speech, he did rather take the position that after all it was not very necessary. True, he said, they had done something of the kind in the British parliament, but then conditions there were wholly different from what they were in the Canadian parliament. Then I recall that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke and supported you quite vigorously in the position you had taken, and urged that it was of very great importance that this committee should be appointed, or at all events that serious consideration should be given to the appointment of a committee for that specific purpose. Others also took part in that debate. I recall that the then sitting member for Neepawa made what I think was the most effective contribution, after the speech of your Honour, to that debate. The upshot of our discussion was that at the suggestion of the government your Honour withdrew your motion, and it was the general consensus of opinion in the House at that time that the discussion had done a great deal of good.

I do not find myself on common ground with the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) when he takes the view that the amendment which has been submitted, and has been accepted by my hon. friend from Macleod, disposes of the whole matter; not at all. As has already been pointed out in the discussion, it simply amounts to this: It makes this question of whether a change in our procedure should be made and the estimates submitted to a special committee, a matter of special reference to the committee that is going to consider the revision of the rules of the House; it is an instruction to that committee that this matter must be dealt with by them; that is all it is. Otherwise the committee charged with the revision of the rules of the House, if such be deemed necessary, might not feel under any obligation whatever to consider a change in the practice of submitting estimates. It does seem to me that that is the sensible way to proceed, and for this reason. We should not lightly change the rules and the practice of this House; when we do make a change we should be as certain as we can be that our judgment is sound and that the change will be beneficial to the conduct of the public business of the country.

We have had a suggestion made by my hon. friend from Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) this afternoon, which by the way appears to me to be the only concrete suggestion that has been made in the discussion. I am not prepared at the moment to accept his suggestion, valuable as I think it may be; but I do think that this suggestion could be made, to the committee that is charged with a revision of the rules, and evidence secured and the books examined in which the expenditures submitted to the ministers are set out, and submitted by the minister to the House. In that way its value could be best determined. That would be an eminently sensible way of proceeding. But I must say that I doubt if any committee charged with the duty of revising the estimates before they are submitted to the House would prove of very much greater value than the procedure we now follow with regard to the estimates. I think it would be of some value, but after all if we are to secure economy in public administration—and if there is one note that has run through all the speeches made in this debate this afternoon it is the desire and the need for economy—there must be more than a desire for economy among the members of this House. There has got to be a desire and an understanding, and a thorough understanding, of the need of economy in the constituencies, back in the country. Because, after all, this parliament is simply the mirror, it is in large measure the reflection, of the opinion that exists in the country—at any rate it should be.

I agree with the criticism that has been made this afternoon, that perhaps we take up too much time in academic discussions in this House. After all, what is the function of parliament? The function of parliament is legislative. It has to do with the consideration of the expenditure of public moneys, it has to do with the consideration of the all important question of how those moneys will be raised, the forms of our taxation, the question of what laws we shall enact and how they shall be enforced. Parliament in the real sense of the word is not a body that exists for the purpose of carrying on propaganda. That is peculiarly a thing that should be done outside of parliament; and when your public opinion has crystallized, as a result of propaganda, along any particular line of reform then that opinion will be reflected in the nature of your legislation and your administration. Such being the case I feel that a burden lies upon the individual members of this House to carry the gospel of economy back into their own constituencies. It has been apparent, I think, to anyone who has observed the proceedings of parliament closely, that very often criticisms of expenditures suggested or expenditures omitted are the result—to some degree at any rate, and we are all sinners in that respect more or less—of the particular or peculiar political effect they may have in some constituency or constituencies; and that, I maintain, is not the atmosphere in which we can approach this question of economy in public expenditures. Unfortunately we have had this condition of opinion in the country in the past—and I am not reflecting on or directing my attention to any particular section of the country; it is a disease that seems to have affected the whole body politic more or less —that the merit of a member and the value to his constituency was judged too much by the number of scalps he brought home at his belt at the end of the session in the way of votes of money for works in his constituency.

Miss MACPHAIL: I want to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that that is not true of Southeast Grey.

Mr. CRERAR: I am sure public opinion in that constituency has improved since my hon. friend has been its representative. I repeat, what I have described is a condition that has, to too great extent, existed in the country, and I say that no matter how many committees you may have to consider estimates, no matter how many questions you may direct to sweating, agonized ministers in this House, you will never find a real basis for economy until there is full appreciation and an understanding of the needs of it among the people outside of parliament.

Now I think that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) in accepting the suggestion that the matter be referred to this special committee has acted wisely. I do hope that that committee, whoever may compose it, will thoroughly examine the whole question, get whatever evidence they can, approach it in an impartial manner, find if possible means whereby these estimates can be scrutinized, and if possible revised, before they are submitted on the floor of parliament, and thus not only save the time of parliament but make some saving to the pockets of the taxpayers of this country as well.

5. p.m.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as amended?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. COOTE: Have I the opportunity of replying?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member replies that will close the debate. Therefore, if any other hon. member wishes to speak he should speak now.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): If I may be permitted I should like to say a word or two. I want to indicate my entire agreement with the amendment, not because I am not in favour of the original motion, but because I do not think we have enough information at this stage to decide the matter as intelligently as we shall be able to do after the committee reports. I think it is a very wise amendment, and I am glad the mover of the resolution has accepted it. I should like to say further that the attendance this afternoon indicates that this is a matter which comes home very strongly to a great many members of the House. It is really a very important question, and I am glad to see the interest that has been taken in it.

Mr. COOTE: I just wish to take a very few minutes of the time of the House in concluding this debate. First, I should like to refer very briefly to the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), and to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) expressing regret that I had accepted the amendment offered by the Acting Minister of Finance. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I gathered from the attitude of hon. members when I was speaking on this resolution that the House was not interested in the question to any great extent. I might remind you, Mr. Speaker, that you were good enough to rise and ask for order in the Chamber in order that the mover of the resolution might be heard. Even after that I am not sure that I made myself heard by all the members. When a member cannot make himself heard, he naturally feels that the House is not very much in sympathy with his motion. I felt that here was a chance of getting some action when the Acting Minister of Finance went so far as to say that the government would be quite in favour of referring this matter to the special committee which is to inquire into the question of revising the rules of the House.

I may explain my reason for putting this resolution on the order paper. After being here for three years I was almost in despair of the hon. members of this House doing anything that would effectually reduce the estimates as presented to them. I felt last year that the only possible way by which we could get a reduction in these estimates was to move that they should be reduced by, say, one-fifth or one-sixth of the amount as brought down, and leave it to the minister to decide on what particular items he was going to retrench. But that might not be a wise way of reducing estimates. We have some expenditures that are necessary, we have some, I am sure, that are unnecessary. In the Department of Agriculture alone, I believe, if my suggestion were adopted and the members of the committee gave their very best attention to this matter, we could effect a reduction of a million dollars in the departmental estimates through the cutting out of overlapping between the Dominion and the provinces alone.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Would my hon. friend be good enough to give me a list of the items upon which he would make that saving, because I have been endeavouring to avoid the overlapping to which he refers? I should be delighted to receive an itemized list of just where my hon. friend would begin, and would endeavour to apply it.

Mr. COOTE: I am sure the minister would not expect that I should give those details offhand; but I think possibly that if this committee would take the matter in hand, we could go into the proposed expenditures in detail and soon find out where we could save the sum I have suggested. I may have made it too big, but I honestly believe it could be done.

One other thing I should like to say in regard to this resolution. I am not absolutely satisfied that the suggestion I have made is the best one that can be made in regard to getting better procedure for the discussion of estimates. When I put the resolution on the order paper last year, I thought it was the very best that we had any hope of having adopted in this House and I am still rather of that opinion. I am pleased to see the interest which the House has shown in the consideration of this resolution, and trust that some good will result from the discussion.

Before concluding I should like to draw the attention of the House to what has been accomplished in the United States in the way of cutting down expenditures. This reference will be very brief and I hope hon. members will give me their attention while I present it. This quotation which I will read is part of an address by the President of the United States at the seventh regular meeting of the business organization of the government. That is, as I understand it, a meeting of heads of government departments from all parts of the United States. The president is referring to the work which had been accomplished since the Bureau of the Budget was established in the United States. I am quoting this in the hope that I may impress upon hon. members the possibility of finding ways of cutting down the expenditures that this country is enduring at the present time. The president says:

> For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the last pre-budget year, our expenditures were $5,538,000,000 and our receipts $5,624,000,000. For the succeeding three years, which include the year which ends to-day—

This is after the Bureau of the Budget had been established.

> —our expenditures were $3,795,000,000, $3,697,000,000, and $3,497,000,000, respectively. Here we show a progressive and consistent reduction in expenditures.

Then he goes on to quote the receipts which I do not think I need quote to the House. He continues:

> An analysis of these figures shows that in the face of a progressive reduction in receipts we have still achieved a substantial surplus at the end of each of the fiscal years—$314,000,000 for 1922, $310,000,000 for 1923, and in excess of $500,000,000 for 1924.

Further on he says:

> Without the aid of this recurring surplus the public debt would be $1,100,000,000 more than it now stands, and the interest charges would be some $45,000,000 greater next year than we shall now have to pay.

In conclusion, I am going to ask the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) who moved this amendment that we have some suggestion from the government that this committee will be asked to consider this particular matter as soon as possible. If that were done, we might have from the committee a recommendation that would help us to secure some better method of considering and discussing the estimates even at the present session. Should that result be achieved, I feel that the time we have taken over this resolution to-day will have been well spent and I shall be satisfied.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Mr. Speaker, has the committee met yet and are we likely to get a report this session?

Mr. SPEAKER: The committee has not yet been formed but it will likely be formed in a few days.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And progress reported?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not speaking for the government, but as my name was mentioned in connection with the committee, I suppose the committee will be formed in a few days and will then sit.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CANADIAN COASTING REGULATIONS

On the motion of Mr. Hocken:

For a copy of all applications made to the government, or any department thereof, towards the close of the last navigation season on the Great Lakes, asking for a suspension of the Canadian coasting regulations, and of all correspondence between any member of the government, or any of its officials and any other person in reference to the same matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice that this motion is really an order for papers. If the House does not object, I take the responsibility of moving it.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no objection to the motion except this, that the hon. member himself may want to make some remarks on it. We have an order under which motions for which discussion is not asked are put, but this is not in that particular category. I am quite willing to let it go through.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not heard that the hon. member wishes to speak on it, but for fear that he might, we shall let it stand.

Motion stands.

OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

INQUIRY FOR CORRESPONDENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in relation to the government order having to do with the bonusing of a fleet of steamers, I should like to refer the government to some correspondence in 1921 and 1920, at least. There may have been correspondence in previous years, as I think there was, with the British government in relation to the subject, and especially in relation to the shipping committee, and with the shipping committee itself. I would ask that that correspondence be laid on the table, as it can easily be done, I believe, before the government proceeds on Tuesday.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: And the Prime Minister.

ALTERNATIVE VOTE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): At the close of last session it was understood that a bill would be introduced to provide for the transferable vote in single member constituencies. Does the government intend introducing that bill shortly?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): A bill of that nature would be in the hands of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and if my hon. friend will put his question when that minister is present I am sure he will receive a reply.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the goverment propose bringing down any legislation this year in regard to old age pensions?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not in a position to say.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—PRINTER'S LIABILITY

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved the third reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code (Printer's Liability).

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DIVORCE

EQUALITY OF GROUNDS FOR RELIEF AS BETWEEN THE SEXES

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting Divorce.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps my hon. friend would allow this motion to stand until the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is in the House. I will undertake to see that he has an early opportunity of going on with it.

Mr. SHAW: Will the Minister of Justice be in the House to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I expect he will be here to-morrow. He was at Washington yesterday and I think he will be back in the city before the close of to-day.

Mr. SHAW: I am perfectly willing to accommodate the Prime Minister in his request, but this is the second occasion on which I have been asked to let this matter stand. I want it to be abundantly clear, however, that I desire that the House shall have the fullest opportunity to discuss the matter, and that there shall be ample opportunity also to put it through its various readings, provided it meets with the approval of the House.

Order stands.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT AMENDMENT

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend The Yukon Quartz Mining Act.—Mr. Black (Yukon).

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) is not here at the moment and perhaps my hon. friend would also permit this bill to stand for the present. I expect the minister here tomorrow.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I am willing to have the matter stand, but it is my intention to move that it be referred to the committee on Mines and Minerals, as was done with a similar bill last session. If that were done it could be considered in detail; and I am inclined to think that the Minister of the Interior would take the same stand.

Order stands.

MOUNTAIN FREIGHT SCALE

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Kennedy (West Edmonton), That, in the opinion of this House, the mountain freight scale should be abolished in so far as it is reflected in standard mileage rates, class rates and commodity rates.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the nays have it; I declare the motion lost.

TORONTO TERMINALS RAILWAY COMPANY

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that on Tuesday next the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the provisions of section 6 of the act respecting the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, chapter 70 of the statutes of 1924, whereby the Canadian National Railway Company was authorized to issue bonds, debentures or other securities to an amount not exceeding seven million dollars, in addition to the issue authorized by subsection two of the section enacted thereby; and to provide that such bonds, debentures or other securities may be used,—

(a) in the purchase at par of securities issued by the Terminals company not exceeding, together with the securities purchased under the provisions of subsection two, one-half of the total securities to be issued by the Terminals company for the purpose of its undertaking;

(b) in defraying the cost of portions of the said viaduct and works, which will not be included in the works to be owned by the terminals company, and will have to be constructed for or by the Canadian National Railway Company itself.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Customs and Excise.—salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act—and temporary buildings and rentals, $6,366,235.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that this vote be taken item by item?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I certainly think it should be taken item by item. What is the principle in the construction of these estimates? How is it that some departments can lump a whole lot of items together, while others systematically specify each item? Is it just because of the ingenuity of the minister?

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Chairman, I should not like to claim the fathership of this ingenuity. I have been looking at the estimates for a number of years back, I find it has always been done in this way, and I could see no reason, neither could the officers of the department, why we should change it. This item covers various ports of the Dominion, and we can give any details when required. Everything appears in the Auditor General's report. I suppose the explanation that will be required of this item is the apparent increase of over half a million dollars, from $5,799,561.59 in 1924-25, to $6,366,235. Last night I was asked if the reorganization in the Department of Customs had taken place. My answer was that it had taken place in the outside service, but not in the inside service. Civil government last night covered the inside service. This item covers the outside service. The explanation of the increase is that in the previous year there was a bonus paid to the employees, they receiving, in addition to their regular salary, a bonus which was not charged to Customs and Excise, but was paid, as I explained last night, by the Finance department. In the reorganization the bonus has been absorbed, and we are paying an amount of $586,223.29. By the reorganization the amount which we have added is not quite as large as the amount which was paid when we paid the bonus. The saving by the absorption of this bonus and the reorganization is the difference between the amount I have just stated, $586,223.29, and $566,673.41.

Mr. CALDWELL: Was the bonus not included in the $5,799,000 last year, or from what source was it paid?

Mr. BUREAU: By the Finance department. It was not charged to the Customs department.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): What was the amount of the bonus paid last year?

Mr. BUREAU: The amount was $586,223.29.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Has that all been absorbed?

Mr. BUREAU: All but $20,000. The amount of the increase, as my hon. friend will see, is the amount of salaries paid without bonus; that is, we have absorbed this amount less $20,000, the difference between $586,223.29 and $566,673.41.

Mr. CALDWELL How much has been paid in superannuation allowances to those who have retired during the year?

Mr. BUREAU: I promised last night that a list would be brought down of those who were superannuated and retired, showing the amounts they received at the time of their superannuation or retirement. We have the list, but it is not totalled. When it is completed I will lay it on the table.

Mr. CALDWELL: For the purposes of comparison it would be useful if this table were inserted in the record at this point.

Mr. BUREAU: It will have to be made up in a hurry and will be subject to correction.

Mr. ARTHURS: Can the minister give us approximately the percentage cost of the collection of customs during the last three or four years?

Mr. BUREAU: The best years are after the consolidation took place; that would give us only 1922-23 and 1923-24. In 1922-23 it cost 2.58 per cent; in 1923-24 it cost 2.49 per cent. The total collected in 1922-23 was $279,229,466.71, and in 1923-24 $298,721,419.55.

Mr. ARTHURS: How will those figures compare in the minister's opinion with those for the present year?

Mr. BUREAU: It is very hard to tell my hon. friend as the year in not concluded yet. I would have to get the percentage for the ten months that have expired.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is the minister fortunate or unfortunate when he has the excise attached to the customs?

Mr. BUREAU: It is rather debatable. I think it is the minister's misfortune and the country's good fortune.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think a more useful comparison would be a statement of the percentage cost of collection now as against that of the time prior to the amalgamation of the two departments.

Mr. BUREAU: I could give my hon. friend the figures for the Customs department, but not separately for Inland Revenue, which now takes the name of Excise.

Mr. CALDWELL: I thought it would be useful to know whether the amalgamation of these two services had cheapened the cost of operation.

Mr. BUREAU: I think I can show my hon. friend that it has. In 1914-15 the percentage of cost for Customs alone was 4.76, and in succeeding years the percentages were as follows: 1915-16, 3.55; 1916-17, 2.54; 1917-18, 2.51; 1918-19, 3.13; 1919-20, 2.48; 1920-21, 3.36; 1921-22, 3.22. That was the last year the two departments were separate.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): The minister has not the figures of the percentages for inland revenue?

Mr. BUREAU: No, they have not been tabulated. This table of percentage of cost of collection in the Customs department has been prepared annually for years.

Mr. CALDWELL: I simply wanted to know whether the amalgamation had cheapened the cost of collection. If the minister is willing to make the statement that he believes it has, I should regard that as sufficient.

Mr. BUREAU: I honestly believe it has, and the figures show it. In 1914-15 the customs dues collected amounted to $107,179,- 360.33, and the cost percentage was 3:59. In 1924-25 we collected $298,721,419.55—more than double—at a cost of 2.49 per cent.

Mr. CALDWELL: Has the minister been able to reduce the staff as compared with the staff of the two departments before amalgamation?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do you know what the extent of the reduction is?

Mr. BUREAU: No, not from memory.

Mr. CHURCH: In the first paragraph of this item No. 349, there is provision for temporary buildings and rentals, and in that connection I would like to call attention to the conditions in the city of Toronto. There are several buildings devoted to Customs purposes in Toronto. These include the express offices at the Toronto depot, an office at the Union station, and an old warehouse building on Wellington street, formerly a baking powder factory. The people of Toronto have for many years been complaining about the utter lack of, and inadequate, accommodation in connection with customs services and it is the general belief that the revenues would be greater if the facilities provided for the transaction of business were adequate. The administration of the income tax, transferred to the Customs department also comes under this item. The income tax branch in Toronto has been located in the old post office on Lombard street but it is proposed to be transferred down to Wellington street. With this in view two extra flats adjoining the customs house were rented at $3,600 per year; they were fitted up for the purposes of the income tax staff and they have been vacant ever since.

When I brought this matter up last year the minister referred me to the Minister of Public Works. The present Minister of Customs admitted the lack of accommodation but said the government could not find the money. The Minister of Public Works was in Toronto recently looking over some buildings with the idea of providing additional accommodation. I understand that the old Union station on Front street was visited in this connection, as well as some other buildings. Business men are complaining of the dilapidated condition of the rented buildings now in use; the plant is thoroughly inadequate to handle the $60,000,000 of customs collections in Toronto each year. The old customs building at Front and Yonge streets which was one of the finest buildings in the city from an architectural point of view, was torn down—I do not know why—and a lot at the corner of Bay and Front streets was purchased for $110,000 from the city who gave it to the government at less than commercial rates. I must say that the minister has been doing what he can to give an efficient service to the business men of the city with crippled facilities. Many organizations have been asking the Toronto members to bring this matter up including the city board of trade and other public bodies.

The Liberal Association of the city of Toronto passed a resolution dealing with it. The resolution reads, in part, as follows:

> The present customs house is not only wholly inadequate to care for the business that passes through it, but it is also an eyesore to the people of Toronto, and a liability that is as a millstone around the neck of the Liberal party in Toronto.
> And be it further resolved, that not only in the interests of good government, but in the interests of common decency, the Right Hon. Mr. King and his cabinet associates be asked to delay no longer in according to the people of Toronto what in simple justice is their right, a new and adequate customs house.

The resolution was accompanied by a letter from the Liberal excutive from which I quote as follows:

> Toronto does not expect favours. If it ever expected them it has long since passed that stage. But Toronto does expect that its necessities will be cared for at least in same measure. And a new customs house or federal office building is an absolute necessity. Let me point out to you that the customs receipts of Toronto amount to $60,000,000 a year, or more than a million dollars a week, out of a total for the Dominion of $133,000,000 a year, and that the headquarters for the customs house there is a ramshackle old shed of a building with two warehouses half a mile distant from it that cannot and should not be called upon in the matter of accommodation to house the millions of dollars worth of merchandise yearly passing through them, and none of these buildings are suited to the requirements of a town of 50,000, much less a city of half a million people.

I am at a loss to know why the old building at Front and Yonge streets was torn down. The late government tore it down intending to build but a war came on and the financial situation of the country was such that they could not go ahead and put up another building. A great mistake was made in tearing it down; it was a shame. I know that business men, irrespective of party politics, have expressed their appreciation of the work that has been done by the Minister of Customs and Excise and his officials in the department. He has at Toronto a courteous collector and staff; they are doing good work, and the department is being run efficiently. The collection of the income tax has now been added to his department and where are you going to house all these officials? You have the old post office building, and the customs officers are housed in a lot of old dilapidated, rented buildings, and you have to walk blocks and blocks to find the one you want. The department is well administered and I contend that for a public service and utility of this kind proper accommodation to efficiently transact business ought to be provided. I think the time has passed for any further discussion, and that adequate accommodation ought to be provided now. It will be good business for the department; it will increase the revenue, and do away with the amount that is now being spent in rentals. The department is deriving a revenue from Toronto of $60,000,000, out of a total revenue for the country of about $135,000,000, and I think the quantity of business done in the city justifies the putting up of an up-to-date building not as a luxury but as a necessity. No business concern receiving a revenue of $60,000,000 would do business in such a ramshackle and dilapidated building in a port the size of Toronto. Our business men have been complaining. The minister has been looking into the situation and I hope he will try and induce the Minister of Public Works or the government to give us some degree of satisfaction in the matter of accommodation. The Minister of Customs will find it of benefit to his department to do so, because a lot of revenue is being lost through not having a proper building and people having to run around from one office to another to transact business. It also involves delay for the business men in getting their goods out; they have to go from unit A to unit B, along Wellington street and uphill and down dale before they finally get their goods out.

Mr. BUREAU: If my hon. friend will allow me first to answer my hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell), who asked me the total amount paid on account of retirements and superannuation from the department during last year, one of the officers of the department has made a rough calculation, which is, of course, subject to correction, which shows that the total superannuation allowance of officers at ports retired under the Calder Act during the last year was $49,551.57. This is, of course, subject to correction. I do not want to bind the officers to a hasty calculation made on the floor of the House.

Replying to my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church): He has put three questions. First, what was the revenue derived from the port of Toronto during the last fiscal year; secondly, what is going to be done to the building on Wellington street; and thirdly, what is going to be done about new office accommodation in Toronto. I may say that a more important question than either of the ones I have enumerated, and one that I was going to ask him to answer, and this goes really to the root of the whole trouble, is why was the old customs house in Toronto torn down? Part of it is left standing, and as my hon. friend has said, it has been my privilege to visit Toronto and examine the offices to see if there was any way of improving conditions and facilitating the service, with a view to securing greater efficiency from proper accommodation. From what I have seen of the exterior of the old custom house, the part that is left, I deplore that the building was ever torn down, because the part that is left, which is now used by the express, is one of the best buildings for the custom house officers in the whole city of Toronto. I do not see how you could justify the tearing down of that building, and am I to assume the burden of the difficulties which have followed from tearing it down? I do not think it would be fair to blame me for that. I admit that the conditions in Toronto are bad, but I must say that it is due to the fact that the old building, which was a good and substantial building, was torn down. My artistic taste may not be as good as that of others, but judging by the carvings and stonework on the part that is left, it struck me that the old building must have been a very fine one, and I do not see how you can justify tearing it down.

Mr. ARTHURS: Was it torn down before the war?

Mr. BUREAU: During the war, in 1914, I think.

Mr. HOCKEN: In 1918.

Mr. BUREAU: In what month did they start tearing it down?

Mr. HOCKEN: Towards the end of the year.

Mr. BUREAU: I stand corrected. At all events I did not tear it down, and this government did not tear it down. Let me now give my hon. friend the revenue from the Toronto office. The figures are as follows:

Year	Customs Entries	Customs Revenue	Excise Entries	Excise Revenue
1922-1923 . .	266,239	$28,842,403 59	50,403	$28,481,660 09
1923-1924 . .	283,738	$29,886,074 36	49,544	$28,375,820 00

Mr. ARTHURS: How does that compare with the rest of Canada?

Mr. BUREAU: I can compare those figures with those of any of the biggest ports, Vancouver, for instance, or Montreal. The corresponding figures for Montreal and Vancouver are:

Year	Customs Entries	Customs Revenue	Excise Entries	Excise Revenue
		Montreal
1922-1923 . .	253,731	$32,307,801 45	58,326	$54,456,503 99
1923-1924 . .	271,207	$30,900,360 76	59,440	$60,176,645 17
		Vancouver
1922-1923 . .	92,738	$11,267,929 90	11,859	$ 4,441,329 86
1923-1924 . .	99,744	$11,489,291 77	14,299	$ 5,240,605 23

My hon. friend can find these figures, I think, in the Auditor General's report. Toronto would average, I am told by the officers who are more acquainted with the details, about 20 per cent of the total.

Mr. CALDWELL: Just on that point, are these figures in dollars the value of the goods entered or the amount of revenue collected?

Mr. BUREAU: In the case of customs it was the amount of duty that was collected, and in the cases of excise the amount of excise taxes and duties that were paid, the amounts being collected by the department at the various points.

Mr. CALDWELL: To go back to the other matter I was discussing. I asked for the amount of superannuation paid during the year and it was given as $49,551.57, but the saving by absorbing the bonus was something less than $20,000 last year. Therefore we have paid out in this department nearly $30,000 more than we did last year. This illustrates the necessity of getting these estimates before a committee or, as an hon. member suggested, of printing and distributing the detailed information. If this were done it would, I think, save a good deal of time in committee of the Whole. What I should like to know in this connection is how much was paid into the superannuation fund by those persons who were superannuated in this department.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not in a position to give my hon. friend that information. The amounts paid for superannuation are kept in the Finance department; the various departments are not in possession of those details.

Mr. CALDWELL: I realize that, but if we are going to discuss the estimates or pass legislation intelligently we should have this information. I am not blaming the minister because he has not got the information, but the lack of it illustrates the need for fuller details than we are now able to get in committee of the Whole. When the superannuation bill passed last year I was in committee at the time, but I fully prepared myself to discuss the measure when it went through. I should like to have the information for which I have asked at some future time if it can be secured. I refer to the amount paid in by any of those officers who have been superannuated. I think a great many hon. members believed last year that civil servants were paying enough into the fund to meet the expenses of superannuation when superannuation became due. However, this is not the case. I was going to say it falls short of doing that by 95 per cent—that is, I doubt if members of the civil service pay in more than five per cent of the amount they draw out in the way of superannuation. I may be a little out in the statement but that is my opinion. For instance we will take a man who enters the service at the age of twenty, at a pretty low salary. His stipend is augmented as time goes on and he retires with a pretty good salary. I understand he could retire at the age of fifty after thirty years' service.

Mr. BUREAU: No, at the age of sixty-five.

Mr. CALDWELL: I understand he can retire after thirty years' of service no matter what his age. I think the minister will find that I am right. He can retire after thirty years in the service or at the age of sixty-five.

Mr. BUREAU: If the employee is physically incapacitated he can be retired after thirty-five years' service; otherwise, not until he is sixty-five years of age. There is a special provision under which an employee who possesses special qualifications can be retained until he is seventy-five provided he is physically sound.

Mr. CALDWELL: I should like the minister to be positive.

Mr. BUREAU: I am as positive as I can be of anything.

Mr. CALDWELL: We will say the salary of the employee is $1,500, I think that will cover a great many cases. Well, he pays in five per cent of his salary during his term of office. That would be $75 per year which, paid in for thirty years, would represent a total of $2,250 he had paid into the fund. If his salary average $3,500 for the last ten years of his service he would draw one-fiftieth of that amount multiplied by the number of years he had been in the service, whereas he would only have contributed $2,250 during the whole term of his employment. I think it is abundantly clear that there must be an immense sum of money contributed from the public treasury in order to provide for the superannuation of members of the civil service. Therefore, I think we should have this particular information, and I should like to ask the minister if he will secure it for us from the Finance department before his estimates are passed.

Mr. BUREAU: I am neither ready nor willing to engage in a financial discussion at this stage. My hon. friend has only put one side of the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Six o'clock.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend supposes that every man who has paid into the superannuation fund and is not now in the service has drawn superannuation. Let me remind my hon. friend that the fund rests on an actuarial basis. Further, my hon. friend is under the impression that in the case of a man who paid into the superannuation fund for thirty or thirty-five years and then died the superannuation went to his family. But the fact is that in the past the money remained in the fund; his widow or family did not draw superannuation.

Mr. CALDWELL: Just there, does not the widow get the superannuation?

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, February 26, 1925.

The House met at three o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS

LAKE OF THE WOODS AND RAINY LAKE LEVELS, AND BOUNDARY DEMARCATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table a copy of a convention and protocol between His Britannic Majesty, in respect of the Dominion of Canada, and the United States, for reglating the level of the lake of the Woods, and of identical letters of reference submitting to the International Joint Commission certain questions for the regulation of the levels of Rainy lake and other upper waters; signed at Washington, the 24th day of February, 1925. Also, a copy of a convention between His Britannic Majesty, in respect of the Dominion of Canada, and the United States, for the further demarcation of the boundary between Canada and the United States; signed at Washington the 24th day of February, 1925.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That 500 copies in the English language and 300 in the French language of the convention and protocol between His Britannic Majesty in respect of the Dominion of Canada and the United States for regulating the levels of the lake of the Woods, and identical letters of reference submitted to the International Joint Commission on certain questions as to regulation of the Rainy lake and other upper waters, signed at Washington on February 24, 1925, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT

JUDGMENT OF THE SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I beg to lay on the table of the House a copy of the formal judgment and reasons for judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the matter of the restoration of the Crowsnest pass rates, and the general order of the railway board disallowing the tariffs of the Canadian Pacific and of the Canadian National Railway Companies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I suggest to the minister that it would be of great interest to the House if he would indicate briefly what the judgment is?

Mr. GRAHAM: Probably, stating it in the words of a layman, I might not state it exactly, so I shall read a substantial part of the judgment:

Question 1. Whether, as a matter of law, the board is empowered, under the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the Railway Act, or otherwise, to authorize railway rates upon the railway of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in excess of the maximum rates referred to in the Crowsnest Pass Act, being chapter 5, 60-61 Victoria, Statutes of Canada, and in the agreement therein referred to, upon the commodities therein mentioned.

Answer. No.

Question 2. If the court shall be of the opinion that the Crowsnest Pass Act or agreement is binding upon the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, then, according to the construction of the Crowsnest Pass Act, section 1, clause (d), and the agreement made thereunder,

(a) I. Are the rates therein provided applicable to traffic westbound from Fort William and from all points east of Fort William now on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's railway;

Answer. No.

(a) II. Are such rates confined to westbound traffic originating at Fort William and at such points east of Fort William as were, at the date of the passing of the Act and (or) the making of the agreement, on the company's line of railway?

Answer. Yes.

(b) Are such rates applicable to traffic originating at points east of Fort William which were, at the date of the passing of the Act and (or) of the making of the agreement, on any line of railway owned or leased by or operated on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

Answer. In order that the traffic provided for by clause (d) should fall under that clause, it must originate at Fort William or some point east thereof which at the date of the agreement was "on the company's railway."

(c) Are the rates therein provided applicable to traffic destined to points west of Fort William which are now on the Canadian Pacific Company's railway or on any line of railway owned or leased by or operated on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

Answer. In order that the rates prescribed in clause (d) should apply, the destination of traffic otherwise within that clause must be a point which was at the date of the agreement "on the company's main line or on (some) line of railway throughout Canada owned or leased by or operated on account of the company."

(d) Are such rates confined to traffic destined to points west of Fort William which were at the date of the passing of the act or the making of the agreement on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's railway or on any line of railway owned or leased by or operated on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

Answer. Yes.

Question 3. Whether as a matter of law the board is empowered under the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the Railway Act or otherwise to authorize rates upon the Canadian Pacific Railway on grain and flour from all points on the main line, branches or connections of the company west of Fort William to Fort William and Port Arthur and all points east beyond the maximum rates specified in the Crowsnest Pass Act and agreement and referred to in Chapter 41, Statutes of Canada (1922)?

Answer. No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the judgment unanimous?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can answer my right hon. friend. The judgment is prepared by the Chief Justice and is concurred in by Justices Duff, Mignault, Rinfret and Newcombe.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. MACLEAN (York): When is that decision likely to be appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think I can answer my hon. friend at this date.

Mr. GRAHAM moved:

That 2,000 copies in the English language and 400 copies in the French language of the formal judgment and the reasons for judgment of the Supreme court in the Crowsnest pass rates matter laid on the table of the House to-day, be printed forthwith for distribution to senators and members and for bound sessional papers, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16 to amend the Supreme Court Act.

He said: The purpose of the amendment is to change the date of opening of the October sitting from the second to the first Tuesday. This is to meet the wishes of the members of the court.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

Mr. BIRD:

1. How many miles of the Hudson Bay railway have been restored to a sound operating condition?
2. What was the total amount expended on the repair of the Hudson Bay railway during the years 1923 and 1924?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. 214 miles have been repaired and put in condition for the present service.
2. $413,222.13.

PUGWASH BUOY SERVICE

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

1. Was the service of buoys at Pugwash, Nova Scotia, taken from Frank Seaman and given to Hanford Van Ember?
2. If so, why was this change made, and when?
3. Were any tenders asked for such service?
4. If so, how, and what tenders were received?
5. On whose recommendation was the change made?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1 and 2. Mr. Frank Seaman had a contract for the maintenance of the buoy service at Pugwash, N.S., which terminated on July 2, 1924. The amount paid under the contract was $100 per annum. A new contract for the same amount was made for the maintenance of the same service with Mr. Hanford Van Ember.

3. No.

4. See answer to No. 3.

5. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

WHEAT RUST INVESTIGATION

Mr. GOULD:

1. How many civil servants are engaged in investigational work on wheat rust?

2. How many workers have been chosen since vote No. 418 was passed whose salary is chargeable to the vote?

3. Were all appointments made through civil service examinations?

4. Did any United States scientists or acknowledged authorities on wheat rust meet Canadian departmental heads for a conference on rust at Winnipeg during 1924?

5. If so, how many, and upon whose invitation did they come?

6. What amount of the said vote No. 418 was expended on account of the conference?

7. What amount of this vote was expended in purchase of land, and the building of needful winter quarters for preservation of host plant of the rust germ through the winter season?

8. Was total amount of vote No. 418 expended?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Four.

2. None.

3. Three of the present staff were appointed after competition by the Civil Service Commission, the fourth was appointed before the outside service came under the commission's jurisdiction.

4. Yes.

5. Four. They were invited by the Department of Agriculture and the Research Council of Canada jointly.

6. None.

7. None of this vote has yet been expended and none will be expended in building winter quarters for the preservation of the host plant of the rust germ during the winter season. It is anticipated, however, that some eighty per cent of this appropriation will be expended by March 31, 1925, in the erection of greenhouses and the purchase of equipment for cereal rust laboratory which it is proposed to erect on the grounds of the Manitoba Agricultural College at Winnipeg this coming summer.

8. Answered by No. 7.

*CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

*Mr. BOYS:

1. How many ships are there in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

2. What are the name, tonnage, length, capacity and horse-power of each?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend will look at last year's report of the merchant marine he will find a list of the names of the ships, their tonnage, and so on.

Mr. BOYS: It is very convenient to have the information in short form rather than in a bulky report.

Mr. GRAHAM: The report is contained in about ten pages. However, I can get the information, I think.

SUPERANNUATION ACT RETURNS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government if a return has been tabled giving the number of superannuations under the Superannuation Act of last year, the amount paid, and the amount contributed during the year by those who were superannuated. I find that section 14 of the act provides that this return shall be laid on the Table within fifteen days after the opening of parliament Yesterday when the estimates were before the House we wanted this information, but it was not available. If this return were brought down the information would be made available to hon. members.

Mr. ROBB: If it is related to the Department of Insurance I will have the question directed to the Superintendent of Insurance and try to get an answer for my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: The routine in the matter is that the recommendation or suggestion is made by the department; then it must be approved by the Civil Service Commission; then it goes to the Treasury board and is finally approved by council. In the discussion of a day or two ago it was pointed out that the Civil Service Commission was now preparing a list of all superannuations as well as of retirements under the Calder Act.

Mr. CALDWELL: May I read section 14 of the act? I think it will clarify the situation:

> The minister shall lay before parliament within fifteen days after the commencement of each session thereof:—
> (a) a statement of all superannuation and retiring and withdrawal allowances granted during the last fiscal year under the terms of this act, giving the name and rank of each person superannuated or retired, his salary, age and length of service, the allowance granted to him on retirement, the cause of his superannuation and whether the vacancy has been subsequently filled, and if so, whether by promotion or by new appointment, and the salary of the new incumbent;
> (b) a statement of all allowances granted to widows, children or other dependents of civil servants under this act during the said year, showing the name, age and sex of each person to whom any such allowance has been granted; and the name, age at death, salary and length of service of the civil servant to whose widow, children or other dependents such allowance or allowances have been granted;

(c) a statement showing the amount received as contributions and the amount paid as allowances during the said year under this act together with such further information as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council by regulation made under this act.

The question has already been asked two or three times during the discussion of estimates. If this return were tabled it would obviate the necessity of repeating the question when the estimates for each department come up.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the interpretation of the word "Minister?" Is that the Minister of Finance or the minister of each department?

Mr CALDWELL: The act defines "Minister" as the Minister of Finance.

Mr. BELAND: I may point out to my hon. friend that the act came into force after the last session of parliament, and the report which is mentioned in section 14 applies to the fiscal year. The fiscal year during which the act came into force has not yet come to an end. It terminates only on the 31st day of March next.

Mr. CALDWELL: This will not become effective, then, until next session?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A return along the line which my hon. friend has requested is now being prepared and will be brought down as soon as completed.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN CALGARY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): I rise to ask the government if it has taken any action on the telegram received from Mayor Webster of Calgary, in which he stated that many of the unemployed there who were in a destitute condition were immigrants who had not been long enough in the community to come within the scope of the relief policy adopted by the city?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): That telegram was replied to, and reference of the matter mentioned has been made to the Immigration department. It is expected that we will have additional information for Mr. Webster shortly.

SOLDIERS' PENSIONS

FORTHCOMING LEGISLATION ON CANTEEN FUND AND CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I would like to ask the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment what he has to say with regard to the following suggestion which has been made to me in the form of a telegram:

Please strenuously oppose grant of $100,000 from veterans' canteen funds to Veterans' Alliance.

Is it the intention of the minister to dispose of the fund in that way?

Mr. GRAHAM: Who sent the telegram?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Mr. Davidson, president of the Riverdale Great War Veterans' Association, of my constituency.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): I understand the question to be whether the government intends to introduce legislation to apportion $100,000 of the canteen fund to the Veterans' Alliance?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Yes.

Mr. BELAND: There is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Then why is there this unrest over it? Has any order in council been passed in the matter?

Mr. BELAND: No order in council having any relation to the canteen fund has been passed by this government. There is no provision in the legislation which is contemplated that relates to the apportionment of $100,000 to the Veterans' Alliance in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very anxious to be clear in the matter. As I understand the minister, he says that the government does not propose to introduce any legislation similar to what is embodied in the act of last year?

Mr. BELAND: The government does, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, the government does?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): But not along the line of the suggestion in this telegram?

Mr. BELAND: Not at all. There was no provision in the bill of last year for the payment of $100,000 to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance.

Mr. ARTHURS: And no order in council has been passed along similar lines?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would like to ask the government if the appointment of a special committee on pensions and soldiers' civil re-establishment is contemplated for the present session?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. J. A. CLARK: (Burrard): When is it contemplated that legislation in regard to pensions, soldiers' civil re-establishment and such other matters will be introduced?

Mr. BELAND: The legislation to which my hon. friend refers will be introduced very shortly. Probably notice will be given next week.

BETTING INFORMATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. E. ROSS (North Simcoe): I would like to ask the government whether they intend at this session to bring in legislation similar to that passed in this House two years ago and amended in the Senate dealing with the handbook evil.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Yes, it is the intention of the government to reintroduce this year the amendment to the Criminal Code which was adopted by the House of Commons two years ago and rejected by the Senate, dealing with the subject mentioned by my hon. friend.

DIVORCE

EQUALITY OF GROUNDS FOR RELIEF AS BETWEEN THE SEXES

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting divorce.

He said: I had the opportunity and the privilege last year of presenting to the House a resolution incorporating the provisions of this bill. The resolution was not disposed of by the House. Subsequently I introduced a bill founded on the resolution; that, however, was not disposed of either, and I now take the earliest opportunity of presenting for the consideration of the House this year a bill designed to establish equality as between husband and wife so far as the grounds for divorce are concerned. In order that the situation may be properly appreciated let me sketch very briefly something of the history of divorce in Canada.

By our federation act of 1867 the subject of divorce was assigned exclusively to the federal parliament. There was another provision in the British North America Act by which the laws in force and the courts in operation in each of the confederating provinces were to continue in force and operation until such time as they were repealed or altered by competent authority. There was a further provision by which upon the expected application of further provinces to join in the union the same provision should apply, namely, that their laws and their courts should be continued until similarly repealed or altered.

Now, having these provisions in mind, I want to sketch the situation as it existed at confederation. Previous to 1867 Ontario and Quebec had no divorce courts. Consequently as to divorce these provisions that I have mentioned had no application to these two provinces. I should say also that the Dominion government has never in any case passed any general divorce law, and the result is that Ontario and Quebec in divorce matters stand exactly in the position they were in prior to confederation.

The provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick each had divorce courts prior to 1867. These courts granted divorce to men and women on equal grounds; that is the grounds open to the husband were likewise open to the wife; there was no distinction as between the sexes. The grounds in the province of New Brunswick were adultery, impotence and consanguinity. To these three grounds which prevailed in the province of New Brunswick there was a fourth added in Nova Scotia, namely the ground of cruelty; and so the situation is that the divorce laws of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick which were passed prior to confederation still persist to this day, and both sexes are on a basis of absolute equality.

The first province to join confederation, was the province of Manitoba in the year 1870. Prior to its incorporation, the district of Assiniboia, of which it formed a part, had passed an ordinance that the laws of England as they existed in the year 1870 should be applicable in that area, and so the result was that when Manitoba joined confederation in 1870, the laws of England as they existed in 1870, including, of course, the law with respect to divorce, applied in that province.

The province of British Columbia joined confederation in 1871, but previous to joining confederation the then colony of British Columbia had adopted the English law as it stood in 1858; so it entered the union preserving the law of England on divorce as of the year 1858.

The province of Prince Edward Island joined confederation in 1873, but previous to confederation it also had a court operating in divorce matters, and that court has been preserved, although I think but seldom used.

The provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, which joined confederation in 1905, had taken the law of England as it stood in the year 1870. And so, shortly, the result is this: that to-day the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have no divorce courts, while Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have each divorce courts, before all of which men and women stand exactly upon equal ground; that is, the husband can secure divorce on the ground of adultery alone, and similarly with the wife. The four western provinces take the law of England so far as divorce matters are concerned for all practical purposes as it existed in the year 1870, because there was no substantial alteration of the English divorce law between the year 1858 and the year 1870. So, for the purposes of my argument I say that the divorce law of England as it existed in the year 1870 applies to the four western provinces.

Now what is this English law which is applicable in the four western provinces? May I just put it shortly by stating that whereas the husband can secure a divorce on the ground of adultery alone, the wife must prove something further; she must prove not only adultery, but in addition either one of two things, cruelty, or desertion without reasonable excuse for a period of two years. That is exactly the situation that exists in the province of Alberta to-day. There are other grounds for divorce which are not necessary to this discussion, and to which I shall not refer, but which are included in the British Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857. I trust I have made that clear; that whereas the husband has a right to divorce upon proving adultery alone, the wife in the four western provinces must prove something additional, either cruelty, or desertion for a period of two years without reasonable excuse. Now that is a considerable burden to place upon the wife in any event; and when we come to the interpretation of these words, cruelty and desertion, we find that they are probably more difficult of proof than perhaps most of us appreciate. Cruelty in the ordinary sense of the term we understand, but legal cruelty is something entirely different. The definition of it has come to us from an English court decision given in the year 1790. Let me give in the words of the Ontario appeal court the definition of cruelty:

> To establish cruelty one must show treatment likely to produce or which produces physical illness or mental distress of a nature calculated permanently to affect her bodily health or endanger her reason, and that there is reasonable apprehension that the same state of things will continue.

That is the definition of legal cruelty. That is what the wife in any of the four western provinces of Canada must prove in addition to adultery before she can secure a divorce from the courts in those jurisdictions. One of our Ontario court judges, referring to that definition of cruelty, which he adopted for the purpose of his decision, used these words:

> The law is not in accord with modern views as to the relations between husband and wife. That it is such is to be deplored. Her life may be made a veritable hell upon earth and she is without remedy if robust enough to suffer it all without impairment of her physical health or her mentality.

In Alberta, the chief justice of the appellate court of that province in a decision used these words:

> It has been accepted in England that legal cruelty to support a wife's claim must be such as to cause danger to life, limb or health, present or future. There may be much room for dissatisfaction, but that is a matter which can be easily and effectively cured by the legislature if it desires.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Must cruelty be established by the wife in any other parts of the Dominion than the four western provinces?

Mr. SHAW: No. Then we come to the other ground. Suppose that the wife, instead of relying upon adultery and cruelty, is forced to rely upon a combination of adultery and desertion. We find that great difficulties are imposed upon her there, because she must prove desertion for a period of two years, and she must prove that it is without reasonable excuse.

Mr. FORKE: Would the hon. member state what are the grounds for divorce in Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. SHAW: Ontario and Quebec have no divorce courts. The applicant for divorce in those two provinces must come to the Parliament of Canada for relief, and the Parliament of Canada is, of course, empowered to grant relief on any terms that it sees fit. It undoubtedly grants relief to the parties, either husband or wife, on terms of equality. Divorce has been granted by parliament on the ground—

Mr. BAXTER: I rise to a point of order. I do so in the hope that it will be beneficial to some of us. We would like to hear what I have no doubt is a very instructive address, but owing to the disorder prevailing in the chamber we are unable to follow the hon. gentleman's remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is, possibly, an exaggeration to use the term "disorder", but there is undoubtedly a great deal of conversation going on. I would ask hon. gentlemen on both sides to kindly listen, and to refrain from conversation. If that is done the hon. member who has the floor will be heard with ease.

Mr. PUTNAM: I understood from the hon. gentleman that in Ontario and Quebec the tribunals have practically unlimited power to grant divorce. How far would the hon. gentleman qualify, if at all, my interpretation of the situation?

Mr. SHAW: I have already stated that there are no divorce courts operating in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. PUTNAM: No, but there are grounds for granting divorce.

Mr. SHAW: What is the use of there being grounds for divorce if there are no courts to give effect to the grounds. In the case of these two provinces, as I understand it, the only way an applicant for divorce can secure relief is by coming to the federal parliament and presenting his or her case. Now, as a result of the decisions of the Senate from time to time I think it is fair to state that parliament grants divorces on terms of equality as far as the sexes are concerned. The Parliament of Canada is supreme. It can grant a divorce upon any ground it sees fit, but in actual practice divorce is granted on the ground of adultery, nonconsummation, and various other grounds which are immaterial to my argument at the moment.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How much does it cost to get relief from the federal parliament in the way my hon. friend has indicated?

Mr. SHAW: If my hon. friend will permit me to go on I shall come to the point in a moment.

Mr. HOEY: In the case of a petitioner for divorce living in the western provinces has he or she the right to petition the Dominion parliament?

Mr. SHAW: Yes, the Parliament of Canada is available to people throughout Canada, regardless of what province they may reside in.

Mr. PUTNAM: If my hon. friend will excuse me, and purely for information, is it true that the divorce committee of the Senate has unlimited discretion in granting a divorce in any case in which the marriage proves to be a hardship—for instance in a case where incompatibility of temperament is shown?

Mr. SHAW: Well, no committee of the Senate has any jurisdiction in the matter at all. As I understand it, the Senate committee hears the evidence and recommends action to the upper house. Even action by the Senate is not adequate unless it is approved by this House.

Mr. PUTNAM: That is technical.

Mr. SHAW: The Parliament of Canada, composed of the House of Commons and the Senate, puts through every divorce bill. It can grant divorce on any ground, so far as I am aware, that it sees fit.

Now, when interrupted by this series of questions, I was about to deal with the subject of desertion, the other ground upon which the wife might secure divorce if it were coupled with adultery. As I pointed out, in that event the wife must prove desertion for a period of two years and without reasonable excuse. The term "without reasonable excuse" allows, as one can easily see, a very wide latitude within which an erring husband can readily escape from the consequences of his conduct.

The purpose of this bill is to remedy these inequalities. It is to put the wife in the four western provinces before the courts of those provinces on exactly the same basis as the husband. And why should it not be so? After all, is not adultery the great cardinal sin against the marriage relationship? Is it not the primary offence which impairs the stability of the home, and is it not the one great offence which interferes with domestic happiness? Therefore, if such relief is granted to the husband, why should it not be equally secured to the wife?

Mr. BROWN: Have the provincial legislatures no powers in this direction themselves?

Mr. SHAW: No, the subject of divorce, as I stated at the outset, is a matter of federal jurisdiction alone. I ask this parliament, why impose this burden on women when it is not imposed equally on men? Why impose it, or allow the imposition to continue, on western women when women in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are relieved from that imposition? I say it is an injustice to the women in the four western provinces.

From the discussion of last year I take it that there may be two objections raised to this bill. There is first of all the objection raised by those who have religious convictions on the matter, and who feel that under no circumstances should divorce be granted. With those who sincerely hold that view, I of course, have no quarrel, but I do say this: We have divorce now, not only granted by the Parliament of Canada, but granted by the courts of all the provinces of the Dominion except those of Ontario and Quebec. Will you, because of any religious conviction however sincere it may be, deny equality in these courts to women? It seems to me that it is unfair and unjust to do so, and may I—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do you not think it would be better to put the man to the same inconvenience as the woman and compel him to prove cruelty and desertion on the part of the wife?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SHAW: The laughter that has greeted my hon. friend's question is perhaps the best answer to it. I said at the outset that the great cardinal sin against the marriage relationship is the commission of adultery. Why camouflage that situation by asking the husband to prove cruelty in addition? The very proposition contains its own answer.

Now may I in that connection, in urging a plea for equality so far as our western women are concerned read the views of perhaps the greatest liberal of the nineteenth century, I refer to Mr. Gladstone. At the very time this Matrimonial Causes Act, to which I referred as the English law which governs our present four western provinces, was in the course of its passage through the British House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone, although conscientiously opposed to divorce, used this language:

> For my own part I shall always assert the principle of equal rights. It is impossible to do a greater mischief than to begin now, in the middle of the 19th century, to undo, with regard to womankind, that which has already been done in their behalf, by slow degrees, in the preceding eighteen centuries, and to say that the husband shall be authorized to dismiss his wife on grounds for which the wife shall not dismiss the husband. If there is one broad and palpable result of Christianity, which we ought to regard as precious, it is that it has placed the seal of God Almighty upon the equality of man and woman with respect to everything that relates to these rights; and I will offer the utmost resistance to any attempt to induce this House to adopt a measure which, I believe, would lead to the degradation of woman.

In the year 1912 a royal commission was appointed in England for the purpose of investigating the whole of the divorce problem. It was composed of representatives from all walks of life; representatives, I think, of practically all the major religious denominations. It heard evidence from every part of the country and from all available sources, and on this question of the equality of men and women the members of the committee were unanimous in their judgment. I read now from the report of the commission itself:

> Apart from abstract justice the strongest reason for placing sexes on an equality is that, where two standards exist, there is a tendency to accept the lower for both parties. The social and economic position of women has greatly changed in the last hundred, and even in the last fifty years. The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has given them a new status in regard to property; they engage freely in business and in the professions, and in municipal, educational and Poor Law administrations, and claim equality of treatment with men. In our opinion it is impossible to maintain a different standard of morality in the marriage relations, without creating the impression that justice is denied to women, an impression that must tend to lower the respect in which the marriage law is held by women.

The commission reported to the House definitely, as follows:

> Our conclusion is that no satisfactory solution of the problem which is raised as to the personal relations between husband and wife can be found, except by placing them on an equal footing, and by declaring that, whatever grounds are permitted to a husband for obtaining a divorce from his wife, the same grounds shall be available to a wife in a suit against her husband.

That was the judgment of a royal commission in England in 1912 after some two or three years of the most careful investigation.

Then, in addition to the broad objection on conscientious grounds, the suggestion may be urged that here is the Parliament of Canada available to people alike from every province of the Dominion—to the wife as well as the husband. My answer to that is: I am not sure that the Parliament of Canada should properly concern itself with the granting of divorces. It seems to me that is a function which might more properly be reserved for the courts. But consider the position of a woman who wishes to appeal to parliament to grant her a divorce. Deprived of her husband's support she is likely to be penniless. But in order to properly place her case before parliament she must face a large expenditure. I think that $210 is the initial expense, payable to the Senate, for publication, expensive advertising and other charges of that character. Then she must come to Ottawa and bring her witnesses here. She must also secure legal assistance to present her case. One can readily see that the charge upon this unfortunate woman, especially if she comes from a long distance—as she must, coming from western Canada—is such that in very, very few cases indeed is the woman in a position to avail herself of the opportunity. Therefore I think our plain duty in reference to these four western provinces is to grant this relief.

My bill does not seek to disturb the situation in the eastern provinces, does not seek to allow the granting of divorce in Ontario or Quebec further than is allowed at the present time, and does not ask to change the relationship in the Maritime provinces; it simply asks that the woman shall be entitled in the four western provinces to claim her divorce before the courts of those provinces on the grounds of adultery. The divorce law under which our four provinces now operate is the English law as it stood in 1870, but England has changed her law now. In that year a woman was given the right by the Parliament of the United Kingdom to claim a divorce on the ground of adultery alone. That is all I am asking by this bill.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, since last session, since this matter was brought up in parliament last year, I have received resolutions—hundreds of resolutions—from women's organizations approving of this principle. I have received them from the locals of the United Farm Women of Alberta and the other provinces. I have received resolutions of a similar character from the Local Council of Women of my city, and I understand the National Council of Women have made representations along that line to the Prime Minister himself. Hundreds of women's organizations, not only women's organizations but men's organizations also in western Canada, have approved of the principle of this bill. And so I think parliament should now in this case constitute itself a true reflection of what matured public opinion is, at least in western Canada. I therefore recommend to the House that the second reading of this bill be now agreed to.

Mr. C. A. FOURNIER (Bellechasse): Should this legislation be enacted, one cannot help but realize that the tragic extent to which we condone the loosening of the marriage tie is a lowering sign of our times, a great modern evil, a false reasoning threatening our best institutions, striking at our noblest hopes.

Although this bill does not challenge the convictions and feelings of the people whom I have the honour to represent, it involves a general principle that for my part, as a member of this House, I cannot see submitted to parliament without registering my protest. And in so doing, Sir, I ask you and hon. gentlemen to accept my remarks as a starter to establish a fulcrum for reform in voicing righteous sentiments and as a live coal from faith's altar to touch the community's conscience and energize into determined action a purpose long latent in every good heart—the heart that desires that the evil of divorce, with all the wickedness it implies and all the wretchedness it entails, should wither away like the short-lived, fraudulent affections that foster it and linger only as a memory of what was once a mockery of Christian faith, and live and love.

What trespass have we committed, of what sin are we guilty, that we have to face the accusation of divorce at this session? Think of the harm that infects the divorced home, the deceit and defection, the misery without measure, sorrows innumerable, wasted lives, perverted careers, children bereft, their sacred rights of parents' united care parceled out or denied them, husband and wife divided, not by exalted death but by a dry decision, whether of courts or parliament. To what degree this harm is hindering the better impulse of the race, to what extent the sorrows of law widowers and law-widowed wives and forsaken children is increasing, no one knows.

Mr. SHAW: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman?—divorce is not a disease, divorce is a remedy for a disease.

Mr. FOURNIER: In the very case now before the House the remedy sought is for a few affected ones; but the law is offered to all. To what degree this harm is hindering the better impulse of the race, to what extent the sorrows of law widowers and law-widowed wives and forsaken children are increasing, no one knows. To what degrading depth lies the evil which accompanies that harm and sorrow, no one can tell. Legalized lechery, adultery by due process of law, concubinage upheld by the constitution, all aspects of present day divorce, being sanctioned, flourishing in rank growth and their foul affects rise, like the exhalations of a noisome slough, which scatters to the winds the propagating plague that poisons the nation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask whether in the opinion of the hon. member, and under these circumstances, or under any circumstances, it is right for this parliament to pass a divorce bill?

Mr. FOURNIER: No.

Mr. SPENCER: Has the hon. member ever protested the passage of any divorce bill in this House?

Mr. FOURNIER: That is exactly what I am now trying to do, and if my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience and listen quietly to what I have to say I shall give him some sentiments to take home with him. Sir, I have not the distinction of belonging to the legal fraternity, but I have no hesitation in declaring from my seat in this House that divorce is contrary to all authority. It is contrary, first, to the law of nature, from which all stable laws must come. I speak not of the nature of brutes, which couple themselves by hazard, but of the nature of men, and as a man speaking to manly men. In the first line of the first page of the law of nature you will find the institution of marriage, which existed before all society. It is anterior and superior to all laws. Civil law can regulate marriage, but marriage is not a simple contract; and the first cry of natural law came from the first cradle. Even Jeremy Bentham, an apostle of divorce, has said:

Marriage for life is the best assorted to the wants of families and the most favourable to individuals.

Marriage is a contract of natural law, unique in its essence. Civil law can regulate it, but never dissolve it.

Divorce is contrary to morals, which all stable laws must respect, follow and sustain. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, can you put morality into marriage by injecting into it a sufficient quantity of legalized adultery? Our law is based on the divorce law in England. Divorce was first granted here for grave cause, and it was looked upon then as a tragedy. To-day it has reached the point of comedy, if not of farce. An hon. gentleman speaking a moment ago referred to England. Does he know that the Protestant Bishop of Rochester said one day to Lord Mulgrave that for ten divorces on the ground of adultery, nine were prepared by the husband with some obliging fellow who would look for Milady and prepare proofs and testimonies for submission to the court of justice? Can you dream of a more immoral law than that which transforms vice into an instrument of procedure and gives it a judicial premium?

Divorce is contrary to politics—that word so dishonoured is interpreted here not in the usual sense which we give to it while speaking of that eternal and confused skirmish disputed between the government and the people; but in its high and useful significance, as the science of keeping the nation in good health. Modern nations drink politics as they drink coffee; they cannot get along without it. The Chinese prefer opium.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would ask the hon. member this question: Is not provision for divorce included in the British North America Act?

Mr. FOURNIER: I will answer my hon. friend in a few minutes. Governments ought to have only one mission in dealing with civilized society, namely, to establish order and promote the common welfare by a just distribution of rights and duties. A government is, by its fidelity in fulfilling its mission, the artisan of its good fortune and glory, as it is by its incapacity, its weakness and its prevarications, the source of its own ruin. The duty of a legislator is to recognize marriage as the first of human institutions. A law which in some way regulates evil and consequently admits it, a law which manipulates disorder to manufacture order, and which uses the shining folds of the nuptial dress to drape vice's shoulders, is a law of masquerade and nothing else.

Divorce is also contrary to religion, which is the principle of everything on earth. Christianity raised man above his ignorance and corruption, purified his nature, rendered his will firmer. It taught the world that duty and love, sacrifice and liberty, are one thing under different aspects, and it gave to the individual, by him to the family and by the family to society, virtue which is force, and force which is liberty.

Divorce also wounds and breaks the hearts of many. It ruins the home; it destroys the happiness and sanctity of married life; it depreciates the dignity of womanhood, for she runs the risk of being deserted after having ministered to the pleasures of man. It also wounds the innocent heart of the child and ruins its future prospects. Needless to say, the love of home is eternal; it is co-extensive with the life of the human race; it came with the first and will go out with the last. Home implies affection for others, and besides, it provides the incentive of progress. And being a source of religion, it is the origin of unselfishness; and this, incredible as it may seem, has been the germ of state and political growth.

Divorce constitutes the gravest menace to our institutions, of which home is the very foundation. Home! Who can estimate its sacredness, its tender associations, or the flood of fond memories which its very mention evokes in the mind of the storm-tossed mariner of life? Who knows? Perhaps in prison; perhaps when far away upon a sick-bed, tossed with fever, or when embittered with the reverses of fate, with fortune, friends and hope all gone; perhaps when suffering beneath a cold world's scorn; then the thought of home steals before the mental vision of the weary wanderer and he trembles to tears as he hears again the loving accents of mother's voice and learns once more those never-to-be-forgotten lessons of goodness acquired at her knee.

Home is the verdant spot of recollection; palms and a fountain in a burning desert; a fragrant flower about which like busy bees cling tenaciously the fondest memories of affection, grief oppressed—

Deep as first love and full of all regret.

—as the great Tennyson has so truly said. Thus does home arouse the soul and strike the chord of love, of father, mother, sisters, friends. Nothing but death can quench that strain. What loving and never-dying sentiment binds us indissolubly with our home! How can we eradicate from memory the hallowed place wherein the incense of morning and evening sacrifice rose to the Almighty, the sweet savour of family worship.

Think of the bride, twice wedded, walking the earth smilingly, knowing that still alive upon its surface are two men who have partaken with her of the sacred feast that only one should feed his soul upon. Perhaps this divorce-mill, second-time bride may attend a party somewhere and there behold both her husbands hale and hearty, and she will look upon these once inviolate companions of her connubial hours, and perhaps she will give a hand to each linked in the festive dance. What a spectacle in a civilized world! And we members of parliament are asked to say that that is beautiful!

What shall be said of the children of divorce? God pity them! They will be forced to grow up in the world deprived of the maternal love. I ask hon. gentlemen before they assent to such a bill as this to think of the scenes of childhood, to think of home, never-forgotten, to think of the shrine of the dearest days, the tenderest of recollections, the treasury of our choicest memories, the place that was illumed by mother's smile. As one great poet says, speaking of the youth in the home:

> Ask
> The little child what is home. You will find > That to him it is the world. He > Knows no other. Father's love, mother's smile,
> Sister's embrace, brother's welcome, those > Throw about his home an heavenly
> Halo, and make it to him all-attractive;
> As their home is to the angels. Home!
> It is the blessed spot wherein the prattling child
> Pours out its plaints to mama; and it is the grave
> Of all his sorrows. The placid place
> Where griefs are banished quite and sobs are soothed
> By the sweet lullaby of fond mother's voice.

Such is the home of happy childhood, such is the recollection of the scenes of innocent and happy childhood, and intervening years cannot shut out the deep vibration of those harmonies that tell of faith unsullied and abiding hope.

Sir, what is the remedy for divorce? My own opinion is that you do not have to go to Calgary to get it. It is not far to seek. We must return to the old faith, to the teachings under which this land has grown, favoured beyond all other lands; we must get back to the simple beliefs and to the steadfast faith, to the recognition of the religious undercurrent of life which bears all of worth it has. If a married couple find that they have made a mistake, that couple must suffer for the good of society. It is but another instance of our sentimental morbidity, a product of an individualistic age that we listen to those who claim that an unhappily married couple must be released for remarriage, even if to help them individually the sanctity of the common home and family must be destroyed. The lack of religious recognition in marriages of to-day is a thing of great concern, for when the inevitable trials come, when the matrimonial barque is beset by storms and tempests, one very present help in time of trouble is utterly denied the bewildered matrimonial mariners.

Marriages are made too easily. There is too much deceit and humbug in marriages to-day. If marriage is entered into as a civil contract, it is the lowering of the rite in the minds of all those who acquiesce in such a mechanical and materialistic procedure. If marriage be a civil contract only, it loses half its binding power. We see daily the failure and inadequacy of the civil machinery of life. Laws are imperfect—witness that we have to amend at every session; governments are often a farce and a reproach. We do not regard our obligations to our country as profoundly as we should—witness the reluctance and evasion of the income-tax payers. And if civil obligations are thus of light authority to us, what is to hinder the regarding of marriage, if it is merely a civil act, as being as unjust an imposition as our money payments to the state? Let but the first real disagreement come after the radiance of the honeymoon has sobered down to the garish light of day, and husband and wife are apt to ask the question: "Why should I be bound? What is the marital faithfulness but a load, imposed like taxpaying and jury duty, which every man gets out of if he can, and no one really censures him? The minister who united us did the act dryly and mechanically, and pocketed the fee. What incentive did he give us for not emulating his attitude? The state gave us a license to be man and wife, but what soul has the state?"

Sir, the law, whatever else happens, should stand for the home, teaching its sanctity, insisting on its preservation. Laws cannot do much towards the remedying of the divorce evil; its only reformation must come through home influence, schools, churches and individual conscience. Reform cannot be implanted into the human breast by legislative enactment, but only by an overpowering sentiment and conviction. The home is the first of human institutions. Firm and reliable principles are the result of the home—the Christian home—not only so, but greatness in any form is there enhanced. The excellent in every calling, statesmen, ministers, poets, warriors, ascribe their success to the impulse that was given them in the home. Moral excellence is invariably associated in the superior mind with home and ability to cherish home —the mark that divides the people into superior and inferior. Wandering tribes have no fixed habitation, and hence they cannot cultivate the solid virtues, such as citizenship, patient and continuous labour, and the setting up of steadfast institutions.

Again. We had a war, and in the fiery crucible of that tremendous struggle much that was vain, much that was unworthy was shrivelled up. It is not necessary to delineate the heroism or the horrors of the war, nor to point out right or wrong; but at a time when fathers and sons were offering their lives, and mothers and daughters were enduring the sorrows that were infinitely harder to bear, the Canadian home was at its highest and noblest. It was a sanctuary from which went faith, fortitude and sacrifice and devotion to preserve the home against our embattled enemies. Its atmosphere was pure and rarified, and our people were on the heights amid death and wounds and the roar of arms. Are we going to let the divorce evil invade our homes, which are the foundation of our institutions. The opportunities for material gain have led away our people to cut down the forests, ravish the mines and impoverish the soil, to get rich quick. We are doing everything with the regrettable result that unseemly customs and opinions have been allowed to spring up and prosper. Of these, divorce is the greatest and most menacing.

Where, Mr. Speaker, are the Dominion Alliance, the Anti-Cigarette League, the Anti-Betting League, the Methodist Alliance, the Women's Christian Association, the Referendum Committee, the Social Service Council, and similar organizations, which have for so many years subjected the country to an orgy of moral uplifting, and who have striven for salvation by statute, to legislate the people into holiness? Will the evil that strikes at the root and foundation of the nation, the morality of the home, which is a thousand times worse than anything battered and hammered by our moral uplifters, go unchallenged in an attempt to get legislative sanction? Is it possible that the only squeak we may get from the uplifters will be for them to tell us that we may go to hell if we buy a newspaper on Sunday, that we may go to hell if we bet fifty cents on a poor old sorrel horse that has the heaves, but that there is nothing wrong in having a Madame X on Monday and a different Madame X on Thursday? What is the taking of a drink, the smoking of cigarettes or attending a horse race, compared to the breaking up of a Christian home?

[Mr. Fournier.]

In closing Mr. Speaker, let me say that divorce is an unstable thing. It is the essence of unrest and irritation and impermanence, it stands for discontent; and therefore it should not prevail in our land—unless, indeed, our people have permanently deteriorated; unless they have morally taken a long step back; unless they can no longer be aroused by appeals to their fondest recollections; unless they have ceased to love and reverence home, sweet home.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to express publicly my disapproval of what I consider to be an evil in our national life, namely, the divorce evil. Perhaps it is not a disease, but in my estimation it is certainly a national social evil. I have listened with much interest to the remarks of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw). I think he is perfectly fair in the arguments he has put forth and I do not doubt his sincerity in endeavouring to rectify what appears to be a wrong as between the two sexes in that there is not an equality of grounds upon which they may both stand in our four western provinces. I found my mind assenting to his arguments on the grounds of fairness and reasonableness. I was also an interested listener to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier) and I find my heart assenting to the sentiments to which he gave expression—and I am rather of the opinion that our heart sentiments are more weighty and of more consequence than our mere mental assent; therefore I find myself agreeing very largely with the arguments of the hon. member for Bellechasse.

I can understand, Mr. Speaker, that there are certain cases where perhaps not divorce but annulment of marriage is advisable. Cases have come under my personal observation in which the annulment of the marriage contract is advisable and remarriage permissible. Such cases are very rare; non-consummation of marriage is perhaps the only reasonable ground for that course. We do have such cases in our national life. Outside of these my own opinion is that there are also a great many cases where incompatibility of temperament or for other reasons two cannot agree and it is necessary that they should separate. In such a case I think separation should be allowed, but it should be a judicial separation and should not carry with it the right to marry again. Or, if we choose to grant a bill of divorce, as we have done so many times since I have been in this parliament, we should amend our legislation in such a way as to take away the right to remarry.

The hon. member (Mr. Fournier) made mention of legalized adultery. Mr. Speaker, that is what it amounts to when remarriage following divorce is permitted. Marriage is a divine institution. Man when he was first created had a helpmate created for him also, and it was divinely instituted that these two should come together in the marriage contract. We recognize the divine sanction of the marriage contract by having the marriage ceremony performed under the cloak of the church; we acknowledge that it is a divine institution. If we are going to follow out that line of reasoning we should also realize that it is divinely ordained that "whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery." If remarriage is permitted following divorce, adultery is committed and legalized.

Mr. GOOD: I would like to ask the hon. member if in the ordinary meaning of divorce we do not imply the right to remarry?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I think that is correct, but I think that our law as it stands is not a proper enactment—that is my own personal opinion. We grant the right to remarry, but in so doing we legalize adultery. I am prepared to admit that it is not fair to put upon the woman in the four western provinces restrictions that are not placed upon the man. But there is a way around that. One hon. member made mention of a reasonable way around that, and his remarks were rather made light of. But in all fairness, if divorce is a national social evil, if it is something that we wish to suppress rather than to encourage, should we not place on the man the same restrictions that are now placed on the woman, in the four western provinces, namely, that in addition to adultery it should be necessary to prove cruelty or desertion for a period of two years?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it not so that in many cases the man could prove cruelty?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: In any case it should be just as easy for the husband to prove cruelty on the part of the wife as for the wife to prove cruelty on the part of the husband. I presume that in some women at least there is a streak of the old Adam that is not good, just the same as there is in some men.

I seriously think that our divorce legislation should be reconsidered in this parliament. It has been more than amusing to me, it has caused me to think very seriously, to sit here during the past three sessions and see the divorce mill grinding out divorce after divorce until the number reached over one hundred for two provinces of this Dominion. If we had the statistics for the nine provinces I am sure that our divorces would number more than five hundred for the past few years. During the last eight, nine or ten years there has been a very great increase in the number of divorces granted in Canada. I do not know whether there is much sympathy in this House towards such a condition or not, but personally I feel that it is a menace to our national life that we should unitedly stand against. We have but to look to our cousins to the south of the international line, at least in the western portion of that country, to find conditions existing which are not very enviable. It was my privilege to have in my home some few years ago a lady from the western states, and in our conversation she stated that she had been divorced three times, and she glibly remarked that if this man did not suit her she would divorce him and get another one. It had come to be with her a sort of ordinary thing. That is the kind of thing that we as a young nation are up against. The citizen is given the impression that he may quite properly say, "Oh, well, I am going into the marriage contract, I will take a chance, and if it does not suit me, I can easily jump out and try it over again." I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that such laxity should not be permitted, and if we in this parliament can raise the bars and make still more restrictive the restrictions, I feel that we would be doing a great benefit to our national life. If it is to be suggested as one hon. member remarked, that we have divorce and are not likely to get away from it, then I would suggest that we seriously consider the proposition of taking the celebration of the marriage contract away from the cloak of the church and put it under the judiciary. I feel that that would be a serious step, but if the marriage contract is going to be considered as lightly as heretofore it has been, and if we in this parliament are going to sanction such lightness of consideration, then in all fairness to what I consider the sacredness of the marriage contract it should be performed by the judiciary, by a magistrate, a justice of the peace, or some other civil authority, and taken away entirely from the cloak of the church. Believing as I do, Mr. Speaker, I could not sanction the bill as it is before the House, and I feel compelled to vote against it.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I almost hesitate to say a few words on this subject after the very eloquent address that we have had from the hon. member for Belle-chasse (Mr. Fournier). With most of the sentiments he expressed as to the sanctity, the holiness, the happiness, and beauty of the home I thoroughly agree. I am sure that all of us would regret very deeply anything tending to make less sacred the sanctity of the home. But while agreeing with the sentiments my hon. friend expressed, I cannot reach the same conclusions that he came to.

It seems to me that we are not discussing the question of divorce or no divorce, but the question of equality of rights as between the sexes in the matter of divorce. We have a divorce law now, and what the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) is bringing before the House is the desirability of putting men and women on an equal footing in this matter. That is the question we have to consider. We know that in the past laws have discriminated against women; women have suffered from disabilities and injustices, which are now gradually being removed. A sense of fair play and justice in the laws relating to women is much more in evidence now than it was in former times. I am one of those who believe that a great many of those laws placing disabilities on women did not result from selfishness on the part of man; it was not his desire to do an injustice to woman; they originated from a belief that women were less capable of taking care of themselves and of property, and it was with a view to safeguarding women in that respect that they were not accorded the privileges given to men. I believe these laws arose from man's desire to protect women from themselves and from those who might have designs upon them. However, as the years pass we are realizing more and more that women are intellectually the equal of men, and are quite capable of taking care of themselves, and consequently we feel inclined to place them on entirely the same footing as men.

Mr. VIEN: Instead of increasing the facilities for women getting divorce, would not my hon. friend be favourable to decreasing the facilities for men getting it?

Mr. FORKE: Unfortunately human nature is what it is. Were it possible to have men and women all willing and able to create happy homes, I would say abolish divorce immediately. I am not in favour of divorce; I am sorry to see it increasing; I do not want to see further facilities for divorce provided; but I do want to remove the disabilities under which the women in western Canada suffer in this respect as compared with the men. I hope the day will never come when Canada will have as high a percentage of divorce as prevails on the other side of the line. I think a great deal can be done towards making happy marriages by education, by teaching our young people just exactly what marriage means. The hon. member for Bellechasse has said that it was a spiritual relationship. I believe it is so, and if there were more teaching given in the homes of the sanctity of marriage, and of the tremendous evil of divorce, more consideration might be given and more care taken in the forming of marriages. Speaking from that point of view, I hope it will never be very easy to procure a divorce in this Dominion of Canada. Nevertheless, knowing the depths to which humanity, men and women, may fall on occasion, I think perhaps there can be no other solution to the problem than divorce, in order to settle the evil. I would not like anyone to think for a moment that I would say one word against the sanctity of the home. The home is the foundation of our civilization. All that is best and noblest and sweetest in human nature is to be found in a happy home. It is only from the point of view of bringing about equality and justice as between the sexes that I would be prepared to support the bill that has been introduced by the hon. member for West Calgary.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): This is not a government measure in any way, and I am going to express my own views upon it; they are binding only upon myself.

The Privy Council has decided as my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) has said that the British law on divorce as it was on the 15th of July, 1870, applies to the four western provinces, and therefore the act as it stood at that time—the law was originally enacted in 1857—with all the amendments down to 1870, applies to the four western provinces. My hon. friend is right when he says that the grounds upon which a woman can get a divorce in the courts of these provinces is widely different from the grounds on which a man can obtain a divorce. Apart from the ground of adultery, the woman must prove that there has been desertion for a period of two years, and as my hon. friend (Mr. Shaw) says it is the cruelty that is defined by the English jurisprudence of older days that applies—it is cruelty of the most severe kind which is likely to injure health or limb or life.

My hon. friend also said that under section 91 of the British North America Act it is the Parliament of Canada that has jurisdiction in divorce matters. Of course, it is still open for any wife in the western provinces to come to this parliament and ask for a divorce on the same grounds as a husband. Mere infidelity would be sufficient to obtain a divorce. There is doubtless an anomaly in the first place in the fact that a woman cannot get a divorce on the same grounds as a man. There is also an anomaly—I admit it—in the fact that the grounds upon which divorce can be secured in this parliament are not the same as the grounds upon which divorce can be secured in the courts. I fully understand the motives which actuate my hon. friend (Mr. Shaw), and I respect them; nevertheless, feeling as I do, and having the opinion which I hold on the matter of divorce, I am sorry that it is impossible for me personally to vote for the proposed measure. If, as I believe, divorce is an evil, I do not think I could conscientiously vote for a measure that would have the effect of making it easier to obtain or to spread the evil more. If one believes that a certain food is a poison, one cannot consistently vote to have the poison distributed more freely or more easily. However this is my own view in the matter. I have risen simply for the purpose of stating what the law is on this subject. The vote I shall give I shall give conscientiously; I cannot support the measure but I fully understand the hon. member's reasons for bringing it forward.

Mr. GOOD: How would the minister propose to remove the existing inconsistencies and inequalities?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps by accepting the suggestion of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) and restricting relief on one side while not enlarging it on the other.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister bring in a bill to that effect?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot promise that to my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is my hon. friend's duty as Minister of Justice?

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that every member of the House who does not belong to a communion which feels that divorce is a moral wrong will respect the conscientious belief of those who do, and we could not expect any other action from them. But I see nothing in this bill which imposes divorce upon anybody. No member of at least two great churches which reprehends divorce, who is faithful to his own communion, will seek divorce. If a man or a woman who belongs to a church which forbids divorce seeks the assistance either of this legislature or of any court, for that purpose, that person has something to settle with the church to which she or he belongs, and that is a spiritual and moral question into which I do not think this parliament would be prepared to enter. With reference to people who belong to churches which tolerate divorce there must be some other attitude to take in public life. After all, divorce for those people is a matter of degree; and I entirely agree with the leader (Mr. Forke) of the party which sits to my left in that I would like to see divorce minimized as greatly as possible. I would not willingly say one word, or take one action in this House or outside of it, which would tend in the direction of divorce. Neither would I nor any other hon. member of this House, ever wish to break up a home. But it is a far cry from breaking up a home to keeping a women in a lingering hell during the whole of her life, and I am prepared to vote—with safeguards and with proper restrictions—to release a woman from a life which is damnable and which ought not to be inflicted upon her. Take the people from the province of Quebec who do not believe in divorce and whose church forbids it. They can, if they are false to their church, come to this very parliament and, either by abstaining from voting or tacitly consenting, agree to legislation that is exactly in the line of this bill, but without any of the safeguards attaching to this particular measure, because the Senate is not controlled, as far as I am aware, by any particular rule although I think it acts in analogy to the English divorce practice. The hon. member has introduced a measure—

Mr. VIEN: Will not my hon. friend admit that when any divorce bill is brought to this House those of us who do not participate in the debate do not give a "tacit consent" to the measure but give a "tacit dissidence"?

Mr. BAXTER: I have not caught my hon. friend's expression. I freely admit that hon. members who from religious convictions are opposed to divorce sit in this House and feel that they are not participating in it in any way and who would feel themselves touched, perhaps, with moral guilt if they did.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend said that we "tacitly consented" to divorce legislation. We never did "tacitly consent", we "tacitly objected".

Mr. BAXTER: There is no objection taken, and I say that no one protests against this legislation.

Mr. VIEN: It is a tacit protest.

Mr. BAXTER: Remarks have come from both sides of the House and from very different angles of Christendom to-day against this measure, but the people who have made those remarks have never protested in this House against the passing of a single divorce bill. That is a fact.

Mr. VIEN: If my hon. friend will allow me further. I would have registered my protest every time a divorce bill was brought up but I understood it was clearly recognized by all members that by abstaining from voting we did not concur in the legislation.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): "Silence gives consent".

Mr. BAXTER: I am quite satisfied that my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Vien) does not feel that he in any way consents or in any way participates in this matter. I am also quite satisfied that my hon. friend from Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) has made no protest, and I rather think from his remarks that he has not quite understood the effect of the legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Every time a divorce bill is adopted in this House, it is carried on division.

Mr. BAXTER: That is quite right. I do not want to raise any question about that at all. I am quite content with that attitude, and I am not trying to throw any reflection on any hon. member on account of voting or not voting.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. member please correct his statement that we "tacitly consent" to it? He is wrong in that statement.

Mr. BAXTER: If I said that, and if withdrawing it will do any good, allow me to withdraw it. That is not the atmosphere I wish to get into. It is far outside my remarks. Referring to the divorce bills that come before us, sometimes one glances at the evidence, and I think as a rule that hon. members, whatever their convictions, probably must feel that there are many cases where the woman is unfairly dealt with; and where, if her religious scruples do not oblige her to remain bound, she ought to be freed from living in what I have already described as a hell. That is very far from letting down the bars to such an extent that there would be indiscriminate divorce for trivial causes. That is something to which I would never consent, and to which I think common sense and intelligent people will never consent. But what is the difficulty about this bill when it only permits, and it does not go a bit farther, the residents of the four western provinces to obtain precisely the same relief—by means of a court properly constituted for the purpose of hearing evidence more minutely probably than the Senate committee would hear it,—as would be granted to those residents of the western provinces by the Senate if they came here at considerable expense and a great deal of travelling. There can be no matter of principle in the length of a railway journey or the size of a solicitor's bill. If a thing is wrong it must be wrong whether it cost ten dollars or five hundred dollars. I have known of some cases, and they have come so near to my own life that I speak with the sympathy born of knowledge for women who have had to drag the chains of a vile husband through their lives, and I am prepared to stand for the equality of the sexes in this matter, and therefore I support this measure as good legislation.

5 p.m.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Would the hon. member allow the parties to remarry?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The Senate does.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): There is a great difference between separating them and allowing them to marry again.

Mr. BAXTER: To my mind that is a moral question for the parties themselves, and I think each person's morals must be decided according to individual conscience. There are at least two great churches which prohibit divorce and remarriage. If a person gives adherence to the doctrines of those churches then he or she will not seek to remarry, but it is a question for each individual and it is not to my mind in any sense a question for legislation.

I wish to point out to the hon. member who has introduced this bill (Mr. Shaw) that in my judgment there may possibly be a doubt as to the constitutionality of the fourth section. This parliament has jurisdiction over marriage and divorce, but the procedure of the provincial courts is entirely a matter for the provinces. I think that the section which refers to the service of the process would be entirely a matter for the court itself to regulate; and would scarcely be a matter for this parliament to attempt to deal with. On the substantial question that underlies the second and third sections of the bill, I feel that it is only fair to put the sexes upon an equality and that it is only fair to have the same law in the four western provinces that we have in the Maritime provinces and the same law that would be administered by the Senate. It obligates no person to violate a code of their own morality and seek divorce where they believe divorce is immoral. It simply grants a sort of justice to those people who do not believe that when there are grave reasons for breaking the marriage tie they are morally guilty in seeking the annulment of that tie.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): If this bill becomes law it does not in my opinion recognize divorce, does not establish divorce, and does not say it is a good and praiseworthy thing. As I view it, it simply says that the injured wife shall have the same standing and the same rights before the courts of the western provinces that the injured husband has now, and that appeals to my sense of justice. I do not think we are opening the gates to divorce by legislation of this kind or that we are encouraging it in any way. If I thought we were I would vote against the bill, but I simply cannot vote to place a wife in an inferior position, and say she shall not have the same rights before the courts of this country as a husband has. Therefore, I will either not vote at all or vote for the bill. I intend to do my duty as a member of parliament, and therefore I will remain for the division.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): If the proposed legislation should have the effect suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) not to increase the possibility of a greater number of divorces in the future, I would be quite willing to let it pass at least with a tacit silence, to be logical and consistent with myself. But my hon. friend says: If I were sure that this was going to increase the number of divorces, or increase the facilities to obtain divorces, I would vote against it. I think a minute's reflection will convince my hon. friend that that is absolutely the effect of the bill. If this bill becomes law not only will a man in the western provinces be allowed to obtain a divorce on grounds that are absolutely recognized to-day, but this right will be given to a lady as well.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why not?

Mr. VIEN: I will come to that in a minute. I am now touching the question of the number of divorces, whether it will increase the number or give a greater facility to obtain a divorce, whether the evil will be greater or will be less, or will be the same. No man who gives a moment's serious reflection to the piece of legislation which we are now studying will fail to realize immediately that if it were enacted the number of divorces as well as the facilities for obtaining them would be greater than they are at present.

Mr. HOEY: In order to substantiate the truth of his statement, the hon. member should give us the figures with respect to the Maritime provinces and of western Canada.

Mr. VIEN: I am not talking of the Maritime provinces but of the four western provinces, and I do not need to go into any definite details. Why is this legislation before us? Is it not brought forward for the purpose of enabling certain persons who cannot obtain divorce to secure it more easily than is now possible?

Mr. BOYS: Is it not purely and absolutely a financial question? The applicant comes to this House and gets the divorce, if she has money, but if she has not sufficient money to come here she does not get it.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend will agree with me that at present there is no federal legislation respecting divorce; there is no law of divorce on our federal statutes.

Mr. BOYS: No, but the recognised custom is that people who can come to this House may get a divorce on the ground, with very few exceptions, of adultery only. There are a few isolated exceptions, but that is the recognized ground; and this legislation enables the applicant to get relief in the province in which she lives, which she can now get in Ottawa if she has the money.

Mr. VIEN: The fact is that we have no federal divorce law.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Every divorce bill that we pass here is a federal law.

Mr. VIEN: They are private bills in every instance; there is no standing federal legislation on divorce. There is no public law on the matter. Every private bill is judged on its own merits by the Senate, and every application for divorce must be separately presented to parliament. But if this legislation is carried there will be in future a general law governing divorces in the provinces concerned. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me on this question have all recognized that divorce is a social evil, and they have suggested that if there were anything in their power that could be done to restrict rather than to enlarge the facilities with which divorce is obtained, they would do it. Well, to achieve the aim and purpose of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), it seems to me that this legislation which is now before us is not fitted. The hon. member wishes to equalize the facilities with which women can obtain divorce, with the facilities that appertain to men. He says that there is an inequality, that there is an injustice, in that men are allowed divorce on grounds which are denied women. Now, if the only object of the promotor of the bill is to remove that injustice, there is another method which he could pursue; and if he presented to parliament a bill to put that method into effect, I think it would receive unanimous support. Instead of increasing the number of divorces that now obtain, instead of facilitating the means of obtaining divorce and so opening the gate wider to this evil, the hon. gentleman might bring forward a piece of legislation to put women on an equality with men in this matter, not by increasing the grounds on which women may receive divorce but by diminishing the grounds on which men now obtain it. If the object of this legislation is not to open wider the gates to this social evil, let the hon. member do as I suggest and in this way put women on an equal footing with men.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand the hon. member to say that he would vote for a divorce law which would grant divorce equally to women and men in the western provinces, or anywhere else, on the ground of adultery?

Mr. VIEN: The hon. member does not grasp what I said. If the hon. member for West Calgary will introduce a piece of legislation to reduce the number of reasons for which divorce may be asked by men in the western provinces to the number of reasons which are allowed to women, I shall vote for that legislation, on the ground that it would tend to close the door to divorce, rather than to enlarge the facilities by which divorce may be obtained.

Mr. PUTNAM: Would that not mean in the concrete that the husband could get divorce only on the ground of adultery on the part of the wife, plus proof of cruelty exercised by the wife against him, or plus proof of desertion?

Mr. VIEN: I would vote for such a measure.

Mr. PUTNAM: It would be absurd.

Mr. VIEN: I do not know that it would be absurd. Divorce is a social evil—

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Does the hon. member not know that he cannot vote for divorce and stay in the Catholic church?

Mr. VIEN: The hon. member does not grasp my remark. My hon. friend (Mr. Putnam) asked me if I would vote for a measure which would reduce the grounds on which divorce is now sought. So far as reducing the number of grounds on which divorce may be given is concerned, I am quite willing to vote for a measure that would accomplish this end. The fact of the matter is that I am ready to vote for a measure which would close the door altogether against divorce, but if I cannot obtain that full measure of restriction I am ready to take what I can get towards that end. However, I shall leave for a future occasion the discussion of these canonical questions with my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil).

The social evil of divorce is recognized by all concerned, and the more we can close the door against it the better, I think, we shall serve the greatest interests of our country, the interests of the population at large. I am quite in accord with the hon. gentleman who said that he was willing to grant annulment of marriage in some cases and separation in other cases. But I think it would be in the interests of social welfare to close the door altogether to divorce.

Now, some hon. gentlemen have a great deal of pity for those unfortunate men and women whose marriages are such a failure that they want to separate in order to put an end to their unhappiness. I think it is better that a few persons who have married imprudently should suffer the consequences of their folly rather than encourage hasty marriages by facilitating divorce and so spreading this social evil throughout the country. In our civil law there is the principle of caveat emptor—let the purchaser beware. It seems to me that we should enforce this principle with respect to matrimony; in other words, let those who are contemplating marriage beware.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Ought not that warning to be given equally to husband and to wife?

Mr. VIEN: To both sides of the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would suggest that under present circumstances there is not the same warning given. We are simply seeking to give it to both sides.

Mr. VIEN: I submit, Sir, that if we grant too great facilities to those who have contracted hasty marriages and seek divorce, to that extent we increase the social evil of divorce, and that we would better serve the public interest by leaving a few isolated couples to suffer for their imprudence by refusing them divorce. This evil has become a plague in the United States. If my recollection is correct, in that country to-day there is one divorce for every six or seven marriages. Undoubtedly future generations of the United States will suffer for this state of affairs, and I would sooner see a few of our people unhappy than allow a similar evil to afflict this Dominion.

The hon. gentleman who has introduced this bill (Mr. Shaw) says that it applies only to the four western provinces. Well, a perusal of the bill will prove that he is not correct; the legislation would apply to all the provinces. I would prefer to be a silent dissident on this matter if its scope were restricted to the four western provinces; but it is not.

Mr. BOYS: Will my hon. friend tell me how the bill applies to the province of Ontario?

Mr. VIEN: I do not say that it does now; but nobody can tell us that to-morrow it may not apply to Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. BOYS: I understood my hon. friend to say that this bill would apply to all the provinces.

Mr. VIEN: And it does.

Mr. BOYS: I ask him, how could it apply to the province of Ontario when we have no divorce law in that province?

Mr. VIEN: It does not to-day; it may to-morrow. It introduces on our statute books the law of divorce, a law which does not exist there to-day. My hon. friend may look at the federal statutes and he will not find among them any law of divorce. This bill, if enacted, would be an acknowledgment of what we consider to be a wrong principle.

Mr. BOYS: I do not contend for a moment that there is any divorce law governing the Parliament of Canada; it is wide open; but I have made the assertion that according to our practices there is substantially only one ground on which divorce is granted in Canada, and that is adultery. Does my hon. friend disagree with me in that?

Mr. VIEN: No, I do not disagree with my hon. friend on that point, and I do not disagree with him that for the time being this proposed legislation would apply only to the four western provinces,—and indirectly to the Maritime provinces; but I do contend that by enacting this bill we would be accepting a principle against which we feel it is our duty to protest; and I am now protesting against the introduction of any legislation in this House which would increase the facilities for divorce. And that is in answer to those who favour this bill on the ground of sympathy for unfortunate couples who cannot live together happily, and for whom it would be a hardship not to grant divorce.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. gentleman says the House by accepting the bill will accept the principle. Will he just clearly define the principle of the bill?

Mr. VIEN: The principle is given there.

Mr. BROWN: What is it?

Mr. VIEN: That a woman will be able to obtain divorce on all the grounds for which a man can obtain divorce.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Does not the hon. member who put forward the principle of caveat emptor in respect to those contemplating marriage, also believe in that doctrine of equality?

Mr. VIEN: No, I do not. I say women should not obtain divorce on those grounds; and men should not either.

Mr. BROWN: Is not the hon. gentleman confusing the principle of the bill with his own personal principles in regard to divorce?

Mr. VIEN: No, I am not confusing anything. I may not possess that mastery of the English language which would enable me to clearly express my views.

Mr. FORKE: You are doing very well.

Mr. VIEN: This is the only excuse I can offer for not having expressed myself sufficiently clearly to be understood on the other side.

Mr. BROWN: You are doing very well.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: If the husband were required to prove, in addition to adultery, cruelty or desertion, the same as the wife, would not that principle be shown forth as at present embodied in the bill?

Mr. VIEN: Surely; but that is not the principle of the bill. Instead of reducing the grounds on which a husband can claim divorce, it increases the grounds on which a wife can claim it. Therefore the enactment of this bill would in my opinion tend to increase the numer of divorces in future, and it is against that that I protest. I protest also against any addition to our statute books of legislation which would enable anyone in Canada to obtain divorce. There is no such legislation to-day.

Mr. SHAW: I listened with a great deal of interest the other day to my hon. friend describing the British North America Act as a treaty, an arrangement between the provinces and the Dominion. Now, do I understand him to suggest to-day that although divorce is covered by the British North America Act, that part of the treaty must not be operative at all?

Mr. VIEN: I do not understand my hon. friend. I do not see in what way I am touching the British North America Act.

Mr. SHAW: Well, a lot of us can. I want to suggest this. My hon. friend says that he objects to this bill because it deals with the question of divorce and because it would put a divorce law on the statute book. If he respects the British North America Act why does he not vote in favour of this bill, having regard to the fact that there is provision for divorce in the original agreement of confederation?

Mr. VIEN: The British North America Act enables the Parliament of Canada to pass legislation on divorce. But I would oppose any legislation introduced in this parliament in respect of divorce, even though it is within the province of the Parliament of Canada to pass such legislation—I would oppose it on the ground of the principle involved. I contend that it is a wrong principle to introduce legislation enabling the people of Canada to obtain divorce. I would prohibit divorce altogether, not on the ground that it is not within the province of the Parliament of Canada to grant or provide for divorce, but on the ground that it is inadvisable to pass any divorce legislation.

Mr. HUGHES: May I ask the hon. member a question? There are two groups of people in Canada, one made up of those who do not believe in divorce at all and do not practise it much, and the other consisting of those who believe, to some extent at least, in legal divorce. Now, is it fair for those who do not believe in divorce to try to impose their will on the rest of the people and to place the female portion of the rest of the people in an inferior position? I would not be a party to that. I do not believe in divorce myself, but I do believe that where divorce is granted or recognized at all the injured wife should have the same standing and the same rights before the courts that the injured husband has.

Mr. VIEN: I think my hon. friend's question is hardly fair. I am not trying to impose my will on anybody. But sitting in this House as the representative of the county of Lotbiniere I find it my duty to oppose all legislation on divorce, because I consider that it is a serious evil, not only in respect of the section of the country in which I live but in respect of the whole of Canada. I do not take this stand on account of my religious belief, which alone would be enough to prompt it; but as a Canadian citizen and as a representative of the Canadian people having a seat in this House I am convinced that divorce is a social evil; that we should restrict it by all possible means, and that in so doing we would render a great service to our country. I repeat that I do not desire to impose my opinion upon other hon. members of this House, still less should I try to stampede the House, even if I could, into passing legislation which would debar others from expressing different views. I take this attitude not because I do not respect the views of hon. members who differ from me on this question, but because, as I have said, I am opposed to all divorce legislation. I think it is the duty of hon. members to restrict divorce by all means and not to introduce any legislation which will render divorce easier in future.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, as one of the members from British Columbia, which is affected by this legislation, I would like to say a few words on the bill now under consideration.

Those who have taken part in the discussion can be divided into two classes, namely, those who are discussing the principle of divorce and those who are discussing the principle of the bill, which is the matter of the relationship of husband and wife in marital differences of the kind referred to. Throughout the whole of the Christian world, in all Christian countries, the principle of divorce has been established by legislative enactment. I do not know of one country where that is not the case. In seven of the nine provinces of this Dominion the principle of divorce has been accepted, and by acts of the federal parliament the principle of divorce is established for the people of Canada as a whole.

Divorce in many cases is a social evil, but I submit that it is an arbitrary course to classify all those who seek divorce or believe in its principles as condoning an evil in our social system. There are instances where in my judgment divorces are absolutely justified. As one engaged in the practice of law and engaged on occasions in divorce cases, I know personally of individual cases in connection with which no hon. member of this House in the full possession of his senses, to say nothing of his ideas of justice and fair play, would say that a divorce should not be granted.

I do not wish in my few remarks to labour the question of the principle of divorce. As I have mentioned, every Christian country in the civilized world has accepted the principle of divorce. What hon. members are faced with to-day is, in my judgment, a simple question which should be disconnected from their personal views except as they reflect the opinions of the people of the country. It is the simple question whether in those cases where divorce is justified the woman shall be put under a handicap and the man left more or less free. The argument which the last speaker (Mr. Vien) advanced as to the encouragement of divorce does not seem to me to apply in this case. Under the law as it has been stated here, a woman must prove adultery plus cruelty or desertion for two years or upwards. It has been suggested in this debate that the reverse principle should apply; that a man should have to prove adultery and cruelty or desertion for two years or upwards. I do not think that anyone who makes such a suggestion can do so on the merits of the question; he does so only as a medium or method of handicapping divorce. The cruelty which is referred to there is physical cruelty or cruelty affecting the health of the person concerned, and if that principle of law is established a man must be able to show that the woman was guilty of acts of cruelty which threatened his health or his physical well being. The idea is absurd. The proposal as submitted is merely a method of eliminating the principle of divorce. I submit that that principle is not now at issue. The question at issue is a very simple one: whether in a marital case where a divorce by law should be granted, a woman should not have the same rights as a man before the courts of the country and under the law of the land. So far as the portion of the west from which I come is concerned, the overwhelming majority of the people believe that the women should be placed in identically the same position as the man.

Mr. VIEN: Is that equalization the only purpose for which my hon. friend would vote for this legislation?

Mr. LADNER: That is all we are called upon to consider.

Mr. VIEN: Would not my hon .friend, instead of widening the grounds for divorce for women, rather reduce the grounds upon which it could be granted to men?

Mr. LADNER: The suggestion made by the hon. member for reducing the grounds is one made not really with the intention of reducing them, but rather on the principle of doing away with divorce altogether. That is his motive. Rather than carry out the principle of divorce, he would eliminate it.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend says that his only purpose is to put the women on the same footing as the men in the four western provinces. Well, let him put the men on the same footing as the women, and he will then realize his object of equalization.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman did not correctly hear my answer. I said that we are called upon in this bill to consider only the question of putting women on an equality with the men.

Mr. VIEN: Put the men on an equality with the women.

Mr. LADNER: That is not the purpose of the bill.

Mr. VIEN: Let us have it.

Mr. LADNER: The principle is clear. It is to enable the women to get divorce on the ground of adultery, without proving cruelty, and there is a very good reason for that. I have known in my own practice many cases where adultery could be established but where actual physical cruelty could not be established although there had been far greater suffering and torment of mind than actual physical cruelty could inflict, cases where, as one speaker said, home was hell on earth. The principle of this bill is to put the men and the women on an equal basis, rather than have one sex under a serious handicap as compared with the other. That seems to me absolutely fair and equitable, and if the principle of divorce is recognized in this country, I do not see how any hon. gentleman carrying out that principle can refrain from supporting the bill, because it merely enables the women to have equal rights under the law with the men in the matter of divorce.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I said a word on this subject last year, and I would not like this question to go to a vote without repeating some of the objections I then urged.

At the time of confederation divorce existed in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. It did not exist in Ontario and Quebec. The Fathers of Confederation felt that it should not be imposed on the Dominion at large. They recognized the existence of these provincial courts, but they gave to the Parliament of Canada the power to legislate in certain special cases to grant relief, and every bill that is passed by this parliament is worded "An Act for the relief of So-and-So." No direct divorce legislation has ever been passed by this parliament. It would never be accepted I know in my province, and in Ontario there are also very strong objections to it.

I asked at the time of the debate last year for statistics on divorce, and I just want to read these few lines:

> For many years subsequent to confederation the number of divorces granted in Canada was very small; in 1883, thirteen divorces, that being the first year in which the number attained two figures; while 1903, with twenty-one divorces, was the record year up to that time.

If we look back to the war years we find that in 1919 there were 376 divorces granted in Canada; in 1920, 429; in 1921, 548; and in 1922, 544. I have not the complete figures for 1923. At the time this question was before the House before I happened upon the following paragraph, I think in the Ottawa Journal, judging by the type. It shows the effect of the change in the law in England giving women over there the same rights that are sought for them in the western provinces. The cable is dated London, April 25, and reads:

> A striking feature of the forthcoming law term here is the large number of divorce suits brought by wives under the new act which gives women equal rights with men in the matter of ground for divorce, namely, proof of misconduct. There are nearly 600 undefended divorce suits entered on the court lists.

That was the first term after the passing of the new law in England; so the contention that a change in the law will not increase the number of divorces in the west cannot be sustained.

Any woman who has a rightful grievance under the law as it exists now can come to this parliament and be granted relief, and her fees can be remitted; the fees have been remitted in a number of cases, for the Senate committee has that power. No real grievance is allowed now to exist. If the Fathers of Confederation could not agree at the time of confederation to impose divorce on Canada seeing we are so divided on that question, I do not see that we should ask now to pass an act which we have always objected to, and which the Fathers of Confederation also objected to, and bring about a state of affairs such as exists across the line. The hon. member for Vancouver said that all Christian countries had passed divorce legislation. I have often scanned the new testament to find authority for the establishment of divorce, and especially for the remarriage of the divorced party. Every divorce bill that comes into this House, and they have been coming here for the twenty-five years I have been here, always contains a second clause granting the right to marry again. If that clause were not there, would any application ever be made to this parliament?

We know the state of affairs that exists now in the United States, where one divorce occurs out of every seven or eight marriages. Last year in the state of Nevada where Reno is situated there were more divorces than marriages.

Here is a country that does not rank as a Christian country, but in which there are more divorces than marriages. It is a cable from London, published last year:

> London, April 8.—Divorces exceeded marriages in Constantinople during the last year, according to the Daily Mail correspondent. He gives the official figures as 9,259 divorces against 7,974 marriages.

We are all of one mind; no man worthy of sitting in this House would impose an injustice upon women, but there are means known to members of the legal profession in our province, and in other provinces by which a woman now can seek relief and a judicial separation, if necessary. Every time you pick up a newspaper nowadays you find people are making a mockery and a farce of marriage, an advertising scheme with moving picture people coming around and taking pictures of it. You find persons divorced one day and remarried the next. I think it is about time for Canadian legislators to consider this matter earnestly, and not to follow the legislation that is in existence now in the United States. Let us take warning before it is too late.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the hon. member figures of the number of couples who have been remarried after getting divorce?

Mr. MARCIL: I am sorry I have not. It is a well known fact that divorces have increased enormously. Here are the number of divorces granted in this country during the last ten years:

1914	33
1915	18
1916	34
1917	17
1918	15
1919	51
1920	100
1921	112
1922	102
1923	117
	589

As the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) has said divorce is becoming a plague to the country. Rather than encourage divorces we should try and find means to prevent them and for that reason, if for no other, I am obliged to vote against the bill.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): Like the last speaker (Mr. Marcil) I should hate to see the conditions of family life in the United States duplicated in Canada, and if a bill were brought into parliament which would deal with divorce throughout Canada in a general way I might feel called upon to speak of it differently from what I am doing at the present time. The last speaker stated that as a result of the passing of a bill giving equality between the sexes in Great Britain that the number of divorces had increased by six hundred. Very well, let us admit that. Would it not seem to imply that those six hundred women in Great Britain had suffered in silence previously and without being afforded an opportunity of getting relief? The hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) has said that if the existing difficulty in the way of getting a divorce were removed it would increase the divorces in the four western provinces. Let me say that if a measure is introduced into parliament to make it harder for people to get divorces I am quite willing to support it providing it is uniform in its operation. But I have read the statistics of the divorce courts in the various provinces in Canada—those provinces where the women had equal rights with the men in obtaining divorce, and also those provinces where divorce was easier for men than for women—and those statistics do not show that the women folk suffered where there was equality of treatment, the ratio as between men and women was about the same.

The present bill will naturally receive the support of all hon. members who believe in divorce, and from the viewpoint of fair play there seems to be no argument against the contention of its mover. We are all coming to believe in absolute equality as between men and women; and as long as the state continues to grant divorces to the people of the country I see no reason why men and women should not be in a position of absolute equality in respect to divorce. I take that stand not because of any religious belief but from the point of view of good citizenship. As a citizen I object to divorce, I do not believe in it, but the question in my mind is this: Shall we in this parliament make the getting of a divorce easier than is possible at the present time? I have sat on the Private Bills committee of this House for a number of years, and I have listened to the evidence as given in the Senate committee. I have also read that evidence carefully in order that I might vote in an intelligent way on the question. Hon. gentlemen cannot say to me that I have not objected to the granting of divorces. I have done so in the Private Bills committee. I have fought the granting of divorces, and in some instances have won with the help of my colleagues around me, because I did not believe that they should be granted. At the same time it does seem to me that divorces get through this House sometimes in a very slip-shod manner, not that we are altogether lax but we do not take sufficient time to study each case, we are not sufficiently interested in the matter, in order to see whether there are proper grounds for granting the divorce.

Some divorces have been sanctioned by parliament where the man, instead of being given the opportunity to contract another marriage, should be given a sentence and the lash. I believe the time has come when we should respect family life in Canada, when we should treat it as sacred, when people who enter into the marriage contract should realize that it is an agreement for life and should act with a due realization of that fact. If the nature of the marriage obligation was duly brought home to those who enter into it I am convinced they would be more careful in its observance. I repeat that I intend to support the bill because I believe that so long as the country continues to grant divorce both sexes should be on even terms. Some hon. gentlemen have argued that we should make it harder to get a divorce. I would not be opposed to that if the legislation were uniform in its application throughout the country. But as things are such a law would, I think, render it more difficult for western folk to get a divorce than it would the people in the eastern provinces. Because it proposes to introduce equality as between the sexes I shall support this bill although I do not believe in divorce. What I am supporting is the application of the principle of equality; I do not believe there should be any discrimination in this matter in favour of men as against women. Our solidarity as a nation, in my opinion, rests to a great extent upon the maintenance of the family union, and I am sorry to note the facility with which that union has been dissolved in many cases.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do I understand my hon. friend to argue that the people of Ontario and Quebec will occupy a privileged position, as compared with the people of the western provinces if this bill does not become law? Let me say to him that the people of the western provinces have the same right of redress from parliament that the people of Quebec and Ontario enjoy, and they have the same right of access.

Mr. HOEY: But the application to parliament for a divorce is more expensive.

Mr. LEWIS: We have the same right to apply to parliament for redress but the question of expense, as has already been pointed out, is a serious one, and in many cases is a great handicap to many people who might wish to dissolve the marriage relationship. If hon. members who object to increasing the facilities for divorce will submit legislation with the object of rendering divorce more difficult I will support it. But, as matters stand, believing that both sexes should enjoy absolute equality, I must vote for this bill which proposes to remove a handicap as far as some Canadian women are concerned.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I hope I shall not be considered oldfashioned. I should not like the House to think that I am ungallant where the women are concerned, but I am against divorce and anything that looks like it, and always have been. There are three subjects on which, early in life, I made up my mind. One was my opposition to capital punishment; the second that I would never object to any amount of taxation for the education of the young; finally I have been absolutely opposed to divorce under any circumstances. I will give you one or two reasons for my belief, although I do not pretend to be any better than other people. We in this country have adhered to the principle that marriage is more than a contract. Only the clergy are allowed to perform what I call the "sacrament of marriage" and at the conclusion of nearly every marriage you will hear these words pronounced:

> Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder.

I am a firm believer in the principle that marriage is a moral and not a commercial contract, and I do not believe, from the moral standpoint, that this House or any other body has the right to dissolve a marriage. You will say that may be cruel. No. Where divorce is made easy the marriage vows are held lightly. Many people marry and only remain married for a few weeks, because when they do marry from momentary inspiration or hallucination they know they can be relieved from that marriage tie through the courts or, in this country, through parliament.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. FORKE: Does the hon. minister think the last words of the marriage service that he quoted have any meaning in a case such as he mentioned? If one has been deceived to begin with, what is the proof that these words are not a mockery? You admit they have never been joined together and the words have no effect; consequently you consider these words are of no avail whatever, so far as marriage is concerned.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am speaking from the inside and not the outside. Conscientiously, I believe that those who enter into the marriage vows undertake a serious obligation and the various churches attach a solemnity to these words as the last admonition.

Mr. FORKE: They ought to.

Mr. GRAHAM: And to my mind the contract is not a civil contract; it is rather a moral contract.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is it not both?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am stressing the moral side of it for my part, although it may be both, and I do not conscientiously believe that it is the right of any legislature to dissolve this contract. You will say "It is a horrible thing for a man and woman to be compelled to live together after certain discoveries have been made." Well, they are not compelled to live together. They can be legally separated and never live together again; but under those conditions they cannot marry again. If the law said that a man must live with a woman, or conversely that a woman must live with a man, under such circumstances as we know exist, then I might favour some other method of having them separated. But the law of every province and the law of the Dominion of Canada gives them the right to separate and to live separately; so that there is no argument at all on account of the fact that they do not live together.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Who is going to support the woman?

Mr. GRAHAM: Very often the woman has the money. If hon. members will go through the records of the United States on divorce they will discover that in a great many cases the women have the money and ask for the divorce, but that is drawing me away from what I wish to say. I would point out that if no divorcé was allowed to marry again there would be mighty few divorces asked for in any country. We do not need to go into any history or statistics to prove that. That is evident on the face of it. But you say to me "You are making a speech on divorce, while this is only a question of equality." Well, my position is this: I am against divorce and believe if there were no divorces, marriages perhaps would be more carefully entered into; and the morality of this country would be improved if nobody was allowed to get a divorce for any cause, but separation would probably be taken advantage of in a great many cases. You know as well as I do that divorces have come before this House and we pay little attention to them, but inside of a few weeks one divorcé is married, which is perfectly honourable and perfectly proper under existing laws; and you know that in a great many cases of divorces that come before this House the party that is asking for the divorce has been keeping company with somebody else for weeks, months and years perhaps, and only comes to get the divorce to be free from a bond that is irksome so that the party may take on another bond that he or she thinks will not be so irksome.

I want to come back to this question of equality. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has said that at the present time all the provinces stand on an equality. They all come to the Parliament of Canada.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I was about through at six o'clock, but I shall say just a few words now in conclusion. It has been suggested that it is too expensive for anyone desiring a divorce to bring his or her case to Ottawa. As I said before, I am not in favour of divorce at all, and if I had my way I would make it so expensive that no one would come to Ottawa. There is another point which is always present in my mind in regard to another question which I mentioned to-day. If a couple be legally separated they can reunite without any comment or any suggestion of scandal; and if hon. members will look back they will no doubt recall very many instances of couples who in a moment, or perhaps after a year, of petulance decided on a legal separation, who on second thought and mature consideration came to the conclusion that for the sake of their families that state was not the best thing for them, and they therefore became re-united. In the case of divorce this is impracticable, if not impossible. Many divorced people have been re-married, but so far as I can remember at the present time, they have never done so until they have gone through the purgatorial process of being married two or three times in the interval. And this really makes marriage a farce.

Mr. EULER: Would the minister say that this applied to divorced persons in Canada, or is he thinking of the United States? I question whether you would find many cases of divorced persons re-marrying in this country, for there is only one reason for which divorce is given here.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not confine the remark to marriage in Canada; as a matter of fact I had in mind the larger area of divorce in all countries. As I pointed out in the beginning, marriage in Canada is on a different plane, both from the legal standpoint and from the point of view of the method of performance, from what it is in some other countries. And for that I believe Canada is to be commended. That is why I said that the marriage ceremony in Canada was far more than a civil contract; to my mind it is a moral contract. However, I shall not go over that ground again.

I believe in the equality of sexes in regard to this matter; I am of the opinion that the man should have no right to claim a divorce or separation on grounds not granted to the woman, and in that respect I think I coincide with the sponsor of the bill (Mr. Shaw). But the way in which I would go at it, from my conscientious point of view, would be to add to rather than to lessen the restrictions; I would make the restrictions more rigid on both sides and make it harder for either party to secure a divorce. That is the way I would bring about equality, and as I told my hon. friend last year on the floor of the House, when I spoke on this question, if anyone will introduce a bill for the purpose of putting a greater number of impediments in the way, and so make it harder for people to get divorce, I am ready to vote for it in a moment. I do not want to influence anyone in this respect; I simply speak for myself from a conscientious point of view which I have held for many years, and I cannot, therefore, see my way clear to vote for any measure which would open the door wider to divorce. I will say this, however, that if the object of this bill were to make it easier for a man to get divorce I would vote against it with much less reluctance than I do in this case. In voting against the bill as it stands, I may be charged with voting against equality of treatment as between men and women; but that is not my attitude at all. I will vote for every measure which will make it harder for anyone to get a divorce.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I suggest that there is a splendid way out of the difficulty of marriage, and that is my way—stay out.

Mr. GRAHAM: In the absence of the Prime Minister, I give his approval.

Miss MACPHAIL: When in doubt say no. I believe it would be a good thing to make marriage harder instead of easier, for there is too great a tendency on the part of people to rush into marriage without realizing either its hardships or its binding nature. It is a fact that all women contribute more to marriage than men; for the most part they have to change their place of living, their method of work, a great many women to-day changing their occupation entirely on marriage; and they must even change their name. They then work continuously for many years until death happily releases them, and that without wages at all. They work without pay. No one can claim that a married woman is economically independent, for she is not; apart from some very rare exceptions, married women are dependent economically, and that is the last possible remaining bond on women. Women have struggled for ages now, and to-day they are ably championed in our country by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) and his friends who in this House are demanding further rights for them. When I hear men talk about woman being the angel of the home I always, mentally at least, shrug my shoulders in doubt. I do not want to be the angel of any home; I want for myself what I want for other women, absolute equality. After that is secured then men and women can take turns at being angels. I stress that angel part, because I remember that last year an hon. member who spoke from the opposite benches called a woman an angel and in the next breath said that men were superior. They must therefore be gods.

An hon. MEMBER: Was it the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier)?

Miss MACPHAIL: I do not remember his constituency. Now, I welcome this opportunity to register my vote in favour of equality for women, who, I think, should be granted divorce on the same grounds as men. It is likely they suffer more than men do because they do not get it, and so I am glad of this opportunity of showing to western Canada that we as a parliament are endeavouring to be fair to the four western provinces.

[Mr. Graham.]

Those provinces have possibly a good deal of reason for the feeling that eastern Canada and the capital of the Dominion are quite indifferent to their needs. I am not arguing either in favour of or against divorce, but I do think that this is a question of equality and that anyone who votes against the bill is after all voting against that principle. And I hate to say that when I think of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), who is indeed very fair usually. I hope hon. gentlemen will remember how the women of the four western provinces will feel towards those who vote against them, because that is after all what it amounts to; they are the women directly concerned. Twice this subject has been introduced in the House, and I believe it will continue to be introduced again and again until justice is done our women. They are merely asking for justice—absolute equality.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have no interest in this bill except in so far as it is an effort to correct what to me seems to be an undoubted injustice. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) before dinner stated that in his early youth he had learned to believe in three things—the undesirability of capital punishment, the virtues of education, and the evil of divorce. I might say to him and to the House that with the first two of his beliefs I am entirely in accord, but I cannot follow him in his attitude towards the bill under discussion. This bill, introduced by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), appeals to me solely on the ground that it seeks to remedy an injustice. If the House admits the propriety of divorce as an institution, then the argument for the bill of the hon. member is in my opinion absolutely unanswerable. I would like to compliment my good friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier) on his speech. Its choice diction, and the beauty and nobility of thought of his remarkable panegyric of married life and the sacred joys of home were, I think, an effort that none of us could hope to equal. And assuredly I have no criticism to make of those who, either from conscientious convictions or because of the practice of their church are unalterably opposed to divorce.

But it does seem to me that much of the debate this afternoon, especially from opponents of the bill, was more or less beside the point. Those speeches might very appropriately have been made if the bill called for the establishment of divorce as something new, or for its abolition. But divorce is already an established fact in this country. The bill, I submit, does not touch the established principle of divorce at all. To my mind its principle is to establish equality between men and women in respect to something that already exists and which no one proposes to abolish. Now, I have said that some of the discussion has been beside the point, and to a very slight degree, Mr Speaker, I am going myself to transgress in order to remove, if possible, some of the confusion that has arisen. Divorce, it has been said, is a social evil. Well, I do not believe that it is. Divorce is the result of the social evil itself and is an effort to remedy it. I have heard only one good reason for opposition to this bill, and that is that members are conscientiously opposed to divorce altogether. If, therefore, the bill is defeated, it will follow that this House is opposed to the institution of divorce; whereupon it logically follows, I submit, that it is the duty of parliament to abolish divorce entirely. I can see no escape from that position. On the other hand, if divorce, as we have had it for many years, is to continue to be recognized on any ground whatever, then surely it is unanswerable that women should have the same rights as men in obtaining this relief.

The suggestion has been made, and it was repeated by the Minister of Railways that the women of the western provinces can come to the Parliament of Canada and have their cases decided on an absolute equality with men. I think the suggestion has been very well answered. If that practice is to continue, then the man in the western provinces who has ground for a divorce can go to his local divorce court which is near at hand, and at very small expense and very little personal inconvenience he can obtain what the woman is obliged to go to Ottawa for, travelling thousands of miles at very heavy expense, an expense which in all probability she is much less able to bear than the man. There is very little chivalry or justice about that.

I do not wish my hon. friend the Minister of Railways to think that I am attacking his argument in particular, but he suggested that if a divorce be granted the parties should not be permitted to marry again. He spoke also of the possibility of a legal separation instead of divorce. That on the face of it may sound very fair, but in the case of a divorce there is always at least one party guilty, and nearly always one party innocent. I cannot for the life of me see why an innocent woman who has conducted herself with absolute propriety, who is blameless, and has very good reason for seeking a divorce, should be prevented from marrying again and having the companionship and what other advantages pertain to the institution which is endorsed by all—marriage. If marriage is a good thing, then surely it should be possible for innocent people to again enter into it.

Some members have stated that they are not particularly in favour of divorce. I am quite frank in saying that I am in favour of divorce for the one cause for which a divorce is usually granted in this country, that of infidelity. I do not think it is fair, I do not think it is right, I do not think it is in the interests of society that a married couple should be compelled to live together when one has committed the single offence which is the most obnoxious and perhaps the most revolting that he or she can be guilty of. Believing as I do that we should have divorce for the one offence, for me there is no other course than to vote for the bill on the score that women should not be prejudiced in the courts of the western provinces, but should have exactly the same right of redress as men have under similar circumstances.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the bill introduced by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) aims at extending, in the western provinces, the grounds for obtaining divorce. If such was not the case, I am certain it would not be brought down for the consideration of the House. Now, in my opinion, divorce is only the tolerance of an evil which must be avoided as much as possible.

I am opposed to divorce on more than one score. I already had the opportunity, at the last session, when a bill of this nature was under consideration by the House, to put forth the reasons which prompted me to strongly oppose divorce. I shall not again repeat them to-day; however, I shall mention two: I am opposed to divorce because I am a Catholic and because I am a British subject.

I am a Catholic, I belong to that Catholic religion which has Christ for its guiding light and holds divorce in horror. Divorce, is the desecration of a sacrament, the sacrament of marriage, and, had I but that reason to rise in this House, I could say with pride that I have always been opposed to divorce and that each time I am given the opportunity I shall strongly register my protest against this shameless law on behalf of the electors which I have the honour to represent in this House.

As a British subject, as a citizen of this country, it seems to me that I still have cause to oppose divorce. When, in 1867, Confederation was agreed upon, Protestants and Catholics united on a common ground and made concessions, it was decided that this question of divorce would be restricted as much as possible. This was a concession which the Fathers of Confederation had, perhaps, no right to make. It was a compromise that the representatives of the French Catholic minority made with the representatives of the English Protestant majority and it was then agreed upon, that a modus vivendi would exist, in order that harmony and peace might predominate in the country and that there might be a court established here to provide for divorce cases. It was, in other words, the tolerance of a social evil. Ever since that time, those who were at the helm of the affairs of the country have recognized the mutual concession agreed upon and have observed it. From time to time, members have risen in this House in an effort to establish divorce courts, to widen the scope upon which divorce might be obtained or to suggest new motives for the granting of relief. But, I must say, to the credit of the representatives of our English speaking fellow-citizens that these statesmen came to an understanding with the representatives of the French race so as to preserve Confederation within the sacred principles upon which it had been founded. I shall mention but one incident to that effect. In 1875, a member rose in this House to request the establishment of divorce courts so as to facilitate the granting of relief in this country, and the Prime Minister of the day, Sir John A. Macdonald, made the following statement which is reported as follows in the Hansard of that date:

> So far as his own personal opinion was concerned, he would vote against the resolution, for there was no reason why we should establish courts of divorce in Canada. While he would not go as far as the hon. members from Lower Canada, and declare that divorces should not be granted under any circumstances, he thought there should be no encouragement given their procurement.

And further on he says:

> Amongst the moral triumphs which Mr. Gladstone had achieved there was none so great as his defeat when he protested against the establishment of a divorce court in England, which had not been productive of any beneficial effects.

Further on he still adds:

> While divorce was not prohibited in Canada, and while parties to domestic misery and unhappiness might obtain relief, nevertheless under the present system no encouragement was given to those cases, and he would be very sorry to see any tribunal established which might be the means of inviting other dissatisfied couples to apply for a divorce.

The practice of those who have taken part in the administration of the affairs of the country has always been to oppose measures which aimed at widening the bases of this legislation of tolerance. They did not wish to further encourage divorce, and they always strived to maintain within reasonable bounds this intricate question of divorce. As a Canadian citizen it is quite proper for me to state that, guided by the British North America Act and the views expressed by the statesmen of this country, we are right in opposing divorce.

It was argued in the course of this debate that there were, in this House, a number of members who thought that the bill contained no obnoxious clauses against Catholics or those who represented the minority, and consequently there existed no grounds for us to oppose such a measure. We protest because it is our right to do so, because we believe it our duty to combat the social evil which spells divorce and that if we must tolerate it, we shall only do so in a measure conforming with the carrying out of the compromise agreed upon. And, one should be grateful to us for the stand, because we show by our attitude that we are attached to our traditions, institutions and to the British North America Act, and thereby prove the interest we take in the whole country. One should be grateful to us, because in taking this stand we claim to be in the right path, and were we but a few in this House, to protest, I feel confident that we are right in the end and that divorce should be restricted within the most limited bounds or disappear entirely. It is in the countries where morals are more or less forgotten that we find these divorce laws, which are the desecration of a sacrament. In a young country like ours, it is well that we should shun any such legislation of a nature to make divorce still easier to obtain, instead of limiting it, and this is why we most strenuously oppose the adoption of the bill introduced by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw).

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the pleasure of listening to this debate, but I think there are certain aspects of the question which, perhaps, it would be proper for me to emphasize in this House.

I am as desirous as anyone in this House to see divorce kept within proper limits. In my humble opinion there is about one cause and one cause only which gives to civilized people the right to dissolve the marriage bond; and if that right is granted—and it has been granted, Mr. Speaker, in every civilized nation in the world—then I think it is proper that that right should be granted to men and to women on an absolute equality. I would go further and say that it should be granted not by committees of a legislature but by properly constituted courts. I am informed by those from the western province of Alberta that their courts are courts of divorce but that the law which comes from this parliament makes a differentiation between the grounds on which a woman and on which a man may obtain divorce. I say that is unjust; I say it is a crying injustice; I say it is a flagrant injustice; I say it is an injustice which should be remedied by this House in passing this bill.

There are those, Mr. Speaker, who conscientiously are opposed to divorce. It may be part of their religious tenets to be opposed to divorce. I have no quarrel with such. I believe in religious freedom, and in my idea religious freedom not only demands that one should be allowed to practise what he believes to be true but it demands also that he should allow others to practise what they believe to be true. We have striking examples in countries not far away from us of the scourge which a too loose form of divorce may bring about. We are all sensible of the warning which the condition of such nations holds out to us. But I say that it would be unfair for people who hold different views on the question of divorce—views which, perhaps, are held by the majority in their own province—to say that people in another province holding different views should be prevented from having those different views applied fairly. That, it seems to me, is the great point in this case.

If this bill is passed it will not affect the rights of those who pertain to the oldest branch of the Christian church. No one is obliged to appeal to a divorce court; no one who holds contrary religious beliefs is obliged to apply to have his marriage dissolved. The founder of our religion himself gave one ground on which divorce was allowable and surely we are not going to set up a higher morality than the founder of our religion has himself set up. I make this appeal to those who are opposed to the bill. I make the appeal for something I have fought for all my life, and that is for religious freedom and for the harmony which I wish to see exist among the different religions and the different races of this country, a harmony which can only exist if people hold fast to those things which they believe to be true. I ask no one to forego one jot or tittle of his religious conviction, but I do ask that he grant to others the right to disagree with him and to have such legislation as will allow him to have what he believes to be fair done before the courts of this land.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of a very few remarks I confess much sympathy, perhaps as respects my vote a controlling sympathy, with the motion put forward by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) I hope that none have offended the religious susceptibilities of others in this debate. Indeed, this parliament ever since confederation has been a great exemplar of the fulfilment of the duty we owe to respect the opinion of our neighbour in matters religious and even in matters political. I cannot accept as an axiom that divorce in itself is an evil, though I sympathize with those whose religious teaching does lead them to that conclusion. If the good resulting from divorce, if the releasing by human agency of couples from positive cruelty and hardship, wherein one is so often innocent—if these benefits outweigh the so-called evil of divorce itself, I could not subscribe to the doctrine that divorce is per se an evil, although there is a body of gentlemen in this House, whose opinion I respect very highly, who do hold that belief. But had I that belief, as the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) professes he has it, I could not see the logic of taking the ground that he does—of supporting the bill now before us—because after all is said and done, viewing the matter most charitably, the result of this bill will be undoubtedly to enlarge the number and scope of divorces in our four western provinces.

Mr. LEWIS: The hon. member will admit that I said that as long as divorce was a state institution I would support equality amongst men and women. That is why I would vote for it.

Mr. PUTNAM: Precisely; I did not misrepresent the hon. member. He made it a basis of his position that he had followed the proceedings in the divorce committee of the Senate, that he had fought divorce in this House and had sometimes succeeded; that he had killed the request for divorce wherever he could. I understood him, therefore, to be absolutely opposed to it. He said, however, that if this evil was to be maintained he wanted equality of cause for dissolving the marriage tie as between the man and the woman. I was unable to see the logic of that, if I should accept his premises.

I do not hope, Mr. Speaker, in my few words to say anything that will be new to any lawyer in the House, but if I can usefully elucidate one part of the argument of the hon. member for West Calgary I feel it my duty to attempt to do so lest he may overlook the point or neglect to refer to it in the concluding remarks which I assume he will make. He pointed out that though the husband in the four western provinces might divorce the wife for the cause of infidelity alone the wife has not there a reciprocal privilege enjoyed by her sister in England, but that if she sought to divorce the husband she could only be successful in the courts of our western provinces of Canada, if, in addition to that infidelity, she proved a cause of great cruelty or a cause of unjustifiable desertion on the part of the husband. Now cruelty is not taken by the court in the popular but in a very strict legal sense of that word, and I shall attempt, not to exaggerate, but to show the vast disability there is against the woman in this respect.

There are two kinds of cruelty in the eyes of the courts, and of the divorce court of this parliament, I believe—physical cruelty and mental cruelty. Physical cruelty is easily susceptible of proof. The man who is coward enough to strike a woman or to use actual physical cruelty in any form against her is easily found out, and if the woman is equipped with the necessary cash to carry on her suit she will probably not have any difficulty in getting the necessary evidence of physical cruelty; but it is much more difficult to prove mental cruelty. On the one hand, we have the wife, who may have been guilty of one isolated case of infidelity, subject to being divorced. On the other hand, the husband might have been living a life of open infidelity, but the wife could not secure a divorce from him on that ground alone. She must supplement that with these ancillary grounds, and the ground she finds most difficult to prove is mental cruelty. She may come before the courts and prove that her husband exercises a great many forms of mental cruelty against her, using that word in its popular sense, but the court guided by the decisions from which the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) so usefully read this afternoon, sets itself the stern task of deciding whether that cruelty be sufficient to destroy her health, or directly and unequivocably calculated to do so. You see at once, Mr. Speaker, that that is an absolutely drastic, a very hard, and a very unfair test; but it is illuminating as showing the vast disability there is between the status of the man and that of the woman when they apply for divorce in our western provinces. The court may say, for example, in the case of a woman in frail health, that if the husband persisted without cause in calling her a harlot, if he persisted in abusing her church and her religion, and in teaching the children infidelity instead of Christianity, that that constituted mental cruelty, and that would allow her to succeed in her case; but the same judge might decide in the case of a healthier woman that reprehensible as the husband's conduct was it did not constitute mental cruelty such as was calculated to break down the wife's health. So you can see at a glance, Mr. Speaker, there is a far greater legal disability against the actual status of the wife than appears on the surface. If I have elucidated that, I have accomplished the main purpose for which I rose.

Before taking my seat, I wish to say that I enjoyed very much the address of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). That hon. member never speaks without giving me at least some useful viewpoint peculiar to woman.

Mr. McMASTER: She touches no subject she does not adorn.

Mr. PUTNAM: I concur. In this particular case I know that throngs of the sterner sex will fervently hope that she spoke but personally when she came out generally against marriage, and will equally hope also that she spoke in the light of that wide and untrammelled privilege which every woman has, in spite of any feminine disabilities, of changing her mind at any time.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I deem it my duty, seeing that this motion is again before the House, to reiterate the objections which I had the honour to raise, on March 19, 1924, against such a measure introduced under the form of a resolution by the hon. member from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) and who, to-day, introduces it as a bill.

The remarks which I uttered on that occasion, following on those of the hon. members who have just preceded me in this debate,—and I am glad to be once more in their company—will be found at page 495 of Hansard of last session. I then set forth the reasons which militate against the resolution. In my opinion the same reasons carry more weight at present against the bill of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) which if adopted will have force of law, and I, therefore, cannot do better than to very strongly protest against this bill and bring to bear all and each of the arguments of last year.

I was not present this afternoon, when the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) expounded the grounds upon which exception should be taken to the adoption of this bill. I believe that, in the course of his remarks, so I am informed, he expressed the views of the province which he represents, of the nationality and religion to which he belongs. All those who spoke after him—and particularly the hon. member from Labelle (Mr. Fortier) whom I wish to congratulate—have expressed exactly the views of the province of Quebec and of all those who adhere to the Roman Catholic Church.

I am satisfied that we should not in the present circumstance take another stand than the one we took last year, that is protest against the passing of any such measure. It is, therefore, with pleasure, Mr. Speaker, that I shall register my vote against the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. SHAW: Mr. Speaker, in concluding the debate upon this important subject, I must express my appreciation of the manner in which it has been received. Speaking generally, I think the subject has been discussed freed from bias of any character whatsoever, and I trust that this parliament may in its good judgment come to the proper and the sound conclusion in the matter.

Fortunately my statement of the law has not been found wanting in any particular. I call to witness the support of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) of the legal viewpoint which I have expressed here to-day. Then, too, all have recognized the inequality that exists to-day between the man and the woman, and that is the simple problem before this parliament. If my premises are correct, if inequality exists, then what does this parliament propose to do about it?

I listened with admiration to the oration with which the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier) favoured us this afternoon. He constituted himself, and I do not object at all, the guardian of the sanctity of the home; but I ask him not to deny to other hon. gentlemen, including myself, exactly that same duty of guardianship. I take it, if I express the feeling of those who favour this bill, that we have no desire to wreck the home. Our only desire is to preserve the home; but we are not going to be misled in the matter. We are not going to say that just because there is no divorce everything is in a perfectly sound and splendid condition. As a matter of fact, as I pointed out to the hon. member for Bellechasse when I interrupted him this afternoon, divorce is not the disease at all. Divorce is simply one remedy which is proposed for the disease which does exist. Nor do I agree with the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) who, although from western Canada, finds it in his heart to oppose this effort at securing equality. I do not agree with him in his viewpoint. I do not agree with him when he tells us that he sits here amused while the "divorce mill," as he called it, of this parliament grinds out its sessional quota. I see nothing at all amusing in those circumstances. It seems to me that anyone with the faintest realization of his duty must feel, in the presence of these numerous divorce bills which come before us session after session, that behind each one of them there is a human tragedy, that behind each one of them there is something wrong—there is some deep, fundamental cause which, so far as possible, it should be the duty of parliament to eradicate if it can. Divorce is not a disease; divorce is simply an attempted remedy for the situation as it exists.

Now, it has been suggested by some hon. members, who have conscientious objections to this matter of divorce, that we should impose similar restrictions upon the husband who seeks relief as is now imposed in the four western provinces of Canada upon the wife who seeks relief from an erring husband. Well, if one thinks of these two individuals, man and woman, thinks of their physical capacities and physical disabilities, what would you say to one who asks a husband, for example, to prove not alone adultery but, in combination with that, the offence of cruelty as defined by the courts in the Old Land. To establish such cruelty the husband would have to prove a cruelty which produced "physical illness or mental distress of a nature calculated to effect permanently his bodily health or endanger his reason, or that there is reasonable apprehension that the same state of affairs will continue." Surely no reasonable person will ask that an imposition of that kind be placed upon a man before he could secure a divorce even if the offence of adultery is committed. As I stated this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, the great offence so far as the marital relation is concerned is the offence of adultery. I am satisfied to make it the only offence justifying a decree of divorce; but do not attach to it other offences which, so far as human beings are concerned, are forgivable, whereas infidelity in most cases is totally unforgivable. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the House now pass this bill.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Shaw) which was agreed to on the following division:

PAIRS

(The list of pairs is furnished by the chief whips).

Messrs:

Halbert,	Mareil (Bonaventure),
Drummond,	Parent,
Sexsmith,	Lanctôt.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I was paired with the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). Had I voted I would have voted against the the bill.

Bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Sections 1, 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Service of process.

Mr. BAXTER: Has the hon. member who introduced the bill given any consideration—I presume he has—to the possible constitutional aspect of clause 4? As I take it, the British North America Act provides that the procedure in court is a matter for the local legislature. This parliament can legislate as to the conditions of marriage and the conditions of divorce. I doubt if it can establish the procedure in a provincial court. The divorce courts are provincial courts, and I would very much doubt whether any federal legislation as to service of process would be valid, and if there is a serious doubt about it, I question whether it would be wise to insert in a bill something which may cause a great deal of difficulty to the interested parties. I suggest that it would be wiser to omit this clause and leave the matter to the regulation of the court, where it would naturally fall.

Mr. SHAW: I am glad the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter) has brought the clause to the attention of the committee. It is not a matter that is without difficulty. I can readily understand how the matter of service of a process within the jurisdiction of a province is properly a matter of procedure, and consequently should not be provided for in this bill. But when the person upon whom the service is sought to be made resides outside the jurisdiction of the court, then it is a very grave question indeed as to whether it is not something more than a mere matter of procedure, but rather a question of jurisdiction. I think my hon. friend from St. John and Albert will at once realize that situation, and if such a provision were not in the bill, undoubtedly the bill would largely become inoperative. But even if it is unnecessary it will not in any event invalidate other than the particular section itself, and it seems to me it cannot possibly do any harm. It may, on the other hand, be a matter of jurisdiction which may be vital to the bill having any real value in its operation.

Mr. BAXTER: It seems to me a great pity that in a matter of this kind which is of some importance we should not be able to hear what my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) is saying. If we are going to discuss public bills, I think there should be such cessation from private conversation as would enable members to be heard.

Mr. McBRIDE: I might remark that we cannot hear what the hon. member is saying now.

Mr. BAXTER: I can assure my hon. friend that I can make anyone in this House hear me, but I do not care to use my voice to that extent unnecessarily. If the hon. gentleman who has spoken will provoke me sufficiently I will speak quite loudly.

Mr. McMASTER: Then let somebody provoke the hon. member.

Mr. BAXTER: If we have just reasonable quietness in this chamber a very ordinary tone is quite sufficient to render one audible in any part of the House, according to my experience. I understand my friend from West Calgary shares the doubt about this matter. If he shares that doubt it is no longer a trivial matter. It is an invitation to a possible litigant to proceed along lines which may be utterly unsafe; and therefore I think that would be an excellent ground for dropping the clause. We are all familiar with the principle of divorce jurisdiction. The matrimonial domicile is always the domicile of the husband, and whatever jurisdiction he is subject to has power to reach him. The divorce proceedings I understand are administered in the western provinces by the ordinance courts. Those courts have ample power to send their processes outside of the jurisdiction of the province, and I would rely on the province in that respect. I do not want to urge the matter too strongly, but I would invite the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who, I trust, will express his view. I feel it would be much safer for the litigants if this clause were expunged. Let the litigants rely on the general authority of the court rather than insert a clause which might cause great difficulty in dealing with one of the most important things in life. People relying on this clause might find that after the proceedings had been taken they had obtained no real divorce. If you rely on the general jurisdiction of the court you will be perfectly safe. I am not raising this point in a spirit of fault-finding or criticism—I think my hon. friend will agree —but I feel it is a serious matter and that parliament should give its best attention to it, having passed on the general principle of the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think this section is unnecessary. The purpose of the bill, as my hon. friend very ably explained is to secure equality in the grounds of divorce for both men and women. This is obtained by other sections of the bill. This section refers only to the service of the document, and surely provision for such service exists at the present time. You have your courts in all those provinces, actions are instituted, and there must be a method of service already in existence. I do not see why this section is necessary to secure what my hon. friend has in his mind.

Mr. MARTELL: I do not want to interpolate anything in regard to this matter. It is seldom I can agree with my hon. friend from St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter), but I think it is perfectly plain that while the matter of setting forth what the law should be in regard to divorce is one altogether of federal jurisdiction, the matter of the procedure to be applied is one of provincial jurisdiction. This clause which my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) has inserted in the bill is purely a matter of procedure. Therefore it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. Now when you come to our courts, the jurisdiction is determined first as to what shall be the grounds for divorce, both as regards men and women; and the hon. member for St. John and Albert has said that this simply refers to equality as regards men and women as to the reasons for securing a divorce, and that is the reason why I voted for the bill. In certain provinces of Canada there are divorce courts, and the procedure in these divorce courts is regulated by provincial jurisdiction or provincial procedure.

The judges formulate the rules of procedure to be followed in order to obtain a divorce. The grounds for divorce are set forth in the federal act, and it seems to me that this is all that my hon. friend is seeking. The method of procedure is, of course, a matter for provincial jurisdiction. In civil matters the provincial court prescribes what shall be the proper service of a writ, and in the same way that court will decide under this legislation what the necessary procedure shall be in serving a writ in cases of divorce. We all know that if a person wishes to secure leave to issue a writ he goes to a judge in chambers and makes his affidavit, setting forth his grounds and cause of action, and the judge gives him the right to issue the writ for service under jurisdiction. If a person happens to be a British subject residing under jurisdiction then he has leave to issue the writ; if he happens not to be a British subject and not residing in the Dominion, then he gets only leave to serve notice of his writ, and the court provides for substituted service. In this particular instance, the bill before us confers on the court a power to decree divorce, giving equality of grounds as between men and women. But the question of procedure should be left to provincial jurisdiction, for the judge to provide how the writ shall be served, and what shall be regarded as proper direct service or substituted service. Procedure is always a matter of provincial jurisdiction, and I am afraid that my hon. friend (Mr. Shaw) is introducing in his bill something which might eventually give rise to litigation or to an endeavour to set aside a divorce once it had been obtained, on the ground that the method provided in the bill as regards service was irregular and ultra vires of the federal parliament. When the hon. member gets equality as between men and women in regard to grounds for divorce, I think he is getting all that the federal parliament can give him, and he would be safe in following the advice of my hon. friend (Mr. Baxter) and letting the provincial courts provide the procedure in this case, as they do in all civil matters.

Mr. SHAW: I am glad to have the fortification of the opinions expressed by the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter), by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and by the hon. member (Mr. Martell). Under the circumstances I move that clause 4 be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

[Mr. Martell.]

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT—AMENDMENT

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend The Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): Does the hon. member intend moving that this bill be referred to the committee?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I intend moving, after the bill gets its second reading, that it be referred to the select standing committee on Mines, Forests and Waters.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on Mines, Forests and Waters.

POST OFFICE AMENDMENT

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Post Office Act.—Mr. Church.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have a memorandum from the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) intimating that he has an understanding with the hon. member (Mr. Church) that this matter will be gone on with next Wednesday. Possibly the hon. member will confirm that statement.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the Prime Minister fix a day?

Mr. STEVENS: May I point out that this order will scarcely be reached on Wednesday next, unless I am seriously mistaken. And this is the fourth Thursday, so that in all probability it will not be reached next Thursday either.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Postmaster General is not here, but as I have stated, he sent me a letter intimating that if the bill were called he had an understanding with the mover of it that it would not be gone on with until Wednesday next. As to the likelihood of its not being proceeded with then, that is a matter in regard to which there may be some doubt. However, I undertake that an opportunity will be given for the discussion of it at some future time.

Mr. CHURCH: Would the Prime Minister have any objection to the bill being read the second time now and having the debate later?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

INDIAN ACT—AMENDMENT

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Indian Act.—Mr. Coote.

Mr. COOTE: The minister (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) has asked that the bill be allowed to stand.

Order stands.

YUKON TERRITORY OFFICIALS—INCOME TAX EXEMPTIONS

On the motion of Mr. Black (Yukon):

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, statements and communications concerning exemption or partial exemption from payment of income tax on payments or remuneration, whether paid as salary, living allowance or otherwise, by the government of Canada to officials of Yukon Territory, and showing what exemptions (if any) from income tax have been allowed to Yukon officials on amounts paid them by the government of Canada during the past seven years.

Mr. BUREAU: I would ask the hon. gentleman to let this notice of motion stand. There are certain provisions in our act preventing the disclosure of any return made by individuals, and not being thoroughly familiar with those provisions, I am not ready to discuss the matter now. I would therefore ask the hon. gentleman to let his motion stand so I may have an opportunity of seeing the Commissioner of Taxation.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I have no objection to letting the motion stand if I am assured that it will come up again, and that I shall have an opportunity of discussing it if it is opposed.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

GREAT LAKES LEVELS

EFFECT OF DIVERSION OF WATER BY CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take some definite and immediate action to prevent the illegal diversion of the waters of the Great Lakes through the Chicago drainage canal and that action should be taken to prevent further waste and to secure specific enforcement of the treaty between Canada and the United States as to this matter, inasmuch as this diversion is not only seriously lowering the lake levels, but is a danger to the public works of Canada and its provinces and an interference with the harbour developments of our country and with navigation and is such a direct violation and breach of the treaty as calls for immediate action by the government of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last session this same resolution came up with reference to the diversion of waters through the Chicago drainage canal. Under the Boundary Waterways treaty 1909, made between Great Britain and the United States, Chicago was allowed to divert 4,167 cubic second feet of water from the Great Lakes. Now that city is asking in effect for a diversion of between 16,000 and 17,000 cubic second feet. I do not intend to-night to again go into the whole history of the case, as I laid the facts before this House last session and they will be found in Hansard of March 26, 1924. But I am very much dissatisfied that the government of Canada during the past twelve months has taken no adequate steps to stop this illegal diversion by the city of Chicago. I contend that instead of sending to Washington a minor official of the Department of the Interior, to appear before the Rivers and Harbours committee of congress, and also before Mr. Weeks, the United States Secretary of War, to protest against the illegal action of the Chicago authorities, the government should have made its protests and communicated with the British government, which through its ambassador at Washington would have protested to the government of the United States. This is not a matter for individual citizens of Canada, but for the two governments concerned. Principles are bigger than individuals, and we shall never get any relief from this chronic state of affairs until we proceed through the proper channels of communication, and have all the cards laid on the table. This diversion is nothing but piracy and is ruining the light and power interests and the public works on the Lakes, the Niagara and the St. Lawrence rivers, is lowering the levels of all the harbours on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence by several inches, and it has been estimated by many engineers on the Canadian side that the damage in an economic way to Canadian light, power and navigation interests amounts to no less than $35,000,000 a year. Are we to send minor officials to Washington? Washington is not the capital of Canada; Ottawa is. Is the British government to be ignored altogether in regard to the enforcement of the Boundary Waterways treaty? Is this treaty, so far as any application through the government of the Mother Country is concerned, to be allowed to be treated as a scrap of paper by the United States government? There are great national and international interests involved, the lowering of the water levels is affecting navigation and seriously jeopardizing the usefulness of the harbours of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence; it is also prejudicially affecting power rights, and the rights of riparian owners also are involved. This lowering of the levels is a menace to navigation on both sides of the border as has been proven time and again, and the resultant damage to shipping and trade and commerce is enormous.

It is most important that the Canadian and British governments should take some action in this matter as governments and not merely send two or three officials down to Washington to join private citizens. What can they do.? They cannot accomplish anything; they can only go around in a circle. The Prime Minister said recently in the House, when questioned on the orders of the day, that Canada's representative held a watching brief; a watching brief before whom? I say that Canada, through the British government should immediately call on the government of the United States to respect the boundary waterways treaty and to deal with the law breakers, the sanitary drainage authorities of Chicago, who for the past eight or ten years have apparently regarded this treaty as a scrap of paper. The interests of navigation should be paramount, and they are made paramount by treaty. Ontario and Quebec are vitally interested from the standpoint of water-power, because Canada's share of these surplus waters which are not required for navigation purposes may be developed for the purposes of power and the surplus waters including the bed of the rivers, the banks and rapids belong to the provinces.

But while these provinces have an interest in the matter it is recognized that the federal governments of both countries alone are interested from the view of navigation. This matter was debated in the House on March 26 of last year, when I moved a similar resolution, and attention was called to the great damage that had been done to the lake levels by this diversion. It was hoped that something would be done during the recess of parliament but I am not satisfied with what has been done; in fact, nothing definite at all has been done except to have representatives of Canada listen to a lot of American politicians talking in the Rivers and Harbours committee and having Canada represented before some one United States cabinet minister at Washington; Canada's representative being mixed up with a lot of private Canadian citizens and others in Washington politics. When we have a treaty it should be adhered to. There is an International Joint Commission before whom this case should be taken with a view to obtaining relief for Canada from an intolerable state of affairs. The Canadian government are only wasting their time.

[Mr. Church.]

The authorities of the city of Chicago have made a football of this matter for the last ten or fifteen years. True it is that last fall the final judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States was given, but it was away back in 1911 when the matter first went before the courts. First Judge Landis handed down his decision. Appeal was taken to the state courts and on to the Supreme Court of the United States, who held that the city of Chicago was illegally diverting water in violation of the treaty. When a treaty is made with a foreign country, especially with the United States, people of our own kith and kin, surely it should be respected and they should not be allowed to treat it as a scrap of paper.

I am glad to say there is a widespread organization along the Great Lakes and on the upper lakes on both sides of the border against the Chicago pirates, in the cities of Detroit, Cleveland and other cities and towns on the American border, who are all organizing a league against the city of Chicago and are opposing its demand that it be allowed to steal this water out of the lake in perpetuity,—take it away from Canada and divert it to the purposes of a greater sewage system. Why do they not set up a modern system of sewerage as every other city on the Great Lakes has done? Why, if every other city on the Great Lakes did what Chicago is doing there would not be enough water in the lower gulf or lower river to enable small ships to come in.

Not satisfied with the diversion of 12,000 cubic feet per second more than the 4,167 cubic feet allowed by the treaty, the city of Chicago are utilizing a lot of this water for sewage purposes and to generate power for distribution in the district of Chicago to private power users. The treaty is as clear as daylight; there can be no doubt about its construction or interpretation. It provides that there must be no diversion in excess of 4,167 cubic feet per second and that any diversion in excess of that amount must have the joint consent of the two countries. But the city of Chicago do not propose to get the consent of the two countries; they do not propose to get even the consent of their own country; they simply take the law into their own hands, ignore the courts and their own government and go on diverting that amount of water. The courts for years issued injunctions restraining them, but the courts have no way of carrying out their injunctions. Having been beaten in the court of last resort the authorities of the city of Chicago are now appearing before the Secretary for War and asking that in the interim, until such time as they can adopt a new sewage system and until such time as they can arrange to get direct current for commercial and domestic lighting elsewhere, they be allowed to continue this diversion.

What is Canada doing in this matter? Last Friday on the orders of the day I asked who was representing Canada and I took objection to the number of private individuals going down there and saying they were representing this country. These people, without consulting the government in any way, have gone down to Washington as self-appointed representatives of Canada to protest to the government of a foreign country and a foreign Secretary of War with regard to the enforcement of a bona fide boundary waterways treaty made between Great Britain and the United States. I never heard of such a proceeding as going over the heads of the Canadian and British governments and the British ambassador. It has hurt Canada's case before the government and the people of the United States and has resulted in a counter attack on the Hydro and Niagara Power systems. Now, there never was any illegal diversion by Canada of waters from the Niagara river; in fact, the people of Canada are taking less water from the Niagara river than the treaty gives them and a large part of what they do take is exported back to the United States in the form of electrical energy for commercial purposes. As a result of these gentlemen going down to Washington and saying they represented Canada an attack has been made on the light and power projects of Ontario on the Niagara river which never were attacked before, in the hope that attention might thereby be turned away from the diversion of water from the Great Lakes for the sewage purposes of Chicago.

We on this side of the House would do anything possible to help the government to accomplish some definite result because our interests over there are being sacrificed by the manner in which the Chicago people have taken the law into their own hands. I do not criticise the minister; he has been active in this power development proposition all over the country. But I would like to find out from him, first, what he has done to call the attention of the British government to the breach of this waterways treaty; second, what has the British ambassador at Washington done; and, third, who appoints all these private people who are going down there and saying they represent Canada? Just think; they are going down there to represent Canada before the government of a foreign country regarding the diversion of water and the matter of an international treaty between Great Britain and the United States concerning those boundary waters. How do these representatives get passports? They do not represent Canada, and the United States will pay no heed to their representations unless this House and this government get busy and stop the piracy on the lakes. The various harbour works all along the Great Lakes have been interfered with by this diversion, both on the Canadian and the American side. At Detroit, Cleveland and Buffalo the levels are away below what they have been for years, and on the Canadian side, on the St. Lawrence river and lake Ontario from Prescott west as far as Toronto and Hamilton the levels have dropped many inches and in some cases from two to three feet, causing great injury to trade and navigation, and to the development of Canadian ports and power interests. A lot of power plants and waterworks on lake Ontario and the Niagara river are also in jeopardy by reason of this diversion. The levels have also fallen on the Detroit river, lake Erie, lake Huron, Georgian bay and the lower St. Lawrence.

Mr. Speaker, a treaty should be respected as a treaty, especially when it is made between the United States, the Mother Country and Canada. Canada has adhered strictly to the letter of the treaty. It is not using even all the water it is entitled to in the Niagara river, while the United States government is allowing Chicago to divert this vast volume of water. Hon. members will find a complete history of the whole case, the legal and engineering side, and further details with regard to this diversion by Chicago on page 706 of Hansard of March 26, 1924, in the debate on my motion which occupied a whole day last session. The government of Ontario and Canadian municipalities are very much dissatisfied with the way things are going, and probably you cannot blame them for acting themselves although some of them think that Washington and not Ottawa is the capital of Canada so far as this matter is concerned. I do hope the minister will take the question up with the proper authorities. Canada has no right to appear before the Rivers and Harbours committee; Canada should not be represented before any committee or before the Secretary of War of the United States. There is a proper channel through which to take this matter up. It should be taken up through the British government and the British ambassador at Washington and the United States should be told in no uncertain voice that a treaty cannot be treated as a scrap of paper when it is made between Great Britain and the United States.

Canada should file a suit claiming damages covering a period of ten years at $35,000,000 a year and collect the amount from the United States through the government of Great Britain. The United States should be told that Canada will no longer stand for the violation of the treaty, and that it is the duty of the government of the United States to check up Chicago, this pirate of the lakes, for diverting this extra amount of water. Even if Secretary Weeks does give his judgment next week, it is not legal under the Boundary Waterways treaty, because Great Britain is the party of the second part to the treaty and one party alone to the treaty cannot give Chicago the right to illegally divert some 4,167 cubic feet per second without the consent of the other.

In conclusion I urge upon the minister that some definite action be taken, and that action should be taken through the British government and through the British ambassador at Washington and that a damage suit be entered to collect from the United States compensation for the damage and injury done. Well, let us send no more pilgrims to Washington. The Canadian government is responsible for seeing that Canada is protected from this piracy of Chicago, and it should take this matter up through the proper authorities, the British government or the British ambassador at Washington, and not shirk its duties and leave it to provincial and municipal authorities who however deserve credit for taking action when they could not get any results through Ottawa.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the House after listening to the long discussion of last session with respect to the illegal diversion of water by the Chicago drainage system will not be interested in hearing a rehash of that same matter this year; but I should like to put my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church) right in one matter, and that is that this government have not agreed to the diversion of 4,167 feet, nor to the diversion of a single foot of water by Chicago.

I would also like to inform him that all official documents passing between the government of Canada and the government of the United States in respect to this matter have passed through the hands of the British ambassador at Washington, so that in protesting against the illegal diversion of these waters we have been using the proper channel of communication. More cannot be said than that.

With respect to my hon. friend's complaint as to individuals going down there unauthorized, of course, the government of Canada cannot very well stop individuals from going to Washington, nor can they stop them from making statements if they get an opportunity to do so, but I can assure him that they are not speaking on behalf of the government of Canada. In so far as representation of this government is concerned, it is quite true that we have had representatives watching the proceedings, and that policy has been pursued by this government for the past two years. We deem it wise to keep informed on every move that is made with respect to this matter, and for that reason Mr. W. J. Stewart has attended most of the sittings of the Senate committee and the hearings before Secretary of War Weeks with respect to this matter.

One other matter. The diversion itself is the result of an application made by the city of Chicago and granted by the Secretary of War for the United States. Objection has been taken by congress; objection has been taken by every city and state surrounding the city of Chicago; objection has been taken to the polluting of the rivers below Chicago by American representatives themselves; and what we are doing is to protest that they are not entitled, not to 4,167 feet, which my hon. friend has mentioned but to not one single foot of the water diverted. That has been the position which we have maintained religiously throughout the whole of this controversy. Of course, they may proceed to divert this water in spite of Canada's protest, and if Canada is to go to the extent of serving an ultimatum, that, of course, may be done; but my hon. friend knows full well that only by force can that sort of thing be backed up, and that is not the course we have decided upon. We believe that the pressure we have been able to bring to bear upon the American authorities through the British ambassador will have its effect, and I believe that is very apparent at the moment. My hon. friend will remember the decision handed down by the Supreme Court of the United States no later than last fall which declared the diversion illegal. A very vigorous fight is also being maintained in the committee of the Senate by those who are very strenuously opposed to this diversion. I hold in my hand a report from Mr. W. J. Stewart who was at the hearing before Secretary Weeks a few days ago, to the effect that they do intend to take active steps to stop this diversion, allowing, of course, a reasonable time for the city of Chicago to make other arrangements.

One other matter I should like to mention. It is undoubtedly an acute situation which prevails on the Great Lakes to-day. The water levels in lake Superior and the upper lakes are 26 inches lower than they have been for some years. Indeed, since 1891 the lake levels have never been so low as they are at the present moment. The diversion at Chicago is estimated to lower the water in the Great Lakes, in lakes Huron, Erie and Ontario, to the extent of 6 inches. We have this undoubted situation because of the lower levels in the upper lakes and, of course, because of the illegal diversion of the water at Chicago. But we are objecting in a most strenuous way, we are not leaving any stone unturned in order to bring those protests through the proper channels to the attention of the American government. But, Mr. Speaker, I must deny—

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Are the American ports advancing a claim in the same way?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And are they making representations to the American authorities?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. Their representatives are appearing before a committee in congress. The chairman of the Senate committee is Mr. Dempsey, of Buffalo. Every lake port on the American side has been complaining most bitterly, and has appointed delegates to attend the sittings of that committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): The minister is quite right when he says that he does not suppose that the House will want to have everything that was said last year rehearsed. I do not think the House would, I think no one would reasonably expect it. But the House would be very much more interested to know what progress has been made, to know why it is that we still continue to be in the position of having an obligation—which so far has not been denied—flouted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In what way has it been flouted?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend wants to ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am asking in what way the obligation has been flouted?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend was not listening to me. I asked why we are in a position of having an obligation, which as yet has not been denied, flouted? Surely the government know that water is still being taken? I assume that they know that. I would assume from what the minister immediately interested had said it would not be necessary to point out to the government that water is being taken. I would have assumed that it was not necessary either to point out that we had a treaty dealing with this matter. Why, that was admitted last year. What we are interested in knowing to-day is surely this: There is a treaty admitted. There is the admitted taking of the water. What is the reason the treaty is not observed? Is there any reason to be given, or are we to understand that the matter really is—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does my hon. friend infer that there is a treaty allowing the American government to take any water?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, no. I am afraid I shall have to go into the whole history of the matter again. I thought the minister understood the situation.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend spoke about a treaty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly, the treaty in connection with the waters of the Great lakes, providing that they are not to be withdrawn. Well, there we are. There is the treaty, the water is still being taken, and we have not yet been told why. What is the reason put forward for the taking of the water? Is the reason really, as was almost in so many words stated by the minister—and I was very sorry to hear him stating it—that the only way the United States government can be got at is by an ultimatum, to be followed by force? Because that is what my hon. friend said.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh no, I did not. I said it was for my hon. friends to suggest what action should be taken. We have gone the whole distance with protest, what else would my hon. friend suggest?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Ah, I do not think the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) ever suggested force. The only suggestion of force that I heard came from my hon. friend the minister; I do not think he meant it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Let me repeat what I said if my hon. friend will permit. I said that we had gone the whole distance with protest through the proper channels. Now my hon. friend suggests that there is some other course, that we have not gone far enough, and I should like to know what that is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We do not know exactly how far the government have gone.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We will be perfectly willing to bring down the despatches.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps that will be the easiest thing to do, to table the despatches and then have this matter brought up another time. In any event I think it would be a good thing for the government that this motion should pass. It is merely backing up the government in taking the necessary action to look after Canada's rights. Do they object to it? I would assume not. If there is objection to it what is the objection? Is there not real sincerity in any action taken to look after Canada's water? I believe there is. Then why is there any objection to the House passing this resolution? I think the government should be asking the House to pass a resolution of the strongest possible kind in its aid. It really does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, a most extraordinary situation that a motion—which after all is really a motion asking the government to take any and all steps it can take to assert Canada's rights—should be objected to by anybody. There is another thing which seems to me to be very incomprehensible, and that is that in these two years—so far as the public know, so far as we glean from newspapers and the like—the question which is exercising public authority in the United States is not a question of solemn treaty rights, but is the question as to whether or not it is convenient to observe solemn treaty rights, just finding out where the balance of convenience is, whether this city here or that city there is going to be hurt more than Chicago will be helped. The effect of that would be lost a great deal if the government is in a position to take the House into its confidence. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing, if the mover of the resolution is also willing, that this matter should stand for the purpose of the papers being brought down. I understood the minister to say that he saw no objection to that course. If there is any objection I should like to continue my remarks.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no objection to bringing down the papers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend says there is no objection I do not want to delay the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Proceed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know who is really—I suppose the right hon. Prime Minister—

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We should like to dispose of this motion to-night.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With the undertaking that the papers will be brought down?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, certainly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then may I ask if there is any objection to the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is objection to the motion. It implies that action has not been taken by the government whereas action has been taken—immediate and direct action as the despatches will show. Last session a return was placed on the table of this House, a printed copy of which I have in my hand at the moment; it contains several despatches, representations made through the British embassy to the United States government with respect to this very matter of the Chicago drainage canal. Since last year further despatches have been forwarded. In the meantime the United States government itself has been dealing with this matter in a most effective way, in a manner more effective than would be possible for any of the other parties concerned to deal with it because the United States government itself has taken the position, upholding the decision of its Supreme court, that water should not be diverted through the Chicago canal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the United States government takes that position the matter is settled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We hope so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the United States government takes that position so far as Canada's rights are concerned it is the first we have heard of it, and this debate has served a useful purpose in bringing out that information. If it is taking the position that Canada is right and that this water ought not to be taken I have nothing to say.

10 p.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States a few weeks ago.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend is confusing the question of national rights with court rights. Canada's rights were never submitted to the Supreme court, never, and my right hon. friend misses the point entirely. Let me try and make it clear what the Supreme court did, and I hope that I will be interrupted at once if my statement is wrong: What the Supreme court did was to consider the dispute between American interests entirely—the right of Chicago to obtain the water or not to obtain it. I think I am right in that, and what the Supreme court has done is to hold that Chicago has not the right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That Chicago has not the right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has gone further; he has said that so far as the government of the United States is concerned they take the position that the water ought not to be taken away.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is the view of the Supreme Court of the United States, supported by the government, as I understand it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In what way do they support it? In the answers to the representations made by this government? If that is so, I am content. If our treaty rights are now acceded to, and the only matter is one of the United States government properly policing some of its own subjects, I think we can safely leave that matter to them, and I am perfectly satisfied. That is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the United States government is able so to adjust this matter, in the interests of certain American states, as to prevent a continuance of the diversion of the water, the problem will be satisfactorily solved so far as the United States is concerned; and if satisfactorily solved so far as they are concerned, it will be equally solved so far as Canada is concerned, seeing the same waters are affected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the right hon. gentleman is right in one sense, but entirely wrong in another. He is right in the sense that if, as in the case he predicates, the majority of interests in the United States—that is American interests—is in favour of upholding the treaty, it helps undoubtedly; but it does not help very much on the other point, and it is rather a sad reflection if we are to approach this matter with the United States knowing that the regulations are only to be enforced if the preponderance of American interests calls for their enforcement. If my hon. friend tells me that the United States government have admitted, not rights in the water in Cleveland, not rights in the water at Detroit, not that as a result of the fact that Cleveland has rights and Detroit has rights that we get our rights that they have admitted, but rights in the water in Canada, I am content, and it is not worth while prolonging the discussion.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): May I say a word about this matter? The object to be attained in this particular case is to stop what I submit is an illegal diversion of water at Chicago. If that can be obtained the discussion as to treaty rights between the United States and Canada is a matter that can be threshed out. But I make this statement: that never since this controversy began has Canada been in as good shape as she is at the present time in regard to it. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church), if I remember rightly last year, criticised the government because they did not send somebody to Washington. At least, that is my memory of it. This government is not responsible at all for any person who went from any part of Canada, except Mr. Stewart, who was sent down from Ottawa, he being a very highly valuable official in the Marine department. This question has not been lost sight of by the government of Canada; but in addition to its own protest it has had also with it the protest of a large portion of the territory of the United States affected, and if that solid body of opinion against the diversion of water at Chicago is working with the United States government, and Canada is protesting through the legal channel in the constitutional way, what more can Canada do? I am not sure whether I will be upheld in this view or not by the House.

My hon. friend said a few moments ago that we should have asked that this question of the diversion of water be referred to the International Joint Commission. That immediately would be an admission that there was something to refer to the commission. My view—and I think it is the view of my colleagues—is that we should stand on the ground of the treaty rights of Canada, and there is nothing to refer to the International Joint Commission. When the correspondence is brought down it will be found that the position taken by Canada is a very strong one. These international relations are delicate matters at times, and Canada surely does not want to make any move which might jeopardize the action which would bring about an end of this diversion. I think that hon. members will find, when all the correspondence is brought down, that we have acted along lines of wisdom and effectiveness. The relationships in this matter between the United States government and the Canadian government are the most cordial and anything which has been suggested by Canada with the authority of this government and the Canadian parliament has been through correspondence between the two governments.

Now protests have been made and the progress towards settlement of this question has not been closed. The Supreme Court of the United States granted an injunction. After that injunction an appeal was made on behalf of Chicago to allow a continued diversion of ten thousand second cubic feet —that is ten thousand cubic feet a second. If members of the House have watched closely they will have seen I think that the Secretary of War immediately told the Chicago representatives that they need not discuss the continuation, even for a short time, of that amount of water because he would not grant a license for it, and it is to him they apply for permission. The question arose following that as to the result that might accrue if this diversion of water were immediately stopped at Chicago. After all, in this treaty and in the arrangement between the United States and Canada their reason for the diversion of water or for the use of water is given and placed in proper sequence. Chicago has been taking more water than she was entitled to under the treaty, and Canada does not admit that she is entitled to one cubic foot of water, and that is the ground on which we are standing.

The United States government has been very cordial in this matter, and has treated our protest with the greatest deference, and our protest combined with the protests made by the states of the union affected has been treated with due regard, and I think has had great effect. The Supreme court issued an injunction, a hearing was had before the Secretary of War who grants the licenses for diversion, and he told the Chicago people that they need not argue to continue the diversion even for a short time of the amount they are now taking, but they are considering very seriously what effect it would have on the health of the millions of people in Chicago if they immediately cut off this water. I think nobody in Canada or anywhere else would take any sudden action that would injure the health of a very large portion of the population of Chicago and vicinity. But the United States, through their Secretary of War, laid down the principle at that hearing that although a diversion is made, extending to a certain percentage which he mentioned, it could be only for a term of years. That term of years has not, I think, been decided upon, and the diversion is merely for the purpose of allowing Chicago to put in a modern system of drainage. In addition to the objection taken by Canada and certain states in the matter of navigation, some of the states affected by the pouring of sewage into the river used by Chicago in the lake diversion are objecting on account of the injury to the health of their localities. On the whole, therefore, the position is good for Canada at the present time as well as for the states of the American union injuriously affected, but it will take a little time.

There are two or three things which I object to in the passing of this motion. In the first place, it asks the House to tell the government to do what we have already done; it implies that Canada has not done anything. But I submit that Canada has done everything that ought to be done or that can be done under the circumstances and done constitutionally. Furthermore, suppose in the face of the progress that has been made in this matter, the Canadian parliament should pass a resolution which practically declared that neither the United States nor Canada had done anything: that would prejudice our case very materially perhaps before the United States authorities, and that is one thing we do not want to do. So far the progress has been satisfactory, and I think it would be a serious mistake on the part of the Canadian parliament to pass a resolution at this time which might in any way prejudice our position.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) has referred to the action of the Canadian government by way of protest. I have in my hand a few of the despatches that have passed; it will I think be of interest to the House were I to read specifically what in this connection has been said on two or three occasions by the government of Canada to the government of the United States.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Have these been published?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, in part. In the return that was brought down last year and placed on the table of the House in reference to the St. Lawrence waterway project and the Chicago drainage canal, there was a copy of a despatch sent by His Excellency the Governor General to the Charge d'Affaires at Washington on December 19, 1923, and subsequently transmitted through the British embassy to the Secretary of State of the United States. That despatch makes reference to previous communications and reads:

Sir,—

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that numerous communications have been received by the Canadian government from various interests and corporate bodies directly concerned, protesting vigorously against the diversion of water from lake Michigan. The position of the government of Canada in opposition to and in protest of the injurious effects of this diversion, both to navigation and water power, has been fully declared in representations which have been made to the government of the United States. The attitude of the Canadian government was clearly made known in a brief filed with the Secretary of War of the United States on the 27th March, 1912, and in Governor General's despatches No. 145 of the 23rd November, 1912, No. 16 of the 25th February, 1913, telegram of the 8th of June, 1916, No. 135 of the 9th June, 1916 and secret telegram of the 15th April, 1921, to His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington for transmission to the government of the United States.

In connection with the aforementioned representations, it has been brought to the attention of the Canadian government that on or about the month of June, 1923, the government of the United States was granted an injunction restraining the sanitary district of Chicago from diverting water from lake Michigan, and, further that this injunction would not become active for a period of six months, to permit the sanitary district time in which to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I shall be grateful if you will inform the government of the United States that the declared attitude of the government of Canada in the above matter is unchanged.

My government request that appropriate enquiries may be made regarding the legal proceeding undertaken by the government of the United States, which the Canadian government confidently trusts will be vigorously pressed.

I have, etc.,

BYNG OF VIMY.

That despatch shows first of all that this is not a new matter, having been first dealt with as long ago as 1912, and that the governments which preceded the present administration have from time to time also registered their protest. Beyond registering a protest they apparently have not felt that any further course was either possible or advisable, having regard to the nature of the situation. It makes clear also that so far as the United States was concerned, many states in the union have precisely the same interest in preventing a continuance of this diversion of water at Chicago as have provinces of this Dominion lying on the opposite side of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence. Further, it indicates that those states in the United States which were primarily interested were successful in having the whole matter brought by the government of the United States before the Supreme court of that country, and were also successful in having an injunction issued restraining the sanitary district of Chicago from diverting the water in question. At each stage of subsequent proceedings our government has taken steps to ensure the Canadian point of view being driven home in order to reinforce and strengthen the attitude being taken in the United States by the government of the United States itself to restrain Chicago from continuing a diversion of the lake Michigan waters through its drainage canal.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has any injunction been issued yet?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it was granted, and a six months' period was given to allow the people of Chicago to make the necessary changes. When the case was set for hearing before the Supreme Court of the United States, care was taken to ensure Canada's right to have persons present at the hearing, in a position to advise, if that were thought possible, or to assist in any way that the circumstances might warrant. Before I go further, I might read a portion of another despatch of date March 19, 1924. On that date the following was sent to His Majesty's ambassador at Washington by His Excellency the Governor General:

The question of the diversion of water from the St. Lawrence watershed into that of the Mississippi by the sanitary district of Chicago is still causing great concern in Canada, particularly in view of the bill on the subject which has been introduced into congress, and my ministers desire that the government of the United States be informed of their hope that no action will be taken either to confirm or permit the extension of the claims of the sanitary district to continue any diversion and thus adversely affect important interests in the navigation of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence river and the development of power, actual or prospective, upon the river or upon interlake connecting waters.

The position of the government of Canada in opposition to and in protest against the injurious effects of this diversion has been consistently maintained, and is still held, and my ministers venture to suggest that it would be unfortunate if, now that the development of the St. Lawrence waterway for navigation and power purposes is under consideration, any action should be taken which might adversely affect the possibility of such development. They sincerely trust that this view will commend itself to the government of the United States.

On January 9 of the present year our government received from the British ambassador at Washington a despatch giving particulars of a decision which had been given by the United States Supreme court. I will read this despatch to the House because it will help to explain the present situation and the nature of the action which the government has taken.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is this the first public statement on that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is, yes. At any rate this despatch has not been brought down. It will be brought down with the other papers now they have been asked for.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was 1924?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The last despatch I read was March 17, 1924. This is from the British ambassador to His Excellency the Governor General:

British Embassy,
Washington, D.C., January 9, 1925.

With reference to my dispatch No. 278 of July 17 last, I have the honour to transmit to you herewith copies of the decision of the United States Supreme Court delivered by Mr. Justice Holmes on the 5th instant affirming the decree for an injunction against the sanitary district of Chicago to prevent them diverting water from lake Michigan in excess of the 250,000 cubic feet per minute allowed by the Secretary of War.

This opinion begins by summarizing the defence of the Chicago authorities and refuses to take seriously their denial that they are at present diverting a volume of water far in excess of the allowance permitted. It then points out that the main arguments on behalf of an injunction are, firstly, the authority of the United States to remove obstructions to inter-state and foreign commerce, and, secondly—

To this I would particularly direct the attention of my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton).

—and, secondly, the terms of the treaty of January 11, 1909, with Great Britain, which expressly forbids action affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters without the authority of the United States or Canada and the approval of the International Joint Commission established under that treaty. It affirms the force of the act of Congress of March 3, 1899, and its application to the present case, and the authority of the Minister of War to act thereunder. It disallows the defence of the Chicago sanitary district based upon the permits already granted by the Secretary of War in regard to the diversion of this water as being too futile to need reply, and finally after commenting unfavourably on the delay which has been permitted in the legal proceedings instituted in 1913 to determine the rights of the sanitary district in this matter, grants an injunction to take effect in sixty days without prejudice to any permit the Secretary of War may issue under the authority conferred on him by the law.

This decision of the Supreme Court was not unexpected.

The despatch continues:

Meanwhile the House of Representatives has referred to a committee a measure introduced by Congressman Hull to sanction a diversion of water from lake Michigan up to 10,000 cubic feet per second and to create a nine foot channel from the lake to the gulf of Mexico. Further, the senate committee is to resume its hearings next Tuesday on Senator McCormick's resolution for a joint committee of both houses of congress to investigate the nine foot channel question. Copies of the Hull bill and the McCormick resolution are enclosed herein.

I understand that the Canadian National Advisory Committee recently met in Ottawa to prepare instructions for the guidance of the Dominion representative on the Joint Engineering Board and Your Excellency will no doubt inform me in due course what further action the Dominion government, after consideration of the present favourable decision of the Supreme court, desire me to take vis a vis the United States government in this matter.

I am sending a copy of this dispatch to His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

I have the honour to be, My Lord,
Your Excellency's most obedient, humble servant,
ESME HOWARD.

Now, that despatch—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What further action has been taken?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING. I am coming to that. I want to make it perfectly clear that we have been acting in conjunction with the British government through the British ambassador at Washington; all parties have been duly informed; we have been taking the course which we believed to be, and which I think will prove to be, the most effective in bringing about the result desired by this country. As has been mentioned, an application was made to the United States Secretary of War to give a special permit to the Chicago sanitary district for a continuance of this diversion for a certain period. We are informed of that hearing. We immediately communicated with the government of the United States and asked that we be permitted to be represented. On the 16th of this month the following despatch was sent to the British ambassador by His Excellency the Governor General:

Information has been received by Canadian government that a hearing is to be held before the Secretary of War of the United States at Washington on February 20, upon an application from the sanitary district of Chicago, for permission to divert 10,000 cubic feet per second from the waters of lake Michigan for "sewage disposal and sanitary purposes," and also to discuss the terms of a proposed permit from the Secretary of War to the sanitary district for a lesser diversion of water for a limited terms of years, and it is the desire of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to send Mr. William J. Stewart, chief hydrographer of his department, to be present at the hearing.

My ministers request that necessary arrangements may be made for the attendance of Mr. Stewart.

BYNG.

Necessary arrangements were made, the government of the United States cordially acquiesced in our request, and Mr. Stewart was present. As I mentioned in the House the other day when a question was asked on the point, Mr. Stewart was instructed to attend but not to participate unless he should be called upon to make some special representations. He was asked by the Secretary of War, if any investigation had been made by Canada to determine whether the lowering was due to the abstraction or to other causes. He replied that Canada had used exactly the same method of investigation as had been used for the upper lakes. An elaborate system of stream measurements had been taken, automatic gauges being used for determining the levels. Then Mr. Stewart in his report made to the minister on his return adds this paragraph:

I stated that it was Canada's earnest desire that any order he might issue would have in view the earliest possible complete stoppage of the abstraction, and that we had expressed our objection to it in a great many dispatches that had been filed from time to time with the Secretary of State, commencing with an elaborate brief presented to Mr. Stimson in 1912.

When we sent Mr. Stewart to Washington we felt it would strengthen his hands if while he was there a further despatch were sent to the Secretary of State for the United States, and accordingly the following was transmitted by His Excellency the Governor General to the British ambassador at Washington on the 20th of this month for transmission to the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes:

Attention of the Canadian government has been directed to a report that the Secretary of War of the United States has fixed a time for public hearings on the application of the sanitary district of Chicago for permission to increase the quantity of water which it is now permitted to divert from lake Michigan under authority of the Secretary of War, and proposes to consider whether in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers the amount permitted to be diverted should under certain conditions be increased to 8,500 second feet in lieu of 4,167 second feet to which it is limited under the recent judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Government of Canada would not wish to oppose such interim measures as may be necessary to protect the health of the inhabitants of the city of Chicago, but in this connection it feels impelled to reiterate the protests it has already made against the abstraction of water from the St. Lawrence basin and to make it clear that the government of Canada does not surrender any claims that might be put forward for consequential loss suffered or to be suffered. It is impossible to lose sight of the fact that the effect of a present increase in the permitted diversion will be to postpone the relief for which navigation and other interests injuriously affected by the conduct of the Chicago sanitary district have been too long waiting and which subject only to the paramount necessity of safeguarding public health they are now entitled to receive.

The injury to Canadian interests by any lowering of the natural levels of the Great Lakes, their connecting waters and the St. Lawrence river by a diminution of the natural water supply is of constantly increasing importance not only from the point of view of navigation in the lakes and the lower St. Lawrence, but also from the point of view of power development. It is recognized also that United States interests are likewise substantially affected.

The Canadian government feels confident that the government of the United States is fully alive to the advisability of restricting within the narrowest possible limits the amount of water to be diverted. It feels sure that no permit will be granted for the diversion of any water not essential to protect the health of the population of Chicago and that the period during which the diversion must on this ground continue will be made as short as circumstances permit.

That, Mr. Speaker, brings the matter up almost to the present week, and I submit, without supplementing the despatches which I have just read, that I have given to the House ample evidence that the government of Canada is watching and safeguarding in every particular the interests of our country in this matter. In this connection we have the active support and co-operation of the British ambassador at Washington and of the British government at home through the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In view of the fact that the government of the United States itself applied for an injunction, that the Supreme Court of the United States granted this injunction to the government of the United States and that the matter in the United States has thus reached such a satisfactory stage, I think it would be unfortunate if a resolution were to go out from this House at this time to the country and to the United States implying that the government of Canada had in any way failed to take necessary action in the matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my right hon. friend will permit a question so as to complete the narrative: He has said that Chicago was promoting a bill before the United States congress following the judgment of the Supreme court. Perhaps he could tell us how that stands?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the moment I do not recall what particular reference was made to that bill, but I do think that the despatches I have read are sufficient to indicate that any bill of the kind would come under our general protest, because we have taken the broad stand that any measure that will allow this diversion to continue would be inimical to our interests and should not be permitted. That is the broad position we have taken and it is being maintained.

May I put one further aspect before the House, because I think it will help to interpret to hon. members the point of view of the government in this matter. Certain of the states in the United States are as much interested in this matter as are the people of this country. It has been the subject of consideration in the courts in the United States as well as by the government of the United States, and both the courts and the government have decided against Chicago. I submit that for Canada to endeavour to interfere either with the judicial or the executive procedure of the United States when both are in accord with our own wishes and interests would be to set matters back rather than to help them. I hope that under the circumstances my hon. friend (Mr. Church) will not press his resolution.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has a counter protest been made that the hydro-electric project in Ontario is unfairly diverting the same waters?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There have been protests and counter protests. I have seen by the press—

Mr. MACLEAN (York): They do not come up in connection with this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, we have been trying to keep the two questions separate. I think it is altogether in the interests of both governments that they should be kept separate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite agree with my right hon. friend as to the bill. In view of the finding of the Supreme court that the treaty holds, the bill, of course, would be a far greater breach than anything else could be. In view of all the circumstances I have the permission of the hon. member (Mr. Church) that the motion be withdrawn.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the hon. member be allowed to withdraw his motion?

Motion withdrawn.

ANNUITY TO DR. SAUNDERS

On the motion of Mr. MILLAR:

Whereas the Canadian people in general, and the people of western Canada in particular, have reaped and are reaping still, material benefits to the extent of many millions of dollars annually as a result of the discovery by Dr. Charles E. Saunders, of that variety of spring wheat known as Marquis, which possesses early ripening and strong milling qualities, therefore, be it resolved that this House is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of granting a life annuity of $5,000 to Dr. Saunders.

Mr. MILLAR: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to go on with this resolution, but I have just been in communication with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) as to the necessity of it. If necessary I can go on to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has already undertaken to do what it suggests. The estimates for the present session contain an appropriation of the amount suggested in the resolution, namely, $5,000, as an annuity to Dr. Saunders.

Mr. MILLAR: The resolution proposes that it shall be made a life annuity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An annuity is a payment each year during the life of the person to whom it is granted.

Mr. MILLAR: That makes it permanent?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MILLAR: Dropped.

Motion dropped.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

CANTEEN FUNDS

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider a proposed resolution with regard to the distribution of canteen funds.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Do I understand that the protest that I read in the House to-day is rather ill-founded?

Mr. BELAND: I think so, Mr. Speaker. I will give some explanation in this matter when the resolution is before the House.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

On the order that the House go into committee of Supply:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand that an arrangement has been made whereby the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be taken up to-night but not proceeded with, so that the government will have full right of way thereafter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Trade and Commerce—bounty on crude petroleum, administration of, $1,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this the item that has to do with petroleum up in Lambton?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There will be quite a little discussion upon this probably, and I think it will save time if the minister will have full particulars of that when this item comes up again. Of course, we cannot do anything now.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 10.54 p.m.

Friday, February 27, 1925.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Evidence taken by the Royal Grain Commision.—Hon. Mr. Low.

NATURALIZATION LAWS AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has received any communication from the British government relative to the amendment of the naturalization laws to prevent a woman of British nationality married to an alien from losing her British citizenship except by declaration of alienage, and providing for the re-admission to British citizenship of British women married to aliens where the marriage state, although officially existing, has for all practical purposes terminated? —and, if so, what measures the government proposes to take to secure the removal at the earliest possible moment of the disabilities in this respect now resting on Canadian women?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall any recent communication. The subject was discussed at the Imperial Conference of 1923. But I will have the records of the Department of External Affairs looked into to see if any communication has been received since then.

Mr. BROWN: The despatch says the matter was discussed in the British House and the Dominions were to be communicated with in respect of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not recall any despatch recently; there may have been one within the past five or six months. However, I will have it looked up and inform my hon. friend.

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY OUTLET

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I wish to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) if he has received any report from the two railway companies with regard to the Peace river transportation question; and, if so, will he give the House the substance of the report?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the only communications I have received lately concerning the question will be found in letters from Mr. Beatty and Sir Henry Thornton, saying that they hope to be ready in a few days to lay their views before the Minister of Railways.

SOLDIERS' PENSIONS

FORTHCOMING LEGISLATION ON CANTEEN FUND AND CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. WALLACE STEWART (Humboldt): I should like to ask the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, if the government have under consideration the introduction of legislation along the line of the Pension bill of last session?

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): A similar question is on the order paper. I will answer the question in due course.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (East York): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government if they have had representations made to them on behalf of the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada with regard to the distribution of the canteen fund? Also, if the government are aware that there seems to be considerable stir among the various branches of this organization as to the distribution of the fund? Also, are they doing anything to allay the anxiety of those concerned?

Mr. BELAND: Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend was absent yesterday when a question was asked by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) in this connection. All the despatches that have come to me from the different organizations state that a certain amount of money, $100,000, is intended to be paid to one particular organization under the authority of a bill which is shortly to be introduced in the House. The only answer I can give my hon. friend is that the information is not correct. There is no intention of introducing a bill to apportion $100,000 to any organization or set of organizations of returned men.

Mr. ARTHURS: Or any amount?

Mr. BELAND: There is $100,000 laid aside for certain purposes, but not destined to one particular organization. I do not know whether I make myself clear in this respect. The bill which passed this House last session, but which was rejected by the Senate, provided that $100,000 should be paid to a central board of trustees, which board should attend to the organization and maintenance of a Veterans' Service Bureau here in Ottawa. No reference whatever was made in the bill to any one particular organization.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will the hon. minister state whether any order in council has been passed in the meantime with regard to the apportionment of this fund? I asked a similar question yesterday.

Mr. BELAND: I think I informed my hon. friend yesterday that no order in council has been passed disposing of one cent of the canteen fund to anybody.

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that on the orders of the day the leaders on both sides are usually allowed to put a question or two, but hon. members generally must confine themselves to at most one question, otherwise the sittings of the House will be unduly prolonged. I hope the hon. member will be very brief in any further remarks he makes on the orders of the day.

Mr. HARRIS: I would just like to read in this connection, Mr. Speaker, a telegram I hold in my hand:

> Our contention is that canteen money should not be used for any organization that does not represent the returned soldiers.

I would like to ask the minister if any of this money is being distributed by any organization that does not represent the returned soldiers?

Mr. BELAND: I have just stated that no canteen fund money has been distributed to anybody so far by this government. I share the view expressed in that telegram that the money should not be apportioned to any one particular organization.

Mr. CLARK: Yesterday I asked the minister when it was contemplated that legislation in regard to pensions would be introduced in the House, and he said that notice would probably be given next week. I understood him to say to-day that that question would be answered on a later day.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend is mistaken in that. The question asked by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Stewart) was whether the bill which is to be introduced will be the same bill as that of last year, and that is the question which appears on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs).

OLD AGE PENSIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): I would like to ask the government if any action has been taken on the report of the Old Age Pensions committee of last session? If so, what action has been taken? And will legislation be introduced this year looking to the establishment of a system of old age pensions?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): That question is on the order paper and will be answered as soon as possible.

SUPPLY

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Trade and Commerce—bounty on crude petroleum, administration of, $1,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have had the question of petroleum bounties up now for two separate years, and we have had information as to the amounts of production and the amounts paid. Will the minister tell us exactly how the production stands at present and what bounties have been paid?

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This vote is $1,500 less than the vote of last year. It is to take care of the administration of the bounty. As the committee is no doubt aware, the bounty will be discontinued on the 30th of June of this year. The following are the values of the production for the years 1919 to 1924 inclusive, on which the bounty has been based:

Year	Amount
1919	$856,038
1920	919,935
1921	641,533
1922	611,176
1923	542,555
1924	475,985

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister give the number of barrels?

Mr. LOW: The following are the number of barrels of 35 gallons each:

Year	Barrels
1919	240,446
1920	196,251
1921	187,541
1922	179,068
1923	171,902
1924	160,830

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the production in barrels for the last six months?

Mr. LOW: I have not the figures for the last six months only, but I can obtain them if my hon. friend wishes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The figures given last year, which were concurred in, as I believe, by the department and accepted without the slightest dispute from anybody, showed a total production of petroleum of 160,000 barrels. They were for the year that had been finished; we are now a year later. They cannot be the same. What my hon. friend has been giving is the production as of the previous year, so that the figures are a year out. I also point out to him that the other factor which was a matter of importance was that the production down to date—which would be for the then last year—in Lambton, which is the place particularly affected, was 145,238 barrels. What I would like to find out, if the department themselves know what they have been doing and what bounties they have been paying, is, what the corresponding figures are at the present time.

Mr. LOW: The figures I have given to the House are for the calendar year—160,830 barrels for the twelve months ended December 31, 1924.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But the bounties, as the minister knows, are paid according to the fiscal year.

Mr. LOW: The bounties are paid monthly as the claims come in.

Mr. LeSUEUR: Can the minister tell us what bounty was paid on the oil produced since July 1, 1924?

Mr. LOW: I can only give my hon. friend the figures for the twelve months ending December 31, 1924; we have not got it for the six months, but I shall be very glad to get the figures for each month if my hon. friend desires.

Mr. LeSUEUR: I should like to get them.

Mr. LOW: For the twelve months ended December 31, 1924, the bounties paid amounted to $63,857.

Mr. LeSUEUR: I would also like to ask the minister—and I do not do this in any antagonistic sense whatever—as to the results of the investigation made by the government into the situation in the oil producing territories. Is the government taking any action as a result of the investigation, or studying the question with a view to action?

Mr. LOW: My department has nothing to do with that investigation. I imagine it would come under Mines or the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MacLAREN: How much bounty was paid for the petroleum produced in Albert county?

Mr. LOW: The bounties paid in Albert county last year amounted to $3,648.14.

Mr. FANSHER: What was the total number of claims for bounty last year?

Mr. LOW: We have not that information, but we can easily get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. LeSUEUR: Might I ask the hon. minister if this item had not better stand until we have the report on that investigation? Until we get that report, and until we know what action the government is going to take, the House is really not in a position to vote on the administration. This is a matter of vital importance to a certain section up there, and I think the proper department should give the House the information it requires.

Mr. LOW: What difference would it make? If it is found that the amount in the main estimates is not sufficient, it will be a very simple matter to place an amount in the supplementaries. If any change is necessary, that will be a matter for the Minister of Finance when the budget comes down. So I do not see that any object is realized in holding up the item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would not think there would be any need for any mystery about it. There is always more or less mystery about some moves from the treasury benches, but after some difficulty last year, when the mystery was dispelled, we were told that Dr. Hume had been sent up there to see what ought to be done. He took some time, but he did finally get there, and we wanted to find out if he had made a report, and if so, what it was. We were told, as I recollect, by the genial Minister of Mines (Mr. Stewart) that a report had been made, but it had not been made; that a letter had been written, but it had not been written; that it was quite true there was a communication, but it was confidential and personal, and so could not be brought down. I would think because it was personal it might possibly be all the more correct. Is there any reason why the people up there cannot know what the departmental information is as to their industry? It is a year ago now since this was up; it is a year ago now since they have desired to know what the department which is supposed to know all about this industry thinks of it; and they still do not know. Surely there is no reason why the report of Dr. Hume cannot be used by my hon. friend to-day.

Mr. LOW: I shall be very glad to bring the matter to the attention of my colleague the Minister of the Interior, and have the report, if there is a report, brought down providing there is no objection to such action.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the matter is dealt with that way, I suppose that will happen which happened last year, that we shall be told the report is personal and is not going to be brought down, and in the meantime we get no information upon it. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) was in the chamber a moment ago, but unfortunately he has gone. I should have thought he could tell us in a moment whether there is any use looking for any assistance in that regard or not. The amount of production in Lambton last year was given as 145,238 barrels. Can my hon. friend tell me what the Lambton production is this year?

Mr. LOW: I am sorry that the record here does not give the figures by counties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then let us take Ontario, because the Lambton production is pretty nearly the whole Ontario production, although there is some in Kent.

Mr. LOW: I am sorry, but it is impossible for me to give my hon. friend to-day the amount of oil production in any particular county or province. However, I would be very glad to bring down the details by provinces if my hon. friend wishes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I want is just what I told my hon. friend last night—and I think he understood the reference pretty well,—full particulars in connection with these particular bounties that Ontario is so widely interested in and especially this particular part of Ontario. The first thing necessary, of course, is to know how the industry stands to-day, and I cannot appreciate my hon. friend's position at all. It is only a few minutes ago that he gave the production of oil in New Brunswick.

Mr. LOW: There is just one county, Albert.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly, one county; I do not care where it is. Then I asked for the particulars of oil production in one county in Ontario, and the minister said he could not give it. What is the difficulty in the way of giving information respecting oil production in one county in Ontario when there is no difficulty with respect to giving the information as to the production in one county in New Brunswick?

Mr. LOW: The difference is that oil production is confined to one county in New Brunswick. There is no desire at all to withhold any information from any hon. member. There is nothing to conceal, but it would be utterly impossible to bring down with every item all the details of any particular industry. If my hon. friend presses for the information we can obtain it for him. I shall be glad to furnish any information that he wishes with the most minute details.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Again, I cannot appreciate my hon. friend's position. He says he can give these details for the province of New Brunswick because oil is only being produced in one county. Then he told me he could not give the information for the county of Lambton and I said "Very well, let us have it for the province of Ontario." Surely my hon. friend knows what was done in the province of Ontario as a whole. That is not a matter of much detail; the figures must be in his department.

Mr. LOW: It is a very simple matter. If my hon. friend wishes to have that information I shall allow the item to stand and get it for him. Also I have no objection at all to producing any other information in connection with the matter. If my hon. friend will accept my word and allow the item to pass, I shall bring down the desired information. Otherwise the item can stand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it will probably save time if I tell my hon. friend what information I desire, it is really cognate to this item. The production in the county of Lambton last year, according to the figures given by the department as I recollect them when this matter was discussed, last session, was 145,238 barrels. I want similar information in respect to the period just closed. Then I want to know how many wells are being operated in Lambton. Last year there were 3,570 wells under operation, and there were 216 power plants. A further matter of importance and interest is the question of cost. The cost last year, at the commencement of the year, was $2.03 a barrel and later on, if I remember it correctly, $2.60 a barrel. These figures were given at the time the discussion took place in June last year. Again, the amount of bounty paid per barrel, on the basis of the calculation of last year, was 52½ cents. I should like to know how much is being paid now. The item should stand until we get these details.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister be good enough, when he is obtaining that information, to give me a statement as to whether there are any wells in Alberta receiving a bounty. I ask for this information because I believe some wells in that province are receiving a bounty while others are not.

Mr. LOW: There are some wells in Alberta in receipt of a bounty. Does my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) wish the item to stand?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, yes, I want that information.

Mr. LOW: All right.

Item stands.

The Copper Bounties Act, 1923, (bounty on copper bars or rods)—administration, $1,500.

Mr. LOW: This item is $1,000 less than the amount voted last year. We found that we did not require as large an amount as we had anticipated and consequently we have effected this reduction.

Mr. CALDWELL: What amount was expended last year for this purpose?

Mr. EVANS: Will the minister state what amount has been paid in bounties since this act came into force, and to what companies the payments have been made?

Mr. LOW: The amount expended up to January 31, 1925, was $130.90.

Mr. EVANS: To what company was that payment made?

Mr. LOW: That was expenditure in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. EVANS: I should like to inform the minister that I asked for the amount of bounties paid and to what companies?

Mr. LOW: Yes, but when my hon. friend was putting that question the ex-Minister of Finance was asking how much had been spent in connection with this vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not said a word this time.

Mr. LOW: Only two claims have been presented to the department up to January 31, 1925. These claims from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Trail, B.C., were based upon a production of 1,164,140 pounds of copper bars, and the amount of bounty was $14,551.75.

Mr. CLARK: What was the value of the output?

Mr. LOW: The bounty is paid at the rate of 1½ cents a pound of copper bar. We do not know the value of the output which totalled 1,164,140 pounds.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister stated that nothing had been paid out last year except overhead expenses. Now he brings in an item amounting to, if my hearing is correct, $14,000. He is only asking for a vote of $2,500 for this year.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend does not understand that we look after the administration of the act and we have nothing to do with the paying of the bounties. They are paid through the Finance department. We simply pay for the administration, the checking up of the quantities and the amount of the bounty that is paid from time to time.

Mr. ARTHURS: Following up the idea, if the total expenses of last year were $130 why ask for $2,500 this year?

Mr. LOW: It only commenced last year and consequently we had not much time to spend very much, and for that reason decided to reduce it by $1,000.

Mr. CLARK: Another company has made a claim. I do not think the minister gave particulars as to that.

Mr. LOW: There are only two claims and they have been presented by the same company.

Mr. CLARK: Are those all the claims made since the act came into force?

Mr. LOW: All the claims that have been made.

Mr. CLARK: Can the minister state whether there has been an increase in the production of copper bars since the introduction of this act?

Mr. LOW: The act is just now coming into effect, and we have nothing to show whether there is an increase or not.

Mr. CLARK: Can the minister state the amount of production in 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923 and 1924?

Mr. LOW: It would be no trouble to obtain that information, but we have not it just now, as we were not interested in those years, as the act was not in effect at that time.

Item agreed to.

The Hemp Bounties Act, 1923, administration of act, $500.

Mr. LOW: This is a new item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it would be very nice if the minister would let us know how the matter stands. This matter is of very great interest to the northwest in particular. It is hoped that under the provisions of the act—at least that is the hope of the Finance minister, and I think he had some justification for it—with the assistance that the government was giving we would be able to work up a really large industry in hemp products in Canada. At that time it was a question whether or not the work could go on and whether the mill would be installed. I am sure the House would be interested to know whether the work is going on and what position it is in, and whether the mill has been started, and so on.

Mr. McMURRAY: I think probably I can explain this matter to the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), as I am more familiar with the local situation than the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low). Two years ago a bill was introduced to give bounties for the creation of a hemp rope and binder twine industry in Winnipeg. At that time negotiations were going on between certain people in Winnipeg and people in Ireland who were familiar with the rope, binder twine, hemp, flax and similar industries. At that time I thought the amount of the bounty was a little too small. As a matter of fact it did not interfere with the creation of the industry at that time. The real object of getting this bounty was to encourage a new industry, and at the same time to protect that industry from a possible war with the International Harvester Company in the United States, which company manufactured a great deal of similar products. However, we are taking the matter up keenly in Winnipeg now. I have been advised by the men who worked on the project that there were people in Winnipeg from the Old Land; I believe a great deal of ground is being seeded this year, and I am advised that there are fair hopes of the industry being established. Undoubtedly if it can be done it will be a wouderful thing for the western country. Growing out of this hemp, if we can supply enough binder twine there to take care in reasonable degree of the necessities of the western country, it will be a great aid to the western farmer in his work. It will also be sound policy in every way, and will afford employment there in the winter time and will keep capital, labour and money in that section of the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the hon. minister can go a little further than the Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) and tell us what the real difficulties are in this matter. As I recollect it, the question turned on two issues; one was the amount and the other was the duration. I think the duration had probably more to do with it than the amount. In other words, one of the all-important questions to those behind the scheme was that they should have such condition of affairs created for them under their contract with the government that they would be able to count upon a certain number of years during which they could go on undisturbed in the advanced cultivation of flax under the agreement as it was thought that the industry might take some time to work up. I remember that at the time I thought that in some instances the contract might prove to be unworkable and so the work would not go on. I would like really to know from my hon. friend whether the work is going on, and if not, in what particular this contract has been found to be unworkable, and for what reason the west is prevented from getting this all-important industry?

Mr. McMURRAY: In reply to my hon. friend, I say that this really means the addition of a new product so far as Canada is concerned. The hemp is altogether different from the flax. In western Canada it grows to a height of from eight to ten feet. We first got a knowledge of the use of it from the people who came from Europe, and people in the Dauphin country. They were growing it and manufacturing a coarse kind of linen for their own use. We had tested it out in various places. The Winnipeg Board of Trade became interested in it. We tested it in various places around Winnipeg, and we were able to prove that it grew very well. The climate was not against it, and the product was of a high quality. The difficulty in the way of getting capital to invest in the enterprise was the fact that they were afraid of a war with the International Harvester Company, an immense institution heavily capitalized, which corporation would undoubtedly have competed strongly against us. They asked a certain bounty per pound on the finished product, and we did not give them what they wanted. If my memory is right they wanted about three and one-half cents a pound at that time, reducing each year. I think if the government accepted the principle involved, they should not stand in the way of a reasonable amount being granted to establish an industry there which apparently was indigenous to that part of the country. We grew the product and marketed it right at our door. We had electrically-turned spinning wheels in the industry and had the labour there. In every way it looked like a legitimate proposition once it got started. But we had to guard against this large organization in the United States that we felt would wage war against us. I think the government at that time having accepted the principle, should have supported it more generously, and that is really the root of the trouble. One of the leading men interested in the enterprise, a gentleman from Belfast, Ireland, after the negotiations had been running for some time, unfortunately died. He was very active in the promotion of this enterprise, and after his death other negotiations had to be opened up. I understand the bounty was good for six years at two and one-half cents a pound.

I believe they agreed on two and one-half cents a pound. The Board of Trade in Winnipeg has taken the matter up actively. The city of Winnipeg feels that the time has come that it no longer sits at the receipt of customs in the wholesale line and that industries should be established that are indigenous to the country; and they are going actively into the question. They are in touch with this man who, as I said before, is in Winnipeg at the present time. The difficulty was purely a matter of getting a sufficient return for five or six years until they got on their feet with the industry established, and after that they would be able to meet any competition. This assistance was simply against a large combine in the United States.

I do not know whether I have answered my hon. friend fully or not, but that was the trouble. They felt that the drop of one-half cent per pound might come too early, before they were on their feet and the market was fully secured. While I am not a high protectionist, neither am I a free trader; but I think this was one case where an industry which was indigenous to the country and had every prospect of success was entitled to a bounty, and I think the bounty should have been a little more generous than it was. If that had been the case, the industry would have been established to-day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is only fair to say to my hon. friend, whether he is a protectionist or a free trader or anything else, I think at the moment he is rather more concerned as a Manitoban, to do something for his district that needs the help badly.

Mr. McMURRAY: Always.

Mr. JACOBS: How badly?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just like most parts of Canada, very much in need at the present minute. My hon. friend asks me if he has answered the question fully. He has, but not quite definitely. I think the committee ought to know what really stands between success and failure in this instance. The differences are not very great and the difference in cost to the country cannot be at all excessive. Perhaps my hon. friend is in a position to inform the committee what changes to-day in the contract will ensure the going ahead of this project?

Mr. McMURRAY: I am glad to have my hon. friend's deep interest in this matter. He wants to know exactly what the difficulty is. The difficulty is simply the amount of bounty that is being given. If the bounty had been four cents instead of three, I think the enterprise would have gone through with flying colours. The question is one of financing the company, and this menace was in the way. I think it costs five million dollars to establish the industry, and the people who are advancing the money will not risk five million dollars without a reasonable certainty of success.

Mr. TOLMIE: Are these men from Ireland who are negotiating the same people who were negotiating in 1921 and 1922?

Mr. McMURRAY: It was a Mr. Coote who was negotiating in 1921 and 1922. I do not know exactly who the present man is who is out there, but Mr. Coote was interested in the negotiations going on at the time we brought in the bill. He felt that he would have great difficulty in succeeding on account of the smallness of the bounty. Unfortunately, he died, as I said, and negotiations had to be opened up with other interests. I got a wire a few days ago stating that the other gentleman was at Halifax and was coming through.

Mr. TOLMIE: Do I understand that the bounty at the present time is one and one-half cents a pound on the manufactured article?

Mr. LOW: It is one and one-half cents a pound on a sliding scale for the year 1926.

Mr. TOLMIE: It is the opinion of the hon. member that this protection should be raised to three cents a pound before it will be possible for them to go ahead?

Mr. McMURRAY: I cannot say that I expect the protection will be raised. I have no objection to the bounty being raised and I think it is highly advisable that it should.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the difference between bounty and protection?

Mr. McMURRAY: That goes into the whole matter of education.

Mr. TOLMIE: What acreage is being sown out there now?

Mr. McMURRAY: I understand the seed that is of use for this is being brought out from Italy. Italian seed is the best seed, and I think there is some provision that it can be admitted into Canada free of duty. I do not know what acreage is being sown, but I would imagine two or three hundred acres. Of course, it will take some time to establish and build this mill. When the mill is running at full capacity, it is estimated that it will handle the product of 20,000 acres of land and that 3,000 hands will be employed.

4 p.m.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the hemp grown actually proved a success up to date?

Mr. McMURRAY: Yes: I understand it is of the very finest quality, and the climate and soil are entirely suited for this product. It is grown all through the Red river valley, and as I said before, it originated in the neighbourhood of Dauphin among the foreign-born people.

Mr. TOLMIE: What percentage of this binder twine is imported from the United States?

Mr. McMURRAY: Speaking in this House on this bill two years ago, I made the statement—I found out afterwards that I was wrong—that little or no binder twine was produced in Canada. I understand there is a large and flourishing plant at Brantford that has done exceedingly well. I would estimate, in looking over their figures, that they manufacture enough twine for a normal crop of about ten million acres. That being the case, I suppose we have in Canada crops of possibly thirty-five or forty million acres, so that I would imagine that about twenty per cent of our twine is produced at home and about eighty per cent brought in. That is only an estimate on my part, but I do not think I am far out.

Mr. CALDWELL: Where does the factory at Brantford get its raw material?

Mr. McMURRAY: That is a different material altogether from the hemp that we grow at home. I think they have plantations of their own in Central America, and of course they get more of it from Manila.

Mr. TOLMIE: Binder twine at present is manufactured from sisal imported from Yucatan.

Mr. McMURRAY: Yes.

Mr. TOLMIE: What would be the comparison as to cost between the hemp twine and the sisal twine?

Mr. McMURRAY: I have not gone into that particular aspect of the matter at all, but apparently the men who are willing to invest their capital in Winnipeg were convinced that they could manufacture hemp twine. I understand it makes a finer and better twine than the imported article.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Might I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that if we desire to call this kind of assistance protection, it is of a terminable nature; it is terminated in six years as against the other kind which is interminable.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is not an incurable disease.

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister agree with six-year terminable protection?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I believe in assisting new industries in some form or other—always have.

Mr. CALDWELL: I notice we are voting money under three different heads for the administration of bounties. Are three different departments, or three different staffs, engaged in this work? If so, could not the payments be administered by one staff and the vote put under one head?

Mr. LOW: There are three different acts, but they are all administered by the same department.

Mr. CALDWELL: The same staff?

Mr. LOW: The same staff here. Outside, some of those engaged in the work are paid only part salary; for instance, two or three are paid $200 in connection with the payment of bounties on petroleum and on copper.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is there a staff which devotes all its attention to this work?

Mr. LOW: Not at all.

Mr. CALDWELL: How is the cost segregated for the different classes of bounties? For instance, supposing your official is dealing with copper bounties in the forenoon, crude petroleum bounties part of the afternoon, and hemp bounties the remainder of the day?

Mr. LOW: Only the outside salaries are charged up against this vote; it does not cover the inside staff.

Mr. HOCKEN: Will the Solicitor General clear up this point for me? Has the bounty granted to this hemp industry been sufficient to get work started?

Mr. McMURRAY: No, they have not started it yet. Negotiations were going on, satisfactorily I understand, but Mr. Coote, who had large experience of the rope and twine industry, did not receive the support from the government that he expected and that I said I thought he should have received. Then, on his going back he had difficulties in negotiating for financial assistance, and unfortunately he died before those negotiations were completed. Since then the work has been continued by others and I understand with a possibility of success. I shall know very shortly.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is there a possibility of success on the present rate of bounty, or do those who are negotiating require an additional bounty?

Mr. McMURRAY: I have an idea that there should be an additional bounty; that would be my own opinion.

Mr. HOCKEN: Will the government give it?

Mr. McMURRAY: I cannot speak for the government. There are men in the government who are strong neither for protection nor for bounties. I think bounties are desirable for some legitimate industries, and I also think that the government, having once consented to the principle involved, should not have stood on the amount of bounty, because no bounty was to be paid until the finished product was ready, and these men are risking a large sum of money, five million dollars, in the project. I think Canada should have been prepared to assume some risk when the other people were risking so much.

Mr. HOCKEN: In my opinion it is a very shortsighted policy on the part of the government to haggle about half a cent a pound on the finished product and about one or two years for the continuance of the bounty in the case of an industry of this kind. Mr. Coote explained to me when he was here that this industry will not only employ a large number of operatives but will also give a very profitable crop to a large number of farmers. Not only industry but agriculture is to be assisted by this project. As my hon. friend has pointed out, the market is right beside the factory practically, and the cost of transportation of the finished product will be a bagatelle compared with the freight rate from Brantford or any other centre where binder twine can be obtained. If in Manitoba flax and hemp can be produced that will make it possible for an industry comparable to the Belfast linen industry to be established there, it would be one of the best things that could be done by way of encouraging industries for the Dominion. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the government will look at this matter in a broader spirit than they seem to have done up to the present time. I hope that if they can find men who are willing to invest $5,000,000, they will show a more generous spirit in helping those men to establish this industry and put them in a position where they can overcome the difficulties which they are sure to meet with at the outset until they get their factory erected and in operation. Never, I believe, since I have been a member of this House have I observed a proposal against which there could be so little objection, even on the part of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), and, as well, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low), who I believe is favourable to this particular industry—at least, having a knowledge of his good sense and sound judgment I would suppose so. I think the government ought to look at this matter in a little broader way and make it certain so far as they can that this industry will be established in Manitoba.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Judging from the statement of the Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) the House must be of opinion that the hemp industry is in a very precarious condition. We are asked to vote $500 for the administration of the Hemp Bounties Act, although the people who are to carry out the contract for the establishment of a hemp industry are dead, and he is looking for someone else to take their place. I think the minister had better strike out the item altogether, and wait until the company is brought into existence. I should like to say a word, too, to the Minister of Agriculture. He is a protectionist for six years. The Solicitor General wants to stretch it out, and probably would make it eight years or some other indefinite term.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is terminable.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is well to know that he is at least a six-year protectionist, and probably as he gets a little older he may add a few years more to that term.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Might I point out, this does not raise the cost of the article to the consumer.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It does not.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Chairman, I think the government is to be commended for resisting payment of any higher bounty. Here is an industry about to be established. According to the Solicitor General, hemp can be grown in Manitoba as cheaply as anywhere else in the world; in fact he said that it attains a growth of eight or ten feet, which shows that the soil is very favourable to the crop. The product of the factory would have its market right there at its own door, a market of at least ten or fifteen million pounds of twine, and it has the cheapest power on the continent. And yet this industry cannot stand on its own feet. What is the use of establishing this industry if it cannot afterwards stand on its own feet in four, five or six years? The International Harvester Company and the Brantford Twine Company will still be in competition with it. What then? The promoters will come to this government and say: "Here is an industry that must do down unless it is protected." I am against anything of that kind any more. We have plenty of these industries established on bounties and bonuses now. The British Empire Steel Corporation is a case in point; I think they have received more during the years they have been established than the amount they have paid in wages.

Mr. CARROLL: How much does my hon. friend say they got?

Mr. EVANS: More than ninety millions.

Mr. CARROLL: No, not ninety millions, and not nineteen millions, in bounties.

Mr. EVANS: It is my opinion that no more industries of this kind, which cannot stand on their own feet, should be established. It only means a burden to the country later on, and the people have plenty of these burdens on their shoulders now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The fact stares us in the face that we are without an industry of this kind. We have every assurance that the country is capable of producing hemp and of producing the twine that can be manufactured from it. Experiments have been conducted and those who are engaged in the business are apparently satisfied that a success could be made of such an enterprise in this country. Yet the negotiations seem to be dragging; they are not coming to a head. The hon. member (Mr. Evans) does not want to give encouragement to any industry that cannot stand on its own feet. I could not help thinking last night as I listened to a representative from one of the Maritime provinces that this country is much greater than the people who live in it and who do not take advantage of the opportunities available to them. This gentleman pointed to the fact that over half a million people from his own province of New Brunswick are now residents of the state of Massachusetts, so I think it is about time we began to realize that there is need of our doing something to develop our natural resources.

Mr. KYTE: They have been in Massachusetts for over twenty-five years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Their numbers have increased very rapidly of late.

Mr. KYTE: Not very.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What assurance have those who would like to establish an industry here that they will have a fair and reasonable chance to make a start? Minister after minister on the other side got up here last session and warned the people that this was the beginning of the end, that the death knell of protection in Canada has been sounded. Now they propose a hand-out for six years, but, they say, "look out as soon as that is used up; you can rest assured you will have to stand on your own feet then or get out." But these are not the policies that are being followed in other countries. All progressive countries are doing something to establish industries, to take care of them and to assure their success. If we can manufacture in this country the twine that we need, and if that much more money can be circulated among our own people, it will go a long way toward overcoming the stagnation which now prevails. This is only one instance among many that might be mentioned. If the government takes some reasonable steps to do something along this line I am sure hon. members will give them every encouragement, but if it is a matter of putting an item in the estimates simply to make the people believe that something is going to be done, I do not think that is of any use. If you do not propose to do more than you are doing you might just as well cut it out and be done with it, and thus end the farce.

Mr. EVANS: The remedy proposed by the leader of the delegation from the Maritime provinces yesterday was that trade should be allowed to go through its natural channels. He meant reciprocity and free trade.

Mr. LADNER: At New Westminster a cordage factory was established in connection with which all the raw materials were imported. I refer to this case because of the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Evans) who is apparently an out-and-out free trader, so much so that he would wipe off the face of the earth any industries which cannot stand against all kinds of competition, fair or unfair, principled or unprincipled.

Mr. EVANS: I would not wipe them off, no.

Mr. LADNER: Well, he would starve them to death. That industry was established immediately after the war, largely due to the enthusiasm of a number of returned men who put up their money to organize the business of a cordage company. After it had been established and was going with fair success, through the influence of such ideas as emanate from some of our friends from the prairies along the line of this wiping-out proposition, the government actually took steps to lower the duty on the finished product, to such an extent that the whole industry was in jeopardy. At that time members from British Columbia were given information which established beyond question that without a certain amount of protection against the mass production of large enterprises immediately to the south in the United States the industry would be wiped out of existence. The protective duty was increased, or rather established where it was before, and the result has been, as I understand it in a general way, that far from being an institution in difficulties the project has developed into a success and it is a credit to those who organized it and operate it. Employment is given to the people in the district, shipping is brought into the harbour by the imports of raw material, and the finished product is sold in all parts of British Columbia to the exclusion of the product from the United States.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: They import their raw material from foreign countries?

Mr. LADNER: Yes, they are not able to grow it in British Columbia.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do they pay duty on it or does it come in free?

Mr. LADNER: I do not think they pay duty on it; I do not see why they should if they manufacture the article here. The point raised in this discussion is extremely interesting to those from British Columbia. In our province we have essentially an industrial outlook. If we can bring into the port of Vancouver raw materials, whether they be sugar cane from distant lands to make sugar at the British Columbia sugar refinery, or materials for the manufacture of cordage brought in from Manila—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Can the raw material be grown in Canada?

Mr. LADNER: Apparently it can be grown in Manitoba. It may be that the raw material will be got from that part of the country; in fact, if it is better business to use that raw material it will be substituted for the imported material. But my point is that if we in Canada are going to build up a country of economic independence, if we are not to be under servitude to the United States, we must use these instruments of protection, these methods of roundly developing our industrial life as well as our agricultural life.

Mr. PUTNAM: For how long?

Mr. LADNER: For more than six years.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What does my hon. friend mean by "economic independence"?

Mr. LADNER: I will give an example. Suppose our friends from the United States owned completely our basic industry in British Columbia, the lumber business. Let us say they owned all the forests and sawmills—everything—and sent their management in, and after the payment of wages took all their profits which includes increase of capital making possible an extension of business, down on the other side of the line for industrial development there; I say then we should be economically dependent upon our friends on the other side. But if we owned those things ourselves through the citizens of British Columbia, and the business was conducted under their management, and the profits used for further industrial extension on this side, we would be economically independent. Although we want capital from any land, I think all experience shows that capital raised in your own country is infinitely more advantageous than imported capital, because the profits go back into your own country.

Mr. EVANS: If you become economically independent of the United States, you are still dependent on production and relying on some industry in this country, which is agriculture, which is not protected at all. Is not that so?

Mr. LADNER: The industry of agriculture in Canada—and I happen to be in that industry perhaps as much as anybody in this House—is protected just as much or almost as much as any other industry.

Mr. EVANS: In what way?

Mr. LADNER: You get Crowsnest pass rates; you get legislation in connection with your own business.

Mr. MORRISON: Does agriculture get any tariff protection?

Mr. LADNER: Any action on the part of a legislative body which gives special rates or special advantages to any particular industry is a species of protection for that industry.

Mr. MORRISON: The manufacturers in eastern Canada have advantages under the Crowsnest pass agreement as well as the western agriculturist.

Mr. LADNER: That may be so, but if you read the preamble of the agreement and the thirteen classifications of articles, you will see that the main purpose of the agreement is for the products coming from the east for the benefit of the farmer and colonization, and for the products of the farmer coming from the west for export.

Mr. MORRISON: It is all for the benefit of the farmer, according to my hon. friend. The manufacturers in eastern Canada, of course, are not at all interested in getting a market for their goods. They do not benefit under the agreement in any way!

Mr. LADNER: The manufacturer receives a certain advantage, but I think a fair interpretation of the agreement will show that its main purpose is for the benefit of the prairie provinces and agriculture.

Mr. EVANS: Does not the hon. member know that we are still paying a higher freight rate under the Crownest pass agreement than the local rates in eastern Canada?

Mr. LADNER: That depends on whether you live in Calgary or Edmonton, but generally speaking, the rates are considerably lower.

Mr. EVANS: No.

Mr. LADNER: All the discussion would indicate that it is the people who are getting the benefit of the rates who want the Crowsnest pass agreement continued. The railways, who are operating under it, do not want it.

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that his remarks are becoming slightly irrelevant to the question whether there should be a bounty granted.

Mr. HOEY: I have been very much interested in this discussion. I think we are all anxious to see a binder twine factory established in the city of Winnipeg. I think, however, it would be regrettable if the impression went abroad that the negotiations collapsed because of the inadequacy of the bounties offered. I was hoping that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), or the member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), or perhaps the member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward), would tell us something about the actual experiences men have had in the growing of hemp. I have seen hemp grow, hundreds of acres of it. I have interviewed men such as Mr. Cotton, of Swan river valley, and I want to say that the men who have attempted to grow hemp have so far been profoundly disappointed with the results. In conversation they have told me they cannot grow a uniform crop. I have seen patches of hemp growing on Mr. Cotton's farm eleven feet high, and other patches that would not be more than from eighteen inches to two feet —useless hemp. Furthermore, they told me that the machinery necessary to harvest it was almost prohibitory in price, that the curing of hemp was a problem that had never been thoroughly investigated, and consequently they were not persuaded in their own minds that hemp could be profitably cured in a commercial way in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. McMURRAY: Did the hon. member discuss this matter with Mr. Coote when he was here? Is it not a fact that Mr. Coote was thoroughly satisfied that hemp could be raised here to the greatest advantage?

Mr. HOEY: I think that is just how we get into a great many of our troubles. In a conversation with me—and I was very much interested in the question—Mr. Coote said that he was basing his reports upon information gleaned from certain citizens of Winnipeg, men who might be described as legitimate or illegitimate boosters. But I am speaking of hemp as I have seen it grow in the province of Manitoba, in the northern sections of the province, and of interviews with men who have had experience in growing it.

Mr. McMURRAY: Will the hon. member answer the question? Was not Mr. Coote, who was largely interested in this as an expert, satisfied that hemp could be profitably and successfully grown? Never mind what his researches were.

Mr. HOEY: He expressed the opinion to me that he had little if any knowledge of growing hemp, or in fact of hemp. The Belfast Rope Works, the largest institution of its kind in the world, imports most of its raw material, and on the growing of hemp, Mr. Coote was not at all well informed, nor was he primarily interested in it. In view of the cost of the machinery, I think it will take a lot to persuade the farmers of Manitoba, particularly those who have already grown hemp, and grown it at an entire loss, that it can be profitably cured, and it will take a great deal of persuasion to get them to take up the growing of hemp in the future. I think that this is a problem that might very well be taken up by the committee on industrial research, and we might have more information on it from the experimental farms; although I do not place much faith in their reports, because any hemp they have grown has been grown on small plots. I have seen it grown over one hundred acres or so, and I can assure the committee that it was not anything like uniform in height or in commercial value.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On the invitation of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), I would like to give the experience of some of the experimental farms and some other farms. The very first year that I had this work in hand we sowed hemp on every experimental farm where there was any chance of its growing. You have to put it on reasonably good land, strong heavy land such as you get in the Red river valley, to attain the best success; and at our farms in both Saskatchewan and Manitoba we have had pronounced success in the growing of hemp nearly every year. In addition to that, turning away from the experimental farms I am sure that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) and the hon. member for Dauphin are familiar with how hemp has been grown in their respective localities. One of the reasons why hemp has become so unpopular in Manitoba is this: In 1921 they grew a magnificent crop at Portage la Prairie, with the understanding that they were going to have a factory to manufacture the hemp, and that they would get a price for their product. The enterprise did not materialize, and they were left with the hemp on their hands. There was no other purpose to which it could be put, and so it was a loss. That was the condition, and they did not want their fingers burned a second time, in the same way at all events. That is the disability under which this whole enterprise has had to grow ever since 1921. The fact is that the farmers had too much faith that the money would be forthcoming to put up the necessary building and to keep it going. I think it was very unfortunate, but probably it was natural that they should go too casually into the enterprise. I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion the heavy lands in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta are eminently adapted for growing hemp successfully, running up to eight and ten feet, and the longer it is the better the fibre will be. I saw a very large field of hemp in Hungary on one occasion and judging from the look of it our fields of hemp appear to be quite as satisfactory as theirs. Of course, I do not know how an analysis of it would turn out, but I do know that a trial shipment of hemp to Ireland resulted in a very satisfactory manufactured product. This was only after prolonged experimentation. The experiments have been going on for twelve or fifteen years; it is not a new undertaking by any means. I think that the least troublesome feature of the industry is the growing of the hemp. I might supplement what has been said by my colleague (Mr. McMurray) in that regard. Just as he indicated, the reason the money was not forthcoming was because the inducements were not sufficiently strong to warrant the investment of capital in the enterprise especially during these troublesome times in Great Britain. There have been something like four governments in power in Great Britain since these negotiations were started, with the result that financial conditions are somewhat disturbed and investors will not put money into the enterprise as quickly as under normal conditions. Consequently, for the purposes of encouragement assistance must be extended, particularly during such a period as we have been passing through during the last few years. I think these are substantially the reasons why the undertaking was not proceeded with—the lack of assistance, the shyness of capital, the disturbed political conditions, all these added to the difficulty of floating bonds or any other kind of securities for the development of industries in any of the overseas Dominions. These reasons are quite understandable, and I am sure will appeal to the hon. member for Springfield.

Mr. HOEY: With respect to the amount of moisture or rainfall, does the minister think it is sufficient to grow hemp profitably year after year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do. The difficulty is more in the matter of weeds. You must not have a lot of weeds on summer fallowed land, because it spoils the fibre. Then you must not put in your crop too early because the cold weather in the early spring is not as harmless to the hemp as it is to wheat. Furthermore, if there is a mass of weeds at the butts of your sheaves it lessens the quality of the hemp. I have had a full discussion of the matter with the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward). I have not discussed it, I think, with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) but I am familiar with the land around Portage la Prairie. My first experience in the west was gained there, and I think the lands are exceedingly uniform in character and that hemp can be grown very satisfactorily there; at any rate I know of no difficulties in the way. I suppose there would be some years when there would be a drought, but in particular areas, especially in Dauphin and in the Swan river country, the same amount of drought is not experienced as in, perhaps, the southern parts of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. I do not fear for the success of this industry because of any difficulty in the way of growing the raw material. I suppose it is like any other crop, I do not care what; even in the case of our major crop, wheat, there are occasionally off periods of production. But I do not know of any crop that is more certain than hemp if it is properly handled. But that applies also to any crop; you have to observe the conditions necessary to success if you wish to obtain the best results.

Mr. LEADER: I should like to substantiate what the Minister of Agriculture has said with regard to the ability of the soil at Portage la Prairie to produce hemp fibre. I also wanted to support what the Solicitor General has said with respect to the different soils in Manitoba being able to produce a good quality of this raw material. I was surprised that the Solicitor General did not in that connection mention the locality from which I come because it is a well known fact that if flax eleven feet high can be produced anywhere in Manitoba we can produce it two feet higher at Portage la Prairie.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think you can.

Mr. LEADER: What the Minister of Agriculture said in regard to the experiment at Portage la Prairie in the years 1920 and 1921 is true. Flax of great length was produced there on a private farm. I believe the statement was even made that a factory was to be built at Portage la Prairie.

I should like to suggest that if the government contemplates going on with this factory it should adhere to the original proposition and locate the plant in the city of Portage la Prairie. The Solicitor General has stated that the soil of the Red river valley is adapted to the growing of hemp fibre, and that it will have a tendency to clean the ground. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I do know that the Minister of Agriculture has stated that the soil should be absolutely clean before the hemp seed is sown. That would imply that we cannot grow hemp fibre on a soil that is dirty, it must be cleaned first. Consequently considerable time, trouble, and expense to the farmers will be entailed in cleaning up the soil and seeing that their fields are thoroughly cleaned before sowing the seed.

I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what the attitude of the government is in the matter of bounties. Does the government wish to confine the bounty entirely to the manufacturers, or is it intended to aid also the farmers who produce their own material?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. LOW: The Department of Trade and Commerce is simply carrying out the administration of the act, and if my hon. friend will address his question to the Acting Minister of Finance I am sure that hon. gentleman will be able to tell him whether he contemplates granting further encouragement to agriculture or any other industry. The matter does not come under my department. I merely want to impress upon hon. gentlemen that my department is simply administering the act.

Mr. LEADER: Does it not occur to the minister that the one who produces the article in the first place is more entitled to the bounty, if any bounty is given, in preference to the middlemen who take toll out of it afterwards?

Mr. LOW: I may say that I have my own opinion about all these things, but at this particular time I do not deem it advisable to make any statement of policy. When the budget is under discussion perhaps I shall tell my hon. friend just where I stand on these matters.

Mr. McMURRAY: I may say to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie that the producer of the hemp does share fully in the bounty that is granted. In this way: At the commencement of the industry the farmer must be paid a considerable amount for his product; I think the arrangement is that the land is rented from him and he is allowed so much per acre. He does not have to grow the hemp himself unless he wants to. The offer having been made to him the money to provide for the crop will be deposited in the bank —I think that is the arrangement—in order to take care of the farmers crop of hemp this year. In that way they benefit from the bounty. The farmer is not bound to grow that hemp fibre but it appeals to him as better, perhaps, than growing wheat, and in growing that hemp fibre he shares in the bounty.

Mr. FORKE: Does the minister know of any desire expressed by the farmers that this industry should be started at Winnipeg?

Mr. McMURRAY: I am very sorry to say that I have not heard such an expression in this House, and I have been exceedingly astonished that I have not.

Mr. FORKE: Or anywhere else?

Mr. McMURRAY: But there has been from the farmers in Manitoba and the Red river valley, an excellent sphere of operations. Now that the arrangements have been made

I must say that I am absolutely astounded that our friends from Manitoba are not supporting this proposition.

Mr. BIRD: The minister need scarcely be astonished. I think the reason is to be found in the fact that the farmers are not keenly interested in the matter. Two years ago I took the opportunity of sounding a representative body of farmers in my riding, and they declared themselves emphatically against it. Not because the country will not produce hemp; it will produce hemp and many things; it will produce apples and plums, and I believe, watermelons, in certain seasons; it certainly will produce hemp. But in the year during which hemp was tried it did not produce it very well. I have not inquired into the growing side of it, and I do not think the farmers in the Swan river valley are objecting to it so much from that point of view. I think they all believe they could grow hemp almost any season, because in the Swan river valley we have more than our share of moisture. I think that is one of the fundamental requirements in growing hemp—abundance of precipitation—and we have that in our district, to a greater degree than have Dauphin or Portage la Prairie. If there is one place in the west where hemp should be sucessful it is in the Swan river valley. We have the rainfall and we have the soil; the farmers are not objecting to it from that point of view, but they believe it would interfere with their ordinary farming operations. They do not believe the season in the fall is suitable for the curing process. And that leads me to make the remark that I do not believe the proposition has been sufficiently investigated. I do not believe our Department of Agriculture has carried its investigation far enough to justify them in attempting to bonus the industry. Before attempting to set an industry on its feet it ought to be ascertained whether it has any feet to stand on, and I am not sure, and the farmers in my district are not sure, whether the industry will be a paying one from the point of view of the farmer; and I think that when you attempt to establish an industry in the west it is the producer who should be considered. It seems to me that without sufficient investigation along those lines the possibility is that you are going to have an industry established in Winnipeg which will have to import its raw material. I can quite conceive that Mr. Coote and others were not very deeply interested in whether Manitoba produces hemp or not; it was the establishment of the industry that was a point of interest to them. Once established it would not matter whether Manitoba could produce hemp or not, because hemp could be imported, and the manufactured article could be produced under protection, which of course would be the natural result. I have no real objection to a bonus in principle; I think perhaps some day we will have arrived at a state of social and economic enlightenment in this country when we will sufficiently trust each other to be able to make these concessions in order that legitimate and indigenous industries may get on their feet. But at the present time I am almost sure, after hearing the expressions of opinion from this corner of the House, that this is a back door attempt to strangle the free trade opinion of the west by means of hempen rope.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may say that my attention was first drawn to the advisability of entering into this proposal by four Progressive members sitting right over there, and if I am challenged I will name them, but I am not going to mention the names unless I am asked.

Mr. FORKE: You must not do that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Name, name.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let one of the four make the request and I will give the names. I had a good interview in my office on this subject, and I was stimulated more strongly to go into it because I thought I had somebody behind me that knew something about the capacity of Manitoba to grow hemp. I did not divulge this two years ago, because I did not want to do it at that time, but when they have shown, not only lukewarmness from the very province and the country we are trying to benefit, but a certain amount of hostility, I think I am entitled to indicate where the encouragement first came from. If any new information has been brought to their attention since then to warrant a change, let them give us the benefit of it, and a change may be made even at this stage. If I had information brought to me at the present time that warranted me in changing my mind with regard to the possible success of this enterprise, particularly with regard to growing the raw material, I would consider myself at liberty to make the change, but that additional information has not been put before the House; certainly none was put before me. The longer I look into the question the more I am convinced that the manufactured article can be produced from the raw material out there. I cannot think of one single substantial new industry which has been established in my province during the last twenty years which has not got some kind of infantile assistance from which it has been gradually weaned. Is that not the way the animal and human kingdom is developed from infancy? But on the other hand, while I believe in helping them while they are young, I do not believe in helping them when they become hoary-whiskered and fifty years of age. I think we have been reasonable in this connection; we assist the young industries but we draw the line at the older ones. There is nothing inconsistent in our position in that respect. Would you extend the same paternal care to a young man of twenty-five as you would to a child of a year old? Certainly not. Neither should you extend the same assistance to an industry which has been in existence for twenty-five years as you would to one which has just been born; there would be no logic in that. However, I have stated the position we take on this question. If you want to start a home industry without some assistance and let them depend upon foreign nations for their raw supplies for all time to come, well and good.

Mr. LADNER: In view of the hon. minister's embarrassment—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No embarrassment at all.

Mr. LADNER:—and a non-appreciative audience from Manitoba, may I ask him if he will not place this five-million-dollar industry in the city of Vancouver, which has both arms open to him?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I made the statement two years ago that I had no doubt that if this industry was once established it would extend to the Pacific coast.

Mr. LADNER: If our friends in Manitoba want to choke the industry by not supplying the hemp, we can get it by water from across the seas.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think our Manitoba friends in their hearts are against it, but I will tell you what they do not like; when they are endeavouring in their hearts to assist a legitimate industry, they do not like to have it thrust in their faces that it is protection.

Mr. LEADER: I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) will withdraw the remark he has just made, when he thinks it over. We are deeply interested in this question. The Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) said no one from this corner of the House had shown any desire to have this industry in that province, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture says he can name four who approached him.

Mr. McMURRAY: The four did not mention it to me.

Mr. LEADER: I am not particularly interested in that phase of it, but when he says that the farmers are not interested, I will tell hon. members why. There was a farmer at Portage la Prairie who raised a crop on two or three hundred acres; he produced a splendid article, and because there was no machinery to take care of this product he burned it. I want to tell the government: promote a factory, do not depend upon any government pap, and we will furnish the raw material which we have amply demonstrated we can do, if we are shown a reasonable profit for our labour.

Mr. WARD: I have no hesitation in telling the House that I was one of the four. There is an angle of this question that has not been dealt with this afternoon, and it is the real crux of the matter. We are producing in Canada something like 1,000,000,000 to 1,200,000,000 bushels of grain annually, and we are absolutely depending upon a semi-hostile nation for our twine supplies. Supposing that war should break out between Mexico and the United States; our sympathies would naturally drift to the United States, would they not? Where, then, would we be for our twine supplies? The time is long overdue when Canada should have been seeking a way out of this difficulty by producing her own twine supplies. I was one of the four who approached the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). We can produce hemp in the Dauphin district quite as well as in the Swan river district. But I am not particularly interested in the question where the factory is to be established; you can establish it at Portage la Prairie, if you like, but establish it where you can produce the twine most cheaply; if you can produce it more cheaply at Portage la Prairie than at Winnipeg or anywhere else, establish the plant at Portage la Prairie. But establish the factory and we will produce the raw material. I am not averse at all to giving this new industry some assistance, and I do not think I am sacrificing any of my free trade principles in saying so, as long as proper safeguards are thrown around the bounty and it is put on a sliding scale. Let them have a sufficient bonus at the outset to give them a good send-off. I corroborate what the Minister of Agriculture has said,—when the industries get hoary-headed and have whiskers a foot long, it is time to take the bonus away from them. But this is an industry that we should seek to establish in Manitoba.

Mr. LOW: May I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this was an act passed in 1923. I have no doubt that everything in connection with the act and the industry was discussed at that particular time, and I cannot see what good will be done by continuing to discuss the industry. Unfortunately, the industry has not started. Many reasons may have entered into that. But the act is on the statute book and the only way to get rid of it is to repeal it. This is an item of $500, and we have occupied the time of the House this afternoon for an hour and one-half in discussing this question at a cost to the country, I should think of almost $500. I do not of course, wish to curtail discussion at all.

Mr. FORKE: I want to take up a little more of the time of the House, because the Minister of Agriculture has to-day made some statements in regard to which I should like a little more explanation. He speaks about being interviewed by four Progressive members who apparently were afraid to mention the fact that they had interviewed the minister. I have been searching my memory and I recollect who the four members were who did not interview the minister, but who went to the minister upon his invitation. That is quite a different matter. I recollect going down to the minister's office with Mr. Coote and hearing this matter discussed. If the minister can get his memory to work, he will recall that there was very strenuous opposition to offering any large bonus to any company to start an industry as to the success of which we were not very sure. It is all very well to point to hon. members in this House and to blame them for not standing behind him when he advocates the establishment of this industry; but I feel certain that his memory is at fault, and I have no hesitation in stating who the members were. They were my deskmate, the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) and myself, who went to the minister's office on the invitation of Mr. Coote and the Minister of Agriculture to discuss this question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The statement made by my hon. friend is reasonably correct, but there is another side to it. I do not recall whether it was Mr. Coote or myself who invited my hon. friends but we will let that rest. We discussed in a very frank and friendly manner the protective nature of the question, and I remember quite well our friends from Manitoba took the ground that they could not defend that side of it. I understood, however, from them equally candidly that they would not oppose it. If they are not opposing it now, I am glad to know that.

Mr. McBRIDE: I was one of the men who went to the minister's office, and I have no apology to make to this House for doing so. I would do so again. I went repeatedly, not only to the Minister of Agriculture, but to the Minister of Finance in regard to this hemp question, and in doing so, I was doing my duty to the citizens of Canada, because this is an industry that should be started and receive every assistance. We on the Pacific coast are sending hundreds and thousands of dollars out of the country every year for rope. If this industry was started, we would not have to do that. Canada will not be what it should be until we get some of these industries started.

Mr. BROWN: This seems to be a time for confession, and it is true, as has been stated, that we went to interview the minister on this question. I was one of the four. We discussed the matter very freely. It is true, possible objections were raised, possible advantages discussed, and for my part I have always contended that if industries were to be helped at all, the principle of bonusing is infinitely better than that of protection for the reason already given that there is at least some finality to a bonus. For my part, I would be only too delighted to see an industry of this kind established in Manitoba with reasonable help given to it at the outset. Whether hemp can be grown satisfactorily or not under average conditions that prevail in Manitoba, I do not know. Whether sufficient investigation has been made of the whole question prior to the present time, I do not know. I do not think, however, it would be fair to cite as an objection the fact that a large crop was grown in 1921 and that there was no market for it. We know that this is a crop that is of no use to anybody unless there are proper facilities for taking care of it. I may say freely that I have some doubt whether average conditions that prevail, not only for growing the hemp, but for taking care of it in the fall, will be such as to make it satisfactory to go into this industry. We know perfectly well our fall conditions are frequently such as would probably interfere altogether with the harvesting of the crop—last fall, I think was of that character. At the same time, if it can be shown that there is any reasonable prospect of success, I should like to see the industry started.

Mr. MILNE: I have no confession to make; but as practically all the Manitoba members have been vying with one another in regard to this project of making rope from hemp, I want to say just a word. So far as I have been able to gather, most of the propaganda circulated throughout the country in connection with hemp growing has been published and circulated by promoters. Farmers are somewhat leary of promoters and I do not blame them a bit. As a matter of fact, in trying to get information as regards hemp growing, I came across some people who were making investigations. I am not going to give their names because they told me definitely that the experiment had not been carried on long enough for them to give out concrete information to the farmers or to advise them whether to take up hemp growing or not. Now it seems to me that the experimental farms should carry on this work. I think a programme should be laid out at those farms to demonstrate to the farmers whether hemp can take a place in the ordinary crop rotation of the western farm. We have had some contradictory statements in this regard. I think the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) stated that you must have clean land for hemp. Well, clean land in some sections of Manitoba is rather hard to find these days, and perhaps one of our biggest problems in western Canada, especially in Manitoba, is the weed crop. I think the government would be well advised, if they have the information available, to inform our farmers whether hemp growing is feasible and practicable on the farms of Manitoba. If that were made clear, I think there would be no difficulty in getting the necessary raw material for any factory that might be established. I certainly should like to see the industry established. I will not oppose its formation in any way if it can be accomplished on a sound basis, but I think it would be unfortunate if an attempt were made through promoters before a thorough investigation had been conducted along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. MILLAR: Has the minister any definite information concerning the point raised by the member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) as well as by the last speaker (Mr. Milne) that is, the proper caring for the hemp after it is grown. I remember years ago when the old binder twine factory was in operation in Brandon the head of it interviewed experts and travelled in several countries, spending a lot of time and money in an endeavour to solve this problem. If I remember rightly, when the factory got into financial difficulties the matter of retting, that is the caring for the flax after it is grown, was still unsolved. That I believe is the greatest difficulty confronting the industry.

Mr. LOW: I am sorry I have not any information on the subject; it does not come within my department.

Mr. MILLAR: Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) can furnish the information?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend will visit the flax plant at the experimental farm he will find that the necessary retting process can all be done indoors. I think the same applies to hemp, but I am not quite sure. When I went through the hemp factories of Hungary something like fourteen years ago, they were still following the old outside process, but since then I understand they have adopted mechanical processes that have proven equally satisfactory and more convenient, being entirely under control.

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Chairman, I am sure all members will agree that we have gone into this matter very fully. I may inform the hon. Minister of Agriculture that even before his time not only farmers but manufacturers were interesting themselves in the growing of hemp in our western country. I remember at that time we investigated the matter pretty thoroughly, and there did not appear to be any sound objections to the growing of the crop. The Minister of Agriculture has stated that further experiments have been made at the various experimental farms, and that the results have been satisfactory. It has been pointed out too by the Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) that our demand for material of this kind to manufacture binder twine is very great. It has also been further pointed out by hon. gentlemen to my left that in the event of Mexico being at war perhaps our present supply of sisal for the manufacture of binder twine might be very seriously interfered with. On the other hand we have these negotiations progressing for a number of years without any definite result. Well now, if it is good to give a small bounty of one and a half cents a pound, and if it is practicable to give more than that, why not give it and get the industry started?

Mr. CLARK: A great deal has been said this afternoon about getting this industry started. It seems to me that it is in that very word that the difficulty lies. Everbody seems interested in getting the industry started. But, as the Minister of Agriculture very aptly stated, our farmers are not growing hemp because they are afraid of getting their fingers burnt. I think that this also applies to the capitalists who are expected to put $5,000,000 into this industry. If the sole ambition of hon. members is to get the industry started, they may be certain that the capitalist will hang on to his money until he is no longer afraid of having his fingers burnt. The Minister of Agriculture stated that he would be willing to apply the doctrine of protection to infant industries. Now, that is welcome news to me personally as one who is not afraid to state he is an out and out protectionist for every legitimate industry. But he and others say that when the industry is established the protection must cease. In my opinion that is just what is making it very difficult to get this industry established.

Mr. ROBINSON: May I ask the hon. gentleman what he means by a "legitimate" industry?

Mr. CLARK: I have not time to go into details. I am talking of one now which is legitimate. I know of very few industries in this country that are anything but legitimate. However, I think we will have very serious difficulty in establishing this particular industry and continuing it unless we are prepared to say to its promoters, "Just so long as you require assistance, whether it be protection or whether it be anything else, we will see that you get it, because the principle that we are prepared to adopt is to assist all legitimate industries." If we are willing now to recognize this industry, and assist its establishment, then surely we recognize it as a legitimate industry, and we should be prepared to look after it, whether it be for six years, ten years or throughout the history of our country. The Minister of Agriculture drew an apt comparison between protection for the infant of two years and the man of twenty-five. I would draw his attention to the fact, if he will listen to me for a moment, because it is something which his government might take very great interest in—but apparently he is not interested.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is the question?

Mr. CLARK: I would draw his attention to this fact, that to-day it is not the infant of two years that is leaving this country but it is the well-educated, full-grown man, the man that forms the very life blood of the nation. Now, which type requires assistance or protection; is it our young manhood—migrating to the United States at the rate of 200,000 a year—or is it our infants of tender age?

Mr. EVANS: Tell us.

Mr. CLARK: I do not wish to insult the intelligence of the whole House. However, if the hon. member wants an answer, it is the youth we are spending millions of dollars to educate, to bring into the state of manhood, he needs protection to-day, we want to keep him in this country to-day, the man who is worth while to the nation. The only way you can keep him at home is to establish industries. And once you have established them, do not quibble over a period of six years; if the industry is a good industry, say that you are ready to assist it not merely for two years or four years or six years but as long as the country needs it.

Mr. LOVIE: Let us get back to some hard facts on the hemp question. I come from one of the best farming districts in southern Manitoba—or as good as there is in any other part of Manitoba, at least—and I do not think the farmers there ever heard the word "hemp" mentioned, at any rate so far as the raising of hemp as a crop is concerned. When hemp is raised, how does it get to the factory? What has to be done with it? What machinery is needed for the handling of the crop in the fall? What facilities are necessary for shipping? Are the sheaves loaded on flat cars or is it baled and put in box cars? What are we up against as regards the marketing of the crop?

Mr. STEEDSMAN: Before there is any suggestion of increasing the bounty on hemp we ought to be sure that there will be a supply of the raw material for the factory when it is built. Personally I have never grown hemp, and I am not going to dispute the assertion of the Minister of Agriculture that it has been demonstrated clearly that hemp can be grown. But it has been mentioned, I think, by one hon. member that the hemp crop is of such a nature that it cannot be harvested and got to the factory in the fall in sufficient time to make the land available for the crop the next year, in other words, that it will not lend itself to rotation. The Minister of Agriculture has said that it was necessary to have clean land, and summer fallowing was suggested. If that is so it will take three years to grow a crop of hemp, and the product would have to bring a good price to induce any farmer to undertake to grow it commercially. If my memory serves me correctly, the professor of field husbandry at the Manitoba Agricultural College has made the statement that hemp will not lend itself to rotation and that it cannot be got rid of in commercial quantities in time to prepare the soil for another crop the next year. If it takes three years to grow one crop it will be a pretty expensive proposition.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can understand its taking two years, but I do not see how my hon. friend makes it three.

Mr. STEEDSMAN: One year for summer fallow, one year to grow the crop, and your land is not in condition for the third year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Why?

Mr. STEEDSMAN: Because in our climate the crop cannot be harvested in time to get the land ready for another crop the next year.

Mr. McMURRAY: Has my hon. friend never heard of spring ploughing?

Mr. STEEDSMAN: Yes, but I would refer my hon. friend to the report of the field husbandry branch of the Agricultural College at Winnipeg. We want this thing amply demonstrated. It will not do for the minister to throw such suggestions at me; we want proof. If it takes three years to grow one crop then I think the matter should be looked into very thoroughly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend does not want to go into that enterprise he is not obliged to do so; it is purely an optional matter. As my hon. friend knows, there are areas both in northeastern Saskatchewan and in northwestern Alberta where the lands are too flat for the growing of wheat. It is the newer land; I am sure my hon. friend has heard of such areas. He says that it might take three years to grow a crop of hemp. I do not accept that at all, but suppose for the sake of argument it did take three years, I would point out that the same condition prevails in regard to the growing of tobacco, on account of the numerous fungous diseases which attack the tobacco plant. Notwithstanding this fact, tobacco growing is developing very rapidly in Quebec and Ontario. I assume that when a man decides to go into tobacco production he must figure on getting sufficiently paid for it, having regard to the fact that it takes three years to produce a crop. As to the point raised by my hon. friend from Macdonald, I must say I never saw a crop of hemp on wheels, but I remember as a young fellow in Ontario we used to cut hop poles, which are much coarser than hemp, so I assume the hemp can be transported in some way. A quarter of a million Christmas trees are cut annually in the province of Quebec, and they are just as bulky as hemp is. So there should be no difficulty in transporting hemp.

Mr. WARD: I would like to clear up some misapprehension on the part of the hon. member for Souris and the hon. member for Macdonald. We have been growing hemp in Dauphin for about eight years, not on a large scale, but in small patches. We have farmers there who grow a patch every year as a windbreak. They do not plough the ground in the spring. The hemp is cut down and very often it is burned. They simply put on a drill and sow the grain without ploughing; it is not necessary to plough before seeding. But whether you are growing hemp for commercial purposes or merely as a windbreak it is necessary to summer fallow, because the hemp is a very delicate plant when it is coming up in the spring and the weeds may get the better of it. Suppose we summer fallow in 1922; the hemp grows in 1923, and in 1924 they simply put the drill on and sow wheat. We have taken forty bushels to the acre off the ground where the hemp had grown the year before. So if the hemp can be removed in the fall of the year in which it is grown there is no reason why the land should lie idle the next year. It seems to me that we have been derelict in our duty in this matter of the production of such a commodity as binder twine, because we have been sending outside of this country every dollar we spend in the purchase of that material.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister said there was one industry manufacturing binder twine in Canada. Is that the only one?

Mr. McMURRAY: I think it was I who said that. I know of only one factory making binder twine in Canada, and that is at Brantford.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Can the minister say what was done with the machinery in the penitentiaries for the manufacture of binder twine? Is that still available?

Mr. LOW: I think the hon. member will have to ask the Minister of Justice that question.

Item agreed to.

British and Foreign News Service, $32,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister be good enough to tell us how this vote started? I cannot find out from the estimates. I notice there was a vote of $21,000 in the estimates of 1923-1924; there was an increase there of about $10,000 odd, but I do not see any vote previous to that. How was that carried, and what are the reasons for the increase?

Mr. LOW: The reason it was only $21,000 in 1923-1924 is that the vote covered the service for only part of the year. This vote is to provide for an agreement entered into in 1923 for a new service. The annual payment is $32,000. The full amount was voted last year. The agreement will expire in July, 1926.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When did the payments start? What was the first vote?

Mr. LOW: The agreement is for three years and expires in July, 1926, so it must have been entered into in July, 1923, and the first vote would be to cover the period from July, 1923, to the end of the fiscal year, a period of eight or nine months.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this something which takes the place of the former vote we had in connection with the news service, the vote that was objected to so bitterly two or three years ago by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill)?

Mr. LOW: I really do not know to what vote my hon. friend refers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The vote for the Canadian Press Association.

Mr. LOW: That was a different thing entirely. This is for a foreign service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So was the other. At the time this new service was initiated, did it take the place of anything or was it an entirely new venture?

Mr. LOW: This is for an entirely new service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it not the fact that it was entered into just about the time the other service lapsed?

Mr. LOW: I do not know whether the contract was made just about that time or not. This agreement was entered into by my predecessor, now the Minister of Immigration. The other vote was a vote of $50,000 to the Canadian Press Association. That was dropped last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But it was promised to be dropped by the government before that time; it was stated in the House that it would be dropped. I think it was dropped just about the time this new agreement was entered into. What is the difference between the old service and the service the country gets under this agreement?

Mr. LOW: The other was to assist the press of Canada. This is to present independently and fairly to the outside world what is going on in Canada and to keep alive interest in Canada and Canadian enterprise. Reuters agree to transmit at least an average of ten thousand words monthly of Canadian news designed to promote the interests of Canada. The two services are entirely different. The other vote was towards the Canadian press.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it, then, that the vote that had lapsed was a vote that assisted in the dissemination of outside news from Great Britain and the like in Canada; in other words, it was something which would enable our own people to have news of what was going on in the empire at large; and this vote of $32,000 is, I understand, for the purpose of news being sent from Canada to other parts of the world.

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are we getting for it? Where is the news collected, who collects it, and where is it sent?

Mr. LOW: Reuter's Agency in Canada collects the news and transmits it to the different parts of the empire and other parts of the world.

Mr. CHARTERS: How often is the news sent?

Mr. LOW: Daily.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By whom?

Mr. LOW: I am sure my hon. friend when he was abroad this year must have noticed many articles appearing in the British press and also on the continent as a result of this service.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Is this news or are these articles from Canada censored by the government?

Mr. LOW: Not at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that quite right?

Mr. LOW: They are not censored.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not censored or inspired?

Mr. LOW: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a vulgar impression abroad in the country that they are, owing to the government's having appointed the same gentleman who looks after the government's publicity. Will my hon. friend deny that?

Mr. LOW: No, but I will make inquiries to satisfy my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not think my hon. friend would deny that. Surely there is no mystery about it. He is a very good man for that kind of work, a very estimable gentleman. I think the government were very wise in engaging him as publicity agent. Apparently it is necessary to have a publicity agent and that sort of thing nowadays. I think the government were very wise also when they chose the agency of Reuter's as their publicity agency. My hon. friend asked me whether I had noticed a whole lot of items last summer on the other side. Well, if he is going to ask me as to the number of items, I must confess that I could not get very many. It may be I was not lucky enough to get any of the newspapers that were getting help out of this $32,000. Perhaps my hon. friend would give me a list of the papers I should have been reading and was not. In other words, we are paying $32,000 a year for advertising overseas, and I want to know in what papers these items appear.

Mr. LOW: In almost all the British daily papers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Anywhere else, in any other countries besides England?

Mr. LOW: Wherever Reuter's have an agency.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there one in Paris?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I should like to know also the name of the newspaper in Paris because I certainly could not find any, and I read most of them. Perhaps the deputy could turn up the list and let us have it?

Mr. LOW: He has not got the list of papers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does not the contract show the list?

Mr. LOW: No, the contract does not show the list. It would be impossible to embody in it the names of the different papers served by Reuter's service,—it is a very lengthy list.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should have thought that you would have had something definite in this contract which would show just how much space we are to get, and in what newspapers the information was to appear. Surely the contract contains some provision which will indicate exactly what we are paying for.

Mr. COOTE: May I make the request that the minister speak a little louder, we are not able to hear what he is saying.

Mr. LOW: An agreement was entered into in June, 1923, with the government of Canada by Reuters—London—for a news service to the United Kingdom and countries in the British Empire, as well as to the principal countries of the world. This provides for the transmission by cable to the United Kingdom of an average of 10,000 words monthly of Canadian news designed to promote the interest of Canada. This is to be in addition to the service which Reuters already cable to Canada from the world at large, which they undertake to maintain at its present average length. It is also provided that there shall be a general dissemination throughout the United Kingdom, the British dominions, and elsewhere, of mail news calculated to arouse and maintain interest in Canada and Canadian activities—commercial, financial, industrial, agricultural and so on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that as far as we get?

Mr. LOW: Yes, unless I send the hon. member a copy of the contract which I shall be very glad to do.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, I think there will be some clause which will show what we get.

Mr. LOW: I have just read the clause and it states exactly what we get.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is wonderful in its generalization, perfectly marvellous. It appears to be more general than concrete; to be more general would not have been possible. Now, if my ear caught the minister's statement aright there are two services that we get; we get a service to Canada as well as a service out of Canada. Perhaps we can find out what happens to the service into Canada if we cannot learn what happens to the service out of the country. Now then, we have a service into Canada. Where does it go and who gets the benefit of it?

Mr. LOW: All the newspapers take Reuter's service. That service extends all over the world, and the newspapers that patronize it get the benefit of the news which is transmitted from one country to the other.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well really the long and the short of it is this: We have nothing definite in our contract at all. We are paying $32,000 for Reuter's correspondents getting the privilege of taking some of our news. If I am wrong in the idea I should like my hon. friend to put me right and show me wherein I am wrong. That is the position of affairs unless there is something more definite which we are entitled to under the contract.

Mr. LOW: I have read the clause covering the item in question which shows that an average of 10,000 words of Canadian news must be transmitted monthly; Reuters undertake to do that. I am sure that is very definite—ten thousand words or more. What more definite information would my hon. friend like to have in the contract?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my hon. friend sees what we are really interested in is the publication. We are entitled to get something definite on that question, one would think. I suppose it can be said that if the ten thousand words were sent that would look to be fair. That is true to some extent, but it is the matter of publication that we are interested in, and surely the minister ought to know whether we are really getting publication and to what extent use is being made of these ten thousand words per month.

Mr. LOW: Let me state for the benefit of my hon. friend that we received during the past year 12,975 clippings from British newspapers dealing with Canadian news items. I am sure that is something worth while.

Mr. FORKE: What particular use is made of these clippings?

Mr. LOW: They are sent to the various departments that are interested in them and are used for whatever purpose those departments may deem best.

Mr. FORKE: Has the government any say at all as to what sort of news shall be sent to Great Britain?

Mr. LOW: No, we have no control.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: As I understand there are two clauses in the agreement. One provides for the transmission to the United Kingdom of Canadian news designed to promote the interests of Canada. The other deals with the general dissemination throughout the United Kingdom and elsewhere of news likely to arouse and maintain interest in Canada and Canadian activities. I was wondering how the government ascertains whether these undertakings are observed? Is the sending out of news calculated to promote interest in Canada left entirely to Reuters?

Mr. HOCKEN: Whether it is in the best interest of Canada or the best interests of the government?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I wanted to find out who is exercising supervision.

Mr. LOW: Reuters is a very reputable agency. We go over the clippings as they come in and we find that the news transmitted is of interest to the various departments, to the people of Canada, and also to the people of those countries in which the news is published.

Mr. FORKE: The minister will realize that it makes all the difference in the world whether the news is taken, as for example during the debate on the Address, from the statements of the government or from the statements of the opposition.

Mr. LOW: The field is covered from all sources and sometimes the remarks of the opposition are found transmitted in the service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not all.

Mr. CARROLL: I should judge the government would be very interested in getting back clippings from the various newspapers who take advantage of this service and ascertaining whether any false news is being transmitted. If such was the case correction could be made. It is pretty safe to presume that nothing is being sent out but what is to the advantage of Canada industrially and socially or otherwise.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend would not suggest that false news is being sent out. I do not think anyone would for a moment suggest that Reuters is sending out false news.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not suggest that either, but if it were done the parties responsible could be brought to task.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like the minister to tell me if the general impression that I have drawn to his attention is wrong. The government has a pretty good hold of the situation owing to the fact that the very capable gentleman who acts for Reuters also acts as its publicity agent here at Ottawa or director of government information if you like. Combining these two activities as he does, it is fairly clear that he would do the government no harm in whatever messages he sent.

Mr. CARROLL: Why should he?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not saying that he should. It may be that it is a very proper precaution for the government to take.

Mr. HOCKEN: The minister tells us that he has received twelve thousand clippings. That does not indicate exactly how many different items were sent out by Reuters. What service do we get for this money?

Mr. LOW: The number must be quite large. We do not receive them all. We have received about twelve thousand. That does not cover all the items.

Mr. HOCKEN: Do I understand there were twelve thousand different items sent out?

Mr. LOW: Twelve thousand in British newspapers alone. About 860 of these items related to agriculture in this country.

Mr. CHARTERS: Separate items?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mr. LOW: I would like to return to vote No. 355.

Bounty on crude petroleum, administration of, $1,500.

Mr. LOW: It is always a good sign to see members anxious to get as many details as possible in connection with the votes, but it seems too bad that the time of the House should be taken up asking many questions when if the members would sometimes turn to the reports that are filed at the opening of the session they would find the information they require, instead of spending hours in the House trying to extract the information from the minister. I find at the opening of the session I placed on the table of the House the thirty-second annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ending March 31, 1924, and just so soon this afternoon as my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) discovered that we did not have with us certain details in connection with a small vote, he endeavoured to press—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What item is being considered?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 355.

Mr. LOW: I am glad that I am now able to give him the full details, and if my hon. friend had only taken a glance at page 40 of the report filed weeks ago, he would have found an answer to every question with which he endeavoured to embarrass the department.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. ARTHURS: Was the minister aware of the details himself?

Mr. LOW: I knew they were in the report, but I told the House I did not have them with me. I find here the total production in the province of Ontario, the production in each county of the province and in each township in the county, the number of gallons produced in each month of the year, the amount of bounty paid each month, and the total bounty paid for the twelve months. If my hon. friend will just refer to page 40 of this report he will find everything in it that he asked for this afternoon.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now that my hon. friend knows something about his subject, I am going to ask and get from him, as I am entitled to, the information in connection with this vote.

Mr. LOW: I am sending the report over to my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want the report. I would have thought that he would have had the material here, and if my hon. friend thinks he can make great progress by homilies as to what other people should do I am quite content he should think so, but I am still going to try to get some facts relative to what may be thought by my hon. friend to be matters of no importance, but which are of some considerable importance to the people immediately interested in them. As he has the information I am going to ask him, what the amount of production was last year in barrels?

Mr. LOW: For Ontario?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. LOW: The total number of barrels for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1924, for Ontario, was 156,092.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are the figures having to do with the administration of this department later than the last fiscal year? What has been paid this year? What is the production this year? My hon. friend seems to forget entirely that there is a broken period here in connection with the change in the bounties. My hon. friend can tell me now—unless the work of the department is entirely behind—what has been paid and what the production has been month by month down to the last accounting period. The books certainly should have been closed six weeks ago.

Mr. LOW: The information is in the report. It gives the statistics up to the end of the last fiscal year. If my hon. friend insists on bringing these right up to the 31st January of this year, we shall have to make up the statement for him and present it to him when these estimates are under discussion again. My hon. friend knows well it would be impossible to present a report to parliament showing the figures right up to the previous month. I thought I had all the information necessary for the House in connection with this vote, and if giving the details of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1924 is not sufficient, and if the House wishes further information, I will have to ask to have the item stand over, but I must know the wishes of the House in connection with this matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend asks to have it stand over.

Mr. LOW: Yes, to get the information for which the hon. gentleman asks.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not got it yet. I also wanted to know the number of wells operating. Can the minister give me that now?

Mr. LOW: No, there is no information as to the number of wells operating. That will come under the Department of the Interior or the Department of Mines. We are simply administering the act and we do not record the number of wells.

Mr. FANSHER: When this item was up for discussion early this afternoon I made inquiry of the minister as to how many claims were presented for bounty. We are asked to vote a certain amount for the administration of this work, and I think it only proper we should know the number of claims and the extent of the work in connection with the administration of the bounty.

Mr. LOW: I will be glad to give my hon. friend full information on the extent of the work in connection with the administration; but so far as the amounts which have been paid to each individual producer are concerned, I have not that information. The officials employed in connection with this work are: W. D. McDermid, supervisor at Petrolia, at an annual salary of $1,560; Hugh Boyle, part time, Sarnia, $200; S. E. Slipper, Edmonton, Alberta, $200; O. J. O. LeBlanc, St. John, $100. Travelling and other expenses amounted to $940. Of course, as I stated at the outset, the payment of bounty expires the 30th June this year.

Mr. FANSHER: I am well aware that the bounty expires the first July of this year, but I think we have some information in the amount that is paid in the different provinces. I understand $200 was paid at Edmonton for the administration of this act, and if my information is correct, I do not believe that amount has been paid in bounties in Alberta. I doubt if one-fifth of that amount has been paid in bounties for some years in Alberta. I have the return for one of the years not long past, and I am doubtful if it amounts to $200.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend is quite right, but we have to have an officer there. It is quite true that the amount that has been paid is very small.

Mr. FANSHER: What is the amount paid in Alberta?

Mr. LOW: The amounts are as follows.

1923-24	$ 30 35
1922-23	199 12
1921-22	614 16
1920-21	169 08

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not yet told us the number of claims which were made. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher) asked about that a moment or two ago. I should think the number of these claims would be in this department, not in the Department of Mines.

Mr. LOW: I did not know the hon. member for East Lambton had asked the question, but I knew the hon. member for West York had asked it before. We have not that, but we shall be glad to make out a list, although it will be quite a lengthy one, for the hon. member, showing the amount paid in bounty to each producer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want a long list like that. I want only the number. I want to find out if I can how this business is being run and the number of claims put in. Last year we knew exactly what the situation was, the number of wells, power plants and the like. Surely it is only reasonable that we should have this year the information which we had last year without having a lecture about it. A minister of the crown with his deputy beside him ought to know what the whole activity is in the year, and that is all I am asking. I do not want a lengthy list; I want a little clarity and a little common sense.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 10, respecting The London Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Canada and to change its name to "London Fire Insurance Company of Canada."—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 11, to incorporate Dominion Chartered Customs House Brokers Association.—Mr. McMaster.

Bill No. 12, respecting The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—Mr. German.

Bill No. 13, respecting a patent of West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 14, respecting a patent of Edgeworth Green.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 15, respecting a patent of Blair Engineering Company of Canada, Limited.—Mr. McMaster.

SUPPLY

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. LOW: When the House rose at six o'clock the hon. member (Sir Henry Drayton) had asked for certain information in connection with the item under consideration, No. 355. I am securing that information for him and will try to have it inside of an hour. In the meantime we might pass on to some other item.

The Canada Grain Act, administration of, $1,100,000.

Mr. FORKE: Is it the intention of the government to introduce a bill based upon the report of the Turgeon commission? The discussion on this item and on that bill would perhaps be the same, and it would clear the air if we understood exactly what the intention was in regard to that report.

Mr. LOW: It is the intention of the government to introduce a bill based upon the recommendations made in that report.

Mr. SPENCER: Will that be a new grain act, to take the place of the old one?

Mr. LOW: Many of the clauses in the present Grain Act will appear in the new, but there will be many new features also in the act it is proposed to bring down.

Mr. SPENCER: When is it likely to be brought down?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. LOW: The bill is in course of preparation. As soon as it is ready it will be presented to the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does this item carry any of the elevator charges?

Mr. LOW: No, that is under another item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This merely deals with the administration of the act itself?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If it is the intention of the government to bring down a bill following the report of the Royal Grain Commission in its entirety I can quite see that we should be wasting time by discussing this item, the supposition being, of course, that hon. members have their minds made up either pro or con on these issues. But if the government does not intend to carry out all the recommendations of the report, hon. members should know it so that they may have an opportunity of offering to the government the reasons which, in their view, would be sufficient to justify the bringing down of a bill dealing with the whole question.

Mr. LOW: Whether or not all the recommendations made by the commission in their report will be embodied in the bill is a matter for the government to decide. It would be almost impossible to hope that all would be included. However, the whole matter will be considered by the government before the bill is presented to the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The west is very particularly concerned in this matter, and personally—and I think I speak for a very considerable interest in the east—I would hesitate to do anything which might in any way prejudice that case. On the other hand I am afraid the western members may find themselves in the position of having thrown away an opportunity of doing something to get the government, before it makes up its mind, to adopt such and such a course. And some gentlemen have not yet entirely abandoned the hope that the government will from time to time listen to reason.

Mr. LOW: I can only assure my hon. friend that ample opportunity will be given the House to discuss the bill. It will be a very simple matter to make recommendations or suggestions when the bill is brought down. Personally, expressing my own opinion, I would suggest that the bill be referred to a committee.

Mr. ARTHURS: What portion of this vote is for the inside service and what for the outside?

Mr. LOW: It covers the salaries of all officers, inspection and weighing, the expenses of the commission and the clerical staff.

Mr. BROWN: Those whom we in this section of the House represent are naturally very much interested in the bill to be brought down, and it is hoped that the bill will be considered on its merits without the government having committed itself too definitely to any proposal embodied in it. We would like to have the assurance of the government that the bill will be thrown into the House and that the best reason of the House will be brought to bear upon making it the best that can be made for the carrying on of the grain trade. Having in mind what took place this afternoon we do not want to have a repetition of a long discussion on estimates and a wandering away into a discussion that would all have to be gone over again when the bill was introduced. We want an opportunity for the fullest and freest discussion and we want to have the best judgment of the House, whether of government or of opposition, to secure the best bill possible.

Mr. LOW: I think I can assure the hon. member that that opportunity will be given.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister hardly answered the question I put to him a moment ago, namely, as to the differentiation between the salaries in Ottawa and those outside under this item. His reply was that weighers and so on were included under this item, but I find an item immediately below for elevators and I understand that weighers would come under that item.

Mr. LOW: There are no salaries paid in Ottawa in connection with this item.

Mr. MILLAR: Can the minister give definite information when the bill will be brought down? There are many controversial matters in connection with it, and the bill will require considerable discussion before it gets through either committee or the House, and unless it is brought down early, it may not be finally put through before the session is over.

Mr. LOW: I think I can assure my hon. friend that the bill will not be long delayed. It will be brought down very shortly.

Mr. SPENCER: I understand that the administration of the Grain Act is met by the various charges on the grain trade. Have the charges made during this last year outweighed the cost of administration?

Mr. LOW: We anticipate there will be a surplus, but a reduced surplus from last year.

Mr. GOULD: Has the decision handed down by the Supreme court last year had any effect on the administration expenses of the Canada Grain Act?

Mr. LOW: No, not yet. The case is still in appeal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The words "administration of the act" would imply that this vote was confined almost entirely to paying officials' salaries, and so forth, but I find quite a number of items, for insurance, and other matters not connected with salaries. Would the minister explain just what administration of the act covers, because it is quite evident from the Auditor General's report that it covers a great deal more than salaries.

Mr. LOW: The vote covers all the expenditure for salaries of officials, permanent and temporary, and the contingencies of the various offices under the eastern and western divisions, salaries and contingencies of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and the salaries and expenses of the grain research laboratory, excepting the salary of the chief chemist.

Mr. GOULD: A few days ago I placed on the order paper a question respecting the grain testing laboratory at Winnipeg, and I would have liked very much to have had that question answered before this item came up. It might facilitate its passing if the minister could give me an answer to the questions at this time.

Mr. LOW: The answer to my hon. friend's question, which is No. 21 on to-day's order paper, is as follows:

1. Yes.
2. Dr. F. J. Birchard.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. Changes in staff in 1922:

Herbert A. Watson re-employed as junior chemist at $160 per month from May 8, 1922, to October 1, 1922.

Andrew Cairns re-employed as junior chemist at $1,680 per annum, April 18, 1922. Resigned September 30, 1922.

S. M. Allman (R.S.) employed as a labourer at $4.50 per day from May, 1922.

Geo. McDonald employed as a labourer at $4.50 per day for 20 days during June and July, 1922.

W. Symes employed as a labourer at $4.50 per day during June, July and August, 1922.

Changes in staff in 1923:

S. M. Allman employed as junior cerealist from July 1, 1923 at $5 per day.

T. R. Aitken (O.A.S.) employed as junior chemist at $140 per month from September 20, 1923.

Andrew Cairns re-employed as assistant chemist at $175 per month from May 21, 1923. Resigned September 13, 1923.

H. F. Bill, junior chemist, at $1,800 per annum. Resigned March 3, 1923.

Herbert A. Watson re-employed as junior chemist at $160 per month from May 1, 1923. Resigned September 30, 1923.

George Ward employed as a labourer at $4.50 per day for 17 days in September, 1923.

Changes in staff in 1924:

The services of the following were dispensed with on March 31, 1924:

T. R. Aitken (O.A.S.), junior chemist at $140 per month.

S. M. Allman (R.S.) junior cerealist at $5 per day.

Miss A. C. Lamb, clerk-stenographer at $1,140 per annum.

Mrs Tate employed as stenographer for 30 days at $90 per month, to assist in preparation of report.

5. No.

6. Answered by No. 5.

Mr. SALES: In view of all the resignations read out by the minister, I would ask him how many officials are operating the laboratory at the present time.

Mr. LOW: Dr. Birchard is the only one in the laboratory at the present time.

Mr. SALES: That leads me to the further question, what is the policy of the minister in this connection? Research with a view to an improvement in the milling qualities of our grain is of very great importance to the farmers of this country. I should like to make a short quotation in this connection from the Canadian Milling and Grain Journal, which expresses this idea:

> There is little doubt that on the grain exchanges of the future, glutenin will play an important role; it will not be sufficient for a grade of wheat to bear a general good name for strength; each shipment will have to undergo its own test, and will be marketed on the basis of actual and not accredited strength.

I should like also to make a short quotation from the report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission. Dealing with this matter of research, the chairman states:

> We are impressed with the great need for research work to be carried on for the promotion of our grain growing and milling industries. The keeping up of the quality of wheat alone is of immense importance. Our excellent position in the better export markets of the world can be held only if we guard the quality of our grades. Commissioner Rutherford reported that in the Old Country extensive provision has been made for carrying on investigation and research in connection with wheats, flour and milling, with special attention given to the content and quality of gluten.
> When we were in the United States, we visited two well-equipped laboratories for carrying on investigations in respect to wheats and milling, viz.—at Minneapolis, where the state has a 125 barrel mill and other splendid facilities, and at Manhattan, Kansas, where the state has made excellent provision for carrying on investigations in respect to questions relating to wheats, milling, baking and flours.
> Canada is now in the position of being not only the largest exporter of wheat, but the largest exporter of the world's "best" hard wheat.

In the light of these facts it is very difficult for the people who are growing wheat to understand the attitude of the minister and of the government on this question. Here is Canada the largest exporter of wheat in the world, and all we are doing in grain research is being done in a little bit of a one-horse place somewhere down a back lane, with only one man carrying on research. I think that is a policy this government should be ashamed of, and especially in view of the following figures: I know the minister corrected me last year when I pointed out the revenue and expenditure in connection with the Grain Act, but I find that the figures this year are as follows: Revenue, $2,850,527.28; expenditure, $1,549,-681.00, leaving a balance of $1,300,846.28. In the face of what the department has obtained from the administration of the Grain Act in the shape of weighing and inspection charges, and so on, it is not too much to ask that we should have a little money spent in determining the milling value of the most important commodity in this country to-day. I would therefore ask the minister and the other members of the government—and I am glad to see the Prime Minister in his seat—to pay attention to this important matter and extend this research work. I know it has been stated that this work is not on a commercial basis, that it is only a matter of experiment. But why not follow the example of the United States, and we export more wheat than they do, and provide sufficient testing machinery to enable these experiments to be carried out on a commercial basis. I would ask the government to pay attention to this phase of the subject.

Mr. LOW: I quite agree with my hon. friend that this is a very important matter. I also agree with him as to the importance of the industry. We are, as the hon. member has said, probably the largest exporter of hard wheat, in the world. The government is studying at the present moment just how to continue the laboratory in the most effective and most efficient manner. The matter was referred to the Royal Grain Commission and when the new act is being prepared, due consideration will be given to the recommendations made in that connection by that body. Hon. members do not need to impress upon me the importance of the work carried on by the laboratory. It is a question of how the work can be carried on with the greatest efficiency, and at the same time render the greatest use to the farmers of the Canadian west. We have only one purpose in this connection and that is to have a laboratory which shall be efficient and effective regardless of whether it is operating under the Research Council or in conjunction with the Canada grain board.

Mr. MILLAR: The fact that this matter will come up for full discussion later on restrains me from saying very much at the present time, but seeing that the government is now making up its mind as to the legislation it will introduce, and that the recommendation of the Grain Inquiry Commission does not go far enough to satisfy very many of us or very many people throughout the country, I am moved to read extracts from at least two letters that I have in my possession. I may say that I have gathered, in connection with the resolution that I will move on this matter later in the session, a great deal of information from the United States, and from various laboratories and other sources in Canada. For the present I will content myself with reading extracts from two of these letters, and I should like the minister to take into consideration the facts there stated when he is deciding what legislation shall be brought down. One of these letters is from Minneapolis. I am not free to give the name of the official who wrote it but I can assure you that it is from a party who should know the facts. He says:

The premiums paid for wheat containing certain percentage of protein vary from time to time with the supply and demand as does the general level of prices. Speaking in a very general way, wheat containing 11 per cent of protein might be considered standard. If it contained 12 per cent protein, the one per cent additional protein might command 5 cents premium. If it contained 13 per cent protein, the 2 per cent additional protein above 11 might command 10 cents premium. For every one-tenth of one per cent of protein contained above 13 per cent an additional premium of one cent per bushel is generally paid; that is, wheat containing 16 per cent protein would command 30 cents premium over the 13 per cent protein.

I now read an extract from another letter received from the United States:

Laboratories to perform this service have been established by private concerns, boards of trade and in one instance by a state grain inspection department. Charges for making these tests range from 65 cents to $1. (In Kansas, Missouri, the laboratories can make 3,000 tests per day).

I wish hon. members to mark that statement because the time occupied in the making of the tests has been one great obstacle that has stood in the way of this reform which has been desired by our western farmers for, I think I may say, ten or twelve years at least. The extract continues:

In the Hard Red Winter and Hard Red Spring wheats, those containing less than 11 per cent protein usually bring the average daily market price for their numerical grades; for wheats containing above 11 per cent protein the premiums for each one-quarter per cent will range from one to two and one-half cents per bushel. The protein content is not shown on the inspection certificate but is shown on a separate certificate issued by the laboratory making the test.

I have also a letter from a farmer living in western Canada but I will just give the substance of it. He points out that the manager of the elevator in his town, a milling elevator and the only one in the place, draws samples not only from all the grain that he ships himself but from all the grain shipped from loading platforms and sends it forward to have protein tests made. That shows the extent to which the mills have carried on this work. They are selecting the strong grains from all over the west and they are making tests, and are taking off the cream in that way, and the farmer feels that with such premiums which I have referred to as prevailing in the States he should at least get a premium of perhaps one-half the amount the American farmers are receiving, perhaps two-thirds, but anyway a considerable premium. He does not see any reason why this premium should continue to go to the mills and the middle men and be lost entirely to himself. I assure the minister there is a very strong demand in the direction indicated, and it has been in existence for years. I could read from a report prepared by the officials of the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association showing that one of their demands presented to the Grain Inquiry Commission was that a laboratory such as has been referred to should be maintained.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Does the farmer get any premium?

Mr. MILLAR: No. Perhaps I might explain that there has been a system of diversion of good grades of wheat and a premium is sometimes paid to the middleman of one cent a bushel. I believe that is supposed to be passed back to the producer, but I think that is done only in one case in a thousand; I do not know that I ever knew a farmer that received it. Consequently the answer I gave my hon. friend on that point is quite correct—the farmer never receives it. I think this subject will come up for discussion when the matter is taken up later, therefore I will not indulge in any further remarks.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Can the minister give any reason why there have been these resignations? Was it due to salary or some such cause?

Mr. LOW: It was decided to discontinue the laboratory in its present form and the services of these people were dispensed with.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It was not a matter of resignation then but a change of policy?

Mr. LOW: A change of policy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Dismissals.

Mr. GOULD: The minister replied, I think, to the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) when he asked a question about the report. I also put a question. I asked:

Has any report of the work of the laboratory been submitted by Dr. Birchard during the years 1922, 1923 and 1924?

The reply was no. It seems to me the minister should state that both he and the government are seized of the importance of this work at Winnipeg; and yet no report has been received from the gentleman in charge of the laboratory. That is a curious coincidence, and I rise to ask if the department or the minister has asked for a report from Dr. Birchard.

Mr. LOW: That is one of the very reasons we decided to discontinue the laboratory under its present staff. There has been no report submitted to the department. A partial report was sent in I believe some seven years ago, and Dr. Birchard never completed that report. He was asked to send in a complete report, and that is one of the reasons why, under Dr. Birchard, we thought the laboratory was not as efficient as we would like it to be.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Did the government or the department ever ask Dr. Birchard for a report? Did they ever request an annual report?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. LOVIE: Did Dr. Birchard present a report before the Turgeon commission? I would like to submit to this House a letter which I received from a farmer who is largely interested in this matter. It is outside information. The letter reads as follows:

I would like to draw your attention to the attempt by the Department of Trade and Commerce under Mr. Low to close up our grain testing laboratory at Winnipeg.

I am aware of the Progressive's stand last spring, which prevented at the time the definite closing up. But in spite of this the fact is the place is occupied by Dr. Birchard alone. Has no staff at all. Has all been taken away. He is carrying on alone and still working. But what can one man do alone in a place like that. The effect so far as the country is concerned is that the place is practically closed now.

At the time of the closing order there was a large amount of very valuable research work nearly completed. Work that would have been of inestimable value to us western farmers (and the country too) in proving the values of lower grades of wheat which are always so much discriminated against.

It seems that there was some effort being made at Ottawa, to close up the Winnipeg office prior to the Grain Inquiry Commission under Mr. Turgeon. But it seems to me that after Mr. Birchard gave that splendid constructive evidence re the milling values of the lower grades that Mr. Low could not stand having the like of that coming from a civil servant. Anyway Mr. Birchard got the millers properly worked up so that practically all their efforts were confined to defeat what had been given out. I am led to believe that Mr. Birchard was prevented by some means from giving the court the conclusive evidence he had on file. Here is where the west lost out. This data is still in existence. It belongs to the western farmers and should be made available.

I think all the results from this kind of research work should be available to the public in some form of report. If the west had the facts that the Dominion grain research laboratory at Winnipeg has on file there would not be the spreads we always have in the lower grades.

There is another thing perhaps not bearing all in line with this matter. There seems to be some way in which the choicer cars in each grade are being picked up before export for our Canadian mills. In this way I maintain the price of all the grades are lowered. Because it is a lower grade average being exported. The export market makes the price basis. So you will see if the choice lots are taken the average must have been lowered. And it is this lower average grade the ultimate export market buys and pays for on a world market value basis. The farmer loses.

As long as the Canadian mills can get all choice lots they need one could expect them to want lower grade stuff which may be a little more trouble to blend. Besides our mills using nothing but the choice grain, can export a flour in demand for blending. The farmer loses again because he was paid on the export price basis of the average (culled over) export grade.

I venture Mr. Low knows all this being a miller himself. And it would be a great thing to be able to close Mr. Birchard's mouth forever.

I am afraid unless we watch carefully the knife will be applied to our splendid grain testing laboratory at the first opportunity. I understand the minister's plea is economy. A convenient one. But far from the truth. The farmers need that office to work at full blast and unbridled as an economy.

Perhaps if the department could not find funds otherwise they should sell one of those tied-up ships they can find no use for and in that way keep this office open. And thus practice economy before it rots out and half the farmers are out of business as well.

I am sorry to say but I believe it to be the fact that there is only a small percentage of farmers know anything about a grain testing laboratory at all, let alone our grain testing laboratory at Winnipeg. If the farmers only understood what they have a chance of losing there would be such a howl go forth that Ottawa would never dare think of closing it.

Mr. Lovie, I would like to have you get in touch with Mr. Crerar and any other members you can rely on interested in this matter. Perhaps you could pay a visit to the laboratory and get valuable facts to work on. So that we may not only prevent the closing going into effect but that sufficient pressure can be made so an efficient staff of help may be given Dr. Birchard to carry on with efficiency.

I can assure you if he had not been a real man Ottawa would not have been alarmed at all. Apparently what they would like would be a "ninny" in charge that would do as bid without question. Possibly then money could be squandered to "satisfy" the "clamouring west."

This is a vital matter for us farmers and I feel sure you will lend a hand and real good will come of it.

If the minister wants the name of the writer of this letter I will give it in private, but I do not want it spread broadcast. The letter expresses the feeling in the west of those who know the work of Dr. Birchard, and there is a feeling among them that money should be spent to keep that laboratory in a state of efficiency.

Mr. LOW: I cannot add to what I have already said. I fully realize the importance of the laboratory, and it is the intention of the government to continue a laboratory in some form. Whether it will be in the present form or under the Research Council, or connected more closely with the Canada Grain Act, is a matter to be decided upon. It is my intention when the new Canada Grain Act is brought in to have it referred to the committee on Agriculture, and there will then be ample opportunity for members of this House to make any representations that they wish to that committee.

After consulting my deputy, I wish to correct a statement I made a few minutes ago. Dr. Birchard did send in a special report to me last fall. That is the first report in several years, and it was sent in after the fact had been repeatedly brought to his attention, that his reports had not been sent in for some years. That report has been referred to Dr. Tory of the Research Council, and will be brought before the committee when the new grain bill is being considered.

Mr. GOULD: The statement the hon. minister has now made is an acknowledgment that the replies to numbers 5 and 6 of my questions on the order paper to-day are incorrect. I distinctly asked about reports being sent in and asked if they were available to hon. members. The answer was no in both cases. That will appear in Hansard.

Mr. LOW: It is not on Hansard yet.

Mr. GOULD: Yes, the questions and answers have been sent up to Hansard, and there is a grave error in the answers. I had the pleasure of listening to Dr. Birchard myself as he gave evidence before the Royal Grain Commission in the city of Winnipeg in the latter part of February of last year, and I was very much interested in his evidence, particularly in his description of what might constitute the different grades which they called the contract grades Nos. 1, 2 and 3, northern wheat. If hon. members will take up Dr. Birchard's statement and compare it with the Canada Grain Act as it is at the present time, people would understand the difference between the Canada Grain Act and the evidence submitted by Dr. Birchard. It would cause almost a revolution in western Canada. When Dr. Birchard said that wheat having a basis of 60 per cent of hard or marquis wheat with a mixture of some frozen or shrunken or other wheat, might be admitted as No. 1 northern, and that similar proportions of high grade grain could be mixed and still maintain their grades as No. 2 and 3 northern, I was surprised but Dr. Birchard established it, I understand, from scientific tests. But the Canada Grain Act is not based upon that. After I went to my hotel, I was visited by two lawyers who were working for the grain companies there, and they asked me if I would issue a statement for the press at that time denying the possibility of Dr. Birchard's statement being true. I told them that I was not a professional man and that I had more sympathy with Dr. Birchard than I had with the Canada Grain Act. But such is the interest of the people who are making a living out of our wheat—

An hon. MEMBER: Who were these people?

Mr. GOULD: These were two lawyers working in the interest of grain companies, without giving names. They visited me at the hotel and asked me to contradict the evidence given by Dr. Birchard.

Mr. GOOD: Did they want you to falsify what you had heard?

Mr. GOULD: To say that I did not believe the statement Dr. Birchard had made. That is the manner in which they endeavour to become a law unto themselves, in order to hide the evidence, to hide the truth. It is because of these things that people in this country, particularly in the west, are dissatisfied with the Canada Grain Act. I hope, as the minister has said, that this time we shall have a grain act that will be just and equitable to the people who are producing the grain. Tens of thousands of farmers would have gone before that grain commission if there had not been such an array of legal counsel who, they felt, would abuse them when they were there. Men who were sincere, who knew their side of the business, would have presented themselves before the commission, but the idea of subjecting themselves to cross-examination by the array of legal talent that was present intimidated them. Consequently, I am here to state that the amount of evidence given before the commission is not a fair criterion of the feeling that exists among the people pertaining to these important questions. I hope, when the act is framed, we shall have ample opportunity to make suggestions and that our requests will be acceded to in the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. MILLAR: We have, I suppose, the assurance of the minister that the valuable information that is now in the laboratory at Winnipeg in connection with experiments that have been carried on for some years and that are only partly completed, will be preserved so that it can be made use of.

Let me also say a word in regard to the reports. Some of those experiments require years to complete, for instance the experiments that are being carried on, I believe, at the present time in Canada and the United States to discover the exact amount of moisture that oats may contain and yet be safe for storage. It requires years to complete that test, so that I do not think Dr. Birchard should be readily condemned because he has not handed in many reports. You can understand that climatic conditions in certain years are such that they cannot get the oats to experiment on, and then they must have certain climatic conditions when the oats are stored. Oats that might be all right in a cool season might be all wrong in a very warm season, so that it requires years to complete such a test as this and there may be others that will take equally long.

9. p.m.

Mr. ROBB: My recollection is that one of the troubles we had with Dr. Birchard was that he never would complete his work. We never could bring him up to a conclusion. With all due respect for my hon. friend's observation that it requires a long time to complete these experiments, I know from practical experience that we send samples to, I think it is Howard at Minneapolis, who does this work, and get a reply within ten days, or we can send them to the college at Guelph and get a reply within a week.

Mr. MILLAR: The minister has, I think, missed my point. They can tell you in ten days or less how much moisture is in a sample of oats or wheat; but in an experiment that has been carried on over years, they have proved that a small additional percentage of moisture in wheat makes it still perfectly safe. A small additional amount of moisture, even one-quarter of one per cent means a good deal. It means, in some years, that dozens of carloads of wheat may be shipped down there and go through straight whereas formerly they would not. That means a good deal. Experiments of that nature are going on, and I believe they are unfinished with regard to oats, both in the United States and in Canada.

Mr. GOOD: Did I understand the minister to say that the department had asked Dr. Birchard for a report and that it had not been furnished by him?

[Mr. Millar.]

Mr. ROBB: I remember very distinctly, during the period when I was in that department, having sent for Dr. Birchard to try to get something closed up with him, but we never could get the work concluded. I think there were partial reports. I am speaking from memory as it is a couple of years ago.

Mr. GOOD: Did Dr. Birchard state that these reports were in such a condition that they were not suitable for publication?

Mr. ROBB: I do not recollect that.

Mr. LOW: I should like to read a few words for the benefit of my hon. friend:

> In this connection it may be said that a portion of this report was forwarded to the King's Printer in July, 1920, as material for Dominion Grain Research Laboratory Bulletin No. 2. This was all set up at the Printing Bureau and the proof sent to Dr. Birchard to read. For some months thereafter, we did not hear from him, and when Mr. O'Hara wrote to him he got no satisfaction, other than the statement that the report would be completed shortly. Finally, on Ocober 4, 1921, by order of the King's Printer, the type was re-distributed and the printing matter returned to Dr. Birchard. This report was never completed.

After part of it had been set up in type for about a year.

Mr. MILNE: Is it the custom of the government in departments which they consider are of such importance as this laboratory is, to retain men, year after year, without receiving reports from them? Is it the custom of the government to retain servants who are as inefficient as this report would lead us to believe?

Mr. LOW: I have no doubt that he may have been making routine reports to the chief inspector at Winnipeg, but I have just read a clause in connection with this report to substantiate what the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) has said about our endeavour to get reports from Dr. Birchard.

Mr. MILNE: The department surely cannot consider this office of any importance or they would not stand for a minute for this sort of procedure.

Mr. LOW: Ministers are sometimes very considerate.

Mr. SALES: After listening to the minister's explanations, I am almost inclined to think he used the wrong term when he spoke of resignations. I think he should have said "dismissals." In spite of what the minister says of the importance of the subject, it appears that the policy is to disregard this office. If Dr. Birchard is not the right man in the right place, why not get someone that is, and make it a real office? Why put up with a man who does not report and is not satisfactory? And why not spend some of this surplus money? I want to know again from the minister whether my calculations are correct as to the revenue and expenditures of the administration of the Canada Grain Act, because I have a balance of $1,300,000 according to what I can find from the Auditor General's report, and the laboratory costs are included in this figure. I am sure that the minister and the government would do well to put into operation a really effective laboratory so that the tests there made can be relied upon by practical men for commercial purposes. Will the minister kindly tell me what the revenue and expenses are this year under the Canada Grain Act so I may not have the wrong figures again?

Mr. LOW: Answering my hon. friend's first question, I fully agree with him that if Dr. Birchard is not the right man a more satisfactory substitute should be secured, and that we should not economize on the laboratory. I am fully seized of the importance of the work of this office. After we have amended the Grain Act I think hon. members on the other side of the House will have reached the conclusion that we are not trying to save a few dollars, but are simply striving to secure the greatest efficiency in the laboratory. No one in this House is more impressed than I with the importance of the great industry of grain growing in the west. But there is no justification for wasting money. We merely closed the office pending the report of the Royal Grain Commission. Upon that report we propose to act, and to establish a laboratory in Winnipeg that will be close to the point of inspection and of greater benefit than ever before to the grain growers of the west.

Mr. SALES: Is the amount included in the estimates?

Mr. LOW: The amount is included in this $1,100,000.

Mr. SALES: But how much for laboratory purposes?

Mr. LOW: That will be decided upon after we have dealt with the report of the Royal Grain Commission. I have an open mind upon the question. Whether $50,000 or $100,000 is required, if the expenditure is going to benefit the farmers of the west, they will find me, as Minister of Trade and Commerce, fully in accord with it.

Mr. SALES: Now, the receipts and expenses?

Mr. LOW: The surplus in connection with the administration of the Grain Act for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924, is $528,559.74; for the ten months ending January 31, 1925, $172,246.11. I pointed out to my hon. friend last year that these elevators are all built out of current expenditure, and that no charge is debited against the revenue for interest on the amounts so invested. But over the actual operating expenses there is a surplus, as I said before, of some $528,000.

Mr. SALES: Why cannot we get this information from the Auditor General's report? I think I can understand figures. Has the hon. minister included in this charge the interest on the elevators, and is this $528,000 the balance remaining after interest has been paid?

Mr. LOW: Of course, the cost of operation and maintenance of the Canadian government elevators comes under another item, but so far as the Grain Act is concerned the figure I gave the hon. member is correct—$528,559.74 for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924.

Mr. SALES: I do not want to be unduly critical, but I should like to understand where I am at. I find the Canadian government elevators on page 18 ZZ of the Auditor General's report.

Mr. LOW: We have not reached the government elevators yet; they are under another item.

Mr. SALES: Yes; but there maintenance is included in the $1,549,681 of expenses. At page 39 ZZ are Canadian government elevators, maintenance at Vancouver, Saskatoon, Port Arthur, Moose Jaw, Calgary—these are all included in the $1,549,681. Then when I turn to the revenue I find the figure is $2,850,527.28. I cannot understand how the minister arrives at his balance.

Mr. LOW: What year?

Mr. SALES: I find my figures in the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924. I got my figures from the same source last year, and the hon. minister then corrected me; he has corrected me again to-night. I want to know what is added to this expenditure which leaves only a balance of $528,000.

Mr. LOW: I am quoting the figures for the Canada Grain Act alone. For the government elevators these are the surpluses: For the year ending 1922-23, $437,063.65; for 1923-24, $241,730.25. I have the figures for the previous years if my hon. friend would like to have them.

Mr. SALES: So the apparent difference in the figures is because the profits derived from the internal elevators are not counted under the administration of the Grain Act?

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. SALES: I see.

Mr. LOW: The combined surpluses total $770,309.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I am glad to notice that the minister has apparently had a change of heart in the matter of this research work.

Mr. LOW: Allow me to correct my hon. friend; I have had no change of heart at all.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I hope he has had a change of heart, considering the impression he left upon us in this part of the House last year.

Mr. LOW: I do not know what impression I left.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): The impression he left upon hon. members in this part of the House, from the attitude he adopted toward the continuance of the laboratory in Winnipeg, indicated to us that the policy was to close it, and the policy that has been carried out since then, that of almost closing it, lent colour to that impression. I say I am glad if he has changed his attitude, or if he has not the attitude we supposed he had. I do not want to repeat the arguments that have been made here to-night as to the importance not only of continuing but of adequately enlarging that laboratory for the proper carrying on of experiments in research work. I want to give one concrete example of the possible value in dollars and cents of that kind of work to the grain growers of western Canada. A farmer in my constituency took two samples of the grain from his crop of the year before last, the appearance of which led him to believe that that grain varied in quality. He sent the two samples to the inspection department at Winnipeg and they both graded exactly alike, No. 3 northern. When he shipped his main crop, two carloads, one of each kind, the sample test proved correct; it was graded by the inspection department as No. 3 throughout. Shortly afterwards he was visiting in Minneapolis and he took two 5-pound samples of each of the grains that he considered to be different in quality, both of which had graded the same in Winnipeg,—No. 3 northern. He approached a grain firm in Minneapolis and submitted the samples, and one of the samples was graded as No. 1 dark northern spring. The other, they said, was worth a premium on account of its protein content. By the way, I questioned him with regard to this test and he said it was almost a matter of minutes—a matter of hours, at the outside—because it was all done one afternoon. For this second sample, which had been graded in Winnipeg as No. 3, they made him an offer of 26 cents a bushel for carload lots delivered on the market in Minneapolis. To prove that the two 5-pound samples graded the same in Winnipeg he took them back to Winnipeg on his return and again submitted them to the inspection department there, and again they were graded No. 3 northern, both exactly the same. It is such knowledge as that, gained from practical experience, that has led the farmers of western Canada to believe that there is a better system of grading than that which we have had for many years past. And if there is a better system of grading it is apparent to us that it has to come through testing. Not that grading can be improved on the basis of the mere looks of the grain; the outward appearance is often deceiving. It is only by proper testing that the real value of grain can be determined. I maintain that a lead should be taken by the department along this line. The argument has been presented here to-night, and I think effectively, that the farmers are paying for that service and that they deserve the best service it is possible to give. I appeal to the minister therefore, not to close the laboratory at Winnipeg or even to keep it practically closed, as at present, letting a whole season pass by without any particular benefit accruing from it. I would urge upon the minister that it should be put into full operation at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. GOOD: The minister's practice scarcely tallies with his professions in regard to this work. Here we have practically nothing done for four years, yet it is work that means millions of dollars to the farmers. We have got the impression that the policy of the department is to leave the farmers at the mercy of the millers and the grain men.

Mr. LOW: I assure my hon. friend that if he has that impression, such is not my intention. I assure him also that the farmers have in the minister a friend who will do everything in his power to see that they get justice. I have listened to the discussion with considerable interest, having some little knowledge of milling. It is not an uncommon thing for us to receive at our mill a carload of No. 1 northern wheat which perhaps at another season of the year would not grade even as No. 2. Very often there is a great difference in the cars as they come in; whether or not that is at the mixing elevators I am not prepared to say. But we find a great difference at times in the No. 1 and the No. 2 wheat. Sometimes we will get cars of No. 2 that mill just about as well as No. 1. Speaking about the grades, my hon. friend knows, I suppose, that the grades of No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3 are fixed by act of parliament, and if any change is to be made—

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): So far as the protein content, the real value of the grain, is concerned, the regulations of parliament have very little to do with it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The percentage of protein content does not determine the value of the wheat for flour. It determines the quantity of protein but says nothing regarding its quality, which is the important thing. In the case of the low grade wheat such as we have this year the protein content in a No. 6 grade might be just as high as in a No. 1, but the point is that the quality of the protein is not there.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to say just a word or two in appreciation of the service that Dr. Birchard has rendered to the farmers of this country, and to point out the service that he might have rendered had he been given support by the department. I do not know that there is a great deal to be gained by any criticism at this time, but, putting it mildly, it was pure waste of money to keep Dr. Birchard in his office for the last six or eight months without an assistant even to wash his dishes. When a man like Dr. Birchard, who has taken a high degree in chemistry, is placed in an office of this kind without an assistant it seems rather absurd for the minister to come and say afterwards that he has a great interest in this work. When I was on my way to Ottawa this year I came by way of Minneapolis and Chicago in an endeavour to get some information in regard to the grading of grain in the United States. One of the officials of the grain grading department there told me that in his opinion Dr. Birchard was a very valuable official; that he had met him several times, and that this country would lose a very valuable man if Dr. Birchard were not retained in his present position. I feel that all that Dr. Birchard needs to be a very valuable official for this country is some efficient backing up by the department. Dr. Birchard's services have never been properly made use of. Our grain standards board when it met in the fall should have called in Dr. Birchard and asked him to give evidence regarding the baking qualities of our wheat in each of these years. I am sure that Dr. Birchard was making these tests, but I have been told that he was never called before that board. Now why do we keep Dr. Birchard in that position unless it is to determine the baking values of the different grades of wheat, and when the grain standards board is meeting to fix a standard for the year, surely if Dr. Birchard's services are to be made use of at any time, it should be when that board meets.

I am quite ready to agree with the Minister of Agriculture that the protein test in itself is not possibly a true indication of the baking values of wheat, but it is some indication, for to have a good strong milling wheat you must have good protein content and good gluten quality. When I was in Minneapolis on the floor of the chamber of commerce I saw the representative of a large milling firm offer a premium of 32 cents for a car of wheat from Montana that tested 13.40 protein. Another sample for which he offered just the bare market price of $1.97 per bushel tested 10.40.

I have here a letter from an official in the grain grading department of the United States giving the protein test of Nos. 1, 2 and 3 Manitoba northern wheat, samples I had secured from Mr. Serls, chief inspector. No. 1 tested 13.84; No. 2, 13.76; and No. 3, 13.76 protein. I am sure that these wheats are just as valuable for the making of flour as this Montana wheat, possibly more so, because you will note that the poorest of them tested .36 above the Montana wheat. The same official told me that he had graded samples of our different grades of wheat, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 northern, this year, and that they would all grade No. 1 hard spring or better in the United States, that is, according to their grades. That would seem to prove that our No. 3 Manitoba northern had an equal milling value with this No. 1 hard spring Montana wheat that sold at a premium of 32 cents on the Minneapolis market.

I think the United States system of grading wheat is very much superior to ours. Their grades are very clearly defined so that even the farmer is never very much in doubt as to the grade of his wheat. On the other hand, under the Canada Grain Act, it is practically left to the discretion of the inspector as to what grade he shall fix. I am convinced that the policy of our Trade and Commerce department in the past has been to consider that whatever the head inspector said about the wheat was final; there was no appeal from his judgment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is a survey board.

Mr. COOTE: There is, but if the Minister of Agriculture would look up the Canada Grain Act and see how the survey board is appointed, I do not think he would argue that that board has very much reason to change any of the grades the inspector has set.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. gentleman is quite wrong. Some members of the board are appointed by the ministers of agriculture of the provinces.

Mr. COOTE: While we are on that point it might be pertinent to ask why the board of grain appeal was never appointed. Section 102 of the Canada Grain Act provides:

> There shall be a board to be known as the board of grain appeal, to consist of three members who must be expert and experienced in the inspection of grain, to be appointed by the Governor in Council.

I asked the chief inspector in Winnipeg this year who were the members of this board, and if I understood him correctly he said that such a board had never been appointed; so that I believe the chief grain inspector at Winnipeg is the keystone of this whole system, and if his eyesight changes a little bit from one year to another the grading of our wheat is going to change to just that extent.

To come back to the question of a grain survey board, the survey board which we have at Calgary is provided for in subsection 2 of section 104 of the act:

> The said survey board shall consist of eight persons, six to be nominated by the board of trade of the city of Calgary—

I would like to know just why the board of trade of Calgary should nominate six members of the grain survey board. Whose grain are they surveying anyway? The clause goes on:

> —and one each by the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta respectively.

I am quite satisfied that up to this present season, 1924, there have been eight grain men on the survey board of Calgary, and at times I think there have been members of that board who belonged to milling firms in Calgary. Now in the grading of wheat there is always a conflict of interest between the miller on the one hand, and the farmer on the other, and the inspector is going to be influenced or at least pressure is going to be brought to bear upon him from both sides. I would like the committee to remember that the millers are living in the same city with this inspector, and very often working in the same office building with him, while the farmer on the other hand is on the average five hundred miles away from that inspector, and only one out of every five hundred farmers ever gets to the inspector to make a kick. That inspector is likely to be influenced by the millers probably unconsciously and if he is not influenced by the millers he is likely to be influenced by the work of this survey board. If he grades the wheat a little too high and the survey board cut his grades down, on a few cars he will soon grade the wheat just the way the board thinks it should be graded; I do not think there is any question about that.

If suggestions are to be received here to-night regarding the new Canada Grain Act I would say that if similar survey boards are to be appointed under the new act they certainly should not be appointed by the boards of trade of the different cities; but the wheat producers should have the opportunity of recommending for appointment at least a majority of the survey board.

There are many other points in which the present act is faulty and out of date, but I do not wish to go into them all at the present time. I should like, however, to refer before I forget to a few other things I learned on my trip to the United States. I found that in Minneapolis they have a state testing mill, a mill owned by the state for the purpose of testing wheat for its milling and baking qualities. They test wheat and manufacture flour there in commercial quantities. They also issue a report on each year's crop and they preserve all the data. All these statistics are gathered from year to year and preserved, and this work has been of great assistance, to the farmers in the United States. It has been, I think, largely owing to it that the farmers there are getting a premium, as high as 50 cents a bushel in some cases, for wheat shown by test to have a high protein content. In western Canada the mills are picking out the cars of wheat that they know will grade high in protein and gluten content. They are picking out all these cars and letting the rest go through to Fort William. As one hon. member said here to-night they are getting the pick of this wheat, and there is no doubt they have in that way an advantage over every other miller in the world. This was pointed out to me very clearly by an English miller whom I met in Calgary in the summer of 1923 when the Royal Grain Commission was sitting there. He said "These mills have the advantage of us, they can pick out the best wheat and mill it. They buy it on the street market and buy it just as cheaply as we do. Not only that but when the wheat gets to Fort William it is put through mixing houses and the grade that comes out is mostly what can be called "line grade," that is it is down to the very lowest possible line under which it can get into that grade.

I may say that when I was in the office of the grain inspector in Calgary this fall I asked him to test for weight a sample of No. 2 wheat which he had received from Mr. Serls for his guidance in the grading of our wheat. It tested 62 pounds to the bushel. I asked him then to test the average No. 2 wheat that he had in his office. It tested 65 pounds to the bushel. That may give hon. members some idea of the difference between the average grade and the line grade.

Mr. LOW: Did I understand my hon. friend to say that the average No. 2 grade tested 65 pounds to the bushel?

Mr. COOTE: Yes. The minister shakes his head as though he was a little hard to convince.

Mr. LOW: I am not convinced that it went 65 pounds to the bushel.

Mr. COOTE: I have here a letter from Mr. George Hill, the minister's inspector at Calgary. I asked Mr. Hill to send me some samples of each grade of wheat to Ottawa. I have these samples now in my room in this building and I would be glad to exhibit them to the committee. I got them for that purpose. Mr. Hill was good enough to give me the weight per bushel of the different grades that he sent here, having tested these samples before he sent them. No. 1, he says, tests 65 pounds to the bushel; No. 2, 64 pounds; No. 3, 63 pounds; No. 4, 62 pounds; No. 5, 62 pounds; No. 6, 59 pounds. He adds:

> Although the 5 and 6 are badly frozen you will observe they are heavy in weight. Surely there must be some quality where you get so much weight.

I do not like to be always holding up Alberta at too high a level in connection with Manitoba wheat, but I am sure there is a big difference between the wheat that is grown in the western half of the prairies, and what is now grown in the older province of Manitoba.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then why call it Manitoba hard?

Mr. COOTE: That is what I say. Why call Alberta and Saskatchewan wheat Manitoba wheat? The statement was made to me by an official who has been in the service of the inspection department for many years that, "for the last twenty years there has been premium wheat coming out of southern Alberta and you have never got any premium for it." He also said, "If you had had a different grade for your southern Alberta wheat there is no doubt in my mind you would have had premium for it ever since you started to raise it. You have virgin land and that wheat is heavier to the bushel." Surely when wheat weighs 65 pounds to the bushel it should be graded in such a manner that the grower can get some premium—he should get the premium which that heavy wheat really ought to command.

I have taken up quite a lot of the time of the committee, but I should like to continue a few minutes longer, because this is a very important subject to the farmer in Alberta. This year we have had more complaints about the grading of the wheat than I have heard in all my experience. The grading got so bad that we held an indignation meeting of farmers in my own town, and we despatched a wire to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the matter. I am glad to say that the minister took action on receipt of that telegram, or very soon afterwards. He took the matter up with the Board of Grain Commissioners, and they sent one of their members out to Calgary to see what all the trouble was about. The reason for our complaint was that wheat which graded No. 1 last year would only grade No. 2 this year, and wheat that graded No. 2 last year, I mean in 1923, and was held over until 1924 would only grade No. 3. We had several bona fide cases of that nature, and that convinced us there was something radically wrong. Accordingly a small committee went to the office of Mr. Hill in Calgary and examined his grain standards. He had standards there for all grades from No. 1 down to No. 6. We compared those standards with the standards which he had for each grade for 1923, which were still preserved in his office, and in our opinion the standards which he had in 1924 were about a grade higher than they were in 1923. We sent a wire to the minister to that effect as I have already stated. Commissioner Snow came to Calgary and held a meeting. He allowed the farmers to go there and present their complaints, but it seemed very hard to convince him that there was anything wrong. He seemed to have the view that if George Serls and George Hill said that this wheat was No. 1 or No. 2 that settled it. He finally brought Mr. Hill over to the meeting, and we found out then that one of the reasons our wheat was grading so low this year was there were some green kernels in it, and he said the millers objected to these green kernels. That, as near as I can remember, was what transpired.

Mr. PUTNAM: What was the cause of the green kernels; was the wheat harvested too soon?

Mr. COOTE: Some of the wheat was of later growth, and when the wheat was cut it was immature; when it hardened, it was green in colour. When I pressed both Mr. Hill and Mr. Snow to state just how many green kernels there might be in the sample he graded No. 2, they could not or would not say. Then I asked them what percentage of green kernels would be allowed in wheat that was otherwise good to grade No. 3, and they could not tell me. "Well," I said, "would you allow 5 per cent?" and they would not say. I said, "Would you allow 2 per cent?" and I could not get any statement from them in regard to that. We must in the new grain act define the grades specifically, in definite language, so that there can be very little question as to what the grade of the wheat is.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend will have an opportunity of presenting all these facts to the committee on Agriculture when the bill is before that committee, and while I do not wish to interrupt his remarks, he will have to repeat his arguments again before the committee, and perhaps it would be just as well if he could see his way clear to refrain from discussing the grade until the matter is before the committee.

Mr. COOTE: I will very soon refrain, but some of these things must be aired a little bit, or else there will be some sort of an explosion.

Mr. SHAW: Do I understand from the hon. gentleman's remarks that he is suggesting that Mr. George Hill or Mr. Serls are not competent for their particular work?

Mr. COOTE: No I would not even insinuate that they are not. The fault is chiefly in the Grain Act. The act leaves it practically to the judgment of some gentleman in Winnipeg to say what is No. 1 wheat, what is No. 2 wheat and what is No. 3 wheat. According to the Canada Grain Act almost anything could be graded No. 3.

Mr. LOW: If we do not leave it to the chief inspector, to decide the grade of the grain, to whom does the hon. member suggest we should leave it?

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. COOTE: Even under the present act I think it should be left to this grain appeal board, which has never been appointed.

Mr. LOW: Would the hon. member call the appeal board together to examine every sample sent in? The appeal board in that case would require to have somebody examine and grade the cars as they came in.

Mr. COOTE: If we had a grain appeal board, I do not think they would make a standard for one year about a grade higher than it was the year before. Commissioner Snow was very hard to convince. He said that Mr. Hill and Mr. Serls knew more about grading grain than he did, and I guess he was right, but after we had persuaded Mr. Snow to go down to the office of the grain inspector and examine the standards for himself he did admit that in his opinion there was about a grade difference. Why should there be about a grade difference between the standard of No. 2 wheat this year and the standard of No. 2 last year?

An hon. MEMBER: Who did that?

Mr. COOTE: Commissioner Snow admitted it in the office of the grain inspector in Calgary. He could not do anything else, if he would tell the truth and if he had eyes to see. There was no question about it. One of the officials of the Calgary Grain Exchange admitted it. He did not know what it had been graded, but he was asked what difference there was in those samples, and he said there was a grade difference, and I think almost every man who examined those standards had to admit there was a grade difference. What I want to impress upon the committee is that we must define these grades in specific language. There is no question about that.

I wish to refer to another matter, the testing of our wheat for moisture. The way this has been carried on in the past has worked a very great hardship on some of the farmers. I saw a certificate for one car that had been graded No. 3 tough at Edmonton; it went on to Winnipeg and apparently they did not know it had been graded, and it was graded 3 straight there. Hon. members will know what it would have cost that man if he had not got a new grade on that car at Winnipeg. He would have lost the difference between tough and straight wheat which would have been anything from eight to twelve cents a bushel. If the testing apparatus we have in our grain inspection office to-day is not very carefully handled, it may show either too much moisture or too little moisture; it may show more than there is in the grain. If the heat is left on too long you will see a bigger percentage of moisture than actually exists in the grain, because when it gets too hot the grain starts to decompose and that forms moisture. The moisture content for wheat, so far as I understand it, is not fixed in the Canada Grain Act; it is set by Mr. Serls as 14 per cent, and anything more than that is graded tough. But there is lots of grain with 15 and 15½ per cent moisture which is quite safe to store. In a trial shipment of wheat that was sent, I think in the year 1915, from Vancouver through the Panama canal to the Old Country, they tested a great many cars; some of them showed 15½ per cent moisture. Although it was two months on the road it arrived in perfect condition. Why should we leave it to Mr. Serls to arbitrarily set the moisture content at 14 per cent? I believe that when the new grain act is drafted, in the case of every sample of wheat that tests over 14 per cent moisture—if that is to be the content—the percentage should be stamped on the certificate; so that the buyer and seller will know just what moisture is in that wheat. I think it is wrong sometimes to say that a car of grain should be graded tough if it contains 14.2 or 14.3 moisture.

One other point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is the practice that seems to me has just recently been put into effect at Calgary. Sometimes when our wheat is graded at Calgary, if we are dissatisfied with the grade we can ask for a re-inspection at Vancouver. I had one car raised from 3 to 2 grade by having it re-inspected at Vancouver this fall, and that gave me an extra seven cents per bushel. But recently a car of wheat was shipped to Vancouver, graded No. 4 at Calgary, and the commission man in Calgary asked for a survey board to survey the sample. That board confirmed the inspector's judgment and said it was No. 4. Then the owner of the wheat asked for a re-inspection at Vancouver. Mr. Hill said he had instructions from Mr. Serls that after these cars were surveyed they should not be re-inspected at Vancouver. I took the matter up with him myself, and at my request he wired Vancouver asking them to re-inspect this particular car. When it got to Vancouver the elevator agent there put it in a special bin and wired Serls for instructions as to whether he could re-inspect that car on unloading. Serls told him no, they could not, that the survey on the car was final. Now the sample which the survey board judged may not have been a true sample of the car, and just because of the arbitrary action on the part of Mr. Serls the party was deprived of the privilege of having that car re-inspected when unloaded. I think that action on the part of Mr. Serls was altogether unwarranted, and I would ask the minister to see that that practice is stopped. It seems to me there is no reason why that car might not have been re-inspected at Vancouver, and it is possible the party lost a grade on it. If so he lost ten cents a bushel.

I hope the minister will act on this last request of mine. I think he might take it up with the inspector right now, and might provide, when cars are shipped through to Vancouver and re-inspection is asked for, it should be allowed, because the samples drawn very often are not really representative of the wheat which is in that car.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would like to say just a word or two about this survey board. I have a lot of sympathy with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) in his suspicion regarding its personnel. I can recall the time when I was just as filled with suspicion, not only regarding the survey board, but everything else on the Grain Exchange. But when I became more familiar with the methods of appointing the survey board and the difficulty of making appointments from anywhere except Winnipeg where the surveys were to be held, I realized some of the difficulty of getting a board that would secure the entire confidence of everybody. If the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Hopkins) is here, he will recall that in 1906 or a little afterwards, in order to secure, if possible, the confidence of everybody in the personnel of the survey board, Mr. Dorrell of Moose Jaw, was appointed. Other farmers were appointed, including myself, and we got notice of the survey board about a week after the board meeting was over. You see how impossible it is to appoint farmers owing to their living, sometimes, hundreds of miles away from Winnipeg or Calgary. Finally, that method was abandoned. The next move of the department was to authorize the various ministers of agriculture for the three prairie provinces to make recommendations to the government and those recommendations would be honoured and appointments made in that way representing the different provinces. What was I to do? I had to get some person in Winnipeg—and I presume other ministers of agriculture were under the same necessity—in order that they might attend a hurry-up call of the board, as it might be called at fifteen minutes' notice. Consequently, I got in touch with Mr. W. W. Thompson, with whom I am sure all members from the west must be acquainted and who is one of the most honourable men we have in the grain trade, and I asked his advice as to whom I should appoint as being a good straight grain man. I used to believe there were none such, but now I believe there are. After he had made his recommendation, I recommended the appointment and the Department of Trade and Commerce made the appointment. If my hon. friend has any better way of making these appointments, let him produce it instead of continuing in his suspicions. Will the hon. gentleman representing Macleod answer this question? I know he will. Did Mr. Snow or anybody else recommend to the Department of Trade and Commerce that he himself be appointed a member of the grain standard board?

Mr. COOTE: Somebody did.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend for reasons of his own, declined.

Mr. COOTE: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But on the other hand he was given the opportunity, since he could not act himself, to recommend another.

Mr. COOTE: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And that other accepted.

Mr. COOTE: In answer to the hon. minister, if he will allow me to answer right now, I may say that I was offered a position on the grain standard board, but I was advised by two reputable solicitors that I had better not accept that, because acceptance might be considered as accepting an office of emolument under the crown which would interfere with my duties as a member of parliament. For that reason, I reluctantly declined. Personally, I would rather be a member of the grain standard board than a member of this House. I, however, declined for that reason and I suggested to the wheat pool board, that they might recommend some farmer or some person to the Board of Grain Commissioners, to be appointed to the grain standard board, and I believe Mr. King, of Raymond, was appointed on that recommendation. When I was speaking on this subject a few minutes ago, I said that I thought the wheat producer should be allowed to nominate or appoint a majority of the members of the grain survey board. I objected to their being appointed by the board of trade of Calgary. Many men on the board of trade of Calgary do not know good wheat from poor wheat any more than I do, at any rate.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was not criticizing my hon. friend for not accepting the position. That was his privilege. What I wanted to point out was that the government, through Mr. Snow, was doing everything it could to get a representative board. As my hon. friend was taking an active interest in it, it was suggested: Here is a gentleman who is taking an intelligent interest in this question; why not appoint him? That was a logical thing to do and it showed that the desire of the government and Mr. Snow was to have the board properly representative. My hon. friend took the next best step to going on himself by getting a nominee of the wheat pool. I had the pleasure of meeting that gentleman at Winnipeg when the board sat there to set the commercial grades. Not only was he appointed to represent the farmers, but Mr. Maharg was appointed as a representative of the Co-operative Elevators of Saskatchewan, Mr. McRae, representing the wheat pool of Saskatchewan, Mr. Dan. McCuaig, who had been on for Winnipeg for twenty years, Mr. Crerar, who had been on for some number of years and Mr. A. E. Wilson, another prominent gentleman who was head of the grain commission for the three western provinces. All these gentlemen with practical knowledge of the whole question have been on the board either recently or for many years, and that shows the desire of all governments, whether Conservative or Liberal, to try to get representative boards. Evidently, they tried to get a good man in the person of my hon. friend and he must accept some responsibility for declining. If the other gentleman was better than he was, then of course my hon. friend is absolved from any blame in the matter. Some day my hon. friend may have on his shoulders the responsibility of government, and when he is adopting the best methods obtainable among the sons of men, then he will ask the other fellow to produce an alternative that is better. I am asking my hon. friend that, instead of casting suspicion over all our boards and over all those in authority, whether it be on the grain board, standard board or survey board, or any other board: Why can he not show some more excellent way?

The criticism to-night about the protein content was logical enough, but the protein content can be got in about three hours by the sulphuric acid test. That, however, does not mean anything at all as regards the quality of the protein content and is of no indication in a country like ours where wheat may not mature due to frost. Under frost the protein content will become actually higher but will be of less value. There is a great deal of difficulty in connection with this complex question, and I would ask my hon. friend to think of these things.

Mr. KELLNER: When the minister states that the protein content is of little value, whom is he quoting from?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Dr. F. T. Shutt of the experimental farm. I have not his books here, but I have five or six of them in my office.

Mr. COOTE: Just in reply to the minister's little lecture to me for criticizing so much, hon. members present will back me up when I say that I offered no criticism of the personnel of the grain standard board. I did criticize the Canada Grain Act as regards that clause which provides for the appointment of the survey board at Calgary. They are appointed by the board of trade in the city of Calgary, and that is what I was objecting to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member certainly did criticize the survey board pointing out where they are all appointed from around Winnipeg. How could it be otherwise? The survey board has to be called in five minutes, sometimes, and you cannot send to Indian Head, or Regina or Saskatoon.

Mr. COOTE: I am talking of the grain survey board of Calgary, and I thought my remarks indicated that I was referring to that board. I saw the members at work several times, and only three of them out of eight were engaged on the different samples.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): The Minister of Agriculture treats as worthless the test made in Minneapolis, which I gave to the House a short time ago, and which made a difference of 26 cents per bushel to the grain firm on the wheat they tested. Why should such a test be worthless in this country if it was worth 26 cents a bushel to the grain firm in Minneapolis?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have heard so many of these proposals put forward that I want to know more about them before I give an answer to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. MILLAR: Mr. Chairman, the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture is my reason for reading this letter in regard to the time required for a test. I think his information as to time is rather astray.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About three hours.

Mr. MILLAR: This is from the National Testing Laboratories, Limited, Winnipeg, and I believe I am free to use the information:

> In the evidence given before the recent grain inquiry it was stated that the time required to make a test was one hour. Our experience has been that it takes one hour and ten minutes from the time that the sample arrives in the laboratory until the result of the test is telephoned to the customer. This does not, however, mean that every sample takes the same time. With our particular equipment if we receive twenty-four samples at one time, the first four would be reported in the above time and the balance would come off in groups of four in five minute intervals. So that while it would take one hour and ten minutes for one sample, twenty-four could be reported in one hour and thirty-five minutes after being received in the laboratory.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The wheat I referred to was whole wheat. The more it is ground the quicker the result.

Mr. MILLAR: There is nothing here to indicate that it is anything else but the whole wheat that we have been talking about.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They have little mills for grinding it.

Mr. MILLAR: I have similar information from laboratories in the States. This paragraph of the letter deals with the cost:

> Referring again to the grain inquiry, it was stated in evidence that at Kansas city the cost of protein determinations is 45 cents a sample. With the extra cost of chemicals and so forth in western Canada we could not approach this figure with the volume of business that we had during the past grain season, but if our present equipment was at work to the limit of its capacity, that is, working for twenty-four hours in three shifts, we could I have no doubt get down to this figure.

That is, 45 cents per sample.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mass production.

Mr. MILLAR: Yes. With regard to the minister's statement that the protein test is of little value, I think he is also astray there. In the laboratory at Winnipeg now there is, I believe, a baking as well as a protein test. While I have not much information to back this up, what little I have leads me to believe that unless there is frost or some other peculiar feature in the grain the amount of protein is all that is required. In case of frost and perhaps dampness the protein is damaged, and that damage would have to be determined. But the mills in Minneapolis, in Kansas City, Missouri, and in Kansas City, Kansas, are making the protein test on a large scale, and there is not any reason why the same cannot be done for the farmer. In that case he will get the benefit; at present the mills are getting the benefit. I am almost inclined to think this discussion has gone so far that possibly the minister might be ready to do with my resolution what he was kind enough to do with my former resolution dealing with Dr. Saunders—place something in the estimates. Now, if he will agree to accept the principle of my resolution, and provide machinery so that grain can be tested when the farmer desires it, and the test used as a basis for fixing the price, possibly it would not be necessary to proceed with that resolution and time would be saved.

Mr. COOTE: For fear the statement of the Minister of Agriculture may create a wrong impression, the day I was in Minneapolis I called on a gentleman who runs a private laboratory in the basement of the chamber of commerce, and he told me that he had tested 200 samples that morning at a charge of 75 cents apiece. Why would the grain men of Minneapolis have that number of samples tested in a morning if they were not making use of the protein test in selling their wheat on the market?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Were any of the samples damaged by frost?

Mr. COOTE: I could not say.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. COOTE: I remarked to the head official of the grading system in the United States, "I do not suppose you have any frosted wheat?" He replied, "Indeed we have; we have considerable frosted wheat from Dakota and some from Montana. But certainly the protein test in most cases gives some indication of the milling value of that wheat."

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): The Minister of Agriculture has intimated that he doubts the reliability of the tests made in the time we have stated. Perhaps he would be good enough to inform the committee how long he thinks it should take to make a complete test?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It depends whether the grain is in its whole state or partially ground in a little mill. The time will run from one and a half to three hours.

Mr. JELLIFF: Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce been down to the Russell hotel to inspect the dockage determining machine on exhibit there? If he has, will he tell us if he intends adopting it for use in this country as a standard? They have done so on the other side of the line, I understand. There are a great many disputes over dockage, and a great deal of complaint among farmers. I think this machine could be used with very great advantage both to the government and to the farmers.

Mr. LOW: I assure my hon. friend that I am always glad to examine such a machine. Probably I was one of the first members of the House to see it in operation. It seemed to clean up pretty thoroughly the sample of wheat that I saw put through. Whether it would be feasible or not to place the machine in our elevators would have to be determined by experts. I am not in a position to say at the moment that I would care to go as far as my hon. friend suggests and recommend that the machine be placed in all Canadian elevators.

Mr. JELLIFF: Another question. I think the very substantial surplus shown in his department would warrant the minister advising a decrease in the inspection and weighing fees. In the delivery season some 1,500 to 3,000 cars of grain go through Winnipeg daily. My recollection is that the inspection and weighing fee is $2 per car, so that would mean a cost to the farmers of from $3,000 to $5,000 or $6,000 a day for that inspection service. In view of the surplus that is shown in the handling of the grain trade it seems to me that there might be a reduction in this fee, with some advantage to the farmers who raise the grain. Has the minister thought of making any such reduction?

Mr. LOW: I would be very glad to suggest that a reduction be made, but unfortunately in a year when we have a small crop our overhead goes on just the same. We have not the complete figures for the twelve months of this fiscal year, but I venture to say that the surplus will be less than it was for last year on account of the smaller crop. We have to maintain a staff, and any reduction that is made in the staff amounts to very little; the great bulk of the expense is continued. While for the last four or five years we have had a surplus, yet for eight or ten years we had a deficit. I think this year the surplus will be reduced.

Mr. JELLIFF: A good deal has been said here to-night about complaints with regard to the grading of grain during the last season. I have heard a great many complaints of that kind in my portion of the country. The farmers are all complaining that grain that they deemed to be equal to that of 1923 has been graded from one to two grades lower, and it is difficult for them to understand it. I wonder if the minister has seen a little booklet that was issued by the Maple Leaf Milling Company in which they called special attention to the excellence of last year's crop from the milling standpoint. They state in the opening paragraph of that booklet that whereas the old grain of the previous year's crop usually makes the best flour the new grain of last year's crop makes flour of just as good quality as the old wheat. So that if we follow the milling test at all in determining our grades the farmers of western Canada should have got just as good a grade last year as they did in 1923. It seems to me that all the statements that have been made to-night and all these references to investigations along scientific lines must convince us that the basis of our grading should be changed; that we should get our grading on a scientific and practical footing so that the farmer shall get the actual value of his product. I hope that in the drafting of the new grain act a new method of testing will be made effective.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The question raised by the hon. member for Macleod with regard to the grading of tough grain, or the tough grading of grain, perhaps I should say, is one in respect to which the farmers in the north-east part of Saskatchewan have a standing grievance. Every second or third year we have a rainy season and our grain is more or less damp. The farmer does not complain of the grading as tough of grain that actually is tough, but the elevator companies have a habit of grading everything tough in that particular district. I have been told frankly by travellers for the elevator companies on more than one occasion that they have instructed all buyers to buy everything as tough regardless of what the grain may be in that particular district. In some cases grain which is carried over from the year before, and which is perfectly dry, is graded as tough, though the buyers themselves admit quite frankly that it was not tough. That condition of affairs has been going on there for many years. I do not know just where the responsibility of the department would come in, but the matter should be dealt with in some way. The fall of 1921 was a very wet one, and practically everything in the way of oats and most of the wheat grown in the part of Saskatchewan in which I live was graded tough. Some of the oats, in fact, sold as low as 12 cents a bushel. The farmers lost hundreds of thousands of dollars that year that I consider we had no right to lose. I remember one case of a farmer showing me some oats that had been grown the year before and that was graded tough. I sent a sample down to the grader at Winnipeg and it was graded straight there, but in discussing the matter with the elevator man I was told that he had been instructed to buy everything tough in that particular district. I came down here in the early winter of 1922 and I had an opportunity of discussing this with the Board of Grain Commissioners. They told me they had Dr. Birchard conduct a series of tests, and I have here a copy of at least part of Dr. Birchard's report, dated February 1922. It says:

> The data acquired at Winnipeg, Fort William and Montreal, lead to the conclusion that the moisture limit for oats is somewhere between 14.0 per cent as a minimum and 14.5 per cent as a maximum. That is to say, the evidence appears sufficient to indicate that oats carrying 14.5 per cent moisture may heat or otherwise go out of condition under extreme conditions, but that they will safely carry under the same conditions 14.0 per cent of moisture. No evidence of heating was obtained in any car where the original moisture was 14.0 per cent or under.

My grievance is that this report of Dr. Birchard was never put into effect, so far as I have been able to find out, by the graders. In fact, I understand they have been grading as tough anything up to 13 per cent in oats and about 14 per cent in wheat. I believe that the examinations would show no wheat spoiling at less than 15 or 15.5 per cent of moisture. During the last year or two we have had comparatively dry seasons and the farmers have not had such a grievance in that regard, but any fall may be unusually wet, in which event this thing will recur and hundreds of thousands of dollars will be lost to the farmers. I think something should be done about it.

Now, the point that has been raised this evening with regard to the milling value of wheat is an old one. It has been discussed in the prairies since 1907 or 1908, I believe, when tests were made which indicated that very often No. 3 wheat would show a higher milling value than No. 1 or No. 2. In these cases the farmer lost a great deal of money. In the fall of 1911 I took two samples of my own wheat to a local miller to have them thoroughly tested. Some of my wheat was threshed before there was any rain and it was perfectly dry, not bleached in any way. It graded No. 2. Some of the wheat that was threshed after the rain and was slightly bleached was graded No. 3. I am not sure what the spread was in the price, but I believe it was 7 or 8 cents. I took samples of both these grades of wheat to a local miller and had them both ground into flour. The miller told me that there was not a particle of difference either in the quality or in the quantity of the flour obtained from these samples. It was perfectly plain that both made exactly the same quality and quantity of flour. It simply meant that the miller who eventually bought it—

Mr. LOW: What were the grades?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The wheat that was threshed before it got wet and was not bleached graded No. 2; the other, slightly bleached and slightly off colour, graded No. 3. But there was not one particle of difference in the milling qualities of these grades.

Mr. LOW: While the quality of both grades might be the same so far as the flour is concerned, yet No. 3 would not yield as great a quantity of flour as No. 2. That is usually the case.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That is what we have always been told, but this miller proved it was not so. He ground them into flour and could hardly tell which was the original shipment. There was not a particle of difference as to quantity or quality. Now we have hundreds of thousands of bushels of that kind of wheat in our part of the country, and it means the farmer loses a great deal of money. Somebody must make it. I do not say the miller always does; probably he pays a premium on that to the grain dealer. I know there are certain difficulties in the way of enforcing grading by milling value, but it seems to me something ought to be done in the way of looking further into it. It was considered quite feasible a good many years ago when the tests were first made, but for some reason or other nothing particular was done about it. This year there have been a good many complaints. We have heard a good many complaints in this House this evening, about the grading of grain. The farmers throughout the prairies seem to have the suspicion that the grading this year had some connection with the wheat pool; in other words, they seemed to have the opinion that there was a determined effort made on the part of the grain companies to put the pool in a false position. I was told very frequently by grain men that when they were expecting wheat to be shipped to the pool they had no margin; they were paid handling charges only and had no profit, so in order to play safe they graded what they call very close. That means very often that the farmer loses a grade. That is the explanation from the grain man's standpoint. But apparently the chief grader was grading very close too. I do not want to imply that there was any collusion between the grain companies and the grading officials, but that is the suspicion, and the results later on in the season seem to have convinced the farmers that there was some ground for it. If there is anything in that, it is a very serious thing, and it would be well for the government to look into it.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. GOULD: We are going to have a new Grain Act, and have it built up in the manner we want. We are going to provide penalties in the act for infringement of its provisions. Possibly some of the evidence that is submitted showing infringements, even if it is submitted by hon. gentlemen here, will cause the penalty to be applied. I would like to see Dr. Birchard brought down here to give evidence before the committee to which the minister said the Canada Grain Act would be submitted.

Another citation that I want to make at this time came under my personal notice, and I am prepared to take my affidavit upon this if necessary. It is the protest of a man who was selling street wheat to an elevator last fall, and at last in despair he stopped going to that elevator and took his grain to another one, where he received a higher grade and 8 cents per bushel more. He had to take a special bin at this first elevator that he went to, and for the first load he took in for his special bin he was allowed 47 bushels; the second load 43 bushels, and the third 37 bushels. They thought then that the special bin was practically assured, but the man took his grain to another elevator and got street price for a load, which meant 8 cents a bushel more. He took another load in; this was at 47 bushels; and the grain had some wild oats in it. He took in a third load and got the same weight and his 8 cents a bushel better. He was asked by the first elevator man if he was not going to use the special bin, and he replied no he did not think he was. The elevator man wanted to know why, so the shipper took the tickets out of his pocket and said as he showed them, "Here is a good reason why." He asked for cash tickets. Cash tickets were made out, and the owner of the tickets said, "Surely you can do as good as this bill, can't you?" and he did. He made the cash tickets out. The shipper then asked why he did not do that in the first place and the elevator man replied, "My positive instructions are that I must grade one grade lower than I know I can get for that wheat in Winnipeg." He was then asked how he got by the Canada Grain Act. I say, Mr. Chairman, that if the farmers had been receiving even justice under the act protests would not have been made in the numbers they are being made to-day; but these grain men think they are a law unto themselves, and I wonder who the individual was who would instruct an elevator operator out in the country that he should and must buy his grain one grade less than he knows he can receive for it in Winnipeg. That is street wheat I am referring to. The grain report shows that about fifty per cent of our wheat is sold as street wheat. Consequently when such practices are taking place, you see the terrible leverage the grain interests can exercise on the farmer, when fifty per cent of our total crop is street wheat. That is only one case. I could cite similar cases by the hour if necessary.

Mr. LOW: I suppose my hon. friend knows that that matter has been very fully dealt with by the Royal Grain Commission. The evidence taken before that commission will all be available to the agricultural committee when the bill is submitted to them.

Mr. COOTE: There is one question I would like to ask the minister, and that is as to the grades on wheat that are shipped out of Canada. I put a question on the order paper last week asking the number of bushels shipped to the United States last year and what grades. The answer I think was to the effect that the department had no record of the different grades shipped out. I would like to know if it is a fact that the department keeps no record of the number of bushels of each grade shipped out. It seems to me we should have that information. It is rather unfortunate otherwise, particularly in view of this suggested export tax on wheat.

Mr. LOW: That question was not answered by my department, but by the Customs department. I do not think they keep a record of the different grades shipped out.

Mr. COOTE: Does the Department of Trade and Commerce keep such a record? Could we get the information officially if we asked for it?

Mr. LOW: No, you would have to apply to the Customs department.

Mr. COOTE: Are we to understand that the minister's department has no record of the numbers of bushels of Nos. 1, 2 and 3 grades that are shipped out of Canada from the elevators at Montreal and Fort William?

Mr. LOW: We have no record of the exports of the different grades to the United States.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Since the minister dismissed these chemists and laboratory assistants, has any research work been carried on by the government?

Mr. LOW: Dr. Birchard is still in the office, and he is no doubt doing some work for the inspection department in Winnipeg.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): To settle the matter beyond doubt, is any research work actually being carried on by Dr. Birchard? I would take it from what the minister said that he was the least desirable of the crowd, yet he is kept on and the other fellows are dismissed. Is any research work being done by Dr. Birchard, and is the only research work being done by the government being done by him?

Mr. LOW: The only research work that is being carried on at the present time under this department is by Dr. Birchard. He is still in the office at Winnipeg and there is no question but that he is carrying on some work, but to what extent I am not prepared to-night to say.

Mr. GOULD: The minister omitted to answer my question as to whether Dr. Birchard would be called to give evidence before the committee to which the Canada Grain Act will be submitted.

Mr. LOW: That will be a matter for the committee on Agriculture to decide. Dr. Birchard gave evidence before the Royal Grain Commission very fully. That evidence will be in the possession of the committee and if, after scrutinizing it, they should decide that it is necessary to call Dr. Birchard before them it will be their privilege to do so.

Mr. GOULD: I would point out to the minister that owing to incorporation of the testimony given before the Royal Grain Commission in the sessional papers only it is very difficult for all those members who are interested to obtain access to Dr. Birchard's evidence. The report was quite a voluminous one and there is only one copy of it although some thirty or forty members are very intensely interested in this evidence. I submit that every hon. member who wishes should have a fair opportunity of acquainting himself with the testimony given before the commission. When that evidence was laid upon the table—although the inquiry had cost this country a lot of money,—I might have moved that it be printed, because it might not have involved a much greater expenditure, but in my generosity I did not ask that that be done. However I believe there should be some arrangement whereby Dr. Birchard's evidence could be made more available to the members of the committee. I have a copy of the official report in my office at the present time, and I wish to retain it as long as I can. Of course those members may see it who wish to do so, but if there were more copies available it would be much better for all concerned.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The minister seems to doubt my statement regarding the milling qualities of the two different grades of grain that I mentioned. That being the case I should like to quote some of the figures in connection with the tests carried out by the Department of Agriculture of the territorial government in 1924. In that year the territorial Department of Agriculture made arrangements with Professor Harcourt, a chemist in the Ontario Agricultural College, to conduct experiments along this line in order to find out the comparative milling values of the various grades of wheat. Eight one-bushel sacks were sent to the inspection office at Winnipeg where they were graded all the way from No. 1 hard to feed, from the highest to the lowest grade. They were sent to Professor Harcourt under numbers so that he could have no means of finding out how the samples were graded by the inspection department. His report was that there was very little difference in the milling and baking values of any of them. I will just quote what he says in that regard:

> The conclusion reached was that there did not appear to be much difference in the value of the different grades of wheat. Even the feed sample proved by no means useless for bread-making purposes, either in yield or quality; the only thing that rendered it less available for bakers' use was its darker colour. All who saw the loaves were surprised at the quality of this bread.

I may say that I myself ate some bread made from what was considered to be a very low grade of wheat—wheat that was badly frozen and which, up to that time, I had always considered utterly unfit for flour. I always wondered where all this feed wheat went, but after having tasted it I formed a pretty good idea because it yields very excellent flour. Now the results of the Harcourt tests were so astonishing that the territorial government made an extra test, which demonstrated conclusively that the first test was correct, and that there was no very real difference in the quality of the flour as between the No. 1 and the other grades. I think that is a very important thing. I should like to impress upon the minister that the department should look carefully into the matter and see if it is not possible to work a statement of that kind into the new grain act.

Mr. LOW: I do not doubt at all the statements of my hon. friend, but an experience of about twenty-five years rather convinces me that you do not get the same yield out of No. 3 that you do out of No. 1. In the case of No. 3 you get a greater quantity of the by-products. The quality, perhaps, of flour from No. 3 might be just as good as that from No. 1, but you would not get the same yield of flour, consequently No. 3 would not be worth as much as No. 1. Speaking from a milling standpoint it has been our experience that it is more profitable to buy the higher grades—we get a greater yield and we have less by-products. We find that when you get down below No. 3 a greater quantity is needed to make a barrel of flour although the cost of manufacturing the flour is just as great in the case of the lower grade as it is in that of the higher.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Perhaps the minister's experience is not quite the same as it would be if he were buying direct from the market. I am inclined to think that some of these grades are doctored a little before they reach the millers. Now the tests carried on by Professor Harcourt in 1904 showed that in the case of No. 1 hard the amount of flour obtained was 70.8 per cent, as against 68 per cent from the No. 4 grade. This difference is certainly not sufficient to account for the difference in price between No. 1 hard and No. 4.

Mr. COOTE: I should just like to explain, in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) as to whether any experiments were now being carried on by the laboratory, that Dr. Birchard was kind enough to make baking tests from the different grades of wheat and to send them to the farmers' convention at Calgary this year to demonstrate to the farmers exactly the kind of bread that could be produced from these different grades. I should like now to express publicly our appreciation of Dr. Birchard's kindness in making those tests. Of course we wired the department at Ottawa first and asked that permission be given Dr. Birchard to carry out these tests. The department wired Dr. Birchard the necessary authority but in its telegram to me stated that it would assume no responsibility for any misapprehensions that might be caused by the use of the different breads. The bread that was exhibited was from Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. The bread made from No. 5 looked to me to be good enough for anybody to eat, and to the ordinary layman it was hard to detect any difference in the quality of bread made from No. 4 wheat and that made from No. 1. Some bakers were called in to examine the bread and they pronounced it to be first class. Their opinion was that it would be impossible for anybody to tell any difference whatever between the bread made from No. 4, and that made from either Nos. 1, 2 or 3. So I think that as a rule any one of our Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 grades, if secured as they come through the hands of the inspector and before they go through the terminal elevator, will make the very best bread.

Mr. LOW: Speaking again from experience I find that a blend of Nos. 1, 2 and 3 very often makes a better loaf of bread than straight No. 1. I should just say to the members here to-night that there has never been a complaint brought to my notice to which I have not given my personal attention at once. I think every member of the House will admit that whenever they have written to me they have found me willing to take up their complaints.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to ask the minister if the Canada Grain Act does not require a return to be made of the grades that are taken in as well as those that are shipped out of the terminal elevators?

Mr. LOW: Yes. The act requires that a record be kept of the grades going into those elevators, but not in the case of grain exported to the United States. When it is shipped to the United States no record is kept of the grade.

Mr. MILLAR: No record is kept of the grain going in and out of the private mixing elevator is there?

Mr. LOW: Yes, the record is kept by the inspector at the elevator.

Mr. MILLAR: In the figures submitted last year or two years ago it was claimed later on before the Grain Inquiry Commission that there had been no cut off as between years, and therefore the figures were of very little value. Did they ever make a cut off and have a weigh up in the private mixing elevator?

Mr. LOW: A weigh up at all the terminal elevators. Is the hon. gentleman speaking of private elevators?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes.

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister said a few moments ago that every single complaint had his personal attention. I have in my hand a letter sent to the minister by a man at Clairmont, Alberta, by the name of Gudlangson, who I understand sent samples of his grain to the minister with the request that they be tested. I will not take time to read the letter as it is lengthy, but I would like to find out if a reply was sent to him because he claims no attention was paid to it.

I would like to say a few words also in regard to the situation of the grain laboratory at Winnipeg. The whole thing seems to have rather a nasty taste. I do not like the look of it at all. We have heard that one of our experienced chemists was left all alone; his staff instead of being retired, you might say, to use a better term, had been fired. The chemist was the only man left in a very large laboratory, and cannot possibly attend to his business properly. The minister claims he is very sympathetic with the interests of the grain growers. His expressions are all right, but his actions seem to prove otherwise. Statements have been made that this Dr. Birchard, who seems to be looked upon as a very able man by those who know him, has not been sending in his reports regularly. Do the reports come from Dr. Birchard direct to the department, or is there any body of men or any official who has to pass upon these reports before they reach the department. Is there any possibility they have been suppressed, if not in whole at least in part? I was very much interested in the information given by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I noticed that he has obtained a large amount of valuable information by going through the States on his way to Ottawa. What surprises me is that the government through its Department of Trade and Commerce has not got this information before, or if it has, why it has not acted on it. It has always seemed to me strange that the Minister of Agriculture should be entrusted with the oversight of the entire interests of the farmers in regard to everything except the largest and most important product they produce; but the welfare of that product is turned over to another department, namely Trade and Commerce; not that I think the Department of Agriculture would look after it any better than the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I think a great deal of useful work could be done in both departments in regard to agriculture. I would like the minister to answer the question in regard to whether any official or officials stand between Dr. Birchard's report and the department.

Mr. LOW: No, there is no official standing between the department and the chief chemist. I think I stated very clearly our experience with Dr. Birchard. As a matter of fact, before I took over the department he had sent in a partial report which had been set up in type and remained down in the Printing Bureau for about fifteen months. The department at the time asked Dr. Birchard to complete his report, and he did not do so. The type was finally set aside, and the report was never printed, and never completed.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask the hon. minister at whose instigation the staff of Dr. Birchard was fired or let out?

Mr. LOW: Dr. Birchard is still in the laboratory at Winnipeg.

Mr. SPENCER: I was referring to the staff of Dr. Birchard.

Mr. LOW: We decided to reorganize the laboratory and we are waiting, or have been waiting, for the report of the Royal Grain Commission. I am sure that when the staff is reorganized hon. members opposite will find that it will be more efficient than it has been.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister tell me how many grain laboratories there are?

Mr. LOW: One.

Mr. CLARK: What provision is made for the testing of grain loaded for the western route?

Mr. LOW: The only place is Winnipeg.

Mr. CLARK: How can grain that goes by the western route be tested at all?

Mr. LOW: Tests can be made at Winnipeg. Samples are sent to Winnipeg to be tested.

Mr. CLARK: What proportion of the vote is being set aside for the purpose of extending the grain testing at Winnipeg or other places?

Mr. LOW: There is no special amount set aside. The vote is $1,100,000, and the cost of the laboratory at Winnipeg is included in that amount.

Mr. CLARK: Can the minister give the details of the vote, what it is for?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is all on Hansard.

Mr. LOW: I will be glad to give the hon. member the information. The item is made up of the expenses of the board, secretary and staff.

Salaries, wages and expenses	$ 84,640
Inspection department, salaries and wage expenses	684,367
Weighing department, salaries, wages and expenses	336,267
Registration department, salaries, wages and expenses	19,039
Survey and standard board	3,650
Grain research laboratory, salaries, wages, not including the chief chemist	14,300
Eastern division, salaries, wages and expenses	24,202
Making a total of	$1,166,465

That is the estimate of the Canada grain board.

Mr. CLARK: Under which department does the grain laboratory at Winnipeg come?

Mr. LOW: I have just stated, the grain research laboratory. The salaries, wages and expenses, with the exception of Dr. Birchard's salary, amount to $14,300.

Mr. CLARK: That is just the point. What provision is there then for this extension which the minister has been discussing so much to-night. I understood him to say that he thoroughly agreed with the representations made by hon. members to my left that the work of the grain laboratory at Winnipeg should be extended. What provision is made in these estimates for extension of the work of this laboratory, if only $14,000 is in the estimates for this purpose?

Mr. LOW: It has not been costing the government that much, but that is the estimate made by the Canada grain board for this year.

Mr. CLARK: That is for 1925-26.

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Is that right?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Can the work of this laboratory be extended under the provisions of this vote?

Mr. LOW: If, after we are through with the Canada Grain Act, it is found necessary to extend it so that more money will be required, a sufficient amount will be brought down in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. CLARK: My point is this: The Minister has already stated in most explicit terms, that there is necessity for the extension of this work. He apparently knew that before these estimates were prepared. Why then was it not included in the present estimates?

Mr. ROBB: The Treasury board insisted upon all ministers getting their estimates down to a minimum of their requirements, and we told them that a little later on, if they needed more, we would help them out.

Mr. CLARK: Is it the opinion of the Acting Minister of Finance that the work of this laboratory should not be extended?

Mr. ROBB: Not at all.

Mr. CLARK: Then, if the Acting Minister of Finance thinks it should be extended, how is it proposed to extend it under the provisions of this vote?

Mr. ROBB: The minister will work that out, and he has already told the committee that if he has not sufficient, he will come before parliament again and ask for a larger vote. I would like my hon. friend to help us a little in trying to effect economy.

Mr. BROWN: The fact is that the $14,000 vote for this particular work is larger than the amount spent last year.

Mr. LOW: That is it.

Mr. BROWN: That is the point.

Mr. LOW: That is the point I have been trying to explain to my hon. friend.

Mr. CLARK: What was allotted to grain research work last year?

Mr LOW: I am sorry I have not the figures here.

Mr. CLARK: That is vital. I cannot see how it could have been very much less. As regards effecting economy, I can assure the minister that he has no more ardent supporter in that respect than myself. But if this is a vital work and it appears to me to be so from the unanimous expressions of opinion from this side of the House, I do not think the sum of $14,000 is going to effect very much extension of this service.

Mr. LOW: Then, I may ask my hon. friend to support me when I bring down my supplementary estimates with an increase.

Mr. CLARK: We shall have to see the minister's plan first.

Mr. WARNER: Is it the minister's opinion that the laboratory at Winnipeg will serve for the western shipper? Does he know that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction at Edmonton on account of the present grading? Different people have sent the same quality of grain east and west, and they never get as good a grade on their grain at Edmonton as they do at Winnipeg. That causes a good deal of dissatisfaction as well in regard to the western shipments and most of the growers want to ship west.

Mr. LOW: I caused an inquiry to be made about that very complaint, and the assurance that I have from the grain board and the chief inspector is that there is no difference in the grading.

Mr. WARNER: The people at Edmonton certainly feel that there is when they have sent the same kind of grain, grain out of the same bin and out of the same lot, to both Winnipeg and Edmonton, and they have found that they got one lower grade at Edmonton than they did at Winnipeg.

Mr. LOW: I have a great deal of sympathy with my hon. friend because I sometimes have the same feeling when a carload of wheat arrives at our mill. We sometimes feel that there has been a mistake in the grading and that it should have graded a lower grade rather than a higher. These things are bound to happen. I made it my business to have the matter investigated with the result that the chief inspector and the Canada grain board assure me that there is no difference in the inspection

Mr. WARNER: I do not understand how it can be possible to take samples out of the same lot even and then get one better grade at Winnipeg than at Edmonton. There must be a difference somewhere, whether they say there is or not.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Are there the same facilities in the way of reinspection for grain going through Calgary to the west coast as in the case of grain going through Winnipeg to Fort William?

Mr. LOW: Exactly the same.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What establishment is provided at Vancouver under this item? As I understand it, the department has at Vancouver inspectors and various other officials and employees who come under this item.

Mr. LOW: We have an inspection and a weighing staff at Vancouver, if that is what the hon. member wishes to know.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes, the details of that and what amount is provided to cover the expenses of the establishment at Vancouver.

Mr. LOW: I have a full list of the Vancouver staff with the salaries. If my hon. friend wishes, I will read them out to him.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I would like to have that information.

Mr. LOW: They are as follows:

Mackenrot, W. H., Weighman..	$ 2,200
Carruthers H., Weighman..	1,950
Simpson, Wm., Weighman..	1,830
McGeachie, Don., Weighman..	1,800
Bottoms, R., Weighman..	1,740
Gardiner, M. R., Weighman..	1,740
Brown, Geo., Weighman..	1,740
Gowe, C. H., Weighman..	1,740
Rumble, Thos., Weighman..	1,740
Anderson, E., Weighman..	1,740
Matheson, C. E., Trackman..	1,260
Reese, R. E., Trackman..	1,260
Riddell, J. H., Trackman..	1,230
Mills, A., Trackman..	1,230
One weighmaster—name not given..	2,430
Four other spare men..	5,760
Total..	$31,110

Mr. McQUARRIE: How does that compare with the previous year?

Mr. LOW: Of course the previous year would be much less. On account of the increasing flow of grain to Vancouver during the past twelve months we have added very materially to the staff.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is the information I want. What additional facilities are being provided to carry on inspection expeditiously at Vancouver?

Mr. LOW: The staff is sufficient at the moment to meet the requirements. When found necessary it will be added to.

Mr. CLARK: Is that the total staff allotted to take care of administration work at Vancouver?

Mr. LOW: That is the full staff. I might give it in more detail:

One grain inspector; two deputy grain inspectors; eleven weighmen; four trackmen; one deputy registrar, and two grain clerks.

As my hon. friend knows, with the increasing elevator capacity at Vancouver we are constantly adding to the staff.

Mr. CLARK: But over $1,000,000 is for the purpose of administration. Is this $31,110 the total sum required for administration at the port of Vancouver?

Mr. LOW: Yes, for the weighing staff.

Mr. CLARK: That is the total under this vote required for administration at Vancouver?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister obtain for me the cost of grain research work for the previous year?

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. LOW: My deputy informs me that for the past ten months the cost has been $4,800.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is the government's programme for grain testing laboratories limited to one at Winnipeg, or does it include similar facilities for the port of Vancouver?

Mr. LOW: We are not committed to any programme. We are waiting to see how the agricultural committee will regard the new grain bill. If the committee thinks that the grain testing laboratories should be increased, it will be for the committee to so recommend to the government.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The government, then, has no programme at all.

Mr. LOW: Yes, we have.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is what I am asking.

Mr. LOW: We intend to continue the laboratory at Winnipeg, but we have not considered the desirability of establishing another in Vancouver, unless it can be shown to us that it is necessary.

Mr. GARDINER: Is any provision made for re-inspection at the interior terminals?

Mr. LOW: No, there is not.

Mr. GARDINER: Is there any possibility of getting such provision made?

Mr. LOW: It will be the privilege of my hon. friend to make any recommendations to the committee that he may see fit when the matter is under discussion.

Mr. GARDINER: I was wondering whether the minister had taken this matter into consideration in view of the report that has been placed before the House, and whether he proposes in the new Canada Grain Act to make any provision for re-inspection at those points.

Mr. LOW: No, we had not thought of making provision for such re-inspection.

Mr. GOULD: I presume that the new Canada Grain Act is being drafted at the present time?

Mr. LOW: That is correct.

Mr. GOULD: Undoubtedly there will be a lot of work for the committee to whom the draft act will be referred, and I think it would save time if the minister would pass on to the draftsman for incorporation in the bill the recommendations for the improvement of the act that have been made here to-night. In answer to the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) the minister said he would ask for the members' endorsation of additional expenditure when he brought down the supplementary estimates. Apparently the minister takes it for granted that he is spending the government's money, but I contend it is money taken from the grain trade, and I do not think there is any thanks due to the government for its promised generosity.

Mr. LOW: But my hon. friend must bear in mind that the capital expenditure is borne by all the people; therefore they have something to say in the matter.

Mr. BROWN: That is as regards the public elevators.

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. BROWN: But all the rest of the expense is charged against the trade?

Mr. LOW: That is right.

Mr. GOULD: During the years these elevators have been in operation they have shown some profit?

Mr. LOW: Only for the last four or five years.

Mr. GOULD: Well, we have had the government terminal elevators for about ten years, and in view of the increased volume of grain to-day it would be interesting if the minister would submit figures to the committee to show whether there is a credit or a deficit.

Mr. LOW: That will be disclosed when the item is under discussion. Elevators do not come under this head.

Mr. GOULD: True.

Mr. TOLMIE: As one or two of our members are unavoidably absent, would the minister extend to them on the next vote the privilege of referring back to this item which we are passing to-night?

Mr. LOW: Yes, if they wish to say anything on it.

Item agreed to.

Mr. LOW: The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) wished me to again refer to item 355.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Since the adjournment, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend (Mr. Low) has relented; he has actually given some information, and it is the information required. I will just read it so it will be on record. It is as follows:

Bounties Paid on Crude Petroleum

1922-23

Provinces	Barrels.	Claims.	Claimants.	Amount paid.
Alberta	379	9	1	$ 199 12
New Brunswick	4,513	6	1	2,369 50
Ontario	165,059	871	183	76,229 95
	169,951	886	185	$78,798 57
1923-24
Alberta	58	2	1	$ 30 35
New Brunswick	6,945	8	1	3,648 24
Ontario	145,200	636	174	76,130 95
	152,203	646	176	$79,809 54

One other point on which I wanted to get information was as to the number of wells, but I understand my hon. friend cannot get that without a good deal of inconvenience, so I shall not bother him about it. I understand that the number of wells is practically the same; that is fairly common ground. I would also suggest that my hon. friend bring down the report of Dr. Hanna and—perhaps of greater importance in view of the position of the industry at present and of the fact that this is perhaps the last opportunity for looking into something which will shortly disappear unless attention is given to it—the report of the other government emissary who was sent to look over the ground. If these reports are brought down I shall be quite content.

Mr. JELLIFF: I understand that the list which has just been read refers not to the total production of oil in Alberta but simply to the portion upon which bounty was payable. Of course, we produce much more than that, but on account of the conditions as to specific gravity our actual oil production is not fully indicated in these figures. I think we should have a bounty on all we produce and that that condition should not obtain in our case.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You think it should be limited, though, to the small well only?

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend is right.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.19 p.m.

Monday, March 2, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Detailed statement of retirements authorized by orders in council passed from January 1 to November 1, 1924; also summary by departments of all retirements effected under the Public Service Retirement Act.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HOLDERS OF RANK OF DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. DOUCET:

What are the names and salaries of all those who though not deputy ministers hold the same rank?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

Public Archives, Dr. A. G. Doughty, $8,000; Auditor General, Mr. Geo. Gonthier, $15,000; Civil Service Commission, Hon. W. J. Roche, $7,000; Col. M. G. LaRochelle, $6,000; Mr. Clarence Jameson, $6,000; Governor General's Secretary, Mr. A. F. Sladen, $6,000; Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Mr. A. A. McLean, $6,000; Patent and Copyright Office, Mr. Geo. F. O'Halloran, $8,000; Registrar of the Supreme Court, Mr. E. R. Cameron, $6,000; Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Oliver M. Biggar, $12,000; Librarians of Parliament, Mr. J. de L. Tache, $6,000; Hon. Martin Burrell, $6,000; Clerk of Senate, Mr. A. E. Blount, $6,000; Clerk of the House of Commons, Mr. A. Beauchesne, $6,000.

WESTERN NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. CLARK:

1. Has an agreement been arrived at between the Dominion government and the province of Manitoba for the transfer by the former to the latter of certain natural resources within the boundaries of Manitoba, belonging to the Dominion of Canada?

2. Have the people of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island an interest in the natural resources referred to in paragraph one hereof, and, if so, what is the interest of each province herein?

3. Have the provinces of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island been consulted as to the terms upon which said natural resources will be transferred?

4. Has the approval been received from any of the last mentioned provinces to the terms upon which a transfer shall be made, and if so, by whom has such approval been given?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. So long as subsidies continue to be paid to the province of Manitoba, in lieu of the transfer to that province of its natural resources, it is obvious that the people of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have an interest therein.

Whether such interest would continue after the transfer of the resources in lieu of subsidy payments, and the discontinuance of such subsidy payments, is a matter which has not been made the subject of judicial determination.

In the event of a transfer of the natural resources being made on the above terms, if any province should feel that it has a claim arising therefrom that claim would have to be considered on its merits and should not be an obstacle to the settlement as to control of natural resources between the Dominion government and the government of the province of Manitoba.

3. Answered by the answers to Nos. 1 and 2.

4. Answered by the answers to Nos. 1 and 2.

Mr. CLARK:

1. Has an agreement been arrived at between the Dominion government and the province of Saskatchewan for the transfer by the former to the latter of certain natural resources within the boundaries of Saskatchewan, belonging to the Dominion of Canada?

2. Have the people of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island an interest in the natural resources referred to in paragraph one hereof, and, if so, what is the interest of each province herein?

3. Have the provinces of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island been consulted as to the terms upon which said natural resources will be transferred?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. So long as subsidies continue to be paid to the province of Saskatchewan, in lieu of the transfer to that province of its natural resources, it is obvious that the people of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have an interest therein.

Whether such interest would continue after the transfer of the resources in lieu of subsidy payments, and the discontinuance of such subsidy payments, is a matter which has not been made the subject of judicial determination.

In the event of a transfer of the natural resources being made on the above terms, if any province should feel that it had a claim arising therefrom, that claim would have to be considered on its merits and should not be an obstacle to the settlement as to control of natural resources between the Dominion government and the government of the province of Saskatchewan.

3. Answered by the answers to Nos. 1 and 2.

4. Answered by the answers to Nos. 1 and 2.

Mr. CLARK:

1. Has an agreement been arrived at between the Dominion government and the province of Alberta for the transfer by the former to the latter of certain natural resources within the boundaries of Alberta, belonging to the Dominion of Canada?

2. Have the people of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island an interest in the natural resources referred to in paragraph one hereof, and, if so, what is the interest of each province therein?

3. Have the provinces of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island been consulted as to the terms upon which said natural resources will be transferred?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The basis of an agreement respecting the transfer to the province of Alberta of its natural resources has been arrived at; the terms of the agreement are being negotiated. When finally determined, the agreement will be submitted for approval to the Parliament of Canada and the legislature of the province of Alberta.

2. So long as subsidies continue to be paid to the province of Alberta, in lieu of the transfer to that province of its natural resources, it is obvious that the people of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have an interest therein.

Whether such interest would continue after the transfer of the resources in lieu of subsidy payments, is a matter which has not been made the subject of judicial determination.

HALIFAX ELEVATOR

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Who prepared plans for the Halifax elevator, and what was the engineer's estimate of cost?
2. Were tenders called for the erection of said elevator, and, if so, in what manner?
3. How many firms tendered, and what are the names of such firms or individuals?
4. What was the amount of the lowest tender?
5. At what figure was the contract awarded, and to whom?
6. What is the total cost to date, based on engineer's approved certificates?
7. How much has actually been paid to said contractor?
8. Has contract been completed? If not, what still remains unfinished?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

1. John S. Metcalf Co., Ltd., Montreal. The engineer's estimate of cost was $620,000.

2. Yes, by advertisement in the public press.

3. Six: E. G. M. Cape & Co., Montreal, Atlas Construction Co., Ltd., Montreal, Barnett McQueen Construction Co., Ltd., Fort William, Ont., The Anglin Norcross, Ltd., Montreal, Macdonald Engineering Co. of Canada, Ltd., Toronto, Keefe Construction Co,. Halifax, N.S.

4. $599,800.

5. E. G. M. Cape and Company, Montreal, $599,800.

6. The only payment made to date, on account of this elevator, is $196.30, for advertising.

7. Nothing.

8. The contract has only recently been let, and no progress estimates have been received from the engineers yet.

"CANADIAN OPPORTUNITIES"

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. Does any department of the federal government contribute to the support of the magazine known as "Canadian Opportunities," published in Toronto?
2. Does the Canadian National Railways make any financial contribution to this publication?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. The Department of Immigration and Colonization has a six months' contract for 1,000 copies per month of "Canadian Opportunities". These are distributed among the agencies of the department in the United Kingdom, Ireland, the United States, and the offices on the continent of Europe. The contract expires in March.

2. The Canadian National Railways make no financial contribution to the said publication.

IMPORTS UNDER BRITISH PREFERENCE

Mr. DUFF:

1. What was the value of goods imported into Canada from Great Britain under the preferential tariff, during the year 1923 and the year 1924, respectively, through Canadian ports?
2. What was the value of goods imported into Canada from Great Britain under the preferential tariff, during the years 1923 and 1924, respectively, through United States ports, but destined for Canada?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

1. and 2. Prior to the fiscal year 1923-24, no separate statistics of the imports of goods from the United Kingdom through the United States, subject to preferential tariff, was kept. The imports under preferential tariff during 1923-24 and all imports during 1922-23 and 1923-24, were as follows:

Imports into Canada from the United Kingdom.
(Fiscal years ended March 31, 1923 and 1924)

	1923	1924
Total imports from United Kingdom	$ 141,330,143	$ 153,586,690

Imports from United Kingdom under preferential tariff through Canadian ports	(a)	102,132,678

(a) Not compiled prior to 1924.

GRAIN TESTING LABORATORY

Mr. GOULD:

1. Is the grain testing laboratory at Winnipeg still in operation?
2. If so, who is in charge of it, and what staff is employed?
3. If not, when was it closed?
4. What changes have been made in the staff in the years 1922, 1923 and 1924?
5. Has any report of the work of the laboratory been submitted by Dr. Birchard during the years 1922, 1923 and 1924?
6. If so, are the reports available to members of the House?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

1. Yes.

2. Dr. F. J. Birchard.

3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Changes in staff in 1922:

Herbert A. Watson re-employed as junior chemist at $160 per month from May 8, 1922, to October 1, 1922.

Andrew Cairns re-employed as junior chemist at $1,680 per annum, April 18, 1922, resigned September 30, 1922.

S. M. Allman (R.S.) employed as a labourer at $4.50 per day from May 1922.

Geo. McDonald employed as a labourer at $4.50 per day for 20 days during June and July, 1922.

W. Symes employed as a labourer at $4.50 per day during June, July and August, 1922.

Changes in staff in 1923:

S. M. Allman employed as junior cerealist from July 1, 1923, at $5 per day.

T. R. Aitken (O.A.S.) employed as junior chemist at $140 per month from September 20, 1923.

Andrew Cairns re-employed as assistant chemist at $175 per month from May 21, 1923. Resigned September 13, 1923.

H. F. Bill, junior chemist, at $1,800 per annum, resigned March 3, 1923.

Herbert A. Watson re-employed as junior chemist at $160 per month from May 1, 1923. Resigned September 30, 1923.

George Ward employed as a labourer at $4.50 per day for 17 days in September, 1923.

Changes in staff in 1924:

The services of the following were dispensed with on March 31st, 1924:

T. R. Aitken (O.A.S.), junior chemist at $140 per month.

S. M. Allman (R.S.), junior cerealist at $5 per day.

Miss A. C. Lamb, clerk stenographer at $1,140 per annum.

Mrs. Tate employed as stenographer for 30 days at $90 per month, to assist in preparation of report.

5. One report of a special nature was received in 1924.

6. The special report referred to has not yet been printed. It was referred to Dr. H. M. Tory, Chairman of the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research, for consideration as to the value and practicability of the work covered therein. This report is at present in the possession of the Research Council, and has not yet been returned to this department.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. BOYS:

1. How many ships are there in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

2. What are the name, tonnage, length, capacity and horse-power of each?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Fifty-seven.

SHEDIAC POST OFFICE

Mr. BOYS:

1. Has the government recently acquired a site for a post office in the town of Shediac, Westmorland county?

2. If so, from whom, on what date, and for what consideration?

3. What quantity of land was acquired, and what is the description of same?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Yes.

2. From Mr. A. F. LeBlanc on the 7th January, 1925, for the sum of $8,000, i.e. $7,000 cash and conveyance to Mr. LeBlanc of lot already purchased by the department in 1913.

3. Site on corner of Main and Victoria streets, described as follows:

All that certain piece or parcel of land situate in the town of Shediac in the county of Westmorland, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at the north-west corner of Victoria street where it joins Main street or the Intercolonial Railway lands, thence southerly along said street to a point fifty feet south of the main building, being one hundred and seventy-nine feet from the north side line of land of George W. Tait; thence westerly parallel with said Tait's north side line until it strikes the easterly side line of land formerly owned by Louis Comeau, thence northerly along said eastern side line to the Intercolonial Railway lands; thence easterly along said railway lands to the place of beginning.

Note: Lot about 150 feet by 150 feet, with three-storey frame building.

[Mr. Graham.]

LORETTEVILLE POST OFFICE

Mr. BOYS:

1. Has the government recently acquired a site for a post office in Loretteville, Quebec?

2. If so, from whom, at what price, what was the date of purchase, and what is the description of land?

3. Was a site previously purchased by a former government for a like purpose?

4. If so, when, from whom and at what price?

5. Does the government still own the last mentioned site?

6. If so, why was it not used?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Yes.

2. (a) From Mr. A. Savard on the 20th October, 1923, for the sum of $4,800.

(b) It is known as lot No. 708 of the official cadastre for the parish of St. Ambroise de Lorette, and is bounded as follows: To the north by lot No. 706; to the south by the main road; to the west by lot No. 709; and to the east by lot No. 707. The following are the metes and bounds:

Starting at a point A as shown on the accompanying plan and situated on the south-west corner of the said property said point being the intersection of the division line between lots 708 and 709 with the main road and running in a north-westerly direction to a point B for a distance of one hundred and five feet (105') direction N-25 degrees 40' W. Thence from the point B to a point C in a north-easterly direction for a distance of fifty seven feet and ten inches, direction N-67 degrees 00' E. thence from point C to point D in a south-easterly direction for a distance of one

The whole forming an area of five thousand nine hundred and forty feet English measure more or less. Note: The directions are magnetic.

3. Yes.

4. 21st August 1913, from Mr. Joseph Renaud for $2,250.

5. Yes.

6. Renaud property not suitably located for post office purposes.

GASOLINE TAX

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to a proposed bill to place a tax of three cents a gallon on gasoline by the Ontario government?

2. If so, will the government look into the legality of such a tax in view of the large grants made to the province for good roads, and as to whether the said tax is not ultra vires of the province under trade and commerce section 91 of the British North America Act, and on other grounds?

3. What has been done to meet the Ontario government and co-ordinate federal and provincial taxation to prevent duplication and overlapping on income, amusement and other forms of taxation since last session?

4. What grants towards good roads have been made the province of Ontario during the past fourteen years?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would direct attention to the fact that there are really three or four subjects dealt with in this question. The answer to the first question is no. In respect to the other three I would suggest that if the hon. member (Mr. Church) desires to have them answered he put them in the form of separate questions.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Stand for amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, answered.

IMMIGRATION EXPENDITURE

Mr. CHURCH:

How much money was spent on immigration during the past four years,—(a) From the British Isles; (b) from the United States; (c) from the continent of Europe?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Is it the intention of the government to bring in a measure this session providing for old age pensions?

2. Has the government received any representations from any provincial government of Canada, offering to bear a portion of the cost of old age pensions? If so, from what province?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK:

1. The matter is under consideration.

2. No.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Has the government communicated with the provincial governments in connection with the old age pension scheme, which was recommended to the House in a report brought down July 1, 1924?

2. If so, what was the result of these communications?

3. If not, has the government decided to do anything during the present session as suggested by the report?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK:

1. Yes.

2. British Columbia. A resolution was adopted by the legislature approving of the principle of old age pensions and advising the enactment of legislation by the Dominion government to bring the same into effect; the government of British Columbia also expressed the opinion that the matter of old age pensions was one entirely in the sphere of the federal parliament.

Alberta. Consideration promised.

Saskatchewan. The reply of the provincial government spoke of the difficulty of adopting any suitable scheme of old age pensions by provincial enactment alone, and referred to the differences in climate between the various provinces as rendering a joint scheme between the Dominion and the provinces difficult of attainment. The opinion of the provincial government was that an old age pension scheme for Canada could best be adopted by the federal authorities alone.

Manitoba. Promised consideration.

Ontario. Promised consideration.

Nova Scotia. Promised consideration.

Quebec. The provincial government intimated in its reply its inability to comply with the proposals of the Old Age Pensions committee.

New Brunswick. No reply has been received as yet.

3. The matter is under consideration.

SALES TAX REBATES

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

By a return dated February 21, 1925, to an order of the House dated July 3, 1924, it is shown that as of date October 16, 1924, out of a total number of 4,486 claims for rebates of sales taxes, 1,907 claims had been checked and paid, leaving 2,563 claims outstanding. How many of these outstanding claims have been checked since the date given in the said return, and how much money has been paid thereon?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would take some time to answer this question. I suggest to my hon. friend that it be made an order for return.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no objection to its standing if we can get the information. The answer should be very short, and I think it should stand as a question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, it can stand as a question, but I am informed by the department that it will take some little time to get the information.

Question stands.

SASKATOON POST OFFICE SITE

Mr. CARROLL:

1. In what year was the site for a post office in Saskatoon purchased and at what price?
2. Is the site considered a convenient one for the purpose?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. (a) 1914.
   (b) $122,500.

2. When the property was purchased the city of Saskatoon was growing rapidly and had this continued, the site would have been an excellent one. The site at present is just outside what is considered as the boundary of the business section. It is across the street from the city hall.

PRINCE RUPERT POST OFFICE SITE

Mr. CARROLL:

1. When was the site for a post office in Prince Rupert purchased?
2. What was the purchase price?
3. How much money was spent in excavating the basement?
4. How much money was spent in pumping water out of the basement?
5. Is the site regarded as an advantageous one for post office purposes?
6. If not, why?
7. Was an offer made in 1924 for the purchase of this property?
8. If so, what amount was offered?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. 1913.
2. $95,000.
3. $18,763.35.
4. $1,197.07

5 and 6. No, as it is not a corner site and there is a cliff of rock which would prevent access at the rear of the building.

7. Yes.

8. $18,000.

ESQUIMALT DRY DOCK

Mr. STORK:

1. In what year was a site for a dry dock at Lang's Cove, Esquimalt, British Columbia, acquired?

2. What price was paid for the site?

3. Was the site made use of in the present construction of the Victoria dry dock?

4. Was any other property acquired for dry dock purposes at Esquimalt, British Columbia, and what price was paid?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. 1914.

2. $346,221.25.

3. No.

4. Yes, at Skinners' Cove. $53,136.60.

STOME & SMITHSEN CONTRACT

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. Was a contract awarded lately to Messrs. Stome & Smithsen of Winnipeg, for the hauling of parcels, etc., from the customs house in Winnipeg?

2. If so, was this contract for a period of years, and if so, for what number of years?

3. Were tenders called for by advertisement in the usual way?

4. Were returned soldiers given the preference in the awarding of this contract?

5. On whose recommendation was the contract awarded?

6. Is the government aware that the successful tenderers have had no previous experience in this line of work, and had no equipment and were not returned soldiers?

7. Was the government aware that Messrs. Smithsen and Stome were Vice-President and Secretary of the North Winnipeg Liberal Association?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (for the Minister of Customs and Excise):

1. Contract was awarded to Mr. Charles Smithsen.

2, 3, 4, 6 and 7. No.

5. The Honourable the Minister of Customs and Excise.

PENSIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. Is it the intention of the government to have a special committee on pensions this year?

2. If not, does the government intend to reintroduce the amendments passed by this House last session of parliament?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This question was answered, I think, on the last question day. Dropped.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first question was answered, but not the second.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can answer the second by saying that the matter is under consideration.

IMMIGRATION CANTEEN—QUEBEC

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

1. What was the cost in salaries and other expenditures for the management of the canteen and restaurant of the Department of Immigration at Quebec, during each of the years 1922, 1923 and 1924?

2. What were the number and names of employees detailed for that service for said years, and what was the salary of each?

3. By whom were these persons recommended?

4. How many officials employed by the Department of Immigration at Quebec were placed temporary at the service of these two organizations?

5. Did the said canteen and restaurant show a profit or deficit and what amount, during the year 1924?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. The canteen and restaurant in the Immigration building at Quebec were not conducted by the department in 1922 and 1923, being in the hands of a private individual who engaged his own help and purchased his supplies. In 1924 the canteen and restaurant were under the control of the department. The salaries for the season totalled $13,713.24, while the other expenses, including the purchase of provisions, etc., amounted to $27,836.98.

2. 41 employees as follows:—P. W. Dugal, $4,000 for the season; and the following at the rate per month given: A. Dumais, $150; D. C. Addie, $125; A. Gauvin and E. Riverin, $100; C. Sampson, $85; A. CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—KAMLOOPS-KELOWNA BRANCH

Mr. STIRLING:

1. Have the negotiations between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, with regard to Kamloops-Kelowna branch been completed?
2. If so, with what result?
3. Is the construction at present proceeding between Campbell creek and Armstrong to be continued to Vernon, Lumby and Kelowna?
4. If so, at what date will the construction of these various portions be completed?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

A formal agreement is now in course of preparation which will give the Canadian National Railways running rights over the Canadian Pacific Railway tracks between Kamloops and Campbell creek (about twelve miles), and between Armstrong and Vernon (about twelve miles), and will also give the Canadian Pacific running rights over the Canadian National rails between Vernon and Lumby, and between Vernon and Kelowna, as soon as the latter stretches are completed.

Meanwhile, until the agreement is formally executed, the Canadian National Railways have tentatively secured running rights between Kamloops and Campbell creek for their construction trains.

There are at present completed on the Kamloops-Kelowna-Lumby branches 101 miles of grade out of a total of 105 miles. This gap of four miles will be completed this year. It is also intended to lay track, and ballast this mileage, erect the necessary buildings, and generally finish the line by the end of 1925.

[Mr. McTaggart.]

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SALARIES

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury) moved:

For a return showing by districts or regions the number of employees in each of the following classes and the average annual compensation for each employee of such class of the Canadian National Railways: receiving under $1,000 per year; receiving $1,000 per year or over but under $2,000; receiving $2,000 per year or over but under $3,000; receiving $3,000 per year or over but under $4,000; receiving $4,000 per year or over but under $5,000; and so on until all classes are complete.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): If my hon. friend wishes to discuss this question, it cannot, of course, be discussed in this form; it will have to come under the regular motions for production of papers. I might say to him that it has been referred to the Canadian National management, and they take strong exception to answering questions of this character for public use.

Mr. HANSON: I would not like the question to be dropped without considering it a little further. Perhaps I could have a word with the minister about it.

Mr. GRAHAM: All right.

Motion stands.

SPILLERS ELEVATOR SITE—VANCOUVER

Mr. McQUARRIE (for Mr. Black, Yukon) moved:

For copy of all letters, telegrams, documents and correspondence, between January 1, 1922, and February 25, 1924, between R. H. Gale and any minister or official of the Dominion government; and, between R. H. Gale and the Vancouver Harbour Commission, and between Vancouver Harbour Commissioners and any minister or official of the Dominion government; and, between any representative of the Spillers interests and the Harbour Commissioners, and, or any minister of the Crown and official of the government, regarding the negotiations for lease or sale of certain waterfront property in the Vancouver harbour, upon which is now erected what is known as the Spillers elevator, and which property lies immediately east of the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners elevator No. 1. Also, copy of any letters, agreements, schedules of fees, assignments, transfers, and other documents appertaining thereto.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not think there is any objection to this motion passing, but in the absence of the minister I should be obliged if it could be permitted to stand.

Motion stands.

BRITISH EMBARGO ON CANADIAN POTATOES

Mr. McQUARRIE (for Mr. Hanson):

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, statements and communications between the government of Canada or the High Commissioner of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom or any department of the government of the United Kingdom or any officer thereof, relating to the imposition of an embargo by the government of the United Kingdom against Canadian potatoes.

DUTY ON ROLLING STOCK

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

For a return showing the amount of duty paid by American railway companies on American rolling stock used in Canada during the past twenty-six years, by years; showing the names of such companies and the character of the rolling stock on which such duties were paid, and the amounts.

MILITARY DISTRICT NO. 10—COAL INQUIRY

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, orders in council, evidence and report or reports, and other documents in connection with the investigation lately conducted by David Campbell, K.C., of Winnipeg, into the supplies of coal and other matters affecting Military District 10, and especially copies of telegrams passing between the Solicitor General and the said commissioner or counsel for the commission and between the Defence department and the commissioner or counsel for the commission.

Mr. ARTHURS:

For a copy of all accounts sent in to the government for payment for services rendered by Commissioner David Campbell, K.C., and D. R. MacLean, government counsel, during the enquiry into coal supplied at Tuxedo barracks, Winnipeg, together with a copy of all correspondence passing between the Solicitor General, or any other official of the government or any department thereof, and Messrs. Campbell and MacLean, or any other person or persons, in connection with said accounts.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—CONTRACT FOR WATER

Mr. MARCILE (Bagot):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports and other documents sent by the superintendents to the General Superintendent, President and First Vice-President of the Canadian National Railways, in connection with the granting of a contract for supplying water to the Canadian National Railways, including the Acton Vale station and the Acton Vale National Aqueduct and Power Company, represented by Mr. H. Begin, of Montreal. Also a copy of contract prepared and presented to be signed in the month of June, 1924. Also copy of contract as amended, copy of tenders sent by the city council of Acton Vale, for supplying water to the Canadian National Railways, as well as to the said station. Also all correspondence exchanged between the Canadian National officials and the officials of the city of Acton Vale, Board of Trade of the county of Bagot, and others.

RACE TRACK BETTING

MOTION BY MR. GOOD TO AMEND THE CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the special privilege now given to Racing Associations under the Criminal Code of carrying on public gambling operations in connection with their race meetings is detrimental to the best interests of Canada and should be abolished.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion is seconded by Mr. Denis, the member for Joliette. The substance of this resolution is identical with that of the resolution presented by me two years ago. The question at once arises—and it is a question which I ought perhaps to anticipate and answer now—why am I bringing up the matter again this year? Those who were here last year will remember that I had the same resolution on the order paper last year, but owing to the fact that the government took private members' day very early in the session, the resolution was not reached at all. I am bringing it up this year for several fairly distinct reasons. In the first place, I am not very easily discouraged, I hope, by such a defeat as the motion had two years ago. I believe in following the well known motto: "If at first you don't succeed try, try again," and so long as I am able I wish to advance this cause in whatever way I can. I shall consider it not only a duty but a privilege to do so. I propose therefore to give the House an opportunity of dividing on the question again, and I sincerely hope that every hon. member of the House will feel it his duty and his privilege to express himself on this resolution.

I want also to say that I believe there was a misunderstanding two years ago in regard to a certain matter brought up in this connection by the then Minister of Justice, Sir Lomer Gouin, and I wish to deal specifically with that particular point because I hope that I can put it in such a way that there will not be any further misunderstanding. I desire therefore in that connection to draw the attention of hon. members to an extract from the Hansard of March 1, 1923, page 739, where in the course of his remarks on my resolution the then Minister of Justice said of me:

He quoted the Hon. Mr. Raney as his main authority, I would say, to justify his resolution.

I might comment just here to the effect that I did not quote Mr. Raney on that occasion as my chief authority. That, however is neither here nor there. Continuing—and this I would bring to the attention of the members particularly—he said:

I am not sure that I shall surprise the hon. member for Brant, but I may tell him this, that the Hon. Mr. Raney has never asked for any such amendment as the amendment my hon. friend now proposes to this House.

Mr. GRAHAM: When my hon. friend spoke of Mr. Raney was he referring to the then Attorney General of Ontario?

Mr. GOOD: Yes, to Hon. W. E. Raney, then Attorney General of Ontario. The hon. gentleman (Sir Lomer Gouin) went on to state that he had had correspondence with the Attorney General of Ontario in regard to a proposed amendment to the criminal code that had to do with the prohibition of the publication of racing information, and so on, and the correspondence is all here. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to point this fact out to the House very definitely, and I hope there will not be any further misunderstanding; Mr. Raney for years asked for the amendment which I am advocating. But he did not ask for it in this particular correspondence that he had with the Minister of Justice, for the very good reason that the matter was then before the House in the resolution I then had on the order paper, and because the proposal which I made in the resolution dealt with a different matter entirely from the question which Mr. Raney was taking up with the then Minister of Justice. These two matters—the question of removing the special privilege which is now extended to racing associations and which is contained in sub-section 2 of section 235, and the question of forbidding the publication of racing information in our newspapers—are two entirely different questions. They are related of course to the one evil of gambling, but they are entirely different questions and should not by any manner of means be confused, and I hope that during the course of the present debate the two questions will be kept absolutely distinct.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to repeat the argument of two years ago. The matter was very fully debated on that occasion, and I consider that it would be quite needless to cover the ground again. I would, however, at this point desire to repeat the summary I then gave of the legislation dealing with this matter so as to refresh the memories of hon. gentlemen.

If we refer, therefore, at the outset, to the Revised Statutes of 1906 we find that sub-section 1, of section 235, made it an indictable offence punishable by one year's imprisonment and a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars:

(a) To use or knowingly allow premises to be used for betting.
(b) To keep, exhibit, employ or knowingly allow to be employed thereon any betting device.
(c) To become a stake holder, or
(d) To record or register a bet on an election, race or contest.

But by sub-section 2 these provisions were not to apply to bets between individuals or to those made on a race course of any incorporated racing association during a race meet. Now, there we have the indictment, if you like, under sub-section 1, and the exemption under sub-section 2. I referred two years ago to the very lengthy discussion which took place in 1910 in connection with the so-called Miller bill as a result of which there was an amendment, a compromise amendment, made to this section which re-enacted sub-section 1 of the foregoing section, and added to the list of offences therein contained by making it an offence:

(a) To engage in pool-selling, or book-making or the business of betting, or to make an agreement for the purchase or sale of betting privileges or of information intended to assist in betting.
(b) To advertise, print, publish, exhibit, post up, sell or supply, etc., or offer to sell or supply such information.
(c) To advertise, print, publish, exhibit, or post up any offer, invitation, or inducement to bet.
(d) To sell, transmit, deliver, or receive any message relating to book-making, pool-selling or betting.
(e) To aid or assist in the foregoing.

But the application of sub-section 1 was further limited by adding to sub-section 2 the provision that sub-section 1 should not apply—and I hope hon. members will listen to this carefully—to book-making, pool-making, betting or wagering upon such race course provided that such race meetings are not continued for longer than seven days or occur oftener than twice a year on such race course.

There was a further amendment in the year 1912, two years later, which re-enacted the foregoing sub-section 2, as amended, but limited the racing associations therein defined to those incorporated before March 20, 1912, and to any incorporated after that date by act of parliament or of the legislature of any province, and also for the first time permitted racing associations to sell information or privileges to assist in or enable the conducting of book-making, pool-selling, or betting, and so on, during the actual progress of a race meeting.

As a result of these two amendments—one in the year 1910 and the other in the year 1912—there was a general tightening up of the law against the keeping of what were defined as betting houses, and a general loosening up of the law as it applied to racing associations. That, I think, is a fair statement of the effect of those amendments. Now, in the year 1917, I think it was, an order in council was passed, to which I referred two years ago, wiping out these two exemptions for the duration of the war and I think a year afterwards—I have forgotten the exact dates; at all events this particular special privilege was wiped out by order in council in 1917 which order in council lapsed in January, 1920. During those three years this practice was discontinued, and I outlined to the House two years ago the effect of that discontinuance during the latter years of the war and for a year or two afterwards. About that time also the so-called Rutherford commission was appointed to go into this whole matter and report. As a result of that report there was a further amendment to the statutes in 1920 which re-enacted the foregoing sub-section as amended—that is sub-section 2—but limited the non-applicability of sub-section 1 to bets made on a race course through the agency of the pari-mutuel system, limiting the percentage which could be retained by a racing association out of the amount of any money paid or stake deposited with such association and of which it became the depository under the pari-mutuel system, and providing that the type of pari-mutuel machine should be approved by the Minister of Agriculture, and that he must be satisfied that a proper proportion of the gate receipts and of the percentage retained as above was given in purses for the horses racing.

The Statutes of 1922 made a few minor changes in sections 227 and 235. Instead of the words "between individuals" parliament inserted the words "between not more than ten individuals." There was also a specific exemption of race track operations permitted by the 1920 amendment. Two years ago there were also some further minor amendments to the law in this respect. Chapter 41, section 6 of the statutes of 1923 made a minor amendment to subsection 2 in respect of the percentage of the total amount of the stake which could be retained.

Such is a summary of the law dealing with this matter from the year 1906 to the present time.

I should like next to mention to the House that during the last two years there has been a notable increase in the number of tracks on which this race track gambling is being carried on. There are two more tracks in British Columbia, two more in Manitoba and two more in Ontario; and I think, as hon. members will have noted from the newspapers, there has been a very distinct increase in the handbook evil which is largely based on the racing and betting that goes on at the race meets. I have received, since the matter was first presented to the House two years ago, a great many unsolicited expressions of approval and appreciation of my action taken on that occasion, and expressions also of a desire that the matter should be kept to the fore, and that the House should deal with it again. I do not think it necessary to read any of these; I have them in my hand, quite a bunch of them as you will see, which have come from various organizations and places throughout the country. I may say also, Mr. Speaker, that two years ago I went to the races at Connaught Park to get first-hand information regarding the details of the pari-mutuel system. I was very hospitably and cordially entertained by the management, and taken in behind the scenes, and everything was explained to me in great detail. I appreciated this opportunity, but I may say that what I learned has only deepened my conviction as to the tremendous menace and evils of this special privilege granted these associations and which I am now asking parliament to take away from them.

I have something further to say in this connection, but I think it would be well for me to reserve it until the conclusion of the debate. I therefore leave the matter for the present in the hands of the House.

Mr. FRED STORK (Skeena): The resolution moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) is one which I find myself unable to support, for the reason that it does not correct the evil. We remember that two years ago the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Sir Lomer Gouin), then minister of Justice, introduced, and this House passed, a bill designed to correct the evil of handbook betting. This measure, we all remember, was thrown out by the Senate. The resolution as presented by the hon. member for Brant deals entirely with betting which takes place upon the race tracks in the Dominion of Canada. It does not in any manner curtail the practice of betting on race tracks outside of Canada. In the Toronto Globe of last Saturday, on the front page, I find a very interesting article, which they feature in regard to the intimated legislation as outlined or forecast by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in which he has intimated that he will at this session of parliament introduce a bill curtailing the evil of handbook betting. In that connection the Toronto Globe of Saturday says:

Inspector Raises Both Hands for Anti-Handbook Measure

Staff Official of Toronto Police Department Declares 90 Per Cent of Illegal Traffic Would Disappear Immediately Proposed Amendment Became Law.

An Effective Blow at Elusive Evil

If passed by parliament, the amendment to the Criminal Code to be presented to the House during the present session by Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, will practically wipe out handbooking, according to Staff Inspector David McKinney of the Morality Department of the Toronto police force. While it may not meet entirely with the spirit of the resolution passed at the Chief Constables' convention in Vancouver in 1922, the amendment will be of great assistance to the police of the Dominion in suppressing the handbook, the inspector added, in an interview yesterday.

Hits at Base of Supply

The amendment which will be presented by the Minister of Justice would make a person guilty of an indictable offence who advertises, prints, publishes, exhibits, posts up, sells or supplies, or offers to sell or supply, other than on the premises of an association lawfully conducting race meetings in Canada, and during the actual progress of a race meeting thereon, any tips, selections, odds, winning money prices, pari-mutuel payments, or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to any horse race, whether such race be held within or without the Dominion of Canada.

There are some quotations here from the city of Hamilton as follows:

Representative clergymen and police officials here agree that legislation prohibiting the publication of betting odds will go far toward eradicating the handbook evil. Some of them said to-day the traffic quickly would collapse once such a law were enforced effectively.

Chief of Police David Coulter said: "Suppress the information, and the entire handbook evil collapses. People are not going to wager money on something they can find out nothing about. I have always advocated reformers going after legislation to this effect."

Rev. Dr. J. L. Alexander, First Congregational Church: "Suppress the information, and you take the nerve out of the tooth. Everybody knows, especially those sporting writers who may be affected, that it is the publicity given their writings which keeps the public interest up. Suppression of the racing tip and odds will go far to put the bookmaker out of business."

That shows, I think, that public opinion is very largely behind the attempt to put the handbook out of business in Canada. I pick up the morning paper published in Ottawa, and I find that, while there are to-day no races being held in Canada, because at this season of the year, the race tracks are not operated, yet we find in all the principal daily papers of Canada there are three columns published of results of racing, and the morning paper says:

Racing on Three Tracks
Miami, New Orleans, Tia Juana

Now, surely the people of Canada have very little interest in the races being held away down in Tia Juana, Mexico. We have sporting events in this country. For instance when a hockey match takes place, the reporters are in the arena and write up every detail of the game as it proceeds. People who follow hockey as a sport get a very fair idea as to how the game is played. When a boat race takes place, the newspapers devote a great deal of space to detailing every feature of the race, and although we sit at home, we can practically visualise the contest from start to finish. The same is true as regards every other contest and sporting event throughout the world. Therefore, in the report of a horse race, we would like to see the race detailed so that one could get some information in regard to the quality of each horse and where he is placed; but I am fairly satisfied that the publication of the news as it appears in the race-track sheets is only for the purpose of carrying on handbook betting as it is carried on in this country. The sheet I hold in my hand is dated February 28, and in it is a list of results, which I will not detail, of the races of that date and then appear the entries for Monday. The details of the races which took place on the 28th give a complete list of the horses, the winners and also the also-rans. You would wonder why they print this in detail. People in this country are not very much interested in regard to races that take place outside of Canada, and I am satisfied that the object in view in printing this detailed information is that this is corroboration of exactly how the races went, so that those who won or lost their money have in this an authoritative report of what took place. There is a complete list for all three tracks outlining the activities that will take place there to-day, and to-morrow's paper will contain detailed information as to what horses won and what horses lost.

Before I take my seat, I hope to move an amendment which will attempt, at least, to correct this evil. The evil to-day is not that of the race-track as conducted in Canada. The crying evil that we have to-day is the practice of handbook betting. This amendment will, I hope, put out of business the resorts throughout Canada in which this trade and practice is carried on.

Mr. FORKE: In the paper publishing the results of those races and giving information as to future races, is there any report as to what the betting is on those races?

Mr. STORK: Yes. It is not necessary to destroy altogether a sport which many people in this country enjoy and appreciate. Horce racing is an honest and honourable sport. It has come down to us through unbroken centuries. We have to-day in England the great Derby day, and I am advised that when Derby day comes around, if the House of Commons in London is sitting the House adjourns to take in Derby day. Derby day and the other great races in England have become English institutions. Lord Rosebery, in his younger days, made three prophecies. He said that he would at some future time be Prime Minister of England; that he would marry the wealthiest woman in England; and that he would win the English Derby. He accomplished all of those three prophecies. He won the Derby three times: in 1894 with Ladas, in 1895 with Sir Vista, and in 1905 with Cicero. The English race-track has been an organized institution for the last two hundred years, and no one will say that it is a reprehensible organization or a bad practice. It is patronized by the very highest and best people in the empire. We find that royalty itself has patronized the race-track in England. We find that while Lord Rosebery succeeded in winning the Derby on three occasions, the Prince of Wales has also accomplished that feat. In 1896, the Prince of Wales won the Derby with his horse Persimmon, and in 1900 he won the Derby again with his horse Diamond Jubilee. In 1909, his Majesty King Edward VII, that prince of sportsmen, won the Derby with his horse Minoru.

Mr. BROWN: Perhaps, before the hon. member finishes his remarks in regard to the situation in England, he might explain the system under which betting is carried on in England.

Mr. STORK: I am not very familiar with the exact method by which betting is carried on there, but no one will deny the fact that betting does take place on the English Derby and on every other horse race carried on in that country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. Is it in order that any hon. member should bring in the conduct of members of the royal family in order to influence the process of this debate?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member is proceeding very closely to a line which is not permitted in debate.

Mr. STORK: I understand that even the names of those high in authority in this country in regard to horse racing rankle in the breasts of some hon. members in this House. I believe there is a well defined place in the Dominion of Canada for a properly organized and operated race-track. When one views the race-tracks as we have them in this country, with the Woodbine, the Blue Bonnets and our own Connaught Park at Ottawa, I think they have a very necessary place in our public life. What more inspiring sight can one see than the beautiful lawns, flowers and spotless equipment upon these race-tracks?

Mr. GOOD: Does the hon. member imagine that I am assailing horse-racing?

Mr. STORK: I am just making a defence for the perpetuation of the king of sports in Canada. I have my misgivings as to the effect of the proposed resolution, and I am simply voicing my sentiments and stating that I for one, as a citizen of this country, desire to see the race tracks of Canada, an honourable, good and clean sport, perpetuated and not endangered by any hocus-pocus resolutions that may be engineered into this debate. I see no reason why the race tracks of Canada should not continue as they are. The horse has always held a great place in this Dominion. Even in the county of Brant and the city of Brantford there is a loving memory cherished of the late Mr. Cope Stinson with his wonderful horse Geneva. Some thirty years ago Geneva was one of the best, gamest horses that ever pulled a sulky around a race track. I maintain that horses and men have their place in the public as well as in the private life of Canada, inasmuch as, long after they have gone, their memory still survives. We have in this country men like Sir Adam Beck and Sir Clifford Sifton, with their stables of jumpers; and while it is true that the horses in these instances are the personal property of these men, at the same time the general public has a very lively interest in the animals and follows very keenly their performances. When we see men of the stamp of Commander J. K. L. Ross, the Hendries, the Seagrams, and all the other men who do so much for racing in this country, and when we think of the sportsmanlike character of every one of them, whose racing stables are a credit to the country, we are bound, I think, to come to the conclusion that they fill a very necessary place in the life of the country. I believe, therefore, that I am voicing the opinion of a great many people in the Dominion when I express my appreciation of this clean sport and of the inspiration it gives to the stock breeding of the country, as well as of the pleasure which is afforded the people generally. I have an amendment to submit to the House which I think will eliminate or at least correct the evils of handbook betting. I move:

That all the words after "that" in the resolution be struck out and the following be substituted therefor: "in the opinion of this House legislation should be introduced during this session to prohibit the advertising, printing, broadcasting, publication or sale of information concerning any tips, selections, odds, or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to horse racing, whether held within Canada or without, unless where supplied on a race track in Canada during the course of a race meeting legally held."

Mr. GOOD: I rise to a point of order. I question whether this amendment is relevant to the resolution which I have presented to the House. I am entirely in accord with the substance of the amendment so far as it goes, but in my opinion it deals with an entirely different matter from that dealt with by my resolution. I tried to indicate as clearly as possible in my opening remarks that I was altogether in sympathy with the proposal of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to take measures against the handbook evil. I would seriously question, however, whether the present motion can possibly be accepted as an amendment to my resolution. It deals with a different subject entirely, under a different part of the Criminal Code, and while I am in favour of it I do not think it touches the question I have raised in my resolution. If we voted on the amendment we should be discussing and deciding a question which is not relevant to the main motion, and it seems to me, therefore, out of order.

Mr. SHAW: I desire also to raise a point of order, not on the ground suggested by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) but for another reason. If I understand the amendment correctly, the mover (Mr. Stork) seeks to anticipate the government's intention in regard to legislation on this matter, and consequently the amendment is out of order.

4 p.m.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think that the question whether the amendment anticipates forthcoming legislation is relevant. The amendment seeks the opinion of the House on the advisability of introducing legislation during the present session to prohibit the advertising, printing, broadcasting and publication of information, and so forth, in the matter of horse racing. The main motion has reference to:

—the special privilege now given to racing associations under the Criminal Code of carrying on public gambling operations in connection with their race meetings.

The question, it seems to me, is whether the proposed amendment relates to a different subject matter from that of the main motion which has been moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). I rule that the amendment is in order.

Mr. GOOD: May I speak to your ruling, Mr. Speaker? I want to challenge that ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member for Brant desires to appeal from the ruling?

Mr. GOOD: Perhaps I am not as familiar with the rules as I should be. Is there any further discussion permissible on the appeal, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Not after the ruling. I asked if any other hon. member desired to speak to the point of order and no one spoke.

Mr. GOOD: I do feel that, for the reasons already stated, the House should have an opportunity of deciding whether in its opinion the proposed amendment is really an amendment to the resolution I have moved.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the hon. member's wish to appeal from the ruling?

Mr. GOOD: Yes, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned; I desire to appeal to the judgment of the House.

Mr. CARROLL: May I point out that the hon. gentleman has not appealed to the House?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Yes, he has intimated his desire to appeal.

Mr. CARROLL: But something else has to be done.

Mr. GOOD: I do not understand the hon. member's claim; I thought I had appealed to the House from the judgment of the Chair. However, I desire to make it plain that I do so now; I move, if I am in order in doing so, that the ruling of the Chair be not sustained.

The question having been put as follows:

Mr. Good having moved that the special privilege now given to racing associations under the Criminal Code be abolished, Mr. Stork moves in amendment that in the opinion of this House legislation should be introduced to prohibit the advertising, printing, broadcasting, publication or sale of information with respect to racing, etc. On a point of order being raised, the Speaker ruled that the amendment was relative and should be allowed. Mr. Good appeals from this ruling:

The House divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained?

Ruling sustained.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The ruling of the Chair having been sustained the debate will now continue, the question being upon the amendment.

Mr. R. J. WOODS (Dufferin): Mr. Speaker, I have no apology whatever to offer in supporting the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) has advocated the ancient and honourable sport of horse racing. As I understand the resolution, the legislation we are asking for has nothing whatever to do with horse racing, outside of the feature of gambling. We are dealing with the gambling feature, not with racing or the testing of speed of horses, and this resolution if adopted by this parliament will not interfere with horse racing as a sport; will not interfere with the raising and breeding of pure-bred horses; will not interfere with any of our local horse racing affairs; but it will interfere with the system that is now in vogue of gambling through the pari-mutuel machines at the meets that are held from time to time.

To my mind this resolution is of the utmost importance because it reaches down to the very root of our national life. We are building up a young nation in this country. We boast of our natural resources, of our great manufacturing industries, of our vast potential wealth, and rightly so; but the greatest asset this country has is its young men and young women, and if we are going to build up a strong country we must build on the foundations of morality and honesty and industry. This practice of gambling is one that will to a great extent mar the morals of our young men and our young women, and lead them off into channels that are not the best for the development of their manhood and their womanhood. We are trying to safeguard the youth of our land in asking for this legislation. We safeguard by legislation the pedestrians as they walk by the way; we safeguard the traffic on the public highway; we safeguard, to some extent, the industries of our country; we safeguard our homes by providing police protection: but particularly should we lay stress, more than we have in the past, on safeguarding the youth of our land. To those who are grown up in years, to hon. members in this parliament possibly, it might not make such a great deal of difference whether they gamble or not; but it will make a difference in the character, in the outlook, and in the honesty possibly, of many of our citizens, the young men and the young women who are growing up and helping to build up this great nation.

We have behind this movement, Mr. Speaker, I believe the united forces of the great majority of the organized churches in this country. I believe that the vast majority of all organizations for moral reform in this Dominion are behind the movement, and we should take cognizance of that fact knowing that they are the organizations that have built up this country. There is nothing that has done so much to build up this country to what it is to-day as the Christian forces that have been at work in Canada. We owe our intellectual, moral and social progress largely to the Christian churches that are founded on the word of God. It is related that on one occasion Queen Victoria was asked upon what rested the great success of the British Empire, and she pointed to the word of God. Now, believing that we have behind us the vast majority of the Christian organizations, in my opinion we should support this legislation, which will cut out this evil.

The question might be asked, what does gambling accomplish? In the first place, we might note some things that gambling does not do. I believe in healthy sports; I believe in field sports that will develop the physical energies and powers of our young men and young women; I believe in every organization that will develop the intellectual forces of our youth. But what does gambling do? Does it develop our physical forces? Does it develop our mental forces? Does it develop our moral forces? Does it develop us into more honest and better citizens? Does it help to make us more energetic and more active in connection with the affairs of our country? It does not require much cleverness to bet on horses, or to engage in other forms of gambling. As for the results which follow from gambling they do not contribute to the elevation of human beings from a physical, moral or intellectual standpoint.

And what is the effort which underlies gambling? It is the effort to get something for nothing. When we seek to obtain money through the agency of gambling we endeavour to obtain profit through some other individual's loss and our exertions are not likely to benefit the community in the same way that they would if they were directed toward some laudable purpose. An individual who used a room in a house for gambling purposes, and collected a rake-off ostensibly to meet the cost of light or heat would be acting illegally and in the event of detection would become liable to the pains and penalties of the law. I remember a case of this kind which occurred not so very long ago. In that in-tance the man used a certain room for gambling purposes and eight or ten men were caught there by the officer of the law. They were all brought before the court and fined. But why discriminate between one form of gambling and another? Why allow men to gamble on race courses when they are not allowed to gamble in gaming houses or in houses used for that purpose? If there is a form of gambling which is a menace to the entire community it is that which takes place on race tracks, and it would be in the national interest to make a clean sweep of all forms of gambling at once rather than to pass piecemeal legislation. I want to say that gambling creates thieves. I do not mean to say by any means that every individual who gambles is likely to develop into a thief; but there are numerous cases where men have not only spent the money which should have gone to the support of their wives and families, but also money which they stole from the tills of their employers. Let me read you some quotations along that line. Here is one from the Christian Guardian of January, 1924:

> Only a few days ago in Toronto we had a case of a trusted official of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment stealing $25,000 of the funds entrusted to him and losing it in gambling on horse races. Just a few days later in the same court we had two employees of the city registry office plead guilty to the theft of about $10,000 in one case and $4,500 in the other, and the money all went on the horses.

And not very long ago we read in the public press where a bank manager in the city of Hamilton had confessed to spending his all on horse racing and then had gone to the bank till and drawn out thousands of dollars —I believe the amount was approximately $60,000—and he said it had all gone on the horse races. It was also reported in the newspapers quite recently that Mr. Jones, a police magistrate in Toronto, referring to bookmaking had said: it was the hardest form of evil that the police of that city had to cope with. Permit me to read a further quotation illustrating the waste of money which occurred in gambling. This is the opinion of a Mr. Burgess, who is identified with an insurance company. He says:

> It has been my opinion for a great many years that the most serious cause of loss to fidelity companies through the dishonesty of employees in positions of trust is the gambling instinct engendered and fostered by the handbooks," he declared. "Nothing has caused the downfall of trusted employees more than the handbook. Fidelity losses were never so serious, and the one outstanding cause is the race track and the evils it creates in the shape of the handbook.

This particular evil has to do with handbooks, but all these forms of gambling are interwoven, and all should be swept out of existence.

Mr. CARROLL: If this resolution is crystallized into law and all this gambling prohibited, will it prevent my hon. friend and myself making a bet on the outcome of a horse race?

Mr. WOODS: No. As I understand it, I do not consider that it interferes with our local fairs where horses are racing and one individual wishes to bet with another. It is aimed at the legalized betting of the pari-mutuel and the rake-off system, in my view.

Mr. CARROLL: Would the amendment of my hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Stork) do away with private betting?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODS: No, it would not do away with the pari-mutuel. It would do away with the handbook as I understand it. I am pleased to note that the Minister of Justice is introducing legislation along that line. I commend him for his action. Such legislation was passed two sessions ago and thrown out by the Senate. We are delighted to have it before us again. It is a step in the right direction, but in my judgment it does not go far enough. In order to make it effective you have to go further. If you want to kill a rattlesnake, do not kill him piecemeal, but take his head off and get rid of him entirely. This race track gambling is an economic waste, and there is no question about it. We have in our country at the present time many unemployed. There may be among those many who have wasted their money. If you go into restaurants when races are being held across the river you get in touch with young men and women and hear them say "I was over at the races, I was betting and lost so much money". It is a common occurrence, no matter where you go in this city or any other city where horse races are being conducted, you will hear individuals stating that they have been at the races and they have lost or won money. Money going into the pari-mutuel machines is an economic waste, because there is no tangible evidence that you are getting anything for your money, and very often people get so fascinated with it that they lose their all, and lose what belongs to somebody else in a great many cases. I have a statement from Dr. Shearer which shows the staggering amounts which are annually wagered at the Canadian racing meets. The figures are:

1921	$80,000,000
1922	68,000,000
1923	60,000,000
1924	60,000,000

In Ontario last year the sum wagered was $36,000,000. If $36,000,000 in the province of Ontario, or $80,000,000 in the Dominion of Canada goes to some place where you received no tangible or adequate return or reward in any way to benefit anybody, it is surely an alarming economic waste.

I wish to refer to another quotation that I have here, from Social Welfare, of Toronto:

> Only in Mexico and Canada and three of the forty-eight American states is such criminal vice allowed by law. When it was driven out from under the Stars and Stripes it found refuge under the good old Union Jack in Windsor, Fort Erie, Vancouver and Victoria. How long shall Canada tolerate this?

In my experience in my younger days I laboured for some time in the United States. I returned to Canada, why? Not because I could make more money, because I was making a great deal more money in the United States at that particular time than I could make in this country; but I returned to Canada because of the British law which was so much better than the law of the United States. At that particular time we heard it currently stated that when the blacklegs, gamblers and thieves committed crime in Canada they went across the line in order to get more freedom in the United States. But things have changed since. Mexico, Canada and three of the states of the union are the only countries where it is permitted. We find forty-five of the states of the union are free from this gambling vice. We ought to realize that we are not advancing morally along lines of protecting our people against these vices as rapidly as our American cousins to the south of us are advancing.

In conclusion I wish to express my approval of the legislation that the Minister of Justice is bringing forward, and I hope this House will take into consideration the necessity of going further and putting all gambling into the same category. If it is illegal in one place to gamble, then make it illegal in every other place, and eradicate completely this form of gambling in this fair Dominion of ours.

Mr. W. B. SNOWBALL (Northumberland, N.B.): I cannot help, on rising to make my first speech in this House, but refer to the death of the late member for Northumberland, Mr. Morrissey, whose place in this parliament I was elected to fill. It was a pleasure to me to listen to the remarks made in reference to the hon. member by our respected leader on this side of the House (Mr. Mackenzie King), by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and the hon. leader of the Progressive party. Mr. Morrissey was a politician who stood high in the estimation of the people, a man who died with his name unsullied. Although he had been for years at the head of the largest spending department of the local coalition government of which he was the only Liberal member, a government which later passed out under the blackest cloud that ever darkened the horizon of any government in New Brunswick. Mr. Morrissey's election in 1921 by the largest majority ever given a federal candidate in the county of Northumberland was a mark of personal esteem.

With these remarks dealing with the late member, I am glad that a moral issue of this nature is the one on which I make my first speech.

I would be thoroughly in accord with the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) if, in the amendment he introduced, he had left out the last few words, "unless applied on a race-track in Canada during a race meet." I feel that his amendment would be even more sweeping than the resolution moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), and one that would have commended itself to me, if he had left out these qualifying words.

I am not opposed to horse racing; in fact, I am very much in favour of all sports. I am interested in horse racing, in race tracks, and in the fact that horse racing should be kept clean from all those things that make it so obnoxious to many people that they are afraid to allow their boys and girls to go and see what should be clean sport. I feel that gambling and betting are insidious evils and perhaps as hurtful to the public mind and the young people especially of our country as is the drink habit. We have prohibited gambling at country fairs and in many other ways we have tried to restrict it, but I feel that we have strained at a gnat and swallowed a camel. We should go the whole length in this matter; we should try to protect the youth of this country from an evil as insidious as this great gambling evil is. We, who are further advanced in life, have seen some of the evils that have followed gambling. We have seen embezzlement; we have seen suicide, as was mentioned by one hon. member, and we have seen imprisonment and homes broken up. We, who are the legislators of this country, should legislate for the protection of our people against such a crying evil as gambling on the race tracks of this fair Dominion of ours. An hon. member who was speaking the other day in regard to another question referred to betting on an old sorrel horse. I do not wish, nor do I think any of those who have spoken against gambling, wish to restrict the right of any person attending a race track individually to bet five dollars or fifty dollars or fifty cents, as is referred to, except that I feel that is one of the insidious things whereby young people who have started gambling in that way might be induced to gamble even worse than that. If, however, we restrict gambling to individual gambling, I do not think we shall have from it the bad effects that are produced as it exists at the present time.

The hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Woods) referred to the fact that horse race betting is prohibited in the United States except in three states; yet we find that in this fair Dominion of ours, adjoining their borders, we are allowing race tracks to be operated under the pari-mutuel, handbook and other betting principles. This reminds me very much of a parent who forbids his children to carry on some evil habit, something that is wrong, while his neighbour on the other side of the fence encourages his children to carry on just the evil that is being prohibited, and to induce, if possible, the other children to be corrupted by that method. We, as a great family living to the north of the boundary line should co-operate with our good friends to the south in doing everything we can to put out of this country forever the great gambling habit. I do not want to speak at any length on this question. I want to see gambling put off the race tracks. I want to see race tracks so clean that the best men, ministers of the gospel, every person, can go to see what I consider one of the finest sports and the greatest exhibitions we have in any country. I have visited our race tracks and I have gone across the Atlantic and have seen racing as it is carried on in the Old Country. I do not think Lord Rosebery or the king or anyone else raced their horses under the inducement that we do on many of the tracks in this country, where we know that jockeys are corrupted; that the best horse does not always win; and that under the influence of the betting, the gambling, a horse that is not entitled to the race is very often the winner. That sort of thing should be opposed vigorously by this House. We should stand in the best interest, not only of our young people, but of one of the best sports we have in this country and one that has been promoted since the time of Charles II in the Old Land, a sport that everyone could enjoy seeing. We do not want it to be surrounded by men who come in with handbooks mostly from across the border. The sum of $60,000,000 was mentioned. I should like to know where the great bulk of that $60,000,000 goes. Does it remain in Canada, or is it carried across the border by men who have been driven out of the United States by the laws they have there, and who have come to corrupt our morals? Are they carrying back to that country money that belongs to our hard-working citizens, our clerks, artisans and other workers? Is that where we want the earnings of Canadians to go when we are struggling as we are to advance our country? Do we want to see that money, frittered away in that frivolous manner, carried across the border by men who are not entitled to the protection that we give them in this land?

I feel very strongly in favour of supporting the amendment if the hon. member (Mr. Stork) would eliminate the last few words. I hope the day will come when the resolution as introduced to-day by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) will be carried, and when the other resolution is brought down by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), I hope to be able to support it. Then, we as Canadians can hold up our heads beside our neighbours to the south and say that we have grappled with the great evil of gambling.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I rise just to point out that some of us are in an embarrassing position by reason of the amendment. Speaking for myself alone, I would rather vote for the amendment than for the motion. I believe the handbook is a greater evil than that of betting on the race track; but if I vote for the amendment, I am precluded from voting for the motion in case the amendment carries. In view of the fact that the Minister of Justice has promised to bring in legislation identical with the spirit of the amendment, I would feel it necessary to vote against the amendment, although I am heartily in accord with its terms. It looks to me as though the amendment were a subterfuge. I am not able to find in it any evidence of sincerity on the part of the mover, and I should have been glad if it had been declared by the House to be out of order, so that we would have had an opportunity of dividing the House squarely on the issue, the elimination of the betting evil.

Mr. T. E. ROSS (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in at least one respect I find myself entirely in accord with one expression of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork), who moved the amendment, and that is when he says that horse racing is an ancient and honourable sport. Let us, in the first place. get clearly before our minds the subject now under discussion. It is not the desire of the mover or of any of those who are supporting his resolution to do away with the noble animal, the race horse, in this country, neither is it the purpose or desire of any of us to prohibit horse racing in Canada. Personally, I enjoy watching a good horse race just as much as anybody else, and in my younger days I enjoyed having the privilege, which I did have many a time, of riding one of those noble animals at the races—I want to qualify that,—races where public gambling was not allowed. The question before us is simply that stated in the resolution: We are dealing with the special privilege which is now given to racing associations under the criminal code of carrying on public gambling operations in connection with their race meetings. I am informed, and I think it is correct, that Canada is the only portion of the British Empire where public gambling at race meetings is allowed by law. If I am not correct, some hon. member will correct me. Personally, I consider this to be a great blot upon our country and a definite menace to our national welfare. The question before us at the present time is a great moral issue, and for that reason it is one of great moment to the people of Canada; for the future welfare of any country must depend upon the character of its citizens. This question, therefore, is of great national importance because it has much to do with the formation of character, particularly in our rising generation.

We find the resolution solidly supported by religious organizations and religious leaders as well as by various other bodies in this country which are working towards the greater welfare of the people and in the interests of social and moral reform. Personally, I have had many letters during the past two weeks from various religious, social and moral welfare organizations in Canada requesting my hearty support of the resolution; and I am told that the same is true of the other members who represent that good old county of Simcoe from which I come. I noticed in the press on Saturday that the churches in the county of Halton have also passed a resolution and have asked the hon. member (Mr. Anderson) who has the honour to represent them in this House that both by voice and vote he support this proposal now under consideration. No doubt a similar situation is true in regard to hon. members of the House generally. Not only is the resolution supported by the various religious, moral and social welfare reform associations, but it is also a matter of very great importance to the financial, commercial and industrial interests of the country. Public gambling at horse races entails, if not the squandering, at least the loss, of vast sums of money as well as the depletion of financial resources. From reliable sources we learn that no less a sum than $60,000,000 was spent during the year 1924 on the race tracks in this country during the racing weeks, a similar sum having been spent in 1923. Not only that, but as great a sum if not a greater was wagered through the handbook men of Canada during those years. This is a serious condition of affairs and it affects business and industrial enterprises very unfavourably.

I stated a moment ago that this public gambling had an evil influence on character building. Let us not forget that the boys of to-day are the men of to-morrow, and that the influences which are thrown around them in boyhood years are very strong factors in determining what their character will be when they develop into full manhood. Since coming to Ottawa about three years ago to attend the session of 1922, I have personally seen many boys who are employed apparently as sub-agents of those who are dealing in this gambling business. They are engaged selling racing forms and other news articles relating to horse racing, and on two or three occasions, at least on two, if I remember rightly it occurred on three occasions—I have personally been approached by boys in this very city, boys only well in their teens, with the request that I should give them two or three dollars. Now, I have always been personally interested actively in our work with the boys, and I took the trouble to stop and ask them what they wished to do with this money, and invariably the answer was that they wanted to place a bet on some horse in the hope of winning some easy money. I am firmly convinced that the influence of this legalized public betting is absolutely harmful and tends to the weakening of character. And it is a positive menace to our national life.

I have been for many years a somewhat close student of that Book of books which is sometimes spoken of as the guide book of life; and I take it that the same thing is true of other hon. members. From that book we learn that a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, nor can an evil tree bring forth good fruit. "By their fruits ye shall know them"; and I want for a short time to point to some of the fruits produced by this legalized public betting. For, after all that is the question we are dealing with; we are not discussing private betting that may take place between one and another, nor are we discussing the abolition of horse racing; we are dealing with legalized public betting on race tracks. In the first place we must remember that the production of fruit is a gradual process. The seed is planted, and after a little while we have first the blade, then the ear and then the full corn, the matured fruit. And just for the reason that the development is so gradual there is a possibility that we may often lose sight of the very close connection between cause and effect. So it is in the case of this national evil, this canker which is eating to the very heart of our national life. When we see the fruition of this evil in a ruined manhood and womanhood, let us not forget that it is the ripened, matured fruit of a seed that was sown long before. Let us remember that some influence, some time, somewhere, has dropped as a living seed into that life and produced the fruit which we now behold. I have said that the production of fruit is a gradual process. So it is; and I see it in this light in the question we are discussing at the moment. No young man or woman, when placing a first bet, ever expects to become a gambler, any more than the boy or girl taking the first glass of liquor ever suspects that he or she may become a drunkard. But the result follows; the temptation is there. In this case it is there under legal sanction, and being under legal sanction, these young people are thrown off their guard. The thing is not against the law, they think it is all right, and so they place their bet. Our young men, and young women as well, we know, have done it and they will continue to do it. They may win for a time and be encouraged, with the result that they repeat the experiment; and they may even win again, and go further into the practice. But the point I make is that this very feature of it, the repetition of the evil, is a habit-forming practice which is undermining the foundation of true, strong character. And when the reverses come; when the fair weather, we might say, has changed to storm; when the winnings have changed to losses, we find that the foundation on which character should be built becomes sand instead of rock, through the process of moral disintegration that has been going on, and the building of true, noble manhood and womanhood falls to the ground.

And more than that is involved. I have referred to the time when losses come, when reverses occur and winnings cease. These losses must be made up. They entail a curtailment, perhaps an entire disappearance of the financial resources of the one who has been engaged in the gambling. And what happens? The need for money is urgent, and he succumbs to temptation. He may be a clerk, or perhaps a manager of some bank or other institution, and he takes that which is not his own; to put it in plain language, he gives way to the temptation to steal. At first it may be only a small sum, but the principle is the same. That may be followed by larger stealing, often by forgery and embezzlement. Then comes arrest, trial, conviction, sentence, a prison term—all in the trail of gambling. What is the mature fruit of this practice of which we are speaking to-day? It is simply this: ruined character, ruined manhood, ruined womanhood, ruined homes, blighted hopes of wives, mothers and children. I leave it to the judgment of hon. members of this House whether that is good fruit or evil fruit. Judge for yourselves, but in doing so do not forget what I said a few minutes ago: "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." If, therefore, we judge the fruit to be evil we cannot get away from the conclusion that the source from which it came is also evil. There is only one course open to us to-day, as I see it, and that is to take such measures as to banish from the land the evil of which we are now speaking.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the House briefly to what may be regarded as a case in point. I use it simply as an illustration. Some cases have been mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Woods), but he might have instanced many. These things are actually true and occur in every day life. The case to which I refer took place only within the last month in the city of Hamilton. It is the case of the arrest, trial and conviction of a man in that city—I have his name, but I do not think any good purpose would be served by my giving it. He was charged with theft, conspiracy and receiving, and by Judge Gauld he was found guilty on the major charge; the other charges were not proceeded with. He was convicted on the charge of theft of $31,780 from the Union Bank of Canada. This man was operating a handbook business on a large scale and had been doing so far many months, within two blocks, we are told of the headquarters of the police force of the city of Hamilton. The arrest, conviction and sentence were the result of an admitted embezzlement of a large sum of money from the Union Bank of Canada by a former branch manager of that bank. This branch manager stated during the trial that he had lost all this money of the bank in dealings with this man's handbook in a certain hotel in the city of Hamilton, and also that the man who was operating the handbook business knew at the time that it was the bank's money that was being wagered. Let me quote briefly some of the criticisms that were made by Judge Gauld in dealing with this case, as published in the Toronto Globe under date of February 2 of the present year. It says:

In his judgment Judge Gauld characterized Baird as a shrewd young man, reared since his fourteenth year in an atmosphere of gambling, and one in whom the mercenary spirit was acutely developed.

Just note that one point: the judge states that this man had been reared from his fourteenth year in an atmosphere of gambling—and we have the result, a ruined life. As I said a little while ago, this question is a vital one to the people of Canada because it has much to do with character building, and character is the foundation of the success of this or any other nation. Judge Gauld says further:

It is difficult to find language adequately to comment upon the pernicious evil, in the form of gambling and handbook making, that has eaten its way to such an alarming extent into our community life. The evidence in this case frankly, even brutally, exposed the existence of an illegal practice which has become so common and so familiar that it has been accepted as almost a proper and natural thing.

It has "become so common and so familiar"—this reminds me of a verse which I learned in my boyhood days while at school, and which runs something like this:

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

We see it carried out in practical life. Further the judge says:

Within two blocks of the police headquarters in this city the accused for months has been openly defying the law with his gambling operations. The general impression in the public mind, when thinking of or discussing handbook transactions, is that only small amounts of money are involved, but this evidence disclosed the fact that large sums of money changed hands.

Remember that the sum involved in this case was $31,780. But that is not all that was involved. We have the ruin of the man who operated the handbook as well as of the bank manager who was gambling through him. I think both are at present serving a prison sentence. More than that, Judge Gauld says:

The whole circumstance laid bare not only a wilful perversion of our moral and ethical codes, but a defiance of law and justice with impunity that is incomprehensible to me, and which should require further elucidation at the hands of those responsible for its existence.

When I read, Mr. Speaker, those last few words, "of those responsible for its existence," I just wondered who they were. I know the judge was speaking at the time of the police officials in the city of Hamilton, but after all they are responsible only for carrying out the law, and I feel that we in this parliament are the ones who are responsible. That very thing was what caused me one day last week to ask the government if they intended at this session to re-introduce legislation similar to that which was brought down in 1923, and which was passed by this House but defeated in the Senate, dealing with this identical evil. I was glad to receive the assurance from the hon. Minister of Justice that the government intended to re-introduce that legislation at this session. I hope that when it is re-introduced that it will meet with the unanimous support of members of this House; I hope it will; I hope also that it will be endorsed by the Senate and become law. Otherwise, if the Senate in their wisdom, or in their unwisdom, as I would view it, should see fit to again throw out the measure, they will have a great deal to answer for in the country districts, as I know from actual experience.

In conclusion, I wish to make an appeal to every member of this House for solid support of the resolution which is before us. For in supporting it what are we doing? We are protecting our boys and our girls, our young manhood and our young womanhood, our homes, this Canada of ours which we all dearly love, from the harmful influence of this national evil which tends towards the destruction of strong, true, Christian character, and which is also a menace to our future welfare as a nation.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): It was my desire to vote for the main resolution, for reasons with which it is quite unnecessary for me to burden the House, as the matter has been discussed very fully already; but I find that the amendment of my hon. friend the member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) prevents me to a large extent from voting for the main resolution. The amendment of the hon. member for Skeena has my hearty approval, and I would like to vote for it also; but I cannot very well vote for them both. If I voted for the amendment, which is a good thing, that precludes me from voting for the main motion, which is also a good thing. That is an undesirable position in which to put hon. members.

I also have one slight objection to the amendment of my hon. friend from Skeena, and it is this. He proposes by his amendment to prohibit the advertising, and so forth, of tips, odds, and so on, unless when supplied on race tracks. Now if it is a good thing to prohibit the publication, advertising and broadcasting of tips, odds, and so on, in any other part of Canada, why is it not also a good thing to prohibit it on the race track? I have the honour to move, Mr. Speaker, the following amendment to the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft). I move that all the words after the word "without" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

and to prohibit the use of pari-mutuels on race tracks in Canada.

If the sub-amendment carries, the amendment of the hon. member for Skeena will then read as follows, and I think it will meet the views of a great many in this House, inasmuch as it will perhaps condense into one amendment the best elements in both the motion and the amendment:

That in the opinion of this House legislation should be introduced during this session to prohibit the advertising, printing, broadcasting, publication, or sale of information concerning any tips, selections, odds or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to horse-racing, whether held within Canada or without, and to prohibit the use of pari-mutuels on race tracks in Canada.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If there is no objection, I would like to consider the amendment to the amendment for a short time. It is approaching six o'clock, and the debate can proceed in the meantime.

Mr. E. W. ROBINSON (Kings, N.S.): I would like to associate myself with the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) in deprecating the fact that there has been an amendment introduced at all. I would say the same thing concerning the amendment to the amendment. It seems to me that it is simply an attempt to prevent an expression of opinion on the original resolution. What I believe we should do, and what I intend to do myself, is to support the resolution as introduced by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), and in order to do that, I shall have to vote against the amendment to the amendment, and then against the amendment itself. It seems to me these are just attempts to confuse the issue. The issue as stated in the resolution is plain, and if we settle on that, it will be an easy matter to decide afterwards what shall be done concerning the handbook evil and the publication of racing news from the United States and other countries. But we have, as I understand it, a resolution on which we can divide, and I propose to support the resolution.

Mr. E. J. SEXSMITH (Lennox and Addington): I have no desire to prolong this discussion, but because of the basic value of the resolution, building up as it would the moral standard of citizenship and nationalism, I wish to definitely give my stand on this question. There have been strong arguments for the resolution and also against it, and a repetition of these arguments to my mind is taking up time for nothing.

The question is, is it right that parliament should legislate a business of commercialized gambling? Gambling is not a sport: gambling is a disease. Gambling is a general evil that leads to vicious inclinations, that leads to the abandonment of honest toil, leads to loss of property, loss of self-control and of self-respect; and laws that encourage this ought to be repealed. Horse race gambling does not differ in any respect from any other form of gambling. If that is so, why should the Parliament of Canada uphold that which is demoralizing and degenerating? Horse race gambling should be dealt with by law just the same as any other. What excuse can hon. members have for not supporting this legislation? We believe in democracy; we believe in an educated and intelligent democracy; we believe that right laws are built upon the foundation of moral pricipals; and if we do not brace up the fundamental principles of right nationalism by law, how can we expect to have a right democracy? For my part I cannot see how any member can frame an excuse for voting against the original resolution and personally I am determined to vote for it.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): No doubt many members find difficulty in understanding the precise situation which confronts them at the present time. To my mind the resolution would have been a fair test of the opinion of the House; but the amendment also proposes a step in the right direction and no doubt those who wish to see a betterment of the prevailing conditions as regards betting on race tracks and book-making will be ready to support it. While bearing in mind the saying that "half a loaf is better than no bread" a number of us on this side of the House are at a loss to know what to do. As by voting against the amendment we may be preventing legislation that is very far reaching in importance and personally I feel like supporting strongly the main resolution; but if the Speaker decides that the amendment to the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is in order I should think it would meet with the idea of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) as embodied in his main motion. I do not think this is an attempt to stamp out racing. We have harness racing in the province of Prince Edward Island and its success won for that province the name of "The Kentucky of Canada." Probably the best harness horses in the world have been raised in Prince Edward Island. Race meets take place there during the summer months, and the whole countryside turns out for them. The people spend a nice afternoon and there is very little betting that we know of—certainly there is no public betting, and pari-mutuel machines are not allowed. Therefore I do not think any hon. member has it in mind to strike a blow at the sport of horse racing or the industry of horse raising. At our last fall fair, the pari-mutuel machine was introduced, for the first time in the history of the province. I do not know whether that machine should be allowed in a case where the fair association receives a grant from the federal department of agriculture; it may be that such is done in accordance with the regulations of the department. However I am heartily in sympathy with the main motion. We have yet to hear from the hon. member for Brant in regard to the amendment to the amendment, but if he accepts that proposition I think we can all do the same.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) seemed to be worrying over the fact that he was placed in an embarrassing position. I do not believe it is the first time that motions have been made in this House with the object of placing members in such a position. Whether the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) did that consciously or not there can be no doubt that is the effect of his amendment. Regardless of any embarrassment I would have no hesitation, in view of the whole situation, in voting against the amendment. While I, and a great many others, undoubtedly do agree with the sentiment expressed in the first part of the amendment—and I am glad to know that the sentiment against the handbook evil is seemingly so unanimous—yet the expression of that sentiment is vitiated, so far as the handbook evil is concerned, by the last few words of the amendment. Therefore for that reason, if for no other, I would vote against that proposition. It seems strange that when a motion, directed against a certain evil, is brought before the House, that we should have introduced an amendment directed against another evil, even if these two particular evils are in some measure related. Yet that is the situation in which we are placed to-day. So even without the few objectionable words at the end of the amendment I would vote against it, not because I do not wish the reform outlined in that amendment, but because it is not a question on which I wanted to vote at this time. My desire was to vote, and to have the House vote, on the particular evil that is mentioned in the resolution of the hon. member for Brant. And that hon. gentleman made it very clear in his opening remarks that he did not want these two issues confused. We had already had the promise from the Minister of Justice that legislation directed against the handbook evil would be introduced here. We accepted that promise in good faith, and no matter how this vote goes we expect the government will implement the promise into legislation. The hon. member for Brant, as I say, made it very clear that he wished us to consider these two questions entirely distinctly. I am not going to discuss at this time whether the handbook evil or the pari-mutuel is the greater evil. I know there are those who will declare against commercialized gambling as carried on through the handbook, and yet will not seem to see the evil of commercialized gambling as carried on by the pari-mutuel machine. With what little study that I have been able to give to the question by personal investigation I cannot see that the evil of commercialized gambling is done away with because it has been clothed with outward respectability. I quite admit that if one goes out to the Connaught races, as I did myself a year ago, and looks around to see what is going on to outward appearance it is respectable; but I saw things also, when I was there that forced me to the conclusion that the evil was none the less because outward respectability was evident. To put a pig into the parlour does not make it any less pig than when it was in a pig sty.

Personally I would have preferred if we could have voted on the resolution as it was submitted to the House; we would none of us then have been in the embarrassing position which the hon. member (Mr. Hocken) seemed to think he was in. However, I am not embarrassed about it, nor do I think any hon. member need be embarrassed if he wants to express himself on the original motion by voting against the amendment. If the Speaker rules that the amendment to the amendment is in order we will accomplish all we desire to accomplish in the original resolution; and in that event, while I would have preferred that we should have voted on the original proposition I intend to vote for the sub-amendment. If the amendment to the amendment is not so held I shall certainly vote against the amendment. If that should be carried we cannot, under the ruling of the Chair, express ourselves on the original proposition at this time. Should the amendment be defeated however we shall have a chance to divide the House on the merits of the question, and I shall certainly support the resolution of the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): I understand Mr. Speaker, that you have not ruled whether the amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have not ruled that it is out of order.

Mr. McQUARRIE: You have not ruled whether it is in order or out of order. As to the amendment to the amendment, there is just one point that I would suggest should be considered by the mover; and that is whether, if this amendment to the amendment is carried and the use of the pari-mutuels is prohibited, it will not be possible to adopt some other system of betting for horse racing. As I understand it, such action is being considered by the racing associations themselves in the west, and some of them are of the opinion that another system would be better and should be used. If that is so, and if some other system of betting be adopted, what will be accomplished by this amendment to the amendment? The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) stated that he found himself in a very embarrassing position with the amendment that had been moved. I believe other members on this side of the House feel themselves in an embarrassing position, notwithstanding the remarks made by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) What is to happen if the amendment is defeated? Will the Minister of Justice then carry out his promise to introduce legislation along similar lines? I think not. I think he would say, "That question has already been determined by the House, and the House has decided against such a proposal; therefore it would not do for me to bring in any such legislation". However, I do not know.

Mr. GOOD: How could the Minister of Justice say that, in the face of the declaration made by hon. members here as to the reasons why they should vote against the amendment?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Now if we have a vote of the House against the amendment, what position does that place the minister in? The minister said something under his breath which I did not hear, but I take it he would be very diffident about introducing legislation on lines which had already been considered by this House and rejected. If that is so, are we not in an awkward position? If I support the original resolution, and I am in favour of the amendment, am I not in an embarrassing position? If I vote in favour of the amendment then I certainly do not wish it to be understood that I am opposing the original motion which I favour. I wish to make that position perfectly clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member voted against the ruling he is all right.

Mr. McQUARRIE: So far as I am concerned, I voted against the ruling of the Chair, but notwithstanding that fact when this amendment comes before the House I feel inclined, subject to what may be said later on in this debate, to vote against the amendment; provided the amendment to the amendment is declared to be out of order, and provided also that the mover of the amendment to the amendment cannot convince me that some other form of betting will not be substituted for the pari-mutuel.

Mr. GOOD: Does the hon. gentleman know that by the 1920 legislation the pari-mutuel system of gambling was the only one that was left legally.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That does not make any difference. You can have some other system.

Mr. GOOD: Is there any other kind of betting that is legally left.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is not the point at all. This House then will not go on record as being opposed to race track gambling as such, but will go on record in favour of being opposed to one particular form which is the pari-mutuel.

Mr. NEILL: Which is the only legalized form.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Why does not the mover of the amendment to the amendment, instead of mentioning the pari-mutuel, go on record as being opposed to race track gambling of any kind?

Mr. NEILL: Because it would be out of order.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is the point that you, Mr. Speaker, will have to consider. If it is out of order then, why is this amendment to the amendment not equally out of order, when it accomplishes exactly the same purpose? What I am afraid of, Mr. Speaker, is that you, upon thinking this matter over after six o'clock, will come to the conclusion that this amendment to the amendment is out of order. If it is not out of order, then it would not be out of order for the mover of the amendment to the amendment to insert a clause, and instead of saying pari-mutuel betting shall be prohibited, provide that any kind of race track betting shall be prohibited. That would clear the situation and put the House on record as being opposed to race track gambling of any kind, and not as against pari-mutuel gambling alone.

Mr. PUTNAM: Why would the hon. member confine his prohibition to race track gambling? The hon. member says you cannot gamble at a race track, and he upbraids the mover of the motion for not putting it that way. Why would the hon. member, in his superlative morality, not make it a prohibition of gambling anywhere and everywhere?

Mr. McQUARRIE: It was not necessary, because we are dealing with race track gambling only, and we are not dealing with other forms of gambling in this debate. If I had an opportunity of voting on the main motion I would vote in favour of it. And I would do so for a number of reasons which I am not going to take time to elaborate to-night. However, I will simply point to this fact, that in British Columbia during the last year we have had a regular orgy of race meets and gambling. We have had too many of them. Perhaps it would be said—and I think it might be said with a good deal of reason—that if you are going to have race tracks at all there should not be any monopoly about it. If you are going to have race meets in this country, then throw the whole thing open, and let anyone have a race meet who desires it. Why should a few associations in this country have a monopoly of conducting race tracks, if race tracks are a good thing? Well, there is certainly something in that argument, but on the other hand, working it out in practice, they have found that a great many race meets in this country would be a very bad thing. It is apparently admitted by everybody that you must limit the number so that there will not be too many race meetings. I know that is not so in other countries. In Australia or New Zealand they can have race meetings almost every day if they so desire, and they do have them and many people attend. I know that in Melbourne, at the Melbourne Cup last year, 140,000 people paid admission to get in to see the races and there were 50,000 people standing outside on an adjoining hill where they did not have to pay any admission. In Australia they go in very extensively for racing. Australia is a great country for sport, and I was told over there that one of the troubles of Australia was that there was too much sport and, in particular, that there was too much horse racing, that it was killing the country. In New Zealand also they have horse racing and they told me over there that the same situation prevails, that there is too much of it. There is apparently no limit to the race meetings at all. They say: Go ahead and have race meetings if you like. If horse racing is a good thing, let us throw it open to everybody. There are in this country people who would pay big round sums of money to have the privilege of operating race courses in British Columbia or, I suppose, in Ontario, or, for that matter, in any other province. These people who are in the business now have the right to conduct race courses and nobody else has that privilege. I am getting away from my point for the moment.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): I rise to a point of order. I submit that the amendment to the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), is out of order. I base my point of order on the following paragraph taken from the third edition of May, which reads:

> Where the original amendment is to leave out certain words, in order to insert or add other words, no amendment can be moved to the words proposed to be substituted, until the House has resolved that the words proposed to be left out shall not stand part of the question. But as soon as the question is proposed for inserting or adding the words of the amendment, an amendment may be moved thereto.

I submit, therefore, that there is another question before the House which must be disposed of before the amendment to the amendment can be in order, and the nature of that other question is clearly defined by May at page 283. Let me read:

> An amendment may be made to a question, by leaving out certain words, by leaving out certain words in order to insert or add others, and by inserting or adding certain words.
>
> When the proposed amendment is to leave out certain words, the Speaker says, "The original question was this," stating the question at length. "Since which, an amendment has been proposed to leave out the words," which are proposed to be omitted. He then puts the question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question." If that question be resolved in the affirmative, it shows that the House prefers the original question to the amendment and the question, as first proposed, is put by the Speaker. If, however, the question, "That the words stand part of the question," be negatived, the question is put with the omission of those words, unless another amendment be then moved for the insertion or addition of other words.
> When the proposed amendment is to leave out certain words in order to insert or add others—

Which is the case in point.

> —the proceeding begins in the same manner as the last. If the House resolves, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question," the original question is put; but if it resolves that such words shall not stand part of the question, by negativing that proposition when put, the next question proposed is that the words proposed to be substituted be inserted or added instead thereof.

I submit that according to procedure the question before the House is, as here stated, that these words stand part of the original motion. So that the amendment to the amendment is out of order until that question is disposed of. Reflecting on the situation in which we found ourselves before the dinner hour, I came to the conclusion that something must be wrong, because evidently we had got ourselves into a position which was utterly opposed to common sense in the circumstances. It seemed to me that either the amendment must be out of order or that there must be some other provision in British procedure whereby the rights of the original mover were safeguarded. And my faith in the procedure, so far as debate under British rules is concerned, is very much confirmed by what I find in these references. I am glad to think that the ruling of the Speaker this afternoon was strictly in accordance with the proper procedure, as I was inclined to doubt that at first. Not knowing that there was some other provision to meet the situation that had developed, I thought that the ruling, even if in order, was an unjust one. I am glad, however, to find that the ruling was in keeping with the procedure, and I am more than glad to discover that our procedure provides a way out of such a difficulty. I submit that before any further progress can be made in this discussion, the question must first be disposed of, as to whether the words which the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) proposes by his amendment to omit from the original motion shall stand as part of that motion, thus reserving the rights of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) and allowing the House to express its will on the resolution moved by him.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I submit that the hon. member is applying one set of rules to a set of conditions to which they are not applicable. It is a well known fact that May's and Bourinot's rules apply in this House only in the absence of our own rules. I do not need to go either to May or to Bourinot for information on this subject; I can get that information in our own rules, very ably set forth by our present Clerk. The remarks of the hon. member for Nelson would be applicable to a great extent if—well, in fact, they would be applicable if they were in order, but they are not; they are not applicable to the present situation. The hon. member says that it would preserve the rights of the mover of the original motion, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), if the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) were put in the language which he, the member for Nelson, suggests. That is true. It would preserve the original motion if the question were put, "Shall the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the question?" But that is not our custom; it is not our procedure. The Speaker says, "The question is on the amendment;" it is not, "Shall the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the question?" That is followed in some of our provincial legislatures, British Columbia, for example, and it often leads to a great deal of confusion; but it is not the custom here. The vote in this House is taken on the question, "Shall the amendment carry?" That is the question, and if it is carried in the affirmative in this instance the motion of the hon. member for Brant is forever estopped. Let me read from our own rules. Rule 36 states the restrictions governing the moving of motions:

A motion may be amended: (a) by leaving out certain words; (b) by leaving out certain words in order to insert other words; (c) by inserting or adding other words.

Then again it says this—and I am quoting only those rules which are applicable to the present situation:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed.

I do not think anyone can gainsay that my subamendment is relevant both to the amendment and to the main motion.

Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the House the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

I am in the hands of the House if I have not complied with that rule.

Mr. BIRD: The hon. member will remember that I did not object to the form of his amendment at all; I think the form of it may be in order. What I was questioning was the point in the procedure at which he introduced it.

Mr. NEILL: If the hon. member is not questioning the form of the amendment, how does it come to be out of order? What is wrong with it? Again, the rule says:

An amendment must not raise any question which by the rules of the House, can only be raised by a distinct motion after notice.

That does not apply.

An amendment cannot anticipate a notice of motion on the order paper.

Again:

An amendment that is merely an expanded negative cannot be proposed by the chair.

The Speaker may refuse to propose an amendment which is in his opinion frivolous.

These are all the rules that have any bearing on this question, and I suggest that I have not broken any one of them. Here is the situation as it presents itself to me. The hon. member for Brant has moved a substantive motion; he wants to do something. What does he want to do? He wants to do away, in his own language, with——the special privilege given to racing associations under the Criminal Code of carrying on public gambling operations in connection with their race meetings.

He says it is detrimental to the best interests of Canada; that is his view; that is what he wants to do. That is method number one of dealing with the situation. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) does not approve of that method, and he comes along with a suggestion which I will call method number two. He says: "I won't go along the lines of the hon. member for Brant; I will deal with another phase of it, that of what is commonly known as book-making —and he moves an amendment to that effect. Now, six or seven hon. members rise up in this House and say: "I am in a position of embarrassment; I want to vote for both the amendment—it is right—and the motion—it is right; but as the one will substitute itself for the other I cannot vote for both." So I suggest what I will call method number three. It is not a new one; it is not a separate one, but it does not accept the amendment of the hon. member for Skeena in full; it does accept part of it. It amends it; it leaves out what some people think should be left out. Then it also takes a portion of the hon. member for Brant's motion, but in spirit only; it does not accept the language of the original motion in its entirety. I say nothing about racing associations, the Criminal Code or public gambling operations on race tracks. In addition to the portion of the member for Skeena's amendment which I include, I simply say "and excluding pari-mutuels." The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) asked why I did not insert the whole thing again. My reply was—and it was appropriate—that I did not want it to be out of order, as it would have been. That is not the objection made by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) but I think it is what the Deputy Speaker had in his mind when he expressed doubt about it at six o'clock.

[Mr. Neill.]

I repeat that my amendment is not a going back to the first motion, because it takes in only a portion of it. It is a compromise; it takes in a portion of the member for Skeena's method and a portion of the member for Brant's method, therefore it is in a true sense not an evasion but, on the contrary, a clear-cut, fresh amendment. I do not think I need further discuss the point of order taken by the hon. member for Nelson, because it is well known that we abide by our own rules and only go to those of Britain when we are at a loss. The custom here, as we well know, is not to put the motion in the words: "Shall the words proposed to be struck out stand as part of the question?" It is in the knowledge of all parliamentarians that that is not done. I submit, on the other point, that my amendment is in order, because it does not hark back to the motion in its entirety; it takes in only a portion of it.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the point of order. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has just said, I moved a definite, substantive motion. An amendment was moved which I submit was not an amendment but a substitute, introducing an entirely new question, putting entirely out of the way the matter which I had in my mind. The effect of the acceptance of that amendment would undoubtedly be to sidetrack absolutely and forever—for this session at least—the matter I dealt with in my motion. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if I or any other member of this House brought in a substantive motion, whether it would be fair or in accordance with the spirit of the rules of this House or of any British parliament for some other hon. member to get up and move that the matter be not now considered and decided upon. If that would not be fair then I submit the amendment was not fair. I challenged it at the time, but as you know, the House divided on it and sustained the ruling of the Deputy Speaker, who was then in the chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: What about the six months' hoist? Would that not be definitely bringing it to an end?

Mr. GOOD: If the six months' hoist had been moved it would certainly have been a little more aboveboard than the amendment that actually was presented.

Mr. GRAHAM: I mean it would have been in order.

Mr. GOOD: Perhaps it would have been in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like the hon. gentleman to state what in his opinion is the effect of the wording of the subamendment added to the amendment?

Mr. GOOD: So far as I can see it would be quite acceptable. I stated when speaking on the point of order before that I was in agreement with the amendment but that it dealt with another matter. The amendment to the amendment, as I understand it, really incorporates the substance of the two motions and it is quite acceptable to me. I would like to see it accepted and allowed to stand, and I think that is the view of the majority of hon. members. Otherwise there are many hon. members here who will be placed in an unfortunate position: they have either to vote against what they believe to be right or they have to allow this question, which they want to decide, to be shelved for this session.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member desire to speak on the point of order? If not, I will reserve my decision for a little while, and the debate can proceed in the meantime.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I started out at six o'clock to say that in British Columbia we had during the last season too much horse racing. That fact is borne out by the press reports, which some hon. gentlemen have no doubt seen, particularly during the last summer and autumn. The matter was the subject of agitations on the part of various public bodies in British Columbia; the situation became so serious that representations were made to the provincial legislature and as a result the legislature passed certain regulations cutting down the number of racing days allowable in the province. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) is in the fortunate position of not having a race course in his constituency. He says he has one? Well, he is in the unfortunate position, then, of having one; it is one I personally never heard of. I have two in my constituency. There are three race tracks in the immediate vicinity of Vancouver. The result of all this horse racing in British Columbia has been that the merchants and others have protested that money was being spent in race track gambling which should have gone into the stores and into other business. The trouble with us is that there are no Canadian horses running in British Columbia so far as I know; at least I never heard of a Canadian horse winning a race in British Columbia. Now one of the arguments which has always been adduced in support of horse racing is that racing has a tendency to improve the breed of horses. Well, it certainly does not do that in British Columbia, because they are not raising any Canadian race horses there which ever win races. The horses are brought from Tia Juana and other American race tracks. When it gets too hot for them down there they come up to British Columbia in the summer time and make the circuit of our province. With these American horses, come American race track gamblers, touts and others who frequent and make a living out of race tracks; and these horses and these men in some way or other manage to accumulate most of the money which is spent on the race tracks, and take it out of Canada. That is why the people out there are objecting to it.

I must say that there are some race tracks in this country where legitimate sport is carried on, such tracks as Connaught Park, Ottawa, the Blue Bonnets in Montreal and the Woodbine in Toronto. If all of the tracks in Canada were as well conducted as these, I do not suppose there would be all this agitation against race track gambling; but, unfortunately, that is not the case, and out in our province, as I have said, there has been a great deal of agitation against horse racing being carried on to such an extent. If the improvement of the breed of horses is left out of the question altogether, we find that the only reason left in favour of racing is sport. Well, I am in favour of sport, and always have been. I have played all kinds of games—lacrosse, football, baseball, tennis, and golf now; I am in favour of all kinds of good legitimate sport, but I suggest that sport is not really the main reason, or any reason for carrying on race tracks in this country. The real reason is the gambling feature, and I defy any hon. gentleman to stand up in this House to-day and say that if gambling was not permitted on these race tracks we would have any number of race tracks in this country. Now if you are going to allow gambling on race tracks, why do you not allow it in other lines? It is true there are among us good reputable citizens who enjoy gambling on the race tracks; there are other reputable citizens who enjoy other forms of gambling. When I went out to British Columbia first, in all the cities and towns everything was wide open. They had faro and roulette and poker and blackjack and everything else running day and night, and everybody was happy. In those days when anybody suggested that these games should be stopped, there were many who rose up against the uplifter and said; Not at all, let us go on in the same old way; we are all right as we are. But will anyone say that we are not better off to-day with all these games stopped? And I think the same thing would apply to race track betting. I am absolutely opposed to it and always have been.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, how to vote on the various questions which are before the House. If I vote for the original resolution, which I intended to do, I would have to do two other things. In the first place, I would have to vote in favour of the pari-mutuels being continued; I would also have to vote in favour of what they call handbook betting, because if I voted for either amendment and it carried, I would have no chance of voting on the original motion

What I intend to do is to consider the matter further. I am in doubt exactly what I should do. I know my idea would be, if I got the chance, to vote in favour of the main question which was brought before the House by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). I would suggest that the proper thing for the mover of the amendment and the mover of the subamendment to do would be to withdraw their amendments, and let us have a fair and square fight on the main question of whether we want race track gambling in this country or not.

Mr. NEILL: I would be happy to withdraw my subamendment if the hon. member from Skeena would withdraw his.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, while these hon. gentlemen consider what they shall do, perhaps we may be allowed to go on with the debate. This question is not a new one, but the situation that we find to-night at the beginning of this sitting is somewhat confusing. As far as I am concerned, my intention is to discuss the main matter, then to try and explain to the House how I shall vote on the two amendments in order to bring about the result that I think should be brought about. As for the question of race betting itself, it is not a new one. It was decided in this House only two years ago, not by a rigid party vote, but by the much greater flexibility of an independent and personal vote. Therefore I think we have had on this matter the clear-cut opinion of the majority of the members of this House, which has not changed very much since then. I will admit that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) is very consistent in bringing up this matter again, but I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the House will show equal consistency in rejecting it once more. It gave a majority of twenty against it two years ago, and I do not think there has been any great change in the opinion of the members since then.

Mr. GOOD: Might I ask whether the hon. gentleman would be prepared to permit the House to show its opinion on this question?

Mr. RINFRET: If my hon. friend will follow me, he will know; the race has just started.

Mr. FOURNIER: Now we're off.

Mr. RINFRET: I think the hon. member for Brant will know about my opinion when I am through. I would like to submit first, as I did two years ago when this matter was before the House, that betting is not a bad thing in itself. That is a very important point that I wish to make at the start. I believe as much even as the hon. member for Brant himself that we should prohibit anything that is bad; but it has never been my opinion and so far has never been the opinion of this parliament, that we should prohibit anything that is not bad in itself, but that only becomes bad from the abuse of it. I submit that a man may invest his property in whatever way he likes, even for his own pleasure. There is in every activity of life an element of gamble. There is a gamble in trade, there is a gamble in the stock exchange, there is a gamble in politics—quite a number of us will find that out, perhaps very soon. All of us in life are staking a certain portion of our own resources on something that may happen. That is our liberty, we are entitled to do that; and if a man has made money in trade, or in any other activity of life, he is as much entitled to stake that money on a horse as he is to buy a new suit of clothes, an expensive dinner, or any other kind of luxury that he sees fit to buy. You are not trying, as my hon. friend was submitting only a few days ago—you are not able at least—to legislate anyone into holiness; and it is a very striking thing for some of us to see with what ease of mind hon. members are allowing certain measures to pass and then are expressing their indignation with respect to other matters which to some of us seem very trifles in comparison to what these hon. gentlemen are ready to stand for. You are not trying, for instance, to stop the extravagance in his manner of living of a man who buys too much or who spends his own money to an excessive degree. You cannot do that, and even if a man is desirous of betting his money on horse races why should you try to legislate against that wish of his?

Mr. GOOD: We are not proposing to do so.

Mr. RINFRET: Let my hon. friend be patient; the horses are just going along. My hon. friend will get my full meaning when I have developed my argument a little further. The point I want to establish first is, that there is nothing bad in the fact of a man taking his own money and betting on a horse race. That is not where the evil is; the abuse that we must try to stop is at the other end of the bargain. What we want to ensure is that there shall be no fraud or no inducement, not on the part of the man who is betting, but on the part of the man or corporation trying to induce him to bet. Therefore it stands to reason that you must not prohibit the thing, I do not think you should be allowed to do it, but you must control it so that the betting will be done under such conditions as will prevent the committing of fraud. That has been the spirit of the legislation on betting that has passed parliament ever since this agitation was first started.

I did not follow every phase of this debate, and perhaps this subject has been alluded to already. Nevertheless I may be permitted, I hope, to state in a few words the history of the legislation on this question. In 1906 there was legislation with respect to certain prohibitions about betting, but betting was permitted as long as it took place on the race course of an incorporated association. In 1910 we had the late Miller bill, which sought to impose further restrictions but did not want to do away with race betting altogether when it was done under certain conditions on a race track and under the control of a properly constituted association. Then there was an inquiry into the subject, followed by the famous Rutherford report which has been alluded to very often. In 1920 when this parliament dealt with the matter again it instituted what we call the pari-mutuel which is a system of betting between different bettors instead of a man betting through a bookmaker. My hon. friend (Mr. Good) insinuates that this constitutes a privilege. I say it is not a privilege at all that the race tracks have. They are simply operating under a law or regulation which permits any incorporated association to exist.

Mr. GOOD: Do they not get a rake off?

Mr. RINFRET: I would not call it a rake off; the provincial governments get a tax and the race track people get a reasonable percentage for the regulation and control which they exercise. The pari-mutuel legitimizes betting in a prescribed form at a regular meeting conducted by a chartered racing association. That is not a privilege at all. It is no more a privilege than the result of any other form of control of activities in the case of a group of men who form an association and abide by the law. Certainly they are not enjoying a privilege; they are merely following the track that we ourselves have induced them to follow. They are simply abiding by the regulations that we have ourselves prescribed. That is not a privilege at all, at least I would not call it a privilege unless you say that a man who abides by the law benefits by the control exercised. Whether that law applies to race betting or any other activity of life the principle is exactly the same. As you will see, Mr. Speaker, every time this House has dealt with race betting it has always observed that principle of control. It has prescribed certain restrictions, but it has never thought for one moment of proposing the abolition of race betting as my hon. friend proposes now—at least on the race tracks; I do not think that my hon. friend is thinking for one moment of allowing betting anywhere else.

Now what would be the effect of prohibition? I think Mr. Speaker that we have already in this country too much prohibition and not enough enforcement. We all know that in other territories it is a very hard thing to enforce the prohibiting of a thing that is not bad in itself, especially, when public opinion is not behind it. And in this case I say that if you try to prohibit race betting altogether, as would be the effect if the main motion were to pass, you would only have prohibition in the statute itself; you would have a worse form of betting in actual practice. Because, after all, I can conceive of only two classes of bettors: The one class a good class of bettors, sportsmen who go to the races and stake a reasonable amount of money, and who in pursuance of their own private liberty, invest their money in that form of sport and pleasure. Surely we are not going to legislate against those. What we want to prevent, at least what my hon. friend wants to prevent, is the other class of bettor—the man who stakes too much of his money, the man who goes beyond the limit; and also the fraudulent bettor who is only hovering round to try and get an illicit benefit. And I say, Mr. Speaker, that far from doing away with that class of bettors we are only favouring them by taking away the actual form of the pari-mutuel which has given good results, and by letting the betting community—if I may so term them—seek other forms of investing their money, seek other ways of betting as they are already doing. We know very well that notwithstanding the fact that the law allows a race track meeting and the operation of the parimutuel you have a class of men who would sooner go on to the main streets, or into pool rooms, and bet through the agency of the book-makers. You are not going to check these, you are only going to send more people the same way, if you reject the other alternative for the control of betting that we have already. The effect of the adoption of the main resolution would not be at all to do away with betting, but it would do away with the safe, well controlled and well regulated form of betting that we have already.

There is another side to this question on which I would like to lay some emphasis before I come to the amendment, and it is this. In matters of prohibition and in matters affecting the ways of living of the individual, I think in this parliament we should be very careful, and when we can leave the matter to the different provinces to decide, we should not interfere. We live in a vast country; it takes six days to travel from one ocean to another, and when a man travels across the continent he has to change the hands of his watch several times before he reaches his destination. In different parts of the country we find different hours shown on the face of the clock, and we also have different mentalities and different ways of understanding life and of living. We agreed in the pact of 1867 that certain distinct matters must come before this parliament, but there is a great number of questions that we should leave to the different groups of people of the Canadian nation to decide for themselves. Some of the provinces are distant from one another. In the Maritime provinces they may have some special ways of understanding life that will not appeal to British Columbia. In my own province, loyal as it is and desirous to live up to the constitution, we have an understanding of life which is not perhaps similar to that of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good). Let us deal with all these problems with great care. We know that the provincial governments of Quebec and of Ontario are deriving revenue from the races, and perhaps my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) will say that that shows the grave extent of the evil. I say no. I say that it shows that in both of those provinces there is a great number of people who are anxious to go to the races and who think there is nothing wrong in doing so; and the higher revenue derived by both provinces appeals to the people although a great number of people do not approve of it. Why should this parliament pass legislation that would impose restrictions on that mass of people? Let the anti-betting apostles work in their own respective territories. Let them go to every province where public opinion is behind them, and they will meet with immediate success. But where public opinion is against them, as we know it is in at least two of the great provinces, why should they ask this parliament to impose the unwanted legislation on an unwilling people?

That is my view. I will not vote in this House to impose on the people of Ontario and of British Columbia legislation that they do not want, which I do not consider federal in character, and which involves a question that the provinces might well decide for themselves. I say that the prohibition of race track betting is that class of legislation. It may come under the federal authorities through the criminal code, but as far as this particular matter is concerned, I say it would be better to let every province decide for itself the question whether it should be abolished or not. Referring to the two amendments, I did not hear the discussion on the first amendment, but I know its contents, and I will be very candid in giving my viewpoint. It is not proposed to sidetrack the question at all. The effect is simply that, instead of plain abolition, as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) desires we propose a form of better control, That is the way I understand it.

Mr. GOOD: If the amendment carries, would it not prevent the House voting on the question that I propose?

Mr. RINFRET: I cannot see it that way at all, but if my hon. friend wants to carry the main motion, there is only one thing for him to do, namely vote against the amendment. That is the way I understand it, and I am very frank about it. As far as I am concerned I am going to vote against the subamendment, as I think it has been introduced to confuse the issue and sidetrack it. I may say that that horse is out of it; it has fallen at the three-quarters.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the amendment?

Mr. RINFRET: I am coming to that. I will vote for the amendment for two reasons, first, because I believe in the amendment and not in the main motion, and secondly, because we should be consistent. I hope parliament will be consistent and adopt the amendment.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): I have heard the argument submitted by my hon. friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret). There are many members on my own side of the House for whom I have great respect. One is the hon. member for St. James, and another, is my hon. friend from Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll). But when we are placing upon the statute book of this country prohibitory legislation, then I think my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) has introduced a first-class piece of legislation, and I hope as a result of his resolution a law will be placed on the statute book. It is a great thing that we on this side of the House, led by my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King), can afford to disagree among ourselves on a matter of great public interest. The hon. member for Brant is introducing into this House a very important piece of legislation, and has argued forcibly I think in support of it. The hon. member for St. James has presented a good argument from his standpoint; but we are not getting fair racing as a result of the legislation that exists to-day. It is all very well to say that if we endeavour to put restrictions upon the racing of horses we are going to prevent the breeding of good horses in Canada. That is not the case. There is not a member of this House—not even the hon. member for Brant—who is against horse racing. I do not think he would say he is against it, but what he is opposed to is the fact that there is an organized system in this country of cheating the people at races. That is all there is to it. You go to a horse race and what do you find? You look at the odds. You have twenty to one shots and you have thirty to one shots; you have a certain horse which is placed at two to one, a second horse at certain odds, a third horse at certain odds, and I am very much convinced of the fact that there is some person who knows exactly what horse is going to win. That is what I think the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) is trying to prevent. He is not trying to prohibit good old-fashioned, honest horse racing which many of us have been accustomed to seeing. In the winter-time we could go to our pond or to our river and we could see farmers bringing out their horses. We could all subscribe a certain amount of money to furnish prizes for those horses, first, second and third. The passing of the resolution of my hon. friend does not prevent that. The same thing happens in the summer-time. You can go to a race track and you can subscribe prizes and witness a genuine horse race. That is the sort of horse race that encourages the breeding of horses in this country, but when we get back to the organized system of gambling legalized by parliament it is absolutely wrong. That is the reason I oppose it at the present time. I do not believe in prohibition in anything. I believe we were given by the Great Divine Creator a certain amount of reasonable intelligence, but this reasonable intelligence should not be permitted to be used in excess for the purpose of the aggrandizement of certain people of the country in order to make money at the expense of other people. For that reason I intend to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Brant, much as I respect the hon. member for St. James.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) provides in his constituency two tracks for horse racing on Lulu island, and from my constituency come frequently several thousands of people to fill the grandstands. It may be said that I would be embarrassed by either the motion or one of the several amendments, but I am not. The resolution in question is a straight issue whether we are for or against horse racing as it is carried on in Canada to-day under the law. To support the resolution means without question the elimination of horse racing in Canada, excepting in the small meets where these prizes referred to by the last speaker (Mr. Martell) are put up. To oppose the resolution would have the appearance of supporting a special privilege for public gambling protected by the Criminal Code of Canada. That is according to the wording of the resolution and I do not favour such an idea. The amendment deals with an entirely different phase of the question. It does not go to the principle of horse racing, whether it be good, bad or indifferent, but it goes to an abuse which I believe, is accepted by all thinking citizens of this country as being an abuse to be eradicated. The amendment to the amendment really reverts again to the main motion involving the principle of horse racing in Canada.

In this particular discussion, I do not consider that I am called upon to express my personal opinion. Personally, I am not much interested in horse racing, if you judge interest from the point of view of attendance. I believe my duty here to-day is to express the will of the majority of the people in my constituency and, as far as I can, of the majority of the people in British Columbia. Members from other parts of Canada will speak for their particular sections. British Columbia has considered this matter in a legislative way. The provincial legislature made quite a careful inquiry into the question of horse racing, its advantages, its disadvantages, its abuses, and all the merits and demerits attributable to this particular enjoyment. Representations were heard from all public bodies for and against horse racing. The owners and those interested in the tracks and horses appeared before a committee of the legislature and the people at large placed their views before that body. After very careful consideration of the question extending over a lengthy period of time, the provincial legislature arrived at a decision which was in the nature of a compromise. They reduced the days of horse racing in British Columbia from seventy-two to forty-four; a very large majority of the members of the provincial legislature agreed to that legislation, and it has become the law of that province as regards horse racing. The motion of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) would seek to impose upon the provincial legislature of British Columbia the super-authority of the Parliament of Canada on the self-same problem which that province has considered and decided upon. In that regard the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) expresses my view. The people of one province may think one way and the people of another province may think another. It is not good policy for this parliament to seek to undermine the decision of a province by legislating on the same principle indirectly through the Criminal Code instead of by direct legislation. The people of British Columbia through their representatives in the provincial legislature having decided upon this question, I believe as a matter of policy that hon. members from British Columbia should be guided by that decision rather than by their personal will and judgment.

I do not propose to say anything on the moral aspect of the question. I would, however, point out that in some speeches to-day the extremes of the gambling side and also the extremes of the raising of good race horses have been put before this House. In my judgment, in horse racing there is an element of both judgment and chance. It is not gambling in the sense that lotteries are gambling as you find them in France and in many other countries. Business men in almost every activity in life engage in gambling from the time they step into their office until they leave, if the element of chance is to become the determining factor plus the element of judgment. When our friends from the prairies sell their crop of wheat in the fall—and perhaps many of them are hedging or selling short or long at the present time on wheat—there is in that far more element of chance than element of judgment. The element of judgment is more prevalent and there is greater opportunity for exercising it in horse racing than there is on a wheat market especially as it has been during the last few weeks. It is not, however, my intention to elaborate on that point. As I say, the legislature of British Columbia having decided this question after hearing all parties interested, I do not propose to aid by my vote a motion which seeks to superimpose upon British Columbia the will of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, we seem to have got into a tangle through the motion, the amendment and the amendment to the amendment. I may say, before I go any further, that I intend to vote for the amendment to the amendment. I will vote against the amendment, and if both are defeated, I will vote for the resolution. I listened with a good deal of interest to the speech delivered by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret). He made a very clever argument, but in my opinion he started from a wrong premise. He started on the assumption that betting was right in itself, and consequently all his argument was built upon a false foundation. I agree, however, with the sentiment that, perhaps, in modern times we are too fond of legislation. I think I repeated the phrase the other day, "Anxious for legislation but impatient of law". And that I think is a weakness of modern civilization; we are too anxious, generally speaking, to tie ourselves up with laws. In this particular case however, I look upon the matter in an entirely different light. There are questions that are fundamentally moral, and of course I admit the right of everyone to judge for himself so far as that is concerned. But in the matter of betting I do believe that this practice, as I know it to be carried on, is immoral in principle, and therefore I can do nothing else conscientiously than vote against the legalizing of what I regard as a moral wrong.

It has been suggested that some in this House are against horse racing, but I do not think that this is so. After all, what is a horse race? It is simply an effort on the part of one animal to outspeed another in a set race, and so far as I have had any experience of horse racing it has always struck me as being not so much a question of speed as a matter of fairness and honesty on the part of the riders, and also of the closeness of the contest. How much difference does it make in a race unless you have a stop watch? The trouble with modern racing is that it is not conducted as a test of the speed of horses but merely as a means of settling bets, and that is what destroys horse racing as a sport. Now, I want to say a few words about sport, for I think that sport is one of the finest things in human life. And that is a broad statement to make. I like to see sport among young people, and there is no better phrase we have to-day than the one we use when we speak of playing the game. What does "playing the game" mean? It means playing fair; and in the school yard, in the large arena of sports generally, one of the finest things in Canada to-day is the fact that everyone wants to see sport carried on fairly. We admire those who when they win can take victory with humility and those who when they lose can look upon defeat with courage. That is the kind of thing we call sport. I wonder how many members in this House will say that racing as it is conducted to-day is in reality what we can call clean sport? Conscientiously speaking, I do not think it can be so described. Rather, judging by what I have seen of racing, I am inclined to think, as one hon. member has already said to-night, that often it is known beforehand what horse is going to win. This would not be so if it were not for betting.

As to the argument that horse racing is necessary to encourage the breeding of good horses, I would dwell on that point for a moment. I have had some little experience in my early years in the raising of race horses and I know something about thoroughbreds. Let me tell hon. gentlemen that no one can afford to breed a racehorse unless he is a very wealthy man; and I will say why.

Mr. CARROLL: Or unless he has a good horse.

Mr. FORKE: Wait a minute and let me explain; I know what I am talking about this time at any rate. I can speak about running horses; I am not referring now to harness horses. I know, that when you breed horses for racing purposes you may breed about twenty colts, or even fifty, before you get one that will win a race. On the other hand, when you raise a horse for harness purposes, for working in the field, even though he may have some blemish or may be weak in some spots he can always be sold for what he is worth. When you raise a running horse, however, unless he is speedy and without blemish, he is likely of not much account for anyone. And there is the difficulty in producing racehorses. So that horse racing, if it is to be conducted as a clean sport, will always be undertaken largely by wealthy people. The other sort of racing that has been alluded to in this House to-night, that is to say, racing at country fairs and local meets, and events of that sort, is, I think, about the cleanest and best sport we can find in the country in connection with what I would call legitimate horse racing.

Allusion has been made to-night to gambling in other respects than racing. Now, I come of a race which perhaps is just as fond of money as any other, but I for one do not want anything for nothing; I want to give value in return for any money I receive, no matter in what way I get it. And I sometimes think, when I have gone out to the races and have seen betting going on, that if the people who felt jubilant over their winnings could come face to face with some of those from whom they got their money, they would not be so happy after all. No one who has gone to the race course and watched some of the scenes that take place there, the heartburnings, the soreness and the disappointments, can feel much joy in any winnings he has made. Getting something for nothing will not tend to make anyone happy; you will find it a law of life that no happiness will come in any other way than in rendering some service, and I could never appreciate any money that I got from anyone for which I did not give value in return. I know that there is something in human nature that inclines us to take a chance, as we say. I believe the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) alluded to that fact. Well, do you not think that there is enough in human life in the way of taking chances without artificially manufacturing games of chance? It seems to me that when one takes a chance at legitimate work he endeavours to give some service to those around him, to do something for his family and for humanity. He may fail in his endeavours and lose in the fight, but at any rate his fight was honest, and his intention was rather to give some benefit in return for what he received. It needs courage to be a good gambler. You have heard of "poker face." I do not know anything about poker, but I do know that poker face is a mask that can hide the feelings that are behind. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but while I do not know anything about this form of activity, I do know that the man who has gone in for that sort of thing loses his feelings to a large extent; at any rate, he feels no sorrow for other people, as he probably would in other walks of life if he happened to make some success through another's misfortune.

I cannot agree to give betting a legal status. I know very well that you cannot make people moral by legislation; I admit that. I grant, too, that perhaps it is a wrong idea that you can make laws to keep everyone walking along the straight and narrow path. But when you find the government going out of its way in the Criminal Code to provide special legislation for one particular thing in this category, I am inclined to look upon it with suspicion and to wonder what the reason is for such legislation. There is a difference between gambling and what we may call speculation. Speculation may not always be right in itself, but it is quite different from gambling. I would remark to my hon. friends to my left, in this connection, that we in the west know what speculation really means. When the western farmer goes out and sows his seed in the spring he is speculating to a certain extent upon the harvesting of a crop. At the same time, he is not robbing anyone; he is trying to raise a crop that will be of value if he is successful. So you cannot compare the taking of a chance in that way with gambling.

Allusion has been made to-night to wheat gambling in the pit, on the grain exchange. Mr. Speaker, I am just as ready to condemn wheat gambling as I am to condemn horse gambling. I believe it is utterly wrong in principle and bad in practice. If any hon. member here had in his employ a young man who was speculating in futures or gambling on the race track he would not entrust him with very large sums of money, and that in itself, I think, is proof that there is something dangerous and wrong in the habit of gambling.

I do not intend to say anything more, because I do not think I can add anything to the arguments that have been presented here to-night. I do not want to set myself up as a Puritan. I know there are certain weaknesses in human nature and that if you attempt to tie people down too tight they will find an outlet in some other direction. But I do believe this thing is wrong in principle and that it should not be recognized by the government of this country; therefore I am prepared to vote for anything that will curtail what I consider to be an evil in itself.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the discussion which has taken place on the resolution offered by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). He proposes in that resolution entirely to eliminate horse racing as it is carried on in this country, for this reason: that it is well known that to carry on horse racing under present conditions, to offer the large purses that are given in connection with horse racing, there must be a source of revenue other than that which is derived from the gate. In that connection an added revenue is secured from the commission paid on the pari-mutuel machines. If we did not have this, then, we could not offer the large prizes that are at present given and we would be unable to secure the best horses in competition with the United States and therefore would not be able to put up the high quality of racing that is found on many of our tracks to-day.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): What is the commission charged, or what is the rake-off, on the pari-mutuels?

Mr. TOLMIE: That is all to be found in the criminal code—the different percentages that are charged. Ontario charges a tax of five per cent on what is taken in through the pari-mutuel machines.

With regard to the various amendments which have been offered, the sub-amendment, I think, is a rather ingenious one because after it patches up the amendment to a certain extent it remains with practically the same effect as the original resolution; it would cut out horse racing altogether. I do not propose to support that.

So far as the handbooks are concerned, there is no one interested in legitimate racing who does not wish to have handbooks wiped out entirely. It is a fact that in the city of Ottawa to-day and in every prominent city in the whole of Canada—the same is true of the United States—you can go down town any day and bet on a race at Tia Juana, Mexico; Miami, Florida, or Lexington, Kentucky, where races are being conducted at the present time. That is the sort of thing that the person who wishes to gamble has access to every day, and it is a very injurious thing. It is quite different on the race track, where racing is continued only for a very short time, a week or ten days in the spring, perhaps, and then no more opportunities until the following fall. That, I repeat, is a quite different thing from the handbook system.

As I said a moment ago, it is utterly impossible to conduct racing on a high scale without a certain amount of betting. Betting on horse races is permitted in every part of the British Empire. The hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Woods) this afternoon called attention to the fact that we should bring up our young people in this country as well as possible. I quite agree with him on that point, as well as on many of the other points he brought out in regard to the moral phases of the question. But I would ask him this: Can we expect to bring our young people up any better than the young people of Great Britain are being brought up, where they have carried on horse racing for hundreds of years, and where, indeed, pure bred horses really originated?

As to the estimate of the amount of money bet on race tracks, you will see statistics which, it is alleged, show that $36,000,000, $50,000,000 and up was bet in one year, with the additional statement that the most of this money went to the United States. But what evidence is there that this has taken place? How can you tell how much new money has actually been bet? You can go to the race track here at Connaught Park with a two dollar bill and if you are fairly lucky you may come home with your two dollar bill after the seven races are run. Or you may make a little money, or you may lose your two dollar bill on the first race. It is a very difficult matter to estimate the amount of new money that is wagered on an occasion like that.

As to the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), he is a brother British Columbian. He has distinguished himself in his knowledge of law; he has distinguished himself in this House in his knowledge of sockeye salmon. He proved himself some years ago to be a very great lacrosse player. But when it comes to horses he needs to take a night course in some school. I was very much astonished to hear him say there were no Canadian horses racing at the coast meetings; that a gang of fellows, blacklegs and others, came up from California and elsewhere, swept up all the money and then went out. Do not think for a minute that British Columbians are as easy as that. I know of several strings of Canadian horses that are racing at the coast. I know of horses from the big E.P. ranch south of Calgary, owned by the Prince of Wales. Horses are bred in the interior of British Columbia, horses bred at the coast, horses that come from my own town of Victoria, are competing in these races on the mainland and on the island.

An. hon. MEMBER: Do they win?

Mr. TOLMIE: Win? Certainly, they get their share. With regard to the nature of the racing carried on there, I feel that the hon. member is rather too severe in his criticism. I quite agree with the action of the British Columbia government, however, in regulating the racing rather than introducing legislation such as we are considering here to-night, which has for its object the utter elimination of racing. We know that racing has been carried on for many years in Great Britain, in Australia and in New Zealand under careful regulations and that it is under those conditions one of the cleanest sports that you could have anything to do with. In British Columbia they have cut down the number of days' racing from seventy-two to forty-four, on the ground that seventy-two was too much, and I agree with them.

We have heard a good deal of criticism regarding this racing business; let us look for a moment at the other side of the question, and deal with some points that have not yet been touched on to any great extent. In the first place, racing is one of the most popular sports, properly conducted. Let me say that I have not one dollar invested in any race horse or any race track. I am speaking on this question as I do because I feel that the people should be allowed to judge for themselves to a certain extent; that they should not be legislated around in their daily life as we are trying to do in connection with some other matters.

This sport of racing is backed up by a very important and growing industry, that of horse breeding. It is proposed to wipe this out entirely. When we realize that during the year 1924 there were in our country no less than 2,000,000 patrons of race tracks it will readily be seen that there is some force in the suggestion of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) that this is a big country and that we should consider all the people and their wishes in matters of this kind. It is estimated that only 75 per cent of the people who go to a race track bet on the races through the machines. There are many others who do not go to the machines at all, but pass the hat around, form a pool and do a little betting, but 25 per cent, it is estimated, do not bet on the races at all, but simply go there for the pleasure of looking on. This betting on racing, taken on the whole, I feel is not done by the average visitor to the race track for the purpose of getting rich, for the purpose of making money, but rather for the purpose of an added thrill to the interest in the races. A party of four or five will go out and put in the afternoon making small bets, such as $2 on a race, have an enjoyable time, compare their winnings and losses on the way home and it adds considerable interest to the afternoon's sport.

There is one other very interesting feature in connection with race track betting, and that is that whereas when the pari-mutuel system was first introduced larger sums were bet to a very great extent; nowadays on many of the big tracks it has been found necessary to remove many of the big betting machines, and there has been a very much greater demand for the smaller or two-dollar bets, indicating that people are not betting to make money on the races but to give an added interest to the afternoon's sport.

We have at least $6,000,000 invested in race tracks in this country. It is proposed by the resolution before us to wipe out this investment entirely, to make it perfectly worthless. Ontario derives a revenue of something like $4,000,000 a year from her race tracks. This is a very important revenue. They charge $7,500 a day on the mile tracks, and $2,500 a day on the smaller tracks. In addition, there is an amusement tax, and in addition to that five per cent of the amount of the money that goes through the machines also goes to the province.

There is another very important phase to this question, one that is sneered at sometimes by those who are perhaps not as well informed, and that is the important part that racing plays in connection with the breeding of horses, particularly the thoroughbred horse, the hunter and the saddle horse. We have horse breeding establishments in Canada extending from Quebec to the Pacific coast. Perhaps the most prominent is the E.P. ranch south of Calgary, owned by the Prince of Wales, where he has established a first class stud of thoroughbred horses. These breeding establishments vary from those owning a single mare to other establishments where there is an investment of half a million dollars. My good friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressives, a few moments ago suggested that the breeding of thoroughbred horses was a very precarious thing. I will admit that. The breeding of any kind of a horse is a precarious thing, for any horse might be unsound; it might be born unsound, or suffer from a blemish later on which will greatly reduce its value, but if you are breeding and have established a stud of horses, very carefully selected, you can get rid of your stock without expending a single dollar on training at all, simply by selling them on their pedigree, on the results of what their sires and dams have done, and what the offspring of these particular animals have been able to do on the track. If you have good stock, you will always find a ready sale for them.

I may say that over $2,000,000 in purses was divided among the race horse owners in Canada during the past year. It has been suggested by some of the speakers that nearly all of this money went to the United States.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

It may perhaps be of interest to you to know that of all the stables that raced in Canada last year the two largest winners were Canadian stables, one of which won between $90,000 and $100,000. That was just simply in purses, or what was offered by the race track owner. At the Woodbine track in Toronto, $70,000 was offered in purses to Canadian breeders. Only horses bred in Canada were permitted to compete in these races. In addition to that, they have offered special prizes to the breeder of the winners of some of these big races, with the result that one man located in Ontario who owned only one thoroughbred mare produced a winner in one of these races and was promptly handed a cheque by the Ontario Jockey Club for $500 as an encouragement to go on and breed more good horses. The Ontario Jockey Club, composed of four different associations, have rendered a very valuable service to the horse breeders in this country inasmuch as they have spent a lot of money in the importation of first-class thoroughbred stallions from the Old Country. These animals are rendering excellent service in the improvement of live stock in this country, and all this is carried on absolutely at their own expense. In adition to that, they have offered a number of prizes to horses shown at the various exhibitions. You will all understand that in producing a first-class saddle horse or high class hunter, you must have a thoroughbred cross in order to get that fineness of quality so much desired in the fine saddle horse or hunter. From the purebred you get speed and stamina, the ability to travel over rough country, take high fences and water jumps at a good speed, and at the same time be able to go the distance; and in no other way can you get it.

The United States government, recognizing the value of improving the quality of hunters and saddle horses, is spending $250,000 in assisting in that work. The breeding of the thoroughbred horse has been taken up to a considerable extent by the states in the south, particularly in Kentucky, California and some other states, but it is from Great Britain that the very best horses come. It is to Great Britain that owners from the Argentine, the United States and other parts of the world go when they wish to secure fresh blood of high class quality. They have built up a big industry in both these countries I have mentioned, and also in Australia, where they pay thousands of dollars for horses. We shall find conditions in Canada just as good when racing is as well regulated as it is in these other countries, and we shall have an excellent market here for the raiser of pure-bred horses.

While, as I have pointed out, the effect of the resolution before us to-night would be to destroy absolutely horse racing in Canada for the reasons that I have already given you, it is interesting to know that my good friend from Brant has not introduced into his resolution anything to overcome gambling in the wheat pit or on the stock exchanges, or gambling over the bridge table which takes place in every city of Canada from one end to the other every night. If you are invited to a bridge game in any recognized house, and you will not play for money, that will be the last invitation you get.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mah Jongg, too.

Mr. TOLMIE: There is nothing in the resolution about those handbooks that are doing so much harm all over this country from one end to the other. If you are going to wipe out gambling, let us get together and be consistent and wipe it all out at once. I have here a little clipping taken from a paper in Florida in which Clarence Darrow, a well known lawyer in the United States makes a few remarks in regard to racing.

Mr. MARTELL: Have you got the opinion there of Mr. Calder, of Montreal, with regard to Mr. Darrow?

Mr. TOLMIE: I will just give you this first, and take a chance on Mr. Darrow later.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Calder will be with you on this.

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Darrow says:

I have greatly enjoyed visiting the track. Most people come to Miami to be amused, and I know of no better source of amusement, and I am glad, for one, that the visitors here have an opportunity of seeing the races. The few people who hold out objection to racing always remind me amusingly of the story of why the Puritans abolished bear-beating—not because it was cruelty to the bear, but because it was pleasure to the onlookers. And I thought the modern American was ahead of that feeling.

It's funny, the trend of the mind. A lot of people seem to think that a bet on a horse race is a sin, and never stop to think that practically everything in life is a gamble. One is encouraged to buy real estate on the chance that the value will go up, or to take a chance on the price of grain or stocks and bonds rising, and no one thinks anything of it, and yet there is no comparison as to the amount of money lost or won.

All business involves a large element of gambling One buys something in order to sell again at a profit, with no certainty that such will be the case. Practically all one's life is a gamble. In fact, if the speculative element were removed there would be little left to live for. That is life.

I do not believe that we can remedy the situation by eliminating horse racing altogether. That would be a very sad result, particularly in a country like this where there are so many British born people with whom this pastime is so extremely popular. I think that in order to meet the whole situation as we find it there should be, not only with respect to horse racing but as regards many of the other lines which I have mentioned, a real campaign of education in which the churches should take a very active part and that we should receive the support of the people who are in favour of carrying on that work.

The resolution would wipe out betting on horse racing altogether; it would wipe out the races, but it would not stop the handbook gambling that is taking place every day. I feel that it would be much better to have what betting we have carried on in this country, if the law is strictly carried out, and to have that betting out in the open as we find it on our race tracks and under proper supervision, than to have it carried on in the dark as is the case with handbook betting. Personally I am strongly in favour of the strictest regulations being applied; you will not find any friend of regular racing who desires to encourage in any way anything improper on a race track. Every one of these persons feels that if racing is to be sustained in this country it must be carried on on the square and out in the open, and I am a very strong supporter of that feeling. In Australia and Great Britain this has been accomplished for a number of years, and by the exercise of a little intelligence and a careful application of our laws we can get the same result in this country.

In Victoria city, which I have the honour to represent, we had a plebiscite on racing in 1922. The vote went in favour of racing by two to one, and a mayor who had been in office during the previous year, and who was strongly opposed to racing, was sent home at the next election with a majority of three thousand against him. I may say that in that city we cater to the tourist trade to a very great extent, and that other legitimate amusements that we can provide there provide added attractions in our city for these tourists. As for the legislation recently passed in British Columbia for the regulation of racing I am heartily in favour of it. I think it is a move in the right direction. I do not believe we can get any good results by putting on the prohibition suggested by the resolution. We know that in the case of the prohibition of liquor, both in the United States and in this country, it has failed to a very great extent in many places. It is by a campaign of education that we shall get good results rather than by adopting the spirit of the resolution which we are considering this evening.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): I rise in the first place for the purpose of defining, if I can, the issue, and secondly for the purpose of making my own position clear in connection with the various and embarrassing amendments now before the House. Many of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, including the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), seemed to be entirely off the track so far as the issue is concerned. The issue, as I understand it, is not whether or not betting shall be prohibited; the question is whether or not commercialized betting shall be prohibited. The criminal code does not prevent, nor does my hon. friend the member for Brant (Mr. Good) seek to prevent, betting between two individuals who go to the race track and have their bets. If I understand the hon. member for Brant aright, that is not his purpose at all. The law now does not prohibit individuals betting with each other, any more than the law prohibits people from playing bridge with each other as the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) has suggested. The law does not prohibit gambling, if you want to call it so, of that kind, unless it is carried on in a common gaming house—unless there is somebody making a profit out of it other than the players themselves. The same situation exists, as I understand it, in regard to betting. The law prohibits commercialized betting but it does give a special privilege to racing associations. Personally I am against privilege of every kind, whether it be that privilege to violate the law that is now reserved for the betting associations, whether it is a privilege which is given by means of a protective tariff, or whether it is a privilege given in any other direction. And so I say to hon. gentlemen who seem to think this is a matter of trying to stop betting that they are shooting entirely beside the mark, because that is not the question at all.

So far as the resolution is concerned I am heartily in accord with the hon. member for Brant; I shall vote yea on that motion. But now the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) comes along and he proposes something with which, on one phase alone, I am in hearty accord also. His amendment has two horns to it. By one he proposes to wipe out the resolution itself. To that extent I am opposed to his amendment. In the second place he desires to institute some measure which will eliminate the hand-book evil so-called. To that extent I am in hearty agreement with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Skeena, and consequently I find myself confronted with this situation on the amendment—part I am in agreement with, and part I differ with. Under the circumstances I must necessarily vote against the amendment although I admit frankly there is a portion of it with which I am in sympathy. I trust that if the amendment is rejected by the House the Minister of Justice will not take that as a mandate from the House not to introduce the amendment which he proposes to the criminal code for the purpose of eliminating the hand-book evil.

Now with regard to the sub-amendment. The sub-amendment proposes to restore the situation so far as the resolution is concerned and seeks, by a rather ingenious method I think, to bring before this House the original issue which was presented to it by the hon. member for Brant. I think it is unfortunate that by this trick of fortune the House is prevented from passing its judgment on the main issue which is now before it—I think it is an unfortunate thing. I do not suppose for a single moment that the hon. member for Skeena intended that should be so, but nevertheless that is the actual situation—we are prevented and effectually prevented by the terms of the amendment—if we desire to support the amendment with which some of us at least are partly in favour—from expressing our opinions on the original resolution. Therefore as far as I am concerned I shall vote for the sub-amendment. If it carries and is tacked on to the amendment I shall have to vote for it. If the sub-amendment does not carry I shall vote against the amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to remind my hon. friend from St. James that I am on the track this time. If the amendment standing by itself does not carry and I have the opportunity of voting on the original resolution I shall vote in the affirmative.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): I would like to define my position on the subject before the House at the present time. I also feel myself in rather an embarrassing position, because there is a part of the amendment which I would like to support. Yet at the same time I also feel that I would have liked to have given my vote in favour of the original motion. I am not so charitable as the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) when he suggests that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) brought this motion before the House not thinking it was going to put the original motion out of the way. So far as I am concerned, it seems to me as if it was a deliberate action to prevent the motion going before this House; and for that reason I am sorry that he has confounded the issue as he has done. The hon member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) says there is an element of gambling in all things. Perhaps that is true. He says "there is gambling in politics, and perhaps in the near future some of us will realize that politics is a gamble." I quite agree with him, and his side of the House will also realize that it is a gamble. It may be a gamble for people who are entering into politics, but it is a bigger gamble for the people of Canada who place men in parliament and expect them to pass reforms for the upbuilding of the country and welfare of the people, and also expect them to carry out resolutions and pledges that they gave to the people some years ago. My hon. friend from Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) said we should not support the measure of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) because of the great number of British people that are in this country. I think the British people can speak for themselves. I should like my hon. friend to speak as a Canadian and not throw the blame on the British subjects who have come to this country. It is only a few days since the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) deplored the fact that people who come to this country were speaking in regard to a certain constitutional issue and said if anyone was entitled to speak on that matter, it was the Canadians and not the people who have come from other countries; for that reason they both take different issues.

I want to speak for a moment or two with regard to race track gambling. The hon. member from Victoria City endeavoured to show the benefits that would accrue as a result of permitting horse racing and betting at the same time. It seems to me his argument is equivalent to this, that without betting there is not sufficient interest in horse racing to make it worth while. If that is the position, then the sooner horse racing is abolished the better. If you have to depend on the weakness of individuals in order to make horse racing a success, then the sooner it is eliminated from our national sport the better. So far as hockey, soccer football and other sports are concerned, which I delight in and love to witness, it is not the betting on the games that I enjoy. If there is such a thing as intrinsic value in sport, it is the play, the manliness of the players and the skill that they put into these things that make it worth while, and I have no doubt that if the pari-mutuel machines were eliminated horse racing would still go on. There is enough of the spirit of the sportsman in our country to induce our British and Canadian people to go to the races for the real love of seeing good honest, clean horse racing.

There is another feature in regard to this betting, and I believe every member in this House knows of it: that wherever you find betting permitted, whether on horse racing or other sports. there is always a certain element that goes along with the betting coming from different parts of this and other countries, which is not always desirable in the interest of good citizenship. The authorities recognize that this element is coming along, and therefore police forces are provided, and they have to take special precautions to safeguard the public at the races. For that reason it would seem to me that if we could eliminate betting this class of undesirables would not be found at the race track.

We have been told that there is an element of gambling in all things; there is an element of gambling in buying and selling wheat. I may say that, so far as western Canada and the growers of wheat are concerned, there is an organized and systematic effort through the wheat pool to eliminate that evil, by eliminating gambling on the grain exchange. This wheat gambling is not done by the men who grow wheat to any large extent. It is done by people who are endeavouring to manipulate the market from outside. As far as the average individual is concerned, there may be a speculative feature in growing wheat, but it is for an honest purpose, to supply the needs of humanity and to furnish food. You cannot say that the element of betting and gambling at a race track is for the purpose of improving the race or of benefiting the people at large. For that reason, I think it is well for the people of Canada to realize that it is a very significant fact that the people who are in power at the present time have side-stepped the issue that has come from the churches and the great moral forces of this country for the elimination of race track gambling. It is just as well for the people to understand that there is always an element of gambling in sending men into our legislative bodies to interpret the wills of people. The people have spoken with no uncertain sound. But we find very little has been done. I say that 170 people were elected in this country on a free trade basis, and they were expecting that as a result there would be a lowering of the tariff and that there would be economic administration, but they have gambled on a hundred to one chance and very little has been done.

The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) stated that two years ago parliament voted in no uncertain way on this matter, that there was a majority of twenty against the proposition, and that we have not changed. You do not know whether we have changed or not. We never stand still in Canada so far as this corner of the House is concerned. We are going forward and onward. It may be that the reactionaries think things are at a standstill. But in Canada the Progressive party believe in going forward, and for that reason, my hon. friends themselves will realize that they are also being weighed in the balance, and if in the balance of public opinion they are found wanting, they will realize that the Canadian people may be played with for a certain time and hoodwinked into believing in pledges. But it is only in action that we get the things that we want done, and when the people of Canada have spoken with no uncertain sound through the churches and the moral, social and reform councils, I think it is time for us as the representatives of the people, for that is what we are in the final analysis, to do as the people desire. Therefore, if I have the opportunity I will vote for the amendment to the amendment, and if the two amendments are got out of the way, I will give my vote for the original motion.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): On the majority of occasions in this chamber I like to be ranked with those who give a silent vote, when that vote is not ambiguous and has the meaning simply of an ordinary vote. In such cases I for one am content to let it pass; but with this unusual and strange mixture of amendments following a motion, one is under the risk of being misunderstood by merely casting a bare and unexplained vote. I have received representations too many and too important upon this question to allow myself to be under any such misunderstanding to-night. At the outset of my remarks which, I will say for the relief of all, will be very brief, I do not see any need of throwing any shadow of bad faith upon the amendment or the amendment to the amendment any more than upon the motion itself, which I accept from the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) as entirely one of the utmost good faith. It is unfortunate that we are in something of a complexity, almost phenomenal, as respects the order of the amendments that have been offered. There is no attempt at dissimulation in the matter, because the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork), who moved the amendment, very frankly supported the pari-mutuel at the race tracks. I cannot agree with him as to the justice or equity of allowing that state of affairs to go on. I voted a couple of sessions ago with the position of the hon. member for Brant. I do not know that there was any great wisdom in the question being repeated in the same terms; but now that it is repeated, I have only one duty and it is the same duty which my conscience told me to follow then. The hon. member for Skeena appeared to argue in favour of the pari-mutuels on their merits. I could not follow him in that, and he wished to summon to his aid Lord Rosebery, reasoning from the analogy of his conduct in England that he was impliedly a supporter of the pari-mutuel in Canada. The hon. member cited three great ambitions of Lord Rosebery. One was that he wished to marry the wealthiest woman in England, second, that he wished to have the fastest horse at the Derby in England, and third that he wished to be Prime Minister of England. I do not think any intelligent critic, writing a life of Lord Rosebery, could cite those three things or any one of them to his credit, but he would rather put that down as a weakness on the part of Lord Rosebery. If he had for his particular ambition to marry the richest woman in England, or to have the fastest horse, I think his third ambition to be Prime Minister of England would probably proceed from the motive of vaulting, personal ambition rather than from any really sincere desire to serve his country.

I am told that the amendment would banish far more evil than would the motion itself. That may possibly be so, and I am told that the newspapers coming over from the United States and publishing the tips, selections and information on races in various other parts of the continent for the year round, produce far more betting than the pari-mutuel machines for the few weeks they are conducted on Canadian soil. Even if that be true, the fact is that the government have nothing like the direct responsibility for the former that they have for the latter, for in the latter, as they take about a million dollars and give it, I believe, to the government of Ontario, I consider that the administration becomes very directly an interested partner in the institution of betting itself. I have little to add. I am going to support the amendment to the amendment as being the nearest approach which lies before me to help the hon. member for Brant in repeating the ambition that he had two or three sessions ago. If that fails, I shall take the same course seriatim as has already been indicated by those who are allied with my belief in this matter.

Mr. L. J. LOVETT (Digby and Annapolis): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate; but owing to the complications that now surround the question under discussion in the form of a main motion, an amendment and an amendment to the amendment, I find myself in a very embarrassing position in regard to my vote. For instance, supposing I wish to vote for the main motion, naturally I will vote against the amendment and the amendment to the amendment. But if the amendment to the amendment or the amendment carries, I would be debarred from voting for the main motion. Therefore, the only course open to me is to place myself fairly on record as being in favour of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). If I have an opportunity I shall certainly vote for that resolution, and in doing so I feel I shall be carrying out the wishes and desires of a majority of the people whom I have the honour to represent.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, the nature of this subject compels me, almost against my inclination at the present time, to say a few words. I have been interested in ethical questions a great proportion of my life, and it does not disturb me
10 p.m. very considerably to see the difference of opinion that has developed in this debate. The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), I think, drew attention to the difference of viewpoint there is in a country like ours on a matter of this kind. That is a very significant point to draw attention to. I believe on questions of this kind there is the need for a large degree of mutual toleration. We are in a position where we are apt to get in exceedingly wrong with each other unless we do exercise the utmost degree of toleration, because the differences in viewpoint are extremely divergent and fundamental. I listened some days ago to the arguments presented on the other side of the House against divorce. They were not arguments that appealed to my way of thinking; but nevertheless I listened to them with great respect, because apart altogether from their intrinsic merit, they impressed me with the thought that in this country, whether one way or another, the great mass of the people are intensely interested in social ethics; that is, we are all keenly interested in the moral advance of Canada. I think that fact, when we rightly apprehend it, ought to take from our minds any undue degree of disturbance at the thought that we are so much apart in our views. As long as we keep the main fact before our minds there is a hope that some day we shall approximate in our views as to what is best for our country in these respects. We can readily see how easily we get adrift and out of our depth. The hon. member for St. James, I think, said that this thing is not wrong in itself. I wonder if the hon. member could tell me of anything that is wrong in itself. I doubt it. I hope he will pardon me for saying that that is an old woman's argument. I say that with the utmost deference both to the hon. member and to the old woman.

Miss MACPHAIL: Why not an old man's argument?

Mr. RINFRET: I was going to rise and protest myself. I wish I had the wisdom of some women.

Mr. BIRD: I expressed my deference and I also offer my apology to the old woman.

An hon. MEMBER: In this House?

Mr. BIRD: I am afraid I am treading unwittingly on very thin ice. However, I know a great many elderly ladies of my acquaintance who would hesitate to use that argument. When I think of that argument I am reminded of certain things that are seemingly bad and really bad in themselves. Take for instance a bad egg. A bad egg may perhaps be regarded as a very good brand of sulphuretted hydrogen; and one of our great English writers has said that the mud you scrape off your feet before you go indoors is a wonderful compound of elements that are simply marvellous in their crystalline beauty. But I like to look at these things in a commonsense way, and I call mud dirt and a bad egg a bad egg. Similarly, I believe that gambling is a degraded form of the sporting instinct of humanity. Let us call a spade a spade. I think, myself, that the collective conscience of mankind is gradually coming to see this matter in this way. The hon. member for St. James got a bad start, and perhaps he is a little behind in the race in this respect.

Mr. RINFRET: Make your bet.

Mr. BIRD: I am afraid we cannot avoid discussing this question from the standpoint of our personal views of what is right and wrong, because after all that depends on what is inherent in the member for St. James and in myself; the upbringing we have had, the culture that has been ours, determines in a large measure our habit of thinking in this regard. It is therefore not seeming in either of us to quarrel about that. But we can bring the question into another sphere where there is not, or where at least there ought not to be, so much controversy, and that is into the social sphere; and we can view it from the standpoint of the good or harm the practice of gambling does Canadian society, leaving the ethical side out of consideration. The thing may be right or wrong in itself, but is it right as regards the welfare of Canadian society, especially the rising generation? We can see the attitude that prevails here from certain remarks that have passed. One hon. gentleman says that you cannot make people holy by law. That is true. Again, however, if you look at it in a commonsense light, you cannot make a field grow a crop of wheat by putting a barbed wire fence around it; but you must have a fence if you want to grow wheat. And the same is true in the realm of social ethics; there are certain things you cannot do by law, but you must enact laws in order that they may be done. It is therefore beside the mark to say that you cannot make people good by law. I should be sorry to think that this was true, because I want to feel that a good many of our legal enactments are salutary and that their ultimate result is to give the people a chance to be as good as it is possible to be in a world of this kind. It is hard enough, God knows, for the average well educated person to achieve the highest under favourable circumstances. And while such a person may not need the shelter of legal enactments, there are a great many people in this world who are the better for it, if they can be sheltered in that way. The limb that is dislocated, as scripture says, needs a straight and smooth way in order that, after being set, it may not be disjointed again.

Leaving that aspect of the question, I would not attempt to deal with the economic side of it, as one hon. member to my right has done, in regard to the effect of gambling on the blooded horse. I should be as familiar in that sphere as he would be in the one I have just left. I mean no harm by that statement. There is no doubt that the blooded horse is an object of supreme beauty, and like all beautiful things it is one the passage of which we hate to see. But if this type of horse is to be degraded into a gambling machine the sooner its extinction comes about the better. Even President Coolidge does not think it a necessary part of his daily exercise.

[Mr. Bird.]

And if gambling is considered necessary, at all events we do not need to degrade the horse to that level. Our sentiment no doubt can be appealed to in this regard. Hon. members talk about the distinguished patronage under which gambling has always gone on, but I do not care into what associations you bring it; you may hang on it all the tinsel and the purple you like, you cannot make it better. It may be a game of nobles, but that does not make it a noble game. I felt, therefore, that I could not sit while this matter was being discussed without stating my point of view. As I said in the first place, it is unfortunate that our fundamental points of view should apparently be so divergent, but that should not unduly disturb us, so long as we are convinced, as I think we all are, that we are very much in earnest in our desire to maintain the moral standards of the country. I was reading the other day a pronouncement of a Roman Catholic bishop of Saskatoon regarding certain customs that are menacing the moral standards of Canada at the present time. When I read that I did not allow any instincts. I might have as a Protestant to rise and becloud my judgment in the matter; I rather allowed other feelings to prevail, and I felt a thrill of satisfaction that in this other great religious community in Canada there should be that earnestness for the maintenance of the moral standards of our beloved country.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): I am sorry I was not here earlier in the evening to hear the first part of the debate. If this resolution carries it means the elimination of horse racing, and if the amendment to the amendment is adopted the same result will ensue. The subamendment is only different in form. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we should take a broader view of matters of this kind which affect the liberties of the citizens of this great Dominion. We are only antagonising one element after another in the population when we enact laws of this kind, and I am entirely opposed to too many prohibitory enactments. This is another drastic law which only a small proportion of the citizens would respect, and consequently we should be unable to enforce it. I have lived in Toronto thirty-seven years, and although there is a race track within half a mile of my home I do not believe that I have been at race meetings thirty-seven times in my life. I have no interest in horse racing, because I can enjoy myself in bowling on the green or in curling on the ice. But I have friends who enjoy horse racing and whom I would not want to deprive of the right of going to a race track and enjoying a good race. I say that the liberties of the people are being encroached upon too far and I object to anything of this kind. I have very little to say on this subject except to express my hearty disapproval of the handbook evil. I think that if we could eliminate the handbook business and get rid of the gambling joints, thus discouraging the practice of betting in connection with races in the United States and other places outside of the country, we should have accomplished a great deal. That is as far as this House should go. I will not support the resolution and I will not support the amendment to the amendment, but I will vote for the amendment with a great deal of pleasure.

There is one word in the amendment that I do not quite understand. It speaks of prohibiting advertising. If that means the elimination of advertising in the daily papers that a race meet is to be held at Woodbine or Connaught Park or anywhere else, then I think it is going too far. Everything else, so far as I am concerned, in the amendment will suit me and I am going to give it my support.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, it having been my privilege to second this motion I think I should take advantage now of the opportunity of adding a few words to the debate.

I have sought to approach this question with an unbiased mind. Two years ago we had a debate on the same subject and on that occasion I voted for the motion proposing the abolition of race track betting. This year, after mature consideration, I have not changed my mind, and will give the motion of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) my unstinted support.

Now, I would not try to make this House believe that race track betting is a crime or a sin of the first magnitude. On the other hand, judging the question fairly and squarely as best I can, I have come to the conclusion that race track betting brings with it a considerable amount of evil and no good. Has it ever produced wealth, for instance? Not that I know of. Has it ever fostered happiness? Not that I know of. But we do know that a great many crimes have been committed by people who got themselves entangled in race track betting. Has it increased public morality? I submit it has not. I was greatly surprised to-night to hear my bosom friend, the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) say that betting is not a bad thing in itself. That is just where we come to the parting of the ways. In my opinion betting is bad in itself because it is an illegitimate way of acquiring property. Betting is bad in itself because it rests on the principle of the acquirement of property without labour, whereas we are taught that property can only be acquired —and this principle has prevailed from the time of creation—at the price of labour. Labour is the price, and he who acquires property without paying the price, is not, in my opinion, doing what is right. I will not make a comparison between the thief and the man who earns money through betting, but the fundamental principle is the same: the thief tries to acquire property in an illegitimate way, without labour. He will not work for it; he does not want to work for it; he wants to get it from the other fellow. The man who bets is trying to acquire property without working for it, without labour.

Mr. RINFRET: What is the difference between betting and investing money in real estate, without working at all, and making a profit on it the next year?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): That is an altogether different proposition.

Mr. RINFRET: It is the same thing.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): Of course you may cite cases such as the one mentioned by my hon. friend. It may be argued that when you acquire real estate and it increases in value you have gained something without labour; something has come to you as a gift from Providence. Quite true, but the cases are altogether different.

Mr. RINFRET: In what respect?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): They are altogether different, because the man who acquires property does so with an end in view; he acquires something tangible and pays for it. He acquires that property for the purpose of deriving a profit and of benefiting from it. He pays for something which is worth something. On the other hand the man who bets tries to get the other fellow's money for nothing. The man who bets does not do so with the intent of losing his money; he does so with the intent of receiving something for nothing.

There is an opinion very much stronger than mine on this subject, and it is the criminal code itself. I submit that the exception made in the criminal code whereby horse betting is permitted and declared legal while all other betting is declared illegal, is at once a challenge to common sense and logic. Why should betting be declared a crime in the criminal code in all cases except when it takes place on the race track or in connection with horse racing? This amendment was introduced into the criminal code in 1910 and 1912. I cannot see the logic of it. I cannot see what difference there is between race track betting and any other kind of betting. Yet section 235 of the criminal code provides:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to one year's imprisonment, and to a fine not exceeding $1,000, who—

And there is a full page of prohibitions which are in exactly the same category as race track betting, but the latter is made legal by law, subject to its being carried out under certain conditions. I submit I cannot see the logic of it.

Now, what is this betting? In view of the amendment made to the criminal code and of the results that obtain, I submit that this betting is nothing else than the exploitation of a credulous public under the benevolent eye of the law. People are protected by the law in the accomplishment of something which the law in a general way declares to be illegal. It is illegal for everybody else but them, and in order to make it legal for them an amendment had to be brought in to the criminal code. Again I say I cannot see the logic of it.

Now, gambling and betting are not new. The place where gambling is carried on to the greatest extent is probably at Monte Carlo. I have never had access to the books, but it is said that the revenues derived from the games at Monte Carlo amount to forty million francs a year. The most important game that is played there, is we all know, roulette. Now, what is roulette? Roulette is a game at which the owner plays against the public with an advantage of 2.7 per cent against the bettor; in other words, when you stake a dollar at roulette you are supposed to receive back a dollar less two cents and a fraction. That 2.7 is the percentage against the man who bets; nevertheless, with so small a percentage, the revenues of the Casino are 40,000,000 francs a year. It is not known that anybody ever made money playing roulette if he or she played long enough. You might win once or twice, or for a week or a month, but it is well known that no one has ever played roulette regularly season after season and come out a winner, because this small percentage makes it impossible for the player to win in the long run.

Now how about the percentage in this case. My hon. friend from Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) said that the percentage, according to the Criminal Code, was 5 per cent. I must admit that looking over the Criminal Code in a hasty way, I have not been able to find the percentage, but my information is that the rakeoff is on the average 10 per cent. Now if the rakeoff is 10 per cent, or even if it is only 5 per cent, how can the public ever hope to win at a game with such a rakeoff when no one can win at roulette where the rakeoff is only 2.7 per cent?

Answering my hon. friend from St. James, I do not know what the people here in Canada think, but I know that in the principality of Monte Carlo these games are considered so obnoxious that the people of the principality are forbidden to play them. They are not permitted to go into the Casino or elsewhere where these games are played, because the authorities have come to the conclusion that it is a bad thing for the people to play at odds of 2.7 per cent. Now if that is so in a country which has made gambling one of its main sources of revenue, would it not be so in Canada, where the percentage against the player is very much higher?

I have tried to inform myself as best I could as to the amount of money that has been wagered in Canada on horse betting through the pari-mutuels for the last three or four years, and my information is that in 1921 there was wagered the sum of $80,000,000; in 1922, $68,000,000; in 1923, $60,000,00, and in 1924, $60,000,000. Taking that last figure, if you wish, a rakeoff of 10 per cent on $60,000,000 represents $6,000,000 or if you take the first figure of $80,000,000, the rakeoff would be $8,000,000, which is taken from the pockets of the people of Canada. I have just said that it is practically impossible to win, but let us suppose that a few people do win. Has it ever profited anybody? Did you ever hear of anyone who had profited with money he won at the races? I never have. Money got easily is always spent easily; it is thrown away almost every time, and for the man who loses there is no way in which he can gain his money back.

Two years ago, rightly or wrongly it was noticed that I was one of the few members on this side of the House who had voted for a similar resolution. A few days afterwards, if I may be permitted this personal reference, I met on the train coming to Ottawa a very distinguished magistrate whose name I shall not mention now, but whose name I could give if necessary, who told me that in his career as police magistrate it had many times come to his knowledge that men, young and old, had been found guilty of embezzlement or theft just because they had spent money which was not their own at the races. These facts are well known. One has only to open books to find hundreds and hundreds of such cases; they are written in England, where betting is so common. From the United States, from practically all of the states which have passed anti-betting laws, people come to Canada, notwithstanding the opinion expressed by my hon. friend from Victoria City, to try and reap some good Canadian money.

It must be remembered that this motion has nothing to do with private betting. That has always been permitted, and remains permitted by this resolution. Neither does the resolution affect tracks on which there are no pari-mutuel machines; in fact, it does not affect tracks at all, but betting on the tracks. I wish to say emphatically that I am not against horse racing; in fact, I have not heard anyone declare here to-day that he was against horse racing.

An argument has been made against this resolution on the ground that it is an attempt against individual liberty. Well, Mr. Speaker, individual liberty is very much of a sophism and a fallacy. Individual liberty exists only within the limits of the law, and not beyond. Whenever anything is recognized as being unlawful or immoral by the law, individual liberty cannot go beyond that. Now this form of betting has been recognized as unlawful and immoral by the law, by article 235 of the Criminal Code, which was amended about 1910 or 1912. Will anyone tell me what has happened in the intervening years to make that which was declared immoral and unlawful at that time moral and lawful to-day? The principle is the same; it has not been altered. But certain strong influences succeeded in having the law amended. I do not wish to cast any reflections upon anyone, but surely what was immoral ten or fifteen years ago must be just as immoral to-day.

I do not want to speak at a greater length except to say a word or two on the amendment. Something rather unusual happened this afternoon when the ruling of the Chair was submitted to a vote of the House. Perhaps I was wrong but at the time I was not able to understand, any better than I am able to understand now, that the amendment as drafted should come as an amendment to the motion. That is the reason why I voted to have the amendment declared out of order. But this reminds me that there is something strange in our rules of procedure. A motion is placed on the order paper. Everybody has time to examine that motion and to study it. Then all of a sudden, while this motion is under discussion, the rules of the House permit a member to present an amendment to it. Immediately the amendment is offered the Chair is bound to decide whether or not it is in order. I submit that under the rules we have now that is an injustice to the Chair, because no matter how learned or how able the Speaker may be it is, in many cases, an injustice to have questions like this submitted to him for an immediate decision. It is also an injustice to members of the House, who are not all lawyers, who are not conversant with the intricacies of the law; and even if hon. members were thoroughly informed on the subject what could they do in a case like the one which occurred this afternoon? I was of the opinion that the amendment should not be allowed and, although I may be wrong, I have not changed my mind. I think the rules of procedure should be so framed that members would have an opportunity of examining and studying an amendment. There is this further fact to be considered: Hon. members do not read the amendment, it is read to them. Now I submit that under the rules of procedure of a court of justice in any city or in any country the counsel in a case should never be compelled to decide on an amendment to a document without having due opportunity to scrutinize it and study its effect and yet in this parliament we are, and I submit very illogically, often called to decide points like this.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What does my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I have no suggestion to offer at the present time. I submit this point for the consideration of the House in order that the committee which is to be appointed to revise the rules of the House may have an opportunity of studying it. The Minister of Justice, who is an eminent lawyer, understands perfectly the point I am making. He understands perfectly well how unfair it is for the Speaker first of all, and then for hon. members themselves, to have to decide upon the spot such a point as was submitted this afternoon.

Mr. PARENT: My hon. friend, I suppose, is aware that the Speaker can at any time postpone his decision until he is satisfied of the soundness of his opinion.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I know that but it is not practicable for the Speaker to suspend the sitting until he has made up his mind and is in a position to render a well considered decision. But if the Speaker can do it hon. members of the House are not afforded the necessary time and so we had to make up our minds this afternoon on the spot whether the amendment was in order. I submit that if the hon. member for Skeena means to support the main resolution he should not have presented this amendment. It is true that the amendment goes in the same direction as the resolution but as far as I can see if it is carried there can be no vote on the main motion which will then have been destroyed by the amendment. It is as though one were to ask for a loan of $100 and were only to receive one, two or five dollars. It would be an advance in the direction desired but would not be going far enough. In the same way the amendment is not what we want, it does not accomplish what the main motion aims at, and for that reason, although I admit I am in sympathy with the amendment I cannot vote for it; its effect is to destroy the main motion. My hon. friend (Mr. Neill) has very properly sought to restore the situation with a sub-amendment. Now I think if the amendment to the amendment were carried the day would be saved as far as the motion is concerned. Therefore I am in favour of voting for the amendment to the amendment, next voting against the amendment and finally for the main motion.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote against the resolution. As long as I am a member of this parliament I will not vote for any prohibitory legislation. We are living in an age in which prohibitory legislation is a fad. Everyone wants to discipline his neighbour but is not so anxious to discipline himself. There is such a thing as the liberty of the subject. I have only been to the races two or three times in my life. Still if a person wants to go to the Woodbine and use his money to bet on the races instead of buying a house with it it is none of my business. We have so many prohibitory laws in Canada that I am beginning to wonder whether this is a free country or not. The country is getting tired of prohibitory laws. A person's liberty is confiscated in Canada in a manner equal to the way in which they confiscate men's liberty and property in British Honduras. Not even the member for Brant can make people good by legislation. I am opposed to the motion as an interference with the liberty of the subject, although I am not a supporter of the race tracks and have seldom been there in my life.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote for the resolution because I believe it is in the right direction. When I say in the right direction I have in mind that the evil of gambling is inherent in the human race, and possibly further restrictions should be placed upon this evil. I do not vote for the resolution because the people who honoured me by electing me to this position are addicts to this evil. I am going to vote for the resolution because if I did not I would inferentially be giving the government my support in giving special privileges to certain people in this country—that is my interpretation of it. I would be giving the government a license to grant a special privilege to a certain class and deny it to others. I think that is unfair and that is the viewpoint the government should take in the matter.

Now I said gambling was inherent in the human race. Let a man walk down the streets of Ottawa, or any other city or town in the country, and as soon as the sidewalks are bare he will see little boys gambling with their marbles. That is the first stage of gambling in which they figure. Later on, perhaps, the boy, now grown into a man, will gamble on the Winnipeg grain exchange, or even our ladies will gamble at bridge; and I wonder how far we are going to proceed in the way of legislation before we shall eliminate all the evils which flow from gambling.

I spoke to the mover of the resolution some time ago and suggested to him that he broaden it out. However this is very broad at the present time. One of the reasons why I only wish to say a few words upon this is that I do not think the House should spend too much time discussing these heavenly and ethereal matters and perhaps send us home with a poor Grain Act, or a poor act relating to the Crowsnest pass rates, which might not be sufficiently debated. Rural credits and other important questions might not receive proper attention. I think we might devote our time more profitably to such subjects as these, instead of putting too much time on ethereal legislation.

I intend to cast my vote at the present time, not because of representations made to me, but because of sentiments I have expressed; and I propose to vote for the resolution.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): I propose to speak on a phase which has not been discussed to-night. I propose to vote without hesitation and without embarrassment, as other members intend to vote, for the subamendment and against the amendment and for the original resolution. I shall not indicate my reasons as they have been expressed by others who are in favour of such legislation. One reason I have for opposing the amendment is this: it is good in itself, I approve of it as far as it goes, but I object to it because it frustrates the object of the resolution. But that is not my main reason for opposing it. My main reason is this: I believe that in supporting this amendment we are opening the way to what may be a very vicious precedent. I took exception to the ruling at the time I voted against it. If we establish a precedent in this House that at any time a member may move, by way of amendment, something that is really a substantive motion rather than an amendment, dealing with another phase of the subject to the exclusion of the original motion, how far are we going to go in that direction? I had in mind by way of illustration another question which will come before the House, and I think by putting the illustration it will show exactly what I mean. A motion will come before the House presently dealing with the early construction of the Hudson Bay railway. Now if I followed the precedent established this afternoon and moved an amendment in the same spirit, I could move that all the words after the word "that" be struck out and that the following be substituted:

That this House declare itself in favour of the early construction of the Peace river railway.

Both motion and amendment so-called dealing with some phase of the transportation question, both good in themselves perhaps, but the amendment would absolutely preclude a vote being taken on the main motion. For that reason, and because I do not wish to put myself in a position in any way of supporting such an amendment, and supporting what might be adopted as a vicious and unsound principle, I shall oppose the amendment.

Mr. GOOD: I understand I have an opportunity of replying before a vote is taken. I wish to say a word regarding the amendment. I am entirely in accord with the amendment, with the exception of the last clause, namely the following:

Unless where supplied on a race track in Canada during the course of a race meeting legally held.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman speaking on the main motion or on the sub-amendment? We are now on the sub-amendment, and I heard the hon. member state that he was going to answer the arguments directed against the main motion. If the hon. member makes his reply now he will prevent other members speaking later on on the main motion. I understand the hon. member is speaking on the sub-amendment.

Mr. GOOD: I may have been labouring under a misunderstanding. I think perhaps it would be better for me to reserve what I have to say until the sub-amendment is disposed of. I am substantially in favour of the sub-amendment as a consolidation of the good parts of both resolutions.

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order was raised and I intend to give the ruling now. First of all in order to make the matter as clear as possible I shall read the main motion, the amendment and the sub-amendment. The main motion reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the special privilege now given to racing associations under the criminal code of carrying on public gambling operations in connection with their race meetings is detrimental to the best interests of Canada and should be abolished.

To this motion was moved an amendment by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) as follows:

That all the words after "that" in the resolution be struck out and the following be substituted therefor: "in the opinion of this House legislation should be introduced during this session to prohibit the advertising, printing, broadcasting, publication, or sale of information concerning any tips, selections, odds or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to horse racing, whether held within Canada or without, unless where supplied on a race track in Canada during the course of a race meeting legally held.

Some objection was taken this afternoon to this amendment and the ruling of the Chair was that it was relevant to the main motion and the majority of the House, on an appeal being taken, decided likewise. The amendment was followed by a sub-amendment by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) reading as follows:

That all the words after the word " without " in the main resolution be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:

That in the opinion of this House legislation should be introduced during this session to prohibit the advertising, printing, broadcasting, publication or sale of information concerning any tips, selections, odds or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to horse racing whether held within Canada or without, and to prohibit the use of pari-mutuels on race tracks in Canada.

Now the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) raises a point of order and his objection is twofold. First he cites May, pages 289 and 290, and states:

According to this authority an amendment like the one moved by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) cannot be carried without the Speaker putting the question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question.

I may just as well quote what May says on the subject as I think it represents the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Nelson. May says:

Where the original amendment is either simply to insert, add or leave out words, an amendment may at once be proposed to it, without reference to the question itself, which will be dealt with when the amendment has been disposed of. The most difficult form perhaps—

And this is the point—

—is when the amendment first proposed is to leave out certain words of the original question, and an amendment is proposed to such proposed amendment, by leaving thereout some of the words proposed to be omitted, and thus in effect, restoring them to the original question. in such a case a question is first put that the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the proposed amendment.

Let me remark that this is the procedure followed in the British parliament, but it is not the one followed in this parliament. Bourinot at page 318 states clearly what the procedure is when there are several amendments:

The Speaker will then submit the three motions in the order in which they are made, and first take the sense of the House on the last.

In the present instance, the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill):

"Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?" If the amendment is rejected, it is regular to move another (provided, of course, it is different in purport from that already negatived) as soon as the Speaker has again proposed the question: "Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the main motion (or original question)?"

As I stated a moment ago, the objection taken by the hon. member for Nelson is two-fold. He stated this evening that the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni only reiterates or repeats in a milder form—at least that is what I gathered from his remarks and that is what was claimed this evening by some hon. gentlemen who spoke on the question—the principle involved in the main motion, and that, if it is carried, the House will evade the main question. As I have already said, the rules of the House of Commons will not permit the evasion or the obscuring of an issue. The rules are based on common sense and hon. members will at once see that a case such as presents itself this evening has been provided for by our chief authority on parliamentary procedure, Bourinot at page 318:

When an amendment has been proposed, it is competent for any member to move an amendment to the same. In this case the original question is laid aside practically for the time being, and the first amendment becomes, as it were, a substantive question.

What is the practical effect of this? The hon. member for Brant has moved a substantive motion, putting squarely before the House the principle involved. To this motion, an amendment which, notwithstanding the objections that were put forward, I consider, in my humble judgment, is relevant to the main motion, was moved by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork). A subamendment reiterating, it is true, but in a different form, using different words, the principle involved in the main motion has been moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Therefore, according to Bourinot, the main question is laid aside. It is, so to speak, superseded and the question that will come at once before the House is that of the subamendment. If the members of the House say "aye" to the subamendment, then the Speaker's duty is to put the amendment as amended by the subamendment, and then again it is the duty of the Speaker, after the sense of the House has been taken, to put the main motion. If hon. members are willing to vote for the main motion, naked, as it were, as it was moved before this House by the hon. member for Brant, it is their right to do so. There is nothing wrong with the procedure, nothing wrong with the rules. The House can dispose of the three questions before it and live up logically to the rules. I hope I have made myself clear. The House will be at full liberty to give a free and unbiased judgment on the question involved.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not wish to debate anything. I wish to say, with all respect, that I differ from the ruling that permitted of the amendment. I think the ruling has led to very great confusion and difficulty, if not impossibility, of giving effect to the wishes of the House. I, therefore, purpose to vote on each motion that appears on the merits of that motion as it reads and without any regard whatever to the effect on any previous motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see that there is difference of opinion between the right hon. gentleman and the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not argued any difference. I just wish to say that that is how I purpose voting, as my judgment moves me as respects each one as it appeals to me. Otherwise, one has to vote as to what the effect is on the motion that precedes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Following the example of the leader of the opposition, I desire to say how I am going to vote. I am in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Skeena, but I cannot vote for it with the addition moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, so I will vote against the subamendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before putting the question I would ask hon. members on all sides to be good enough to assist the officials by remaining in their seats when the vote is being taken, and to vote row by row.

The House divided on the sub-amendment (Mr. Neill) which was negatived on the following division:

Leader,

[Mr. Leader.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the amendment carried. The question is now on the main motion as amended.

Mr. LEADER: I was paired with the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I was paired with the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the last motion is put, Mr. Speaker, might I ask your Honour if you would kindly read the main motion as amended?

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Good moves, seconded by Mr. Denis (Joliette):

That in the opinion of this House legislation should be introduced during this session to prohibit the advertising, printing, broadcasting, publication or sale of information concerning any tips, selections, odds or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to horse racing whether held within Canada or without, unless where supplied on a race track in Canada during the course of a race meeting lawfully held,

The question is on the main motion as amended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I point out that we are now voting on the amendment over again? I know that it is quite in order that we should, but I also point out that we are now precluded from voting on the main motion.

Mr. GOOD: I want to raise the question, Mr. Speaker, whether we shall have an opportunity, as I understood you to assure us, of voting on the main motion.

Mr. VIEN: As amended.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House has rejected the subamendment. It has given a majority in favour of the amendment. The question now before the House is, shall the main motion as amended be carried? I may point out to the hon. member, however, that other amendments can be moved to that motion as amended.

Mr. BROWN: How will the motion read now, Mr. Speaker, as it comes before the House?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BROWN: Does the main motion not read—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have just read the motion as amended. That is how the main motion reads now, by the verdict of the House.

Mr. MARTELL: I submit that the amendment is a new substantive motion.

An. hon. MEMBER: Withdraw it.

Mr. GOOD: I think we ought to be very clear on this point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot hear the hon. member for Brant. I would ask hon. members to keep silence.

Mr. GOOD: Perhaps I misunderstood you, Mr. Speaker, but I thought you assured the House some time ago that we should have an opportunity of deciding the issue that I presented in the original resolution. I thought this afternoon when the amendment was moved that it was a device or subterfuge to prevent the House from declaring itself on the main question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might remind the hon. gentleman that the House decided this afternoon to sustain the view taken by the Deputy Speaker, namely, that the amendment was relevant and therefore in order; and I may say that personally I endorse that ruling. The question now before the House is whether or not the House will accept the main motion as amended, but this does not prevent hon. members from moving other amendments to the main motion as amended. I must accept the verdict of the House.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Speaker, may I request that the main motion with the amendment added be reduced to writing in order that we may know exactly what we are voting on? With all due deference to hon. gentlemen, I must say that in my opinion the amendment in fact nullifies the main motion because the amendment is in itself a substantive motion. I suggest, whether the amendment deletes from or adds to the main motion, that the motion as amended be reduced to writing so that we shall have something concrete before us. I do not want to say anything in derogation of anything that has been said in the House, but it seems to me that in voting on the main motion now as amended we are voting in a fool's paradise.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to move. First I would like to say what the main resolution now before the House is, as I see it. The action we have taken means, if I correctly interpret it, that all that is left of the original motion is the word "That." I do not think those who voted against the sub-amendment under the impression that they were going to have an opportunity to vote on the main motion as it was presented have any real grievance. As I see the matter, if we wanted to express our will in regard to the real essence of the main motion the only way to do it under the circumstances was to vote for the sub-amendment. However, since we have failed in that, and as the main motion reads in this form—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I remind the hon. gentleman, so as to prevent any discredit from attaching to the decision of the Chair, that the main motion as amended is the only question that is before the House? But as I said a moment ago that main motion can still be amended. I quote from Bourinot, page 316:

> All motions should properly commence with the word "That" In this way, if the motion meets the approbation of the House, it may at once become the resolution, vote, or order which it purports to be.

That is the principle laid down by Bourinot. Therefore there is nothing strange in the fact that only the word "that" is left in the main motion, and that the main motion as now amended begins with the word "that" taken from the original motion.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) has an amendment.

Mr. BROWN: Understanding that the decision of the House now is to strike out all the original motion except the word "that", and that the amendment adopted reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, legislation should be introduced during this session to prohibit the advertising, printing, broadcasting, publication, or sale of information concerning any tips, selections, odds or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to horse racing, whether held within Canada or without, unless where supplied on a race track in Canada during the course of a race meeting legally held.

—I beg to move that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "without." The words struck out would be "unless where supplied on a race track in Canada during the course of a race meeting legally held." I make that motion because in my judgment it would leave what now stands as the main motion in a form that would not be objectionable at all. It would leave it in a form in which it expresses the opinion, I think, of the great majority of the members of this House. We have not been able to secure the purpose of the original motion, and if there is any way by which that can still be secured, I would be only too happy to do it; but as I view the situation the House has pronounced against that principle, and therefore I would like to make this amendment which now stands as the main motion. It is not objectionable at all in the way it will go before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Lisgar moves that all the words after the word "without" be struck out. That is all, is it?

Mr. MARTELL: May I ask then, Mr. Speaker, what we are voting on?

Mr. SPEAKER: The House is called upon to vote on the following amendment to the main motion. I will read the motion:

That in the opinion of this House legislation should be introduced during this session to prohibit the advertising, printing, broadcasting, publication or sale of information concerning any tips, selections, odds or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to horse racing whether held within Canada or without.

The words "unless where supplied on a race track," and so forth have been struck out.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Before the House votes on the amendment of my hon. friend, I must say that this question was brought to the attention of the then Minister of Justice, Sir Lomer Gouin, two years ago, by the Attorney General of Ontario, then the Hon. Mr. Raney. Mr. Raney in the suggestion that he made had exactly the same exception that my hon. friend wants to remove from the amendment of my hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Stork). I have here the suggested amendment of the Attorney General of Ontario, which reads as folows:

(f) Advertises, prints, publishes, exhibits, posts up, sells or supplies, or offers to sell or suply (i) other than on the premises of an association lawfully conducting race meetings in Canada; and during the actual progress of a race meeting thereon, any tips, selections, odds, winning money prices,

And so forth. The amendment moved by Sir Lomer Gouin two years ago, and which was adopted by the House, followed that suggestion, and there was an exception made for the race tracks during the progress of race meetings on those tracks. I do not see why we should go further this year. I have promised on behalf of the government that I would reintroduce the amendment of two years ago, and we intend to do so; but we intend to do so in the way in which it was adopted by the House. So I am going to vote against the amendment of my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I have no particular objection, Mr. Speaker, to this new amendment, although I will not second it. It seems to me that perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has a good deal of justice on his side in mentioning the fact that in the original amendment as passed two years ago dealing with this matter there was an exception made to the doing of certain things on the premises of a racing association. But the point I wish to direct attention to is that I am denied what I think is my right of bringing this matter to the House for its decision. There has been no opportunity to decide the matter that I presented to the House. If I am to understand the vote as a definite vote against the resolution which I presented, then I take it as such; but I have certainly understood since eight o'clock that the House would be permitted to vote on the specific question mentioned in the original resolution. Now, apparently, we are not to be permitted to do that unless I move in further amendment that all the words after "that" be struck out, and I insert my original motion. Would that be in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: May I suggest to my good friend from Brant that the best way out of his difficulty would be to now withdraw his resolution and bring it up at some other opportunity?

Mr. GOOD: When?

An hon. MEMBER: Next session.

Mr. VIEN: I think the purpose of the hon. member would be well served if he waited until the Minister of Justice introduced his legislation. He would have the opportunity then to bring in all kinds of amendments to the proposed legislation that the minister has announced to the House. I think the House will be quite satisfied with the discussion that has taken place to-day, and the purpose of the hon. member would in that way be well served. Therefore, in the interests of the House, as well as in the interests of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good), I think he would be well advised to submit to the suggestion of the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) and withdraw his resolution.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The hon. member can bring in his amendment when the Minister of Justice brings down his bill.

Mr. GOOD: I quite understand, Mr. Speaker, and I may avail myself of an opportunity if it occurs in the future. It does seem to me however that there is a simple matter on which the House has refused permission for a vote. I had intended to say something in reply to the various arguments that have been advanced but I think there is no desire that the matter should be debated further and I shall have to await another opportunity of presenting any views I have on the question.

Mr. HOCKEN: The hon. gentleman seems to be labouring under a misconception. He speaks as though his motion had not been voted upon. He seems to think that some injustice has been done to him because the amendment was carried over his motion, and that the question of his motion was not directly put to the House. That ought to get out of his mind—

Mr. GOOD: It is hard to get it out.

Mr. HOCKEN:—because there is no doubt at all that his motion was voted upon. This House dealt with his motion. It dealt with it by carrying the amendment and therefore on the whole I think he has been perfectly fairly treated.

Mr. BROWN: Under the circumstances, and in view of the explanation that has been made in regard to the bill that was passed here two years ago, I think, perhaps, it might not be wise for me to stress my amendment if the House will allow it to be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman, of course, must get the consent of the House.

Mr. VIEN: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I second the amendment and I see no reason whatever for withdrawing it.

Mr. BROWN: If not too late I will allow it to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CALDWELL: No, certainly not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I object, Mr. Speaker, I seconded the motion and I object to its being withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The withdrawal must be by unanimous consent.

Mr. RINFRET: I object to this debate being rehashed on any future occasion. The question has been fully debated to-day and it is a well known practice in this House—I made that very clear in my speech—that when an amendment is moved and voted upon those voting in favour of the amendment vote against the motion. My hon. friend's motion has been defeated by 34 votes, and if he tries to bring the question up again when the bill of the Minister of Justice is before the House I will certainly rise to a point of order. Because I consider this matter has been fully debated, and I do not think we can go back to it any more.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment please say aye.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. An amendment was placed before this House by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) which I seconded. When he proposed to withdraw that amendment I objected. I take it that that amendment is still before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think it can be withdrawn.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker is putting the amendment now.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment could only have been withdrawn with the unanimous consent of the House. Objection was taken to the withdrawal and the amendment remains before the House. The question is now on the amendment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I should like to say just a word with regard to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTELL: I rise to a point of order. After the question has been put I submit that it is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question was not put. I did not see the hon. gentleman rise in his seat and he has a right to speak to the amendment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I second this motion though it is not at all satisfactory. I must join with other members who have objected decidedly to the course which this debate has taken. I have not had the opportunity in any way whatever of expressing my views upon the motion which was before us to-day. This is a substitute motion. The original resolution has gone from before us under the ruling of the chair as supported by the House, but the present amendment does look in the direction of doing away with one little bit of special privilege. I would have supported the motion advanced by the hon. member for Brant because it struck at a certain monopoly under which one particular group of people, those engaged in horse racing, have a special privilege at the present time in Canada which is denied to other people. Two or three years ago legislation was passed making illegal any sort of betting on a baseball game, or the guessing of baseball results, and that kind of thing. Yet at present one particular group of people, a very wealthy group, have certain privileges in this country which are absolutely denied to the rest of the population. If a man is well enough off to be able to attend a horse race he can there engage in the pastime of betting; if he is not rich enough to go there it becomes a crime that he should bet. That seems to be an absurd situation. Then we have the further situation that we are going to make it illegal to have book-making anywhere else but in connection with horse racing and while horse racing is in progress another bit of special privilege. The House is denied the right to express itself on the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Brant by those who are now trying to claim a special privilege for this particular sport of horse racing. If we are going to legislate in this way I think it ought to be known to the country at large. If laws are devised with respect to gambling let them apply equally. Do not let it be made a crime for one particular group to bet in one particular place and then exalt another group above the law; do not let them be accorded a special privilege and safeguarded in every particular. When this opportunity offers the least we can do is to take away this particular betting privilege and in so doing establish something like an equality in the legislation that is now before the House.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Brown) which was negatived on the following division:

PAIRS

(The list of pairs is supplied by the chief whips.)

Messrs:

Leader,	Murphy.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. I would ask the exercise of the privilege which I think is provided for in rule 42, page 112, subsection 419, which says:

A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the House may be taken on each separately.

If ever there was a resolution which contains two propositions, it is the one before us to-night. We have the resolution of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) who wants to do away with pari-mutuels. We have the proposition of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) who wants to do away with book-making off the race tracks. These are the two separate propositions. If we divide the motion and take the sense of the House on each one separately we will accomplish what we have been trying to do all afternoon.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member raised the point of order that the amendment and the resolution deal with two separate subjects, and therefore that the question involved by the amendment is out of order.

Mr. NEILL: No, I would not quite take that position. The rules do not quite prescribe the procedure here. It simply says that the sense of the House may be taken on each separately. I do not take the point that the amendment is out of order. I simply ask that the motion should be divided, as it contains two propositions, so that the sense of the House may be taken.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have divided four times already.

Mr. SPEAKER: The paragraph quoted by the hon. member is not a rule. It is only an authority cited under rule 42. The question which the hon. member has in mind I think is that the amendment is not relevant to the main motion. That point has been settled. It has been decided by the Speaker that the amendment was relevant to the main motion.

Being of the opinion that the amendment is relevant to the main motion, I therefore rule that the point of order is not well taken.

Motion agreed to on division.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Tuesday).

Tuesday, March 3, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved: That the names of Messrs. Pouliot and Delisle be subsituted for those of Messrs. Beland and Euler on the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved: That the Auditor General's report for the year ending March 31, 1924, and the Public Accounts of Canada for the year ending March 31, 1924, be referred to the select standing committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA—UNITED STATES SMUGGLING TREATY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

Resolved by the House of Commons,—That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the treaty for the suppression of smuggling operations along the international boundary between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and assisting in the arrest and prosecution of persons violating the narcotic laws of either government and for kindred purposes, which was signed at Washington on the sixth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four, and which was signed on behalf of His Majesty in respect of Canada by the plenipotentiary therein named, and that this House do approve of the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution is to secure from the House of Commons, and subsequently from the Senate, of Canada approval of a treaty in the nature of international co-operation which has been entered into between Canada and the United States for the suppression of smuggling across the international boundary, and also to assist in the arrest and prosecution of persons violating the narcotic laws of either government.

This treaty has been negotiated and signed in accordance with the procedure laid down at the Imperial Conference of 1923. Hon. members of the House may recall that in the fall of 1923 a conference was held here at Ottawa between officials of the United States government and officials of the Canadian government who have to do with the administration of the customs and excise laws of the two countries. It was felt that if a conference could be held at which the officials of the two countries might be brought into immediate and personal touch with each other, it might be possible to draft regulations, subsequently to be embodied in a treaty, which would be helpful to both the United States and Canada in the suppression of smuggling into either country. As I have mentioned, the officials of the United States government came to Ottawa for the purpose of conferring with our officials here. As a result of that conference a report was presented to the governments of the two countries, which subsequently became a matter of further negotiation between ministers of the two governments, and a treaty was drafted. It was signed at Washington on June 6th of last year, signed on behalf of the United States by Mr. Secretary Hughes, and on behalf of Canada by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) who received from His Majesty the King full powers enabling him in respect of Canada to sign on His Majesty's behalf. The treaty, so far as the United States is concerned, was submitted to the United States Senate for advice and consent of ratification last year, and the advice and consent of ratification on behalf of the Senate was obtained on December 12, 1924. What the government is seeking at the moment is approval by this House of the treaty as a preliminary to ratification on the part of Canada. When ratification by Canada has been obtained exchange of ratifications between the two countries will be made and the treaty will then become law.

The provisions of the treaty relate in the first place, to the exchange of information between the officials of the two governments with respect to clearances of vessels, or the transportation of cargoes, shipments or loads of dutiable articles across the international boundary. The treaty provides that where the officials of the United States government or of the Canadian government request the officials of the other country for information with respect to such clearances of vessels, transportation of shipments of articles across the international frontier, that information shall be given.

It provides further that where there is reason to believe in respect to clearances of vessels to any ports smuggling is about to take place with respect of any articles which are prohibited entry into either of the countries, the officers of the country from which these articles are about to be exported shall give information to the officers of the other country to assist in preventing these smuggling operations.

A further clause provides that where it appears, from the size or tonnage or general character of any vessel about to clear from a port either of the United States or Canada to some port named that it would be impossible for the vessel to reach the destination named, clearance shall be denied by the custom officers to any such vessel if carrying cargo consisting of articles the importation of which into the territory of Canada or of the United States is prohibited. I may say that this is a restriction which our Department of Customs is now enforcing as a departmental regulation. This treaty if it pases, will make the regulation a matter of international obligation.

There is a similar clause in the treaty with respect to the names and activities of persons known or suspected to be engaged in violation of the narcotic laws of Canada or the United States, the underlying idea being that the officials of both countries are interested in doing all they can to suppress the narcotic evil; it is therefore provided that they shall co-operate and assist one another by exchanging information wherever they have reason to believe that an effort is being made to violate the narcotic laws of either country.

There is a clause in the treaty which provides for the return to the owners in either country of property that has been stolen and taken across the border and there seized by customs officials of the other country. It has happened very often of late that articles, automobiles especially, have been stolen in one country and taken across the border to the other, in order that the offenders may the more readily escape punishment, and often to permit of the disposal of the article on the other side. It has been found in some cases that the owners of the articles have suffered in consequence through there not being an adequate requirement under which the stolen article shall be returned to its owner. The provision in the treaty will assist bona fide owners to recover stolen property in circumstances of the kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has been the practice in the past?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that in the past effort has been made to secure restoration, but that the matter has frequently necessitated considerable negotiation; there has been difficulty in a number of cases in effecting a speedy restoration of stolen goods.

I am informed by the Minister of Justice that there has been in force during the last few months a departmental regulation covering the matter. I presume it is along the lines of the provision of the treaty in that regard.

There is also a provision in the treaty which will facilitate the giving of evidence in the courts of the other country of the customs and other administrative officials of either country who may have knowledge of violation of the law respecting smuggling or narcotics; the treaty provides they shall upon request be directed to attend as witnesses in civil or criminal cases. In other words Canadian customs officials may give evidence in United States courts, and shall give evidence in those courts if requested by the government of that country, the payment of their expenses devolving in such a case upon the government of the United States. Similarly our officials or departments will have the right to ask officials of the United States government to come into our courts to produce documents and give evidence with respect to matters of which they may have knowledge and which our officials may desire to have investigated in our own courts.

There is a provision also with respect to the conveyance of prisoners, wreckage and salvage where offences have been committed against the narcotic laws of the respective governments. There is also a provision which admits of the importation into the Yukon, through American territory, of liquor that is being legally imported under Yukon regulations or laws. The provision in that regard is simply to provide as respects importations into the Yukon the same rights of transit across American territory in the vicinity of the Yukon as is given with respect to the transit of alcoholic liquors through the Panama canal or on the Panama railroad.

The treaty is to be in force for one year and thereafter subject to thirty days' notice. It will come into force ten days after ratification.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I am not clear as to one thing, that is as to the restriction on the shipment of goods by vessel. I understood the Prime Minister to say that when a vessel was clearing, if it appeared that the destination, having regard to the size of the vessel, was so far away that she could not reach that port within the time specified clearance would be denied.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is right, not likely to be able to reach the port.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not aware, in the case of the departure of a vessel, that the time was fixed as to when it was to arrive at its destination.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might read to my right hon. friend the section of the treaty which covers the point he has raised.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which one please?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

The high contracting parties agree that clearance from Canada or from the United States shall be denied to any vessel carrying cargo consisting of articles the importation of which into the territory of Canada or the United States, as the case may be, is prohibited, when it is evident from the tonnage, size and general character of the vessel, or the length of the voyage and the perils or conditions of navigation attendant upon it, that the vessel will be unable to carry its cargo to the destination proposed in the application for Clearance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has that been carried out by departmental regulation for some time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand the departmental regulation has been with respect to furnishing information to the officials of the United States government by our government where there was reason to suspect that the owner of a vessel was intending to smuggle prohibited articles into the United States.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That has been done in such a place as Windsor?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Belle River?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Is this the same treaty concerning which a resolution was on the order paper last session and was withdrawn because the United States Senate adjourned without ratifying it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. My hon. friend is right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that under the rules the House does not go into committee to consider the resolution in detail. I do not know just under what provision—

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order. I wish we had a rule in this House which would make the leaders of parties speak in audible terms.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Among other qualifications of my hon. friend he would be quite up to the mark on that score. Under the rules, I am informed, there is no provision by which this resolution can be considered in committee in detail. If that is correct I very much regret the fact. I recall that the ratification by parliament of the French and Italian treaties in some way was considered in committee in detail.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Because, apart from the approval of the treaty, legislation was needed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is right. The explanation is no doubt correct. But misfortune, though, is still apparent because we cannot consider and question details of this treaty in a formal debate in the House. I say this not because I have in mind any rigorous criticism of the treaty itself. The purposes the treaty has in mind I quite approve of, and I have no doubt every hon. member of the House does as well. Smuggling of recent times has become not only a fine art but a very remunerative and widely extended occupation—one of the most successful, one of the few prosperous occupations of the present time in this country. The dimensions which smuggling has reached, according to the views of those who should know best, are really appalling. I regret that the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Bureau) is not in his seat, as I would like to question him as to his view on this subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend is aware that the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Bureau) has not been well for some time past, and unfortunately this afternoon is indisposed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not intimating that he is away because the treaty is before the House, but I should like to have some information as to the correctness of data furnished by various associations and especially by one, as to the extent to which the smuggling is now carried on. As respects ourselves, it presents a problem much wider than it presents as respects the other contracting party, the United States. I do not presume that country is very much troubled with the smuggling evil, except in respect of narcotics and intoxicating liquors. The treaty, from their point of view, is doubtless framed with a view to meeting the troubles they have encountered in enforcing the Volstead Act. But for ourselves the field to be covered is much vaster. Smuggling into Canada extends from liquors to tobaccos, from tobaccos to cottons, and from cottons to woollens, silks, and all specially valuable articles easily procurable across the border. Consequently the terms of the treaty have very special interest to this country. Many of our laws will be rendered nugatory if smuggling is to be carried on to anything comparable to the degree presented by this association. I am rather disappointed in the terms of the treaty, not that I object to any of them, but they do not seem to me to go any further than what has been, or certainly should have been, the practice of both governments up to the present time. The treaty provides that mutual information shall be furnished by the contracting parties. I think the Prime Minister says that this has been the practice of recent months. Undoubtedly, even without a treaty, it should be the practice at all times and should have been the practice for years departmentally between the governments. I do not object, and there can be no objection appealing to my mind, to this common practice having the sanction of a treaty—resting upon that more secure foundation of making it obligatory upon all parties hereafter. The same provisions seem to be in force with respect to the transfer of liquor. But there is one that may or may not be effective. I refer to the one as to which I questioned the Prime Minister specially—that which is provided in article 2. It seems to me that article 2 would have been better had it made it obligatory upon the party applying for clearance that the period within which the boat should arrive at destination should be stated. All the article now provides is that if it appears to the customs authorities, say of Canada, that any boat sailing from our shores applying for clearance is not likely, because of its size and the distance to be traversed, to reach its destination within the period stated in the application, then clearance may be denied. It may be one of the regulations of the department that within the application there shall be a stated period, but the department would still be at liberty, so far as this treaty is concerned, to abandon that phase of the regulations. Simply by doing so article 2 would be rendered nugatory. I have not much faith, from what information I have received, in the officers of the Customs department of this country exercising any particularly scrupulous srutiny over clearance papers prior to departure. There have been certain notifications from the department which go to show they have a very wholesome view of exportations from Canada, no matter what the article or destination. The other provision with reference to the return of stolen property is of course an obviously correct one. I have had complaints as to property shipped from the United States to Canada being stolen and not being recoverable, but it always seemed to me very hard to understand why it would be difficult, once the real owner was discovered, to see to it that some means was provided whereby he could at least come to this country and get his property. The provision as to the interchange of witnesses seems to me a practical and useful one. That is to my mind the principal provision of this treaty. The rest in the main merely covers what is obvious, and what has been, or at least should have been, the practice all along; but the officers of either government would not be compellable to testify in the other country, unless provision was made therefor. The making of this provision should render more easy the establishment of the offence in whichever country committed. All that can be done is to wish well of the treaty and to remark that its efficacy depends to the extent of ninety-nine per cent upon the earnestness and determination of the government and its officers.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): As far as the several sections of the treaty are concerned, it may be that they might go further, some of them could go further, as suggested by my right hon. friend; but I would call attention to the fact that this treaty is based largely upon an understanding reached in Ottawa two years ago by the officers of both governments, and all its provisions were then discussed and fully considered, and the result is what the officers thought best for both countries to agree upon. As far as the evil of smuggling is concerned, I agree with my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) that it is a most serious evil and that every means should be adopted tending to check it most effectively, and I may say that in that regard the government has decided to deal with the matter in a special way this session by means of legislation and otherwise.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Health): I think that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has very fully explained the provisions of the different clauses of the treaty. I also regret that under the rules of the House we are not permitted to go into committee of the Whole, where it would be possible for every hon. member to ask questions and receive answers, but I will content myself at the present time by saying that those who desire the suppression of the narcotic evil in Canada—and for that matter all over the world—will hail with deep satisfaction the new agreement that has been arrived at between Canada and the United States. So far as we are concerned, our narcotic laws are very drastic and very stringent, and inasmuch as Canada does not produce opium or coca-leaves, and furthermore does not manufacture the derivatives of these two raw products opium and coca-leaves, the problem would be very much simplified if we were not deluged with clandestine importations. The treaty which is now submitted to the House for ratification provides for compelling witnesses from either country to attend in the other for the purpose of giving evidence in cases brought before the courts. The treaty also provides for the extradition of persons who may be under bail or convicted under the laws of either country. This will be a great help to us. The House is aware that numberless difficulties confront the Department of Health and also the Department of Justice in administering the act as it stands. It is well known that alkaloids, so-called, or, to use ordinary language, derivatives of opium and coca-leaves, are transported in very small volume, which circumstance makes smuggling all the easier. Another feature of this illicit traffic is that it is rewarded by very large profits.

There are three classes of men with whom we have to deal. We have to deal with the addicts. The House will agree with me that we should regard this particular class with some sympathy. In many quarters they are held to be diseased persons rather than criminals. There is another class, which is not the worst, but which is not to be put in the same class as the addicts. These are the small trafficking people, the deck peddlers, the men who are engaged for a very small remuneration to peddle the powders on street corners, in houses, public places and so on. This class we endeavour to check and to punish as they deserve to be punished. But the class towards which we should turn our attention is made up of ringleaders as we call them, large traffickers, men generally wealthy or in very comfortable circumstances. Under the laws as they exist between Canada and the United States, it is possible for a man of this importance, when he suspects that the Department of Justice, through the mounted police is getting too active towards himself, to cross over the border and thus be immune as far as he is concerned. Should he, through some channel, realize that, for instance, he is going to be punished within a week or two, his means enable him to move immediately across the border. Such a man may conceal himself beyond our power of dealing with him.

That is the case of a man who is suspected, a man who has been the subject of close and persistent investigation for a number of weeks, sometimes for a number of months. Let us go one step further and take the case of a man who has been arrested and who is out on bail. Nothing prevents this man from crossing over the border into the United States and thus relieving himself from any anxiety of action being taken against him under our law. Further, let us take the case of a person who has been convicted under our laws and who appeals against the decision of the court of first instance. He is allowed out on bail. Again, we have a man who has been convicted of carrying on illicit traffic and who can pass over the border and so escape the punishment which he deserves. The treaty as it is now submitted provides for power of extradition of such parties. I am informed by the officials of the Health department that no less than ten or twelve cases have happened during the course of the last twelve months between Canada and the United States, and as regards the United States, we know of three cases where the suspected person, the convicted person, has disappeared from their territory and is probably located in Canada. The department has been supplied with photographs and descriptions of those persons, and were it possible for us to locate them in Canada, we would be absolutely powerless inasmuch as to-day our law does not provide for extradition.

There has been between United States and Canada in this connection very close co-operation. Since I have been at the head of the Health department, I think Canada can congratulate herself on the fact that the closest co-operation has existed between the inland revenue service of the United States and this department. Last year, to exemplify what I have just stated, at our request the United States authorities seized a shipment of 100,000 ounces of coca-leaves which had been landed in New York and had as its destination a fictitious firm in Montreal. What was contemplated by the ringleaders in the United States was, during the progress of this train from New York to Montreal on the American side of the border, to empty the car containing that consignment. The United States were requested to deal with this consignment and they did so in a perfectly satisfactory manner.

Now, I do not think I should prolong this explanation, inasmuch as later on, I presume, when the estimates of the Department of Health are under consideration, it will be my privilege to explain to the House the various discussions and negotiations that took place in Geneva during the last opium conference. I may say this much, however, that it is expected that the new convention will prove a step in advance over the convention of 1912 which was decided upon at the Hague. The explanation I had intended giving to the House will have to be postponed in view of the fact that the convention as it was signed early in February has not yet reached me. So far as this treaty is concerned, however, I want to say emphatically that our task will not be made any less arduous but will be rendered the more effective of execution by reason of the fact that we shall be in a position to deal with those powerful traffickers who up to the present time have been mocking at the governments both of the United States and of Canada.

Mr. HANSON: The first paragraph of the treaty provides that customs and other officials of the respective governments of Canada and the United States shall upon request be directed to attend as witnesses, and so on. Upon whose request are they to attend? Will it be the request of the respective governments? Will these officials, some of whom may be resident in the country of which they are not nationals,—say the immigration officials of the United States resident in Canada —be answerable on a subpoena? I may say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that at the present time United States immigration officials resident in Canada, while they will answer a subpoena, refuse to give any evidence which they may have collected in the course of their official duties.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The request, no doubt, will have to be made by the accredited representatives of either government, and in the usual manner.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): In the absence of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau), who unfortunately is ill, I may be permitted to say a word or two. I know that the press has been rather misconstruing a remark which the Minister of Customs made recently in the House in reference to the difficulty of altogether eliminating smuggling. What he had in mind undoubtedly was that in this matter, as in the case of sin, the elimination of the evil cannot be altogether accomplished in this world, although it can be suppressed and reduced to a minimum. This much must be admitted, however, that in recent years smuggling has apparently got to be a science. Whether it be that prohibitions are too strong for human frailty and the desire has consequently been cultivated to break all laws in sight, I am not prepared to say; but this does seem to be the case, that the smugglers both ways have got to understand the rule of transportation, that in order to obtain cheap rates you must have a return cargo. When they take spirituous liquors one way they are inclined to carry silks back, and so they make a double profit. The Minister of Customs is very much alive to this situation, and he informs me that he is going to ask this House to give him the right, without referring to the Civil Service Commission, to select a number of men specially fitted for this particular work of prevention in the smuggling practice. I do not think that there will be any question about conceding him that right to appoint men of a certain stamp who are specially qualified to suppress this evil. The evil is not only a moral excrescence but it is also a source of financial loss to the country, and the minister should be permitted to select a number of men, large or small as he sees fit, who, he thinks, have special qualifications for this particular work.

Mr. LEWIS: Can you not get those men through the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. GRAHAM: They are so obtained now.

Mr. LEWIS: Well, is it not possible to get them in the same way in the future?

Mr. GRAHAM: I say no, most emphatically. It seems to me you might as well go to the Civil Service Commission for a clergyman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I inform the minister that that is done under the act?

Mr. GRAHAM: I shall proceed with the remarks I was going to make.

The government is seriously considering the advisability of bringing in more stringent legislation for the prevention of smuggling. I take it that it would be harsh if the man or woman who smuggled small articles—and nearly all of you do—were to be prosecuted criminally. On the other hand, there seems no great reason why men or women who deliberately violate the law to the financial loss of their fellow taxpayers and for their own profit should not be prosecuted to the full extent. I will not dwell further on the evils of smuggling, but I would point out that the practice has got to such a stage that a very stringent remedy will have to be applied if it is to be curtailed, as it ought to be curtailed.

Mr. JACOBS: Why not have free trade altogether?

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, if we could get free trade altogether it would do; but that is impossible in this world. There is something else besides silks that comes over here, and it may surprise some of our people to learn this. While we are continually talking about spirituous liquors being exported to the United States, there is a large quantity coming into Canada from that country at the present time, mostly in the form of alcohol. Although perhaps on the Detroit river and in that vicinity there is not much reciprocity in the imports and exports of liquor, in one or two other parts of Canada there are coming in to-day large quantities of alcohol. This alcohol I know was recently tested and was found good in every respect, and it was placed in the stores of men in the big cities, merchants who are permitted by law to sell alcohol, and they can sell this at a price less than half what they would have to pay for the same alcohol if they purchased it legally in Canada.

Something else that calls for a remedy is the considerable traffic which is taking place illegally in the whiskey business between Canada and the United States. In 1922, at the request of the provinces, this parliament enacted an amendment to the Canada Temperance Act by which on the request of the provinces, through order in council, certain authority vested in the federal parliament was to be handed over to the provinces. Through this authority the control of the export of liquor can be put into practical effect by the provinces themselves. But to my mind there has been something lacking up to the present time to give that legislation full effect, and we hope the deficiency will be supplied by this treaty. Therefore, if the provinces interested would take advantage of the legislation of 1922, with the power therein conferred supplemented by the provisions of this treaty, they could, I believe, bring about a far better state of affairs in the border localities between Canada and the United States. We are hoping that this improvement will be brought about, because I am free to say that at present there are towns in Ontario which, although the people from the town council down hold strong temperance views, are being made ports of export for whiskey manufactured legally, but peddled illegally. If this result is accomplished, then I say the treaty will be worth while.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Does the treaty better ensure the payment of excise duties in any way? It is common knowledge in British Columbia that large shipments of liquor take place presumably to Mexico or South America, but after being taken out into the gulf a short distance they are brought back into Vancouver or the adjoining districts and are sold at much lower prices than those charged by the provincial government. This is said to be due to the excise duties being evaded in the bonded warehouses under present arrangements.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under this treaty the officers are given power to refuse clearance if in their judgment the vessels are not of sufficient capacity or are not intended to land their cargoes at the port for which they clear.

Mr. LADNER: Why could not the excise duty be assessed and the exporters be given a refund upon evidence of delivery of their cargoes at the ports for which they were given clearance? That would certainly ensure the government getting the duty.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think that is in the treaty.

Mr. JOHN MORRISON (Weyburn): The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), in speaking for the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) stated that his colleague was going to ask for the privilege of going over the head of the Civil Service Commission in order to secure a competent staff to better enforce the laws against smuggling. I do not think he paid much of a compliment to the civil service. In my opinion something should be done to improve the standard—

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I interject that the suggestion comes largely from the Manufacturers' Association. They are very deeply interested in the prevention of smuggling.

Mr. MORRISON: Well, I am going to offer a suggestion also. I would suggest that in the examinations for the civil service applicants should be examined as to their integrity as well as their ability to pass written examinations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How will the hon. member examine any man as to his integrity?

Mr. MORRISON: If the Prime Minister will answer my question he will find the answer to his own. If the Prime Minister were at the head of a big business concern, would he tell the House that he would not examine into the integrity of any applicant for a position of responsibility? Certainly he would.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By written examination?

Mr. MORRISON: You would go about it in the same way as the head of any business concern.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would remind the hon. member that the Civil Service Commission advertise vacancies, hold written examinations and make appointments. How, under such a system, could the commission test a man's integrity?

Mr. MORRISON: The Civil Service Commission examinations do not go far enough. Men get into the civil service who are absolutely unfitted for the work they have to do and are a menace both to the service, and to the public, but once they get in it is impossible to get them out. The minister's statement proves that there are inefficients in the service. No member likes to get up and cite a case near home, but we know of men who could not get a job with a good firm who get into the civil service, and then no power in Canada can get them out. They should be investigated as to their integrity, the same as any business concern would investigate them, and if they had not a good clean record they should not be considered for a moment.

4 p.m.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the enforcement of the law against smuggling, when we were discussing the Royal Canadian Mounted Police a couple of sessions ago it was said that we needed this body to enforce the laws of the Dominion. Do I understand that they are not fitted for doing this kind of work?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I have an answer as to whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is to be reinforced by still another police force?

Mr. SPEAKER: I might remind the hon. member and the House that we are not in committee of the Whole, and consequently no one except the mover may speak twice on the motion. By unanimous consent of the House I am willing to let the minister answer, but questions are being put by hon.

members which, strictly speaking, are not according to the rules.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I do not see how it is possible to stop smuggling if we leave our doors open at night. That is actually the case in some parts of the Dominion. According to my latest information, that statement is correct in respect of British Columbia. On the Pacific highway and on other roads in my constituency leading to the United States, on which the principal traffic between the two countries takes place, the customs officers both of Canada and the United States are not on duty after one o'clock in the morning. Neither government provides a sufficient staff to attend to the business. Now, perhaps the man who goes in for smuggling should do so in the day time, but usually he does not, his favourite time is at night, and there is nothing in the world to prevent him from smuggling as much as he likes along those roads in the night-time. If my information is correct, there is something wrong with the administration. If you want to stop smuggling you will have to have a staff on duty at night as well as in the day time, because smugglers are active at night. Now what is wrong with the administration if the statements I am making are true, and I think they are? Why cannot this government and the government of the United States do business in a businesslike way, and put on sufficient staffs to prevent smuggling along the principal roads in any event?

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I would like to call the attention of the government to the fact that at least two years ago when the treaty between Great Britain and the United States in relation to the smuggling and handling of liquor was before this House for ratification, it was pointed out to the government that the right now accorded by Article VII of the treaty which this House is now asked to ratify could have been obtained at that time. I pointed out then to the minister that by the insertion of a simple paragraph, such as this Article VII, in the treaty between Great Britain and the United States the same right could have been obtained, and I predicted that we would have to wait a long time to get that concession, if it can be called a concession, from the United States. That prediction has come true.

The only practical way whereby goods can be imported into the Yukon territory is through the United States port of Skagway in Alaska, and for twenty-five or thirty years past up until about three years ago there had never been any objection to the importation in bond of British goods into the Canadian territory of Yukon across that narrow strip of Alaska. But suddenly the United States proclaimed that it was illegal to take intoxicating liquors across that narrow strip of United States territory either in bond or under guard, and it shut out importations even by the government. In the Yukon territory the handling of liquor is done entirely by the government. It is sold by government shops, and without prescription, as a beverage, and the administration of the law is very satisfactorily carried out; but because of this change of policy on the part of the United States it has been practically impossible for the past two years up until last fall to take any liquor into that country, and in consequence, the people of that territory were driven to the subterfuge that people in the United States and in Ontario who desire liquor for beverage purposes have resorted to when they require liquor for beverage purposes. For upwards of a year now people of the Yukon requiring alcoholic liquor for beverage purposes have had to go through the form of getting a prescription from a medical practitioner. They have had to pretend they were sick, they have had to have a doctor pretend he thought they were sick, in order to give them a prescription. There was really no necessity for that, and I am glad to see that that method will no longer be necessary when this treaty finally goes into effect.

I would like to comment on the fact that the government has tied itself down to only one means of transportation into the Yukon. It is provided by Article VII that:

> No penalty or forfeiture under the laws of the United States shall be applicable or attached to alcoholic liquors, or to vessels, vehicles or persons by reason of the carriage of such liquors when they are in transit under guard by Canadian authorities through the territorial waters of the United States to Skagway, Alaska, and thence by the shortest route, via the White Pass and Yukon railway—

It is true that most freight going up there goes by the White Pass and Yukon railway, but that is not the only means of ingress and egress to or from that country. Suppose that railway happened to close down or was tied up for a period of time; this section of the treaty would then be inoperative. I do not see why the government should have limited itself to one railway line, because it is not by any means impossible or impracticable to take goods into that country by other means, both by way of the White Pass and by way of the Yukon river. But the treaty will better the present state of affairs, and for my part I think its provisions will be very well received by the inhabitants of Yukon, as they do not like the present method.

In regard to the remarks that have been made in connection with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the part they have played in the prevention of smuggling and the violation of law generally, I do not think that the discussion of this treaty should have been made the opportunity for an unnecessary slam on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, because I think that body does not need apologists either here or elsewhere. I think probably that if the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were given more authority and a little freer hand in enforcing the laws of this country, the laws not only with respect to smuggling but as to crime generally would be much more efficiently enforced. I have no doubt that their services will be called into use in many instances in enforcing the various sections of this treaty.

Before I sit down, I would again call the government's attention very seriously to the restriction I have mentioned contained in Article VII. Although most of the goods come in over the White Pass and Yukon railway, there are other means of transportation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In reply to my right hon. friend—

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, the hon. gentleman can only speak again by unanimous consent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend has referred to the fact that two years ago there was submitted to this House a treaty between Great Britain and the United States concerning the liquor traffic, and he says that at that time we should have inserted such a provision as is now contained in Article VII of the present treaty. That treaty, as my hon. friend knows, was negotiated by Great Britain. It was submitted to this parliament for our approval, and we did approve it. We had to approve it in the form in which it was, or otherwise we would have had to negotiate a separate treaty by ourselves including such a provision as Article VII of the present treaty contains.

My hon. friend also says that we should not confine ourselves in this treaty to the specific means of transportation mentioned in Article VII. Well, as a matter of fact, Canada claims that we have the right to transport liquor over the Yukon river; but this right is denied by the United States. However, the means of transportation which is mentioned in Article VII is really the best means so far as Canada is concerned, as I understand, and that is what Canada has been asking from the United States. My hon. friend knows, however, that if we have the right to use the Yukon river, we still have it even after this treaty has been negotiated. Section 7 of the treaty gives us an additional right, but does not remove at all any right we may have had before, to use the Yukon river.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate informing their honours that this House has adopted the above resolution and requesting that their honours will unite with this House in the approval of the above mentioned treaty, and that the Clerk do carry said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

NARCOTIC ACT OFFENDERS

EXTRADITION TREATY BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

Resolved by the House of Commons,—That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention between His Majesty and the President of the United States of America for the purpose of enlarging the list of crimes on account of which extradition may be granted with regard to certain offences committed in the United States or in the Dominion of Canada under the convention concluded between Great Britain and the United States on the 12th July, 1889, and the 13th December, 1900, and the 12th April, 1905, and the 15th May, 1922, which was signed at Washington on the eighth day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-five, and which was signed on behalf of His Majesty in respect of Canada by the Plenipotentiary therein named, and that this House do approve of the same.

He said: The resolution itself gives the House practically all the information, it will, I think, wish to have with respect to this particular treaty. The treaty or convention arises, in a way, out of the one which has just been approved by the House, and makes special provision for the extradition of persons from one country to the other who have violated the narcotic laws of either country. In international law there is no obligation upon a country except by treaty, to surrender persons who have violated the laws of another country, and while, up to the present time, there has been an extradition treaty between Great Britain and the United States, which includes Canada, with respect to a number of offences, offences against the narcotic laws of the two countries are not included. The purpose of the present treaty is to provide the power of extradition as between this country and the United States where offences are committed in either country against the narcotic laws of the other.

As is set forth in the resolution the treaty was signed at Washington on January 8, of the present year, and consent of the United States Senate to ratification was obtained on January 27. The procedure of the negotiation and of the signing of this treaty has been in accordance with the procedure laid down at the Imperial Conference in 1923, and the procedure with respect to ratification will also be in accordance with the understanding reached at that time unanimously by the several governments of the empire. It may interest the House to know that extradition treaties have been signed between His Britannic Majesty and the United States at various periods since 1842, notably in 1889, 1900, 1905 and 1922, providing for the surrender of persons against whom prima facie evidence exists of certain crimes. The list of such crimes now includes murder, manslaughter, arson, burglary, embezzlement, perjury, bribery, and other specified offences. It is now proposed, as regards Canada and the United States, to add to the list of crimes or offences for which extradition may be granted, crimes or offences against the laws for the suppression of the traffic in narcotics, of the country making the request for extradition.

Previous extradition treaties between His Britannic Majesty and the United States—1842, 1889, 1900, 1905, and 1922—applied to cases in which the crime was committed, or, in the other contingency, in which the offender was found, in the United States or in any part of the British Empire. The present agreement is confined to cases in which the offence was committed in the United States or in the Dominion of Canada, and the person so charged is found in the Dominion of Canada or the United States respectively.

The necessity for such an agreement arises from the elaborate organization of drug rings throughout the world, and the dimensions to which the traffic has developed. The Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Health (Mr. Beland) speaking a moment ago gave to the House very fully, the reasons which render advisable this treaty for the extradition of offenders against the narcotic laws.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the Prime Minister sits down—I notice this is called a "convention" and the former arrangement a "treaty"—would he tell us what the difference is?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The two terms are largely interchangeable. They are both more or less formal; a "treaty" is more formal and important than a "convention." I would assume that in the present case use of either term might have been correctly made. The matter dealt with here being a minor matter and the agreement being largely in the nature of an amendment of a former treaty, it was not given the designation of "treaty" but the less formal designation of a "convention."

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I am a little confused not only at the various titles to these many documents but the variety as well of the style of recital. I noticed that the last document was termed a "treaty" and I have always been under the impression, which the Prime Minister was under, that a treaty is the more formal, being entered into between the heads of the contracting states. A "convention," the least formal, is usually, in fact is always, entered into between the states themselves, for example the Post Office convention that exists between Canada and the United States, but here we have a treaty which is supposed to be the most formal and it starts in this way: "His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom" and so forth and "the United States of America"—that is, between the head of the one country and the other country—"being desirous of" and so forth, "agree as follows." But instead of calling it a "treaty" they called it a "convention." Coming now to the second document with which we are dealing at the present time, instead of being as the first one was between His Majesty the King and the United States—formal on the one side, informal on the other—this convention is formal on both sides. It is between "The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India" and so forth. What I am drawing attention to is that it is only confusing to have these various titles. As a matter of fact under the very reading of the document the greater formality attaches to the "convention;" it is between the heads of the two states. There is a lot of fine doctrine now appertaining to these matters since this complicated arrangement was made in 1923, so much so that I am lost in the maze of the whole thing.

Mr. McMASTER: Then why are you endeavouring to instruct us?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not endeavouring to instruct, I am endeavouring to find out the facts, and I have more faith, perhaps, in the hon. member for Brome really shedding some illumination than I am in getting it from any other source. I hope, therefore he will have pity on my mystification and come to the rescue before it is too late. Where are we going to drift to in these matters? There are other documents to be ratified. I think the next two are called "conventions" and they are differently described altogether as respects the parties between whom they are negotiated. I would think uniformity would be best—uniformity all down the line—and so far as I am concerned I think it would be better to follow the heading in this convention in every single instance. Then we would know that at least we are following a certain definite form. We would understand what it is and why it is. We would not be mystified between various forms of language and different titles and no logic or reason in them at all. I make this comment also: that it would be better, it seems to me, if we could have fewer of these treaties, conventions, or whatever in the world you call them, and get them all into one. In the last one there is a provision for the extension of the extradition rights. Why was not that treaty, which was concluded only a few months before this one, made wide enough to include this one?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can answer that to my hon. friend's satisfaction. There is some rule of procedure with respect to extradition law which is different from the rule with respect to other classes of treaties. In other words, matters relating to extradition are supposed to be surrounded with the greatest secrecy, which does not apply to other treaties. The United States government, when it was suggested to amend the extradition law, requested that it should not be made a part of the treaty regarding smuggling. Their reasons for it, as I have said, as given to us, were that in matters relating to extradition they preferred that the whole matter should be kept as secret as possible and not made part of a general treaty. It was at the instance of the United States government itself that the matter was presented in a separate, supplementary document.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not clear as to where the difference in secrecy lies between a convention and a treaty. One is just as public as the other. But the point I was making was this. In the treaty regarding smuggling there is provision as to extradition; if it is not extradition, it is something very close to it. I read from the treaty this clause:

[Mr. Meighen.]

The following offences are added to the list of offences numbered 1 to 3 in article 1 of the treaty concluded between Great Britain and the United States on May 18, 1908, with reference to reciprocal rights for Canada and the United States in the matters of conveyance of prisoners and wrecking and salvage, that is to say:

4. Offences against the narcotic laws of the respective governments.

This may not be actually extradition, but it is about the same. It would seem to me there is no substantial objection to having the whole of them in one, and very probably these two subsequent ones as well. Really it is a bad month nowadays when we do not have a new convention with the United States. I am beginning to think we shall have to adopt the suggestion made by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) for approach to this House. We shall have to construct a tube between here and Washington, so as to enable the minister to get down there and return with expedition. He could probably add roller skates to his equipment.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): With reference to the terms "convention and treaty", my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) might have said those two terms were used interchangeably. But to relieve my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) of any anxiety in the matter, I may say I have here the first extradition treaty between the United States and Great Britain. It was called a treaty, and was negotiated in 1842. Then in 1889 new offences were added to the list of those that were extraditable, but then it was a convention supplementary to the treaty. In 1900 another convention was entered into, still supplementary to the treaty. In 1907 another convention was signed and called a convention. So the convention of this year is still a convention, and I think every one of us ought to be satisfied with the name. My right hon. friend asks, why have a separate treaty or convention to add this offence to the list of extraditable offences, when in the other treaty concerning smuggling there is a section adding the same offence to the list of those with reference to the reciprocal rights of Canada and the United States in the matter of conveyance of prisoners? Well, it is not the same thing at all. This treaty for the conveyance of prisoners is a separate treaty entered into in 1908. It does not give the right of extradition, but it gives the right of an officer of either the United States or Canada who is in custody of a prisoner on his own territory, to convey him on the territory of the other country for the purpose of bringing him into his own territory. That is simply to avoid long transportation in some cases, but it is quite different from an extradition treaty. Now, as has been suggested, perhaps it would have been better not to put the provision in the same treaty, because the extradition treaty is a special document; but at the same time, when the first treaty was signed, the other one might have been signed also. Canada was prepared at that time to sign the extradition treaty adding the special offences, but the United States was not prepared to sign it. There must be agreement on both sides in arranging a treaty; so that we had to postpone the signature of this one.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What are the additional crimes referred to in this resolution?

Mr. LAPOINTE: All the crimes and offences against the law for the suppression of the traffic in narcotics. My hon. friend will find a list of them in chapter 22 of the Revised Statutes of 1923.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate informing their honours that this House has adopted the above resolution, and requesting that their honours will unite with this House in the approval of the above-mentioned treaty. And that the Clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

MINERS AND STEEL WORKERS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): In view of the fact that the provincial government of Nova Scotia has not appointed a commission upon which the Prime Minister based his refusal to take action, and in view of the fact that a deadlock still persists and the conditions of distress still prevail, does the government now intend to take any action.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government will be pleased to take into consideration the representations the hon. member has just made. Up to the present time we have not had an opportunity of considering the matter.

MILITARY DISTRICT NO. 10—COAL INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Does the government propose to lay on the table the report of the royal commission appointed to investigate the alleged frauds in the sale of coal to the Department of National Defence in military district No. 10?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am unable to say whether it is the present intention of the Minister of Defence. I do not think he will have any objection but I would rather the hon. member would permit the matter to stand till the minister himself is present, when he will be in a position to give a definite answer.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): When does the government propose that the committees of this House should get down to business? Last year there were no meetings of committees until after the Easter adjournment, I think, and the session was prolonged into July. Is the same thing going to happen this year? Would it not be possible to have committees sitting immediately so that we might get down to business?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): That, I think, is a matter for members of the committees themselves to decide. If my hon. friend is on a committee and would like it to meet, he has only to ask the whip to see that it be called together.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I will certainly do that.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—REDUCTION OF INDEBTEDNESS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation during this session to provide for reduction of indebtedness on the part of returned men who have taken land under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am afraid I shall have to ask the hon. member to allow his question to stand until the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Robb) is here.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I will repeat my question when that hon. gentleman is in his seat.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BRANCH LINES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. N. H. McTAGGART (Maple Creek): Will legislation be introduced at this session making provision for the construction of Canadian National branch lines; and if so, when is it expected that legislation will be brought down?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps, my hon. friend will allow the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) to answer that question to-morrow.

FEDERAL AID TO HIGHWAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Have the government any announcement to make in regard to federal aid to highways?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): No announcement to make.

OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

AGREEMENT WITH SIR WILLIAM PETERSEN—MOTION IN FAVOUR OF RATIFICATION

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That to give the government of Canada control over certain ocean rates it is expedient to ratify and confirm the agreement between His Majesty and Sir William Petersen, K.C.B.E., as set out in the schedule to this resolution, and dated the eleventh day of December, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four, and that in view of the provisions of said agreement giving the government control over such rates and of the services to be performed thereunder, the Governor in Council may authorize payment out of the consolidated revenue fund to the said Sir William Petersen, K.C.B.E., of an annual amount of two hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds in the manner and for the period provided for in the said agreement.

Schedule

Articles of Agreement made this eleventh day of December in the year of Our Lord 1924,

BETWEEN

His Most Gracious Majesty King George V represented herein by the Honourable Thomas A. Low, His Majesty's Minister of Trade and Commerce for the Dominion of Canada, hereinafter called "the minister," of the one part; and Sir William Petersen, Knight Commander of the British Empire, of the city of London in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called England, hereinafter called "the contractor," of the other part.

Whereas it having come to the knowledge of His Majesty's government in Canada through repeated and continuous representations made by the agricultural community of the Dominion and the manufacturing, producing, commercial and financial interests as well as the general merchants throughout the country, that these trading communities and interests have been and are still seriously handicapped and hampered in their trade relations with overseas countries in bringing their products to such markets and there disposing of them profitably owing to certain difficulties and disadvantages which have been artificially created, and it has been shown that such difficulties and disadvantages are due largely to transportation conditions and the uncertainty of ocean rates indiscriminately placed and imposed upon their goods so exported from time to time, such rates being levied by ocean shipping combines and under the control and jurisdiction of such combines or shipping conferences;

And whereas the consumers of Canada are also interested in the control of ocean rates charged on commodities shipped from British and European continental ports;

And whereas the government of Canada after an investigation of the representations brought to its knowledge and after giving the same serious consideration has thought it wise to adopt such means as may be deemed expedient and necessary to exercise such supervision and control of trans-Atlantic freight rates as it is possible for them to do and thereby as far as possible to prevent and defeat any unreasonable excess or overcharge in ocean freight rates as exercised by such ocean shipping combines or conferences to the loss and detriment of its citizens and has reached the conclusion that in order to more fully safeguard the interests of its citizens it would be well advised to enter into an arrangement whereby it may exercise such control or supervision and whereby it may improve the conditions under which the products of its citizens are exported or imported;

And whereas the contractor has offered to supply a fleet of ten up-to-date new ships of the most modern type with all the latest known appliances for ensuring economy, speedy and cheap transportation and fitted in every respect for ocean service, some of which ships are now in course of construction and all of which are to be approved by the British Board of Trade and are to have the highest classification at Lloyd's and Bureau Veritas Shipping Registries, and the contractor is to furnish all particulars and details of such ships to the technical representatives of the government, and have the same approved by them, such particulars and details being referred to more fully in Schedule "A" which forms part of these presents;

And whereas the contractor has offered to establish and maintain the said fleet of ships as aforesaid in the service hereinafter referred to for a period of ten years from the commencement of the said service or for any longer period that may be mutually agreed upon for an annual subsidy of two hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds (£275,000);

And whereas the government of Canada offer to accept the same subject to ratification by parliament and subject to the terms and conditions more particularly hereinafter set out:

Now this agreement witnesseth that the contractor for and in consideration of the premises and of the covenants and agreements on the part of His Majesty hereinafter contained for himself, his executors and administrators,

Doth hereby covenant and agree to and with His Majesty, His Heirs and Successors in manner following, that is to say:—

1. That the contractor shall and will either personally or by a company which he may form (and it is hereby understood and agreed that this contract may be executed, performed and fulfilled by a duly incorporated company formed or to be formed by or at the instance of the contractor, which company when formed shall be accepted by His Majesty instead of and in lieu of and in substitution for the contractor, and which shall be hereinafter referred to as the "shipping company"):—

(a) Build, equip, provide, establish and during this contract, continue and in the manner hereinafter mentioned, operate a regular shipping service between such ports in Great Britain or Ireland or the continent of Europe, and Canadian ports as may be designated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce for Canada or his representatives from time to time;

(b) Establish and continue and maintain and operate as hereinafter set out the shipping service hereinbefore referred to free from the control of and independent of the Atlantic Shipping Combine or Conference or any other combine or conference now in existence or which may be operated or established upon the Atlantic ocean at any time in the future without the sanction of the government of Canada;

(c) That such service shall be put in effect and maintained with ten ships as hereinbefore referred to and these shall be built and placed in operation with all possible despatch and shall be fully completed and put in service within eighteen months from the date of this agreement (at least two of the same to be placed in service by August 1, 1925) and pending completion of the same, other ships of modern construction properly equipped and of approximately the same tonnage shall be substituted and operated in the said service until the fleet in question is completely constructed and in operation, the said service to commence with at least six ships not later than June 15, 1925;

(d) That the control and regulation of the rates to be charged by the contractor shall rest with the government of Canada and that the government shall fix such transportation rates on all commodities from time to time;

(e) Make proper provision for the carriage of perishable and partly perishable produce by means of cold storage facilities;

(f) Carry emigrants from Great Britain or the continent of Europe at rates to be fixed by the government and carry all Canadian mails free if and when the parties hereto agree upon the establishment of a passenger service or other steamers suitable for the carriage of emigrants in conjunction with and under the control of the shipping company.

2. And His Majesty for himself, his heirs and successors hereby covenants and agrees with the contractor, his administrators and assigns that the contractor well and faithfully performing all and every the covenants, agreements and stipulations hereinbefore set forth and contained by the said contractor to be done and performed shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid to the contractor, his heirs, administrators and assigns during the continuance of this contract an annual subsidy of two hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds (£275,000) from and out of the consolidated fund or other proper moneys of the Dominion of Canada, the same to be paid and payable to the contractor at the city of London, England, in equal monthly instalments payable monthly at the end of each and every month (unless otherwise agreed upon between the contracting parties) in each and every year during the continuance of this agreement, the first monthly instalment to become due and payable one month after the commencement of the service hereinbefore referred to (which shall not be later than June 15, 1925) and instalments monthly thereafter unless the parties hereto mutually agree upon other terms of payment.

3. And it is mutually covenanted and agreed between the parties hereto that the subsidy payable to the contractor in the preceding paragraph is based on the operation and maintenance of a service of ten ships and the subsidy aforementioned shall be increased or reduced as the case may be in proportion to the number of ships operated and maintained by the contractor in the service aforesaid from time to time and such increase or reduction of subsidy shall be added to or deducted from the monthly payments hereinbefore provided for in paragraph two.

4. And it is mutually covenanted and agreed between the parties hereto that the shipping services to be established by the contractor herein will co-operate and work loyally with the Canadian National Railway system and the fleet of ships operated by that system and under its control and known as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

5. And it is mutually covenanted and agreed between the parties hereto that should any of the ships in the service aforesaid be lost or disabled the contractor shall have the privilege of substituting a modern ship of approximately the same tonnage for the ship lost or disabled until the same is replaced or repaired and put in service again as the case may be.

6. And it is mutually covenanted and agreed between the parties hereto that on receiving at least three months' notice from the minister herein the contractor shall arrange to place additional ships up to the number of ten in this service on an increase in subsidy in proportion to the number of ships actually placed in service; the subsidy referred to in paragraph two being based on a service of ten ships; and the additional service to be put in effect within twelve months from the date of the receipt by the contractor of the notice aforesaid.

7. The contractor shall not convey or permit to be conveyed in any steamer while employed in this service any nitro-glycerine or any other articles which in the opinion of the minister shall be considered dangerous.

8. If at any time after the expiration of the eighteen months mentioned in paragraph 1 (c) the contractor should fail to carry on the said service with the full complement of ten ships, the minister may by notice in writing call upon him to supply the deficiency within a delay of three months, and in default of the contractor's doing so within such delay, the minister may terminate the contract by notice in writing.

9. And the contractor covenants and agrees that the vessels in the said service shall prosecute all voyages made by them with all possible speed and despatch.

10. The minister shall have the privilege at his option of entering into contracts for like purposes with any other contractor or contractors.

11. And it is mutually covenanted and agreed between the parties hereto that this contract is to continue in force for the full period of ten years from the time when the first service under the terms hereof is commenced; and the same may be extended for a further period of time and under such terms and conditions as the parties hereto mutually agree upon.

12. Except to the company to be formed by the contractor as hereinbefore provided for to whom this contract may be assigned no other assignment thereof either by the contractor or by the said company is to be or shall be made nor any right nor interest therein without the consent in writing of the minister having been first obtained.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the Honourable Thomas A. Low, "the minister" hath hereunto set and affixed his hand and seal as such and "the contractor" has hereunto set his hand and seal the day and year first above written.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to take this first opportunity of explaining to the House the full details of this contract as I believe the country as well as the House is anxiously awaiting such explanation. I wish to say at the outset that it is the intention of the government, in full realization of the importance of this measure, to refer it to a select committee. When the bill itself comes up for its second reading, parliament will be asked to refer it to such a special committee, so that anybody who has any suggestions to offer or any questions to ask may have an opportunity of being heard before the contract is ratified.

This matter of ocean freight rates and ocean combines is not a new one. It has been brought to the attention of governments and of parliament many times during the past twenty-five years. Numerous commissions have been appointed and each commission in turn has reported that a combine did exist.

I shall endeavour this afternoon to establish to the satisfaction of the House that a combine does exist; that Canadian ports have been discriminated against in favour of United States ports, and that the preference which the dominions have given to the Mother Country has been nullified in many instances, by the action of this combine. I intend to show that the British manufacturer and the British merchant have been discriminated against in favour of German and other foreign merchants. I intend to show that, perhaps, there is nothing retarding immigration to this country more to-day than the action of this gigantic combine.

The item of greatest interest to us in the subject is the actual "ocean rates" and I intend, this afternoon, to try to establish—and I think I shall succeed in doing so—that these rates are exorbitant, and unjustified. In my endeavour to prove that, I propose to call as my star witness the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). I intend to establish by his sworn testimony that he was of the opinion that a combine existed, and that, when he gave evidence before the Dominions Royal Commission, he was of the opinion that the rates at that time were unnecessarily high. How much more does that apply to-day?

There seems to be no doubt that a combine exists. It embraces almost all the leading shipping companies of the north Atlantic—the American line, Anchor-Donaldson, Baltic-America, Canadian Pacific Railway, Companie Generale, Trans-Atlantic, Cosulich, Cunard, Hamburg-America, United-America, United States, Intercontinental Transports, Holland-America, North German Lloyd, Norwegian-American Company, Cairns-Noble Company, Scandinavian-American, Swedish-American, Red Star, Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, White Star, White Star Dominion, Furness-Withy Company, Maclean-Kennedy Company

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Under what different flags are they flying? Is the minister prepared to say that?

Mr. LOW: I am not prepared to say, but I think the majority are plying under the British flag. The rates of all these companies sailing out of Canadian ports are generally fixed at the city of New York. One can realize how little interest Americans or those who are associated with them at the head office in the city of New York, will display for Canada or Canadian ports. The activities of this combine have been the subject of investigation upon more than one occasion. In 1909, the British government became alarmed and appointed a commission known as the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings. I am sorry to say that I have not been able to secure a copy of their full report, but I have evidence that they reported that a combine did exist. Then there was the commission appointed by the Canadian government of the day, the Drayton commission in 1913. Of the finding of my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) there can be no question. At that time the hon. member was plain Mr. Drayton, chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, whose one concern was to look after the interests of the people of Canada. I find in his report the following:

> The position when action was taken by your honourable body was that steamship conferences were effective so that no competition was afforded beyond the sporadic competition that the tramp freight boat affords. Competition of this character affords no protection whatever to shippers requiring regular shipments in less than cargo lots. In my view, such a condition practically eliminates all competition, and requires some governmental control.

And again:

> This affirmation by a member of the conference of a condition under which the business of any given importer could, at any time, perhaps by the carrier's whim, lack of information, or desire for an excessive return, be at least temporarily extinguished, would appear of itself, to call for the fullest investigation.....
> Might I be permitted to say that, if the Dominions Royal Commission could take this matter up and make an interim report on it, if necessary, I do not think the inquiry could be in better hands.

On the recommendation of my hon. friend the matter was referred to the Dominions Royal Commission. That commission was not appointed solely to inquire into the question of ocean freight rates; its creation was the result of a resolution adopted at the Imperial conference held in 1911. Six members were appointed to represent the British government, while each dominion was represented by one member. I might cite the purpose of the commission:

> The Dominions Royal Commission came into being in consequence of a resolution passed by the Imperial Conference of 1911. The members were first appointed on the 15th April, 1912. Six represented the United Kingdom and one each Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and Newfoundland.

The representative of Canada on that commission was a gentleman whose opinion I am sure hon. members opposite will have no hesitation in accepting as authoritative—I mean the Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster. That gentleman concurred in the findings of the commission, who state:

> In the pre-war period, as we pointed out in our second interim report, British steamship companies had made a practice of charging a lower rate to New Zealand from Hamburg and other German ports than from London on the same classes of goods. We may repeat the observations which we made then on this state of affairs:—"The net effect of this practice.....has been, and must be to facilitate the competition of German manufacturers with British in New Zealand, unduly to handicap British manufacturers, and to destroy, at least to the extent of the difference in freights, the advantage intended by New Zealand to be given, by means of preference, to the British manufacturer." No satisfactory explanation of the matter was given to us at the time by the companies concerned. No assurance, to the best of our knowledge, has been given either to Your Majesty's government or to the New Zealand government that similar practices will not continue after the war. The case is much the same with regard to the differential freight rates charged on asbestos from Canada to foreign and British ports, to which attention was drawn in our Fifth Interim Report.

Now listen to another clause which was concurred in by Sir George E. Foster:

> For ourselves we regard it as intolerable that British shipowners should be in a position to initiate or countenance practices of a kind so directly inimical to British trade.

And again in their finding the commissioners state:

> We are satisfied that the operations of the steamship companies should not remain longer without some measure of government control. This view is based on two grounds:—
>
> (a) That in normal times the combination of shipowners is strong enough to limit the freedom of shippers, whose varied and detached interests make it difficult for them to combine in any effective opposition.
> (b) That in some cases shipowners have used this power to grant more favourable freight rates on foreign than on British goods.

That was the finding of the Dominions Royal Commission appointed by the British government, on which there was a representative from Canada in the person of the Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster.

But perhaps the most thorough and exhaustive report that has been made on the subject was that of the committee appointed by this House two years ago under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) when evidence was brought out which convinced this government that it was time for action.

Now, much has been said of the Preston report; but after all is there anything new in the Preston report? There is nothing in that report that was not contained in the report of the agricultural committee appointed by this House. I have noticed many press comments upon the Preston report, but in each case almost entirely—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell us how much it cost?

Mr. LOW: If my right hon. friend wishes to draw a red herring across the trail I am sure a simple question like that will not succeed.

Mr. McMASTER: We hope value was given.

Mr. LOW: The question as to the cost of the Preston report will prove I am sure of value to this House and to the people of the country. As I was saying, a section of the press of Canada in an endeavour to discredit that report has attacked its author, but I am glad to say that only a small wing of the press has assumed that attitude. But I am not so much concerned about the author of any of these reports as I am concerned about their contents. It has been charged that there has been discrimination against Canadian ports. I am sure that no hon. member in this House who was a member of the former administration will attempt to deny that assertion. It was brought to the attention of the government on more than one occasion during that time, and it was brought again to the attention of this government. In the fall of 1923 I prepared a memorandum for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), who were then going over to attend the Imperial conference, and I asked them to bring before the Economic conference the question of discrimination against the flour exports of this country. They did so, with the result that the matter was adjusted in a few weeks. But that discrimination had continued for many years. The American miller was able to mill his wheat and ship it to Liverpool and London at from eight to ten cents a barrel less than the Canadian miller; and worse than that, he was able to buy Canadian wheat, mill it in transit and ship it at this advantage over his Canadian competitor. The government succeeded in having that discrimination adjusted.

Now as to immigration. To-day perhaps nothing is retarding immigration more than the action of this combine. In 1900 an immigrant could be brought to this country for $17.50; to-day it costs $85. In 1900 a man, his wife and five children could be landed in Canada for $122.50; to-day it costs $600. Contrast this with the fact that this combine will carry European emigrants to South America, more than double the distance, at lower rates than they are quoting to Canadian ports. Let me read a letter from one of our immigration officers to show how adversely these high rates are affecting immigration to this country. Evidently he was not thinking of this debate, for he writes:

> The prospect of securing farm labour from Great Britain did not look encouraging at the end of the month. The high third class fares have turned many to ask for assistance, and our officers report large numbers of applications for assisted passages in whole or in part. As only a small number of these applications can be absorbed, it would appear that many very desirable farm workers will be unable to go to Canada by reason of the cost of passage. However, it is too early to give a final word in this regard.

Mr. BRISTOL: Will the minister give us the particulars on which he bases his comparison of ocean rates? In other words, do the rates to South American ports include railway transportation, or are they purely port to port rates?

Mr. LOW: Before this debate is concluded I shall be very glad to furnish my hon. friend with all the details he requires. Now I come to the exorbitant freight rates charged by the North Atlantic Steamship Conference, and I think, as I said before, that the evidence of my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) is conclusive on this point. He was then—1916—chief commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and when giving evidence before the Dominions Royal Commission in October, 1916 he was asked whether in his opinion ocean freight rates were too high. He replied:

> My own conclusion, from the little investigation which I was able to make, was that the companies were perfectly right in saying that the cost has largely increased. But while all that was true, the increased carrying facilities of the boats were so great that when you came to prorate the increase over your carrying unit—the marine ton—the cost per carrying unit had gone down, although the cost per vessel for operation per trip had gone up very much. Or course, the cost per carrying unit is the decisive matter on which your rate should be based.

That was the opinion of my hon. friend from West York, and if that were the condition at the time at which he was speaking I am sure it is still worse to-day. As further evidence that these rates are altogether out of proportion to the increased cost of other things, I desire, with the consent of the House, to place on Hansard a letter from a manufacturer.

Mr. CLARK: Before the minister proceeds further, would he give details of the evidence that he has been quoting from?

Mr. LOW: Part one, page 334, paragraph 4,675, of the Minutes of Evidence taken in 1916 by the Royal Commission on the Natural Resources, Trade, and Legislation of Certain Portions of His Majesty's Dominions. The letter to which I referred was written by a manufacturer who charged that the rate on his article of export had increased from $1.50 per ton of 40 cubic feet in 1911, to $12 at the present time. In 1911 the writer was exporting a carload of instruments every week; to-day he is not shipping one carload in a year as the result of these exorbitant rates. But hon. members will get a better idea of this manufacturer's complaint when they read his letter in Hansard to-morrow. The letter reads:

5 p.m.

Now, I am enclosing you documents that will prove the statements which I am to make.

At the present time, as you will see by the ocean bill of lading I am sending you dated October 21, 1924, we are paying 30 cents per cubic foot or $12 per ton of 40 cubic feet, on organs or pianos going to Liverpool. In 1910 we paid on similar instruments six shillings and ninepence per ton of 40 cubic feet, which is practically $1.50 per ton of 40 cubic feet, as you will also see by the enclosed ocean bill of lading.

I am also sending you bills of lading of the years 1911, 1912 and 1913. In 1911 we paid six shillings and ninepence per 40 cubic feet. In 1912 and 1913 we paid twelve shillings and sixpence and 5 per cent per 40 cubic feet, which is practically $3 per 40 cubic feet, as you will see by the bills of lading enclosed. To-day, as already stated, we are paying $12, which is 400 per cent of an increase over 1913 and 700 per cent of an increase compared with what we were paying in the year 1910, and for many years before.

As a glaring example of what this combine is demanding of us, in the way of ocean freight rates, I might state that we are shipping musical instruments to-day to Cape Town, South Africa, at $9.50 per 40 cubic feet, and on which, as already stated, we have to pay $12 to Liverpool. The distance in one case is three thousand miles and in the other case where we are paying less freight, six thousand miles.

It will be quite safe in saying that ten or fifteen years prior to the year 1910 referred to above, we were paying only six shillings and ninepence per 40 cubic feet on these instruments.

You are at liberty to make any use of the enclosed documents you wish, only return them to us when you are through with them.

I have representatives of the steamship companies calling on me every week, who are complaining about the small amount of freight that is offered, and I never miss an opportunity of telling them that it is all their own fault, as the prohibitive freight rates make it impossible for us or anyone else to do the business we were doing before the war.

In 1910 and 1911 and for many preceding years, we were shipping a carload of instruments to Liverpool every week. The car would contain eighteen instruments. To-day we nor anyone else ship a carload in a year, simply because the freight rates, added to the price that we must get for our instruments, brings them up to the price of what they can purchase a cheap piano for in England, of German or English make. We might say that we have cut our prices for export, to the bone, in fact the cost, as we regard this export trade merely a means to reduce our overhead.

Our experience is the experience of all other manufacturers of musical instruments in Canada, and also the experience of all those who ship bulky goods where the rate is calculated on a ton of 40 cubic feet basis.

If I can be of any further service to you, do not hesitate to ask me, as I feel that the steamship companies, including the Canadian Merchant Marine, are only preventing trade coming to them by demanding such exorbitant freight rates, and I sometimes think that the Canadian Merchant Marine are the worst sinners of the lot.

For instance, we had a number of instruments going to the West Indies some weeks ago, and have also a shipment of five going this week, and we found that the Canadian Merchant Marine rates were much higher than what we were quoted from Pickford & Black of Halifax, so instead of sending the instruments to Montreal, we had to send them to Halifax and the amount saved on the ocean freight more than paid the difference on the inland freight between Montreal and Halifax.

I have also a letter from the Cockshutt Plow Company Ltd., of Brantford, which I am sure will be of interest to my hon. friends opposite, and which reads:

Answering your letter of November 27 with reference to freight rates on goods for United Kingdom ports, rates on agricultural implements have almost quadrupled in the period you mention. Prior to the war there was practically a uniform rate of ten shillings and sixpence per ton on implements. This might fluctuate occasionally, due to temporary conditions, but we used to figure approximately $2.50 per ton. To-day there is apparently a tight conference ruling on freight rates to these ports, and the best rate we have been able to obtain for some little time has been $10 a ton. It puts us in an unfavourable position as compared with doing business with other markets. When one considers that goods can be laid down in South Africa for $7.50 per ton and in Buenos Aires or Montevideo for $7 per ton; the hauls in both cases being more than double that to the United Kingdom ports.

We can assure you that any assistance the Department of Trade and Commerce can render exporters in connection with these rates will not only be appreciated but will be beneficial to the various industries interested.

Yours very truly,
COCKSHUTT PLOW COMPANY LTD.,
Geo. G. Scott.
Export Department.

The Manitoba Free Press, commenting upon ocean rates in an editorial last June, stated:

The railways have increased their rates 40½ per cent, the steamship companies 166 per cent. No one so far has had the temerity to attempt to approve that the cost of operating ships has increased in that proportion. The only means whereby the North Atlantic Conference or combine can be brought to time is by the Canadian government securing ten or twelve tramp ships, having them properly fitted and putting them into the cattle trade with a rate of $10 per head to any British port.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister has quoted a despatch from the papers giving certain rates. Were those rates average rates for all commodities, or rates on some specific commodities?

Mr. LOW: I think the reference was to cattle rates. Now, take the opinion of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and I am sure that my hon. friends opposite will not readily dispute anything that that association may say. As I read the Montreal Gazette and the criticisms of our plan to reduce rates, I have been wondering just whose opinion it represents. Usually it voices the opinion of the manufacturers, but on this occasion it is taking issue with the manufacturers, because the manufacturers presented a memorandum to the Imperial Shipping Company about a year ago, as follows:

> Exporters and importers, however, view with considerable alarm the general tendency which has been expressed by material increases in ocean rates this spring in a number of the important trade routes. In this connection we would particularly point out the North Atlantic United Kingdom Conference eastbound placed into effect on March 1st a general increase in ocean rates, which was stated to average twenty-five per cent, although some important commodities were increased to a much greater extent. Protests were entered with the steamship companies against these proposals, but while the matter is still under investigation no adjustments have as yet been made. We feel that the level of rates now in effect is unreasonable when compared with the basis in effect in 1914, or just prior to the war. An examination of a number of rates on important commodities indicates that the present level of ocean rates from Canada to the United Kingdom is from 166 to 433 per cent higher, and we believe that this level is in excess of what is warranted by general conditions.

Mr. BRISTOL: Would the minister allow me another question? I see in this document, which apparently is issued by the Atlantic Conference, and has been mailed to us, a statement as follows:

> In the list of eastbound rates promulgated by the North Atlantic Conference no rate or agreement is made in respect of grain, flour or cattle, these rates being absolutely open.

Is that statement true or not?

Mr. LOW: I do not know whether it is true or not, but I am prepared to say this: If there is no rate fixed by the North Atlantic Conference on grain, there is no credit or thanks due the North Atlantic Conference, because the tramp ships coming into Canadian ports regulate the price of carrying grain across the Atlantic.

Mr. BRISTOL: I am asking for facts, if the rates include cattle.

Mr. HANSON: Is it not a fact that the regular liners out of Montreal are carrying grain cheaper than the tramp steamers out of Montreal?

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it would be more in conformity with the rules if hon. gentlemen would leave the minister free to explain the main features of the resolution. Then, when we are in committee, questions can be put.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Speaker, I shall now endeavour to establish that the rates are exorbitant. Perhaps one of the most important products of the farm is bacon and other meats. In 1911 the ordinary storage cost was 16.88 cents per one hundred pounds; to-day it is 50 cents per one hundred pounds, an increase of about 200 per cent. In cold air storage, in 1911 it cost 22.24 cents per one hundred pounds for bacon and meats; to-day it costs 85 cents per one hundred pounds, an increase of about 300 per cent.

It costs $7.50 to carry a ton of newsprint to Cape Town, South Africa, a distance of 7,108 miles; it costs $10.08 to carry the same ton of newsprint to London, a distance of 3,241 miles, and $8.00 to Buenos Ayres, a distance of 6,421 miles. In 1914 the rate on newsprint to the United Kingdom was $3.04 per one hundred pounds; to-day it costs $10.08 per one hundred pounds, an increase of about 231 per cent.

Now I shall quote the rates and increases in another line outside of the conference which is being subsidized by this country and carrying on a service to South Africa. In 1914 it cost $7.30 to carry a ton of newsprint to Cape Town; to-day notwithstanding the increases, it costs $7.50 per ton, or almost the same, because, fortunately for the people of Canada and the newsprint men, the Elder-Dempster Line is not in the combine.

As I said at the outset, this is not a new question. The matter has been brought to the attention of parliament upon more than one occasion, and in the year 1920 there was a rejection by the Acting Prime Minister, Sir George E. Foster, as reported in Hansard of May 5, page 2013, of a resolution moved by Mr. Armstrong asking that the recommendation of the Dominions Royal Commission be given effect. The Acting Prime Minister stated that he was not prepared to accept the motion and advised the hon. member to drop it, which was done. Again in the following session, the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, Sir George E. Foster, answering a question in the House on this matter as reported in Hansard of May 18, 1921, page 3530, as to whether the government intended to give effect to the report of the Dominions Royal Commission, stated that the government were awaiting the inquiry of the Imperial Shipping committee. The minister further answered:

> After this investigation is finished and the reports made, what action, if any, is to be taken by the government will have to be determined after the reception and consideration of these reports by the committee.

So, Mr. Speaker, as I said before, this is not a new question. Governments and parliaments have been appealed to before on this same question.

When the decision of this government was announced in the press, I read two or three articles in which the question was asked, why did not the government approach the ship owners or the Imperial Shipping committee? And it was charged that we had approached the matter in the wrong way. I also notice that all the shipping companies are very emphatic in their denial that the commissioner ever approached them with reference to freight rates. Well, I do not know about the commissioner, or whether he approached them or not; but they will not have the hardihood to say that I did not approach them. A year ago I asked the shipping men, the representatives of the different shipping companies, to meet me in Montreal and, after several meetings in which I appealed to those gentlemen to make a slight reduction on the carrying charges on cattle across the Atlantic, I received no encouragement whatever. I offered, if they would reduce the rate, to give an understanding that I would see how far the government was prepared to go in supplementing such reduction. They met me more than once, and about all I received from them was a pleasant smile, I could make no headway; and now they wonder why we did not approach them before we decided to deal with Sir William Petersen and enter into a contract with him. A few days ago I received a cablegram from certain of the vessel owners of England offering to refer the whole matter to the Imperial Shipping committee for investigation. Well, the reply to that is that the matter is now before parliament, and that if these shipping companies have any representations to make I am sure the committee to be appointed by this House to deal with the subject will be glad to receive their representations. But we have had a little experience with the Imperial Shipping committee. I noticed by the press the other day the claim that the matter of discrimination in the rates on flour had been remedied by their visit to Canada. I am glad to be able to say that the matter was adjusted by the efforts of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways and Canals, when they were attending the Economic conference in England. The people of this country made many representations to the Imperial Shipping committee when they were here about twelve months ago, and I have failed to observe that any great relief has been given to Canadian shippers up to the present time. Therefore if this matter were referred to the Imperial Shipping committee I should like to feel assured—although I feel quite satisfied that this government is going to be in power for another twenty years—that there would be some hope of getting a remedy for the existing grievances before we go out of office.

That brings me to the contract upon which I desire to say a few words. The government looks upon this as a cast-iron contract. It was drawn by one of the best legal minds in Canada—perhaps, the foremost in this country. So that if there is anything wrong with the drawing of the contract it is not through any lack of effort on the part of the government to secure the best counsel possible. The most important provision in that contract is—

Mr. BOYS: Who is the cast-iron contract with?

Mr. LOW: I hope my hon. friend has read the contract embodied in the resolution?

Mr. BOYS: I have.

Mr. LOW: Then I am sure it discloses the information for which he has asked.

Mr. BOYS: Do the government regard the covenant of Sir William Petersen as in anyway vital to the contract?

Mr. LOW: We do, and I may say that the contract contains a clause providing that not one dollar is to be paid over to Sir William Petersen until the services contracted for have been rendered by that gentleman.

Mr. BOYS: Does the minister object to another question?

Mr. LOW: Well, I would rather my hon. friend would wait.

Mr. BOYS: Certainly. I do not wish to be discourteous, and if my hon. friend objects I will not ask the question at this stage. But I understood the minister to say that he regarded the covenant of Sir William Petersen as vital. If that be so cannot Sir William Petersen, under clause 1 of the contract, escape his personal covenant entirely by substituting for this contract one with a proposed company, and when the contract of the proposed company is completed will it not supersede the contract in question and in that event Sir William Petersen's convenant will no longer be in existence?

Mr. LOW: I might just say to my hon. friend that this is a matter for discussion at a later date. Now I want to make a few references to Sir William Petersen who is not unknown to the Canadian people, nor to the North Atlantic Conference.

Mr. BOYS: That is why we want his covenant.

Mr. LOW: He has successfully opposed that conference upon more than one occasion during the past quarter of a century. Sir William Petersen first became known to the people of Canada when he came to this country in 1893 with a fleet of boats to engage in the carrying of coal from Cape Breton to Montreal. About that time the collieries of Cape Breton amalgamated and the rate per ton for the carriage of coal was approximately $1.25 to $1.50. Sir William Petersen succeeded in cutting that rate practically in two, and to-day it remains at about the same. Again he was one of the first gentlemen—if not the first—to introduce the carrying of grain from the head of the lakes to continental ports. In 1897 he entered into a contract with the Laurier administration, a contract about which much has been said in the press. The details of the arrangement are familiar to all hon. members. What happened in 1897 was that the German conference and the North Atlantic lines fought the Petersen scheme with such tenacity that the government granted an extension of one year. The following year the Spanish-American war broke out. As all hon. members know that war as all wars played havoc with shipping companies, and as a result the whole scheme was abandoned. Perhaps over in England they have a higher opinion of Sir William Petersen than some hon. gentlemen opposite. His position during war time alone should substantiate our confidence in him. In 1916, with the approval of the British government and through the President of the Board of Trade, he was elected chairman of the British committee of the Bureau Veritas, the largest shipping registry in the world, exclusive of Lloyd's, with headquarters at Antwerp. This committee superintended the construction of standard vessels for the British government during the war, the testing and inspection of war material and facilitated munitions. Sir William was also given authority to dispose of the German fleet interned in Portugal and Brazil. To-day, seven years after the war, Sir William is still chairman of the British committee of the Bureau Veritas.

That is his record in England, and I am sure that any contract that this government has entered into with Sir William Petersen is sufficiently safeguarded to protect the people of this country. We hear much about the Petersen fleet of ten ships. It is referred to by some hon. members as a mere flea bite, but let us make a comparison with some of the best known lines in the north Atlantic trade. Take the White Star line. I have never heard the White Star line described as a flea bite in Canadian trade, nor of no account, yet here are the details of the White Star Canadian line:

Passenger and freight	Built in	Gross tonnage
Regina	1916	16,500
Doric	1923	16,484
Megantic	1909	14,878
Canada	1896	9,472
Freight and Cattle
Oxonian	1898	6,383
Turcoman	1892	5,829
Colonian	1892	6,583
Cornishman	1891	5,749
Welshman	1891	5,730
Caledonian	1900	4,998

It will be noted that the greater number of freight and cattle boats are from 30 to 35 years old. They have earned their depreciation, and they have paid for themselves twice over. They owe their companies nothing, and in all probability they are not in a position to compete with the very up-to-date boats that are built to-day.

The Anchor-Donaldson line is not looked upon with contempt, yet it has four passenger and six freight steamers only, on the Canadian service.

I have a list of the ships of the Anchor-Donaldson line, the Canadian Cunard service, the Furness Withy Company, the Head line, the Manchester line, the Cairn line and the Canadian Pacific ocean services.

The Anchor-Donaldson Line—

Passenger and Freight steamers	Built in	Gross tons
Saturnia	1910	8,611

The Cunard Canadian Services have not been hitherto regarded as insignificant, yet they have but ten boats: five passenger and freight; five freight steamers on the Canadian service, as follows:

Passenger and Freight steamers	Built in	Gross tons
Asconia	1924	13,900
Antonia	1921	13,867
Ausonia	1921	13,912

The Furness Withy Co. have only three freight vessels on the Canadian Service, namely:

Canada to London and Hull (fortnightly)
(cannot carry cattle)

	Built in	Gross tonnage
Cornish Point	1914	4,259
Comino	1918	4,618
Ariano	1918	5,155

The Head line plying to Irish ports from Canada has but six freight vessels with an average tonnage of 5,000.

Canada to Irish Ports—about fortnightly

As a matter of fact, taking them all in all, the Petersen line will compare very favourably with any fleet working out of the port of Montreal or the Atlantic ports outside of the Canadian Pacific ocean services. We often hear the question asked, why does the Merchant Marine not pay? Well, I am not a shipping man myself. Perhaps I could not do better than quote from the authority of Mr. Fetterolf of the International Mercantile Marine lines, speaking in the city of Boston a few days ago, and reported in a New York paper of February of this year. The report reads as follows:

A. C. Fetterolf, freight traffic manager of International Mercantile Marine lines delivered an address on Tuesday night at the annual dinner of the Traffic Club of New England at Boston. Mr. Fetterolf is an authority on ocean transportation and has had many years of experience in trans-Atlantic shipping. His remarks at the dinner in Boston defined clearly the position of not only the I.M.M. lines but of steamship companies operating out of practically all ports of the world.

Of the boats of the class of the Government Merchant Marine he makes the following derogatory statement:

"Another class, more or less temporary, is a product of the war and may be placed in a category by themselves on account of the disappointment that they have brought to their owners and shippers alike, namely, the war built standardized cargo ship. They were built of such materials that could be quickly assembled without regard to their suitability for commercial uses.

'These ships are at best a compromise, and, as they were designed for no particular trade, they do not give the best results in any trade."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that speech refers entirely to the ships built by the American government in their standard plan. The hon. minister can correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. LOW: They certainly apply to the merchant marine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister says so, the speaker does not.

Mr. LOW: They certainly refer to the merchant marine type. I might add myself, in addition to that, that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine probably cost three times the amount it would cost to build to-day. What has Mr. Fetterolf to say about the class of boats that are to be used by the Petersen company? Referring to the cargo liner steamers in which the Petersen boats fit, Mr. Fetterolf states:

> The next classification which occurs to me is the "cargo liner", probably the most useful and important ship in the commerce of the world. Some years ago these ships were small, they averaged 3,500 to 6,000 tons, but now range from 7,500 to 10,000 tons. If the best results are to be obtained with ships of this class, they must be specially designed for the trades they serve, with the object of obtaining the greatest efficiency and economy in handling and transporting cargo without damage or deterioration. These ships have a speed of from 10 to 13 knots with winches and other gear designed for quick loading and discharging in order to keep their regular sailing dates.

That is the class of boats that Sir William Petersen proposes to establish for Canadian trade. The government endeavoured to ascertain, as far as possible, whether ocean rates could be reduced by using modern, up-to-date boats, with a company with no obsolete boats to carry in their capital expenditure or overhead, and I asked a shipping man to submit to me a statement showing the probable returns from an average cargo between Montreal and Liverpool. I also asked Sir William Petersen to do this, and he submitted a statement showing what he would expect from an average cargo from Montreal to Liverpool. He also furnished us with a statement of the cost of operating one of those boats from Montreal to Liverpool and back again in ballast, and it showed a net profit on the round trip, coming back in ballast, of £3,000. I submitted that statement to Mr. Teakle, the expert of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and he sent me a letter which I shall ask permission to place upon Hansard, together with a copy of his statement showing the returns from an average cargo, and a statement of the cost of operating a boat to Liverpool and back again. The letter and statements are as follows:

> Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited

> Minister of Trade and Commerce,

> Dear Mr. Low:
>
> Referring to conversations in Ottawa on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. I am sending you herewith the information you asked me to gather.
>
> I have treated the question as carefully as it has been possible for me to do so without complete data in respect to the ships, as I think you are aware, Sir William Petersen has no plan of the proposed vessels with him, so that I had to work on the general details given to me by that gentleman.
> The most difficult part was in respect to the shelter deck space. Sir William could not tell me from memory just what cubic space would be contained therein so that I have had to guess at it, and without a plan of the ships am unable to measure off and see whether or not I am allowing too little or too much for cattle to be carried in that space.
>
> In regard to the statement covering cargo and earnings, I have taken what I consider a very good and yet average cargo, and have taken the rates on the basis of the average rate covering the last thirteen months.
> Insofar as disbursements are concerned, there is substantial agreement between Sir William and myself, he estimating £6,103.0.0 per round trip voyage and I, £6,134.0.0, but neither have included anything for managerial expenses.
>
> I just want to once more draw your attention to the items I questioned when in Ottawa, and which Sir William Petersen assured us are correct, namely, wages to be paid the crew, insurance on the vessels, and the manner in which redemption and depreciation is to be taken care of, and also the oil consumption. These are points I cannot check without going so closely into the proposition as might cause inquiries to be made, but I have no reason to think these figures are materially out of line.
>
> I am also enclosing herewith statement showing the going rates on various commodities for the last thirteen months with the average rate for same, also a statement of sailings from Montreal and Quebec to the United Kingdom since May 1.
>
> Taking Sir William Petersen's proposition of ten ships, I calculate that they would make fifty voyages from Montreal to the United Kingdom between May 1 and November 30.
> In any estimate of gross earnings, much must necessarily depend upon the cargo to be obtained and this in turn, depends on rates, business conditions, activity in solicitation, and various other factors.
>
> As to the proposed speed of the ships, consideration should be given as to whether somewhat faster ships might attract more lucrative business.
> I trust what I have given you will meet with your requirements and if I can be of further service, will you kindly call on me.
> Yours very truly,

I would also like to read a few extracts from a letter from Sir Henry Thornton, dated Montreal, November 21, 1924, as follows:

Dear Mr. Low:

I have had an opportunity of looking over Teakle's figures in connection with Sir William Petersen's proposition, and I note there is a substantial agreement with respect to operating costs which would seem to bear out the essential claim of Sir William, although neither has included anything for what may be called "managerial expenses". I should hardly think, however, this would be a very large item as our own shipping officers and freight solicitors on this side could canvass freight for the new proposition as well as the railway without additional expense.

The proposition seems to disclose the following fundamental features:

(1) From our investigation, it seems that Sir William's estimate of the cost of ocean carriage under his proposal is substantially correct:

(2) We have nothing to fear from competition or hostility on the part of others as this would in the last analysis be to the advantage of Canadian shippers.

(3) It looks as if there might be more in the Petersen type of ship construction than we have been led to believe.

(4) There is no doubt about Petersen's experience and knowledge of the shipping business:

(5) The proposals, if they can be brought into effect, would be of material advantage to our shipping public.

The above is the way it looks to me in a general fashion, and perhaps this little analysis may be of some assistance to you.

Yours sincerely,

H. W. THORNTON.

That was the endorsation of Sir Henry Thornton.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to disturb the minister, but at this point it would be very interesting to get the costs of the new boats if we could have that while this submission is going on.

Mr. LOW: That will be presented to the House and to the committee in due course.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would assume the government knew it before they made the contract. They evidently did not.

Mr. LOW: In conclusion, I just wish to state that the government of my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) was appealed to from time to time to do something in connection with ocean combines and ocean rates. Similar representations were made to this government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell me who appealed to the government of which I was the head?

Mr. LOW: Of which my right hon. friend was a member. It is the opinion of the government that they have taken what offers as the best plan to break in on the combine in an endeavour to reduce rates, not alone to the Canadian farmer, but also to the Canadian manufacturer. If any hon. member has any better method to suggest, I am sure that the House will be very glad to have it offered for consideration. But we have given this matter a great deal of thought and we have reached the conclusion that this suggestion offers practically the only method by which the combine can be broken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister referred to the government of which I was a member being appealed to in this matter. I should be glad if he would give the reference as to who made the appeal.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. LOW: There is ample correspondence on the files, and there is the resolution which was introduced by one of the supporters of my right hon. friend. Was that not an appeal to do something?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Lake freights, was it not?

Mr. LOW: Not lake freights at all—ocean freights. I read the item and I will read it again if my right hon. friend so desires. The resolution was introduced by Mr. Armstrong, one of the representatives from Ontario, and as I stated, the Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster, who was leading the House at the time, asked the hon. member to drop his resolution. The resolution asked that effect be given to the findings of the Dominions Royal Commission. To-morrow, my right hon. friend will find it on Hansard.

All the dominions are aroused over the matter, and not alone in the dominions is it creating discussion, but in the British parliament at the present time questions are being asked and the matter is being debated. I am sure it must be apparent to every hon. member that it is time for some government in the Dominion to take some action.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): The subject matter of the resolution now before the House is one of great importance and it touches such a variety of subjects and interests that I shall not presume for one moment to attempt to cover the whole ground in the course of my remarks. I purpose rather dealing with the question in a more or less general way and when we get into committee, if we arrive at that stage, we can discuss the details much more fully and with perhaps greater effect.

Having reference to the observations made this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) in introducing the subject, I have just a few things to say. My hon. friend, at the very outset, said in effect that he would proceed to show that a combine did exist, that its rates were exorbitant, and so on. He then referred to a large number of commissions that had been appointed at one time or another, remarking quite truly that this was not a new question, that it had been discussed on many previous occasions, and that various bodies had investigated and reported upon it. I was surprised when he said that one of the most important investigations that had been held was that of the royal commission appointed by Great Britain which reported in 1909, and the minister also said that he had found it impossible to secure a copy of the report of that commission, and he expressed regret at that fact. I was surprised to hear him make that statement, and I immediately sent a page to the Library and within five minutes received the report. I do not know, therefore, why my hon. friend should have experienced any difficulty in getting a copy of it.

Mr. LOW: It was probably out of the Library at the time.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all. As a matter of fact, the minister mentioned previously that he had been dealing with this question since last June, and I doubt whether the report has been out of the Library at all. At any rate, it was there when I sent for it and I got it and looked it over. It is rather unfortunate, I think, that the minister had not secured a copy of this report, for there are some very interesting things in it. I notice for one thing that this commission was appointed first in 1906 and reported in 1909; and I notice further that Canada had a representative upon it for a time, among other distinguished gentlemen. That representative was Isaac Hendry Mathers, Deputy Receiver General of Nova Scotia, and it is recorded in the report I have under my hand that he resigned after about a year, as Canada's interests were not affected at all. I want to read to the minister a few excerpts from this report. I have not had the time to study this report as carefully as I have studied another one which I have by me, of equal or greater importance, and which also, I presume, the minister has failed to see. At this point let me observe that had the minister had his erstwhile agent, one Preston, take this report along with others and sit down in the Library of this parliament, there could have been prepared an infinitely better report for presentation to parliament than the one we have before us and to which I desire, shortly, to give my attention. However, in the present report to which I have alluded I find among the recommendations at the end, the following:

> It was suggested by some of our witnesses notably Mr. Tredwen, that all that was required to check abuses of the conference system was that the shippers and merchants in a given trade should form themselves into an association so that they might be able to present a united front to the conference when any controversy arose.

The report then observes:

> This suggestion we adopt as our main recommendation.

The document then proceeds to deal with a lot of detail. Let me point out in passing that this important commission, to which the minister referred this afternoon and whose report he admitted not having read, recommends this system. Among other things the commissioners say this:

> There are numerous important questions arising between merchants and shipowners which cannot be properly determined by legislation.

I pause here to make this remark, that this is exactly the situation with which we are faced to-day—differences between shippers and shipowners. They go on to say:

> We consider that most if not all the serious abuses to which the system is liable can be remedied by such counter-combinations on the part of merchants and shippers, and that it is generally undesirable that the state should interfere to remedy or prevent grievances which by reasonable effort can be prevented or remedied by the persons concerned.

That is very sound doctrine which I commend to the government. It is undesirable for the state to interfere in private business operations, but rather should it bring about a reconciliation between conflicting interests by a process of reasonable conference between those affected. The report then makes this very trite observation:

> We are confirmed in this view by our belief that the majority of the shipowners conducting the operations of conference lines are public spirited men fully alive to the desirability of encouraging trade.

That, I think, will be found in marked contrast to the spirit of the report immediately under review and forming the basis of the resolution. There are three or four other findings of this commission which I will not bother to read.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): Is the hon. member quoting from the majority report?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; and now that the hon. member has asked that question I may quote from both. I have been quoting from the majority report but there was also a report submitted by the minority. Let me read further, however, from the same report:

> We do not consider that inquiry should be ordered where associations merely complain that rates are too high or unfair, or where, owing to a temporary rate war, rates from a foreign country may have been lower for a short time than from the United Kingdom.

That is rather a strange doctrine in view of what my hon. friends have been saying. However, the point I want to emphasize—and I do not wish to be misunderstood or misquoted—is that in this very intricate and complex question, which has been investigated by the very best authorities on the subject for many years, it is recognized that the difficulties being as involved as they are, it is undesirable to seek to straighten them out by any arbitrary act of parliament. A course must be followed which will tend to promote harmonious relations between shipper and ship owner.

Now, my hon. friend suggests that there may be a minority report. There was. Let me state that the main portion of this report deals with the subject of rebates rather than conferences, although the two are reported on together. This is an extract from the minority report:

> We who sign this minority report think that, before the adoption of legislation declaring illegal the deferred rebate system, or involving great interference by a government department with the details of the working of a highly complex industry, and leading probably to much litigation, a real attempt should be made to give effect to a system of conciliation and limited supervision by the board of trade.

There again you have the same doctrine expounded. I shall not weary the House by quoting further from that report. I read this, however, for the purpose of impressing upon the members of the House this fact: It is true this is a complex and delicate question, fraught with the greatest difficulties, and in spite of all the experience we have behind us there is a grave danger in injecting into it arbitrary legislative action.

My hon. friend referred also to the report of the agricultural committee of two years ago. He said that it was one of great importance. If that is the case, why did not the government some time within the last two years take cognizance of this clause in the agricultural committee's report, which report was commended to the House by the minister this afternoon:

> The committee desire to bring the facts in this regard to the earnest attention of the House,—

Dealing now with the North Atlantic conference.

> —and would respectfully suggest that the Minister of Railways and Canals should take the matter up with those responsible for the management of the boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, so that the complicity of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine in this combine may be brought to an end immediately.

This afternoon the minister professed to have a great regard for this report; but for two years since the report was made the Canadian Government Merchant Marine has been "sitting in" in this conference. I am not blaming the management for that, I am merely stating the fact. For two years the government have gone sweetly along their way ignoring this report, and now they come forward to tell us that it is of great importance and is in support of the report made by Mr. Preston, and that therefore his report should be accepted by the House.

My hon. friend also addressed to the House as a reason for the recognition of the Preston report and its acceptance certain quotations from the evidence taken by the Dominions Royal Commission. Does he not recall that his quotations refer exclusively to New Zealand and to trade to British ports—British trade? I am going to deal with that at some length in a moment or two. What I want to point out to my hon. friend is that he is justified in quoting the Dominions Royal Commission in regard to grievances that New Zealand or some British ports had, but he is not justified in expending nearly a million and a half dollars of the taxpayers money to subsidize the Petersen interests.

Now, I address myself directly to the resolution. Its basis will be found in a section of the Speech from the Throne which I desire to quote in laying the foundation for my argument, and the House will bear with me a moment while I again bring to their attention this paragraph from the Governor General's speech:

> It is becoming increasingly evident, however, that quite as important a factor as the customs tariff in their effect upon production and living costs are transportation costs and rates, by land and sea. It is the opinion of my advisers—

The government.

> —that the attention of parliament at the present session should be directed more particularly to the desirability of effecting a freer movement of commodities through an equalization of railway freight rates as between provinces and localities, and through a lowering of carrying charges upon shipments by water of the products of the farm, the mine, the forest, the fisheries, and of our manufacturing industries.
> Some measure of control of transportation by land and sea is obviously essential—

And so forth. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we have presented to us by this official document these suggestions: First, that the government have in mind the freer movement of commodities; and, secondly, the lowering of the carrying charges. And it alleges that there is a powerful steamship combine restraining the export trade. The very essence of the proposal embodied in the resolution now before the House rests on this test: Will the proposal bring about the control of ocean freight rates? That, I say, is the test of the whole question and I purpose focusing the attention of the House upon it. Will the proposal of the government bring about a freer movement of commodities and a lowering of carrying charges? Or perhaps I should be more charitable and say: Is it likely to bring about this result? Is it reasonable to expect that it will? What is the basis of the proposal? It is found in a report by one, W. T. R. Preston. His report is offered as the reason for the resolution and for the remedy suggested, and it is all the evidence adduced by the government to support the charge that a combine in restraint of trade exists. I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the fact that when this resolution was originally placed on the order paper I asked for the correspondence between Mr. Preston and those affected, or for any correspondence bearing upon the subject. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), who replied, stated that there was no correspondence so far as he knew. So we have only this report to support the contentions of the government that such a combine exists.

Now, Mr. Speaker, our business as a House is to analyze and weigh this proposal. I ask, first: Does it offer a satisfactory remedy of the alleged grievance? Secondly: Has the maker of this report demonstrated that the alleged injury is an actual injury? These are the two questions I ask at the moment, and I purpose examining the report in regard thereto. All through the report the maker of it refers to the North Atlantic conference as a combine in such terms and in such a tone as to convey the impression that it is an evil and sinister thing. I apprehend, Sir, that it is not the part of an impartial investigator to adopt at the outset and to preserve throughout his report to the end a prejudiced attitude towards the subject of his investigation. The least that such an individual should do is to seek to be fair and impartial in his investigation. I am not for the moment suggesting that there is not a combine, but I say that the maker of the report is not justified in starting from the premises that an evil and sinister influence exists in the form of a combine.

In the second place, I want to say this: A combination of trade interests is not necessarily in itself an evil thing, and I think the House ought to pause and consider that. The Prime Minister is very fond of pausing this session, and I invite him to pause for a moment and consider this point, that a combination of trade interests, I do not care what they are, is not necessarily an evil thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend says, "hear, hear," and I know that that is sound. Then I say to him that this report bears evidence that this institution referred to is judged and condemned from the very commencement and before any investigation was held. Indeed, the minister (Mr. Low) this afternoon referred to the fact that ever since last June he had had in his mind this ten-ship remedy for the situation. Now let me proceed. A combination of interests, or a conference, or whatever you like to term it, a combine, if you will,—although I do not like to apply the word combine because almost invariably it carries with it a suggestion that is not necessarily contained in the word, but a combination of interests in regard to shipping—may have some beneficial results. I say it may have. It may stabilize service; it may result in a uniformity of rates; it may improve shipping conditions; it may render possible recovery of losses in shipping; it may fix regularity of service. These are some of the things it may do, and are these evils? Everyone within hearing of my voice knows they are not. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, no one disputes the fact that there is a conference, or a combination of interests existing in connection with shipping. It is unnecessary to establish that; it is admitted. The point we have to decide, however, is this: Has this conference been conducted contrary to the interests of the public? Has it been injurious? Has it been sinister? Or, on the other hand, has it contributed to the benefit of the country and to the benefit of shipping? I think we must admit that there are some benefits accrue from this conference, and I wish to state them. I think it is necessary and only fair to do so if we want to be impartial in this matter.

I know as a matter of my own personal knowledge, and I think it will not be disputed, that about the beginning of the year, about March, which is the beginning of the shipping season on the St. Lawrence, and the same thing applies to other sections, a list is supplied freely to shippers giving the fixed sailing dates of ships throughout the whole season from March, in the case of the St. Lawrence, to October or November. Now these fixed sailing dates are very valuable to shippers. They enable shippers to contract for the future: shippers are thereby enabled to provide for the contracting of delivery of goods to other countries for months ahead; they are likewise able to contract months ahead for the purchase and receipt of goods from other countries. Furthermore, by this method of fixed sailings the shippers, large and small, are assured of cargo space. In addition to that, there are almost daily sailings fixed from the port of Montreal. The reason I take the port of Montreal is this: There is no doubt in my mind from reading the resolution and the report that the point of attack—shall I say?—is the St. Lawrence route, or the port of Montreal and the lines running from there. In a lesser degree, of course, other points will be affected. Now I submit, Mr. Speaker, that these are things that are beneficial to the shipper in this country; these are things that we ought to recognize and frankly acknowledge.

I turn now to the consideration of another British report, which I have under my hand. It is the report of the Commission on Shipping and Shipbuilding, a commission appointed, I think, by Mr. Asquith in 1916. The commission reported in 1918, a very excellent report, comprising a large volume, and most exhaustive in its research and in its findings. I want to read an extract from that report to form the basis of some further comments. This report, mark you, is dealing with the question of conferences, with the question of this great combination of conferences, if you like, referred to in the report of Mr. Preston:

> Conference Agreements. Broadly, conference agreements are designed to prevent the kind of abuses which has attracted so much attention in the New Zealand trade but immunity from such abuse may be bought at too high a price. Shipping, however, could not subsist on rate wars, and the whole object of conferences is to avert them and to produce equality of rates and stable conditions in the great ocean trades. This aspect of the matter was clearly brought out in the report of the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings—

That is the report to which the minister referred, and which I have also under my hand:

> —and we see no reason to dissent from the general conclusions stated in that report.

Let me pause to point this out. Through all the reports of these British investigating commissions, the report of 1909, the report of 1918, the Imperial Shipping committee's report, the report indeed of the Dominions Royal Commission, there runs a singularly uniform note, that it is inadvisable to precipitate conditions that bring about rate wars, and inadvisable also to have too much government interference with shipping and with the operation of ships on the high seas. I say this is singular, and it is rather important and most interesting.

Now in connection with the report that we have as a basis for this resolution there is a letter issued by the party who prepared this report, Mr. Preston. He says:

> I acted on my own judgment.

and so forth.

> I thought it better to have a frank discussion and I therefore presented the following memorandum.

I have under my hand the memorandum which he prepared, and which he suggests in the report that he sent to all the shipping concerns. I do not know whether they received it, but I notice in the press of this morning or yesterday that one after the other of the shipping companies have absolutely denied ever having received any invitation from him at all; but whether they received it or not does not alter the fact I wish to place before the House. What I wish to point out is the strange procedure followed by this gentleman. He pre-judges the case. If you will read the letter—I do not intend to read it all—you will find he declares that a combine that is sinister in its influence exists. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, this letter is supposed to be addressed to individuals whom he declares he is going to invite to a discussion; but before he invites them, indeed, in the very letter he alleges to have sent them as an invitation, he tells them that they are in an evil combine, a combine of sinister influence. He furthermore tells them, and this is the strangest feature, that a decision had already been arrived at. He tells them that it was proposed to deal with the matter in one of two ways:

> (1) By an arrangement with an independent steamship company with government assistance, and government control over freight rates or,
> (2) The establishment of a government service between British and Canadian ports with modern vessels.
> The former is regarded as the more desirable.

So he had already judged, before he made any steps to inquire into the business at all, what course he was going to pursue. Then in the latter part of the memorandum he indulges in what is undoubtedly a threat. For instance, he tells the shipping interests in connection with this company which he proposes to establish that:

> The government railways traverse the Dominion of Canada in about 24,000 miles of tracks or service. It is fair to presume that whatever action the government takes in the matter, will be towards linking up the suggested ocean transportation with this enormous mileage of National railways—and so on. In other words he simply says this: You ship owners and shipping companies are leagued together in a combine and I judge you and condemn you. That is his first point. Secondly he says: I have already found a remedy and that remedy is the organization of a separate company—in this case the Petersen Company under government subsidy. In the third place he says: It is my intention, and it is the government's intention, to link this special company, subsidized by the government, up with the railways; and the inference is left, to the prejudice of all other concerns as far as the securing of freight by these railways is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was not Mr. Preston, in the statement which he made, basing his remarks upon the finding of a committee of this House, to the effect that there was a North Atlantic combine?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I have already referred to that. The Prime Minister, I think, perhaps is right; but let me put to him the question I put to the minister; I am glad to put it to him because he is the leader of the government: If this finding of the committee on agriculture of two years ago is of such importance, why did the government not take cognizance of this clause which I read a moment ago and which I will read again:

> The committee desire to bring the facts in this regard to the earnest attention of the House, and to respectfully suggest that the Minister of Railways and Canals should take up the matter with those responsible for the management of the boats, so that the complicity of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine in this combine may be brought to an end immediately.

Now, I ask the Prime Minister this question: If that report is of such grave importance as he would suggest, why did not the government two years ago pull the Canadian Merchant Marine out of the combine? If the existence of a combine, to which the right hon. Prime Minister now refers, was established by that committee to a sufficient extent to form the basis of Mr. Preston's report so that he need investigate no further, why did the government allow its own ships to continue for two years in that iniquitous combine?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am told that the ships that were built as part of the merchant marine were not at all suited for the class of transport that is required between here and the Old Country. The matter was looked into, it was gone into very carefully at the time, and when the government found that the merchant marine were not suited in any way to meet the situation that we are face to face with, we began to take other means to bring about an effective meeting of the situation.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend will pardon me, I do not wish to be impertinent, but he has not answered the point at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Some one laughs. I will deal with the question of the suitability of the ships in a moment, I have the necessary memoranda under my hand. I am now dealing with—the propriety shall I say—? of government ships continuing for two years in a combine that is declared by the government's own emissaries to be an evil thing, continuing for two years after a committee had reported —and upon this report they rest their case,—that the combine existed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am told—I speak subject to correction—that one of the operations of this combine is, that if any line withdraws from it it will immediately attempt to undertake to put that line completely out of business. Now the merchant marine was in bad enough state when this government had to take it over, and we were not looking for a means to utterly destroy its usefulness.

Mr. STEVENS: I really have too high a regard for the Prime Minister to attribute that to him, as a serious observation and the ground for my hesitancy will be disclosed before I finish my remarks to-night. I am not going to be driven away from this point: The fact remains that it is alleged that the combine existed. The government takes in perfect faith the report of the committee on Agriculture of two years ago—I do not, but the government does—they take it to the extent of saying that Mr. Preston was warranted in accepting the report holus bolus without any further investigation. And yet they come before this House and say in the words of the Prime Minister "We had to keep our ships in this evil combine for two years. If we took them out we were afraid that the other members of the combine would exercise some damning and bankrupting influence upon the government of Canada". Just on this point I again remind the Prime Minister that the control of rates was the suggestion in the Speech from the Throne; but under this proposal of Mr. Preston, and under the proposal of the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon, the objective is to smash this combine. I should like the House to bear that in mind—the intention is to smash the combine. Very good. We will find out before we get through, the feasibility of smashing it with the puny weapon that the government has taken into its hands.

Now, the letter goes on to say that there has been occasional discrimination, that freight rates have been excessive, and that the insurance on the St. Lawrence is higher, and so on. I want to examine briefly one or two of these points. In the first place it has been known for years that the insurance rates on the St. Lawrence have been high. It does not follow that a North Atlantic combine is to blame for the insurance rates on the St. Lawrence; that fact has nothing to do with the North Atlantic conference at all. As a matter of fact this government has to its credit the lowering of insurance to some slight degree: They added thirty days to the end of the open season, and took fifteen days off the first part of the season. In other words they added fifteen days to the St. Lawrence route during which favourable rates are granted. They also secured the same rates of insurance in the case of shipping from Halifax as are obtained in the case of shipping from New York. That is the way to do it. I want to say to the Prime Minister that it is by dealing with this question step by step—here a problem solved and there a problem solved—that these great commercial and trade matters are properly and effectively treated. The government, however, seem to have departed wholly from that course in regard to this as well as in regard to other matters.

Now with respect to discrimination, I wish to examine the report at some little length. On pages 14 and 15 of the report will be found certain schedules. If the House will examine these schedules, and if the House will recall the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon, it will remember and it will note this: That in every case it refers to a discrimination against British shipping from British ports, and very little in these schedules touches Canada at all. The report deals with the schedules from continental and United Kingdom ports to all sections of the world. Well, that is quite all right, but as to discrimination against British ports I want to ask in all fairness and with all courtesy, is it our business to take up the cudgels in behalf of the British shippers? Surely the British ship owners and the British merchants are wise enough, and skilled enough, and experienced enough to look after their own affairs. I do not want to say or to infer that we should wholly disregard their interests, but I do say that it is not the business of this country, of this parliament, or of this government to supply a subsidy to protect British shipping and British ports. Let us see what the British say themselves. I have it in their own reports, and it is worth reading. I wonder if the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is in the House? Yes, I see him here. I wish he would listen to this particular clause. This is a clause drawn up by the British Commission on Shipping and Ship-building of 1918, and it must be remembered that it is drawn up by a free trade country so that there is something in it which seems to violate that idea.

Mr. McMASTER: Sound philosophy and good sense.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend in advance stamps the words I am about to quote as sound philosophy and good sense.

[Mr. Stevens.]

> The British ship owner has to compete with the foreign ship owner in the provision of service, just as the British manufacturer has to compete with the foreign manufacturer in the supply of commodities.

That is perfectly sound. Then this report goes on to say:

> To meet such competition rates for foreign goods may at times be lower than rates for British goods, just as British goods may be sold abroad at lower prices than they are sold to the home consumer.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Good free trade doctrine. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has stamped this with his approval already.

> Some latitude in this respect must be allowed to the ship owner as it is allowed to the manufacturer, since international competition would otherwise be impossible.

I pause to emphasize the point. The minister comes before us with a resolution approving of a subsidy of $1,300,000 a year to certain steamship lines. What for? He says they are discriminating against British ports and British shippers to every port in the world. I will come to Canada in a minute. The British House in their own report state that such things are permissible and that it is sometimes necessary to give a preference, to give better rates to foreign goods in order to meet the competition of international trade. I want to say that that is an economic axiom that you cannot escape; you can do what you like to seek to escape it but you cannot.

> If the control of freights is confined simply to certain commodities of primary importance—

I want to read this to hon. friends to my left. I am addressing them in no captious spirit, but very seriously.

> —a preference will be given to the carriage of all other commodities, and the result will therefore be the exact opposite of that intended. If the control of freights is confined to particular trade routes, British tonnage will be diverted from those trade routes to others in which the freights are not controlled.

That is perfectly sound reasoning. It is infinitely more wise than anything I find in the report before the House. It simply says this: If you control rates in certain commodities shippers will seek to carry other lines of goods and make as much money out of them, and raise the rates to break even in their revenue; or if you have certain ports or trade routes which are under control, shipping will be inclined to abandon those routes and frequent those that are not under control. What is the next step in the reasoning? I want hon. members from the province of Nova Scotia to consider this report. They talk about using Canadian ports. You talk about reversing this practice of shipping goods from Providence, Rhode Island, Boston and other ports but if you put a restrictive control upon Canadian routes you will find goods diverted through Maine and other states and going out through American ports. There is no escape from that. This British report, which represents a study of the whole situation, points to the danger of this form of control and restriction. We turn for a moment to Canada. We have a case where Canadian rates are higher than the rates from Germany. This is the matter upon which the writer of this report has apparently based a great deal of importance. He points out that goods coming from Hamburg to New York are carried at a lower rate than goods from Canada to Liverpool. In this case he is comparing the rates westward to the rates eastward, a comparison which is neither fair proper, nor germane to the subject at all. That is about all the reference he makes to Canadian goods, except that I find a reference to grain, which I will deal with in a moment. The point that I wish to make at this stage is that ships from Canadian ports carry full cargoes eastward to the European ports, but almost invariably they come back with perhaps about a quarter cargo. I think that is a fair statement of the case. The result is that if you carry a full cargo one way and a quarter cargo the other way, the rates on the goods carried must be sufficient to pay for the trip both ways. That is a simple problem and a simple fact. That is one of the reasons why Canadian rates are high. Perhaps some of my hon. friends will say, "Well then, why not lower your tariff, so as to make a larger flow of goods into Canada?"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I find that I have properly interpreted the view of some. I have a remedy which I think is much better than that. If you followed that course and lowered your tariff so as to admit goods into the country, it is not likely you would increase the amount of goods coming from Europe or Great Britain, and the chances are that you would increase the influx of goods from the United States. To remedy this situation in Canada in regard to open freight rates, we want full cargoes from Europe. But they must be made up of goods bought in England or in Europe, which are to-day bought in the United States. I will tell my hon. friends why I hold to that point.

Mr. FORKE: We favour a British preference.

Mr STEVENS: I will very gladly discuss the British preference, but I want to finish my argument if I may. I say we should increase the cargoes from Europe at the expense of the cargoes coming from the United States. I do not want to get into a side discussion, but I think the point is worth making. We owe the United States annually in interest about two hundred million dollars. In order to break even with them we ought to sell them two hundred million dollars per year more than we do. As a matter of fact we are importing annually from them two to three hundred million dollars worth of goods more than they buy from us, the result being that we are going behind the United States some four hundred and fifty or five hundred million dollars per year, and it is about time we designed a policy, irrespective of how we do it, that would divert to Europe and Canada the purchase of some of the goods which are now brought in from south of the line. That policy will go a long way to remedy the very grievance that we are labouring under at the present time.

I will pass to another point, and I pause to remind the Prime Minister of something that I think perhaps he will find interesting. I know that I found it interesting. Would he recall that in his speech delivered in this House a few weeks ago, on the occasion of the debate on the Address, he took a great deal of time to demonstrate that our foreign trade was in a splendid condition and our manufacturers better off than manufacturers south of the line and that conditions generally in Canada were more normal than conditions south of the line. I should like to read to the House what his special emissary says in that regard. In a paragraph headed "Closing down" he quotes an extract from some anonymous writer regarding that and says:

> Further quotations from departmental correspondence are uncalled for. It is only necessary to say that complaints have been received by the Department of Trade and Commerce from correspondents extending from the Maritime to the western provinces, clearly indicating that the increase in the cost of overseas transportation has played serious havoc with manufacturers, agriculturists, exporters and traders, as well as causing unemployment in industrial circles, and is also adversely affecting communities which otherwise would be fairly prosperous.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: The Prime Minister says "hear, hear". The other day my right hon. leader pointed out that there was serious havoc played in the industries and in the prosperity of the citizens of this country. The Prime Minister took three hours to try to persuade this House and the country that my right hon. leader was all wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I said that notwithstanding the fact that conditions were bad, they were much better in Canada in some particulars than in the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: They must be pretty bad over there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are.

Mr. STEVENS: It is rather strange to find upon what grounds they consider our rates unfair as compared with those obtaining in the United States. If the United States have better rates than we have and their rates are bad, and this report says that these conditions are because of rates, then the rates in the United States being low must be the cause of their being in a worse condition than we are. The Prime Minister's proposals will not bear examination. He knows that quite well. He sought to imply in this House the other day, that conditions were excellent. I merely read this to show that one of his chosen henchmen differs from him in this regard.

By the way, I notice that this refers to the department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low). He says that his files are filled with this sort of correspondence, and I was wondering when I read it, how the minister had the hardihood to issue that famous advertisement that Canada had turned the corner.

These schedules to which I have referred furnish the grievance which is claimed on behalf of Canada. I want to refer to the wheat situation and this is of intense interest. May I say to my hon. friends who are seriously interested in arriving at some proper solution of this problem, that wheat, flour, sugar and cattle have never been under the conference rates? They are not controlled by this alleged combine at all. They are excluded from it and are free from these rates.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: On what authority is that statement made?

Mr. STEVENS: No one will dispute it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the Minister of Justice dispute it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am laughing at the authority quoted by my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Justice is, perhaps, one of those happy individuals that can see a joke in almost any tragedy, but he will not take the responsibility of saying that I am wrong in the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, but the hon. member's authority seems rather poor.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS. Does it? I can give further authority.

Mr. LAPOINTE: All right.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister had given me time, I would have done so, but I ask him: Will he dispute my authority, my own statement? He will not. He knows better. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, his colleague: Am I right or am I wrong in asserting that wheat, flour, sugar and cattle are exempted from the conference rates? He can accept the advice of my hon. friend behind him. Not one of them will dispute it. They know perfectly well I am right. I do not see the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) in his seat, but I know that he would at once confirm my statement.

Mr. LOW: The burden of proof rests with my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: This is delightful. Will the Minister of Justice bear the Minister of Trade and Commerce out in that statement? I appeal to him. He is the legal authority.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I certainly concur with my colleague that he who makes an assertion must prove it.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not a lawyer, but I will venture this opinion, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has got the cart before the horse; he has it reversed. It is not my business to prove my authorities at all. If my hon. friends dispute my authorities, it is up to them to show that I am wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: There goes the Minister of Agriculture with a laugh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I never heard such a doctrine in my life.

Mr. STEVENS: I repeat that wheat, flour, sugar and cattle are not, and never have been, included in the conference rates. I state further that I have this from shipping authorities both in Montreal and in other sections. I am not going to go any further in regard to quotations.

Mr. JACOBS: As a matter of information, would the hon. gentleman tell me if there are any fixed rates with regard to the commodities which he has just mentioned?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. JACOBS: There is competition?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly there is.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. gentleman quote his authority for that?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes—myself. I am going to give my hon. friends some facts in connection with the matter. In 1923, from Montreal, there were 200 tramp steamers and 598 line steamers. The tramp steamers carried 48,600,000 bushels of wheat or 42 per cent, and the line steamers carried 65,000,000 bushels of wheat or 58 per cent. In 1924, there were 367 tramp steamers and 570 line steamers. The tramp steamers carried 94,700,000 bushels of wheat or 62 per cent, and the line steamers carried 57,600,000 bushels or 38 per cent. My figures will be slightly different from those of some of the shipping interests of Montreal, because my figures are the harbour board figures. There may be a slight variation, which is accounted for in this way, that the shipping bodies, in their report, deal with the exact amount that was handled out as of certain dates, while the harbour board may deal with slightly different dates. This may make a difference of a few bushels, but the difference is so slight that it is not worth mentioning.

As regards cattle, in 1923, there were 28,966 shipped and in 1924, 41,892. If my hon. friends want my authority, I have in my hand in regard to both of these items, the customs reports which I secured from the Customs department presided over by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). This is the authority I am quoting. I am not going further into details, but what I want to make perfectly clear is this: First, no one will question this, that tramp steamers are not members of the combine. The tramp steamers from the port of Montreal carried 62 per cent of the wheat. Giving my hon. friends, for the moment, the pleasure, if they like, of questioning my authority regarding the wheat being outside of conference rates, at least the quantity of 94,700,000 bushels carried by tramp steamers last year was outside of the conference rates. They must admit that, although they would not admit the other. The point I want to make is that about one-half of this wheat—the quantity varies from year to year; sometimes it is more, sometimes less—is American wheat brought in early in the season through the port of Montreal, and it is, perhaps, the most valuable freight carried by the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, but more by the Canadian National than the Canadian Pacific. Does the government propose to subsidize to the extent of $1,300,000 a year Petersen steamers to carry American grain to Great Britain?

9 p.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer that at once. Under the contract with Sir William Petersen, the government controls the rates and designates the commodities, and the government intends to confine its rate reductions under the agreement with Sir William Petersen to Canadian products.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. As a matter of fact, the agreement, as it is now drafted, does not say so. It does, as to the rates which I shall deal with in a moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The agreement has not all the details in, but I was putting my hon. friend right in a matter on which he was astray.

Mr. STEVENS: I rather suspected that. I rather suspected that the government would be anxious to get this agreement to a private committee away up somewhere so that they could trim it up in order that it might be a little more presentable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The agreement will have to pass just as it is. It cannot be trimmed up.

Mr. STEVENS: What about the commodities to which my right hon. friend refers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The agreement gives the government the right to control the rates and to state on what commodities it shall apply, and the government intends that it shall apply only to Canadian products, merchandise and consumption generally. I am speaking in the name of the government to my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend stated a moment ago that this agreement stands and that not a letter of it can be changed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It does stand.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, that agreement does not give the government the power to determine the commodity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The agreement gives the government the power to control the rates and the government intends to see to it that wherever the rates give any advantage that advantage will be given to Canadian produce and other commodities and will not be extended beyond Canadian commodities.

Mr. STEVENS: Here is a dealer in Montreal, say, who buys a lot of wheat stored in one of the elevators there. That wheat is partly American and partly Canadian wheat, and he owns it. Is the government going to say that this particular man shall have the special low rate and that this other man shall not have it? After all, we put our finger on the very crux of the whole business, the absurdity of it, when we deal with this point. And let the Prime Minister bear in mind that ten ships will make no great impress on the traffic out of Montreal alone, to say nothing of Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Vancouver, Victoria and Prince Rupert.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We shall see how the arrangement works with ten ships and we can add to the number if necessary.

Mr. STEVENS: I take my right hon. friend's word for that, and we shall "wait and see". And that is another point which I may touch upon. This arrangement is so elastic that the government may extend the number of ships to a hundred and may spend $10,000,000 a year in the enterprise. The Prime Minister nods his head, and that is precisely the danger of the whole thing; at the whim of a minister this agreement may be enlarged until it obligates the country in tremendous sums. And what for? To benefit some designated shipper, to favour some particular port or route, and in consequence to involve this country in endless discord between shipper and ship owner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend will not think I am trying to interrupt him; I simply want to confine him to the facts. He has noticed in one of the clauses that the agreement is subject to the approval of parliament; the agreement will be as parliament approves it. And any subsequent agreement will be presented to parliament for approval; it will not be left to the whim of any minister.

Mr. STEVENS: But the Prime Minister assured me a moment ago that not a jot or tittle of the agreement was subject to change. Where do we stand? One moment we are told that not a letter of the agreement can be changed and the next moment we are informed that the agreement may be amended and a subsequent agreement brought in. As a matter of fact, that is the very point we are disputing, that the agreement as it stands will not be approved by parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what the hon. gentleman wishes; it is not what the House wishes.

Mr. STEVENS: We shall see what the House wishes, and we will take care that the House is given an opportunity to express its views on the matter. I turn now to the question of immigration, in regard to which the report has much to say. It declares that the charges for immigrants have been greatly increased, and I admit that. It may be that the charges for immigrants at the present time are unreasonable; I am not disputing that point. But I would point this out. I have seen immigrant ships come to this country for twenty-five or thirty years and I know what the accommodation on the present liners to-day is, and in the light of my experience I want to tell the House that there is no comparison between the state of affairs now and what it was at that time. As everyone knows, it is impossible to expect immigrants to come to Canada to-day under the conditions that prevailed twenty-five or thirty years ago, when immigrants were housed like cattle. In the second place, the costs have risen. Whether or not they have so risen as to justify the present rate, I am not in a position to say, but I do assert that it is unfair to suggest that immigrants can be carried at the rates that were charged twenty-five years ago. But this point is more important still: the rates that obtained say twenty years ago applied at a time when there were literally millions of immigrants coming across the Atlantic. Let me give the figures. In 1913 there came to Canada 303,000 immigrants as compared with 108,000 in 1924, while the figures show that in 1913 there came to the United States 1,079,000 as against 395,000 in 1924. In other words, the United States, by an act of congress placing a limitation upon the number of immigrants that may be admitted to that country, has restricted immigration to such an extent that it is now less than a third of what it was twelve years ago. And Canada by its process of selected immigration, with which policy, generally speaking, I wholly agree, has confined its immigration to about one-third of what it was in 1913. And you cannot expect the same rates to be charged to-day when the traffic is only one-third of what it was formerly.

Now I come to the question of the remedy which the government proposes. The government proposes ten ships, and I would ask hon. gentlemen to bear in mind that from Montreal last year there sailed out nine hundred and thirteen vessels, while from Vancouver there were over a thousand, so that these two ports account for over two thousand vessels. And the government intends putting on ten ships, which probably will make about fifty or sixty trips in the year. Is it reasonable to expect any serious impress to be made on the shipping of the country by such a service as this, when we reflect that two ports alone account for some two thousand vessels? And in addition to that, consider Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Victoria and Prince Rupert. It seems to me that any proposal of this kind, if it is to be effective, must apply to all ports in Canada alike, and at the present time this is limited to Atlantic ports. I apprehend that someone may question me and I had better state my authority; the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) may insist upon that. In paragraph 4 of the preamble to the agreement I find that the government has thought it wise to adopt such means as may be deemed expedient and necessary to "such supervision and control of trans-Atlantic freight rates", and so on.

Why should the government abandon the Pacific coast when we are told in the report that the combine is world-wide and covers every sea and trade route? Why, the picture drawn by Preston is one that would wring the heart of any credulous person who did not know who the author was. But if this combine is world-wide, why should not the government apply the agreement to Pacific as well as to Atlantic ports? Why limit the agreement to the Atlantic? And I emphasize once again the fact that ten vessels applied even to the one port of Montreal will prove inadequate. The Prime Minister a moment ago referred to the character of the ships. I have a brief comparison to make and I invite his consideration to it. In the first place, in the schedule covering the type of vessels contemplated, I find that the particulars are "without guarantee." Do the Prime Minister and his government realize what that means? The Prime Minister says that nothing can be changed; this agreement stands as it is. Well, if it stands as it is, these specifications of the ships are without guarantee, and there is no reason in the world why Petersen should not vary them one way or the other at his whim and fancy. Let me compare them briefly with the present Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships. The Petersen ships, "without guarantee," have a gross tonnage of 5,000 while the merchant marine vessels, twenty-five ships, of the 8,100 ton class, have a gross tonnage of 5,751. The net tonnage of the Petersen ships is 3,500; of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine 3,550. And, by the way, net tonnage is the test. The speed of the Petersen ships —unguaranteed, mark you—is 11 knots; the speed of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships on a six-mile trial trip was 11¾ knots. Repairs to the Petersen ships, I am informed by men thoroughly competent to advise in the matter, owing to the unique construction of their internal combustion engines can only be made in Great Britain in virtually the one place where they are now built; that is, the cylinders of these engines are made of a peculiar steel that is not kept in stock in other yards. Consequently these ships will find great difficulty in securing engine repairs on this side of the water. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships are more or less of a standard type and therefore can be repaired in any port throughout the world. A great deal of stress is laid upon the value of internal combustion engines because of the saving in fuel. But it is well to bear in mind that owing to the fluctuating price of fuel oil many oil-burning ships today are being converted back into coal burners. I am not speaking of the fast passenger ships, but of this class of cargo boat. The Petersen ships will have a grain capacity of 580,000 cubic feet as against 447,000 cubic feet of the 8,500 ton Canadian Government Merchant Marine boats; but the difference is not very great, and as regards our 10,000 ton ships the capacity is about the same as that of the Petersen ships.

Now let me deal briefly with the cost of this proposal. A ten-year period with principal and interest amounts to an expenditure of over $17,000,000; a 20-year period, with principal and interest compounded, amounts to $46,200,000. The government are asking us virtually to commit the country to an expenditure of some $17,000,000 over a period of ten years. But the Prime Minister says that if he and his colleagues think the contract is working out successfully they may extend it indefinitely; at any rate, there is no limit in the agreement. What are we asked to do this for? For the alleged purpose of smashing, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, the North Atlantic combine. This measure will plunge the country into excessive expense. This is no time for us to indulge in experiments that will cost the taxpayers large sums of money. Infinitely better would it be to apply this sum annually to debt reduction, although it may be a small sum in comparison with the national debt, rather than waste it in an abortive effort to control ocean freight rates in this manner.

The Preston report upon which the government rests its case is prejudiced and unfair, and bears all the earmarks of an effusion from a narrow and jaundiced mind; nor does any utterance upon any subject by this author carry any conviction or respect in this country. This may sound a little harsh, but I want to say it very frankly. Certain men may be very clever, they may be useful in elections to pull their party out of a difficult corner, but because of that qualification they are not necessarily fitted for a quasi-judicial position such as this investigation called for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend taking advantage of the privilege of parliament in making that statement? I hope he will repeat it on a public platform, and so give Mr. Preston a chance to answer him.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very glad to waive any parliamentary protection in regard to that statement. I would very willingly submit this agreement to any judicially minded person as a basis for my contention. I affirm and reaffirm my contention that this whole report is permeated with prejudice and bitterness and bears abundant proof that its author had prejudged the case that was before him for consideration. As a matter of fact, the Petersen agreement is a case of heads I win, tails you lose. There is no penalty in it for Mr. Petersen at all. He can abandon this trade route any time he likes, and the only recourse the government has is to notify him that the contract is terminated. It is the most absurd thing I ever heard of.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What will Mr. Petersen get out of it if he does not perform his contract?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Petersen draws his subsidy from month to month.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After he has performed his service.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course; but after he has performed his service from month to month he draws his subsidy. The government having tied themselves up hand and foot under this contract, Mr. Petersen may abandon it if he is not satisfied with the results. He may see more lucrative trade routes somewhere else, to Australia, South Africa, India or any other part of the world, he may make a contract with others for ten years and abandon this contract, he may pull his ships off the route at Liverpool. And what happens? Here is the penalty clause, Mr. Speaker, that this lawyer, whom the minister referred to as the greatest lawyer in Canada—and we will find out later who it is—has inserted in the contract:

> If at any time after the expiration of the eighteen months mentioned in paragraph 1 (c) the contractor should fail to carry on the said service with the full complement of ten ships, the minister may by notice in writing call upon him to supply the deficiency within a delay of three months, and in default of the contractor's doing so within such delay, the minister may terminate the contract by notice in writing.

When Mr. Petersen abandons his contract and leaves us high and dry, I picture the Minister of Trade and Commerce sitting down and inditing a terrible letter to the ship owner telling him that if he does not immediately restore the service he will lose his contract. The man having already abandoned the contract is under no penalty whatever! In the meantime we have been paying him during the period of the experiment, $1,300,000 a year, and at the same time we have disturbed and upset our trade arrangements and our shipping connections, and we have driven every tramp steamer out of the business.

Now, if the House will pardon me a little humour after so much seriousness. The Minister of Trade of Commerce and his friend the author of this report, remind me of the story of two Irishmen—

Mr. LOW: I might inform my hon. friend that Mr. Lafleur is the lawyer who drew the contract.

Mr. STEVENS: I have a very high regard for Mr. Lafleur, but I have a shrewd suspicion that this agreement, whoever may have gone over it afterwards and revised it, was signed in the Old Country before the minister ever returned here.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend's suspicion is not well-founded.

Mr. STEVENS: Probably not. The minister referred to Mr. Petersen as chairman of the Bureau Veritas. I like to accept suggestions when they are given to me, and I find it rather interesting to note that Mr. Petersen who is going to supply these ships without guarantee—it is so stated in the contract—is to preside over the committee which will determine whether these ships are or are not in accordance with the schedules.

Now for my story. There were two Irishmen, the story goes who met a bob-tailed wildcat and chased it for a while, and finally drove it up a tree. Mike sent Pat up to shake it down. Pat shakes it down, and Mike catches it. Pat shouts down, "Have you the wildcat?" "Yes," cries Mike "but come down and help me let it go." I can imagine, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Mr. Preston scurrying around and finally treeing this bob-tailed wildcat and Mr. Preston then taking the safer course and going up the tree to shake it down. The minister now has the bob-tailed wildcat in his hands, and he is praying for heaven's sake for someone to come and help him let it go.

The government's objective is a free movement of commodities and a lowering of charges. Can anyone suggest for a moment that the government's remedy is conducive to a freer movement of commodities, that with ten or twenty or even thirty ships it is going to make any appreciable impress upon the North Atlantic conference or upon the ships in that conference?

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, it perhaps may be fitting as I had the great honour of being chairman of the committee that looked into the matter of ocean freight rates some two years ago, if I detain the House for a little while in consideration of the matter which is now before us.

The speaker who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Stevens) stated that he did not take our report in perfect faith. In making that statement he reflected to a certain degree on certain very honourable and distinguished members of his own party, because the two reports which were brought into the House by this committee on ocean freight rates were unanimous reports, concurred in by the former Minister of Agriculture in the government of my right hon. friend who now leads the opposition, concurred in by a gentleman of the Conservative party who at one time, I understand, occupied the important position of Minister of Agriculture in the province of Ontario, and by two other distinguished and hon. members of this House; and in reflecting upon the report the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) was reflecting upon the wisdom or patriotism of these gentlemen as well as upon the wisdom or patriotism of other members of the committee. I would be prepared to leave the appreciation of the conduct of our committee and of the actions of the chairman in regard thereto in the hands of my fellow members of that committee who belong to the Conservative persuasion. There was not from the beginning the slightest attempt to make political capital out of the matters which came before us for investigation. I would gladly bear testimony to the work which all the members performed on that committee. We worked literally night and day in endeavouring to get at the facts, and with no other endeavour, and when we had got some of the facts concerning certain phases of our inquiry—our time was not sufficient to enable us to go fully into all the multitudinous matters brought before us,—we made two reports on the question of ocean freight rates. Those reports were concurred in unanimously by all the members of the committee; they were concurred in without cavil by all the members of this House.

Now the gentleman who has just taken his seat does not state that there is not a North Atlantic conference or combine, but he rather objects to the word combine; he prefers the word conference, and though he does not exactly praise it, he would give us to understand that this combination of shipping interests is really rather beneficial than otherwise. It is true that it may require some slight correction here and there, but according to him, its virtues far outweigh its vices. Here again he falls foul, I will not say of a more distinguished member of the party which sits in the corner immediately at your left, Mr. Speaker, but he falls foul of the gentleman who occupied in a previous administration the very honourable and onerous position of Minister of Finance, a gentleman who in earlier, I will not say happier days, was the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and who looked into this matter and reported upon it to the government of the day; and his view of the situation was precisely the same view to which this committee arrived at.

I could not expect the House to listen with patience to me if I went over all our report, but perhaps I may be permitted to draw the attention of the House to certain of its salient features. We brought in two reports, one on the 23rd of April, 1923, and one on the 18th of June, 1923. In our first report we set forth that there was a combine, that there was a North Atlantic and U.K. Conference Eastward-Bound—I think that is the full title of the organization—which met every month in New York and there agreed on certain rates, and that there was also a committee of various lines trading out of Montreal called the Weekly Liner Committee. The matter in which the Liner Committee operated was as follows—I read from our report:

> The general rates were set at the North Atlantic and U.K. Conference in New York, but for the purpose of united action in regard to these and other rates, a weekly meeting was held, at which representatives of all the steamship lines attended. At this meeting, rates were agreed upon, and no member of the line had the right to depart from the rates so established without conferring with, and warning his competitors of his intention so to do. An earnestly worded expostulation would be directed by one member to another if this line of conduct was not followed.

Then we pointed out in our report that the operation of this conference had brought about this most extraordinary result:

> The government of the United States forced the Shipping board, which manages the United States governmentally-owned steamers, to make a very low rate for the transportation of flour to Europe, a rate stated by the shipping companies to be below a commercial rate. This rate applied only to flour ground in the United States. To meet this rate, the North Atlantic Conference lines established at a given moment a rate of 15 cents per 100 pounds on flour ground in the United States, while they maintained a rate of 19 cents per 100 pounds on Canadian flour—a very substantial differential against our Canadian millers.

That rather disposes of the appeal made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that flour was always free, that flour was never controlled by the conference. As a matter of fact, the hon. member was mistaken in that regard.

In our second report we dealt somewhat thoroughly with the history, not of the shipping rings, but with the history of the investigations which had been made into the shipping rings. We examined with care the report made by the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings in 1909; that is the report to which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has referred in his somewhat extended remarks. But what he drew the attention of the House to was the report of the majority of the committee, and this majority was made up largely of men who were not unconnected with the shipping business. They therefore gave to themselves a very high certificate of character. But the members of that committee who were less intimately connected with the shipping rings were somewhat more critical and the labour member of the committee, a gentleman by the name of Madison, made a very strong reservation and came out whole heartedly with the view that shipping combines were on the whole evil and not good things. I think we were very fair in our report in this matter. We gave a succinct and I think a fair account of the findings of all three classes of commissioners who subscribed to that report. We gave the findings of the majority of the commissioners and even the majority who investigated into the shipping rings were not satisfied with the way things were going on. Their solution was that groups of shippers should combine in associations that could face the powerful shipping ring: that one group should be organized to "faire face," as we say in the language of the province of Quebec, to present a united front against the association of the ship owners. But we also brought before the House the findings of the minority of the commisioners. Now, the minority of the commissioners found along lines which I think tend to appeal to the sense of the people of this country. It certainly appealed to the sense of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) when he looked into the matter. This is what the minority of the commissioners said:

All monopolies are liable to abuse, to a greater or less extent, unless they are strictly limited either by nature of the case, by legislation, or by some form of supervision.

[Mr. McMaster.]

And again:

There is, of course, a presumption against a monopoly in any branch of trade being beneficial to the community.

Again:

The benefits of the organization which they (the shipping companies) adopt for the purposes of their business must be valued, mainly with reference to its effect, not on the shipping companies, but on the general public.

I should not like to detain the House in setting forth all the conclusions to which this minority came, but I may be allowed to draw attention to a few of them. I suppose we are all agreed that it is a good thing to have cheap freight rates either on land or on water. But freight rates should not be driven down to such an extent, either on land or on water, that there is not a fair and reasonable return for the capital invested. I think that is reasonable, I think that is fair, unless there is too much capital invested, in which case it might be quite proper that rates should be driven down until the capital in the industry represents fairly the earnings earned upon it. But with that proviso I think I am within the sense, the common sense of this House, that we are all on common ground in saying that with provision for a proper return for capital it is paramount under our present economic system that goods should move freely from place to place, and that freight rates should be brought down to what would be a fair return for the public service rendered. That being the case I think we will all agree with the statement that:

The system was introduced in the first instance with the object of raising rates or preventing their fall and diminishing competition

It has been successful in raising or keeping up rates;

The public have as a rule, to pay higher rates of freight than they would pay in an open market;

The system has been injurious to "tramps", the strongest element in the British Mercantile marine, and it leads as to them to waste and to higher rates of freight.

The system tends to waste in various other directions owing to the manner in which the rings are constituted;

There is no satisfactory evidence that the saving in cost, if there be any, under the system of shipping rings, exceeds the waste which is due to that system;

The system tends to inflate the amount of tonnage and consequently the amount of capital invested upon which interest has to be paid.

I think that is merely an example of an economic law which is of almost universal application, namely—that if you artificially—whether by restriction of competition, or otherwise—increase for the time being the reward of capital in any certain given line you will induce more capital to flow into that line; that therefore you will produce an excess of capital in that line; that excess of capital will aim to earn money for itself; that rates and prices will increase, and in the long run the business which it affected will be hurt and that capital which has entered into that artificially stimulated channel will be hurt as well. It seems to me a grateful thing to listen to the energetic and eloquent paean of praise in favour of an absence of artificiality put forth this evening by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I would invite him to follow that wholesome line of reasoning into many other spheres of social, political and economic thought.

After dealing with this long report on shipping rings we dealt with the report made in 1913 by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) who was then chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners. His findings were practically the findings of the minority who had examined into the shipping rates. I will not say that he found in his report everything that they found, but I think that the conclusions which he arrived at were based, in large measure, upon the same reasonings and he came very much to the same conclusion that they did. I know that we based ours, in making our report, in no small measure upon the findings of a commissioner who went over there with judicial experience for the purpose of finding out the facts without, I may say, the slightest inclination to veer either to the right or to the left, and I think that it is a complete answer to those who would depend too strongly upon the favourable findings of this British commission if I might quote the words used by the hon. member for West York when he said in his report "Notwithstanding the information which I received from the conference lines, I am still of the view that an investigation should be held".

I am at one with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre when he says this matter is of the greatest difficulty and that it behooves us all to get at the real facts of the case. I cannot imagine a wiser step than that intimated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon that this resolution shall be placed before a special committee of this House for investigation into the matter, and that before this committee there will be opportunities given for all interested parties to make their representations known.

May I just say that this should not be a matter upon which men should differ on party lines. I cannot see that there should be any difference of opinion between patriotic Canadian citizens as to the advisability of getting the cheapest freight rates that we can and all the facts we possibly can in order that our ways may be guided wisely and justly in the matter.

In our report we dealt with the finding of the Dominions Royal Commission which has been referred to by the minister in his address to the House this afternoon, and we also drew the attention of the House to the fact that there had been a similar movement in the United States, a similar attempt made to control freight rates by that country, and that the great publicist Lubin who founded the great Institute of Agriculture at Rome, had given us his opinion that it was vital for the agricultural interests of the world that some international body should control freight rates on the seas, because the question was in effect international and not national. Mr. Lubin in his report to congress shows how those who control the freight rates of the world control the supply of the staple commodities of the world, and how, if they are in league with speculators they may mulct not only the consumer but also the producer. That is one of the matters that we dealt with in our report, and I feel that that report, in view of the unanimity in which it was prepared, offered and accepted, might be accorded full faith and credit, even by leading members of the party which sits immediately to the left of the Speaker.

I have dealt at some length with the report itself, and I will now proceed to answer a few of the arguments which were advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). The statement was made that the concern of British shippers was not our concern, and that British shippers might well be left to look after themselves. If that statement had been made by a nationalist of the province of Quebec I know what the Toronto Telegram would have said the next morning. What was the object of this country some time ago in giving a preference to British goods but to encourage trade between ourselves and the British Isles, I could not help remarking with a certain amount of interest—and my hon. friend will pardon me if I say also amusement—the emphatic statement made that if return cargoes could not be obtained freight rates must be paid both ways on any shipment. The hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) interjected a question as to how that attitude of mind comported with the desire expressed in some influential quarters to get rid of the British preference; but when that question was suggested my hon. friend wisely gave silence for a reply.

It seems to me that perhaps a few words may be spoken concerning the arguments used by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that what we must do is to devise a policy which will divert trade from its natural channel and into unnatural channels. That was in effect his argument when he pointed out that we had what he would be pleased to call an adverse balance of trade with the United States, and that we should endeavour by legislation to change that adverse balance of trade. Now, Mr. Speaker, we do not buy anything from the United States unless we can get better value for our money by so doing. We buy nothing from Great Britain, Germany, Austria or Italy unless those who are charged with the purchase of it think they can get the best value for their money. It is preposterous nonsense—and I say it in all kindness—to think you can effectively divert trade from its natural channels by legislation. Let me give the House an example which I gleaned from the pages of the report of the Economic conference which was attended by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways the autumn before last. The representative of India said that after the war they had endeavoured to direct their trade in raw hides from Germany to Great Britain. They had apparently in India—at least so I gathered from the report—a large trade in light hides, and prior to the war these light hides had been going largely to Germany. They had an export duty on these hides of 15 per cent. They cut the duty to Great Britain down to 10 per cent, and maintained the 15 per cent duty on hides sent to Germany; but the hides went to Germany just the same. Why? Because that was the natural place for them to go, because trade had worn that channel, because, as the representative from India said, the German people seemed to be the only people who were able as a good business venture, to work up or deal in these light hides. We had at the time when the National Policy was introduced into this country a very much smaller trade with the United States, relatively to the trade with England than we have to-day; but with the introduction of the National Policy, which was supported by the slogan "Reciprocity in trade or reciprocity in tariff," we found that relatively to our trade with Great Britain our trade with the United States increased. After 1896 we gave a large preference to British goods, but our trade with the United States increased proportionately faster than did our trade with Great Britain. In 1911 we were given an opportunity, which may not come again for many years, the responsibility for the rejection of which will have to be borne as a crushing burden on the shoulders of the distinguished members who sit on the immediate left of the Speaker.

But even after that rejection, trade with the United States relatively kept increasing and increasing. It is folly to fight against economic law and the facts of geography, and the sooner the country realizes that, and instead of trying to fight against economic law and to fight against geography, tries to take advantage of economic law and to take advantage of geography, the sooner we will arrive at a prosperous position.

In his remarks dealing with the report of this special committee investigating agricultural conditions, the member for Vancouver Centre made this statement:

> Wheat, flour, cattle and sugar were never affected by the conference rate whatever.

I have not had time to look up sugar, and I am prepared for the purpose of the argument to grant that my hon. friend is right about sugar, but he is wrong about the three other commodities.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt?

Mr. McMASTER: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is not quite right. I said that these articles were not now and had not been for some time affected by the conference rates. They were at one time, because I am quite aware of the fact that the United States government interfered in regard to flour, so that my hon. friend is quite right in regard to that.

Mr. McMASTER: Perhaps my hon. friend is not quite so wrong as I thought he was. I did not understand him to say that it was merely at the present time that these were not affected by the conference rates. I do not know whether they are now affected by the conference rates, but I know that after the representatives of the lines in Montreal had endeavoured to hide from your committee the existence of their combination and combine, and that after we examined into the matter, investigated and cross-questioned them, we found out these facts and, perhaps, if they had conference rates on wheat, flour and cattle, in the past, it is quite possible that even if they do not have them on these articles now, they may easily have them in the future.

In connection, however, with cattle, there is not much room for difference of opinion, because I hold in my hand a reply of the steamship lines engaged in the Canadian north Atlantic trade to a report made by Mr. Preston, and on page 21, I read as follows:

> During 1921 cattle were being shipped to continental ports at rates varying from $75 up to $100 per head whereas conference lines were only charging $40 to the United Kingdom during the same period, and during the same year this rate was reduced to $30 and was subsequently reduced to the present basis of $20 on cattle weighing over 1,000 pounds, and $18 for cattle weighing 1,000 pounds or under.

This is not the rate of one particular line. This is the rate stated by all the lines to which the rates apply, and I think it is fair to say that that is a conference rate on cattle at the present time.

Let us look at the question of flour, because quite an eloquent appeal was made for support of the attitude assumed by my hon. friend, which after all, was an attitude rather of criticism than of constructive statesmanship, to members who sit immediately opposite me, because wheat and flour had not been controlled by conference rates. I have in my hand the evidence which was taken before the special committee on Agricultural Conditions. In part 1, at page 143 I read as follows:

By the Chairman:

Q. Have you a fixed agreement on other agricultural products?—A. We have certain understandings as to rates on some commodities.

Q. What commodities?—A. Oh, on butter, provisions—

Q. Flour?—A. No, there is no fixed rate on flour. We have what might be called a gentlemen's agreement as to rates on flour.

Mr. BRISTOL: What date is that?

Mr. McMASTER: This gentleman is Major Curry and he gave his evidence on March 15, 1923:

Q. What is the difference between an "understanding", and a "gentlemen's agreement", Major Curry?—A. There would be difficulty. If any particular flour shipper came to me and wanted a lower rate, and I thought there was justice in his argument and I felt we could afford to carry flour at a lower rate than we were quoting, I could very easily arrange to get him that rate.

Q. How would you arrange to get him that rate? Just give it to him yourself, or would you confer with others before giving him an answer?—A. On account of the understanding we have, I would have to give notice to the other steamship companies.

Q. What other steamship companies would you have to give notice to in such cases?—A. Do you wish me to name the companies?

Q. If you please.—A. The Canadian Pacific, the Cunard line, the Donaldson line, and the Canada Steamship line.

Q. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine?—A. I do not think, sir, they are in the agreement, but I believe they are represented, and perhaps could answer that question themselves.

We had some interesting evidence about flour from a Mr. Cunningham and I read from his evidence at page 195:

Q. Here we find the minutes of a meeting held on the 7th of February at 11 a.m. It does not say, but that would be in 1920:

Grain rates:—The lines present agreed to maintain a rate of forty cents per 100 pounds on rye, corn, barley and wheat when the latter is released, with fifty cents per 100 pounds on oats, with the exception of McLean Kennedy and Co., who stated they would have to cable their principals, but would recommend their adopting these rates.

That applies to wheat rather than to flour, but I may as well deal with wheat now, and there is plenty of evidence in the testimony given by these gentlemen that there was at that time and had been previously a conference rate on wheat as well as on flour.

There was also a rate on a great number of other agricultural commodities:

Q. Mr. Curry gave us to understand that the rates charged upon butter, cheese, live stock, chilled meats, apples, canned fruit and vegetables were all rates established after conference between the different lines?—A. No. I think he excluded the live stock.

Q. Well, apart from live stock, you would agree with him?—A. Yes. As far as we are concerned. We feel we should follow to a certain extent the rates that are considered satisfactory by the other lines.

I will not weary the House with further references to the evidence. I have merely this to say, that I think if anyone with an unprejudiced mind and a fair degree of intelligence will sit down and read the evidence which was given before the special committee, he will come to a conclusion without the slighest doubt that there was a combine and that there was a fixing of prices, not by the mere law of supply and demand, but an artificial fixing of prices. I am a great believer in the law of supply and demand in regard to ocean transportation as well as in regard to other things, but you do not have the law of supply and demand when those who have the supply combine together, no matter what the demand is, to put up the rates. One of the great difficulties in the situation is this. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is perfectly right when he says that to have a schedule of vessels sailing and vessels arriving settled beforehand, is of real and vital interest to the commerce of the country. Of course it is, but it is also of real and vital interest to the commerce of the country that a man should know that not only will a certain ship leave on a certain day, but that no advantage will be taken of his necessity of shipping the goods by the transportation company in arbitrarily raising the rates, because that is what has happened and that is what is likely to happen under the present arrangements. Is this a good thing for the shipping companies themselves? I very much doubt it. We see more shipping in Montreal to-day than is needed to supply the demand. There would be far more goods shipped away from Canada and brought into Canada if we could have in many regards reasonable freight rates. There are some freight rates which are perfectly reasonable; there are others which are not reasonable. I am quite willing to admit, for the sake of argument, and I think it is a fair proposition to put before the members of this House, that operating costs of vessels have increased 100 per cent in, say, the last ten to fifteen years. But I am told that they have not, as a general rule, increased more than 100 per cent. Therefore, when one finds as one does certain rates increased from, not 100 per cent, but 200 per cent, 300 per cent, and, in some cases, 400 per cent, that is prima facie evidence of extortion.

A fair day's wage for a fair day's work applies to the workman, it applies to the administrator, and it should apply to capital. And those who endeavour by artificial means to get unjustifiable profits will find in the long run that they hurt not only those who are the direct sufferers but themselves as well. Are there any people in the world who are really more interested in the development of this undeveloped half of the North American continent than are the shipping people? When you consider that this country is able to support not only twice, but three times and perhaps four times the number of industrious, hard-working people whom we have in Canada to-day, is there any interest in the world, I ask, which is more concerned with the development of this Dominion than are the shipping people? Take the question of immigration. It is quite true that the immigrant accommodation on vessels to-day is incomparably better than what it was twenty years ago. But does it cost more than twice as much now than it did ten years ago to carry third class passengers? I doubt it very much, and when you find that third class rates have gone up three and four and five times what they were before, then I say that such a state of affairs calls for investigation. And if the investigation establishes the fact that there is extortion it calls for a remedy. There is one thing I believe a committee such as was foreshadowed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon will do: it will enable us to get at the facts. And if whatever committee is appointed will work at the facts with the same devotion, the same lack of party spirit and animated with the same desire of arriving at the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, as animated the previous committee, then I think a useful work can be accomplished.

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Centre Toronto): The matter before the House, the proposed contract with reference to ocean transportation, is one of the most important problems that will come before parliament this session. The question of ocean transportation and the virtue or the misconduct of the North Atlantic conference or combine, or whatever hon. gentlemen may choose to call it, has been a matter which the Canadian people have had under consideration for, I suppose, twenty-five years. The chief thing in their favour, to start with, is the fact that they are principally English and mostly respectable people. So respectable are they that they even had until a few days ago the steamers belonging to the government of this country; and I believe they still have steamers belonging to the United States working under their flag as part of the conference, to say nothing of such ordinary people as the Canadian Pacific Railway Steamships, the Cunard line, the White Star and others.

To begin with, we might reasonably take it that at the hands of the Canadian people these gentlemen have a right at all events to fair consideration on the question whether they are or are not really a combine for the purpose of fixing ocean rates. They should be given the same fair consideration which the railway commission gives to the two railways of this country in the matter of fixing rates for their traffic. If these shipping interests have been operating as fairly as the railways have done, then no one has any reason to complain; and if on the other hand they have not been fair, if the farmers and the manufacturers of the country have not been properly treated, then we have a right to quarrel with them and possibly to do something to remedy whatever injustice might exist. I will not render any verdict on that question, inasmuch as we have Mr. Preston on the one hand and, on the other, the reports which have been referred to. I have received through the mail the reply of the steamship lines engaged in the Canadian north Atlantic trade, and apparently they differ very materially from Mr. Preston on many important matters. I did notice one thing which I considered of great importance to the farmers, and as they are the largest shippers of Canada, on the whole, the truth of the statement was one I wanted to verify. When the minister was speaking I therefore asked him a question as to whether grain, flour or cattle rates were fixed by the conference, and in this connection I would quote a statement that appears on page 5 of this document I have received:

> Furthermore, in the list of eastbound rates promulgated by the North Atlantic conference, no rate or agreement is made in respect to grain, flour or cattle, these rates being absolutely open.

If they are absolutely open and are continued absolutely open it is naturally a matter of great importance to the farmers of the country. Of course, it is easy to understand why they should be and are open, because on these particular commodities, such as cattle, there are tramp steamers in Montreal fighting the battle. The transportation question in Canada presents some difficulties on the Atlantic side, in Montreal and Quebec, that do not exist in the great port of New York. There is on the Atlantic ocean what is commonly known as the Atlantic triangle. That is to say, a ship will go from London or Liverpool to South America, thence up to New York, and if it gets a cargo it naturally will not want to go up the St. Lawrence particularly in October and November. If, however, a cargo is not available and the prospects are not bright, then there is a plenitude of shipping out of Montreal, as happened last year, when the tramps were in the proportion of two to one in opposition to the liners which are alleged to be a combine or conference.

Now, we must have had fairly good transportation rates in the last two or three years. for if I am correctly informed the great port of Montreal within the last three years has doubled the transportation that has proceeded from it.

An hon. MEMBER: What does that prove?

Mr. BRISTOL: That proves that at all events the rates were such as to encourage the shipment of goods at a profit, for otherwise people would not have exported. Of course, one difficulty in our shipping business naturally is that while we have a good cargo to go to England we often have a small cargo coming back. On the other hand, vessels going from England to South America or even to Australia usually have good return cargoes. So that when all is said and done the thing that really makes the difference is the number of cargoes which the ships carry.

So far as the present question is concerned, the real point before us is, not whether there is or is not a combine, but whether the contract which the government presents for our consideration is a sensible contract, a useful contract, a contract which, while it may not do very much, may make the combine, if there is a combine, sit up and take notice that we do not think they are treating the Canadian people fairly and that we will show them what can be done.

As regards the government, if they can do anything to improve transportation rates between Canada and the Old Country, then of course they are doing something of great public benefit. But I have read the contract with a good deal of care and I have no doubt it was drawn by the distinguished lawyer whose name was given to us. But the drawing of a contract is one thing and the making of it another, that is to say, the composition of what you put into it. I have no doubt Mr. Lafleur has drawn an excellent contract; but I want to tell my distinguished friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that I think it has been put over this government in a very shocking fashion. And I will explain the reasons for that view. I may be wrong, but I will explain my position, because I do not think the Prime Minister proposes to have something injurious accomplished if he can help it.

Now Sir William Petersen is only personally liable until he forms a corporation. That is perfectly clear. Once he has done that the clause to which I am referring absolutely releases him from liability; and very sensibly so too, for the modern man prefers to put a ship under a corporation; then should she run down another ship he is not liable for damages if there is carelessness on the part of the crew. It is a common practice to form a shipping company on these lines. But I am pointing out to the Prime Minister that the distinguished gentleman on whom he is relying is absolutely free from liability the moment he forms that corporation. Forming corporations as a matter of modern business has many qualities which are worth considering. For instance, under this contract if on the 15th of June he has borrowed or rented six ships and put them in operation, on the 15th day of July he starts to get his monthly payment of the $1,333,000, or thereabouts. The two ships which he is to deliver under the contract must be ready on the 1st of August, but he is under no penalty if he is not able to make delivery. If he writes, "I am very sorry, but the people who are constructing these ships have not got them quite ready," you have got to go on paying him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh no.

Mr. BRISTOL: I am not asking the Prime Minister to accept my view. We will assume that you have not to go on paying. But on the 1st of August before he starts one of his real boats you have to begin paying him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend?

Mr. BRISTOL: I will read the clause my right hon. friend refers to later.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read it now, please.

Mr. BRISTOL: I will, if it will give you any comfort. This is the clause:

And it is mutually covenanted and agreed between the parties hereto that the subsidy payable to the contractor in the preceding paragraph is based on the operation and maintenance of a service of ten ships and the subsidy aforementioned shall be increased or reduced as the case may be in proportion to the number of ships operated and maintained by the contractor in the service aforesaid from time to time and such increase or reduction of subsidy shall be added to or deducted from the monthly payments hereinbefore provided for in paragraph two.

Is that the clause?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BRISTOL: Is there another later on?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, let my hon. friend read clause 2.

Mr. BRISTOL: Certainly.

And His Majesty for himself, his heirs and successors hereby covenants and agrees with the contractor, his administrators and assigns that the contractor well and faithfully performing all and every the covenants, agreements and stipulations hereinbefore set forth—

Not afterwards, but hereinbefore set forth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BRISTOL: The clause continues:

—and contained by the said contractor to be done and performed shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid to the contractor, his heirs, administrators and assigns during continuance of this contract an annual subsidy of two hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds (£275,000) from and out of the consolidated fund or other proper moneys of the Dominion of Canada, the same to be paid and payable to the contractor at the city of London, England, in equal monthly instalments payable monthly at the end of each and every month (unless otherwise agreed upon between the contracting parties) in each and every year during the continuance of this agreement, the first monthly instalment to become due and payable one month after the commencement of the service hereinbefore referred to (which shall not be later than June 15, 1925)—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not that make it quite clear that he is to get no payment until he performs the service? He is to be paid monthly as he performs the service.

Mr. BRISTOL: If the service starts on the 15th of June he would be entitled to his first payment one month later.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the six ships and no more.

Mr. BRISTOL: I should not like to agree with that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the point.

[Mr. Bristol.]

Mr. BRISTOL: I think he would be very fortunate if he could get it on the six ships that he has hired instead of waiting to get it on the ten ships to be built. I am not trying to change the meaning of the contract, I am giving you my view. Clause 2 concludes:

—and instalments monthly thereafter unless the parties hereto mutually agree upon other terms of payment.

So the payments start on the 15th of July, and he has not got a ship built, but it is hoped he is going to have two ready on the 1st of August. Now, if he can get that rate of payment for the six ships he has hired he is very lucky. But we will leave it still August, and we will assume he gets his two ships ready on the 1st of August, when he receives two payments in advance, $300,000, on the two ships. Take ten ships of the character that are to be supplied under this contract, 5,000 ton ships, I am advised that a fairly high price for that type to-day is $120 per ton; that is $600,000 will build each one of those ships in England to-day. I do not think there is any doubt about that at all. During and immediately after the war the price was about $175 per ton. Of course, he has got good engines in them and they are excellent ships. Now, if you take $600,000 as the unit price, you have $6,000,000 that he has got to put into this business through a corporation. What he has to do really is to go to the shipping companies and make a contract with them for the ships, they will take security on the ships, and he need not put up one dollar. I will show you how he works it. He gets $6,000,000 from the corporation with this contract turned over to them so far as he has a right to turn it over, because it is mostly based on the carrying out of its terms, and with that money, if he paid $600,000 annually for the ten years—I am not allowing interest—he has still got out of that contract $1,330,000 per annum—a lot of money. If you take interest to-day in England at 5 per cent, $300,000 is all he has to pay on the $6,000,000, but it will be less, because as he receives his monthly payments he will have less interest to pay; in other words, in five years he will have paid for half the ships. So he would have a cold-blooded profit of at least $430,000 annually, and he would have the ships free. The only thing he has got against them is what the government of this country may do to him in the way of controlling and regulating the ocean freight rates he may charge. The minister to-day says that with the high type of ships he has to build he will make something like £4,000. I do not know whether he means per annum or not. For myself, if I had a contract of that character, I would not care if I made anything each year, I would be quite content to get the ships at the end of the ten-year period for nothing.

The government is losing money on the operation of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, for the very obvious reason that those ships are not under the British flag, and they pay higher rates of wages and higher prices for coal and supplies. Therefore it costs so much more to run them, and on last year's operation I am informed there will be a loss of nearly $9,000,000. They were charging the same rates that these terrible gentlemen, whom you may call anything you like, charged on their boats. The United States government in the same line of business lost $35,000,000, for although their coal bill is lower their rate of wages is higher. They charged the rates that the government are telling you are so high that these Atlantic pirates or combine, whichever you like to call them, are charging. But at least the combine people had to make a profit where we and the United States government made a loss. So that if Sir William Petersen, with new boats, charges the same rates, not as the combine, but as the combine would if they did not make a cent, he will make money; he will have his $430,000 cash annually and in ten years he will have the ships and they will not have cost him one dollar. He will not be liable for one cent, for the obvious reason that he has turned this over to a limited company, which is a very common and a very sensible thing to do. So with all respect to the government and to the distinguished gentleman who drew up that contract, I want to say that in my humble opinion, and I have had a little to do with contracts especially with reference to shipping, Sir William Petersen has an extremely valuable contract. He can even charge less rates than the so-called combine, still make money, and have his ships without them costing him a cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot quite follow this point. My hon. friend says that Sir William Petersen has made a great contract, and is going to make a lot of money. On the other hand, I understood him to say that if any of these ships in the combine attempted to reduce rates, they would be ruined.

Mr. BRISTOL: I did not say they would be ruined. First of all, I do not believe there is a combine in the sense that it is a combine to restrain trade. I have too high an opinion of the Canadian Pacific and of these other lines to believe they are doing anything more than trying to get a fair rate which will keep them going. There may be mistakes made, just as there have been in the fixing of rates on our transportation lines in this country; there is a little one, for instance, on the Crowsnest pass; but I do not believe for one moment that the men who are running that North Atlantic conference, the best brains in England, the people who have made Great Britain, and who provided the ships to win the war—I do not believe that body of men are pirates or that they are desirous of charging a rate that will be ruinous to the people of Canada; they would be crazy to do it. They must try to give transportation at reasonable rates in order to get the products of this country as cargo for their ships, and if the people do not get a reasonable rate they will not ship their goods.

Coming back to the Petersen contract, I say that these modern ships, which are good, will certainly be able to carry just as cheaply as the ships of the Atlantic conference. All right. Now you say that the Atlantic conference is making money. So they are, I hope; they would not go on if they did not, but Sir William Petersen can cut his rate down to the amount they have made and charge that much less rate, and still have at the end of ten years his ships and $430,000 of annual profits for ten years. That is what he would have, and he need not be liable for one cent if his contract is a failure. In that case he can bid you good-bye. But if his contract is a success he takes the money. In the old contract in 1899 he had to put up some money as a guarantee.

I come now to the next stage. Sir William Petersen gets his contract, and the government are going to fix the rates. Now the government of this country have no more knowledge, in my humble judgment, than I have of fixing what ought to be the rates for transporting the trade of this country across the ocean in ships of this kind. Therefore they will have to select, as they did in connection with the railways, one, two or three men to say what shall be the rates that this new company which will be formed shall charge, and a company, of course, will be formed because Sir William Petersen will never leave himself open to liability; it would be foolish for him to do so; he does not have to. So whatever rates this company has to charge will have to be fixed by gentlemen to be selected by the government. I do not know who around Montreal has brains enough —they may be there—to fix ocean rates the world over, or between here and Great Britain, taking insurance, transportation and all other factors into account; but no doubt you can get the men if you pay for it, and that is an added charge to what this thing is going to cost.

Now when you have the rates fixed, it is perfectly obvious as has been said already that the ten ships are a mere bagatelle compared with the shipping that is engaged in carrying our trade across the ocean. What they can carry is a joke relatively to what has to be carried. Now who is going to get the benefit of the joke? Which of you gentlemen sitting to my left belonging to the Progressive party are going to have the good fortune to get your goods on these ships at a lower rate? How is it going to be decided? Is it going to be done by lot, or how? Is the space going to be given to particular friends, or to the Conservatives, and is it going to be done by advertising or how? Everybody in Canada will want to ship by those boats if they are from one to three per cent cheaper than the others; yet these ten ships cannot commence to handle our trade. My advice to the Progressive party is that they should see they get the first chance. I do not see much chance for the manufacturers of this country getting any space on these ships.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): How many ships does my hon. friend think should be put on?

Mr. BRISTOL: I have not expressed the view that any ships should be put on. I am only criticising the particular contract before us. I have not found the slightest fault with the government for endeavouring, so to speak, to beat the lion in his den and destroy him, if there is a lion; and that, no doubt, would come out upon investigation. We can have the three gentlemen from New York representing this combine come down here, and they will tell us that the one thing in the world they love to do is to give Canadians the cheapest freights in the world; and I hope they will from now on. But what I do say is that this particular contract, in my humble opinion, and with all respect, is a gold brick so far as we are concerned. It is an extremely valuable contract for Sir William Petersen if he builds the right kind of ships, and he has no liability. Secondly, it gives such a small percentage of the people of this country a chance to get their goods on these ships at a reduced rate, whatever that rate may be; and I hope the government will be clever enough in appointing people and get a reduced rate.

But that is not all that Sir William Petersen makes. I have had a slight experience in shipping, and I will give you a little suggestion. In case Sir William Petersen gets the contract, he may as well get all there is out of it. If the Petersen line operates, the government should get a rakeoff on all the activities, including commission on supplies, repairs, particularly the charges on which there is five per cent—viz: on charters, time charters, freights and all the other known perquisites that fall into the willing hands of a shipping agent who puts up nothing but his brains. Most of these transportation companies have a special company, and one set of friends will furnish the supplies, and make something out of that, and another the repairs, and so on. Sir William Petersen is a very experienced man in transportation, and no doubt he will have his supply company and get his share on supplies and repairs, and we have the evidence now that the engines that will be used in these boats can only be repaired in London, and that is pretty close to home.

I am not going into any further detail in this matter. I say that the question is a very vital and important one, and this contract cannot commence to solve the problem. The people who want space on these ships will have to fight each other for it, and I do not know what will happen to them. On the other hand, the gentleman who happens to have the ships, the owner of that stock, has no loss; he makes a large amount of money, and I should think he would be very happy in the proposition. But the contract is not going to solve the problem of ocean transportation for the people of this country. I cannot say at the present moment that I am able to give any solution of real value, but I would say that this government ought to be fairly well posted during the last two or three years as to how the conference does its work. You have government owned ships which are much larger than those which are to be put into operation. Government owned ships which have belonged to the North Atlantic Steamship conference for a number of years. Surely it would be possible to have the officers of the mercantile marine called and examined as to whether there is or is not a combine on the three things which I have mentioned—wheat, flour and cattle. It is surely very easy to get at that information, and it ought to be equally easy to get at the rates charged.

The carrying of live stock is a very important matter to shipping companies. I do not know whether the Petersen company are to provide any special facilities for the transportation or not. In my humble judgment the farmers of this country are absolutely protected at the present time. To-day the liners are having much difficulty to get cargoes; when they cannot obtain sufficient other cargoes they put in grain to fill up the space. Both liners and tramps operate from the port of Montreal to ports of the United Kingdom. Last year 153,000,000 bushels of grain were shipped from that port and more of that grain was carried by tramps than by liners.

I cannot see that this contract is going to help our people to get lower transportation rates. It may help a few but at the expense of the Canadian tax payers. Doubtless the matter should be investigated, and if you appoint a committee to go into it it ought to be possible to secure the attendance of some distinguished people and to secure the facts and no doubt some good may result from the investigation, but not from this proposed contract.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): I want to take this opportunity of making a few remarks in support of the live stock industry, and to point out how that industry is affected by high transportation costs. The Preston report deals with the cattle industry, and it makes this comment:

> The tragedy of the cattle industry must be largely laid to the determination of the North Atlantic steamship combine to keep the ocean rate at an exceptionally high figure.

In regard to the question of prices the report says:

> In January, 1923, the White Star S.S. line quoted a rate of $15 per head, since which time it has ranged largely from $20 to $25. It is claimed by the steamship companies that the $15 rate was a "distress rate." Shortly afterwards, however, the rate was fixed for the season at $20.

This proves that even the cattle rate is in the hands of the conference. I do not rise for the purpose of censuring the government for taking the action proposed here in order to secure cheaper transportation rates. I would rather feel like censuring them for not taking action sooner. I have on frequent occasions deplored the fact that the government have not undertaken to give us better transportation rates as I think perhaps they could have done. Resolutions have been passed by different live stock organizations throughout this country, in addition to the protests made on the floor of this House, at the failure of the government to take action. As far back as 1921 the following resolution was passed at the ninth annual convention of the Western Canada Live Stock Union:

> Be it resolved that this Western Canada Live Stock Union in convention assembled, while appreciating the voluntary reduction in freight rates on live stock by railways, urge upon the federal government the imperative need of a reduction of the cost of transportation on live stock to pre-war levels consistent with the drop in prices for live stock which the producer has been compelled to accept, and suggest for their immediate and serious consideration the utilization of the merchant marine service reported to be now lying idle in port as one means of alleviating this condition.

I had the privilege of attending the convention of the Western Live Stock Union at Calgary this year when a similar resolution was passed unanimously. I also attended the meetings of the Stock Breeders of Manitoba and a similar resolution was passed there also. So I say, that the demand is becoming insistent on the part of the live stock breeders of Canada for the government to take some action along this line. It has been claimed that the live stock industry is in a deplorable condition and that contention is true. I have some figures here that will prove how the industry has gone back and deteriorated in the last five years. The following table shows the extent to which our shipments to Great Britain and the United States have declined:

Year	No. of head
1920	500,216
1921	295,410
1922	207,735
1923 (approximately)	210,000
1924	262,680

There was a little increase in the shipments of 1924 due to the fact, I am sure, that the farmers becoming disgusted and discouraged with the disappointing results from this industry had sold off much of their breeding stock.

Now, I maintain that agriculture has never had the support and attention that its relative importance to the nation has demanded. The live stock industry is the most important factor in permanent agriculture. Britain recognizing this fact has always paid careful attention to its live stock, and still remains the pure bred nursery of the world. We read in the agricultural papers of Royalty itself being seen often in the show rings leading a prize beast bred on their own farm. The Breeders Gazette has taken exception very often to the fact that men in authority in America have not paid much attention to the live stock industry. This year we find that President Coolidge made the first trip of any United States president to the International Fair at Chicago. The time has come now when we would like to see the Prime Minister of this country attending many of our agricultural fairs, and I am sure we would be delighted to see him leading round the ring some prize animal. We can produce the cattle that Great Britain requires. She wants nothing but good stuff, and we can deliver the goods. In substantiation of this statement I should like to say that at the International Fair at Chicago Canadian breeding cattle won thirty-four prizes. Among that number I believe were 9 firsts, and 3 grand championships. We won no less than nine prizes in the fat cattle class. There is a most wonderful market in the Old Land when we consider last year that it bought $160,000,000 worth of cattle from Ireland, whereas we succeeded in selling the Motherland only a little over $8,000,000 worth. Therefore it behooves this parliament and this government to take action immediately to try and save this great industry.

When the cattle embargo was finally removed we expected a great trade to develop and we had an assurance—in fact I believe it was advertised—that the White Star line would charge a rate of $15 per head for cattle shipped to the Old Country. Previous to the war, if I remember correctly our cattle were transported to the Old Country for $7.50 per head. We were much surprised when, instead of $15, the rate was advanced to $22.50 at which figure it now prevails although it is quoted at $20. While the farmers, ranchers, and business men of Canada have done everything possible to foster trade and build up this great industry, the shipping barons of Montreal and New York have planned deliberately a combination, charging excessive freight rates, thus hampering and almost strangling our promised trade in export cattle. We have in Canada a national railway, and a government merchant marine. We have the cattle suited to the British market, and in Britain we have a market. We have everything, indeed, to build up a great trade. Yet we are the victims of a combination of commercial blood suckers that are bleeding the farmers and live stock men white. The efforts of the government to relieve the situation is being watched with concern by the live stock breeders of Canada, and it is to be hoped that those efforts will meet with success. One very important phase of this agreement is that it takes no cognizance of the possible trade that will develop in the Orient; it seeks only to regulate the Atlantic rates. It was my privilege while attending the convention at Calgary this year to listen to an address delivered by Mr. Craig, Deputy Minister of Agriculture for Alberta, who spoke of the steps taken to develop trade with Japan. The government of Alberta has sent special commissioners over there, and I believe that the Canadian government also has trade agents in the Orient who also assist in that great work. The important fact was brought out by Mr. Craig that there is a market in Japan for our cattle. He told us the first shipment from Vancouver to Yokohama cost him $75 per head. He succeeded in getting a reduced transportation rate of $50 per head, and, by the way the ship that took the cattle over at $50 a head was one of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I asked him if they got good service, and he said everything was first-class and that the cattle arrived in good shape. The rate has been reduced to $37.50 a head, and everything points to a development of a great trade with the Orient. We now have even Japanese importers coming to Canada. I think one came two weeks ago and bought 250 head of cattle for export to Japan. I read in the papers a statement that another importer had purchased over 500 head for shipment to Japan. Therefore I believe there is a great possibility of building up a trade among the seething millions of the Orient. I was told, and I know it is a fact that the Japanese are a proud nation. They have found out by experience that they can increase the stature of their soldiers by feeding them on a meat diet, and no doubt they intend to eat more meat as well as flour in Japan.

A lucrative and prosperous live stock industry in this country will solve many of our problems. It will solve the problem of immigration which has been mentioned frequently to-night. If hon. members will forgive a personal reference, I will show them how that will increase employment and will increase the immigration to this country. A few years ago, as my father before me, I was a wheat miner, as we are termed. We did not keep any live stock on the farm outside of a cow or two which furnished us with milk and butter. Realizing that our farm must be built up on a system of mixed farming, we got a herd of cattle. Formerly I used to do the chores myself in the winter time, but since I made the change I employ two men all the year round, besides employing others in the busy season. The cattle industry will increase employment in this country, and a great industry can be established. I intended to deal with the possibility of utilizing the merchant marine to take care of this trade, but I fear I would weary the House if I took up more time. I just mention the fact that in going over the tonnage of the ships appearing in Hansard yesterday I find thirty-six of 8,000 tons register. These are almost as large as the Petersen ships. It seems to me the government might undertake to sell or lease these vessels to Sir William Petersen to engage in this trade, rather than have him build new ships, because in that event our ships might be scrapped or tied up, and left lying idle in the harbour. I desire to state again that the people in western Canada and indeed in the whole of Canada are looking forward with great concern to this project, and we hope that the government will be successful in giving us relief from present excessive rates. I will withhold my support of this proposed legislation, Mr. Speaker, and adopt a policy of "wait and see."

Mr. CLARK moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. gentleman wishes to occupy more than ten minutes, all right.

Mr. CLARK: I do.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Civil government—Public Works, salaries and contingencies, $689,655.

Mr. BOYS: Is it the desire of the minister to proceed very far to-night? As a matter of fact two or three members on this side of the House expected to be present when these particular estimates were under discussion, and if it is proposed to continue for any length of time I would like to communicate with these hon. members.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think we intend to go very far to-night. We might pass this item.

Mr. BOYS: I am quite aware there is no hard and fast rule, but there is a sort of understanding that, except for special reasons, the House will rise at eleven o'clock. One of our clocks shows twelve minutes to eleven, and another shows six minutes to eleven. It hardly seems worth while to proceed to eleven o'clock, but if we are going to sit till half past eleven or twelve I should like to get in touch with the members referred to.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is no intention of going on, under the circumstances.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Wednesday, March 4, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

I have received with great pleasure the Address you have voted in reply to my Speech at the opening of parliament, and thank you for it sincerely.

BYNG OF VIMY.

Government House, Ottawa.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 17, respecting the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company—Mr. Jelliff.

Bill No. 18, respecting the Manitoba and North Western Railway Company of Canada—Mr. Stewart (Humboldt).

Bill No. 19, respecting patent of the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of Canada, Limited—Mr. Marler.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER REVISION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the following members do compose the special committee appointed to consider, jointly with Mr. Speaker, the advisability of revising the rules of this House, and to report to the House at this session, viz., Messieurs: His Honour the Speaker, Marcil (Bonaventure), Boivin, Euler, Gordon, Kyte, Bird, Kellner, Thurston, Wallace, Meighen, Ryckman, Bristol and Arthurs.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

List of leases of wharves, piers and breakwaters, and statement of the amount of revenue and expenditure—Hon. Mr. Cardin.

Report of the Research Council—Hon. Mr. Low.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

STONY MOUNTAIN PENITENTIARY

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. Has Arthur Guest been appointed, either temporary or permanent, as steward at the Stony Mountain Penitentiary?

2. If so, on whose recommendation was the appointment made?

3. If so, was the position advertised in the usual way, and was the Civil Service Commission consulted about the appointment?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes permanently appointed.

2 and 3. The position was advertised in the usual way and the appointment made by the Civil Service Commission.

GENERATION OF HYDRO-ELECTRIC ENERGY

Mr. McKAY:

How much hydro-electric energy, expressed in kilowatt hours and horse-power years, was generated by each of the power companies mentioned on page 404, of Hansard for February 23rd instant, (a) for export, and (b) for consumption in Canada, during the fiscal years 1919-20, to 1923-24, inclusive ?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

STATEMENT SHOWING AMOUNT OF ELECTRICAL ENERGY, GAS, OR FLUID GENERATED OR PRODUCED FOR EXPORT AND FOR CONSUMPTION IN CANADA, UNDER THE AUTHORITY OF THE ELECTRICITY AND FLUID EXPORTATION ACT, FOR THE YEAR ENDING 31ST DAY OF MARCH, 1920.

EDMUNDSTON CUSTOMS AND IMMIGRATION BUILDING

Mr. DOUCET:

1. What was the total cost of the customs and immigration building at International Bridge, Edmundston, New Brunswick?

2. Were tenders called for the erection of said building?

3. Who were the tenderers and what was the amount of each tender?

4. To whom was the contract awarded?

5. What was the amount paid for extras apart from the contract price?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. $3,771.94.

2. Yes.

3. L. A. Dugal, Edmundston, $3,360; J. R. Lebel, Edmundston, $3,950; J. and D. A. Harquail, Campbellton, $4,080.

4. L. A. Dugal, Edmundston.

5. $400 to contractor; $11.94 to Wm. Turgeon.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Pursuant to section 3, chapter 9, 13-14 George V. (Combines Investigation Act), has a minister of the crown been charged with the general administration of the act?

2. If so, what minister has been so charged?

3. Has there been a case up to February 25, 1924, where the minister of his own motion, as empowered by section 6, chapter 9, 13-14 George V, directed the registrar to enquire whether any alleged combine exists?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Yes.

2. Minister of Labour.

3. Yes, inquiry by the registrar in several cases has been authorized.

PENSIONS TO ABENAKIS

Mr. DOUCET:

1, What was the total amount paid in pensions to the Abenakis by the government, for the fiscal years of 1921-22, 1922-23, 1923-24, 1924-25?

2. What merchants of Pierreville supplied goods to the above pensioners and in what years?

3. What was the total amount supplied by each merchant for each year?

4. Is the government aware that said goods are supplied to the Abenakis without tenders being asked?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1.

1921-22	$ 612 16
1922-23	1,022 10
1923-24	1,322 52

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. What was the total cost of the commission appointed by the government regarding the coal inquiry at Tuxedo barracks, Winnipeg?
2. What amount did the commissioners receive?
3. Has the government received any objection as to the amount paid from Winnipeg or elsewhere?

BOOTS AND SHOES—SALES, ETC.

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis):

1. What was the total value of boots and shoes sold in Canada during each of the years 1914, 1918, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923 and 1924?
2. What was the total value of said goods imported from the United States, England or other countries for the above mentioned years?
3. What was the total value of said goods exported to the United States, England or other countries for above mentioned years?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

YUKON GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS—INCOME TAX EXEMPTION

Mr. BLACK (Yukon) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, statements and communications concerning exemption or partial exemption from payment of income tax on payments or remuneration, whether paid as salary, living allowance or otherwise, by the government of Canada to officials of Yukon Territory, and showing what exemptions (if any) from income tax have been allowed to Yukon officials on amounts paid them by the government of Canada during the past seven years.

He said: When the motion came up a few days ago the Minister of Customs asked me to permit it to stand. I have not heard from the minister since that time, and I think the motion should be allowed to stand.

Motion stands.

VANCOUVER—WATERFRONT PROPERTY

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved:

For copy of all letters, telegrams, documents and correspondence, between January 1, 1922, and February 25, 1924, between R. H. Gale and any minister or official of the Dominion government; and, between R. H. Gale and the Vancouver Harbour Commission, and between Vancouver harbour commissioners and any minister or official of the Dominion government; and between any representative of the Spillers interests and the harbour commissioners, and, or any minister of the crown and official of the government, regarding the negotiations for lease or sale of certain waterfront property in the Vancouver harbour, upon which is now erected what is known as the Spillers elevator, and which property lies immediately east of the Vancouver harbour commissioners elevator No. 1. Also, copy of any letters, agreements schedules of fees, assignments, transfers, and other documents appertaining thereto.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I do not rise for the purpose of making formal objection to the motion, but I am informed by the officials of the department that it is the first time that an order of the House has been requested for the production of papers or correspondence exchanged between the commission and private individuals. I am not quite clear as to whether this is the practice, and I would like to inform myself on that point. Will the hon. member let the motion stand, and I will ascertain if it has been the practice to make the correspondence between the department and individuals public property.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I have no objection to the motion standing, although I do not think the subject matter is open to objection.

Motion stands.

CURRENCY AND CREDIT

MOTION, MR. WOODSWORTH, AGAINST GRANTING PRIVILEGE TO CORPORATIONS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is not in the interests of the country at large that the privilege of issuing currency and of controlling financial credit should be granted to private corporations.

He said: I recognize that it requires considerable temerity to bring forward a resolution of such a far-reaching character as the one I have just moved. The House has considered from year to year for a good many years the tariff question in this country. Yesterday considerable time was devoted to the alleged North Atlantic combine. And yet I venture to say that this resolution strikes at a far more fundamental problem than either of these and one which, I venture to say, will in the future of Canada occupy a much more prominent position. I call attention to the terms of the resolution. I can quite understand that it it would be in the interests of the banks or the Canadian Bankers' Association that things should remain as they are; but the question as to whether it is in the interest of the public at large is an altogether different matter. This resolution was on the order paper last year, but it was not reached. It is purposely negative in form. Many schemes might be advanced as desirable substitutes for the existing system, for example, national banks, or provincial banks, or a central reserve bank, or the development of co-operative banks, or some one of the many new financial systems which have been discussed. I am not venturing into any of those fields to-day. These schemes may be discussed at some later period or possibly to-day by other speakers. I propose to confine my remarks to an examination of the system as it now exists. It seems to me that the first step is to show the injustice and inefficiency of the existing system.

This undoubtedly involves a discussion of the question of money itself. Though technical, this is intensely practical. Every man handles more or less money, very often less, but few of us stop to think anything about it.

Modern industry and civilization are based very largely upon the exchange of surplus products. In the old days a man consumed what he himself produced. Later on, when he produced more of one commodity than he required for himself, and his neighbour produced more of another commodity than he required for himself, there was possible an exchange, and thus barter sprang up. Nowadays, this exchange is carried on by means of money, and I take it that fundamentally money is a ticket system to facilitate distribution or exchange. We so frequently think in terms of money that sometimes we do not pause to remember that money in itself is not wealth: that it merely represents wealth. This is true even of gold money as money. It is not wealth as money; it simply represents wealth. We have a good deal to say with regard to production in this House. I would remind the House that after all the end of our present economic system is not essentially production, it is consumption. We work in order that we may enjoy, but unfortunately the productive end, and behind that the distributional end of our system, has gained such an ascendency that it has dominated everything else. In this country, if we looked at matters from the right angle, we would recognize that we can here produce sufficient to meet the needs of the people, we would realize that the problem essentially is one of distribution rather than one of production. As Viscount Milner says in his book, Questions of the Hour:

So long as the things themselves could be procured in adequate quantities, the counters for dealing with them would always be forthcoming.

That is coins, money, whatever form money takes, are essentially simply the counters by means of which we effect the process of distribution.

Mr. SPEAKER: In justice to the hon. gentleman, I would ask hon. members kindly to stop talking in order that his remarks may be heard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since money has come to be the measure of all other commodities, the question of money, its value and control, is basic. I would suggest that in ordinary commerical life whoever controls the size or weight of the pound practically determines the value of everything that goes over the scales; that whoever has the custody of the yardstick and can extend and contract that yardstick has very effective control over all selling operations.

After the earliest primitive times, when almost any commodity might be used as money—shells, beaver skins and similar objects —the world as a whole settled down to gold as the standard, the recognized money. All our text books on economics will tell the reason why gold was found specially suitable, its rarity its even quality and so on. I need not go into that here, and the fact that we have certain subsidiary coins such as silver, need not enter into this discussion. Gold, in most civilized countries, became the standard of value, but gradually within comparatively modern times, another kind of money was introduced, that is, bank notes. We are so accustomed to these bank notes or bills, as we ordinarily call them, that we have forgotten that their introduction is comparatively recent and that they represent an altogether new conception of money. Walker, the economist, said in one place many years ago:

Money is that money does.

Whatever performs the function of money is really money, and according to that bank notes are in reality money. We may recognize three stages through which bank notes have passed. First of all, they actually represented gold—there was as much gold as there were bank notes. Then it was found by the bankers that it was quite possible to issue a larger quantity of paper than there was a supply of gold. It was found in practice that only a few people demand gold, and that as long as general confidence could be maintained a small reserve of gold was sufficient. That stage is what we know as the gold basis. That is, there was on hand simply a sufficient supply of gold to meet the demand, not a sufficient supply of gold to cover all the paper that was in existence. Then we reached the third stage in Canada within the past ten years when bank notes became irredeemable. I do not think the majority of the people of Canada have yet learned that that is the case, but since the war broke out bank notes have not been redeemable. That is the present situation.

We have, however, in still more recent times, had added to the gold money and the bank note money a third kind of money, that is, cheques. Many people, perhaps, have not been inclined to think of cheques as being in reality money, and yet, some of the leading economists and bankers recognize that as being actually the case. To-day some ninety-six per cent of the business of Canada is done through the checking system. That was the statement given in the evidence offered to us two years ago in the Banking and Commerce committee. I am not putting forward this statement that cheques are money on my own authority. No less an authority than the Right Hon. Sir Reginald McKenna gave this statement:

Let me define the sense in which I shall use the word "money." I understand by it all currency in circulation among the public and all bank deposits drawable by cheque.

So that to-day, according to eminent bankers and economists, we have three kinds of money: gold money, which is almost non-existent in Canada; paper money in the form of bank notes, and bank cheques.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

We are of course still more or less in bondage to the fetish of the gold standard. In the Speech from the Throne it was foreshadowed that there might be an attempt to return to the so-called gold standard. But I would urge that if we have been able to get on without the gold standard for a period of ten years it is possible we might be able to get on without it for at least another ten years. Indeed, I am rather inclined to think, and this on the authority of some of the leading bankers of Great Britain, that it might be a decided mistake to return to the gold standard at all, a mistake, that is, in so far as the great mass of the people are concerned, though it might very well play into the hands of a comparatively small group. I would point out, taking an ordinary illustration, that it is quite conceivable that we could get along without gold as a medium of exchange. For example, the farmers in the west grow wheat; the manufacturers of Montreal make boots; is it absolutely necessary that we should send men into the wilds of northern Ontario to dig out gold and convert it into coin in order to enable the farmers of the west to exchange their wheat for the boots manufactured by the men in Montreal? As a matter of fact, even gold itself it not a fixed standard to-day. As Mr. Keynes points out, although until the war gold more or less perfectly performed the functions of a regulator. it is itself regulated to-day. I would read to the House two or three paragraphs from that very thought-provoking book of Mr. J. M. Keynes, Monetary Reform:

But the war has effected a great change. Gold itself has become a "managed" currency. The West as well as the East, has learnt to hoard gold, but the motives of the United States are not those of India. Now that most countries have abandoned the gold standard, the supply of the metal would, if the chief user of it restricted its holdings to its real needs, prove largely redundant. The United States has not been able to let gold fall to its "natural" value, because it could not face the resulting depreciation of its standard. It has been driven, therefore, to the costly policy of burying in the vaults of Washington what the miners of the Rand have laboriously brought to the surface. Consequently, gold now stands at an "artificial" value, the future course of which almost entirely depends on the policy of the Federal Reserve Board of the United States.

If the Federal Reserve Board intends to maintain the value of the dollar at a level which is irrespective of the inflow or outflow of gold, what object is there in continuing to accept at the mints gold which is not wanted, yet costs a heavy price? If the United States mints were to be closed to gold, everything, except the actual price of the metal, could continue precisely as before.

We have no ready-made standard. Experience has shown that in emergencies ministers of finance cannot be strapped down. And—most important of all—in the modern world of paper currency and bank credit there is no escape from a "managed" currency, whether we wish it or not;—convertibility into gold will not alter the fact that the value of gold itself depends on the policy of the central banks.

One of Mr. Keynes's critics, Professor Gustav Cassel, in a paper read to the Institute of Bankers in London on June 11, 1924, makes certain far-reaching admissions. He says:

> The gold standard can no longer be regarded as an absolutely objective standard outside every political discussion. The present value of gold is very much dependent upon the purchasing power of the dollar, and this can by no means be said to be fixed objectively by the value of gold. It is easy to see that the United States, by slightly altering their monetary policy, could keep their general level of prices somewhat higher or somewhat lower, and thereby give the metal gold a lower or a higher value than that which it actually has. In other words, there is no objective necessity in the present level of prices in the United States and neither, therefore, in the present value of gold.

Now, if money is the measure of all other commodities, what determines the value or, better, the purchasing power of money itself? What determines the purchasing power of any particular coin such as the dollar? We tried to get some statement on this matter from Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor during the inquiry before the Banking and Commerce committee two years ago. Sir Frederick did not appear to have any scientific or economic knowledge of the money situation; in fact, he himself said that he was simply a practical banker. I can understand that a practical electrician is quite capable of making ordinary repairs about a house; he can connect wires and do work of that kind. But when there is some fundamental problem confronting the city such as electrolysis, brought about by say, the operation of the street railways, we are driven to call in a scientist and try to get below the apparent difficulty in order to find out what the basic trouble really is. In other words, we must have some theory upon which to work. Let me read to the House some questions which I asked Sir Frederick during the investigation to which I have referred, together with the answers he made.

Q. What then determines the value of money itself? —A. The ability of the holder of that money to convert it into gold.

Q. Since we cannot convert it at the present time into gold, what determines its value?—A. It is accepted with confidence throughout the whole community and answers the purpose equally well. Is that your answer?

Q. It is in part; that is as to whether it has value. But it does not decide as to what its particular value is. Has the quantity anything to do with it?—A. Has the quantity of the money anything to do with the value? Not if there is a sufficiency of gold behind it.

Q. But now that we are not on the gold standard, has the amount of money in circulation anything to do with its value?—A. That amount of money in circulation is in strict accordance with the requirements of the country under our very admirable currency laws.

Q. Then the amount has something to do with its value?—A. There is no excess of money in the community. Automatically the circulation of the banks is retired every day, beyond the requirements of the people who wish to carry money in their pockets.

Q. Do credit instruments such as cheques not act or function as money?—A. Yes.

Q. Then would you not say that at any given day there might be a very much larger amount of money in circulation than there had been the day previous? —A. It varies constantly, of course.

Q. Then in accordance with the variation that would lead to a change or a variation in the value? —A. According to what?

Q. According to the amount in circulation the value would be altered?—A. Not necessarily.

Q. Then if we doubled the amount, as referred to in the matter of Germany or Austria or any of the European countries, would not that affect its value?— A. Absolutely, because there they have fiat money, irredeemable.

Q. Then the quantity does affect the value?—A. The quantity affects the value in those circumstances, where there is no proper basis for the money, which is not real money but paper money.

Q. We have no gold basis to-day?—A. Yes, we have. We have a very excellent basis.

Q. A gold basis?—A. We are not on a gold basis strictly speaking at the moment.

Q. Well, on the basis on which we are, what determines its value?—A. What determines the value of money is the confidence in that currency by the people of the community passing it from hand to hand without question.

Q. Supposing we should arbitrarily lessen the amount of all kinds of money in circulation, would not that affect the prices of all kinds of commodities?—A. But we are not going to do anything of that kind, are we?

Q. But if I understand you aright you say the amount of money in circulation, taking all sections of the country, does fluctuate from time to time?— A. It fluctuates in strict accordance with the requirements of the trade of the country and for no other reason.

Q. And you would not say that that has a relation to the price of commodities?—A. It has only this relation, that if the prices of commodities rise, then more money is required.

Now, in contrast to these answers of Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, I beg leave to give the quantitative theory as stated very concisely by Professor Taussig in his Principles of Economics:

> Double the quantity of money, and, other things being equal, prices will be twice as high as before and the value of money one-half. Halve the quantity of money, and, other things being equal, prices will be one-half of what they were before and the value of money double.

I do not profess to be a profound economist, Mr. Speaker; I must go to the economists for their statements of these scientific facts; but if it is true that the quantity of money has a very decided effect on the value or purchasing power of any particular piece of money, then I say it is fundamental that someone should control the quantity of money. How is that regulated to-day? Well, with regard to gold, it depends very largely upon the production of the gold mines. If we discover a new gold mine, or invent some improved methods of production, gold is produced in larger quantities. That is when gold was the standard, the quantity was dependent upon natural resources and upon labour. In the case of paper money, the quantity is not dependent upon labour or upon natural resources, it is entirely dependent upon the printing press, as we saw in Europe during the war. This is under the control of the government. The banks may actually issue all bills over the one and two dollar denominations, but at least the maximum amount of issue is controlled by the government itself.

But what about this third kind of money? And this shows the importance of laying our foundations correctly. Is the third kind of money which I mentioned a few moments ago, that is, credit instruments, subject to the same law of money? Some of the economists say that it is. If that is so the results are very far-reaching. The issue of credit instruments is dependent upon the banks, and the banks alone. They have a practical monopoly of the control of credit. Then we have arrived at this position. Those who control the quantity of money in circulation, whether of gold, bank notes or credit, control the value of all other things, since all other things are measured in terms of money. Need I illustrate again that if we are using scales, and somebody is able to make the pound weight weigh either fourteen ounces or eighteen ounces instead of sixteen, he is able to control the value of all the groceries that pass over the scales at the other end. Mr. John A. Todd, an economist of recognized standing, makes this statement:

> One thing is clear as the result of our war experience: There is no use trying to control a country's currency system unless you can include control of its credit system. No matter how strictly controlled the currency may be, if the credit system is allowed to expand ad lib it may produce inflation just as certainly as the most unlimited expansion of the currency, as for example Germany in recent months.

That was in 1923.

Mr. FORKE: I hardly understand what my hon. friend means by his statement that the man who controls the pound controls all that passes over the scales. What effect will that control have on goods passing over the scales weighed by a different weight?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My illustration was this: If I have a scale, evenly balanced, sixteen ounces to the pound, I get sixteen ounces of say, sugar at the other end. If I should in some way dig a hole into the pound weight so that it now weighs in reality only fourteen ounces, I would get only fourteen ounces of sugar at the other end; if, on the other hand, I should plug that hole with lead so the pound weight now weighs eighteen ounces, I would get eighteen ounces of sugar at the other end. Is that clear?

Mr. FORKE: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: How would the man who bought the sugar and resold it to you be affected?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It would surely make considerable difference whether I was getting fourteen or eighteen ounces to the pound. In practice it means that the individual who has the dollar receives only 50 cents worth of goods, and that is precisely the difficulty to-day.

As to the evil influences of inflation and deflation, I cannot do better than quote from the evidence given by Mr. Irving Fisher before the Banking and Commerce committee two years ago. He said:

> There is always someone who gets rich as a consequence of inflation or deflation, and gets rich as a parasite, off of other people. It is not his fault. You cannot help being a profiteer, when prices are rising, if you happen to be in the position of a profit taker, because the profits just fall into your lap. Of course, you may be more extortionate than other people but you may do that when prices are falling. Your nature has not changed simply because prices are rising, but your opportunity has changed. And when prices are falling, in the same way the bondholder gets an advantage, but it is not his or her fault; he is simply reaping what has been sown in the unstable dollar.

And again:

> The evil then is one of social injustice, of picking the pockets of some people, to the benefit of other people. It is the same kind of economic evil as robbery is, and in appearing before a congressional committee, which is considering this same subject in Washington, and has a bill before it to stabilize the dollar in accordance with a particular plan that I have in my book, which your chairman has referred to, Professor King of the National Council of Economic International Research, who appeared in favour of that bill, said he had made a rough estimate of the actual amount of wealth which had been unjustly transferred through the change in the purchasing power of the dollar during the last few years, namely the war and the after-war period, and he believed that it was not less by any calculation that he could make, than forty billion dollars in the United States. Then he said, if there had been a forty billion dollar robbery, which would have amounted to the same thing, the people of the United States would have been considerably excited over it, but this picking of the pockets has been so slyly done that all that the person who has lost can see is that in a vague way he can identify the class that has got what he has lost, and he naturally accuses that class of having intended to steal it, whereas as a matter of fact it is an inanimate object, the dollar, or the price level, which has done the stealing.

Now I come to the very practical question: Who in Canada to-day regulates the quantity of money? And I use this term "money" in the sense that Sir Reginald McKenna uses it: All currency in circulation among the public and all bank deposits drawable by cheque. I submit that the banks to-day very largely control the quantity of money. They do so either directly through the giving or withholding of credit or in their control over government policy. We had a very interesting admission by Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor in regard to the policy of deflation. The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine), quoting from an article which appeared in the Monetary Times of January 7, 1921, under the caption "Leading Bankers forecasted Tightening of Credit," asked Sir Frederick:

Q. This is an excerpt: "With reference to current loans in Canada your directors have felt impelled for many months past in the bank's and in the country's best interests to follow the policy found essential in every other country, and keep within bounds our advances to merchants and manufacturers. This policy is in accordance with the views of the Dominion government and it has been followed more or less closely by all the Canadian banks. Naturally enough, exception has been taken in certain quarters to such restriction, but as a rule our customers have recognized the necessity of checking over-trading and further expansion in such times as we are now facing." That is an acknowledgment of the point that I had at issue, that the bankers had taken an active part in the deflation of credit, is it not? A. That statement I think was quoted from my annual address to the shareholders in December.

Q. That is right? A. And that is strictly in accordance with the facts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What year was that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This was in 1921. I quote further:

Q. What effects do you think deflation of credit would have upon manufacturers, for instance, or business generally? A. The deflation of credit that took place at that time was in the interests of the manufacturers as well as of the banks and the community at large.

I think it is very generally acknowledged, Mr. Speaker, that that policy was a serious mistake and we are still suffering from the effects of it in Canada. The manufacturers, according to Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, were quite willing that this should be done. He suggested that it was in the interests of the manufacturers, but I think that a good many of our manufacturers are coming to learn that it was decidedly not in their interests. Last year the Federation of British Industries, to which more or less our Canadian Manufacturers' Association corresponds, in its bulletin of the 30th October, 1923, considers, according to a summary which appears in the International Labour Review of January, 1924.

—that the deflationary policy in Great Britain and the consequent fall of prices during 1920-1922 were the cause of: dislocation of trade and severe losses to all holders of stocks and commodities, and to all who trade on borrowed money, that is, practically to the whole commercial and industrial community; a severe check to export trade; an increase in the burden of internal debt; and severe unemployment.

An alternate policy was suggested by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna at the June meeting of the shareholders of the Midland Bank. This was reported in the London Times of January 26, 1924, and

4 p.m.

I am glad to say was reproduced in Toronto Saturday Night, some months later. I quote:

To define monetary policy in few words I would say that it is the policy which concerns itself with regulating the quantity of money.

And again:

Gold coin is no longer minted, and additional paper currency is not issued except to meet the demands of the public. . . . . The amount of money in existence varies only with the action of the banks in increasing or diminishing deposits. . . . . Every bank loan and every bank purchase of securities creates a deposit. . .

And again:

People often talk about money going abroad, or of foreign money coming here, but as a fact, when gold is not in use, money is incapable of migration. . . . . No exchange transaction, no purchase or sale of securities, no import of foreign goods or export of our own can take money out of the country or bring it here. Bank loans and their repayment, bank purchases and sales, are in substance the sole causes of variation in the amount of our money.

And again:

When national output is below productive capacity, the policy should be to let money out; when production is at a maximum, the outflow of money should be checked, and if inflationary symptoms have appeared, money should be withdrawn.

And again:

Whatever name we give to this expansion of credit, it is indispensable to the proper functioning of our commercial system, and is imperatively needed when trade is deferred and unemployment general.

I should like to quote in this connection a paragraph from Mr. J. A. Hobson which shows very clearly the connection between inflation and the war debt:

The connection between the inflation which the governments and banks conspired to produce and the magnitude and ownership of the war debt is not obscure. The "money" which the governments got by printing notes, by borrowing from banks, or by inciting banks to give credit to customers in order to increase subscriptions to war loans (all pure inflation), they spent in buying goods and services. Thus prices and profits mounted up the faster, because this easy way of getting money made governments more careless in the rates they paid for what they bought. The immense and rapid profits due to the expanding prices, with a lag of wages and a virtual elimination of competition—the recipients invested in war loans, the only authorized and available investment.

I should like particularly to direct the attention of both the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) to a very illuminating article on Bank Credit and Unemployment published in the International Labour Review for January 1924. That publication is issued by the International Labour Office which is connected with the League of Nations. It points out:

There is a growing school of economists whose attention is mainly directed toward the possibility of stabilizing industrial activity by judicious regulation of the bank credits upon which industry is largely dependent.

....The summarized results of all the above evidence would appear to be that banking policy should be directed toward regulating credit, not as before the war, in accordance with the amount of cash reserves held, but rather in accordance with the requirements of industry as determined by the employment index and the movement of prices.

I submit that our government is still proceeding on the theories that were prevalent and were considered to be sound before the war but that the war has made an entire change in the whole financial system and that it is high time that we gave a little more attention to the far reaching effects of that change. I urge that the large measure of control of currency and credit, by private corporations now existing must not continue. It is not safe to leave such wide powers in private—and, shall I say without offence—irresponsible hands, that is in the hands of those without responsibility to the people at large.

May I in a few words review the existing privileges of Canadian banks? In the first place they control and use the peoples' savings, taking them at three per cent and giving them out at eight or ten. Secondly, they have what I might call the franchise of issuing currency, which enables them to double their capital. Thirdly, they have virtually a control of credit—they can give or withhold and thus they can make or unmake any business in this country. Revelations of what went on in connection with the Home Bank have been a severe shock to the public at large, yet I think careful study will show that a great many of the practices prevalent in connection with the operation of the Home Bank, and which so shocked the public, are common with many of our banks. We are constantly meeting such instances as this—I quote from a despatch from New York dated July 23 last:

[Mr. Woodsworth]

Steps to end what local newspapers describe as the "binder twine trust" were taken to-day by Attorney General Stone at Washington, when action was begun to dissolve the Sisal Sales Corporation as a trust, in violation of the anti-trust laws. Among the defendants named in the suit besides the corporation was the Royal Bank of Canada.

This is not an isolated example by any means. These banks are engaged in business not only in Canada but in the United States and other parts of the world, and they are able to manipulate the savings of the people to their own ends. Further than that, the banks have great power, as we have pointed out on other occasions, through their interlocking directorates, as a result of which the directors of a bank are interested in a great many of the industrial and commercial enterprises of the whole country. But their really great power comes, not through the interlocking directorates, not through the issuance of currency, but essentially through their control of credit which gives the banks the power to inflate or deflate. Through this power they derive profits in both ways. The operation may be compared to the working of a pawnbroking establishment. You bring your goods to the pawnbroker, and he may charge a very exorbitant interest on the loan. If you fail to pay his charges he retains the goods which have been pledged. Thus he has either the exorbitant charge or he has the goods. The same thing is true with regard to banks, as a good many of our western farmers are beginning to find out.

There is one other power which the banks have in Canada, and that is that they very largely do the government financing. It is not my purpose to go into this matter at this stage, but we all recognize that these great flotations are very largely made through the banks, the government fearing for some reason or another to undertake to finance direct. I should like to quote a paragraph or so from a little pamphlet which came into my hands not long ago. It is written by Mr. H. C. Cutting who states the situation with regard to credit very concisely. He says:

Now then, since our troubles are caused by the fluctuation in the value of the dollar, it stands to reason that if our system of credit issue could be changed so that the volume of available credit would be controlled by the demands of business, instead of by a board or the personal interests of the bankers, there would then be no fluctuation in the value of the dollar and the uncertainties, worries and losses that now harrass the business world would be at an end.

The report of the comptroller of the currency of the United States shows that 99 per cent of our entire medium of exchange is bank credit. It is practically our only money. It is issued by the banker through making a loan. We speak of borrowing money at the bank, but, in reality, we do not borrow money—we borrow the bank's credit, or, rather, we exchange our private and less known credit for the bank's better known credit.

If the banker grants the request for a loan, he gives the borrower credit for a deposit, discounts a note for him, or takes an acceptance, which are but different ways of doing the same thing. In every case it is simply an exchange of bank credit for private credit. To illustrate: If the banker sees fit to make the loan, he takes the note and security of the borrower, gives him credit for a deposit in his pass-book and on the books of the bank. The borrower uses this credit as a medium of exchange by means of a cheque. It can be turned into what we call money by cashing a cheque—but our paper money is only another form of bank credit, so that about 99 per cent of our medium of exchange is created and controlled by bank loans. The bank therefore has assumed the functions of the mint. It issues our money.

That is the essential point. We have on our statute books old laws that make coining one of the worst crimes imaginable and the penalties are very severe, and yet, to all intents and purposes, the banks to-day are doing coining—they have taken out of the hands of the government the power of issuing the great part of our money.

We have seen here in Canada, perhaps more than in most countries, the steady concentration of capital in the hands of a few. We have our bankers association, and in recent years we have had bank merger after bank merger. Why should not the government democratically control this money situation rather than allow a group of a dozen men who are not responsible to the people to do so? We have now government supervision and inspection. We have the advocacy of government guarantee of deposits. Here I quote a few sentences from the Vancouver Sun:

This bank consolidation should be followed by a government announcement that in future the security of all bank deposits will be government guaranteed, just as note circulation is to-day guaranteed. When a Canadian bank goes out of business, its note circulation starts to carry 6 per cent interest until it is fully paid. When that same bank goes out of business, the depositor starts to figure—not whether he will get 6 per cent on his deposits, but whether he will get 6 per cent of his deposits.

From all over this country demands are coming that the government should go much further than it has in the past. Why not take the next step and effectively control our currency and credit? Money itself is of the nature of a public utility. In the old days our roads were more or less controlled by private individuals. Some of us remember in childhood days passing along a road and having to stop every little while at a toll gate to pay for our use of that road. Those who constructed the roads took toll, and I presume they charged all that the traffic would bear. Now our roads are managed by the people, and they are given to the people at the cost of service. Why not the same advance in the case of money? Here in parliament, we may pass legislation, but so long as there is economic control outside these halls our legislation will be largely nullified. Mr. Lloyd George, with whose opinions I am afraid I do not very frequently agree, made a very significant statement several months ago at the time of the issuance of the Dawes report. He said:

Agreement would never have been reached without the brusque and brutal intervention of international bankers. They swept statesmen, politicians, jurists and journalists all on one side, and issued their orders with the imperiousness of absolute monarchs who knew that there was no appeal from their ruthless decrees. This settlement is the joint ukase of king dollar and king sterling.

Thus we face the larger question as to whether or not parliament is to be sovereign, as to whether or not the people are to be sovereign, or whether we have not had our liberties filched from us without most of us having been aware of what has taken place. Many advocate the breaking of monopoly. My thought is not that we should attempt to break this monopoly that we have to-day, this money monopoly, but rather that in some way the people themselves should assume the direction or control of the monopoly, and use it not in the interests of a few but administer it in the interests of the whole of the people of Canada.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, former Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain, has said that:

Those who control credit direct the policy of governments and hold in the hollow of their hand the destiny of the nation.

If anything were necessary to prove the truth of the above assertion, it is supplied by the effects of the drastic deflation of the currency which in the fall of 1920 was carried out concurrently in Great Britain, the United States, and Canada. The almost immediate effects were a general stagnation of business and unemployment that totalled 2,000,000 people in the British Isles and nearly 6,000,000 in the United States. In Canada it has resulted in the ruin of tens of thousands of farmers, business men, and manufacturers; it has been responsible for the exodus of hundreds of thousands of our best working people to another country; and it has set the clock of our country's progress back for a generation.

The masses are being told that present economic conditions are a result of the war. I often think that in their private moments of devotion members of an exploiting class must give thanks to heaven that there was a great war since they find in it such a convenient means of passing responsibility from their own shoulders. It cannot be denied that the period during which the greatest inflation of the currency occurred was the two years immediately following the war. In September, 1920, the current bank loans in Canada reached the amount of $1,417,520,756 and in October, 1920, the Bank note circulation touched the highest point recorded in the history of Canada, being $249,165,000. There was a gradual incline in the current loans and the note circulation from November, 1918 the month of the armistice, until the peak of September and October 1920. This period of inflation subsequent to the armistice was responsible for a gigantic agricultural development in western Canada as is shown by the fact that the acreage under cultivation in the prairie provinces in 1918 was 30,398,000 acres, but had increased to 38,614,000 in 1921, the greatest agricultural expansion that had ever taken place in Canada in a similar period of time. The farmers were appealed to by provincial and Dominion governments, by banking, manufacturing and commercial men to increase production to the utmost limit, the ostensible object being to pay off the war debt. Concurrently a great commercial and industrial expansion took place in eastern Canada such as this country had not previously known. There was no unemployment; manufacturers, business men, and farmers were alike prosperous. Prices were high and measured in terms of wages, of farm or factory products, the payment of our war debt offered no serious obstacle to continued prosperity.

Then in the fall of 1920, came the deflation that, according to many economists, has caused more misery and suffering and probably more actual deaths than the great war. It is contended by some of the disciples of the orthodox system that it was the deflation of business that caused the deflation of the currency, but this is not taken seriously by any economists of note.

In the three months' period from October, 1920, to January, 1921, the bank notes in circulation were reduced by $43,000,000, and by June 30, 1921, by a further $10,000,000. When it is considered that a great deal of extra money is needed to handle the crop during this period, the deflation is very much greater than is indicated by these figures. In the ordinary course of events the banks would have issued $20,000,000 extra paper as permitted by law to handle the crop, in addition to using up more of their own reserve currency. It is, therefore, reasonable to suppose that the actual deflation was in reality not less than $75,000,000. Due to the elasticity of our credit system, the banks usually show loans to the extent of three or four times the total amount of money in existence. The skrinkage in the circulation medium of $75,000,000, would, therefore, mean the curtailing of loans to an extent probably several times $75,000,000. There was a steady shrinking of the bank note circulation from October 1920 until we reach the low water mark of January 1923. The net withdrawal from October, 1920 being $97,000,000, or two-thirds of the total bank note circulation.

I have here a report of the Bureau of Statistics which shows the estimated wealth of Canada at the close of the year of 1920 and also for 1921.

These figures would indicate that nearly $300,000,000 of our national wealth disappeared during this period. It does not mean a disappearance of actual goods, but a lowering of value based on money value. What really happened was that by the simple method of deflation the value of money was increased and the holder of government bonds, farm mortgages or businessmen's notes was in a position to compel the delivery of more goods or services for the same amount of money. The net result was a drastic increase of all debts both public and private to the benefit of an interest-earning class.

In reality the effect constituted a capital levy on the manufacturers, business men and farmers, and a direct transference of wealth from the active to the inactive portions of the population.

The same report shows the national income of Canada in 1920 to be $3,682,000,000, but only $2,728,000,000 for 1921, a lowering of the national income of nearly one billion dollars in the short period of one year.

Dividing our population up into families of five, these figures show a direct cut in the annual income per family of $525. A further direct result of the financial policy referred to. Some of these facts are so obvious as to be beyond the necessity of argument.

It would appear that the United States financiers realizing that the deflation had been too drastic adopted a measure of inflation in 1922 which was reflected in a period of considerable industrial activity and the elimination of unemployment.

France and Belgium are two countries which refused to deflate in 1920 in conjunction with Great Britain and the United States. The currency of these countries is still on a depreciated basis, which means that debts contracted during the inflation period still bear the same relation to wages and value of products as when they were contracted. The common opinion that a currency below par value is indicative of national weakness does not necessarily follow. It simply means that money is of low value and the holder of money securities is in a position to demand less in goods and services than he would be if the currency were contracted to bring it to a par value. In fact, the low value of money means a lessening of the burden of taxation on industry and labour. I wish to quote a press despatch which appeared in a western paper some few weeks ago, in which the former Finance minister (Sir Henry Drayton) who had just returned from France was quoted as saying that the people of France were remarkably prosperous. There was no unemployment and the people, he said, seemed to be saving money. I think he said that France had absorbed about 1,500,000 immigrants since the war and had jobs for all of them, and that she was still absorbing immigrants at the rate of 5,000 per week. Of course, the ex-Minister of Finance attributes this to protection, but I do not think he expects us all to take him very seriously. I think he and, indeed, any other hon. gentleman will admit that France to-day would not be in that prosperous condition had she deflated, in conjunction with Great Britain, the United States and Canada in the fall of 1920. The recovery of France after the close of the war of 1870 and the facility with which she paid off the enormous burden laid upon her by Germany, belied the predictions of the economists of that day, who believed she was destined to become a province of Germany. The financial policy of France to-day is very similar to what it was subsequently to 1870. All countries inflate their currency during the war period, and France was no exception to this rule during the war of 1870; but instead of drastic deflation immediately at the close of that war, through the action of the French government, there was an inflation, just shortly after the close of the war, to the amount of about 250,000,000 paper francs. This had the effect of stimulating business, but unhealthy speculation was prevented by heavy taxation. When deflation came in France, it came very gradually, being spread over a long period of years, and France emerged from that dark and difficult period a sound and safe nation, industrially, commercially and financially. I think there is something that we might learn from this to-day.

It is useless to blame our individual banking institutions. The unit bank can no more help itself than a single pulley can help revolving with the whole machine. The system itself is wrong, and the power that is to-day vested in the hands of about seven men in the city of Montreal, should be vested in the people of Canada.

It will always be necessary to inflate and deflate currency under certain conditions, but our complaint is that what was done drastically in the course of a few months in the fall of 1920, should have been spread over a period of five or six years; or as one economist expressed it, our financiers used the expedient of stopping the express train by the opening of a switch rather than by the application of the air-brakes; or as a banking authority puts it, there was no necessity for throwing us out of a ten storey window when we could have been led down a fire escape. What the financial interests did to the nations in 1920, no government with full responsibility for the control of financial policy on its shoulders would have dared to do. It seems to me just as logical, as sensible, as reasonable, that we should hand over the control of the policy of national defence, of fleets and armies, to private corporations, as to leave them with power to create at will periods of unhealthy speculation on the one hand and depression with business insolvency, unemployment, and the lowest depths of poverty, misery and suffering, on the other.

One of the greatest obstacles in the way of monetary reform is the fear of a system, the ramifications of which touch every man, woman and child in the nation. The business man or politician who dares to lay unholy hands on the hitherto inviolable Ark of the Covenant called finance, is considered extremely venturesome. In this connection, I should like to quote the late President Wilson, who said:

> Some of the biggest men in the United States, in the field of commerce and manufacture, are afraid of somebody, are afraid of something. They know there is a power somewhere so organised, so subtle, so watchful, so interlocked, so complete, so pervasive, that they had better not speak above their breath when they speak in condemnation of it.

Henry George said:

> There is danger in radical change, but far greater danger in blind conservatism.

We may evade the demands of common sense to-day, but that public control of credit will eventually come is just as predictable as sunrise and sunset. The government of the day may evade the responsibility of action and shift the burden on to another generation; but, to do so, is to face the dangers of national bankruptcy and is an admission to posterity that this generation is bankrupt in imagination, vision and statesmanship.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the resolution of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), as it appears on the order paper, reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it is not in the interests of the country at large that the privilege of issuing currency and of controlling financial credit should be granted to private corporations.

I have listened very carefully to the speech of my hon. friend and also to that of the hon. member (Mr. Campbell), who seconded the resolution, and I cannot understand that my hon. friend's speech has very much to do with the resolution as it appears on the order paper. He has gone carefully into the merits of credit and the value of currency. He has repeated a speech that, I think, we have heard before in this House, that if there was a more plentiful supply of money, the products of labour, whether they be in cereals or in manufactured goods, would consequently advance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister point out where I urged a more abundant supply of money? I am not aware of having done so.

Mr. ROBB: That was the inference I gathered from my hon. friend's speech. I am going to read that speech over carefully, because I observe that he must have prepared it with some care. I must be dense, because I really cannot understand anything in the speech of my hon. friend unless it is that he wants Canada to adopt the methods which were tried out in Russia and which were a failure. My hon. friend seemed to go out of his way to bring in as a witness Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, and he rather tried—at least I gathered that opinion—to create in this House the impression that at least my hon. friend believed that Sir Frederick knew very little about the banking system.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend concurs by saying, "hear, hear." Having the responsibility, temporarily, of providing at certain seasons of the year for the money to move the crops of the northwest, I am bound to say that I do not always accept the advice of Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor upon questions of finance. I am inclined to think, however, that the man who grows the wheat in western Canada and wants real money for it, would prefer that I should take the advice of Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor to that of my hon. friend.

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. IRVINE: What does the minister mean by "real money?"

Mr. ROBB: I mean money that will be worth something in any part of the world.

My hon. friend who seconded the resolution made a reference to bank mergers and to the control of banks by a group of seven men in Montreal. If there is one thing more than another that will lead to bank mergers—and we do not want any more bank mergers in Canada—it is this continual attack upon our banking system in this parliament. It makes it very hard sledding for the small bank, it creates distrust in the mind of the depositor, and consequently it renders it difficult for the smaller banks to compete with the larger institutions. There is no such thing as the control of the money situation in Canada by any group of seven men in Montreal; the banking system of Canada is controlled by two hundred and thirty-five men in this parliament. At the close of the ten-year period the Bank Act was revised; it was gone over last year; and while every man's opinions did not prevail the views of the majority did. And that is the real basis of sound government.

Mr. IRVINE: If the banks have good money why should it unsettle them to have subjects of this kind discussed in the House?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the minister a question at the same time? Does the minister suggest that this parliament has any control over the issuance of credit by the banks?

Mr. ROBB: I say that this parliament gives the banks their charter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That was not the question.

Mr. ROBB: The banks can exercise only such rights as are given them by the two hundred and thirty-five representatives of the people who constitute this House. Now, I think that the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) and even the resolution carry an implication that is a bit misleading. As I understand it, the resolution suggests two things. One is that the Dominion government has not now the privilege of issuing currency. I submit that this is hardly correct, for at the present moment there is $227,000,000 worth of Dominion notes outstanding. Of this amount aproximately $60,000,000 is in circulation unsupported by gold or securities; and for every dollar of this issue the government has at some time or other been paid the equivalent in cash by the banks. In other words, it might be said that the government has a loan of $60,000,000 free of interest and protected only by $12,500,000 in gold.

In regard to the banks, there was outstanding on December 31, approximately $165,000,000 in notes. As the aggregate capital of the banks is $122,000,000, this leaves, therefore, $43,000,000 over and above the capital of the banks. The penalties for excess issue above the paid-up capital may be enumerated as follows: 1. That the bank has to keep cash reserves on which no interest is earned, so that it may redeem its notes when presented by other banks for redemption. 2. That an individual bank is penalized if it issues more notes than its capital merits.

Mr. SPENCER: Was that the case with the Home Bank? Was that institution penalized when it did this?

Mr. ROBB: We may go into that question later on. At present I am discussing the general situation as it is. The third penalty is this: That there is a tax of 1 per cent paid to the government on the maximum of its monthly note issue. Giving the banks this privilege of issuing notes has meant a profit to the Canadian people of $15,857,631.32 between the year 1914 and February 20, 1925. The greatest profit in any one year was in 1921, when it was $3,644,056.72. But that is not all. The bank also pays income tax on its income. Previous to 1922 the amount paid in circulation tax was deducted from the amount of its income tax. In 1922 the Income Tax Act was amended so as to take away this privilege.

The banks, under section 64 of the Bank Act, are required to deposit with the minister 5 per cent of the average amount of their notes in circulation to form a circulation redemption fund. This fund bears interest at 3 per cent. Owing to the fact that the population is spread over a territory three thousand miles in length, different conditions may exist in the different provinces simultaneously. To provide for the financing of industries in each of these provinces, Canadian financiers have developed a branch bank system, and it is in connection with this system that the greatest benefit in regard to note circulation arises. Reference has been made by an hon. gentleman to Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, but I notice that hon. gentlemen were careful not to quote Sir Edmund Walker who appeared before the Banking and Commerce committee in 1923. Sir Edmund stated at that time that the right to issue notes permitted the banks to open many offices which could not possibly be kept open otherwise, partly because of the till money and partly because of the profit on note issue. It will therefore be seen that the right granted to the banks is of great practical value to the people of Canada, inasmuch as it enables these institutions to open branches where they are required in order to assist in carrying on the affairs of the country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the privilege of issuing notes is so profitable as to enable Sir Edmund Walker to declare that branch banks can be opened up in consequence, would not the same thing be true if the government controlled the banks?

Mr. ROBB: As to the government controlling all banks, my hon. friends have not advocated that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am not referring to that just now.

Mr. ROBB: Let me answer my hon. friend this way. Suppose the Dominion government should have the exclusive right of issuing currency, this would mean that approximately $300,000,000 worth of currency would be put into circulation. It would to a great extent mean that much of the circulation would be unsupported by gold backing, for practically all of the gold in the possession of the Minister of Finance at the present time to protect the outstanding issue has been received from the banks in exchange for Dominion notes and in reality belongs to the banks. In some countries, of course, the right to issue notes is a monopoly given to one bank.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does the minister say that there is gold behind the bank note circulation to-day?

Mr. ROBB: I have already stated the amount of gold in reserve at the present time, and there are many bankers in Canada who think that we should work upon a gold basis. The fact remains, however, that the Canadian dollar to-day is worth one hundred cents on any market in the world.

Mr. LEWIS: Would not the same be true if currency were issued by the government?

Mr. ROBB: If I can follow correctly the speech of the hon. member who moved the resolution (Mr. Woodsworth) and the speech of the gentleman who seconded it (Mr. Campbell), they want us to go back and adopt such a system as was tried in Germany, where it failed, as it failed in Austria and in Soviet Russia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope the minister will accept my word for it that I had nothing of the kind in view. I did not say such a thing, nor can it be reasonably inferred from my remarks.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If the minister was not listening when I was speaking, he will find on reference to my speech in Hansard to-morrow that the same is true of the very thing I have been complaining of, the inflation in the past, inflation that led to a lot of unhealthy speculation in this country, which speculation was assisted by the opening of all these branch banks.

Mr. ROBB: Well, it ill-becomes my hon. friend to find fault with the opening of branch banks, because I have in mind a gentleman who sits right near the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) who attacked the banking system prevailing in western Canada, and yet he came to me and pleaded that I should request the directorate of one of our chartered banks not to close a branch bank in his constituency.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the minister suggest that it is necessary to have six branch banks in a town of six or seven thousand people? Is it any more necessary than to have six post offices or six railways stations?

Mr. ROBB: No, I quite agree with my hon. friend, that the branch bank system may have been overdone, I will go that far with him; but I would remind him that we have revised our banking system, we discussed it again last session, and I submit that the banking system of Canada to-day is meeting pretty well the requirements of the people. That banking system has prevailed for a hundred years, and I think we would be wise to let well enough alone. I have said enough to indicate to my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) that I am not in sympathy with his resolution. I am not sure whether he intends to press it to a conclusion, but I would ask him that, having presented his views to the House—and possibly other hon. members will also present their views—the resolution might be withdrawn.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister has dealt with the issue of currency and bank notes by the banks, which amount to about four per cent of the money used in Canada. Has he anything to say about the ninety-six per cent which is put into operation through checking?

Mr. ROBB: The checking system is a very great convenience to the business people of this country, and it is the recognized system of doing business throughout the world wherever the national currency is on as sound a basis as the currency of Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: Has the government control of that now?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to repeat the question asked by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine): Has the government control of the checking system of Canada, or is it in the hands of the chartered banks?

Mr. ROBB: If I presented a cheque to a bank without any funds, I do not think the government would be called upon to go in and make good the loss.

Mr. SPENCER: That does not answer the question.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have seen anything more tragic and pitiable since I have been a member of this House than the empty benches opposite during the course of this vitally important discussion. Nor have I heard anything which revealed such an utter inability to understand the point of view of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) as the speech of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROBB: That is all right; it does not hurt me.

Mr. GOOD: It was not meant to be offensive at all; I have a very high regard for the hon. minister personally. Now, Mr. Speaker, although the supporters and the members of the government apparently know nothing and care less about this matter—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GOOD: Well, Mr. Speaker, if they cared they would have been here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GOOD: Although this indifference has been only too abundantly indicated and is very patent to everyone of us here, I maintain that there is no public question of greater importance to the masses of this and other countries.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit that.

Mr. GOOD: I am told by one of my friends on this side that because the people in the country do not understand this question and have never made any demands in respect to it, because no political party has a plank in its platform dealing with the matter, therefore we should be silent in this House with regard to it. But I will not be silent so long as I believe that this is a vitally important matter; I shall do my best to arouse public interest in it. That is my answer to my hon. friend on this side.

Although the Acting Minister of Finance may object to the principle of the resolution, and although he may call upon his followers to vote it down, yet he has admitted, his government has admitted, and nearly every government in every civilized country has admitted, the principle of this resolution,—but they are very far from attempting to carry it out effectively. Now, it is our purpose to show, first that the principle of public control over our financial system is absolutely sound, and also that there is a crying need for the further and more effective application of the principle than has generally been admitted. The application of this principle of public, democratic control over finance has been shown in many countries through the development of co-operative banks and their various federations. I have mentioned this matter on previous occasions, and I do not wish to delay the House now by going into details again, but anyone who cares to look up the literature on the subject of co-operative banking will realize that through that particular method the democracies of the world, the people who need to use credit and currency have asserted their right of control. Not only so, but every government—and the Acting Minister of Finance has admitted this—exercises a certain amount of authority over all banks and financial institutions. We have it perhaps carried to a much further extent in some other countries than in Canada: witness the creation of the federal reserve system in the United States, of the Commonwealth Bank in Australia, and of other similar institutions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the need is to make effective the public control that is to-day implied but so lamely and inadequately exercised. I think the hon. member who moved the resolution (Mr. Woodsworth) has presented the case in outline in a most admirable way and has covered the whole field. I propose therefore merely to refer as briefly as I can to some particular aspects of the case which he presented.

Hon. members will recall the situation that developed in 1920, 1921 and 1922 with respect to the deflation, throughout Canada and the United States. This deflation affected agriculture in particular, and the government of the United States was much more prompt in instituting an inquiry than the government and parliament of Canada. And I would like to emphasize the promptness and effectiveness of the movement that was begun by the United States in the early part of 1921. There was then instituted a joint committee of agricultural inquiry which presented its report in four volumes. I have here one—the smallest of the four—on Credit which I shall refer to again. In addition to that they published in detail the evidence taken at a number of hearings. I have under my hand the hearing before this joint committee of agricultural inquiry held at Washington between August 2 and August 11, 1921, dealing specifically with the relation between the policy of the federal reserve system or board in the United States and the terrible industrial condition of the country that developed in those years. I should like to refer briefly to one or two passages from addresses delivered by a gentleman who appeared before our Banking and Commerce committee last year, and who had been for some years previously the Comptroller of Currency in the United States. I refer to the Hon. John S. Williams, who was ex-officio a member of the Federal Reserve Board and who took a very prominent part in objecting publicly and privately to the financial policy which, he maintained, was an ill-advised one and which prevailed in the latter part of 1920 and 1921. I want to get right down to facts, because I know there is a disposition on the part of many hon. members to say, "Oh, this is all a discussion of mere academic theories." The practical man—at least, the man who prides himself on being practical—is inclined to scoff at the stuff that he calls theory, and so on. I should like to suggest in passing that after all the most practical man is the man who sees farthest. Unfortunately we often hold, in practice if not in theory, that the practical man is the man who sees nothing but what is directly in front of his eyes: he can see neither to one side nor to the other, neither backward nor forward; all that comes within his observation is what is immediately before his eyes, in place or time. But the really practical man is the man with vision, who knows history, who knows what is going on in the world and who thereby can interpret what has been passing and can, as it were, project himself into the future. After all, that is the genius, I take it, of prophecy; and there is an element of prediction about it.

Coming to the passages I referred to a moment ago, I will read from one of Mr. Williams' addresses given in the United States and in which he made reference to the federal reserve system in that country. I may say again that the federal reserve banks of the United States were created for a definite purpose and the Federal Reserve Board was put in charge of those banks in order that the government or the people of the United States might exercise a greater measure of control over their financial policy than had been exercised previously. I am free to admit that that control may not have been exercised as it should have been, but in any event, in the very creation of a Federal Reserve Board there was an admission of a need for public control. There was indeed, a recognition of the very principle that we are debating to-day and to which the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) says he objects. I hope he will withdraw from that very untenable position before it is too late. I read, then as follows:

5 p.m.

A primary purpose of the reserve system is to provide for the ebb, flow, and distribution of the country's supply of money to meet the legitimate needs of the people and of commerce. Generally, that purpose has been fulfilled admirably. Sometimes it has been impeded or prevented and troubles have ensued in consequence. For instance, when abnormally high rates for money for speculative or other purposes have been made and maintained in New York, the natural result has been to draw money from sections where it was needed for productive and constructive work to where it could earn extraordinary profits from the necessities of speculators and promoters.

Let me pause here, Mr. Speaker, to direct the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance to what has been revealed in connection with the Home Bank. Was money not diverted from productive enterprise, the saving of poor people all through this country, and devoted to speculative ventures and the activities of promoters? This is not theory; this is fact.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): May I ask the hon. member this question: Is it not the case that if we had a federal reserve system in this country and the Home Bank had to go to the federal reserve bank for currency, as all member banks have to do in the United States, would the things that occurred in connection with the Home Bank not have been discovered by that system?

Mr. GOOD: I think it would depend not so much upon the mere existence of a federal reserve system as upon the existence of an efficient system of inspection. That, of course, is or ought to be very closely linked up in practice with a federal reserve system.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): With my hon. friend's permission, may I ask this: Under a federal reserve system by which control would be exercised over member banks—and the Home Bank would be a member bank—would not the misconduct, if it was misconduct, have been discovered early in the history of the bank?

Mr. GOOD: The evidence that was given before the Banking committee last year proved that no system of that sort could be safely operated without a very effective system of inspection connected therewith. But the discovery of a rotten condition would depend more on adequate inspection than upon the mere existence of a federal reserve system.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend allow me, then, to ask another question following that of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean)? The hon. member is a student of this financial situation: If the theory advanced by the hon. member for South York is correct, what is the explanation for the large number of bank failures in the United States in the last two years?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Were they member banks?

Mr. GOOD: Bank failures in the United States have been for the most part among banks not linked up with the federal reserve system, and they have been largely owing to what I think is now admitted to be a mistaken policy on the part of the Federal Reserve Board, However, the answer to the question would lead me very far afield, and perhaps it might be left over for another occasion; I propose to go into some other aspects of this matter when my own resolution comes up. Continuing, then, I read as follows from the remarks of Mr. Williams:

The farmer, merchant or manufacturer in the west and south, and also elsewhere, found money scarce at the six per cent, seven per cent, and eight per cent rates he could afford to pay, because New York was offering from ten per cent to thirty per cent. This tends to defeat the wise and beneficent purpose of the system.

And will hon. members note the following:

I used my official powers to investigate this subject as thoroughly as possible and made some astounding discoveries. The daily rates for call money—meaning money loaned on stock or bond collateral, to be called at will, are fixed daily by from five to eight members of the New York stock exchange, men also actively concerned in the purchase and sale of stocks, meeting informally at the exchange or consulting over telephones. They are responsible to nobody, under no direction. Their casual, hasty decisions not only affect the prices of money and stocks there—frequently meaning disaster or gain to hundreds of individuals and interests—but tend strongly to determine the movement and prices of money and incidentally, to a greater or less extent, of wheat and other commodities—for more than a hundred million people.

Let hon. members weigh that statement very carefully: that the conversations, if we like to use that term, of a few men connected with the financial centre of New York, meeting together in this informal way, may affect the lives, and destinies, and prosperity of millions of people. This book is full of evidence of a very specific character along the same line, evidence which I have not time to submit to the House on the present occasion. But let me again point out its relevance to the matter under consideration. In New York, according to the allegations made, certain people in financial circles were using the system that was devised for the protection of the people of the United States for their own personal and financial aggrandizement. But let us, however distinguish in our minds between a good system and the abuse of that system. I read again from the speech of Mr. Williams:

I am giving this outline of inside events to support my contention that Congress should take action to provide against negligence, lack of ability, or stubborn disregard of the needs and rights of the public by the board or any future board. As an illustration I knew that certain New York banks were borrowing from the Federal Reserve bank, which means from the people of the United States, millions of dollars, at 5 per cent to 6 per cent, and lending it at from 10 per cent to 50 per cent, and sometimes higher still. In fact, among others, I gave them one instance, an extreme case, where a certain large bank last summer borrowed money from its reserve bank at about 6 per cent per annum, and at about the same time loaned a customer, at the head of a large manufacturing enterprise, $1,000,000, well secured by collateral, of which loan about $500,000 was passed on to correspondent banks (without liability to the selling bank) at about 12 per cent per annum, and $500,000 of the loan retained on a basis of interest and commission which yielded the lending bank about 200 per cent per annum, on its net outlay, the whole loan being paid in full in six months. When that 200 per cent transaction was referred to in a meeting of the reserve board, one member, to my amazement, was disposed to condone or defend it on the ground, as he expressed it, that "the banks all charge such rates, more or less." I resented his imputation upon the banks of the country, and I am happy to say that his opinion cannot be sustained, for the vast majority of our banks, of which I am informed, conduct their business on a very different plane, and would not be guilty of exacting such extortionate rate of interest as I have here referred to, which might well bring the blush of shame to Shylock's cheeks.

Here is another quotation from the report of Mr. Williams, as comptroller of currency, to Congress; as set forth in his speech:

Cases from time to time come to light where important banks to which are entrusted milllions of dollars of the funds of depositors are found lending the funds of the bank in large sums to practically all their senior and junior officers—president, vice-presidents, cashier, and assistant cashiers—and while they are extending these large and excessive accommodation to their own officers, directly and indirectly, largely for speculative ventures, the banks are themselves borrowing heavily from the Federal Reserve bank of their district.

From another address which is here given as part of the evidence before this Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry I quote the following:

Member banks should be given to understand that the board disapproves—

This is a quotation from a letter which he had written, I think to the Federal Reserve Board——and will not countenance the excessive rates which have been in vogue in New York city and which are higher than the rates charged by banks in any other country in the world. Such rates, in my opinion, have been very damaging to the commercial and financial interests of the country, and I submit that it would be well for the board to establish regulations to prevent the reserve banks from lending money to member banks at 6 per cent to be passed on to customers at extortionate rates. The effect of such a regulation, I believe, would be most helpful and salutary.

The records of this office show numerous instances of banks which have gotten large sums of money from the reserve banks to be loaned in Wall street for the purpose of profiting by the difference in interest rates.

Here we have gambling of a most virulent character.

Mr. FORKE: Not as bad as gambling on race courses, surely?

Mr. GOOD: Much worse. I may say, in passing, that I have never contended that gambling on race courses is the worst kind of gambling. I should like to make that very plain. Now I continue:

The official reports also show that in addition to the money which the New York banks were lending on call in New York for account of their correspondents and customers, the national banks of New York city this time last year had on deposit to the credit of their correspondent banks in all parts of the country approximately $900,000,000 more, while the total sum which the New York national banks were lending, directly and indirectly, to all other banks throughout the country was considerably less than one-fourth of that sum.

The important thing is to find and apply proper remedies.

May I repeat that statement here. I think the principle is beyond question: The important thing is to find and apply proper remedies. To continue the quotation:

Perhaps there has never been a time when the business and industrial interests of the country were more deeply dependent upon a sound, wise, and courageous administration of our banking and financial system than at the present moment.

Perhaps I should not take up the time of the House too much, but there is one other extract I should like to read, from an address delivered by Mr. Williams before the Augusta

Board of Commerce and Georgia Press Association at Augusta, Georgia, July 14, 1921:

Yet while this orgy of usury and speculation was raging in New York many of you here had the experience of going to your local banks for money with which to pick or hold your cotton or to carry your paper through the dull season, and of being told of the difficulty of getting money through the reserve bank, and of the limitation being put on the small borrowers. Seeing these things as I do, nobody on earth can convince me that there is not something wrong, a perversion of purpose somewhere. I do not mean to suggest that the New York banks, for instance, were handed out money without security. I do mean that they could and should have been admonished and restrained by the federal reserve administrators precisely as the village man or the country farmer, even with ample assets, is advised and restrained by village and small-town bankers when showing a disposition to be too speculative or extravagant. These things, as all of you know, occur every day.

I heard much talk while I was a member of the Federal Reserve Board about forcing the farmer to sell his wheat, or the cotton planter his cotton, or the cattle raiser his live stock, the wholesaler or retailer their stocks of goods, but I must tell you frankly that I do not recall a single occasion during the past year or two of deflation when the board ever discussed seriously the importance or desirability of requiring the big banks in New York city, some of which were lending millions of dollars to their own executive officials on highly speculative securities and to big syndicates in which these officials were actively interested and which those banks had been carrying for months and sometimes for years, to liquidate a portion of these loans, in order that by so doing those banks might have more money to supply the legitimate use of trade and commerce.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I quote these extracts in order to show hon. members of this House if I can, that this is a matter which touches very vitally and closely the interests of every business man and producer in this country. If we had a little more omniscience than we have, and if we could see the inside and the ramifications of all the various activities of our financial system during the last three years, hon. members on the other side of the House, and some on this side, would not show the indifference they are showing to-day.

I desire now to refer briefly to one or two paragraphs of this report of the joint committee of Agricultural Inquiry. I am referring here, not to the statements made by the ex-controller of the currency, whose opinion and judgment you might question, whom you might accuse of being an interested party, but to a report of the commission of inquiry made after a full examination of the evidence, part of which I referred to a few moments ago. I read two paragraphs from the summary at the beginning of this section of the report referring more particularly to the situation that faced the farmers of the continent in 1921:

The debacle of prices in 1920 and 1921 reduced the farmer to a condition worse than he has suffered under for 30 years. Prices of farm products are relatively far below the prices of other groups of commodities. The products the farmer has to sell will buy less of the products the farmer has to buy to-day than at any time in the last two decades. Farm indebtedness has doubled in the last 10 years, and the drop in prices has the effect of again doubling this indebtedness. Farmers are having the greatest difficulty in paying the debts incurred in producing the crops of 1920 and in securing credit necessary for the new production.

And now listen to this:

The commission believes that these difficulties are due in a measure to the credit restrictions and limitations of the past eighteen months, and in part to the fact that the banking machinery of the country is not adequately adapted to the farmer's requirements.

I desire to comment at this point. This is the considered report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives in the United States, and they have here asserted most definitely that financial policy was a factor in that most terrible disaster. We are claiming to-day—and I desire to claim again and most emphatically—that financial policy ought not to be left to a few individuals or to a few private corporations. It is something that must be retained by the people at large, exercised through their proper representatives; even then we shall have lots of mistakes, for I presume there are many mistakes made in this parliament, no matter how good our intentions may be. The Federal Reserve Board, according to Mr. Williams' allegation, was party to a very ill-advised policy. Let us put it in this way: They lent themselves, in his judgment, to the speculative interests in the United States at the expense of the real interests of the farmers and the workers throughout that vast country. I am not asserting, and I do not think anybody would be so foolish as to assert, that this ill-advised financial policy was the sole cause of the disaster. There was a number of other factors which entered into the situation, but the best evidence we can get indicates beyond all controversy that it was a factor and an important one. Our contention is that owing to the situation which has developed under modern conditions the control of financial policy, the issue of currency and the control of credits ought to be in the hands of the people. That is all the resolution says. I am positively amazed that the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) objects to the resolution when he admits that this Canadian parliament has authority over our banks. All we want is to assert that authority and make it more effective.

Mr. FORKE: The resolution is in negative form. It simply says it is not in the interests of the country that it should be in private hands. It does not give any statement as to where it should be.

Mr. GOOD: Then all the better for my case. What does it mean when it says it should not be in private hands? The converse must be true, namely that it should be under the control of the public. I was simply interpreting the resolution in a slightly different way. I want to refer now to one or two statements made a few moments ago by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). He says the banking situation is now controlled by 235 men in this parliament. So it should be. But we want more than control. We want intelligent control. And we cannot get intelligent control if those benches on the other side of the House are empty.

Mr. CALDWELL: To whom would the hon. gentleman propose to give the control?

Mr. GOOD: I do not propose to give the control to any other than to parliament, the representatives of the people. But what I have in mind is the indifference shown by the hon. members of this House to this most important question, as indicated by the empty benches, and if they do not give attention to these matters, how can we have intelligent control?

I desire next to refer to a matter which I brought to the attention of the House last year.

Mr. MILLAR: Before the hon. gentleman leaves the matter, may I interrupt? My difficulty is this; it would seem to me that the inflation and the deflation which has caused so much trouble are in the hands of governments. Is the Finance minister not responsible for the inflation and deflation?

Mr. GOOD: I am free to admit that there may be a very considerable element of truth in what my hon. friend says. In the report which I had in my hands a few minutes ago there is a very free and frank admission that what we will call the national financial policy of the United States in war-time had a great deal to do with inflation. I think that is absolutely true, but it does not touch the question at issue at all. I have already admitted that representatives of the people, if they have control over financial institutions, will make mistakes. But it is far better to have control, to make mistakes, and to learn from those mistakes, than not to have control. Just let me elaborate that thought a little. Would it not be better in this country to have a democracy, even if it be very inefficient, than to have a dictatorship? We might say: As long as we have a benevolent dictator or autocrat, we would all be better governed than we are now. Possibly we would, but we would not be satisfied with that particular type of government. We want to have the privilege of making our mistakes and learning from them, and the only way by which we are going to learn is by making mistakes under a democratic form of government. The analogy holds in this particular field, that if the private corporations who control our financial policy are all-wise and all benevolent, well and good; but you cannot assume that is so, and the evidence that Mr. Williams adduces shows that when the power to rob and to exploit the public is in the hands of the few, they very often exercise that power and the public suffer.

Continuing, I want to refer to a matter that I brought to the attention of the House last year. I have heard it stated that the Canadian Bankers Association is the most powerful organization in this country. That may be quite true. I referred last year to the expenditures for lobbying and so on made by that association during the revision of the Bank Act in 1923, amounting in all to $96,646.50, irrespective of what they paid their secretary who was the only representative of the association who was visible and who had credentials. I have heard it said in connection with the question of public ownership of railways—and I should like some of my Quebec friends to bear this in mind—that if we did not have public ownership of railways, we were going to have railway ownership of the public, of the government. If we do not have public control over finance, we are going to have control of the public by financiers. We can take our choice.

I have in my hand some correspondence which was exchanged between Professor Irving Fisher who was here two years ago, the Right Hon. Sir Reginald McKenna, one of the great English bankers, Professor Gustav Cassel of Sweden, one of the most prominent economists and a certain Mr. Bellerby who was connected with the International Labour office at Geneva, Switzerland, dealing with the question of the stabilization of our currency. I want to read a few extracts from a letter written by Professor Irving Fisher to Sir Reginald McKenna, as follows:

> A recent letter from Prof. Cassel says: "With regard to your paper on the Stabilisation of Europe, I must say that it is nothing less than a scandal that nations should go on being ruled by ignorant politicians completely incapable of grasping the most elementary truths at the bottom of the world's present difficulties. The American opinion that a solution must be handed over to economic experts is all right, but people should not be led to believe that the problem is a simple question of arithmetic."

Prof. Cassel and I both feel that instead of concentrating on the problem of stabilising paper relatively to gold, we would probably make greater progress and certainly be more fundamental if we could first stabilise the money unit in gold standard countries.

I do not wish, at the present time, to go into details concerning the stabilization of currency, and I have very little further to say on this present occasion. May I repeat this however that unless the people of Canada and the people of other countries take means to secure a more effective control over financial policy and financial systems, they are practically doomed, because there is not any force, any influence, more potent for good or ill at the present time than the money influence? I have therefore, great pleasure in supporting the resolution moved by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth).

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I shall have to burden the House for a few minutes in saying something upon this issue. It is a matter I did not expect to speak on, but a good deal has been said as to what has happened in the past in connection with deflation policies and the like. The whole subject is interesting. I like to hear it discussed, but much more than hearing it discussed, I should like to get one ray of light as to the future, as to something practical, from the gentlemen who delight to discuss it.

Mr. GOOD: I will give it to the hon. member later.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I shall be delighted to get it. So far I have not been able to get it. To-day we have had complaints all around. There is a complaint if you go to the right. There is a complaint if you go to the left. There is the complaint of inflation by the banks. There is the complaint of deflation and the like. There is the complaint of government inflation. There is the complaint against rapacious financiers. Then, there is the plaintive complaint voiced by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) as to ignorant politicians having anything to do with financial matters. I believe many economic thinkers will agree with my hon. friend. I wonder if, after all, we cannot get somewhere with these complaints.

I wonder if we cannot possibly clear the ground just enough to begin to appreciate the difficulties of the situation. Everybody should want to endeavour to improve the situation where any avenue of improvement is opened up, and I think that is the desire of everybody. The trouble is that we have so much talk, and what the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) says is perfectly true. If we have any interest in the smaller banks, one of the worst disservices we can do them and the public generally is to create suspicion in the public mind as to our banking system. It is well to criticize these institutions if by so doing we can accomplish anything useful, if we have some concrete, sensible proposition which will advance their interests instead of hurting them. But in the absence of such a proposition I want to endorse entirely what the Acting Minister of Finance has said.

Hon. gentlemen say that the previous government were to blame for deflation. Following that out, they would have to say that the present government is to blame for continuing the same policy. There has been no change. Everything is the same. Many questions have been asked to-day and I am going to put a question. What step did the former government take, or what step has this government ever taken, to force upon Canada deflation? Not one. There was never a governmental action taken in this country calculated to create a position of artificial, forced deflation.

Mr. MILLAR: Was currency withdrawn from circulation in 1920? And if so, how much, and by whom?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the hon. gentleman really thinks that any government or bank, or anybody else, can expect to feed out dollars in this way and keep it up? Is there anybody to-day who does not realize that the issuance of money means interest and that the people holding money which they cannot use return it in order to avoid the burden of that interest? Can anyone be in ignorance of that fact? What governmental step was ever taken, either by the present or by the past government, to bring about sudden deflation? There never was such a thing.

Mr. IRVINE: Did anyone make that charge to-day?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, I have heard it to-day.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Not from this section.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, from that section. Some hon. gentleman, I cannot remember who, read some report or other of Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor in which the statement was made that, agreeable to the policy of the government, or words to that effect, something was being done. I did not quite get it, but I remember having heard something of the kind. But my point is that there never was anything done in Canada, either by the former government or by this government, which would have anything at all to do with price levels.

Mr. IRVINE: But should not something be done?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There we are getting on to something else. But there is no difficulty about that point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the hon. gentleman is referring to a quotation which was submitted to the House this afternoon from the evidence given by Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor before the Banking and Commerce committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thank the hon. gentleman for the information. There is no mystery about the matter at all. By one of those strange accidents of fortune, it happened that price levels were affected just through one of those vehicles which some hon. gentlemen think the government should adopt. Now, what is it that has to do with price levels? Commodities, is it not?—commodities and the outside market for commodities. Canada has no special supply market of her own for raw commodities.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the hon. member mean to say that the only thing that affects prices is commodities?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There we are getting into an academic discussion that would afford us room for discussion all day long. But let us keep to one thing at a time. Does the hon. member suggest that inflation is a condition which is not mirrored in an inflated value of commodities?

Mr. IRVINE: I would ask another question. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the inflation from which Canada suffered during the war was caused by commodities?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If we go back to the war it will take us a long time to get done. But that was a period during which, from the very nature of things, inflation was inevitable. It has been said quite often, but I will repeat it, that inflation is due not merely to a redundancy of currency but largely also, as was shown during the war, to a redundancy of government credits. Every single government issue of bonds for war purposes, which does not produce anything, goes to reinforce a greater foundation for credit. Wars have to be financed, and at the end of every war there is bound to be inflation. Hon. gentlemen seemed to indicate to-day that, while things were going first-rate after the war, and when we had high prices and inflation, through some governmental policy or some policy of the banks, or both, there was sudden deflation, which was a very bad thing for the country. I think I am safe in representing this as the burden of their complaint. But the deflation that took place at that time was almost entirely a deflation in commodity prices. And I was about to point out that Canada's commodity markets were the same as the markets of other purchasing nations. Unfortunately, in that period of post-war inflation there was, as there always is, a great deal of speculation. For example, there was an immense amount of sugar bought up, as well as of rubber. And what happened in the sugar situation? Do hon. gentlemen remember what occurred then? All of a sudden the federal reserve bank of the United States came to the conclusion that there was too much sugar paper out and so refused any more re-discounts or anything of that kind. And the same thing happened later in rubber. These are only two illustrations. Raw sugars dropped to something like one-sixth of their former value; they dropped to such an extent that the very collateral which the banks held and which under former values was perfectly good, became entirely uncollectable, and the whole thing had to be carried. Does any hon. gentleman think that what happened in New York was not mirrored in Montreal the next morning? Does he think that there was anything in the world which the Canadian banker could do to keep up the value of a collateral in something which played relatively a large part in the nation's business? Sugar raws were down to 3 cents; could the Canadian banker do anything at all to increase its value to 18 cents, where, I think, it was before? And what could the Canadian government do? Take another large raw material, rubber. What could either the Canadian banker or the Canadian government do in that situation? And so, in the case of any single one of the large staple commodities, there was nothing in the world which this country could do to maintain prices. What would any hon. member expect? Do hon. gentlemen think that the Canadian government or the Canadian banks could go into a "corner" for the purpose of artificially holding up prices in order to maintain an inflation that had disappeared? And what else was there that could be done? Take wheat: Has any hon. gentleman the temerity to suggest that any government in Canada either did, or could, do anything to hurt the price of wheat?

Mr. FORKE: Why was it that wheat and other agricultural products deflated so much more rapidly than any other commodities?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is one thing that is really unfortunate. Wheat was affected more quickly than any other product. The transfer of wheat is so immediate, the stages of manufacture are so short, that in the past it always has felt an upward movement, a movement of inflation, quicker than anything else. But unfortunately it also feels the return quicker than anything else. It is more sensitive, it takes the benefit of the up curve first; but it also takes the detriment of the down-curve, if not first, certainly as soon as anything, and, I think, first.

But I pause again for an answer, Mr. Speaker. Has any hon. gentleman the temerity to suggest there was anything that any government in Canada did or could have done to injuriously affect the price of wheat? Well, of course no one can suggest it. Everyone knows that if any hon. member did suggest it, his thinking constituents would look upon him as a fit inmate for an asylum. And yet what hurts this country more than anything else in case of deflation is that very article, wheat. And it is coming up again. Why did it go down? Its decline certainly had nothing to do with currency deflation, not a single thing. As every hon. gentleman knows, the price of wheat rests, not upon any artificial basis, currency inflation or credit, or anything else that we have here, or that the States has, or that the Mother Country has; it rests upon the purchasing power of the wheat-consuming countries of Europe on the one hand and the amount of visible supply of wheat on the other.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the hon. member explain how the bankers had nothing to do with bringing about deflation in this country in 1921-22?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any doubt that the particular item of deflation which hurts this country more than any other item, namely wheat, is something which we had absolutely nothing to do with, and which our banks had absolutely nothing to do with, it being dependent entirely upon the purchasing capacity and power of the wheat-importing nations on the one hand, and the visible supply of wheat on the other? Again I pause for a question?

Mr. GOOD: Will the hon. gentleman say whether or not the fluctuation in the volume of money, or purchasing power, of the countries of Europe were not to some extent at least determinable by public policy in those countries, and therefore affected the price of wheat here—according to his own theory?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will see if he thinks the matter over—and he is thoughtful, he is trying to get somewhere—that he has a choice of all kinds of things in Europe; he has his choice of stable currencies—gold currencies—inflated currencies, and everything else. Take for example, Spain at the end of the war.

Mr. IRVINE: Why go to Europe?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, it is big enough for the moment, and I go there particularly at the invitation of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). He could go to Spain, entirely upon a gold basis after the war; or he could go to Germany, without any basis at all; or he could go to Switzerland or Holland, each on the gold basis,—I do not care where he might go, he would find exactly the same condition, he would find that the particular kind of counters—currencies—would not help him at all. He would find it coming right back in the last analysis to this: Have the people the purchasing power necessary?—whether they get that purchasing power from gold itself, or from their own labour, or from commodities.

Mr. GOOD: Does not the deploring by Sir Reginald McKenna of the deflation policy in Great Britain indicate that there might have been a larger amount of purchasing power in that country for Canadian products if the policy that was followed there had not been followed?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that to some extent, certainly to an infinitely greater extent than we could arrest it, it is possible that Great Britain might have arrested the deflation. I do not know how far they could have done so.

Mr. SPENCER: Through the government or through the banks?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Entirely through the government.

Mr. SPENCER: Why could we not do the same?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend will take the trouble to look up the blue books to see the influence our trade would have on these commodities, bearing in mind my answer to the hon. gentleman that Great Britain could have arrested deflation to a larger extent than we could—but not absolutely, that was quite impossible—he will see the reason of my answer. The whole thing is relative. But I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that if you have as large a consumer of raw materials as the United States, absolutely embarked upon a policy of deflation, it would have been very hard for any other country in the world to have kept up an artificial standard in the same raw commodity.

Mr. GOOD: Has anybody denied that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Ah, but the hon. gentleman's question, when he asked me whether Great Britain would not have been able to buy much more if she had not deflated, of itself must affirm that proposition. I point out to him that that is one of the reasons why it would have been extremely difficult for Great Britain to have done it. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Evans) had a question?

Mr. EVANS: Does the hon. gentleman imply that the withholding of credit by the banks here to the farmers has nothing to do with the price of wheat by forcing it on the market for the want of credit?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was going on to that in a few moments. Much can be said as to the wisdom on the one hand of holding back an annual production, such as wheat, in the hope of raising our market or, on the other, of selling at once. Sometimes one method is successful, sometimes the other; it depends upon the year. Sometimes the man who holds back his wheat makes a lot of money. This year he would have done so. Sometimes the man who sells his wheat without delay, taking into consideration his carrying costs and all that sort of thing, gets the advantage.

Mr. EVANS: The hon. gentleman has not got my question. Through the want of credit the grower has been forced to put his wheat on the market, and thereby the price has been lowered.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the grower loses so much in that way as by the fact that he is not able to reap the benefit of a better price in case the market goes up later on. I think that really is the point. But after all the great thing in connection with the movement of grain is the ability to finance it properly, and I am going to say something to hon. members upon that score in connection with inflation. That is, inflation of currency which has taken place in this country, having that very aim and object and end in view. It is something in ease of some of the arguments of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg. We have had in Canada what was in effect currency based upon a commodity, not on gold at all, just for the purpose of moving the western grain crop. At one time advances were made—I am speaking now from memory —of as high as $128,000,000. That was under the Finance Act in 1914; and it was just for the purpose of enabling the farmers' grain to be properly and economically financed and taken over to the British market.

Mr. SPENCER: Did I understand the hon. member to say that the British government, but not the British banks, could have stopped inflation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not say they could have; I said they could have a little more than we could.

Mr. SPENCER: Why could not the Canadian government exercise the same right?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought I had answered that, but I will answer it again for my hon. friend's benefit, because I am sure he wants to know. The hon. member will see that if any given country has control of say five per cent of a certain commodity, it would be difficult for that country to stabilize the price of that commodity. I think I carry my hon. friend's judgment with me to that point. If another country held, say, twenty-five per cent of the visible supply of that commodity, then that country would be just that much more able to stabilize the price. That is the reference I made as between Canada and Great Britain. I do not think Great Britain could have done it, but she could have done it to a greater extent than we could. I am not giving the exact proportion; I do not say whether it is a question of five to twenty-five or not.

Mr. GOOD: It is a question of degree.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member has the point exactly; it is entirely a question of degree. If you own enough of anything you can always stabilize the price.

Mr. MILLAR: I do not think we have a direct answer to the question that has been asked twice. Without considering whether it had the effect of deflation or inflation, did the government of which my hon. friend was a member withdraw any money from circulation in 1920?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Again, I thought I had stated what the situation was. We took no action whatever toward withdrawing money at any time, and I do not believe any government has ever done so or could very well do so. If circulation is out, it is out; but the hon. gentleman will see that there is a string on that circulation—it is the excess that always comes back. At one time we had an excess of $131,000,000, the whole of which bore interest at five per cent. Just so long as the banks can hold that out at the five per cent rate and make some money on it, they are going to do so, but the moment the money becomes idle with them and they are penalized to the extent of five per cent, back that money goes. Six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BROWN: Just for my own information, may I say that the statement was made to me the other day—I give it only as made to me—that at that time the government offered the banks the option of increasing their capital or of withdrawing their amounts in circulation. Can that be answered?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very easily; it is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. BROWN: That is the statement as made to me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Many strange statements are made. This is the first time I have heard it.

Mr. BROWN: That is satisfactory.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 5, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 20, respecting a patent owned by the Concrete Surfacing Machinery Company. —Mr. Chevrier.

Bill No. 21, respecting the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of Canada, Limited. —Mr. Casgrain.

REPORT

Supplementary list of leases, licenses, permits, or other authorities cancelled under provisions of section 3 chapter 21 of the Statutes of 1922, an act respecting notices of cancellation of leases of Dominion lands.—Hon. Mr. Stewart (Argenteuil)).

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved:

That the order of the House referring to supplementary estimates 1925-26 respecting loans to the Canadian National Railway Company and Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, laid on the table Monday February 16, referred to the committee on Supply, be discharged, and that the said estimates be referred to the select standing committee on Railways and Shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi) moved:

That the annual report of the Minister of Agriculture and of the Director of the Experimental Farm be referred to the select committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—LOTTERIES

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, to amend the Criminal Code.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. MARTELL: As hon. gentlemen know, there is a provision in the Criminal Code in regard to lotteries. Section 236 of the Criminal Code was amended, and special provision was inserted to permit churches or eleemosynary institutions to hold lotteries where the prize was of less value than $50. They were permitted under this provision to conduct a raffle. The purpose of the bill is to cut out that exception, on the ground that if the church of this country is to be a model for the discipline and morality of the country they should set a good example to others. Hon. members will quite appreciate the force of the old maxim which declares that the church is the teacher of the laws and the dictator of morals. What is wrong for an individual is wrong for the church.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CARAQUET AND GULF SHORE

Mr. ROBICHAUD:

1. What was the total amount of subsidies paid by the Dominion government towards the construction of the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway?
2. What was the total amount paid by the government for the purchase of said roads?

3. What amounts were spent for the reconstruction of these roads in each year from the time they were taken over to the end of the last fiscal year?
4. What were the total operating deficits during the same period?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. $277,699.20.
2. $296,399.60.
3. Capital expenditure:

Year ending March, 1921...	$	104,253 34
March, 1922...		263,718 33
March, 1923...		143,895 71
March, 1924...		49,729 21

4. Operating returns of this line are not segregated in accounts of the Canadian National system.

COL. H. A. MULLINS

Mr. McTAGGART:

1. Was Colonel H. A. Mullins, Winnipeg, employed by the Dominion government during the war period?
2. If so, what was his official position?
3. What was his annual salary?
4. What was the total amount paid to him for services rendered?
5. What was the total amount paid to him for expenses during the period stated?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Yes.
2. (a) Inspector of meat at Sewell camp. (b) Chief Inspector transport and supplies from Fort William west.
3. (a) Lieutenant-Colonel's staff rates 27th May, 1915 to 3rd November, 1915; pay, $5 per diem; field allowance, $3 per diem; married allowance, $1.20 per diem.

(b) Lieutenant-Colonel's rates from 4th November, 1915 to 31st December, 1915: Pay, $5 per diem; subsistence allowance, $1.50 per diem.

(c) As Chief Inspector transport and supplies from 1st March, 1916 to 30th November, 1917: Pay, $2,900 per annum; allowances, $1,100 per annum. (During this period he was on leave for one month without pay and allowances.)

(d) Colonel's rates from 1st December, 1917 to 28th February, 1918: Pay, $6 per diem; field allowance, $1.50 per diem; subsistence allowance, $1.70 per diem; separation allowance to dependent, $60 per month.

4. Total pay and allowances. ..	$9,355 92
Total separation allowance.. ..	$ 180 00
	$9,535 92

5. Total expenses paid: 1915-16, $302.10; 1916-17, $242.75; 1917-18, $84.00; total, $628.85.

PORT NELSON HARBOUR WORKS

Mr. McTAGGART:

1. Was any considerable damage done to the harbour works at Port Nelson, by a storm, in the year 1924?
2. If so, what was the extent of the damage?
3. Was the bridge connecting the artificial island with the mainland affected by the storm?
4. What steps, if any, have been taken by the government to repair damage caused by the storm?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.
2. Damage confined to removal of part of the stone and earth filling in the timber crib bridge piers which lead from the shore to the island structure.
3. The bridge spans and supports were not injured.
4. Impossible to take steps to repair during the winter season.

GRANTS TO HIGHWAYS IN ONTARIO

Mr. CHURCH:

What grants have been made to the province of Ontario during the past fourteen years on account of good roads?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

The Department of Railways and Canals has no record of any payment to the province of Ontario on highways account prior to the passage of the Canada Highways Act of 1919. Since that time, and under that act, the following payments have been made:

1920-21..	$ 295,100 00
1921-22..	1,031,229 01
1922-23..	2,047,918 28
1923-24..	1,377,440 88
1924 to Jan. 31, 1925.. ..	701,069 90
Total payments to date..	$ 5,452,758 07

MINERS AND STEEL WORKERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I have received the following telegram from Sydney Mines:

Sydney Mines, N.S., March 3, 1925.

Conditions getting acute Sydney Mines. Much relief given out already. We start a soup kitchen to-morrow. Citizens meeting appointed relief committee and assistance would be appreciated.

W. C. Stewart.

Has the Minister of Labour any recent information to give to the House concerning the situation, and is anything going to be done to stir up the provincial government to take prompt action?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): The information before the government in regard to the general situation in Cape Breton, both as to a dispute between employers and miners in the matter of a new wage scale and as to the distress which is the result of some of the mines not working, is, I think practically the same as the public generally has through press reports. Yesterday, we received a telegram of almost six hundred words, which was a copy of a statement that had been made by representatives of the miners to the Nova Scotia government. Our understanding is that the Nova Scotia legislature is now in session; that it is taking cognizance of the situation and the claims in regard to both the distress which is the result of unemployment and the dispute which is and has been for some months in evidence between the mine operators and the miners. Our understanding is that the Nova Scotia government is taking all such steps as to it appear proper to bring about a settlement of the existing dispute, and, we assume, taking such steps as may be necessary to assist in relieving distress, if any is in evidence.

I can add nothing further to what has been previously stated as this government's position, except I might say that it is not regarded as good form to step into another man's house to assist in settling a dispute which is under careful discussion between those who are directly concerned and responsible. That is all I could say for the federal government.

ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): I desire to draw the attention of the government to the following announcement that appeared in the daily press of 2nd March:

> The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company have announced their intention not to renew their contract with the government.

I desire to ask the government—I notice unfortunately the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low)—if any statement can be made to the House regarding what action it is proposed to take in view of this announcement.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The Minister of Trade and Commerce, evidently anticipating a question of this kind, sent a note to my office asking me to assure any inquirers that:

> Negotiations are now proceeding for the extension of this contract, and we have no reason to think that there will be any interruption in the service.

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY OUTLET

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): When does the Minister of Railways and Canals expect the joint report of the two railway companies with regard to the Peace river transportation question?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have nothing in the way of words of hope to add to those uttered by myself the other day in reply to the same question. I have nothing further from the heads of the railways, but I anticipate having word in a few days.

RURAL CREDITS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I trust the government will be able to give us some more hope in respect to the report of Dr. Tory on rural credits. Has the government any further information to lay before the House?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is not in his seat. I will call his attention to the question of my hon friend.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BRANCH LINES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. N. H. McTAGGART (Maple Creek): Will any branch line bills be introduced this session? If so, how many, and when may we expect them to be brought down?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I think it is safe to say that branch line legislation will be introduced at this session. I am not sure that there is not something on the order paper for two lines that are in a different position from the other lines from the fact that the government of Saskatchewan has in its hands in trust certain moneys which it desires,—as legislation has been provided—to apply to the construction of the lines that will be named in these two bills. The bills will be introduced without delay.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Will the bills to be introduced by the government in connection with branch lines include any more than two branches?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not in a position as yet to state.

QUESTIONS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY UNANSWERED

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Has the Acting Prime Minister any word to give to the House on the various questions that ministers told us on previous days they would submit to their absent colleagues and advise the House upon later?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Are the colleagues yet absent?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are still absent and getting more absent.

Mr. GRAHAM: The absence of the colleagues to-day is on account of the funeral of the late Madame Dandurand, wife of the leader of the government in the Senate. These matters have all been referred to the ministers interested and I hope they will have answers to-morrow.

MILITARY DISTRICT NUMBER 10—COAL INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): When does the government propose to lay on the table the report of the commission appointed to investigate the alleged frauds in the sale of coal in the Department of National Defence, Military District No. 10?

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): If my hon. friend had followed the proceedings of the House as he usually does, he would have noticed that a few days ago an order of the House was passed for all the papers in connection with this matter. These papers will be brought down in due course.

CANTEEN FUNDS

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the distribution of the canteen funds by distributing the same as follows:—

(1) The sum of $20,000 to be held for payment of any outstanding accounts;

(2) The sum of $100,000 to be paid to a central board of three trustees appointed by the Governor in Council, without remuneration, to be used in such amounts and such manner as it may deem best for the maintenance and assistance of an adjustment service and bureau for the benefit of ex-service men and their dependents;

(3) The sum of $50,000 to be paid to the United Services Fund of Great Britain, and the sum of $50,000 to be paid to the American Red Cross, to be used by them, respectively, in such manner as they deem proper for assistance in specially meritorious cases of ex-members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who have served in France or England, and their dependents, resident in Great Britain or the United States as the case may be, and who are in genuine distress;

(4) The residue of the Canteen Fund to be divided into nine provincial allotments in the proportion indicated by the following percentages:—

Alberta	7.752
British Columbia and the Yukon	11.213
Manitoba	10.654
New Brunswick	4.072
Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island	6.288
Ontario	41.237
Quebec	11.622
Saskatchewan	7.162
	100.000

(5) The provincial allotments to be paid to a provincial board of trustees, appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council in each province, without remuneration, empowered to receive and hold the provincial allotment and to ascertain the wishes of those interested and residing in the province concerning the disposition of such allotment and to determine the object to which the allotment should be devoted, and to administer the same for such object or to provide for such administration by others, and to do such other things as may be indicated in the order in council appointing them. The expenses in connection with the trust to be a charge on the allotment;

(6) The sum of £5,000 received from the Council of Management of the United Services Fund to be allotted and paid to the Central Board of Trustees to be expended by such board from time to time in such amounts and in such manner as it may deem best for assistance in specially meritorious cases of ex-members of the Imperial Forces and their dependents resident in Canada or the United States of America as the case may be.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. BELAND: This resolution differs sligthly from the one which was passed by the House last year. There is, for instance, provision for the distribution, or perhaps I should say disposal, of the sum of £5,000 which has been allotted to Canada by the Council of Management of the United Services Fund of Great Britain. I take this my first opportunity of bringing to the attention of the House that this money was secured through the deep interest and the intervention of His Excellency the Governor General who, as it will be remembered, played a very important part in the organization and direction of the United Services Fund in Great Britain.

There is a slight alteration in section 4 of the resolution so far as Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are concerned. I see no good reason why these two provinces should be grouped together when all the other provinces are afforded the possibility of appointing each a board of trustees for the administration of their respective allotments, and in the bill I intend to have Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island each treated separately.

The committee will note that British Columbia and the Yukon are put together. As was indicated last year, the Yukon is not organized as a province, and the interests of the returned men residing in that territory, it was felt, might be better served if the province of British Columbia and the Yukon were joined in the administration of these two allotments. In this regard, however, certain representations have been made to me by different persons having an immediate interest in the welfare of the Yukon; returned men and members of this House who have taken an interest in the matter have represented that, from the Yukon point of view, it would be preferable if the share that fell to that district were allotted to it directly instead of forming a part of the allotment to British Columbia for use in both the province and the Yukon. Personally I have no objection to this being done, I cannot look unfavourably on any such proposal; and, if it is the desire of the committee, I shall introduce an amendment to the bill to provide that the Yukon shall have its share separately. If this is done, however, some local committee or board will have to be appointed for the disposal of the allotment, whatever it may be.

The percentages which are set out in the resolution are arrived at on three bases,—the percentage of enlistments, the percentage of discharges, and the percentage of pensioners in each province or territory as the case may be. This has been deemed by the royal commission the fairest way of dealing with the fund, and we have adhered to the principle this year as we did last year. The figures are somewhat different, but they are correct to date, having been subjected to a close review by the Department of National Defence. These, I think, are the only comments that seem necessary at the moment, but I shall be pleased to give hon. gentlemen any information that may be in my possession.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been reported that an order in council has been passed within the last few months appropriating or disposing of a portion of the fund. Has the minister that order in council before him, or can he explain the nature of it? I am told that it was to authorize the borrowing and apportionment of some part of the fund.

Mr. BELAND: No money whatever has been appropriated from the canteen fund, by order in council or in any other way, since 1921.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister say that no order in council was passed relating to a grant of some ten or fifteen thousand dollars from the moneys referred to in paragraph 2 of this resolution, to an organization known as the Dominion Veterans' Alliance or to any other body? There has been a great deal of mystery about this order in council. Surely the minister knows what we are talking about and can give us the particulars. The matter has been referred to at least a dozen times; there is such an order in council, and the minister knows it.

Mr. BELAND: I am giving my hon. friend all the information in my possession. No money whatever—

Mr. CLARK: I know that.

Mr. BELAND: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to proceed with my explanation. I say no money whatever pertaining to the canteen fund has been disposed of by order in council.

Mr. MANION: Irrespective of the money having been disposed of, has any order in council been passed dealing with it?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister explain that order?

Mr. BELAND: Last year a certain amount of money was appropriated from the disablement fund for the maintenance of the adjustment bureau. That was done after the bill had passed the House of Commons unanimously. No money has been appropriated from the canteen fund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps I can help the minister's recollection. There are two trust funds: One the canteen fund, the other the trust fund that was very largely created through the munificence of the late Mr. James Carruthers, under which a large sum of money was obtained for the purpose of looking after very grave cases which did not technically fall within the rules. I think my hon. friend will remember those two trust funds?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend quite clear that this is not what has happened? A loan of $10,000 was made to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance, another of $10,000 and a third of $5,000, all covered by order in council, that money being taken, in breach of trust, not from the canteen fund, but from the trust fund which I have secondly described, the Carruthers fund; and that the same order in council provided for the return of that money. Of course, the government would know that it was entirely improper to use trust moneys for a purpose not covered by the trust, so they had to put the money back again, and they propose to effect this by providing that the three trustees whom the government are going to name when the matter is finally adjusted should repay to the government the $25,000 improperly taken out of the Carruthers fund. Now, have I assisted my hon. friend's recollection sufficiently?

Mr. BELAND: I think my hon. friend has stated the facts correctly inasmuch as the last apportionment was made from the disablement fund. The House will remember that two years ago an appropriation was before parliament for the partial refunding of the expenses incurred by organizations presenting claims. That appropriation was not voted at the time, and, if I remember correctly, the disablement fund advanced $5,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was it not $25,000?

Mr. BELAND: It may be $10,000, it may be $5,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On what authority?

Mr. BELAND: There were no orders in council as far as I remember, dealing with the first payment.

Mr. MANION: The minister admitted a moment ago that an order in council was passed. Would he mind reading the document to the committee so we will be familiar with it?

Mr. BELAND: I have not the order in council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the minister would recognize it if I read it to him? He will have more difficulty I think in defending it than in recognizing it. The order in council is dated September 18, 1924, and is as follows:

Certified copy of a minute of a meeting of the Committee of the Privy Council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 18th September, 1924.

The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 12th September, 1924, from the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment representing that the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is the trustee of a fund known as the Disablement Fund which was contributed by patriotic citizens mainly during the years 1915 and 1916 and that this fund is being used generally for the purpose of small loans to pensioners and others who are in need of immediate assistance and who, in the opinion of the departmental investigations, would benefit by such assistance.

The Dominion Veterans' Alliance, which represents the various veterans' organizations throughout Canada has for a considerable time past maintained a service bureau in Ottawa for the purpose of assisting former members of the forces in the presentations of claims in respect of pension, medical treatment and other matters. It is stated by the officers of the Alliance that the service given involves considerable expenditure.

On the introduction of a bill to parliament at the last session to deal with the canteen funds now in the hands of the government provision was made for the setting aside of the sum of one hundred thousand dollars to be applied by a board of trustees to the maintenance of an adjustment bureau in the city of Ottawa. It was intended to utilize the Dominion Veterans' Alliance as the adjustment bureau under the provisions of that bill. Owing to the fact that this measure was introduced during the last few days of the parliamentary session it failed to become law and consequently the moneys which would have been available for the assistance of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance still remain in the hands of the Receiver General. It is proposed to re-introduce the bill early next session.

The minister further represents that in order to enable the Dominion Veterans' Alliance to continue its activities a loan of five thousand dollars ($5,000) was made by the trustee of the Disablement Fund in June, 1924, and that it is now proposed that a further loan of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) be made, subject to reimbursement of the disablement fund should any moneys be appropriated by parliament for the benefit of the alliance or should the proposed allocation from the canteen funds be made.

The minister states that a further loan of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) is being made out of the Disablement Fund to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance, payable as to five thousand dollars ($5,000) on the 1st of October, 1924, and as to five thousand dollars ($5,000) on the 1st of January, 1925, and he recommends that the trustees who may be appointed after the passage of the canteen funds bill at the next session of parliament be requested to reimburse the Disablement Fund the amount of fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000) out of any moneys transferred to such trustees under the authority of the said bill.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

E. J. Lemaire,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

On the recommendation of the minister the government effected a misappropriation of trust funds—admitted on the face of the document to be a misappropriation to the extent of $25,000—trust funds, known generally as the Carruthers fund, contributed by patriotic citizens, for certain definite purposes specified in the trust. Because the government did not get their bill through parliament under which they hoped to support this Dominion Veterans' Alliance, they take the money out of this trust fund and hand it over to the Alliance, and then say, "We will depend on parliament recouping the trust fund." They give, as the reason why parliament has not already made good the breach of trust, that the bill was presented too late last session, and therefore did not pass; the order in council recites that it was because the bill came so late to the House that it did not pass. But the Prime Minister declared that it did not pass because of the obduracy of the Tory

Senate, and because of that obduracy he mounted his charger, raised his sword, and proceeded through Canada on a campaign to clip the Senate's wings. Now the order in council says parliament approved of the bill all right, and it was only because it reached the Senate late that it could not get through. Anticipating the will of parliament, the government passes the money out of the treasury before parliament has any say about it at all—not only passes it out of the treasury, but passes it out of a specific trust fund.

Now will the minister give his opinion of that as an example to the people of Canada? I wonder how that would appear before the depositors, say, of the Home Bank at the present time? What would their opinion be of conduct of this kind on the part of trustees? There is no question as to the facts. No man need start to argue that the use of the funds for that purpose was in accordance with the terms of the trust. If it was, we would not need an order; if it was, the trustee could do it; if it was, we would never suggest a return. The minister says that parliament is going to be asked to return this money; that parliament would have done it before only we were so slow about getting it through the House. The fact is that parliament rejected it. Parliament acted on it; this House passed it; the other House rejected it. But the government is above parliament in both its branches; and of course this is all a part of the great programme of "restoring responsible government to Canada."

Mr. CARROLL: Who were the trustees of this disablement fund?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The trustee is recited to be the Assistant Deputy Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. He is the trustee, but the government orders him to dig into his trust funds and apply the moneys to purposes not within the purview of the trust at all, to assist what they call an "adjustment bureau" of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance. And they justify it by saying that parliament will vote the money back into the trust fund some time later. Is that not very much like what the bank teller always says when he takes trust funds—that something will happen later on and that the money will be returned? This government puts its hand on trust funds, casts them where it will, then says, "Oh well, parliament will have to return them in order to save the government."

Mr. BELAND: I think a very simple explanation can be given. It was recognized two years ago that certain organizations were carrying out certain duties on behalf of the ex-service men. Parliament recognized that to the extent of appropriating a sum of money to recoup those organizations which had spent money in so serving the ex-service men. First of all, therefore, that principle was recognized. Last year a bill was introduced into this House making provision for the maintenance of the service bureau at headquarters in Ottawa and the amount of $100,000 was specified in the bill for the purpose. My right hon. friend has admitted—and it is of common knowledge—that this bill passed the House of Commons nemine contradicente—not a single word of opposition from anybody. Questions were asked as to how the board should be constituted, and so on, but the principle was recognized by the House of Commons of that time that canteen fund money could be used for the purpose of maintaining a service bureau.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The point is that it is not canteen fund money that is used at all; it is disablement fund money. That is the whole thing.

Mr. BELAND: I am coming to that. There are two trust funds, the disablement fund and the canteen funds. I hold that the disablement fund can better be used for this purpose than the canteen funds, and that is the view of Sir Arthur Currie. Sir Arthur Currie is of the opinion that unless parliament provides differently, the disablement fund could be put to no better use than that of supporting an adjustment bureau at headquarters. I say that the House of Commons recognized the principle of the maintenance of a service bureau at headquarters and that the House of Commons voted $100,000 for the purpose from the canteen funds. That the bill did not become law was not because the Senate rejected it on the ground of its not deserving their approval; the reasons were well known—they said they had not time to go into the matter fully. These facts being of common knowledge, am I to prevent the adjustment bureau from fulfilling the duties which have been recognized by the House, by withholding from them assistance available from the disablement fund? I would not take any money from the canteen funds for this purpose. Why? Because a bill was introduced in parliament, and although it was approved by the House of Commons it did not pass the Senate and was therefore not adopted by parliament. But after consultation with many who occupy high places among the returned soldiers I was advised that some money might be taken from the disablement fund for the purpose, it being understood that the funds might be recouped as suggested.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the disablement fund in the hands of the government as trustee?

Mr. BELAND: I do not understand so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly not; the disablement fund is in the hands of a single individual as trustee and the government has no authority over it at all. The fund is in the hands of an individual for a certain definite purpose. That individual being an officer of the government, the government says to him: "You are our officer; put your hands into your trust funds and give us the money."

Mr. BELAND: Does my right hon. friend contend that the disablement fund was not used for a proper purpose when it was devoted to serving the interests of the ex-service men through the adjustment bureau?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a case of the propriety of the purpose; it is a case of the purpose not being the purpose of the trust fund. There are lots of good purposes.

Mr. BELAND: What is the purpose of the trust fund?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The purposes are recited in the minister's own order in council. If this is in fulfilment of the purpose why does the minister provide for the return of the money?

Mr. BELAND: The loans that are made from the disablement fund are generally very small loans.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is the total amount loaned from that fund up to date?

Mr. BELAND: I think it is $15,000 in the order in council.

Mr. ARTHURS: The appropriation is much more than $15,000.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend will remember that two years ago an appropriation was made by the House in the amount of $150,000 for partial refund.

Mr. ARTHURS: That was passed by parliament. It was a vote of the House; it was not a case of—shall I say?—misappropriation of trust funds. But if the trust fund has been diverted why should the minister in the order in council use the words "be requested to return"? Why should there not be an order to return any moneys so appropriated?

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend will know that the man in charge of the disablement fund has a sort of surveillance over it; he keeps a good guard around his fund and seeks reimbursement.

Mr. ARTHURS: Pardon me—

Mr. BELAND: Oh yes.

Mr. MANION: Who is the trustee?

Mr. BELAND: The Assistant Deputy Minister. I have no objection to naming him; Mr. Scammell, an appointee of the late government, a man who is discharging his duty properly—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nobody attacks him.

Mr. BELAND: I am satisfied that I was justified in doing that, and I am satisfied also that my right hon. friend would not have done otherwise.

Mr. CARROLL: Did I understand the hon. member (Mr. Arthurs) to say that this parliament had already dealt with a part of the disablement fund?

Mr. ARTHURS: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no; that is the whole point. It is not subject to the disposition of parliament at all. It is bad enough for the minister to be a party to this transaction without attributing similar conduct to others on a mere supposition.

Mr. BELAND: I may say in that regard that if I am guilty, the right hon. gentleman must knock his conscience three times because he himself when he was Prime Minister appropriated $202,000 of the canteen fund.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, from the canteen fund, and this government out of the funds in their own possession would have the right to anticipate the will of parliament, taking its life in its hands; but it has no right to go into a trust fund of which it has no disposition at all, and never had any, and authorize the man in charge of that trust, merely because he is their own officer, to dip his hands into that trust and hand the money over to a veterans' alliance or to anybody else; that is the point I am making. In exigent circumstances the government, the trustee of the country, can, by Governor General's warrant or other process, meet that exigent circumstance, and then come to parliament for approval. That is the manly stand the government should have taken if they thought the circumstances were an exigency demanding a loan from the treasury. But on the contrary, that is what the government does: It dips its hands into a private trust fund, which is in the hands of an officer of the government, a trust fund the purposes and the destiny of which is clearly and plainly set out, and it says to its own officer, "We order you to take that money and hand it over to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance; expect your return out of a bill which parliament last session rejected but which we hope next session it will pass."

Mr. ARTHURS: I would like to point out to the minister that his answers in this matter have not been very frank.

Mr. BELAND: Oh, yes, very frank.

Mr. ARTHURS: A few days ago I asked whether any moneys had been appropriated from the canteen fund by order in council or otherwise, and the answer of the minister was a distinct negative. Now, if the minister's contention is right, and the moneys appropriated by the order in council now before the House will be returned, the minister was at least begging the question.

Mr. CARROLL: I have never seen the trust, but I have a general idea of what the disablement fund was for. I presume it was in the general interest of the returned soldiers of this country, and was to be looked after by the deputy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The presumption is loose and wrong. This was a loan for certain definite purposes of returned soldiers, to assist the disabled by money appropriation, and the thing is clearly set out in the letter of gift. It is not for any general purposes of the returned soldier.

Mr. CARROLL: I still hold that this trust was for the purpose of assisting the returned soldiers, and the most likely and the most reasonable presumption is that it would be to assist disabled returned soldiers. Now we have in Ottawa an organization which has been looking after the returned soldiers of this country, and looking after them I think fairly well. Last year, as was pointed out by the minister, this House undertook to do something with the canteen fund which had been in the hands of the government since the end of the war. I am not going to discuss now the reasons which the Senate may have had for rejecting that bill—which was passed unanimously by this House—providing that the canteen fund should be distributed in a certain way. It was passed by this House very late in the session, it is true, and the Senate saw fit—and I am not criticizing that body at all—to say that they would not pass the bill because of the lateness of the session; that probably was a fairly good reason. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment consequently found themselves in this position: This House had decided that a certain sum of money should be given to this organization for the purpose of looking after returned soldiers, but when the bill did not pass, they did not have the money to give. Now my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), has made the point, and made it very well, that the department could then have said: We will take $100,000 out of the canteen fund and hand it over to this organization, expecting that parliament next year will approve the canteen fund legislation. Now what difference would that make? I dare say that those who are adversely criticizing the action of the department to-day would have done so in that case because neither this nor any other government would have any right to deal with the canteen fund in the way suggested. But if they have that right, then I say this government has the right to say by order in council: We have this money for a distinct and separate purpose; we have not outlined what the distinct and separate purpose is, but we do know by the trust which was created what the disability fund is for; we will therefore borrow $25,000 from the disability fund and help out the returned soldiers of this country in the way the House of Commons decided they should be helped out, and if necessary we will return it.

4 p.m.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why, "if necessary?"

Mr. CARROLL: If necessary for the returned soldiers. I may point out to the hon. member that there must certainly have been a necessity when the minister asked for this $100,000 vote, and this House must have felt there was a necessity because they voted that money without a dissenting vote.

Mr. ARTHURS: I asked the hon. member why he said "if necessary" return it to the trust fund.

Mr. CARROLL: I say, if there was any question about the desirability of returning it to the trust fund. I am not saaying it would be legally necessary; it may be, I do not know. But I cannot see that there has been anything in the nature of fraud or of improper dealing with a trust fund. Everything was done openly by order in council, which was open to the public gaze.

Mr. CLARK: Does that justify misappropriation of funds?

Mr. CARROLL: There was no misappropriation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the order in council published in the Gazette?

Mr. CARROLL: I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not.

Mr. CARROLL: I have never time to read the Gazette after parliament closes, but I notice my right hon. friend got the order in council. If there was anything secret about it, if they could frighten the deputy into making a recommendation to council, surely they could frighten the department sufficiently to have the order in council kept secret.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will tell the hon. member the secret. I got it through the mail marked "Secret", with no name appearing on the envelope or anywhere else. I have no idea who sent it, but it was evidently someone who understood its nature.

Mr. CARROLL: I am certain the minister did not advise his officers to keep it secret; but if he did, he should investigate and ascertain who the scoundrel was in his department that gave it out. Knowing the Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment as I do, and knowing what he has done for the returned soldiers, I do not for one moment think he had any desire to keep it a secret. How could he keep it a secret? The matter had some day to come before this House.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no secrecy about orders in council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh? We cannot get them.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh yes you can, and you are getting them.

Mr. CARROLL: I am very glad to know that the minister has pointed out, in regard to section 4, that the item representing the allotment to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, will be corrected. I do not see any good sound reason for putting them together. As a matter of fact, I think they would have a good deal of trouble in disbursing this fund if they left it in that position, because the Governor in Council in each province might appoint a separate and distinct board, as they probably would. I think there is nothing else to be done. When the act is brought down, I think this matter will be corrected. The same remark applies in the case of British Columbia and the Yukon. Their local governments are administered under entirely different organizations. They have a commission, I believe, in the Yukon.

Mr. MANION: We are not quite finished with this canteen fund. Might we not finish that before we deal with the other section of the bill?

Mr. CARROLL: I want to give the minister the benefit of any ideas I have on the general act.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman will have plenty of opportunity.

Mr. CARROLL: The same reason that exists for separating Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island in my opinion exists for separating British Columbia and the Yukon, because they have two governmental organizations in the province and district, and it will lead to trouble if left as it is. They have no lieutenant governor in the Yukon but they have in British Columbia.

I intended asking the minister a few other questions on this matter, but I will only ask one at the present time, because it refers to the matter before us. What item in this resolution refers to replacement of the $25,000 which was referred to in the order in council by the right hon. leader of the opposition?

Mr. BELAND: There is no such provision in the resolution.

Mr. HANSON: For the benefit of those who do not understand the history of the fund, I ask that the deed of trust or letter of trust be laid on the table. It seems to me a very serious charge has been laid at the door of someone in connection with this matter, and in order that we may properly understand the situation it is absolutely necessary that the House should know affirmatively what are the terms of the deed of trust, and I ask the minister to produce the deed of trust.

Mr. BELAND: I advised the assistant deputy minister to loan that money to the Veterans' Alliance, because the association was in my opinion discharging duties which were important to the ex-service men. He consented to make the loan, and if the same thing occurred again I would make the same recommendation. And why?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this money that the assistant deputy pays out submitted to the Auditor General?

Mr. BELAND: I do not think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not that the reason it is done in this way?—The other payments would have to be submitted to the Auditor General.

Mr. BELAND: That is not the reason it was done.

Mr. CARROLL: As I understand the matter, it is simply assuring the trustee of the fund that he will be reimbursed these moneys. There will be no act of this parliament affirming that.

Mr. BELAND: It is true there is no provision that will force anybody to reimburse him, but even if the loan were not repaid into the disablement fund, where is the harm? Have not the interests of the ex-service men been served by the amount that has been loaned?

Mr. MANION: Possibly, but that disablement fund was for a specific purpose, and this is for an altogether different purpose. Will the minister tell me to whom this money was paid? It is stated that it was paid to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance. How much money was paid to them and to whom?

Mr. BELAND: Whatever money was paid must have been paid to the secretary treasurer of the association, and I think the gentleman was Mr. MacNeil.

Mr. MANION: I am informed by one officer of that alliance that not one cent was ever paid to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance. He does not dispute the statement of the minister, but he says that the Dominion Veterans' Alliance never received a cent of it—that Mr. MacNeil did. I am not criticizing Mr. MacNeil. He was secretary of the Great War Veteran Association, but that association was only part of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance, and this officer states that the Dominion Veterans' Alliance never received the money or had anything to do with it, that it was handed to one of the officers, Mr. MacNeil, and that, as far as the Dominion Veterans' Alliance is concerned, they never saw it. That is the information I got from one of the officers, and he gave me permission to make the statement.

Mr. HANSON: Is there any reason why the minister should not produce, for the benefit of hon. members who are not familiar with this matter, the deed of trust under which this disablement fund was created. It seems to me that that is elementary. We could then determine the matter for ourselves. I ask the minister, and I am going to persist in asking him to produce the trust deed for the benefit of the members who do not know the details of the matter. It is only fair that we should know what the deed of trust was.

Mr. BELAND: I have no objection to giving my hon. friend what he requires.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister produce the cheques or receipts showing how the money was disbursed and showing who got the money, so that we can see how much money was really paid out?

Mr. BELAND: What is the request?

Mr. MANION: To bring the cheques or receipts, as well as the documents asked for by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), which would show to whom the money was paid and by whom cashed. Bring the cheques if possible, or whatever vouchers the department has, in order to show to whom the money was paid, as to whether this payment was made to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance, as the gentleman from that association says they never saw it.

Mr. BELAND: If the cheque was written to the order of the secretary treasurer of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance, and that secretary endorsed it, would that be regular?

Mr. MANION: I do not think there would be anything irregular in that. I want to see if that was the way it was done, as these gentlemen say they never saw it.

Mr. CARROLL: When the minister brings down that information will he also bring down the order in council of 1921 authorizing the payment of $200,000 out of the canteen fund, also to whom it was paid and for what purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to get the minister's mind in order on a distinction he persists in not seeing. This fund is not a fund over which the government has control. This is a disablement fund, in the hands of an individual, subject to disposition provided in a specific declaration of trust, and the minister has admitted that the Auditor General has no right to deal with the cheques after payment. I do not doubt that he is right. My understanding is that it is a fund over which the government has no control at all, it is not in the Receiver General's hands and the money never was in his hands. It is not under the disposition of the government. It is under the disposition of a private individual who happens to be an officer. The canteen fund on the contrary is a fund in the Receiver General's hands. It may be anticipated that the government feel that the circumstances are such as to justify it, and then submit the matter to parliament. I submit first of all that the government under no circumstances at all had any right to authorize one of its officers to commit a breach of trust. The minister says that there is no breach of trust so long as it is for the general benefit of the ex-service men. If that had been the purpose of the men who gave the money, they would have said so. That was not the purpose at all. The purpose was to assist a certain class of veterans under certain circumstances. For the minister to say that as long as the money goes to some organization that calls itself an alliance, the government's hands are washed of the whole thing, is a very loose view to take of public responsibility, especially in trusteeship. I venture to say that if any individual came before the courts of Canada in that position, his liberty would be short-lived.

Mr. CARROLL: Would not a trustee be allowed to make a legitimate loan of part of these funds?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That depends on the trust deed. As long as he is giving it in terms of the trust deed, all right. But the very order in council shows that this is not the purpose at all. The order in council shows what the money was for and then goes on to say: We will authorize them to use it for something else, on the supposition that it will be subsequently returned.

Mr. CARROLL: It is in the nature of a loan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, but has a bank teller a right to make a loan of the bank's money on the supposition that it will be subsequently returned? Has a bank manager that right?

Mr. CARROLL: He has.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARROLL: Of a trust fund?—yes, of a trust fund.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister, under present circumstances, would have no right to put his hands on the canteen fund and anticipate its return. Inasmuch as parliament has already acted in respect of the matter, whatever parliament's reasons may have been, the minister has no right to impute reasons in the conduct of his office now. Parliament has rejected the proposal of this government to use the canteen fund for this purpose. In the face of that rejection, the government has no right to assume that parliament now would be of another mind. If parliament had never acted in the matter at all, the case would be different; it would come under the general rule. But parliament having acted, the minister is bound to take the will of parliament, and I venture to suggest that the minister would have gone into the canteen fund and presented his cheques to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance, but for the fact that the Auditor General would not have passed the cheques. The Auditor General, in face of the decision of parliament, would not have been justified in passing the cheques. That could not be done; there was someone on guard. So the minister goes about the matter through another official who has charge of another fund over which the government has no control, and he orders the money out of that fund, saying: We will depend upon parliament taking another view of the canteen fund next session.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Did the administrator of this disablement fund, who is the assistant deputy minister of this department, voluntarily pay out this money, or did he make any objection, in writing or otherwise, to the minister?

Mr. BELAND: He made no objection that I remember. Naturally, the man who has this fund in trust would like to keep it as complete as possible. When he makes a loan, he endeavours to secure repayment of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did he get an order in council on any other occasion than this?

Mr. BELAND: I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister will find that he did not.

Mr. CLARK: Has a cheque been drawn at any time and submitted for signature or payment to the Auditor General for any of the amounts mentioned in this order in council, P.C. No. 1596, or any portion of the amount mentioned therein?

Mr. BELAND: I do not think so. That is my opinion.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister secure a definite answer on that subject before this resolution passes?

Mr. BELAND: Surely.

Mr. CLARK: Was the Auditor General requested to pass an appropriation from the canteen fund for this amount or any portion of this amount mentioned in this order in council?

Mr. BELAND: The Auditor General was never requested by this government to pass any amount from the canteen fund.

Mr. CLARK: Does the minister suggest that it was recognized by this House that the canteen fund or any portion of the sum of $100,000 mentioned in paragraph 2 of this resolution should be appropriated for the purposes of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. CLARK: In the face of the minister's answer, "no", to that question, he now suggests to the committee that the government is justified in securing a loan from trust funds for other purposes, to be paid to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance and to be repaid out of the sum of $100,000, which he expects to be voted at this session from the canteen funds. If we pass this resolution, if legislation goes on the statute books relating to this matter, we can readily see the delightful position that these trustees are going to occupy. They are not trustees at all. They are just agents of the government. Whenever the government tells them to hand over $20,000 to any organization whatsoever, they must do so. In fact, even before the trustees are appointed, the government arranges for the approporiation of $20,000 and intimates that when these trustees are appointed, they will impose upon the trustees the duty of paying out that sum of money. Why appoint trustees if the government is going to manage this fund or to dictate to the trustees how the fund is to be spent? The very thought is preposterous that moneys which belong to the returned soldiers of this country are being appropriated by this government for such purposes, or that there is a proposal to that effect.

Mr. BELAND: It is going back to them.

Mr. CLARK: It is going back to them?

Mr. BELAND: Not back—it is going to them.

Mr. CLARK: Does the minister now say that no portion of this sum of $100,000 which he expects to be appropriated from the canteen fund and placed under this central board of three trustees is going to be paid to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance?

Mr. BELAND: If the trustees are willing to reimburse the disablement fund, they may do it, and if they do not choose to reimburse the disablement fund the loan will not be paid, but the amount will have been spent for the benefit of the ex-service men. Does my hon. friend dispute that?

Mr. CLARK: In other words, the minister says that he is not going to exercise any coercion over these trustees, though he has already passed an order in council stating that he will tell these trustees that they must appropriate this $20,000 as soon as they are appointed. Now he says that he will not exercise any coercion over them, and if they refuse, the result will be that the trust funds which have been misappropriated and which belong to the disablement fund will never be repaid.

Mr. BELAND: I do not agree with my hon. friend that the trust funds have been misappropriated in the sense that they have been taken away from the ex-service men.

The CHAIRMAN: The word "misappropriated" has a peculiarly significant meaning. I have been looking it up in Crankshaw. It is not within the range of expressions that may be used in the House of Commons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any charge at all can be laid against a government, and it is against the government that we are laying the charge. You may lay a charge of misappropriation, or theft or anything else against the government.

The CHAIRMAN: I would call the right hon. gentleman's attention—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the Chairman will show me where, under the rules, this cannot be done.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not need to refer to the rules to substantiate the ruling that the expression that has been used is not within the compass of those that may properly be directed against a minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All ministers are responsible for actions of the government, and so long as an expression is directed against the government there can be nothing unparliamentary about it.

The CHAIRMAN: I quite agree with that, but I disagree with the contention that a remark may be directed to a minister questioning the honesty of his own conduct.

Mr. CLARK: When I was interrupted I was about to point out that these moneys belong to the disablement fund and are unquestionably in trust; as recited here, they were subscribed by patriotic citizens during the war to be used generally in the making of small loans to pensioners and others in need of immediate assistance. There is the sole purpose of the fund; that is what it was created for. And here we have a portion of these moneys appropriated and paid to an organization, the minister being unable to give us any details whatever of what it was used for. He cannot tell us whether it was used for the purpose of paying salaries, nor can he assure us that there is any probability of its being returned. He admits, as he must admit in view of the terms of the order in council, that these moneys were taken out of the trust fund, contrary to the express object for which they were subscribed. He attempts to justify that course of action before this committee, yet cannot give us any assurance that the moneys will be repaid, nor can he assure us that the trustees of the canteen fund when appointed will be trustees in fact, free from government control. It is a pretty mess that the minister has got himself into, as far as I can judge.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I merely rise to bring to the attention of the committee something that has taken place in previous years and which probably has been overlooked. I cannot really follow the line of reasoning of our friends to the right on this particular question; perhaps I may be able to follow them in other respects but not on this question. There seems to be a good deal of criticism of the action taken by the minister (Mr. Beland) in allocating certain sums, which were held in trust, to a representative of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance. Personally I would commend the minister on the judgment he used in this matter. It is a well known fact that the Veterans' Alliance have decided amongst themselves to appoint one of their number to speak on their behalf, and before all previous special parliamentary committees which have considered these various questions, the Dominion Veterans' Alliance have had a spokesman. In the majority of cases they have been represented by Mr. MacNeil, who has proved a very admirable representative.

I think that possibly this question has come up to-day much in the same way as a similar question was brought up in 1921, and it would be interesting if hon. members of the committee would refer to the final report on the second part of the investigation which was carried out by what has been called the Ralston commission. Looking over that report I find that the government of that day, that is to say, 1921, passed a good many orders in council along the same line. We need only refer to Nos. 2378, 3648, 3519, 3762, 3647 and many others, which have to do with the allocation by the government of certain funds that were held in trust.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who would allocate them if the government did not?

Mr. HUMPHREY: But the question came up nevertheless as to whether the government had the power to allocate funds which it held in trust and which were the property of the men throughout Canada at that time. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) knows, the question arose in 1921 as to the right of the government to take to itself that authority, and in my opinion the present minister, in allocating say $25,000, in the way that has been indicated, can point to a very strong precedent established in 1921. I think it would be well for hon. gentlemen to read over these orders in council to which I have referred, inasmuch as the question did arise as to what authority the government had in the circumstances. Those moneys at that time were held in trust for the returned men throughout Canada.

Mr. CARROLL: Subject to the action of parliament.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Yes, and practically in the same manner as in the case of the present order in council which has come under discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is not within a mile of the point.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I take it that the two things are similar.

Mr. CARROLL: Can the hon. member tell us what amounts were appropriated in 1921?

Mr. HUMPHREY: I should say, roughly speaking, about $100,000.

An hon. MEMBER: For what purpose?

Mr. HUMPHREY: The various reasons are set forth in the orders in council; moneys were given to every individual returned soldier organization for certain purposes. As I size up the present situation, I should say that there is some similarity between it and the condition I have described as existing in 1921. If the government had authority in the matter then, I should say the government would have the same authority now, subject to the approval of parliament.

Mr. ARTHURS: I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman, but in the former case the government of the day published an order in council and used the canteen fund for the benefit of returned soldiers; in this case the government did not take that action, they went to the Carruthers fund.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Was not the canteen fund at that date held in trust? And is not this practically the same thing?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member complains that he cannot follow the reasoning of this group to his right. I am afraid that I shall have to say in all deference to him that until he gets a lot closer to the subject he can never expect to follow our reasoning. He is off the line altogether. The canteen fund is in a sense a trust fund. This is a trust fund. But the difference is that the government is trustee of the canteen fund; it has nothing to do with this trust fund. I wonder if an officer of this government, say the Deputy Minister of the Interior, were treasurer of the Red Cross fund, would the hon. gentleman say that the government would be quite justified in ordering that man to dip his hand into the Red Cross fund to help out the situation that the government wanted to help out at the moment? Does he think so?

Mr. HUMPHREY: I would hardly think so. But I still question the right of the government in 1921 to dip their hand into the canteen fund.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member questions the action of the government in 1921, why was he a party to the justification of it in voting the money? Because it was right. I am not questioning that action at all, I never did. This House, controlled by a government opposed to us, voted the money, and thereby ratified what we did. Therefore it is a little late now to question our action. The government had to determine, subject to the will of parliament, how to best carry out that trusteeship. The government was trustee, the fund was in the hands of the government and subject to the audit of the Auditor General. In determining what action to take we were subject to the ratification of this House. Here is a fund over which the government has no control at all; it is a fund in the hands of an individual, and the purposes for which it is to be applied are clearly set out in the order in council—for loans and pensions to individual disabled men. That is what the contributors to the fund wanted the money used for. But because the trustee happens to be one of its officers, this government says to that trustee, "Put your hand down in the treasury and give us this money, hand it over to the Veterans' Alliance, because we believe in the purposes of the Alliance."

Mr. HOEY: Had the trustee power to refuse in this case?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I say most frankly he should have refused, no matter who appointed him. A trustee has no justification whatever for taking dictation from the government; the only dictation he should submit to is the dictation of the deed of trust.

Mr. CRERAR: Can anyone here give us the terms of the deed of trust?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it is recited in the order in council:

> The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 12th September, 1924, from the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, representing that the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is the trustee of a fund known as the Disablement Fund, which was contributed by patriotic citizens mainly during the years 1915 and 1916, and that this fund is being used generally for the purpose of small loans to pensioners and others who are in need of immediate assistance and who, in the opinion of the departmental investigations, would benefit by such assistance.

That is the purpose of the fund.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course, that does not give the terms of the trust in full.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no doubt the terms are set out more fully elsewhere, but this gives enough to make it clear that the fund was not intended, for example, for the purpose of a $25,000 loan to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance who were carrying on activities all over Canada, activities for the benefit of the men who were just as well as you and I. Is that a purpose within the meaning of the clause as there defined?

Mr. CRERAR: I am inclined to agree with you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the plainest possible breach of trust. The minister gets this money, over which he had no disposition at all, which does not go before the Auditor General, and consequently is not within the disposition of the government as such, and he says to the trustee, "Use that money for this purpose." Then we are asked to justify it because the funds over which we have control were disposed of in anticipation of the judgment of parliament.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The order in council states that these funds are being generally used for the purpose of assisting individual cases. Does the deed of trust specify that the funds shall be used only for that purpose, or is it simply indicated by the order in council that it is being used generally for that purpose? This seems to me to be an important point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not seen the deed of trust, but on the minister's admission there is a private trustee, there is no trusteeship in the government. Consequently the government had no authority to order the trustee to do this at all. Further, if by any possibility the trustee were justified in using the money to this end, this order in council would never have been necessary. The fact that the order in council exists shows that there was a diversion of the trust fund, and the fact also that the Dominion Veterans' Alliance is to get this money back on a request, as it is put, of these trustees to be appointed, shows it is trust funds that have been diverted.

Mr. MANION: I am going to ask the minister three questions in the hope that he will be able to give me answers to them. These questions, I think, will show the difficult position in which he and the government are placed under certain circumstances. In the first place, suppose the House of Commons, or the Senate, or the Parliament of Canada at this session refuse to pass legislation dealing with the canteen fund, suppose they do as the Senate did last year, throw it out, where is the minister going to get the money to enable Mr. Scammell to recoup his trust fund which money he, on the order of one of his superior officers, loaned to the government to pay salaries or something of the sort? Second, suppose the legislation does pass and these trustees are appointed, and suppose then they refuse to pay back the money, saying, "We had nothing to do with the $25,000 spent last year; we are appointed to deal with the future, not with the past, and we refuse to pay back this money to the trust fund from which it was borrowed," where will the government get the money? Third, suppose that the government cannot get the money to pay it back—I do not know how the government can pay this money back except by getting the proposed legislation enacted and appointing trustees who will be willing to pay it back—if the government do not get the money to pay it back to Mr. Scammell, what position would he be in? —because the order in council distinctly states that this money was in the hands of Mr. Scammell as trustee for the purpose of making small loans to disabled veterans. He would be $25,000 short, and he would certainly be liable personally to the trust fund for that money; I do not think there is any question about that. Will the minister answer those three questions?

Mr. BELAND: The matter reduced to its simplest form is that a loan has been made by Mr. Scammell to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance. That is the fact.

Mr. MANION: Even that fact is disputed.

Mr. BELAND: That the loan has been made?

Mr. MANION: No, the fact is disputed by one of the officers of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance that they ever got the money.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend surely does not seriously contend that the money was not paid to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance?

Mr. MANION: I seriously contend that one of the officers of the—

Mr. BELAND: If my hon. friend will permit me to continue.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend asked me a question; I was going to answer him.

Mr. BELAND: If the money has not been paid it is in the trust fund.

Mr. MANION: Not necessarily, it may have been used for other purposes.

Mr. BELAND: Well, it has been paid out. My hon. friend will admit that?

Mr. MANION: I think probably it has. That is one thing we will admit.

Mr. BELAND: The money has been paid out as a consequence of Mr. Scammell consenting to make a loan to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance. That is admitted also?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Did he consent?

Mr. BELAND: Surely he did; otherwise the loan could not have been made.

Mr. ARTHURS: What about the order in council?

Mr. BELAND: What order in council could force him to make the loan? The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) has stated twice in my hearing that the trustee could have objected and refused to make the loan. That is very clear. He made the loan. My hon. friend questions the payment of this money to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance.

Mr. MANION: I question it—if the minister will allow me to correct him—on the statement of one of the officers who says that the Dominion Veterans' Alliance did not get the money. He does not say that some officer did not get it, but he does say that the Dominion Veterans' Alliance never had the handling of it.

Mr. CRERAR: Who was the officer?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I need answer that.

Mr. BELAND: Somebody must act for the Dominion Veterans' Alliance. You cannot pay the money to a piece of paper bearing on its face "Dominion Veterans' Alliance"; you must pay it to somebody who represents that organization, somebody who is authorized to act for the organization; in this instance I think it must be the secretary treasurer, though I am not absolutely sure about that. It has been made plain to the committee that six or seven different Dominion-wide organizations have got together and formed what is known as the Dominion Veterans' Alliance with a president, a vice president and a secretary treasurer. Mr. MacNeil is the secretary treasurer of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance.

Mr. HOEY: Is he secretary of that organization at the moment?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, I think he is, and has been from the first. He happens to be at the same time, I think, secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association. But it is not for me to say whether he should be in either one place or the other; he happens to be there, and the loan has been made to him. If it is not paid back into the trust fund the trustee will be in the position of having made a loan in the interests of ex-service men to assist them in presenting their claims—disabled men who have claims to present to the department and to the Board of Pension Commissioners. The spirit of the trust is preserved. Does my right hon. friend say that the spirit of the trust is not preserved?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say the spirit of the trust has been brazenly violated.

Mr. BELAND: I do not agree with my right hon. friend. He is very insistent in his assertion that we have violated the trust. Does he say that the canteen fund could be regularly disposed of without action of the Canadian parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The canteen fund, like any other trust fund in the disposition of the government—for the government is trustee of all its funds—can regularly and constitutionally be disposed of in anticipation of parliament. The only question is, are the circumstances so exigent as to demand it—that is all. But that law does not apply and that rule does not apply to a fund over which the government has no control.

Mr. BELAND: The government did not make the loan; the government did not take the money from the trust fund. Representations were made to the minister in charge that the maintenance of a service bureau would be impossible unless assistance was given. The minister in charge, who happened to be myself, asked the man in charge of the fund to make a loan to these people. I did that, and I am not sorry for it; I would do it again because it is right. The loan has been made, and it has served what purpose? It has helped the Dominion Veterans' Alliance, or the men who are in it, to discharge important and useful duties to returned men generally in Canada. That is what has been done with the money.

[Mr. Béland.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was that why the money was given to this trustee?

Mr. BELAND: I believe so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "To discharge important and useful duties to returned men generally in Canada"?

Mr. BELAND: Surely, that is the spirit of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, if the minister cannot see the distinction I am afraid there is no use of proceeding further. That was not the spirit of it at all. What is the sense of talking about the spirit and the letter and all the rest of it? The thing is as plain as words ever were. It is one thing to devote money to a trusteeship, to a trust for the purpose of returned men generally, disabled and undisabled alike, the well-off and the poor alike—that is one thing; but it is a wholly different thing to devote money to a trust for the purposes of disabled men only, for loans to small pensioners and the like who are disabled. Yet the minister stands up and says: We have helped the returned men generally by this action; I am proud of it and I would do it again.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Has not my right hon. friend missed something just as important as the stress he lays upon the making of loans to pensioners only? If the order in council contains a proper quotation of the trust, and I take it that it does—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say pensioners only; I said disabled men.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My right hon. friend is stressing the point that this trust fund was for one purpose only, that of loans to and assistance to pensioners and others in need of funds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Disabled men.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, but it also says, "to others who are in need of immediate assistance," and it says that the decision is not altogether in the hands of the trustee. I would prefer not to say very much about this until I have seen a copy of the trust itself, but I take it that this is a fairly definite statement of what is contained in the trust. Not only that, but it goes on further to say, "who in the opinion of the departmental investigations." Surely my right hon. friend will not contend that one individual, in the person of Mr. Scammell, had the absolute disposition of that fund, to whom he might seek to give it? Loans are specified to individuals and others, and the investigation is to be departmental.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend suggest to the committee that this fund, which is known as the disablement fund, can legally be given in any way to men who are not disabled at all?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know, because I have not seen the deed of trust.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister not bound to know that before he can support this proposal?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am quoting the very words here, in the preamble.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The preamble intimates clearly it cannot.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I differ from my hon. friend. It says "and to others who would benefit by such assistance."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Disabled pensioners and others.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Here is the document. I will hand it to my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good; I have it here too. I do not think it could be called a "disablement fund" to start with if it is a fund for the undisabled. If what the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment says is right, then there is no need of this order at all.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not raising that point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Here is what it says:

> This fund is being used generally for the purpose of small loans to pensioners and others who are in need of immediate assistance and who, in the opinion of the departmental investigations, would benefit by such assistance.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is the point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good; the trustee gets the benefit of the departmental investigations.

Mr. BELAND: Does my right hon. friend still maintain that it is a fund to pensioners?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I never said it was.

Mr. BELAND: My right hon. friend just said that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no; I say it is not for the undisabled—that is, from all the indications here; I have never seen the deed of trust, as I have repeated over and over again.

Mr. BELAND: All who are war disabled are war pensioners.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know some who are not; and there would be disabled men who would be disabled before they would be pensioners, and the fund could be used for them. But I have not seen the deed of trust. I know this, that a fund known as a "disablement fund" may be presumed not to be for the undisabled. Secondly, I know that if it were for all alike, for general purposes, there would have been no need of this order in council at all.

Mr. BELAND: As far as I am concerned I will say this: No loan was made from the disablement fund with my consent or at my request before I had secured from the chief donator and Sir Arthur Currie an expression of their views, and their view is that it can be used for an adjustment bureau.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say he has that from Mr. Carruthers?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, it was secured from him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it in writing?

Mr. BELAND: I think I can have it in writing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would be very glad to get it.

Mr. BELAND: At all events it was requested from him and he expressed his view, as did Sir Arthur Currie also. Does my hon. friend say Sir Arthur Currie did not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know anything about that, nor do I care. What matters is the deed of trust, and that deed of trust Sir Arthur Currie and no other man can change.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend is an adroit and skilful lawyer—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. BELAND: Yes, everybody will grant him that, but upon this point, although he has used all his adroitness and his skill, he cannot succeed in putting the minister wrong. My view is that the Dominion Veterans' Alliance was discharging a useful and important duty to pensioners and to other service men in need of assistance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nobody denies that.

Mr. BELAND: Well then, we agree perfectly. The loan was requested from Mr. Scammell—I could not authorize the loan—for the purpose of discharging those very purposes.

Mr. MANION: Is Mr. Scammell satisfied, if the legislation does not pass and the money does not come back, that he has lived up to his duties as trustee of this fund?

Mr. BELAND: I think so.

Mr. MANION: Then, if the minister has finished, I would like to differ. I am not an adroit lawyer as he says my right hon. leader is.

Mr. BELAND: Oh, don't complain.

Mr. MANION: I am not complaining; I am rather glad I am not. But I want to point out that the order in council distinctly says, if this is taken from the charter or trust deed, that this disablement fund is being used generally for purposes of small loans. The Minister of the Interior read just beyond that. It is loans to pensioners and others who are in immediate need.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Read it all.

Mr. MANION: The minister would not call $25,000 a small loan.

Mr. BELAND: They are small loans if they are spread over two or three years.

Mr. MANION: It was not spread over two and a half years. The smallest amount paid out was $5,000. The small loans referred to here are loans of ten or twenty or thirty or at the most fifty dollars to pensioners who have got into difficulty. The minister knows full well that very many times a pensioner for some reason or other does not get his pension when it is due, not due to any fault on the part of the officials, but that sometimes happens. I have had dozens of chaps come into my office whose pensions were two or three months over-
5 p.m. due, and then all would be paid the arrears in one cheque. I am not blaming the department for that; it would probably happen if I were in charge. But take a man like that who gets into difficulties over his board bill and needs immediate assistance. He can come to this fund for assistance to the extent, I would say, of $25, or $50 at the most. It was cases of that kind that were spoken of as small loans, not $3,000 or $5,000 for another department altogether. If the minister says he is perfectly satisfied with what he has done, and would be perfectly satisfied if the money was not returned, I think Mr. Scammell must be very uneasy; if I were in his shoes I would be very nervous about the disablement fund if the minister would be perfectly satisfied if the government did not pay the amount back.

Mr. BELAND: Mr. Scammell is like my hon. friend; he is not nervous.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: I think he should be nervous. I hope the minister will bring that trust deed down; he has had plenty of time to bring it down already and he should let us know exactly what that money was for. When the trust deed is here we shall be able to discuss the matter much more intelligently. If only small loans were to be made, there has been an absolute breach of trust in giving out $25,000 from that fund for any other purpose than the purpose laid out here. I venture the assertion that the minister when outlining this order in council, if the charter or trust deed had permitted these moneys to be used for such purposes as this, would have shown his good common sense by putting that in the order in council; but it distinctly says it was for small loans. So unless the trust deed shows a good deal more than this shows, there has been an absolute breach of trust in handing out $25,000 to any organization.

Mr. BELAND: Read it.

Mr. MANION: I will read the whole thing to put it on record:

> The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 12th September, 1924, from the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment representing that the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment—

That is Mr. Scammell.

> —is the trustee of a fund known as the disablement fund which was contributed by patriotic citizens mainly during the years 1915 and 1916 and that this fund is being used generally for the purpose of small loans to pensioners and others who are in need of immediate assistance and who, in the opinion of the departmental investigations, would benefit by such assistance.

I do not see any other interpretation but that what was meant was small loans of ten or twenty or thirty or perhaps up to fifty dollars to pensioners or others in need of immediate assistance. Certainly by no stretch of the imagination can you include under that clause payments for the salaries, which I presume this money was used for, of the officers of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance or of the Great War Veterans' Association or any other body.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The speech of my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Manion) is based entirely on the alleged contents of a document about which this committee has been talking for over an hour, but which it has never seen and knows nothing about.

Mr. MANION: That is the minister's fault.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The minister dealing with this question cannot get papers out of his office in such an easy way as my hon. friend thinks. The whole question is, under what terms and conditions does Mr. Scammell hold this money known as the disablement fund?

Mr. MANION: He is in the gallery.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not care where he is; what difference does it make? Surely this committee is going to wait until it sees this document which constitutes the trust deed before we express an opinion one way or the other. I think, Mr. Chairman, we might well have saved the time that has been taken up by this discussion for the last hour, in which suggestions and insinuations have been made here and there as to what was done with this money, in view of the fact that nobody in this committee knows what the terms of the trust are.

Mr. STEVENS: Would it not be better if the usual procedure had been followed that obtains in the case of resolutions of this kind and estimates in committee, when the minister has one of his officials on the floor to advise him on questions which we all frankly admit it is difficult for the minister to anticipate.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That is something that every minister will have to decide for himself. The point I wanted to make is this: I think this committee might well have awaited the receipt of this trust deed and found out its terms and conditions before expressing a hasty opinion. I want to say further that it is a fact that Sir Arthur Currie, about whose interest in this matter nobody can have any doubt, has stated that he knew no better purpose for which the money in this disablement fund could be used than maintaining this adjustment service.

Mr. DOUCET: Does that make it right?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I think hon. gentlemen might well have hesitated to make insinuations when he approved of the money being used in that way.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Have you a written opinion from Sir Arthur Currie?

Mr. BELAND: If we have, do you agree with it?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am very doubtful if he gave it. I have too high an opinion of his good judgment to think he would give such an opinion, if the details were explained to him. I would like to see an opinion from Sir Arthur Currie in writing. Has the department such a document?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Hon. members seem to have got into a suspicious frame of mind. When I say that Sir Arthur Currie stated that he knew no better purpose for which the fund could be used than this scheme hon. members say they do not believe he said it. I say he did say it, and I say further—and I think the committee will agree with me—that the proper way is to wait and see what occurred with this trust deed.

Mr. HANSON: Assume this is a trust for disabled soldiers, does the minister suggest that by any stretch of the imagination these funds should be loaned to the War Veterans' Association for the purpose of paying salaries which the members of that association have not interest enough to pay?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is a lawyer and a very distinguished one, and he knows that he could not expect me or any other person to express an opinion upon any question with so many presumptions and whereases as he has put in this question. I will wait until I see the document.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): If in the opinion of the minister, the government and Sir Arthur Currie the terms of the trust agreement have not been violated, and the money has been appropriated to a proper cause, why pay it back? Why not leave it as it is? Why pass such an order as has come to light since this debate began? And why dip into the canteen fund to take money to pay back this money which has been—the word "misappropriated" has been used but has been objected to—improperly withdrawn from the disablement fund? If the government was not doing wrong in using that fund, why pay it back? Let it go. Eventually that disablement fund must be expended and dissipated. If reasonable and proper expenditure has been made of part of it, let it go, and if not why go into the canteen funds to get money to pay it back? Let the government put it in the estimates and put it through in the regular way. There is no reason on earth why the canteen fund should be used to pay back the money paid to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend will remember that a certain amount, namely $100,000, was set aside in the bill last year for the purpose of maintaining an adjustment bureau, and that bill never became law. It was understood to be the unanimous desire of the House of Commons that $100,000 should be used for the purpose of maintaining a service bureau. The trustee of the fund, without questioning the use of a certain amount of money for the maintenance of the bureau, suggested perhaps that it should be repaid to him, because he makes loans with the idea of being repaid, and the provision in the order in council is, if possible, that this trustee should be paid the loan he has made at my suggestion.

Mr. CLARK: What is the total amount in that fund?

Mr. BELAND: $100,000.

Mr. CLARK: And this is 25 per cent of the total fund—a small loan.

Mr. BELAND: Although the amount of the fund is now $100,000, there is a great deal of money which has been loaned, and some small loans are outstanding and some written off.

Mr. CLARK: What was the biggest loan previously made?

Mr. BELAND: I have no idea.

Mr. CLARK: When the minister brings the agreement this evening, will he also bring with him the details of the expenditure of $25,000 and the exact name and position held by the payee of the cheque?

Mr. BELAND: I will give the name of the payee, of course.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister answer my question?

Mr. BELAND: I will give the name of the payee. I cannot supply him with all the information he desires.

Mr. CLARK: Can he supply the committee now or at a later time with the details of the expenditure of this money advanced to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance?

Mr. BELAND: I will try to do that.

Mr. CLARK: Did I understand the minister to inform the committee that the House of Commons passed a resolution for the distribution of the canteen fund before any loan was made by the trustee of the disablement fund to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance?

Mr. BELAND: No, I never said that.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister give me the date when Sir Arthur Currie approved of this scheme?

[Mr. Beland.]

Mr. BELAND: I will try and get it.

Mr. CLARK: Is it in writing?

Mr. BELAND: It is in writing.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister bring that letter.

Mr. BELAND: I do not say I will bring the letter, but I will quote the passage that refers to that matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We want the letter.

Mr. BELAND: If Sir Arthur Currie treats with subjects which have no relation to the disablement fund, my hon. friend would not insist on my producing that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps not, but I can hardly conceive of his dealing with an important matter of a trustee like this in the body of a general letter. It is the rule of the House that if the minister lays on the table of the House any letter or document, or reads it, he must read the whole of it.

Mr. BOYS: Was the deed of trust submitted to Sir Arthur Currie when he gave his opinion? I can understand him expressing a view as to what might be done with a certain fund which was not ear marked in some way, but if it was to be disposed of according to the terms of a trust agreement, one would think that he should see that agreement before he could express an opinion that would be of any value. I would like to know from my hon. friend (Mr. Beland) or from the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Macdonald) whether he ever saw the agreement.

Mr. BELAND: I cannot give an answer to the question as to whether he ever saw it.

Mr. BOYS: I suppose my hon. friend will agree with me that if he had not seen the trust agreement his opinion would be of no value. The Minister of Militia and Defence has said that he or no other intelligent person should be asked to give an opinion without seeing the trust agreement; therefore it is most vital to know whether he saw it, because if he did not his opinion would not be of any consequence. I want the minister to bring certain papers with him. I take it for granted that when a loan involving $25,000 is made by the trustee of the fund there will be a contract of some description under which the money will be repaid whether with or without interest, and stating when it shall be repaid and by whom. I would ask him to bring such a contract with him if there is one. You can hardly imagine that the minister or the trustee on his advice would loan that money to any association without some document providing for repayment.

The minister points out that these loans are made under the trust agreement. I would ask the minister to look at the very words of the first paragraph of the order in council—and I am assuming they were used intentionally and deliberately; that they properly indicate in a measure at all events the purposes of the trust—and say if it is not perfectly plain that the intention there is that the trustees should make these loans to individuals for the benefit of individuals, and if he can find anything in the language used in the order in council which would warrant the giving of that money to an association and not to the individuals who are intended to benefit by it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If my hon. friend will more closely scrutinize the order in council from which he is quoting, he will see that it does not purport to quote the terms of the trust deed, but that it goes on to say that this money under the disablement fund is now being used for the purpose of making small loans.

Mr. BOYS: I absolutely agree with what the minister says, but I think I have a right to assume that in so using it, they are using it in accordance with the declaration of trust, and surely the minister would be one of the last to ask me to come to any different conclusion. When, in the Privy Council, of which he is a member, this language is used, surely he is not going to suggest that the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Beland) in introducing this order in council and asking to have it passed is intimating that this money is being used for purposes not authorized by the declaration of trust?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No.

Mr. BOYS: If it is for purposes authorized by the trust as are indicated in the order in council, surely it is manifest that the money is intended for individual benefit and use and not for the use of any association.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That might be only one of the purposes of the trust. There might be many other purposes in the trust. We had better wait until we see the trust deed.

Mr. ARTHURS: I think we are wasting time, because it is very unlikely that this resolution will pass before the minister has brought down certain information. A couple of weeks ago I asked the minister whether or not an order in council had been passed diverting funds from the canteen fund for other purposes. The answer of the minister was no. If, however, the minister is right in his premises to-day, that answer was wrong, because he is seeking to recoup the disablement fund from the canteen fund. At least the order in council refers to the canteen fund indirectly. The request has been made to-day by myself and others that the trust deed be produced before we go any further with this debate. I believe the minister now nods his head when he says that $25,000 has been paid. Only an hour or two ago he would not admit that $15,000 had been paid over to the Dominion Veterans' Alliance. I should like to ask how much has been paid, to whom, on whose recommendation and for what purpose it was paid. I should also like to ask the minister if he can produce a record of any case in which this government or any previous government has passed an order in council directing a private trustee to divert funds whether for the benefit of the government or anybody else.

Mr. BELAND: I do not know that any order in council has been passed prior to this, disposing of the disablement fund or any portion of it. But I was referring a few minutes ago to the canteen fund and my right hon. friend stopped me at a point when I was asking him whether he thought it was regular that the government should apportion to soldiers' organizations large amounts of the canteen funds without the authority of parliament. The canteen funds are made up of moneys which belong to the returned men, to all those who served overseas. By what stretch of imagination can the leader of the opposition contend that it is regular to dispose of the canteen funds by order in council when this parliament is sitting, and every year when it had been sitting in 1919, in 1920 and in 1921, only a month, I think, before the first disposal of the canteen fund was made? Does he think this is quite regular?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will answer very directly, but first of all I cannot help commenting on the minister's wondering as to the morality of disposing of the canteen funds under the government's charge, but having no doubt about the morality of disposing of the disablement fund which was not under their charge at all. I have stated repeatedly that any fund under the charge of the government may be disposed of in anticipation of the will of parliament. There is no hindrance save that the Auditor General must be convinced that the exigent circumstances require it to be done. If the government fails to get the authority of parliament for what it has done, the government goes out of office. That applies to the canteen fund as well as to all other funds of which the government is trustee. This House at this session will be asked repeatedly to vote money which this government has paid out of funds of which it is trustee in anticipation of the will of parliament. That is what was done in 1921. That is what this government is doing this year. That, I do not criticize. It is all a matter of the nature of the circumstances which demand it. This is a matter in another category wholly, as I have sought to explain. I do not wish to prolong the discussion further. I am only too anxious to see the terms of his declaration of trust. What we have now indicates that a breach has been committed. When we get the full terms it will not matter what anybody, however dignified, may have said as to the merits of the Dominion Veterans' Alliance. I had never attacked the Dominion Veterans' Alliance or any organization under it. They serve a purpose that is perfectly laudable and right, but because a fund is a trust fund devoted to a certain purpose, you cannot justify diverting it to another by merely saying that the other purpose is very laudable and good.

Mr. HUMPHREY: At the rate the government of the day, during the few months prior to November 1921, were disbursing the funds they held in trust for the returned men, the minister, had they been returned to power, would not have been able to bring a measure before parliament to provide for the disposition of any $2,000,000 because the late government were paying out these funds at the rate of from $25,000 to $50,000 a month.

Mr. BOYS: Anything wrong with that?

Mr. HUMPHREY: In my opinion, yes. I was not here at the time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member was here when that was ratified.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Public Works—salaries and contingencies, $689,655.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): Perhaps I had better make a brief statement in explanation of the items before the committee, comparing them with the estimate passed last year. There is a reduction of $18,665. The estimate last year was $633,320 for salaries, but we are asking this year for $614,655 for the same purpose. There has been a decrease of four in the number of positions, due to the following reasons. Ten positions were dropped from civil government owing to retirements and resignations. This is offset in part by two new appointments, one a position which was dropped last year but which is revived for 1925-26, and three transfers from the Ottawa building repairs vote. Two new positions, are provided for namely, a clerk-typist and an office appliance operator; but the position was revived of assistant to general superintendent of telegraph service. This makes a net decrease of four. It might be wise to explain how the reduction is made up, accounting for the reduction in the estimate this year. Three positions were reclassified, at a reduction of $1,180; one vacancy was reduced to the minimum, making a reduction of $360; there were five deaths accounting for a saving of $1,290; there were ten resignations, accounting for $9,750, twelve retirements, $15,535, twenty promotions in connection with which there was a decrease of $5,970; and one position abolished at $300, making a total decrease of $34,385. The increases are due to three positions re-classified, accounting for $435, sixteen transfers from other appropriations, making an increase of $2,415; two new positions and one position revived, making an increase of $4,200; one hundred and three statutory increases totalling $8,670. In other words, the grand total of the increases is $15,720, which being deducted from the total reduction of $34,385, represents a net decrease of $18,665.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the particulars in regard to the ten resignations and the twelve retirements, having reference to superannuation and pensions?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The position of curator of prints has been dropped.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What has become of the individual?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He resigned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is he getting a pension?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. The position of construction architect has also been dropped. There is no pension in that case, the employee having resigned. The position of principal clerk is not to be filled. This was a resignation with a retiring allowance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The position of clerk stenographer, in which case there was a resignation, is being refilled at the minimum salary. No pension.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have no information in regard to the one in which there was a retiring allowance. That is part of the expenditures.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I thought I would give a summary later on dealing with the whole matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That will do just as well if it is more convenient to the minister.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have a statement covering the whole service, showing the amount of retirement allowances and pensions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the minister's department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. The position of junior clerk stenographer, resigned, is being filled at the minimum salary making a saving of $165. The position of clerk-stenographer, also resigned, is being filled at the minimum salary; the same in the position of junior clerk typist. The position of messenger clerk is being re-classified as that of office boy, accounting for a saving of $700. The position of junior file clerk, which is now under transfer, will be placed in the minimum class. As to the question of retirements and annuities, I have a table showing the amounts paid from the year 1921 down to the year 1924. There have been in all 351 retirements during the four years, the number last year being 186.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): All in civil government?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not all, no. The gratuities paid during the four years totalled $84,409.60; for the year 1924 they amounted to $42,935.99. The annuities for the four years amounted to $132,530.31; for the year 1924 the total was $75,614.24. Salaries of positions abolished amount for the four years to $207,949.52; for the year 1924, $60,651.86. Of the total number of 351 persons retired, 269 were over sixty; the other retirements were due to ill health.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not quite catch the effect of all that was said, but if I caught one figure correctly it was that the amount of annual pensions inside and out, as I caught it, was $75,614 in the one year. Is that correct?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend give me the annuities for the past four years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): For 1920-21, $15,011.47; for 1922, $22,391.21; for 1923, $19,510.39; for 1924, $75,617.24. Fifty-seven retired in 1920-21; fifty-four in 1922; fifty-four in 1923, and one hundred and eighty-six in 1924.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that an annual payment, or is it got rid of now for all time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is an annual payment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I take it that that represents pensions.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I gave the gratuities for the four years; they amounted to $84,409.68.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So we are now paying in pensions for this department $76,614. While we have a saving this year of $18,000, of course this has only to do with the inside service. To be fair to my hon. friend, he would have a further credit in the lower amount asked for the outside service this year as compared with last year. Has he those figures handy?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The statement covers both the inside and outside service of the Public Works department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I appreciate that fact, but I want to be fair to my hon.. friend. He has given me the information which makes for expense in connection with pensions, and as against that he points to a net saving of $18,000 on the inside service.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is the reduction in the amount asked for to carry the service for another year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I understand the figures, there is a saving of approximately $18,000 on the inside service. Now, as we have the plus of the $75,000 and the $80,000 odd in gratuities covering the whole service, it would be in the interest of my hon. friend to now give us the comparative figures for the outside service this year and last year, so we can see how pensions, gratuities and salaries are running along one with the other.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The positions abolished in the whole department through retirements effected a saving of $207,949.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Were not those positions refilled?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, they were abolished. That is for the four years. For the last year there would be a saving of $60,651.86. I do not think I have the data that would cover my hon. friend's question. We are not dealing with the outside service in this vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All I want, Mr. Chairman, is what pensions are costing the inside and outside services respectively.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the inside and outside services separated.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has given the total in one case, and a section in the other, which does not cover it at all. Take for example the saving that is said to have been accomplished?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The saving in the inside service of the Public Works department by positions abolished through retirement is $12,305.55 for 1924.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand that is the figure for annual pensions payable in respect of resignations and retirements accepted up to the present time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I do not think that is right. It is under the head of annuities and salaries of successors. I think we can give the annuities. They are: Engineer public works, grade 2, $2,215; engineer public works, grade 1, $1,740; head clerk, $739.56; architectural modeller, $680; principal clerk, $1,064; assistant tester of building material, $1,050; draftsman, $771.66; file clerk, $840; second file clerk, $498.33; junior architect, $952; senior stenographer, $1,005; photographer, $750. These are all annual payments.

Mr. ANDERSON: To what extent is the superannuation fund in the minister's department self-sustaining?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Most of these retirements are under the Calder Act. As to the fund maintaining itself, I have not that information.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understood the minister to say that these were annual payments?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: They are under the Superannuation Act, are they?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are all under the Calder Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid that is incorrect. The Calder Act was not a superannuation act proper; it was not a permanent act. If all these payments are annual payments they cannot be under the Calder Act. As it is near six o'clock, I suggest to my hon. friend that he have a statement prepared during the dinner hour showing, first, all cash bonuses, gratuities or other payments following suspension of service, including those under the Calder Act, and, second all annual payments under the different superannuation acts. I think these annual payments ought to be separately classified. It is not fair to the department to do otherwise, because it makes it look as if the department is costing more than it really is. We would like to know exactly, on the one hand, what it has cost to get the service reorganized to the extent that it has been reorganized, under all the different methods, and, on the other hand, the saving involved. If we have this at eight o'clock we can deal with this matter in a short time instead of having perhaps half an hour or more of cross-examination.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think we could prepare a statement that would show the matter any more fully than the statement we have before us now. We have shown the retirements for four years, the annual payments for each year, the amounts of salaries dropped on account of abolition of positions, and the retirements from the inside service. Under the Calder Act annual payments were made to many who retired under its provisions, so that it was not merely a matter of cash payments or gratuities. I will try to have a statement prepared if my hon. friend desires it, but I do not think we could state the facts any more clearly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite content to take as final from this department the statement that they are paying out in pensions $75,617, if the minister thinks he is doing himself justice by letting it go at that. But if that is correct he is running up in a very short time a rather alarming burden upon the country. We have $42,000 in superannuation payments in the one year—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The $42,000 was for gratuities and the $75,617.24 for annual payments.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought the $42,000 was the amount of annual payments for the year before last. What was the corresponding figure, then, for the annual payments during the year before?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There were 54 retirements in 1923, involving annual payments amounting to $19,510.39.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So we jump from an annual cost of $19,510 in 1923 to an annual cost of $75,617 in 1924; is that right?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Your cost depends entirely on the number retired and the amounts they draw. There were 57 retirements in 1920-21; this year there are 186.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister give us the average age of those retired, so that we may get an idea of how long this will go on?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That can be had in the department, yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Of the 186 retirements of last year, some were made under the Superannuation Act of 1924?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, none.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Was the $75,000 paid last year in respect of retirements that took place last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Can the minister give us the total payments made last year to those retired last year as well as to those who had been retired in previous years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have not that information, but it could be obtained in the Finance department. The information could be procured if the House desires it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Would it be fair to assume that the figures for the last four years given by the minister, 57 retirements amounting to $15,000 and 54 retirements amounting to $22,000, are annual payments?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Except in the case of death, which of course would reduce the payments. Many of these men are old, and some of them are dying. The payments in 1922 amounted to $14,510.30. I have no doubt that the annual payment to-day would be very much less on account of the men who were retired that year, because there will have been deaths among them.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): But the annual payments made under superannuation last year would be much greater than $75,000. The total would almost be the sum of the payments that have been made in all the previous years, except for those who have died.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): And the minister has not the total.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, that does not come within our department, but under the Department of Finance. I understood there was to be a statement presented to the House showing the retirements under the Superannuation Act. The figures I have given relate only to the Public Works department.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Year by year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have on my desk the list of retirements from all the departments, but it does not give the information asked for. I asked that it should also state the amount paid into the fund by those persons who have been retired. That information is not given, and it is very necessary to have it in order that we may see if the fund is self-sustaining. Do I understand that there were no payments made by the civil servants into the superannuation fund under the Calder Act?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. CALDWELL: In what year was the Calder Act passed and how many retirements were made under it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In 1920 I think. There have been 351 retirements from this department under that act.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think we passed a very unwise superannuation act last year, but if it should be criticized, the Calder Act should be absolutely condemned. Any superannuation act to provide pensions for civil servants who contribute nothing towards making up a pension fund I think is absolutely unsound. I have criticized the act of last year before and I shall do so again at some future time. I think it was unsound because it was not on an actuarial basis. I think in almost every case you will find that the civil servant who retires at sixty-five, and who is drawing a salary averaging $3,500 for the past ten years, will draw out more in two years than he paid in in thirty-five years. Unfortunately I was unable to speak on the bill last year. I intended to do so, but it had got through committee and was up for its third reading when I happened to come into the House from a committee meeting I had been attending, and I did not have the opportunity to speak. I think last year's act was unsound, and the Calder Act much worse. I think there were one or two superannuation acts under which we were working previous to 1924. Was any payment made by the civil servants under those old acts?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think so.

Mr. CALDWELL: Can you give us the details?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the details.

Mr. CALDWELL: I suppose we can get that information.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Finance department can furnish that, when the Finance estimates are before the House. The suggestion my hon. friend has made regarding the list before him I will bring to the attention of the minister with a view to having the list supplemented.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would urge very strongly that this list be printed so that it will be available to hon. members. It is not in a convenient form to get at, and is hard to copy as it is. It would not cost much to print. It would be valuable as a matter of reference, and I think we should have it. Before the list is printed it should be supplemented, showing in detail the payments that have been made into the fund.

Mr. MILLAR: Is any member of this House also receiving a retiring allowance under the Calder Act? I have heard that charge made.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not to my knowledge.

Mr. MILLAR: I have heard that charge made publicly in one of our churches, and I just wanted to know whether it was true or not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That must have been a long way out in the west.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1924-25

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting further supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1925, as presented by the Hon. J. A. Robb, (Acting Minister of Finance) read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to committee of Supply.

[Mr. Caldwell.]

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Agriculture—Experimental Farms, $1,440,000.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Probably it would facilitate the work of the committee if I were to give a short explanation of the increase of $40,000 over last year. This has to be utilized for specific purposes. One of these is the extension of the Harrow tobacco farm which was undertaken last summer. This was formerly a small tobacco station, but the work has extended into the growing and breeding of corn, and it was found desirable to add about 200 acres to the farm. The sum of $10,000 will be used for the purpose of getting the farm in shape, plotting it out, making roads through it and doing all the things necessary to carry on experimental work. A similar amount is being expended at Invermere, where a small farm existed, and was organized ten or twelve years ago with the idea of developing it as a fruit farm. The altitude, however, was too great and the temperature too low to be suitable for fruit-growing purposes. Therefore we are developing that also into a general farm. For this purpose something like 300 acres was transferred from the Soldier Settlement Board. It was some soldier settlement land that had lasped back to the department. This land was transferred to the Experimental Farm branch, and this made the necessary addition to convert the Invermere farm into a regularly constituted farm. This farm is in an irrigation area, and well adapted for potato growing, poultry raising and so on. Some buildings were erected on it last year, but this $10,000 is to develop the farm, complete the fencing and ditching, and provide the general equipment, so that it may be utilized for the purpose intended.

A further $10,000 of this amount is to be used for the establishment of additional illustration stations. We find that we have all kinds of ideas regarding experimental farms. Some people have no use for a little illustration station. They would not be bothered with it in their neighbourhood. They see a post in the ground with a board on it stating it is a Dominion illustration station, and when you speak of these stations they look upon them with disdain. They want a great big farm of 300 acres fully equipped with stock and buildings, and they have no use for these little farms. There is another class of people that have no use for the regular large experimental farm. They say: They are run by the government and therefore they cannot be much good; the men are paid salaries by the government; they do not work very hard and they are looking for sundown and their salaries. So these people think that such farms are not of much account. They want a small farm, an illustration station. We find, however, that the kind of farm work that is increasing in popularity more than any other is these small illustration stations consisting of forty acres that the government does not buy but merely rents from a resident settler that is of an experimental turn of mind. We enter into a contract with him, renting his property at five dollars an acre, supplying seed and everything else required for working out experiments best adapted to that area. These are particularly popular in the soldier settlement areas. Some of these boys that have taken up farming have been rather unfortunate in their location, sometimes, perhaps, through the fault of nobody in particular. But they are having a hard struggle and are just able to wiggle along. These men appreciate very much any assistance that can be given to them in the way of demonstrating the best method of conducting farming operations in their particular district. I have more especially in mind a number of illustration stations established in Manitoba around Dauphin that have been very beneficial to these soldier settlers who are starting out anew and who are badly involved, without much experience and in need of some assistance from the government. These illustration stations seem to be filling a real need and appealing to a large number of people who like to see work done by what we call a dirt farmer himself, a man on the land that they know, working out these problems without the halo of having a government salary associated with him. That is just an idea that some people have and they derive a great deal of benefit from these little illustration stations On the other hand, others receive greater benefit from the larger experimental farms and would not thank you for the little ones. There is $10,000 for that, $10,000 for the Harrow farm, $10,000 for the tobacco and corn farm, and $10,000 for the extension of the Invermere farm. If we have the money to spare, we have thought of re-establishing a tobacco station at L'Assomption in the county of Montcalm-Terrebonne. There was a tobacco station there some years ago on rented property, but the land did not prove suitable for growing tobacco. Tobacco growing requires a special character of light soil, and there are in Canada only a few such places, one of them being in the Windsor country in Essex county and two or three places in Quebec which are peculiarly adapted for growing tobacco. We are thinking of devoting $5,000 to the re-establishment of a tobacco farm there if we have the money for that purpose, and we think we shall have that by exercising a little economy in other directions. The farm was never re-established during the war period and so we are taking it up now. These are the explanations regarding the increases.

With regard to the experimental farm system proper which consists of the Central experimental farm at Ottawa and something like twenty-three branch farms, the Central experimental farm is spoken of as a farm. We think of it as a farm, but it is really a research agricultural bureau with branch activities in different parts of Canada. Not over one-half of the money that is devoted to the Central experimental farm is spent on the farm proper. Out of the moneys expended there over $300,000 are devoted to research work in the various branch farms throughout Canada, but the money is charged up to the Central farm. The sum of $107,000 is devoted to running this farm itself and when you deduct the revenues derived from it, amounting to $65,000, which are returned to the treasury, that leaves a net balance of thirty-two thousand dollars odd against the Central experimental farm. This Central farm has not had its farm areas extended since its organization something like forty years ago. Part of the land has been taken up for an arboretum, part for extensive lawns and borders, shelter beds, orchards and vegetable gardens, so that the farm proper now is reduced to about 235 acres, or about one-half of the original acreage. Therefore, it stands very much in need of extension for farming purposes.

With regard to branch farms, our policy, since I have had the responsibility of trying to guide the destinies of these institutions, has been not to establish any more branch farms until we had the old twenty-three in better shape. I believe that has been the correct policy. It is not an easy matter to carry it out. The government that preceded us started nine new branch farms in different parts of Canada, a number in the Maritimes and a number in the west. The government that preceded that again started nine branch farms. The government responsible for starting these farms, that led by Sir John A. Macdonald, started five, making in all twenty-three farms. We have stopped establishing new farms until such time that we get the others already established in reasonably good shape. That is speaking generally as to the situation. If we come back again to the Central experimental farm, if members of the committee interested in the matter, should so desire, I will give the subdivisions of the work that goes on at the Central farm showing the nature of the research work. Hundreds and thousands of experiments are conducted from year to year, and I shall be glad to give some of the results therefrom, if hon. members so desire. These are the subdivisions: Chemistry, horticulture, cereals, botany, animal husbandry, field husbandry, tobacco, poultry, agristology, bacteriology, illustration stations, extension and publicity, bees, fibre plants. The total amount expended under these various subdivisions I can give, but I had better leave it where it is and let members of the committee ask what they desire as to these particular subdivisions, or any work regarding the branch farms or illustration stations, or any other matters they may desire information about.

Mr. HANSON: Is this the vote under which the new residence for the superintendent at Fredericton is being built?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. That comes out of the Public Works vote. There is a vote later on in Public Works for new buildings. Part of the work is, however, being done by the experimental farm regular labour and charged up to the Public Works vote. The work, as I think my hon. friend knows, has been under way for ten years, since the year of the war. Last year we conceived the idea of cleaning up some rough land that was an eyesore from the railway and using the stone from that to build a residence for the superintendent. They had not enough to finish it last year, so we hoped to complete it another year. The same force of men that cleaned the land was used to build the house. There is a way of adjusting the accounts

Mr. HANSON: I was wondering why it was that the minister departed from the well-accepted principle of having work of this kind done by tender, and not by day labour. The minister did us the honour of visiting us the summer before last, and I understood that he left instructions to have this work done by day labour. I was just wondering why.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was the reason. It would be pretty hard to get a contractor to go grubbing around in this rough land, hunting up the stones. If he did, I think he would charge up pretty sweetly for it. There is a popular idea too that a contract is always the cheapest, but that is not necessarily so. In this particular instance better value all round was obtained in the way the work was done, having regard to the peculiar material that was used and especially in view of the difficulty we should have experienced in getting the contractor to clean up the land. As it was, the same force that cleaned the land supplied the material for the building, so that they had an interest in getting the best stones they could for the work as well as in cleaning up the place at the same time for the plough.

Mr. HANSON: That is not very convincing, if the minister will allow me to say so. I do not complain particularly but I wondered why there was a departure from the general principle. I have no doubt that the minister could have secured competent contractors in the city of Fredericton to build the house just as it is being put up now, and it would not have been necessary to send out of the immediate community to look for labourers. As far as I am aware, there was not a local stone cutter employed; men were brought from the north shore of New Brunswick to put up the building under the plea that local men were not available. I do not think that this was the fact.

Mr. BROWN: From what vote is the money to be taken for further research into the rust problem?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That comes under "Administration of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act." With regard to the question raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson), I would point out to him that it takes experience of a special kind to build a wall out of field stone. Some masons will not put a hammer on it at all; they insist on having quarried stone to work on. These being field stones I presume it was found necesary to get outside men who were familiar with this kind of material.

Mr. HANSON: That may be, I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest that the idea which the public has, that it is better to have tender and contract, is likely the product of the speeches of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) and others in the last parliament.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was not here; I think I have read something about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is not guilty; he never had any such heterodox views himself.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I used to have when I was younger and less familiar with these things. Speaking generally, though, I presume that the contract is the proper method; but it does not always get the best results by any means.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister means, not the best results politically.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had no thought of that this time. Sometimes, however, the intense desire of the contractor to get the contract induces him to bid too low and he either skimps the job or gets into difficulties before he is half through. I am merely defending the day labour system under these peculiar circumstances, and I add, too, that it often proves better even under more favourable conditions. The popular idea of course is that the only right way is the contract way.

Mr. MILLAR: There is a line of work I have been urging the minister to take up in connection with experimental farms and I am glad to see that something is being done in this direction. Yesterday I received a notice indicating that the Civil Service Commission is applying for a horticulturist for the Indian Head experimental farm. I believe that more money devoted to that work would bring good results, for it is research work that would certainly prove beneficial. I have here a clipping showing something of what is being done in the west at the present time. There are some gentlemen in this House who believe that the west is unable to grow fruit; I am sorry that the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) is not present, because I remember his making a reference to this supposition a short time ago. This clipping is short and I shall read it. It has to do with the work of Mr. Tate P. Stevenson of Manitoba, and reads:

RUSSIAN FRUITS THRIVE IN WEST

Varieties Introduced by Pioneer Manitoba Horticulturist Are Still Bearing

In front of the old Stevenson home near Morden, Manitoba, stands a Transcendant crab apple tree forty years of age, still bearing fruit in abundance. A little way off is the old apple orchard with its Blushed Calville, Repka Kislaga, Charlamoff, Ostrakoff, Hibernal and other varieties of Russian apple trees, which were loaded with fruit last year. From this orchard Mr. Stevenson harvested one autumn, a few years ago, no less than 300 barrels of apples. Several of the varieties are splendid eating apples, and all of them are first-class cooking fruit. Many varieties of plums have fruited successfully at Pine Grove Nursery, notably the Emerald, Minnesota No. 131, Kaga, Stella, Etopa, and Pembina and several of the newer varieties. The well-known Mammoth plum was developed by the late Mr. Stevenson, being a seedling of the Cheney. Raspberries and strawberries have long been successful fruits at Pine Grove Nursery.

Of chief interest to the visitors at Pine Grove Nursery was a hedge row of Vladimir cherries. Back in 1891, the late Mr. Stevenson secured a shipment of the then newly introduced hardy Russian cherry trees. Gradually nature thinned them out and cut them down until Mr. Stevenson discarded all except the Vladimir and Shubianca varieties, grown extensively north of Moscow, in Russia, the former being the better in quality. Some of the trees fruited after a few years, there being naturally a great variation in the quality of the fruit. Pits from the best Vladimir fruit were planted, and in due time produced trees which again began to fruit about 10 years ago. Pits from the best of these were again selected and planted. Probably there are 500 to 600 of these cherry trees growing close together in hedge rows six to thirteen feet high, and bearing, in August last, quite abundantly a beautiful bright red cherry. It was rather an inspiring sight to see upwards of 50 people busily engaged eating cherries in a Manitoba orchard. The horticultural experts from eastern Canada pronounced the best of these Vladimir cherries to be quite equal to the best sour cherry produced in Ontario.

To give some idea of what the results might be if a little more attention were paid to this department, let me remind the committee of the benefit which the western provinces have derived from the work of Dr. Charles Saunders. Reference was made to this subject before and it will bear emphasis again. Working year after year quietly, and after a considerable period of experimentation, he was able to produce the marquis wheat, and although it did not involve very much money, the production of that wheat has meant hundreds of millions of dollars to the prairie provinces. One of our leading daily newspapers put it at five hundred million dollars to the world. That may be a large amount but I am not sure that it is over-estimated. Now, the prairies are very bare of fruit, and what was done by Mr. Stevenson, what is being done at Indian Head in the forestry farm, where they are able to grow an excellent plum, and what a doctor in the town has done, in producing standard apples for a number of years, can be accomplished by departmental activities. At that experimental farm there is a small staff but little attention has been paid to these things. There is an impression in the town nearby where I reside that this work has not been very continuous, nor has it been given any encouragement in past years; in fact, I have heard it rumoured on the streets that on one occasion when there was a fairly good foundation and the trees were ready for grafting, an order was issued that they should be torn up and the place converted into a pasture field. I do not vouch for the truth of that, but it does seem that there has not been sufficient continuous and persistent work along this line; had there been the results would have been better. Certainly, they would have been better when you think of what has been done by Mr. Stevenson and others who are known to the department. I was very glad to see that horticulturists were to be engaged, but I have this criticism to make: The salary offered, $1,500, does seem to me to be entirely inadequate for a qualified man to fill such a position in a new country where the foundations for this work are to be laid and three vast prairie provinces to be supplied. I think any man that can be engaged for $1,500 a year is—well, it does seem to me that he surely cannot have the experience and standing in his profession that he should have. I do not think a salary of $2,500 or $3,000 would be too much; it would be well warranted. However, I am glad that a start has been made. I do hope that a great deal of attention will be paid to this work. The people concerned will appreciate it. It will be easily understood that the individual farmer cannot carry on very much of this work himself; it is too expensive. Fruit trees must be brought from Russia largely. It is well known that we are greatly indebted to that country for a great many of our best hardy varieties of fruit. I will not say that all the money expended on this grant and on experimental farms is wisely spent, but I believe more money might be spent on this department with very good results.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to hear my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) so express himself. We have had representations from Mr. Chipman and others urging the conversion of some of these farms into strictly fruit farms. That, again, is a question of money, and until people in the west get well established there will not be very much attention devoted to the developing of fruit growing except by a few enthusiasts. As a business proposition, fruit growing at the beginning does not bring very good returns, although of course it affords one a great deal of satisfaction to be able to fill his basket with home grown apples and other fruit. I have had some experience of fruit growing on my own place, and I know it takes a lot of work, work that can ill be spared from other more revenue-producing branches of the farm. Speaking of the late Mr. A. P. Stevenson, I had the pleasure of presenting his family with the Carter medal that was awarded by the Canadian Horticultural Council for having done the most for horticulture, particularly apple growing, in the west. I also had the pleasure of visiting the Morden experimental farm and his old homestead. His orchard was a very interesting place indeed, and you would think you were in an old established orchard in Ontario to see the large burly limbs well laden with fruit.

Horticulture is a somewhat comprehensive term; to-day it covers vegetables, flowers and fruits. I presume my hon. friend applies the term largely to fruits?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, it just depends upon how much money we will have available. We have to divert our funds into the avenues that will bring the most practical results to agriculture at this time. It is a matter of opinion as to when we should embark on a more active policy with reference to fruit growing. Fifty years ago this locality was not much better adapted for fruit growing than the district around Indian Head is to-day. I can remember when only an occasional enthusiast grew any considerable number of apples here, but during recent years Mr. W. T. Macoun, Dominion Horticulturist, has evolved, by grafting and by the development of seedlings, eight or ten first class varieties of apples suitable to this climate. They are all excellent for eating, particularly the Melba. Her Excellency Lady Byng is very much interested in this work, and she pronounces them to be very high class apples. Some of these varieties no doubt will be suitable for development in the western country. I will give consideration to my hon. friend's representations —indeed I am doing so now by calling for this assistant horticulturist. With regard to the salary offered, I have always noticed, Mr. Chairman, that the salaries of technical men in agriculture were lower than in any other department. If anyone examines the salaries of technical men, say, in the Mines branch, where engineers are required, and then runs over the salaries of corresponding men in agriculture, he will find the latter are lower for some reason. I am not going to account for it, but they are lower. When young men are starting out in life they choose the vocation which offers the best salaried prospects. If agriculture does not bring as much remuneration as some other profession, naturally they avoid agriculture. Consequently the country develops with comparatively few men available for this class of work, and the salaries are low. I do not want to pass the buck on to the Civil Service Commission, but there is the classification, and I tell you it makes one sweat to get it changed. If my hon. friend, (Mr. Millar) will back me up in insisting that agricultural technical positions should be better paid, probably we will get somewhere. We have had these positions reclassified, but the Civil Service Commission have hundreds of other similar applications, and by the time they have investigated them probably a year has elapsed, meanwhile the lower salaries prevail and there is no one available for the positions at the lower remuneration. I quite agree with my hon. friend that the salaries are too low.

Mr. SENN: How much money is spent in Ontario outside of the experimental farm in Ottawa?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Last year we added nearly 200 acres to the Harrow farm, and this year we are spending $10,000 to develop it into a general farm, because we find we cannot very well develop a proper tobacco or corn farm without live stock. Then there is the Kapuskasing farm in northern Ontario, doing excellent work where a few years ago was a wilderness. That is one of the few farms I have not visited. I have seen it passing by on the train, and everything looked quite progressive compared with the surrounding country. We have spent about $40,000 at Kapuskasing and $35,000 at Harrow. I remember that my hon. friend who is just rising (Mr. Sutherland) rather took me to task the first year for not having given more attention to illustration stations in Ontario. I think there are eight in this province, at about $300 apiece; then we have $35,000 for Harrow and about $10,000 for Kapuskasing. These, of course, are exclusive of the Ottawa farm. The first agricultural college in Canada was established at Guelph over fifty years ago, so that Ontario has had the benefit of that training and assistance to agriculture, and that may account for the fact that there has not been such a large demand in that province for these small illustration stations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. member (Mr. Senn) asked what the department was doing in regard to the fruit growing in Ontario. The minister has talked a long time and ended up by not giving the information asked for.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I often do not hear very well, but my deputy has good ears and he told me that what the hon. member wanted was the amount spent in Ontario outside the Central experimental farm. Now, I am going to try to-night to meet the wishes of the hon. member for South Oxford, even if it takes us all night. As to fruit growing, the principal work is done at the Central farm under Mr. Macoun. Under another vote we have the appropriations for the horticultural work, horticultural council, and so on. We had representations only yesterday with respect to the expansion of this work, particularly as it relates to vegetables, flowers and fruit. But not very much is spent in Ontario outside the Central experimental farm and at Harrow and at Kapuskasing so far as fruit goes, except in an educational way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What fruits are grown at Kapuskasing and Harrow?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Largely the small fruits at Kapuskasing; other tree fruits and smaller fruits at Harrow.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is it not a fact that the provincial government are carrying on this work and have experimental farms all over the province? Are any of these illustration farms in Ontario devoted to fruit growing?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: So that the department are really not doing anything in Ontario in the way of experimenting in fruit growing, outside of the Central farm at Ottawa, which is really for the whole Dominion, not particularly for Ontario?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We had an application recently from the county of Lanark for some work along the line of the rejuvenating of old orchards—spraying and putting them back into good bearing shape. I do not know of any other application. I went fully into the matter, and it looked to me a little like invading what has been recognized as the provincial field to start out on a policy of establishing illustration stations in respect to fruit alone. There is no particular line of demarcation; but that is the way I feel about it, particularly in regard to an area that is not peculiarly adapted for the growing of tree fruit.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: So far as invading the provincial field is concerned, I do not look at it from that view at all. It costs less for the province to do this work than for the federal department to do it; that is really about what it amounts to. If the federal department refuses to do anything the province has to step in and do it and pay for it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is about the way a lot of the work is done; if the province refuses to go into it then we take it up. We are trying to work out an allocation of the respective spheres of operation of the provinces and the Dominion. Speaking generally, work associated with production is looked upon as provincial and work associated with the health of animals, the grading of products and the marketing of them, is looked upon as federal. But it is hard to get the line.

Mr. HOEY: The minister visited the constituency of Nelson in September last. He must have been impressed, not to say surprised, by the agricultural possibilities of that region. Apart altogether from the gardens that he visited—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does my hon. friend refer to that portion of the district which is towards its northern extremity?

Mr. HOEY: Yes, I will explain that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is pretty hard to give any estimate of its possibilities after one hurried trip, but I was very much struck with what I saw there in the way of gardens, in the way of grass and in the way of possibilities in many directions which may be considered as sufficient to support a very considerable population. Without entering into railway matters at all—confining myself strictly to agriculture—I found less evidences of frost in the gardens around the Pas than we found around Winnipeg, and up the Swan river. In the newer districts, where the soil is largely what is called muskeg but what is really vegetable matter, the gardens were frozen very badly. But where the soil had been worked for three or four years and the ground solidified and its capacity to contain heat increased, the gardens were in perfect condition. Onions do not grow well there, however; there is too much vegetable matter.

Mr. CALDWELL: What time of year was that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The last week in August. We went on north to mile 81—that is the Herb lake country. The train we were on had something like twenty cars, including the car of settlers' effects. There was no siding on which to spot this car; so it was just set on the track right opposite this man's shack, and the hon. member for Springfield's party I think must have had a time pinch-barring it on and getting their gas car past it. It is quite a trick on that road to spot a car right opposite a man's farm so that another man can get past it. When you get to mile 137, you find there a Hudson's Bay store and other frontier buildings, and evidences of men who in the winter time devote their attention to trapping, and in the summer to farming operations. At mile 185 there was a gentleman by the name of Cowan. He had a beautiful garden of flowers, and one little apple tree, only about so high, but it had produced its first fruit in the shape of one apple. That was about the last of August. I never inquired how it developed, or whether it would suit the particular taste of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote), but at all events it was an apple. Then as we journeyed further north we came across a cold storage plant at mile 239. It had been filled with sturgeon fish but at the time we got there only one carload was left to ship out. From that on up to mile 332 there was not much evidence of agricuture that I could come to any conclusion about; but the country is not the quagmire or muskeg we hear so much about. It will support a very considerable population engaged in mining, trapping and fishing in the winter, very much the same way of living pursued down in the Maritime provinces, where the people may be engaged in fishing or lumbering at one time of the year, and in farming at another.

Mr. CALDWELL: I object.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not speaking in disparagement at all. It is a fine thing in a new country to have two or three sources of revenue for the first few years. I cannot remember his name, but the party who was keeping the stopping place at the end of the track was from Cape Breton and knew all the members in this House from Nova Scotia. He and his wife gave us a splendid lodging, and an excellent breakfast next morning at four o'clock when it was time to get back on the train. The whole country up there is capable of considerable agricultural development, but I do not think you will get much development up there so long as you have better land on the open prairie. Do not mistake me; people are not going to flock in there pell-mell when there is better land easier of access and closer to the market; but when the Hudson Bay road opens up the farther north country, of course, the closer they will be to their market—I presume that is what my hon. friends across the way wanted to get out of me.

Mr. TOLMIE: The minister was good enough when the live stock vote was taken up the other day, to give us permission to speak on live stock in connection with the present vote. The other day during a somewhat long discussion, one very important feature of the live stock business was not touched on, and that is that while we have expended hundreds of thousands of dollars on exhibitions and the improvement of live stock by the distribution of pure bred sires and in various other ways, at the present time there are still thousands of cattle of very poor quality and in very poor condition being crowded into our markets during the last two or three months of the year, and in that way forcing down the prices in our markets, and so crowding the market with cattle that they can hardly handle the bulk of them. It also tends to lower the market at that time even for the best cattle. In view of this condition and its seriousness to the whole of our agriculture in Canada, I would like to know what the department is doing and has done in the last two or three years towards remedying such a condition, and towards inducing the farmers to finish their cattle in a better way so that they can take them to market and make a better profit on them. The great problem to-day is not so much the quality of the cattle, as the proper feeding of them before sending them to market, and sending them to market at the right time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Speaking from memory, the latest action we have taken in regard to the improvement of live stock is that we have refused to give indemnity to the owners of grade bulls that are slaughtered for tuberculosis, or for steers of any kind or lump jaw cattle. In order to encourage the farmers to produce a better quality of cattle we have let them know that we are no longer going to indemnify them for animals slaughtered for tuberculosis. That step has just been taken, and that is why I mention it first.

We have also been working in conjunction with the provincial governments where they have had "better live stock" trains, with men going through the country preaching the gospel of better live stock, because after all this is largely an educational matter.

In addition to that we have developed our various branch farms more and more along the line of live stock. I have used the term "live stock breeding depot" in the past, and at such points we are not spending so much time in experimenting with the soil, because in some of the older districts the farmers have a good knowledge of the best cultural methods necessary for their district, but we are giving more attention to live stock and the development of a better quality from grades up by using pure bred males and developing the ordinary cattle along that line. I think that is the cheapest and most practical way for the average man, to take his ordinary female stock, and rather than sell them at a sacrifice, use a pure bred sire and grade the stock up.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is being done in the feeding line?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Feeding is a very important matter. There is no virtue in live stock of any kind if you are a bad feeder. You cannot turn animals out to take care of themselves and expect to make money out of them. You have to give them not only a maintenance ration, but more, to make them thrive and fatten. We are trying to bring that lesson home, for it is a lesson everyone should know, but like any other missionary work you have to keep pounding it into the people all the time. Some will listen, some will not; but there are always some who believe it.

9 p.m.

Then during the last two or three years we have had various stockyard associations at Calgary, Moose Jaw and Winnipeg, working in conjunction with the provincial departments of agriculture and our department in the putting on of three feeder shows. Those owning feeders are encouraged to bring them in there, and those wanting to buy feeders, including Ontario buyers, are encouraged by special freight rates to come out there and buy feeders to take back to Ontario and other eastern provinces. The first show was a remarkable success. Then we put on men to give lectures and addresses on the best way of conducting feeding operations. It seems simple enough but you have to keep on reiterating these things, and we are having remarkable results already. It was really fine at the second feeder show—I was present at the shows at Moose Jaw and Calgary—to see these animals which were nearly all ranch grown animals running on their mothers on the range with that sleekness that you get only from such bred animals. They were in great demand when they arrived at the show, and they ran up to as high as 7 cents, and very many of them 6 cents, for feeders. The Ontario farmers ran them up a little bit because having gone out there so far, and having the advantage of a cheap freight rate they wanted to take back something with them, and they made a good bid; and I have no doubt they will make good returns too. It is just a question of keeping the necessity before them.

In regard to the rubbish to be found in the stockyards, I was quite amazed two years ago, on going to the stockyards at Edmonton, Calgary and Winnipeg, to see the rubbish in those yards. The stock will not pay the freight. They have a very poor quality of stock, and frequently have no money to buy feed for them, and they have to get rid of them in some way. It is a burden on any man to keep such stock. Where is the responsibility? We are spending a lot of money under the live stock vote. We come in for a little bit of criticism in this regard—I am told that no matter where you go through the Dominion you will trip over an employee of the Department of Agriculture, in the Live Stock or some other branch. If we are to speed up this work any more than we are doing now, we have still more to preach the gospel of better live stock. You can go into the older districts of Ontario, not 25 miles from where we are sitting, and find a very alarming number of poor, unprofitable boarders among our cattle. I do not think my hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) looks any more guilty than anybody else, but I am sure he can tell us about the unprofitable class of animals kept down in some parts of the Maritime provinces.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have got rid of mine.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Everybody knows about them. I do not know if my hon. friend has any explanation of why people will perisist in raising this class of animal. If he can tell me how we can provide a remedy I shall be very glad, because I know my hon. friend is a practical live stock man. We have our clergymen preaching the gospel of salvation for over 2,000 years, and yet a lot of people do not believe it, and many people believe there is no more profit in good cattle than in the poor ones.

Mr. TOLMIE: The hon. gentleman implies that while they preach the gospel, people still persist in betting on horses.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think that that practice would keep my hon. friend out of the Kingdom.

Mr. TOLMIE: I should like a little information. Has the minister any figures he can give us over a term of years as to the profit in feeding steers on the experimental farm with the ordinary feed that can be obtained from the farms in the neighbourhood.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not that information here. That is published in the regular reports and bulletins. I suppose my hon. friend means the branch farms.

Mr. TOLMIE: The branch farms throughout the country, looking at it in a commercial way.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The branch stock was sent to the Central farm and finished off with that experiment as chilled meat last year. We have not the figures here. But a lot of animals fed here were used entirely for that experiment. Some were sent as fat animals, some as stockers and some as chilled. If you are not too fond of getting out or of constant and continuous hard work, and if you like live stock, you can convert a whole lot of money into it on the farm, and if you do not know how to manage it and buy the wrong type of animal, you can lose money faster than you can make it. If you have the room and cheap enough land, you can make a profit. But there is tremendous room for information in this regard, and there is an additional desire to get the right kind of animal. I shall be pleased to get that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. TOLMIE: There must be a number of feeding experiments carried on at the experimental farms west of the lakes, where there is a profusion of food.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. TOLMIE: Have they been generally successful or not?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I have visited a good many farms; the animals are nearly all fed outside and they are profitable. People go out and buy them. Last year Mr. Taggart of Swift Current was at the Calgary feeder show, and he claimed he could buy the steers cheaper outside of the show where there was no competition. He buys them at the market price from the farmers, takes them to Swift Current, keeps them in a straw shed, feeds them in the open yard from trench silo with cut corn and sunflower and makes good money. He gets the right kind. However, I have not the exact figures.

Mr. TOLMIE: This feeding has been carried on very largely on the prairies by private companies and private individuals who have started out on a large scale. Is the minister aware whether they are making it successful?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. TOLMIE: There is a big plant out in Manitoba and another near Edmonton.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was not thinking of Manitoba. I understand they are doing well. I wonder how they look after them. I see these dealers all dressed up very natty round the Fort Garry hotel, and it must be very profitable if they are able to stay at that nice hotel, feed their stock and make a profit. I was never able to do it myself.

Mr. CALDWELL: Maybe they have a man to do it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, and they have a good foreman, a gentleman named Speers. He tells me he is making money and I think he is. I think he is a real feeder. I think he is pretty much on the job. But it has become a profitable business since the embargo was taken off. Everybody who has a little money to blow in buys a bunch of steers, feeds them, gets interviewed, and they are supposed to be developing the British market, and all that sort of thing. I have some doubts as to whether that is the proper way to carry on practical steer feeding for any market. If a person has a little money he might as well amuse himself that way as any other. But you require to give careful personal attention to the business and I think that that is being done in the one or two cases my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. BIRD: I should like to draw the minister's attention to the Hudson Bay railway again. The northern part of the province of Manitoba was delighted and gratified when the minister decided to take his trip up north, and I think they will be equally gratified to learn he has borne his testimony in the House to-night regarding that district.

My purpose in intervening in the discussion to-night is to inquire of the minister whether he has given any consideration to the desirability of instituting an experimental station on some modest lines on some points on the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. BIRD: I do not mean that part of the railway which is not built yet, or the part that has gone into decay, but the part that is operative. I want to announce to the House that the Hudson Bay railway, so far as half of its mileage is concerned, is in operation. I think the minister himself can bear testimony that it is a good piece of railroad, and ought to be put to the utmost possible use. The minister's testimony does not stand alone. For two or three years we have been trying to persuade the House that this country through which the Hudson Bay line runs is as good a country as you can find in the west of Canada.

This does not depend upon recent visitors to that country. We have evidence dating as far back as that district has been known. Every government expedition sent in there has reported equally favourably about that country. Before the Senate committee, five years ago, J. B. Tyrell, a well-known government explorer, described that country through which the line ran for about 200 miles as being beautiful clay land, as good as any in Manitoba. We have other evidence which all goes to back up what the minister has said. I will detain the House just for a moment in reading the evidence of Mr. McInnes, a member of the Geological survey, who went in there some years ago:

> In summing up his impressions of what he designates "the gently rolling clay covered country", Mr. Wm. McInnes, of the Geological survey, wrote:
> "Of the whole of this extensive plateauland, extending from the valley of the Nelson river westward to near Burntwood and Wekusko lakes (west long. 99 degrees, 46 min.), northerly at least to beyond latitude 56 d., and southerly to the limestone escarpment, an area of about 10,000 sq. miles, it may be said it is characterized by a heavy clay soil entirely free from boulders. Lacustrine clays, composed of the rock flour once held in suspension by glacial streams and deposited by them as they reached the quiet waters of a great lake, are essentially the soils of this region; there is no distinct surface soil clearly separable from the clay subsoil, the one merges gradually into the other, the clayey character of the soil being strongly apparent at the very surface where merely the shallow cover of decaying leaves and other vegetation is scraped away. Generally for from five inches to over a foot down the clay is deep brown in colour from the admixture of vegetable matter, and quite friable, and the rootlets of even the smaller surface vegetation reach down far below this level, though on the tops of many of the ridges the light buff-coloured clay, without any appreciable colouration from vegetable matter, comes to the surface. The rolling character of the plateau generally provides fair drainage, but over considerable areas in its central portion, far from the valleys of the larger streams, there are large tracts that have not sufficient gradients for the proper flow of the surface water but could be made available for agricultural uses by being artificially drained."

And further, this is his description of the climate:

> Mr. McInnes gave particular attention to the question of climate, which he rightly considered of "vital importance in connection with this region". He kept a careful record of temperatures, and from the time it was "begun on the 19th of June until the night of the 29th September, when the thermometer fell to 26 d., there was no frost that affected even tender vegetation. On the night of the 10th of August the temperature fell to the freezing point, but did not get low enough to do damage at least in the valley of Grassy river, though some of the potato vines on the summit of the high ridge north of the Pas were slightly touched". He was convinced that the "district is not at all too cold for general agricultural operations. The longer daily duration of sunlight in these high latitudes must be taken into consideration and for purposes of comparison with more southerly localities yearly averages of temperature are of no value."

Through this agricultural region described by Mr. McInnes, the Hudson Bay road runs at the present time and is operating the whole of the distance through this clay belt. It seems to me to be a reasonable request that the government should, in a modest way, without going to a great deal of expense, institute some form of experimental station to prove up this country. Already there is an abundance of proof, as the minister's own experience has confirmed, in regard to the character of this land. Not only has the Minister of Agriculture for the Dominion been over that country, but so has the Minister of Agriculture for our province. As late as last summer, Mr. Bracken, in company with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) took the same trip and covered the same ground as the Minister of Agriculture, and their impressions were almost identical with those of the Minister of Agriculture. We are always glad when visitors take that trip. We never try to keep any one away from viewing that country because our faith in it is very well established. It is a beautiful country to look at and I believe it is a good country. It may not be feasible to develop it immediately; but if we are going to operate these 214 miles of railway right through the middle of it, it is only reasonable to spend a little money in trying to determine its agricultural qualities. In this country, even in Manitoba, we have a class of farmer who likes to mix his agricultural operations with a little fishing or other occupations of that kind. I think we have many of them who are trying to eke out a living on land that is not equal in any respect to the land I have described. I think there are, in Europe, especially in northern Europe, farmers who would be only too glad of the opportunity this district gives. It may not be possible to open up the land extensively to settlers of any kind for some time, but in view of the ultimate completion of the Hudson Bay line and the fact that 214 miles of it are being operated every week, it is only reasonable that the government should follow up the personal investigations of the Minister of Agriculture and try out, in a scientific way, what the soil and climate of this immense northern clay belt of 10,000 square miles can really do. I hope the minister has given some attention to that and has already determined in some way or another to test out this country.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Has my hon. friend in mind any particular place along that road where he thinks we could get the best information in regard to the region? When I came back from there I met some of my experimental farm staff at Winnipeg at the rust conference, and I discussed with them the advisability of establishing either one of these small forty-acre illustration stations or possibly what we call a substation that will cost about $3,000 a year, either at mile 137, where there is a store owned by a man named Atkinson or at mile 185, where the apple tree was growing to which I referred. I do not know which might be the better place and perhaps my hon. friend might give some suggestion.

Mr. BIRD: I think either point would be suitable, but probably the more northerly point would be desirable. It seems to be a suitable spot in many ways and, being more northerly than the other, it might give the region a better test.

Mr. HOEY: When we reached Port Nelson we were surprised at many of the things we found there, but perhaps the most surprising thing to us was the fact that they had been ploughing. They had a splendid team of Percheron horses there and they had ploughed, I would say in the neighbourhood of three-quarters of an acre of land. The soil was rough on the surface, but we had a technical agriculturist with us and he was very much impressed with its possibilities. There are six men there under the superintendence of an engineer, Mr. Hazelwood, and I was wondering, in view of the fact that they had been attempting to cultivate some land there, if it would not be possible to have even there, without much expense, a kind of little illustration farm. That is to say, why not send up some seed to the engineer and the men in charge there, just as it is sent out to a little illustration station in my country and have them do a little experimenting on the side? The question may be asked as to its value. Well, one cannot help being impressed, in visiting the United States, by the erroneous opinions widespread there with regard to the southerly region of the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. In the United States someone will ask you whether it would be safe for a woman to visit the city of Winnipeg in December. Now if it could be shown that wild grasses or coarse grains can be grown at Port Nelson, I think it would prove of tremendous advertising value to our immigration authorities and would dispel a great many of the erroneous opinions that prevail to-day concerning that whole north country. I would not expect anything of an extensive nature, but I should like the minister to promise that the officials of his department would get in touch with the engineer in charge of the work there to see what could be done with the ground which was ploughed when I was there.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I shall be glad to do that. I did not know there was any experimental work carried on there. I think we could have some experiments made at a very small cost, especially now that the land has been tilled. What staff is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. HOEY: There are several men in connection with the engineering work and so on.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not see why, without additional men, some experiments could not be made at a cost under $50.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): What proportion of the $1,440,000 for experimental farms is spent in Nova Scotia? We have in Cumberland county a farm which looks very well seen from the railway, but so far as the public are concerned it is not very well known. Whether this is due to lack of advertising and propaganda I do not know.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Which particular farm is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I am referring to the Nappan farm in Cumberland county. What proportion of the money devoted to experimental farms generally is spent on the experimental farms in Nova Scotia, how much is spent outside the farms, and for what purposes?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member seemed to be of the opinion that the experimental farm to which he has referred just looked like a farm. Well, that is the greatest compliment he could pay. I understand it is thought not to be sufficiently developed. I asked the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) last year a question in regard to that farm and he gave me the figures in regard to the number of visitors who resorted to it annually, and my recollection is that the number was something like 6,000. It would seem therefore that a good many people visit the farm in the belief that they can get some benefit from what they see carried on there. I may say that that farm has got some pretty hard knockers around Nappan. I do not know exactly why this is so, but every now and then I see correspondence in the press from a gentleman there who never misses an opportunity of slamming the farm He is something like our friend Mr. Barnjum, who is quite frequently heard from in regard to the terrible depredation in connection with our forests, a whole lot of which no doubt is true. In this case the active party is Mr. Blanchard, who appears to have some grievance; and through the adverse publicity he has given the farm an impression has been left with people that it is not doing much good. Well, I visited the farm myself and I can say something of what it does. There are three farms in Nova Scotia, one at Nappan, one at Truro and one at Kentville. Possibly the public may be of the opinion that at a time like this some of these institutions might be dispensed with, but that is a matter of opinion. The farm at Truro is a provincial farm, the one at Nappan was one of the four original farms which were established throughout Canada, while the farm at Kentville was established principally for the purpose of developing the orchards of the Annapolis valley. It has been a problem to know how to reduce these without doing injustice to an old established institution. Has the hon. member any suggestions to offer as to how the Nappan farm could be put to any better use? Some suggest that it might be closed, but I would point out that it is an old established institution, being among the very first. There is a certain sentiment associated with the location; there are beautiful trees and lawns, there is excellent live stock, the experimental work is good, and the farm has been in operation for the last forty years. I would not care to be the one to take the responsibility of closing that farm unless I happened to be at a safe distance at the time the fact was made public. The question has been raised, however, as to the necessity for this number of farms in Nova Scotia. New Brunswick has only one, as has Prince Edward Island, while Nova Scotia has two federal farms and one provincial. As to the cost, the farm at Nappan represents about $40,000 and the one at Kentville $46,000.

Mr. DOUCET: I may tell the minister that he would get no advice from anybody in the Maritime provinces to close any of the farms there. When he first introduced the vote, the minister said that the former administration had established a few farms in the Maritime provinces. I fail to see where they were established, because there are only four federal farms in that part of the country. As the minister says, Nappan is one of the first four farms that were established in the Dominion; the one at Fredericton, in the province of New Brunswick, was established a few years later, and the one at Kentville was instituted for the purpose of developing the fruit industry of the Annapolis valley.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is the point? The Fredericton farm was established by the government that preceded this one.

Mr. DOUCET: That is so much to their credit then, and I wish the present administration would consider the advisability of establishing one in what we call the north shore counties of New Brunswick. The condition of the soil there, the climate, and the fertilizing ingredients available on the shores of that part of the province are such that it would be beneficial to the farming population of that district if at least illustration stations were established, conducted by the federal department, for the purpose of helping agriculture in general in those counties.

The other evening, when discussing the live stock vote, the minister told us that we should have an opportunity of referring to these questions later. I placed on the order paper some time ago a question in regard to the Live Stock branch at Moncton, and I find that of twenty-one organizations for the co-operative marketing of sheep and lambs there are sixteen in what are known as the French Acadian centres of New Brunswick. These are Mont Carmel, Saint-Ignace, Saint-Louis, Saint-Paul, Richibucto village in the county of Kent; Rogersville, in the county of Northumberland; Tracadie, Saint Isidore, Lameque, Six Roads, Upper Caraquet, Grande Anse, Bathurst, Sainte Therese, Petit Rocher, in the county of Gloucester; and Saint Quentin in Restigouche county. Eleven of the seventeen poultry clubs in the province are in the same section, namely, Acadieville, Saint Louis, Saint Ignace, Saint Charles, in Kent county; Barachois and Cap Pélé in Westmoreland county; Rogersville and Néguac in Northumberland county; and Saint Isidore, Paquetville and Pokemouche in Gloucester county. Furthermore, of the twenty-one egg circles, thirteen are again to be found in the same section, namely, Acadieville, Saint Louis, Saint Ignace, Saint Charles and Saint Paul, in Kent county; Barachois and Cap Pélé in Westmoreland county; Rogersville and Néguac in Northumberland county; and Caraquet, Saint Isidore, Paquetville and Pokemouche in Gloucester county. In this connection an immense amount of correspondence has to be sent out from the Live Stock branch office in Moncton, but I find on looking over the personnel that there is no one in the office able to conduct the correspondence in the French language. Now, these poultry clubs and egg circles have been established for the purpose of co-operative marketing, and they are doing excellent work. Therefore I hope the minister will find an opportunity of having a bilingual stenographer appointed in the Moncton office so that the men in charge of this special work for the various counties of the north shore of New Brunswick may be able to get the correspondence conducted in the French language whereby the greatest benefit will result to them; otherwise it will be practically impossible to conduct the work satisfactorily either to the Live Stock branch or to the farming population of that section of the province. This special work needs development, and the people interested expect to get a large measure of help from the department which has been instrumental in creating those organizations in the districts which I have enumerated.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that three of our officers are capable of talking both English and French, and three others are French Canadian. It is rather regrettable that all our staff is not bilingual. As a matter of fact it is sometimes late in life when we make the discovery that we should be able to speak both languages. If my hon. friend will draw my attention to any appointments which he thinks will result in the work being neglected or an injustice being done to his constituents I shall be glad to look into the matter, We have twenty illustration stations established in New Brunswick. One reason why we are not building up a permanent well-balanced staff, as suggested by my hon. friend. is that nearly all of this work is, strictly speaking, provincial. All these egg circles, calf clubs and such like organizations should have been looked after by the provincial government, but inasmuch as they did not take action we started the work, and sometimes we operate with our men, the province paying half the cost, and sometimes the provincial men do the work with the federal government paying half the cost. We are working in conjunction with the local government, and as soon as we get an opportunity we are going to try to have them take the work over entirely. I will consider my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. DOUCET: It is true that some of the men are bilingual, and that is appreciated. but more effective work would be done if an additional bilingual stenographer were engaged to conduct the correspondence with the French Acadian farmers, who would be in a better position to understand the business if carried on in their own tongue.

Mr. McBRIDE: Mr. Chairman, I think the point raised by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) and by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) was well taken. In my opinion the government would be well advised, before they spend any more money on the Hudson Bay railway, to find out whether anything could be grown up in that part of Canada. I also agree with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) that agricultural farms in the old districts are not as useful as they would be in new districts. I have been going to the Agassiz farm for the last thirty-two years, and I cannot see what good that institution is doing. It is simply a bill of expense to the government. I think if it was closed and its activities transferred to the northern part of British Columbia, an immense amount of good would result. The Minister of Agriculture in the late government (Mr. Tolmie) and the present minister has approved of the establishment of a farm in the Nechako valley. He sent his men to look over the location, and they too approved of it, but so far nothing has been done. I think if the government could see their way to spend less money on the farm at Agassiz and make a start on another farm in the northern portion of British Columbia it would be a step in the right direction, and I know the people out there would very much appreciate it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is the Agassiz farm in my hon. friend's constituency?

Mr. McBRIDE: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) I think gave some assurance to the people concerned that Vanderhoof was in line for the first new farm. I had hoped before this to have established one there, but we have not been able to do so yet. However, we have that still in mind. Agassiz is one of the original four branch farms—Nappan, Agassiz, Indian Head and Brandon. I have at times thought, Mr. Chairman, that in order to deal with this matter without bias we might get an impartial committee appointed to view those four old farms and two or three others to see if we could not arrive at some conclusion of what would be the fairest thing to do. I have views myself on the subject, but I do not think it is necessary to express them because I am not in a position to carry them out. I do think we could dispense with a few of these farms. Agassiz is doing good work, but there is no question that to-day a similar farm at Vanderhoof would do more effective work in the next thirty years. But it takes money to dismantle and transfer such a farm, and we have not the means available, so the old farm is continued. The Brandon farm is well located, but it has had the misfortune of being flooded during the last three years in succession, and it may be flooded again. Some people think we should move it to another location, but I do not know what my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) would say if I suggested it. I think we had better leave these somewhat delicate activities to a more suitable date. If my hon. friends have any recommendations to make with regard to the closing of any of these farms in their respective ridings, I shall be very glad to give them careful consideration.

Mr. KNOX: I wish to endorse the request of the hon. member for Nelson and the hon. member for Springfield in regard to some kind of demonstration stations along the Hudson Bay railway. I am not surprised that the hon. member for Cariboo should oppose the Hudson Bay project. He is not opposing the demonstration stations but he opposes the project; and I find that the farther a man is removed from that project and the less he knows about it the more he is opposed to it. There is a vast area lying to the south and west of this railway that should get a little more attention than it has been getting. The route itself should be given more attention; and there are hundreds of thousands of people in the western provinces who are of that opinion. I have had communications from people who live along the railway and it is astonishing what they have grown in gardens at these different points. I had heard of that garden which is producing the apples; and not only is it doing that; it is producing all kinds of vegetables. A demonstration station at a point like that would no doubt prove a great many things that the people residing there do not now realize as to the possibilities of production in that area. The constituency which I represent lies to the west of the territory that we have been discussing, but the south end of my constituency also contains an experimental farm—the Rosthern farm. Rosthern has been giving a good account of itself in many lines, particularly in the herd of Holstein cattle which they have developed there. When the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was speaking about expanding in horticulture at Indian Head, it occurred to me that that expansion might very well be taken to Rosthern. Rosthern is very much nearer the centre of the province than Indian Head is, and it has already carried on a good deal of experimentation in fruits and other things. There has been some talk of removing the farm from Rosthern, but if something along the line of expansion in horticulture is carried out I can see where very good work could still be done by the Rosthern farm. We have also been very successful in bee culture. I would ask the minister to consider the advisability of spreading a little in horticulture at Rosthern.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are considering it now.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Is the embargo on American baby chicks still in force, and is there any objection to the way it is working?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is an embargo against all kinds of chicks from some twelve or fifteen states. Of course, that covers baby chicks.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): According to the understanding of the producers of poultry in Ontario, if a certificate from the Bureau of Animal Husbandry of the Department of Agriculture of the United States accompanied the shipment, it would be allowed to come in. I have been led to believe however, that they are allowed in without that certificate from the bureau, but with a certificate from some veterinary in the United States, which is very easily procured.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If that is happening we will stop it. A certificate is required to show that the chicks do not come from the quarantined states against which the embargo is in effect. If my hon. friend will bring the matter to our attention in such a way as to start the wheels of inquiry in motion, we will certainly look into it.

Mr. PRITCHARD: What was the net profit on the steers that were fed last year at the experimental farms?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not that information.

Mr. PRITCHARD: It is rather strange that the minister cannot give that information. Were the steers fed for profit or for experimental purposes?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All that work is experimental. If we get a profit out of it, so much the better, but quite frequently we do not. My recollection is that we made money on the steers we sold for feeders. On the ones we sold for fat animals to be killed immediately on arrival, we got two cents less, and for those we sold as chilled beef we got four cents still less, so that on the latter we lost heavily. But the experiment was successful so far as it showed that for intermittent shipments the sale of these animals as chilled meat was not profitable under these conditions.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I understood that all the feeding was done with a view to experimenting and making the results known.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The information is all published in detail. I should be delighted to supply my hon. friend with the bulletins containing it.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. PRITCHARD: According to the Auditor General's report, about $20,000 was paid for the steers and about $88,000 for feed, but the total sales of the twenty farms amounted to only $81,000. I would like an explanation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If we are to feed our own cattle we would have to buy more land to grow the feedstuffs, but if I brought down an estimate here for three or four hundred thousand dollars to buy additional land my hon. friend knows I might have great difficulty in getting it through, judging by the way such increases have been received in the last two or three years. It is a very expensive business buying the feed for these experimental farms, but we have to do it or enlarge the farms. A lot of this revenue from the cattle does not show in the Auditor General's report. A certain part of the proceeds goes into the Receiver General's hands, and a certain part back into the operations of the farm. I have simply been following the system of accounting that has been followed here for the last thirty or forty years.

Mr. LEWIS: I notice that the experimental farms brought in a revenue of $125,000, about one-twelfth the total expenditure for the experimental farms. Is this sent back to the government?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I am not prepared to leave this matter yet. I have been a cattle feeder all my life, and I have had to pay my own bills for feed. While I do not expect the experimental farms to be a paying institution, I am taking only this one item of feeding cattle, and I find the farms could not grow enough to feed their stock. They sold $81,000 of steers, and that included the cost of the steers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What farm was that?

Mr. PRITCHARD: I am taking the sales of twenty-one farms, but I am not charging up the expenses of the Ottawa farm, and yet we fall $7,000 short of the feed you bought for the $20,000 worth of steers handled. I do not see why you bought so many if you could not make them pay.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is the point —that something disappears somewhere, that it is not good business buying feed? I quite agree with my hon. friend. I have been signing accounts not only here but elsewhere for the purchase of feed that I know is not good business; but you have either to do that or buy more land for these farms. I have not been accustomed to buying feed for my own farm. I do not think a man should buy any feed that he can grow; but that is my opinion with regard to a private farm, and I cannot carry out my opinion with regard to these experimental farms. I have simply the money to spend that is voted by parliament. I try to get all I can, and to get the votes through this committee as easily as possible, but I say that you cannot run a farm at a commercial profit, speaking generally, if you buy your feedstuffs. I suppose that if you had the very finest class of feeding animals and the most skilful feeder, and you could buy your grains cheap and everything was favourable, you might show a profit, but you would show far more if you grew the grains yourself.

Mr. FORKE: The minister is up against that old statement that when the farmer eats his own eggs he is getting cheaper eggs than if he bought them in the store. It is the same with the farmer who raises his own feed for his cattle.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think it is the same thing. If you buy your feed you pay for the cost of production plus the other fellow's profit. If you raise it yourself, there is just the cost of production.

Mr. FORKE: The minister says it does not pay to feed cattle when you have to buy the feed, but the little margin of profit you have to pay in that case should not make so much difference. A ton of hay on your own farm is just as valuable to you for feeding cattle as the ton of hay the other man has to sell. It is the old story that what the farmer consumes himself does not cost him anything, that if he uses his own chickens, they do not cost him anything; but the chicken the farmer consumes off his own farm has just exactly the same value as the chicken the man buys in the store. There is no difference.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will just carry that out to its logical conclusion. Here is a farmer, and my hon. friend says it does not make any difference whether he buys his feedstuff or grows it; so he follows the easier method and buys it if he has the money, and keeps on buying and buying—buying feed, and calves, and everything. Now where is he going to get off eventually? It may be able to be done, but I tell you frankly I do not know how to do it. The less you buy that you can raise on the farm, the better off you are. If you keep on buying, buying roughage and hay and concentrates, and paying for your labour and housing and all that sort of thing, I do not see how you are going to make it pay. On the other hand, if you put the labour of yourself and your family into it—I gave this illustration once before and one hon. member was considerably exercised over it—if you can manage your farm with the labour of your own family, assuming that you have a family, and I am fortunate enough to have one, that is the way the farms of Ontario were run and made to pay, not by paying for everything outside. That is my own idea, and I am surprised that a good canny Scotch farmer like my hon. friend would justify buying anything at all that he could raise on his own farm.

Mr. FORKE: I remember a system of farming in Scotland where the farmers never raised any sheep; they raised turnips and grain, and bought all their sheep. It did not pay them to raise the sheep. That is an instance of where it pays to buy. If you go to the lowlands of Scotland you will find very few men raising sheep on their farms; the sheep are bought from lands that are better suited for raising sheep, lands that are not so valuable. There is another point. The minister talks about the farmer and his family working. I want to protest against the idea that to make a living on a farm the farmer and his wife and family have all to work. Do you know any other business where they have to do that?

10 p.m.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: With regard to the buying of sheep to be fed on turnips and other fodder grown on your farm, that is sound policy. You are buying live stock; but it is vastly different when you are buying hay or fodder.

Mr. FORKE: I do not see why.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Out in the west that is what they do at feeder shows. They buy range steers, and ship them down to Ontario and other eastern provinces and feed them there. But when you start in to buy feed, your profits begin to disappear. As for the family working, my hon. friend knows that he got along himself by the hard toil of himself and his family, and that if he had to pay for all his labour, and unwilling service very often, his profits would have been a lot smaller than they were. I do not think it is a bad thing for a man and his family to have to work as long as they get a reasonable reward.

Mr. FORKE: That is the point. But what about those thousands of sheep that come down to Fort William where the feed is all bought? They make a big profit out of those sheep.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are fed offal that would otherwise be thrown into the lake. That is found money.

Mr. PRITCHARD: How do you expect these men at Edmonton are going to make a profit if they buy cattle and buy the feed, when the experimental farms cannot do it at a profit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have a memo. from my deputy here pointing out that the money that is got from these animals does not show in the Auditor General's report. Part of it goes back into the farming operations and part to the Receiver General. My hon. friend asks me, if the government cannot make money buying feed, how can anybody else do so?

Mr. PRITCHARD: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not saying that anybody is making money. If you are going to buy everything, buy your feed, put up your building, buy your labour and concentrates and buy your steers, believe me, you have to do some fancy work.

Mr. SENN: I have heard several hon. members to my left making suggestions to the minister that the experimental farms might very well be established in their own districts, and I understood the minister to say he was quite favourably disposed towards that proposition. Would the minister give us a list of the experimental farms in each province, and the total amount of this vote which is being expended in each province separately, outside of the experimental farm at Ottawa.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: With reference to these branch farms, if we had somebody to do the work, I think we could perhaps dispense with three or four of them which are not doing as useful work as some others, and I believe we would get better results if we concentrated on the others. I do not see why we should have more than two in each of the three prairie provinces, or more than one in each of the Maritime provinces and three or four in the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I think we might have some impartial tribunal, and get some man like—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Duncan Marshall?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:—some man like the president of the Agricultural College at Guelph, Mr. Creelman, or Mr. Reynolds, or J. W. Robertson, or two or three of those gentlemen who have had no political bias, with no idea but the good of the experimental farm system. Such men might very well decide how many branch farms there should be in each province and stop at that. I know there is a temptation just prior to every election to spread out in the matter of experimental farms, and the result is that some of them are very politically and very unfortunately located. I am not referring to any particular party in this regard. If the farms keep on growing in this way there will be no definite plan in regard to them. I think there should be a specific system of branch farms, beyond which we should not go, and they should be used for developing the activities of the Central farm.

Mr. SENN: This is a fairly large vote, and there is an increase over last year of $40,000. Will the minister give us a list of the experimental farms by provinces and the cost?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You mean the amount of money?

Mr. SENN: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. gentleman wants to know the number of farms and the amount of money for each individual farm?

Mr. SENN: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For this year or last year?

Mr. SENN: Both.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will give last year. The figures are as follows:

Charlottetown	$26,000
Kentville, Nova Scotia	46,000
Nappan	30,000
Fredericton	44,000
Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, Quebec	41,000
Cap Rouge, near Quebec city	46,000
The Horse farm, associated with the same farm	16,000
Lennoxville	44,000
La Ferme	33,000
Kapuskasing	30,000
Harrow, Ontario	25,000
Morden, Manitoba	37,000
Brandon, Manitoba	46,000
Indian Head, Saskatchewan	39,000
Rosthern, Saskatchewan	31,000
Scott, Saskatchewan	32,000
Swft Current, Saskatchewan	33,000
Lethbridge, Alberta	46,000
Lacombe, Alberta	42,000
Summerland, British Columbia	44,000
Agassiz, British Columbia	39,000
Invermere, British Columbia	36,000
South Vancouver Island	30,000

Then we have sub-stations like Grande Prairie and Vermilion, $9,000.

Mr. PRITCHARD: Can you give the revenue?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not it totalled by provinces. In Nova Scotia the total was $86,000 and in Quebec $165,000.

Mr. SENN: Does that include illustration farms as well in the different provinces?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, nor the sub-stations. I have just read the sub-stations.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I have no desire to do anything to injure the work of experimental farms, but we are dealing with this vote which asks for an increase of $40,000 over last year. I am in favour of all the research work and I have no criticism to offer of the farm at Ottawa. I do not look for anything in the shape of monetary return in that work. I believe they are rendering a great service, but there is a feeling abroad through the rural sections that we are going too fast with our experimental farm enterprise. If you cannot show that you are teaching us anything from your operations experimentally, and it is a failure financially, why ask that more money should be spent in the same way? I am not a bookkeeper, and the hon. minister tells me I have not looked at the figures properly. I take the total sales of those farms and I add them together. I admit I may have made a clerical error. I took the cost of the steers and I added it up. I do not see how there can be any mistake in the amount of the total sales of the steers or the total expenses of this year. The total sales for the whole of the farms was $81,000, and $20,000 of it was put in for steers. I think that we should have some explanation of how this business was transacted. Those of us who have fed cattle all our lives will look at this matter with interest. If we had lots of money, if we were a wealthy concern that had money to burn, I would have no fault to find with the spending of our money on all sorts of things without getting any return, but we are doing business and are somewhat in the position of a man that is hard up, and we should realize our position financially. I would not give much for the chances of the business man who would undertake to run his farm in the same way that we are running these experimental farms. For my part I think that, taking what the hon junior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) says about the farm down there, the minister would be well advised if he would make a present of that to the province of Nova Scotia. He could also make a present to the provinces of a couple of farms in the west and a couple in the east.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They would not take them.

Mr. PRITCHARD: The minister would get $140,000, and now you are asking for $40,000 more to go on and do the same thing over again. We have in this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, men who are making money in farming operations. What I have asked the minister to do before and what I am asking again to-night is to run a farm so as to make it financially profitable. I do not know why the government do not try that. They have never attempted it so far as I know. If they started such a farm and suffered a loss on it, I would say: All right, try again, and keep at it even if it is a loss. But I do not believe in spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in carrying on an unprofitable business. We are not reaping any benefit in the way of gaining experience from the operations of these farms, as the minister tells us that he cannot give us any information.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is my hon. friend complaining about? What is the difficulty? There is nothing in the Auditor General's report, but I told him some time ago that the Auditor General's report does not show the receipts from these steers. Supposing $2,000 is paid out of the experimental farm vote for steers and those animals are sold afterwards for $2,500, the money goes back into the same vote. It does not go to the Receiver General, it goes back into the operations of the farm from which it came.

While I am on my feet, might I answer that theory that a government farm primarily established for experimental purposes should show a profit? Surely no hon. gentleman in this House believes that can be done by anyone under the sun. I know there are some who are said to be doing it out in the west. The International Harvesting Company are said to be doing it in the United States and are offering to do it on the prairies, but I want to be shown. I never saw anybody do it. How are you to keep these farms in proper shape at all times for visitors, for excursions that may come along at any moment? How can you keep the lawns, borders and everything else in proper shape? My hon. friend must put that kind of improvement on his own farm and he knows there is no revenue except the pleasure which he gets out of it.

In my opinion, it cannot be done; at all events, I will admit that I cannot do it. You cannot run an experimental farm established primarily for experimental purposes, for profit, in the same way as you would run another farm.

Mr. PRITCHARD: The minister has not got my point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am pinning my hon. friend down to what he was saying.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I said that I wanted the government to run a farm for profit, not for experiment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is another matter.

Mr. PRITCHARD: We have a list of salaries paid to officials for these experimental farms running up to $235,879. If you will let three or four of these officials do as we have had to do when we have bought farms, borrow the money and pay interest on capital, and let them show, at the end of the year, their balance sheet, that is all we want to see. We do not want an experimental farm, we want a farm for business, for profit. We have, in Canada, men who are farming for profit and who are making a profit, and these men are laughing at us. I could cite cases if I wanted to, but I do not feel disposed to mention names in this House to-night. I can cite several cases where they are laughing at some of the statements of men who are setting up to be authorities on agriculture in this country. I feel like some other hon. members who have spoken on agriculture to-night. We have in our country one of the best colleges, if not the best college in the Dominion, and I am sorry to say that right under the shadow of that college and right in the vicinity of that experimental farm we are not getting the information put into practice by the men there as we would like to see it put. As I have said before, there are weeds growing right beside the experimental farm, and 75 per cent of the cattle are below what they ought to be. If we are failing in what we set out to do in our experimental farm work, why increase the work and the expenditure? If you want to use the money already allotted, cut out some of the farms in the east and the west and go into the outlying districts, such as the Hudson bay region, in a small way. I do not want to curtail the work at Ottawa. I have no criticism to offer as regards that institution. The criticism I have to make is in regard to laying out hundreds of thousands of dollars in outlying points where insufficient return is received for the work we are carrying on there. I am expressing the views of a number of men in the country. If you look over the list, you will find many things that men who are in poor circumstances do not like. I find that on one farm the cheapest horses that were bought were four horses bought from one man for $750.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Which farm?

Mr. PRITCHARD: I cannot tell you which farm. The prices paid ran up to $500. Just by the way, the other day I was talking to a business man at home who has been a farmer, and he complained about a certain young man starting out to pay $125 each for two horses, saying that that was too much for him to pay. But we have plenty of money to pay $400 for a horse, whereas these people have an idea that they can go out and buy as good horses for $300. I find that $400 is paid for Jersey cows and these people think it may be possible for someone to go out and buy these cows for $300. Whether that is the case or not, these men who are paying the taxes imagine that that can be done. Many people throughout the country are feeling sore about this, and coming from an agricultural section I take the liberty of mentioning it. I do not want to speak disparagingly of the experimental farms, but I am dealing with this estimate and I think the increase should be cut out this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is it Guelph my hon. friend is talking about?

Mr. PRITCHARD: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Was that where the horses were bought?

Mr. PRITCHARD: No. I took all the farms and all the horses bought by the department.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend's leader a short time ago was lecturing about all these stallions being sold. Now my hon. friend thinks that we are paying too much for them.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I do.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member had better settle that with his leader. What is the use of discussing whether too much or too little has been paid for a horse, without seeing the horse. I cannot bring the horse in here as was done with the apples the other day. I do not want to discredit my hon. friend's criticism, but I have heard that kind of criticism quite frequently and I know it is entertained. My hon. friend represents a certain element in the community. I referred to it in the earlier part of the evening when I said that many people have no use for these farms. These are experimental farms. If my hon. friend wants commercial farms established and run, we shall have to have another vote for that. You cannot have that under this vote. These are farms primarily meant for experimentation. If you can make any revenue out of them, all well and good, but as a rule these experiments cost something. I remember the other evening the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Stewart), when we were discussing dehydrating plants with which we were experimenting, made a similar criticism. I will tell the committee something that I did not know at that time, that we have two commercial dehydrating plants that developed last fall. We did not give them any grant, but they are developing there, one in the Annapolis valley and one in the Okanagan valley. The comment of my hon. friend was that when they got going, it was hard to stop them, and so why not get them started commercially? We have started them commercially, but as a result of these experiments private capital has gone into them. When we are through with experimental farms, why cannot private capital develop these farms commercially? It is not the function of a government to develop commercially operated farms. Does my hon. friend think that any government under the sun can operate a farm as economically and successfully as a private individual can?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the late government we did, in the case of some of the greater production farms.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, but that was with Indians, not white men.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes, we operated them, the Indians did not. I admit, however, that I have no hopes of this government doing the same.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know of no greater production farm which has ever been operated more successfully by a government than by private individuals, except the greater production experiment which was carried out by Mr. William Graham, with the Indians.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If we did that with Indians, what could we not do with white men?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know what Indians can do, and I know that one thing which they can do is farming. They farm the way our forefathers did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are not Progressives.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are, in the strict meaning of the term. Now, I do not know where I was.

Mr. FORKE: I hardly know what the minister was trying to unload on me when he associated me with the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Pritchard). I really got up to help the minister out a little.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Thank you.

Mr. FORKE: While the hon. member for North Wellington was speaking about experimental farms I began to think about the one at Brandon. I have every summer made it a point to visit the experimental farm there, and I would say a word or two with reference to the gentleman who was formerly in charge, Mr. McKillican, who is now at the agriculture college in Winnipeg. As he has left the Brandon farm I am free to say what I like in praise of him. He has been making an effort for a number of years now to popularise that farm among the farmers in the vicinity who visit Brandon once or twice in the summer to discover what is going on there in the way of raising crops and live stock. Now, when you consider that that farm is divided into hundreds of plots, a quarter of an acre here growing one thing and another plot somewhere else growing something else, different kinds of grains being experimented with, you can readily realize how impossible it is to make a paying proposition of anything of that kind. It is in a different category entirely from any farm operated on a commercial basis. Then take the horticultural side of the farm; there you find experiments in plums and different kinds of fruit, some of them paying and others not. It is all an experiment, and it is a matter for the government to consider whether it is of sufficient benefit to the people for the money that is spent on it. That is the question; it is not a question of commercially operating the farm with profits in view. The object of the institution is to give information to the people in the surrounding country as to what can be done and what is the best variety of grain or the best grade of cattle, as the case may be.

I do not know anything about prices paid for live stock, but I would hesitate to suggest that the experimental farm at Brandon is not a success. It is a distinct benefit to the community and is increasing in popularity. Each year there are more and more people visiting the farm, and last year when I was down there looking over the crops there was a very large attendance. They bitched up teams and drove around the different fields, the man in charge explaining what the different varieties of grain were, and so on. Some were more liable to smut than others, while some were peculiarly liable to rust. I really think that a great deal of benefit is derived by the farmers from the institution, and the one criticism I have to offer is that the farmers do not take sufficient advantage of the experiments that are carried on in their interests. They do not realize the privilege that is within their reach. I want to pay a tribute to Mr. McKillican, and I do it all the more cheerfully because he is out of the department, being now engaged by the province of Manitoba. Certainly he did a great deal to popularize the Brandon farm. I had almost forgotten to mention that the women find a great deal to interest them in the farm; they go there to find out what can best be raised in the way of vegetables and things of that kind.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The speech of my hon. friend is to the point, and I thank him for the tribute he has paid. If he would be good enough to do so, he might take his follower from North Wellington with him to the farm and give him a few kindergarten lessons.

Mr. BROWN: I have visited only two or three farms but those that I have seen amply justify their existence. That at any rate is my opinion. One of these farms in my own constituency I had the pleasure of visiting at the same time as the minister (Mr. Motherwell).

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, we had a good time too.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, we did have a good time; nor do I think that anyone could visit that farm which is operated at Morden without being impressed with the value of the work that is done there. I do not suppose the experimental farm there is conducted in such a way as to show a profit, any more than any one of the rest of them. Nevertheless, they are doing a work of incalculable value to the people of the northwest. My hon. friend (Mr. Forke) has seen fit to pay a tribute to the man formerly in charge of the Brandon farm; I would pay a similar tribute to the young man in charge of the farm at Morden. I am surprised that such things should be said as were said by the hon. member for North Wellington. The fact that there are some farms in the vicinity of these stations that still show signs of weeds and bad farming is aside from the point altogether. I might remind my hon. friend of the old saying, the nearer the church the further from grace. That may be true in regard to some of these farms, although of course I do not suggest that it is necessarily so.

We should like to see these farms carried on as economically as possible, of course; but we cannot reasonably expect them to show a balance on the right side of the ledger from the strictly money point of view. There was one point brought up by the hon. member for Brandon on which I could not quite agree with him, and that is in reference to feeding on the farms and at home. If my hon. friend has some straw stacks out in the prairies in which his cattle are running around, he will realize that he has something that is absolutely of no market value, and which at the same time is of value when fed in that particular way. If he will bear that in mind he will perhaps realize that there is not so much ground for his criticism after all. I think we all realize that on the farms we have an immense amount of roughage that can be profitably used there and nowhere else.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I want to say a word about the decreasing value of the older farms, but before I do so I must take issue with the minister on a statement he made a little while ago in regard to stock feeding. I do not consider myself an expert farmer, but I do know something about feeding stock, because this is something I have had to do from the age of ten. The minister made the statement that while it was impossible to purchase feed and feed at a profit it was possible to grow the same feed on the farm and then feed profitably.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I said more than that.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is part of what was said by the minister.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I said a lot of roughage would go to waste anyhow.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Precisely; but I would point out that very little of that roughage is of any value in finishing stock. To my mind, the value of hay or grain or any other form of feed you grow is exactly the value you can get for it on the market. If I have a bunch of young cattle I want to fatten —baby beef—and I have a stock of hay and other feed, I take the value of the stock unfed and the value of the feed as it stands, that is, the price I can get for it on the open market, and if I can get more by selling the two separately I will do so. If I cannot make money feeding that stuff at the market price, then I cannot make money either by growing it or buying it. Every pound of feed grown on your own place and fed to your own stock is worth exactly what you can get for it on the open market. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Pritchard) might not be so far out of line as the minister intimated. He said this was an experimental vote. I quite agree with him, and I suggest that one of the chief experiments should be to see if we could carry on farming at a profit. Certainly that might be considered in the light of experimental work.

I did hold the view very strongly that our older farms had practically outlived their usefulness, but I have rather changed my mind. I can say so the more frankly because I am speaking of a farm which will not be in my constituency after redistribution, so no one can accuse me of talking politics.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Lacombe?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes. In the newer districts they have certain problems. Take Lacombe, the first experiments were to see what grain could be grown in the surrounding district which would not be subject to frost, to find out how cattle could be fed on grass, and so on. That phase has passed away. The important phase now is to study crop rotation, because you are dealing now with soil which has been depleted of much of its natural humus. Consequently an altogether different set of problems have to be studied. I may say that I put in some time last summer in going into the business aspect of that farm, because I had felt that this was a vote which might well be reduced without impairing the efficiency of the farm. I took the trouble to see how much correspondence had passed between the farm and the farmers of the surrounding country in order to gauge the value of the farm to the farmers within a hundred mile radius. I estimated the number of visitors. I was surprised at some of the results. The letters numbered about 20,000, and I found by inquiry among the farmers within that radius that the most valuable were the negative results.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is right.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: At times we in that country are deluged with literature and pestered by salesmen advocating some new kind of seed that is frost proof, rust proof, cutworm proof, drouth proof and everything else; in a word, the seed will make our fortunes. Hundreds of farmers have paid out good money on the strength of such representations. This experimental farm carries on experiments with grain seed offered for sale, and they advise the people of the district whether the seed is of the quality represented. I made an estimate, based on the number of inquiries received by them and on the answers given me by farmers in the district, and I have reached the conclusion that the experimental work resulted in a saving of at least $80,000 because the farmers had not bought this useless seed that they would otherwise have wasted their money on. That negative result is something I had not considered before.

While I believe the farm has been carried on well, and while I believe that Mr. Reed and his staff are not only capable but enthusiastic, anxious to do their work and give all the service possible yet I think some lines of experimentation are being duplicated in the province. For instance, we have stock feeding experiments conducted at Edmonton, one hundred miles away, by the university under provincial auspices. We could very well come to an arrangement by which the federal farms and the provincial institutions might carry on experimental work along different lines and so avoid unnecessary duplication. Undoubtedly a considerable saving could be effected by a careful system along that line. After going through the district and observing the beneficial influence that has been exerted by the farm in the last year, for instance all through that part of the country the people are growing shelter belts, flowers, small fruits and shrubbery, I believe the farm has been worth while and is still doing exceedingly good work. But I should like to have the minister take steps so that as far as possible—and I discussed this very frankly with Mr. Reed—no duplication of research and experimental work should be continued as between the federal experimental farms and the provincial institutions. I believe it would be easy to arrange for certain phases of the work to be taken over absolutely by each class of institution, that is, when they are close together and the conditions are comparable. I have not made a careful estimate of the saving that could be effected, but when we discussed it we were agreed that undoubtedly a considerable saving would result and the money so saved might be devoted to the carrying on of experimental work that is now being neglected.

As I said at the outset, I visited the farm under the impression that the vote ought to be reduced, but after going through all the books and files I came away very dubious as to the ability of the manager to reduce his expenditure by one dollar, because it did seem to me that he had made a dollar stretch to a dollar and a half wherever he possibly could, even to the extent of taking off his coat and working after hours. But I also came to the conclusion that when the management is efficient—and I say this because I do not know whether the management is equally efficient elsewhere—and they recognize the changing nature of the problems to be dealt with, keeping a little ahead of the farms in the surrounding country, these old farms are still doing good work and might well be continued.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It would be well if more hon. members would follow the example of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) and visit these farms. I find that a distressingly small number of public men visit our experimental farms at Lacombe and Lethbridge. I had the same view regarding these older farms, but I find that new problems present themselves with changing conditions, and I do not know when the time will come that these farms will not be useful. The other proposition regarding overlapping is something we have all along the line more or less. We are trying to cut it out all we can, but in a system of farms like that the provincial men will have their ideas and our men will have theirs. I think, though, we can still travel a little bit further and a little bit faster along the lines suggested, with a view to avoiding overlapping.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: About half an hour ago the minister said that these old farms had lost their value and he recommended the appointment of a commission with a view to eliminating a great many of them; that an experimental farm was really not much use except in the newer districts. But now, if I understand him correctly, he is advocating the value of the old farms. I do not know which view he is going to carry out after this item is voted, but I do know that the minister is advancing two or three different policies. We would like to know what his views really are. If he does not approve of his farms, why not pare down the estimate? The minister said there was a tendency to increase these appropriations for experimental farms just before an election; that everybody liked to have an experimental farm in his vicinity. Well, there is an increase of $40,000 again this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But not for new experimental farms.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At any rate, there is an increase. The hon. member for Haldimand asked for some information with regard to fruit growing, and the minister stated that if we did not hand these things out to the provinces they would go ahead and do the work themselves. Why not have a uniform system? Why not treat all provinces alike? Why discriminate against one province and favour others?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is my hon. friend referring to Ontario? We cannot press these things upon Ontario; they must want them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They want them and want them badly. New farms are being established by the provincial government in Quebec almost every year. The farm in connection with the Agricultural College at Guelph is one of the best on the continent, and that work is being done entirely by the provincial government. The minister has said that you cannot carry on this experimental work and demonstrate that you are able to make a profit. But surely with twenty-one farms, one hundred acres here and there might be used to show what the cost of operating a farm under ordinary conditions is and what the ordinary revenues would be. That information would be of great value to many people. With regard to the receipts from the farms, the minister stated that the Auditor General's report did not contain that information; I think it does contain it. I notice that the receipts from all the experimental farms for the last year were $125,814 and that there was expended on wages on the one farm at Ottawa $192,017. I do not want to leave a wrong impression with the committee; of this $192,017 the salaries of officials amounted to $29,496, but the cost of ordinary farm labour on this one farm was $162,520

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not ordinary farm labour.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, ordinary farm labour, according to the Auditor General's statement. I think we are justified in asking that some real demonstration work should be done, even on an experimental farm, to show the actual cost of production. Work of this nature is being done at the Ontario Agricultural College farm at Guelph. I know this does not make any impression on the minister; he is going to ask the House to vote this money again, even though he takes the view that a lot of it is absolutely wasted and that a commission should be appointed with a view to doing away with some of these farms. I do not agree that the old farms cannot do useful work. In fact, if an experimental farm can do good work at all it is in the old settled districts. Where the land is new, crops of almost any kind can be grown without much effort; it is in the old settled districts that the greatest problems arise and where science can be applied and remedies provided to bring about better results. A few years ago the minister held the same view that he holds to-day—that the old farms have outlived their usefulness. I think the minister ought to comply with the request of the hon. member for Haldimand and bring down a statement showing the amount of money to be voted for these farms and illustration stations in each province so that we shall have a fairly good idea of what is being done. The minister talks about the need for economy and refers to the cutting down of estimates. It is true that the government have cut down the estimates in some respects. The appropriations for the building of highways have been struck out and the provinces now have to provide the money to carry on this work without the assistance of the federal government. The same thing holds with regard to federal aid to agriculture under the Agricultural Instruction Act; nothing more is to be done along that line and the provincial governments have to take up the work themselves. Then there was the housing question; the government have eliminated assistance under that head, and they have refused to give any assistance in the matter of unemployment. They are paring down these items in refusing to do anything, but when it comes to a matter of experimental farms, many of which the minister states are of very little use and ought to be done away with, there is no reduction but on the contrary an increase of $40,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My deputy has figured up the amounts that are being spent in each province. They are as follows, in round figures: Prince Edward Island, $42,000; Nova Scotia, $86,000; New Brunswick, $44,000; Quebec, $165,000; Ontario, $57,000, outside of the Ottawa farm; Manitoba, $75,000; Saskatchewan, $144,000; Alberta, $87,000; British Columbia, $140,000. You will notice a considerable disparity when we come to British Columbia. Because of its tremendous variety of conditions, with its valleys and mountains, it has been found advisable, and I have no doubt justifiable, for it to have more forms than some of the other provinces; but that does not account for Saskatchewan having four farms, while Alberta and Manitoba have only two. I do not think even my hon. friend from South Oxford, however, would hold me responsible for the way these farms are distributed, because they were all there before I had anything to do with them. My good friend has tried to make out—I do not know exactly what he was trying to make out, but I think he was trying to show that I had two or three policies, and yet had none at all. As I intimated the first year I took charge, I thought some of the older farms could be dispensed with. I think now more farms can be dispensed with, without designating whether they are new or old. I have had just the same experience as my hon. friend from Red Deer. The closer I get to some of the old farms, the more familiar I become with them, the more I find that their problems are changing with the passing of years, and though they may not be quite so useful to the settlers as they were in earlier days, we find they are still required. We find farms existing in the old countries for over a thousand years, and finding new problems all the time. It is not an easy matter to decide on just which four or five farms we can dispense with and still have enough left, not so much for the purpose of teaching agriculture in their respective provinces but for co-operating with the provinces working in conjunction with the Central farm. That is what we want them for rather than for teaching agriculture in their respective provinces, which is primarily a provincial duty.

My hon. friend from South Oxford has got that same idea that the farms can be run commercially, or at all events he pretended to have that idea; I do not really think he believes it for whatever faults he may have he is a practical farmer, and he knows just as well as I do that if he had to hire all the labour for his farm, including his farm foreman, he would have to hunt around for his profit. There are over eight hundred thousand people conducting commercial farms; so why should the government go into that business? One of the vital problems in making a farm pay is the difficulty of getting competent farm foremen. I know this myself. I hunted around for them, but I never had a proper one yet; I never found one that could get the same results out of my machinery and team that I could myself. I do not know what further I can tell my hon. friend. I have given him the figures for Ontario and all the other provinces, but if there is anything I have overlooked, and he will repeat his question, I will try to answer him; but it will be difficult to convince me that you can run a farm successfully when you have to hire all your labour. I understand that my hon. friend had ambitions at one time of being Minister of Agriculture. If he ever has that experience, I would suggest that he try it out and see how it works. Maybe some day the opportunity will come his way.

Mr. HANSON: What particular lines of policy are you following at the farm at Fredericton? What particular problems is the superintendent there carrying on?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The biggest problem is to get the stones out and get the ploughing done. We will be able to build houses for the foreman and all the men before we get all the stones off that place.

Mr. HANSON: That is said very facetiously. That is not a fair answer to my question. I admit that on one part of the farm, where they are building a new house on the crown of the hill, there are stones; but it is not a bad farm. It is a very good high land farm in the immediate vicinity of Fredericton, as good a one as can be found in the district. I would ask the minister to tell me seriously, if he can get his mind down to a serious problem, just what problems Mr. Bailey, who is a first-class man and is trying very hard to interest the farmers in central New Brunswick in the farm, is devoting his attention to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not mean to make any reflections on the farm. This is getting kind of dry, and as the hon. member for South Oxford does not seem to be contributing to the entertainment, I thought I would do a little myself. But the big problem at Fredericton really is getting out the stones, so that we can get on with the ploughing. I may say that they are using not only horse-power but ox power, and I was very glad to see that, because it is a cheap and economical means of supplying power for the breaking of a new farm. A great many of the Maritime farms at the outset have a shortage of lime in the soil. That condition is more pronounced in the other two Maritime provinces, and the problem is to supply the soil with some antacid or mussel mud. Then in addition, there will be the growing of clover and grass and the rotation of crops. I did not mean to disparage the farm at all. I was rather pleased with the work done there, and if my hon. friend had just given me time I was going on to tell him of the work, but he was so loyal to his district he was afraid I might not come to the other part.

Mr. TOLMIE: A little earlier in the debate, remarks were made with regard to the necessity of an experimental farm in northern British Columbia. When I was minister I was over that territory, and I found it a very rich country with a great future, particularly in agriculture. It is a fine grass country that gives great promise as a live stock producing area, particularly in the dairying line. I think at the very earliest opportunity a farm should be established in the best place in that great northern section, an empire in itself.

11 p.m.

With regard to the removal of the experimental farm at Agassiz, that farm has rendered a very valuable service during the time it has been located there. I can quite understand it would not be of great value to the hon. member for Cariboo because he is located in the dry belt area and under conditions quite different from those prevailing in the section where the Agassiz farm is located, where there is a heavy rainfall. No one can say that the farm at Agassiz has not done good work, after the splendid record it has made particularly in dairying. It has won some of the world's records in the cattle produced on that farm; it has also done excellent work in hogs, poultry, and also in connection with other field experiments. I think it has been very valuable to the Fraser valley section of British Columbia in general. I do not agree with this idea that the minister has presented on one or two occasions to-night, that just as soon as the country gets settled you must move the farm away to some new area.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have expressed doubts about the wisdom of that.

Mr. TOLMIE: The minister expressed himself both ways earlier in the evening.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. TOLMIE: The minister seemed to change his statement a little later on. I desire to say that as a district settles up and farms become more numerous farming problems are greater than they were previously, and an experimental farm located in that district can be of much greater benefit because more people come in contact with it. The minister has presented another problem to-night in connection with the lack of interest taken in our farms. I want to say that, when Minister of Agriculture a few years ago, one of the things that struck me very much indeed was the fact that the farmers do not take advantage of their opportunities of visiting their experimental farms and seeing what splendid lessons they can learn there.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. TOLMIE: Just the same way in connection with the remarks I made earlier in regard to our exhibitions and the splendid feeding experiments carried on there. The farmers do not take advantage of these, but prefer to send the live stock to market, and grow scrub stock, when they might as well grow good stock. If agriculture is to be made a success, it does not matter what effort the government may make, the farmer has to assist to a very great extent.

Mr. HODGINS: The minister spoke a few moments ago about the chilled meat sent to the Old Country. Would he give us any further information in regard to that? Has he any idea of continuing the experiment?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will be glad to send my hon. friend the bulletin, but we do not have it here. I referred to it fully last year, and we had a very good discussion in regard to it on the live stock vote. The vote will not stand a continuance of the experiment. We are going to lose money. We would require to continue the experiment at least a year or two more to get any results, and it is quite possible we would have to establish butcher shops in Great Britain, because of the difficulty of getting the meat sold on its merits as Canadian beef. That would mean considerable expenditure of money, and there are objections to establishing wholesale butcher shops. I do not know how they would be received by your brother butcher shops which have been trading for a number of years. I think it would probably cause a good deal of friction. In the absence of these butcher shops I do not see anything but a substantial loss of money. The stockers are selling pretty well now.

Mr. HODGINS: Does the minister not think he could establish some sort of co-operation with our packing plants and establish that trade? The handling of live stock overseas seems to me to be the most expensive method you can possibly adopt. If there were some system by which you could handle chilled beef, put it on the market and place it in your retail stores in conjunction with the Canadian Packing Companies the trade might be established. I think that is the only feasible way of handling our live stock business.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is quite a bit of sense in what my hon. friend says, but he will have to help me create the impression through the country that co-operating with the packers is a safe line of business. There is a tremendously foolish prejudice throughout the country and nine-tenths of it is quite unwarranted. The packers have done a great deal of good work to improve our live stock industry, but we have not accepted it very graciously. It is only by team play in these times that we are going to get the maximum results. I had the pleasure—my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) will not object to my making the statement—of accepting an invitation to Gunn's Limited, where some sixty members of his staff and sixty members of the staff of the Health of Animals branch had an evening's entertainment, and the usual nice dinner, but no four point four stuff or anything like that. We had the usual after-dinner speeches. I feel if I did as my hon. friend suggests I would have a hornet's nest around my ears. I am not speaking of the sentiment down here because I am not familiar with it, but there is a tremendous sentiment to be found largely in the west; they are prejudiced against the packers and have no confidence in any experiment in connection with them. It is something like the prejudice we find against public men, and if my hon. friend stays in parliament long enough he will probably find the sentiment directed against himself.

Mr. HODGINS: I will not stay.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is something that develops against the big fellow. I think there is something in what my hon. friend says, and possibly they have been conducting experiments. One of our primary objects in our experiments was to check up the figures to see if they were bona fide experiments, because some people were suggesting to us that we could not rely on the factory experiment, that we should make one for ourselves, and in order to remove that suspicion we did so.

Mr. SNOWBALL: I was very much pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. Minister of Agriculture in regard to the benefit mussel mud is to the farms in New Brunswick, that it needs that element to make them productive, especially the rocky experimental farm in the constituency of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). There is a considerable amount of mussel mud available in the constituency from which I come, and I will be glad if the minister will put something in the estimates to have that mud transported to other districts as well as used by farmers in the locality, so that they may get the benefit of it. Provision should be made to enable the farmers to use the mussel mud more than they are able to do at the present time.

Mr. FORKE: I have been a little puzzled at a remark the hon. minister made. He suggested some connection between a member of parliament and a packing house. Will he kindly explain what he meant?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would like to answer the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball). I looked into the proposition he presents, and I find this mussel mud is usually dug out when the water is frozen, often on the ice, carried to the adjoining land and hauled in the summer time. I understood it could not be hauled more than eight or ten miles by team to advantage, and a suggestion was made that there should be a spur run into the bay at the island, in order to facilitate the transportation of it more interiorly, and thereby make more use of it. To men out on the prairie it would be a joke, but it is no joke down in the Maritime provinces. It is a real requisite, but the long haul is very expensive and they require eight or ten loads to the acre. We have nothing in this vote to assist that and I have no plan whereby assistance could be granted. At the same time, however, it is an interesting proposition that might be looked into with advantage.

Mr. McKILLOP: Has the minister had any reports lately as to how the premium which is being paid on bacon hogs is working out? A few years ago the minister first announced that this premium was going to be paid and the farmers throughout the country received the news with great pleasure. But I have had several complaints lately that the hog producer is not receiving the premium; that in many cases, when they bring their hogs to the local shipper, they do not receive more for them than they do for the ordinary kind of hog, and therefore many of them are dissatisfied and have quit trying to raise the bacon type of hogs. Has the minister had any complaints along this line?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend, I think, refers to those who sell to drovers at a flat rate?

Mr. McKILLOP: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know how you can get over that. The only way is to encourage the hog producers to form co-operative shipping societies, ship to the packers and get the government grader there to grade the hog and the buyer to buy it on the basis of the grade, taking the "thick, smooth" as the foundation of the price and "selects" at ten per cent more. In the small places where the drovers buy, they buy on the flat rate. In fact, I do not see you are going to reach them unless you encourage them to ship in the hogs in carload lots, have a farmer accompanying them and have the hogs marked with tags in the ear to indicate the owner. Then they can get the grade and price according to the grade. That has been done in the west through co-operative shipping associations.

Mr. McKILLOP: At the present time I understand the local shipper or the packer is receiving the benefit of the premium.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it will be the drover. If the drover buys a hog at the price of a "thick, smooth", and he gets the price of a "select" out of it, he gets the ten per cent. The packer does not get the benefit; he pays his money for the "selects", no matter who brings them. That is why the drovers are invariably against the grading. They want the flat price because there is more money in it for them.

Mr. DOUCET: In the earlier part of the evening when I suggested to the minister an illustration station on the north shore of New Brunswick for the purpose of demonstrating the fertilizer value of mussel mud, he said that twenty illustration stations were there located. I find from the Auditor General's report that the only amount paid for illustration stations in my county, where the mussel mud experiment could be conducted, was something like $110 at Rexton. I do not find any for the neighbouring county of Northumberland, and I find a small amount of about $80 for the county represented in this House by the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp). I point this out merely to show that even in that northern section of the province many illustration stations could be established where experiments could be conducted with mussel mud for the purpose of showing to the farming population the fertilizing ingredients contained therein.

Mr. STANSELL: I do not want to be understood as criticizing unfairly experimental farms, because I realize the value of the work that is done by them. It is, however, only fair to say that there has been criticism, not confined to this House, as to the number of experimental farms actually needed in Canada. It must be apparent to all that an experimental farm, no matter what the nature of the work, is valuable only in proportion to the degree that the farmers avail themselves of the results of that experiment. We can readily understand that an experimental farm does not need to be located close to the farmer who is to receive benefit from it. That is easily seen from the fact that farms in close proximity to experimental farms are usually not much more up to date or better operated than ones at a distance from them. The reason for this is plain. The only farmers who can benefit are those who are willing to apply the result of the experiments to their own operations, and that can be done just as easily from the reports sent out from the farm by the man who lives twenty, thirty or forty miles away as by the man who is quite close to the farm itself. The work of experimenting, it seems to me, could be very well carried on in one central farm in a province. I cannot see the necessity of having three or four or more experimental farms in a province except under very exceptional circumstances. I have many times heard the criticism that there is too much overlapping and that there are too many experimental farms to be in the best interest of the work. Whether this is so or not, I am more than ever convinced to-night that it is by the statements of the minister himself. The minister told us some time ago that he really believed there were too many and that some might very well be done away with. If this is true, there never was a time when that policy was needed more than it is at present. Everywhere we are asked to practise economy. The government is faced with a falling revenue and there is a necessity for economy in expenditure. I think I can speak for the farming population in this country in saying that they are willing to bear their share of real economy in order to help balance revenue and expenditure. If what the minister has told us to-night is true that some farms could well be done away with, why not begin that policy now? Why the necessity of increasing the vote at this particular time when we should be trying to economize? What is the necessity of appointing a commission? The minister states that he believes there are too many of these farms. I cannot see why it is necessary in a matter of this kind when everything is within the knowledge of the minister and when he has the power, that he should appoint a commission to deal with a little matter like this. Especially when Mr. Preston is otherwise employed just now, why cannot the minister deal with it himself?

I have suggested that it might be possible to do with less experimental work; that in each province one or at the most two properly located and well conducted experimental farms should be sufficient. Other work necessary could be done in a small way possibly by illustration farms in different localities: If this is true—and I believe it is—I should like to ask the minister how many illustration farms he has at the present time, where they are located by province, what is the approximate cost of operation and what is the average acreage?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The acreage is about forty acres to the farm. Sometimes it is not quite that. There are 143 illustration farms. I have not given them by provinces, but while we are looking them up, I will tell my hon. friend why I think it is not advisable just now to make any reduction, until the provinces are consulted. I have discussed the question of reducing the number of provincial farms with two provincial authorities, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan, and we have further deliberations to enter into before we can take any action, because it is not wise to take action with respect to this matter without consulting the respective provincial departments of agriculture and the respective governments. I have suggested, not a commission but a committee of disinterested men to look into the matter because their recommendations would be freer from, shall I say, bias, than would the recommendations of the minister. He might be accused of partiality towards his own province, his own party or his particular riding, and for that reason it would be better to have an independent committee. I could make the selection right now, for I have my mind almost made up as to where we might do the paring. But I question the advisability of doing it arbitrarily in that way. I think we should consult all the provincial governments affected before doing anything. It has been recommended that we should have co-operation with a view to cutting out the overlapping, and that is a good suggestion. One of the very first things to consider would be co-operation with the provinces in the matter of suggested changes; and in the meantime, while that is being decided, we should keep the farms in a respectable condition.

Mr. STANSELL: The minister has been thinking of this matter for the past two or three years and he admits that it is nothing new. Why not begin in a small way and, instead of increasing the estimate $40,000, come forward with the former estimate if not a lower? Where are the 143 illustration farms located?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are in British Columbia 13, in Alberta 15, in Saskatchewan 24, in Manitoba 8, in Ontario 8, in Quebec 43, in New Brunswick 20, in Nova Scotia 12 and in Prince Edward Island 8.

Mr. McKILLOP: Has the minister any record of the number of hogs the packers take in in the course of a year on which a premium is paid?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, we have a record. The first year it was very small; it depends on the province. We get more in the Maritime provinces as a rule, in proportion to population, than anywhere else.

Mr. McKILLOP: I think the highest number is in Ontario.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is right, yes, Ontario and then the Maritime provinces. In some of the provinces the tendency has been to grow fat hogs, but in all of them there has been a marked improvement in the increased number of selects. This is a business that can be developed rapidly, and it is showing considerable improvement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: With regard to hog grading, the minister informed us a little while ago that the government graders were doing good work. But he admits that a great many of those hogs shipped direct to the stockyards are not graded at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Those shipped to the stockyards are graded there; the drovers do not grade them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The producer does not get the benefit. Why are hogs not bought according to quality the same as beef animals? Why employ an army of graders to grade hogs for the packing companies, who should buy their hogs according to quality as they do beef animals? The minister knows very well that while he employs graders to go to the packing companies he keeps no check on the meat that passes through the packing houses. He can give no information concerning the proportion of the meat that is sold as select, but as a matter of fact it is all sold as select; they do not mark it anything else. The people of this country have to pay the price of select but they are not getting it. Why does the minister not exercise control over the packers as well as over the farmers? I do not see why we should have all these vexatious regulations governing the producer, while we give other people a free hand to do as they see fit. The minister has his officials all over Ontario just now threatening the people that unless they do so and so the law will be enforced. Egg grading, for instance, has to be carried out throughout the country; with what result? Eggs are sold as seconds just as the farmer sells his hogs, not as selects but for a lower grade, where they are not taken to the packing company. And this thing will result in a lower price paid for the eggs although a higher price will be charged the consumer. If there is one commodity in regard to which there is no necessity for all this process of grading by government officials it is eggs. Eggs are either good or bad; and as to size, you might sell them by weight if you cared to. At all events, I do not see why we should have an army of officials who do not encourage but rather discourage people who would like to do something. The whole fact is that we have too many restrictions. Here are two items in connection with which we are asked to vote upwards of $2,000,000. and the minister admits that a great deal of what is being done is practically useless.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not admit that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Well, then, what about the farms which the minister admits should be eliminated? Is that not an admission that they are useless? With regard to the graders, the minister knows very well that if there is anything that requires attention on the part of the officials of his department it is the food sold to the consumer. But nothing is done in that direction.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But that would only take more inspectors.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would it not be better to put the inspectors where they would do valuable work? The packing companies are anxious to have the graders do for them what they should have done for themselves years ago. There is no reason why they should not pay for the hogs they get on the basis of quality, just as they pay for beef animals. Why does the minister not employ graders to grade beef animals as well as hogs?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You have to start somewhere, and the proposition was worked out by the various provincial ministers, as well as the Swine Breeders' Association and the federal Department of Agriculture in the fall of 1921 before I came to Ottawa, as my hon. friend (Mr. Tolmie) knows. We took over the plant and we are doing our best to give it a chance; and I believe it will go, if we have not too many people in the country roaring against it. My hon. friend asks why we do not follow it up with grading bacon. Well, it takes all our time to get the graders to grade the hogs. We have had one of the best experts we could secure engaged in studying the question of bacon requirements, and he has gone to the Old Country in this connection. This gentleman came back and we discussed the subject with him on his return. The Dominion government was asked by Great Britain to appoint two representatives on the Imperial Marketing committee, and this man we recommended as one. He is over there now and will complete his investigation in due course. But if we employ more graders, the first complaint will be registered by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that we are stacking up another bunch of inspectors. You cannot have it both ways, Mr. Chairman. If new duties are to be imposed upon my department I must have additional men. We are going along in the direction my hon. friend indicates as rapidly as we can get the men and the money.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is the committee to infer from the minister's remarks that he proposes to appoint graders to grade beef animals too?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. There is no demand for that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There certainly has not been a demand for the egg graders. I can assure the minister that there are very pronounced protests against these obnoxious restrictions.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For anybody who wants to make political capital out of it. There is a complete system of egg grading in Prince Edward Island and the other Maritime provinces, also in the three prairie provinces. The only place where we have had to do any stimulating to get the system adopted is in the province my hon. friend comes from, and I do not know whether his agitation has retarded its adoption or not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this is the province where the people have to work for a living. The minister informed us how the westerner could produce beef cattle successfully by going around the hotels in white pants and starched collars. We cannot produce beef in Ontario that way.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not recommend that system anywhere.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That may be the case in western Canada; in Ontario the minister may impose all the restrictions he likes, but he cannot force the people to produce this stuff if they do not wish to do so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not trying to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I believe by his regulations the minister is driving people out of the business by hundreds. The minister has done most of the talking on this very large item to-night, and he has talked around it and succeeded in confusing the committee so that we really do not know what he meant after he got through. I should like some information about the Seasonal Hints which have been published by the experimental farm. As the minister knows, in Ontario you are confronted by these pamphlets in every bank and post office, there is a stack of them on the desks and you are invited to take one and to apply at the nearest experimental farm for information. Well, if we have to go to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick for information it does not do us much good in Ontario. How much is being spent on this publication? There is another feature worth considering. The people in the Old Land, for instance, are anxious to obtain information about Canada, and they naturally look to the government publications for this information. But in the reports of the experimental farms Ontario is scarcely mentioned. They are growing tobacco down in western Ontario, and frozen oats and hay and some other stuff up along the Transcontinental railway in the northern part of the province. But so far as the rest of Ontario is concerned, which presents the very best opportunities for people who are coming out to engage in farming and to learn farming—we have coached tens of thousands of young fellows, and then they hike to the west where they can get cheap land and become farmers for themselves—so far as the rest of Ontario is concerned, I say, the province is discriminated against, because intending immigrants from the Old Country do not find anything about Ontario in these government publications. This item of $2,600,000 is of some consideration in these times, and I think it deserves a little more serious attention than the minister has been inclined to devote to it to-night. It is a popular thing to increase these votes just before an election, but surely the minister does not want the impression to go abroad that the experimental farms are not doing the work that the people expect they are doing.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am trying to improve them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should like to know the cost of these Seasonal Hints.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend spoke about publications.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, the publications I referred to are the reports of the experimental farms, which reports are not available to the prospective immigrant. The shipping agents in the Old Country naturally get all the information they can about Canada, but this information so far as Ontario is concerned is practically a blank; they see abundance of it with regard to farms located in all the other provinces. This is the penalty Ontario pays for having borne the cost of this experimental work herself. The same discrimination against Ontario prevails in the Immigration department. The provincial government for years has had to do this work and pay for it, while the federal government has been doing it for all the other provinces. This is absolutely unfair. The minister exclaims, "Why, if these things are not done for the other provinces they will likely do them themselves." But why penalize them for bearing the expense? Why should Ontario suffer by reason of the fact that the federal government does little or nothing for experimental work in the province, and fails to furnish the prospective immigrant with the information he is seeking about farming opportunities in Ontario. These Seasonal Hints which are sent all over Ontario are really an insult to the people. What do they cost?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About $5,000.

Mr. McKILLOP: A little earlier this evening the minister remarked that Essex and Kent were great tobacco-producing counties. I would ask him not to forget to add the county of Elgin the next time he is talking about tobacco production in Ontario. During the past few years the county of Elgin has had from 700 to 1,000 acres under tobacco, and we expect this coming season the area will be increased to about 1,500 acres. The county produces very good tobacco. With respect to the regulations governing the premium on bacon hogs, is it not about time the minister made a change so that the producer may receive the benefit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We changed them a few months ago. Only two grades are graded by the graders now, "thick-smooth" and "select." As to the other grades, the buyer and the seller do their own negotiating, and if they disagree as to the grade they call in the grader to arbitrate.

Mr. McKILLOP: The local shipper you are referring to now?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no way of reaching the local shipper. He is in the same position as the local shipper of grain. The man who sells to a local shipper on a flat rate basis cannot get the benefit of any grade. The system cannot be applied to the man who will not use his chances of co-operating with his neighbours and shipping in car lots.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. GARDINER: The minister informed the committee a few moments ago that we have 143 illustration stations. Are those stations owned by the government or is the land rented?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The farms are owned by the farmers and operated by them under the advice and supervision of a member of the experimental farm staff.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the average cost of these illustration farms?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About $300.

Mr. GARDINER: I have been studying this question of experimental farms and I have come to the conclusion that the work in that connection is not giving the benefit to the people that it should, simply because it is impossible to get to the farmers the information that can be derived from that work. I suggest that the illustration station is far more valuable than some of the present experimental farms and that it would well repay this country if we put more money into the illustration stations and less into the experimental farm work. I have had the pleasure on more than one occasion of observing the work of these illustration stations. They are usually very close to a small town or village, on highways that are much used by the farmers, and as the farmers go to market or to town, as the case may be, they pass these illustration stations and see what is being done. Personally I believe that the results would be more beneficial if the illustration station plan was extended and the experimental farm work reduced.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Thank you.

Mr. STANSELL: Most of the information I intended to ask for has been given in answer to the hon. member (Mr. Gardiner). Like him, I have been of the opinion that good results could be accomplished by increasing the work of the illustration farms, and that without greatly burdening the taxpayer. What I wanted to know was about the average cost. Am I correct in inferring that the average size is about fifty acres?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Forty.

Mr. SENN: A year or two ago the federal department entered into some kind of arrangement with regard to the importation of sheep, and I think that policy was carried out last year. Is it the intention to continue it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think last year was the first year we adopted that policy. A few Rambouillets have been brought in from the United States by the Sheep Breeders' Association, with some assistance and supervision by members of the Department of Agriculture, who assisted in making the selections. All the other breeds we have been handling are prohibited entry under the embargo on account of the foot and mouth disease.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Two years ago the minister intimated that the department intended to import pure bred animals and to use the central farms as distributing centres to supply the surrounding districts. Many complaints have been made as to the unfairness of the government's entering into competition with people engaged in legitimate business, yet the government have been paying officials to go over to the Old Land, buy stock there, bring it out here and sell it in competition with breeders of live stock in this country. Does he consider that that is a proper policy for the government to pursue?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We endeavour to carry only such stock as the capacity of each farm will permit. We have practically no complaints of the character my hon. friend has mentioned; in fact, our activities develop such a demand throughout the country for pure bred stock and better stock that the result has been to increase rather than to lessen the sales to private breeders. The same question came up some years ago in connection with the distribution of trees by the Forestry department. It was urged that the private nurseries would be injured, but the reverse actually happened; the business of the nurseries was increased very considerably.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have received a letter from Nova Scotia to-day complaining about this very matter and pointing out the unfairness of the government's entering into this business in competition with those in this country who have invested their money in it and have been endeavouring to carry on. I do not think this is a matter that comes within the province of the federal government. The government have enough to do to look after things that are absolutely necessary, and they should not venture into such new fields as the Department of Agriculture have been entering upon. Many vexatious restrictions have been put into force by that department during the last few years, but I believe this establishing of breeding depots at these farms is about the worst. The minister says they are carrying on this work just to the capacity of the farms. Well, what is the capacity of the farms? If you import stock and keep it there a week, two weeks or a month—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We do not do that at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister informed the House two years ago that that was what he proposed to do, and I believe a good deal of it has been done in the Maritime provinces as well as in other parts of the country. The minister intimated that was his policy.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has got the two problems mixed. These importations of sheep are made by the provinces, and we place them. We rarely import even breeding animals for the use of the farms, but occasionally we do import hogs and sheep. But we do not bring them here and then retail them to the farmers. We import only what we require for the various farms, and then we breed from them on our own farms. My hon. friend thinks we are doing a retail business in them, importing them and retailing them, but that is not the situation at all. We have not done that in one single instance.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am afraid I shall have to send for Hansard and read the minister's policy on this matter given a few years ago. I protested against it at the time, and I know complaints have kept on coming in. I received one to-day from Nova Scotia complaining of what the government were doing, and of the inferior class of animals that were being sold to them.

Mr. CHURCH: What is the minister going to do with regard to assisting the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair? The city of Toronto has spent $2,000,000 on this fair, and it gets only a small grant towards the prize list from the government. The minister made a fine speech in Toronto, much better I think than he makes here, and promised the pioneers in that work some assistance. The city has spent $40,000,000 on the summer fair, very largely for the benefit of the agricultural industry, and then it comes along and spends $2,000,000 for the Royal Agricultural Fair for the development of the live stock industry of this country. An application has been made to the government for practical assistance, and I would like to know what the government is going to do. It is not a municipal matter at all, but a federal and provincial matter, because live stock is under the jurisdiction of both legislatures. The show is larger than the New York and Chicago shows. The minister himself said that it was the largest show on the continent when he spoke in Toronto at the opening of the fair. He has received a memorandum asking for assistance, and I would like to know what he is prepared to do. The association is composed practically of farmers; I do not think the city of Toronto has a single representative on the board, although the city has supplied all the money for the fair, which is far larger than Madison Square Garden. The city should not be left alone to carry the burden, because the fair is doing an educational work that is for the benefit of the live stock industry all over the country, and it is being done now at great cost to the taxpayers of the city of Toronto.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The annual grant to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair, not of Toronto, but of Canada, is $25,000 a year, extending over ten years. They have requested additional assistance, and that is under consideration. That is as far as I can go.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I notice an item in the Auditor General's report of $18,476 for free freight policy, which is included in this item we are discussing. There is another policy of car lot policy, for which there was an expenditure of $8,768. How does this apply? How is it that some provinces can avail themselves of this free freight policy and others not?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That policy was adopted in order to encourage the shipping of breeding animals back into the country. Take the case of one of our stock yards where there is a lot of breeding stock that should be kept on the farm. The farmer being hard up has shipped this stock into market; he may have been short of feed or of cash, or both. In order to encourage the return of that stock to the interior, which it should never have left, the government some six or eight years ago adopted this policy of assisting the farmer in buying this breeding stock at the respective stock yards and shipping it back to the interior. We have continued that policy up to this year. We have recently had a conference between the deputy minister and the live stock commissioner, and as a result, whether for good or evil, we are discontinuing the policy. A considerable amount of abuse has crept in under it. I am not criticizing the policy; I think it was all right when it was inaugurated, but certain abuses have crept in that render its discontinuance advisable.

Mr. THURSTON: This policy was to assist in shipping back young cattle from the west that had been sold on our eastern markets?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Did it not apply to the shipping of feed cattle as well as breeding stock? The shipper from western Canada to Toronto could have these animals sent back at half carload rates, but in Ontario we have not any of these privileges. I am speaking of feeders for commercial purposes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend refers to the first item, the free freight policy with respect to breeding stock. This other is with respect to steers. Assistance was given by the federal government for a number of years. We pay the transportation expenses of the purchaser and his hotel expenses, and the transportation companies knock off 25 per cent from the cost of transporting the animals. That was arranged with the railways just about the same time, some five or six years ago, and I understand that that is being eliminated also.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What I was particularly inquiring about was the policy of getting a half rate on cattle for feeding purposes. The western shipper into Ontario can get that rate, but the Ontario buyer cannot get it. Now is that fair?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that policy was extended to Ontario. I know the Ontario buyer got sufficient inducement to come out west to the feeder shows, in the way of cheaper freight rates and assistance all round both from the government and the railways, although I have not the exact details, to encourage him to come out there and get animals for feeding purposes at a good figure and bring them back east. As far as the future is concerned, I understand that we are eliminating both that system and the free freight policy with respect to breeding stock.

Mr. FORKE: I thought the minister was wrong, but if he is right I must be mistaken. The way he explained the matter was that if western cattle were shipped to Ontario there would be a reduction in the cost of transportation back to the west.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. FORKE: That is what the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) stated.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. FORKE: He talked about shipping them back to the west.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that was only to Winnipeg.

Mr. FORKE: What goes to Winnipeg can be shipped to the prairies.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I did not think it extended any further than Winnipeg.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I must protest against the impression which the minister's explanation leaves on members of the House. That does apply to Ontario. The shipper from the west can ship his stock to Ontario, he can sell it there and consign it out again at half rate. If it is consigned to a dealer in Toronto and sold there, and the purchaser purchases it in Toronto, he has to pay full car rates if he sends it outside. I know payment is evaded in many instances, but it is not honestly done, and should not be permitted, because many people send their cattle to Toronto, and in some instances, through the connivance of the commission men, can get the special rate. Why should this rate not apply to people all over the country?

Mr. THURSTON: The minister stated a few minutes ago that the purchaser's hotel fare was paid. Was that the Ontario purchaser who went to our city markets and purchased young western cattle?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the local market. I do not know why they make a difference, but it only applies to stockyards, Winnipeg and the west; but an eastern man could go to the stockyards at Winnipeg and the west and get these advantages and ship stuff down here. I do not know why it was not extended to the eastern stockyards at Toronto. I did not work out the policy, but it was in force when we started to administer this work, and certain abuses have crept in, with the result that we are dropping all these things.

Mr. THURSTON: The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) left the inference from his remarks that the purchaser from Ontario did not benefit by this reduced fare.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He is wrong.

Mr. THURSTON: I have been on the market considerable myself, and I know it was the practice of Ontario buyers to go in and buy western stock or cattle and have them shipped out to their homes without any freight charge, but the Ontario purchaser did get the benefit of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I referred to a case where the westerner sold his cattle at Toronto market, as has been done in many instances, but some of the dealers arranged to have those cattle shipped out, even though they were not consigned by the party who shipped them there at all. Another farmer comes in and buys a mixed load from two dealers, and does not get that advantage. It is an unfair thing and the regulations are being evaded. In many instances people get that rate, but they do not get it honestly. If the western shipper consigns his stuff right through to the dealer and it is purchased direct on the market from that dealer, he gets the benefit. But if it is purchased with a mixed load he does not get any benefit at all.

Mr. THURSTON: I beg pardon. It was the practice for two or three falls that when western cattle consigned to commission men in Toronto market sold again as stocker cattle out through the country there was no freight charge from Toronto to the distributing point. It had to be western cattle. It did not matter whether you bought them out of half a dozen loads, as long as they were all western cattle. It was not necessary that they should all be purchased out of the one car

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think the hon. member is in error, and if we had a little more time I believe we would be able to convince our western friends that they have many privileges that we in the east do not have, even in regard to the Hudson Bay railway which the country will have to build for them. In the province of Ontario we have offered to build a line through to Hudson bay, and we are going to do it ourselves. I think the minister might move that the committee rise.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is what the member has been playing for all night.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think that remark is justified. The minister should be fair sometimes. He has done more talking than anybody else. The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has only been talking for the last half hour, and the minister has made long and probably excellent speeches.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have to, I cannot get out of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not complaining, but it is not fair for the minister to charge the hon. member with killing time and holding this vote back till twelve. He certainly has not. I do not know what the understanding as to adjournment is. I thought the idea was to sit till eleven, unless we were given some notification to the contrary. It is after twelve o'clock now, and I have no doubt the minister will move the adjournment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We would like to have the item passed. We have referred to the live stock this evening and reverted to a former vote, and discussed experimental farms until I think we have covered the ground better than we have ever done on any previous occasion. We have to judge our hon. friend from South Oxford by his conduct of former years. He may not have wanted to prevent the item going through to-night, but we know his attitude generally.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not want the minister to impute wrong motives. I think I have been reasonable in my request for information, and if the minister had been more frank with the committee it would have been better for the committee and for himself. He has certainly given information on two or three different questions on different occasions, and taken up a good deal of time in doing so, when he might very well have given a direct answer. He has informed the committee that there are a large number of these things they propose cutting out, even the last item to which I have referred in regard to the assistance in freight rates. Why is the minister asking for as large an item as he asked for a year ago in regard to live stock; and an increase of $40,000 in the item for experimental farms, when he admits that a great deal of pruning might be done and much money saved in that respect? Surely some information should be given in regard to that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The work in other lines is increasing and requiring more money. We dropped off the work which had been developed to the point where its usefulness ceased or its purpose was accomplished, but other activities required more money.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What new activities are being undertaken in connection with this?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Experimental farms. I gave that information.

The CHAIRMAN: That information has already been given to the committee, and the minister does not require to give it again.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I object to any blocking of any reasonable information. I asked for information in regard to live stock and it has not been given.

The CHAIRMAN: The information asked for by the hon. member was given and the minister does not require to give it seriatim the second time. As it has already been given to the committee, to give it again would mean irrelevancy and the debate continuing over the same ground the second time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I must insist that to my knowledge the information for which I have asked has not been given, that is with regard to new activities in connection with the item under live stock.

Mr. THURSTON: The minister mentioned that it was the intention of the department to cease giving this assistance on freight to stock or cattle in Ontario. I differ slightly from the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) in saying that this assistance is given only to western farmers. It was taken advantageously by the farmers of Ontario, and I think they appreciated it fully as much as the western people because it afforded them an opportunity to get good stock and receive some assistance in connection with it. I am satisfied that the Department of Agriculture is carrying on a good many side lines that might much more easily be cut out than such a direct assistance to agriculture as this is, and I think it is something that should be continued.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Has my hon. friend reference more to the feeder shows that I think he is familiar with?

Mr. THURSTON: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am sorry we have decided to cut it out for the reason I have given. Many abuses were creeping in and we found we could use the money to better advantage elsewhere. We will continue though, the encouragement for eastern men to go west to these stocker or feeder shows at Winnipeg, Moose Jaw or Calgary, because we find that they like our class of feeder animals there very well and they assist the sales very materially by their activities.

Mr. THURSTON: What is the nature of the feeder shows the minister mentions?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I read them over very fully. I want to answer the hon. member for South Oxford as to the new work we are taking over. This branch is taking over the cow testing for butter fat, not for tuberculosis. An additional amount is required for that. It was formerly conducted by the Dairy branch.

Mr. THURSTON: I did not hear the minister's explanation, but I am not going to ask him to repeat it because it was my fault possibly for not being present. As regards the feeder shows, they may be doing a certain amount of good, but the department is assisting eastern people and there will be only a very limited number of Ontario farmers who will be able to go to these shows. At the same time the western stocker cattle must come to Ontario to be finished for the export market, so as to be in the condition we should try to put them into before they leave the country. Therefore, I feel that the department will be doing more good in assisting the distribution of stocker cattle from the central markets into eastern Canada than by assisting a few individual farmers in going to those western shows.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There may be something in that, but there were certain abuses that I do not care to mention.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The matter referred to by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Thurston) is very important in the older province. There is certainly not much advantage in shipping stockers to the Old Country when it costs just as much in ocean rates for a thin animal as for one that is finished. If these animals can be finished in this country, so much the better for the country. That is the point that should be encouraged. The hon. member for Victoria must have shipped the feeders to which he has been referring through the farmers co-operative.

Mr. THURSTON: Not all of them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I know they have been able by some means to ship those cattle out where others did not obtain the same rates which they did. I am not saying this in any way disparagingly of the practice, because I know of instances where stock has been shipped out by commission agents as these people really are. I know in many other instances they have not been able to avail themselves of this assistance. The department might very well encourage the giving of cheap rates on feeder cattle so as to have them sent back and finished on the farms. I do not know of any expenditure which could be made with better results.

Mr. McBRIDE: Does the hon. member think he is entitled to rates from the prairies to Ontario when we do not get them to British Columbia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not speaking about any particular province. I am speaking about a general practice over this Dominion, not confined to any province as it is to-day.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Friday).

Friday, March 6, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—PENSIONS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved, that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act by providing that pensions to officers, their widows, and constables, granted prior to the seventh day of July, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, may be readjusted in accordance with the rates of pay for officers and constables provided by the said Act as amended prior to and on the seventh day of July, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, but no such readjustment shall authorize the increase of any payments for pensions that accrued before the passing of the proposed legislation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

AUDITOR GENERAL AND ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I notice from the newspapers that there seems to be some little altercation in connection with some of the activities of the Auditor General and that he has made a reply which has not been made public. I wonder if the Acting Minister of Finance would table the reply of the Auditor General?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): As the Auditor General is the servant of parliament, I have no objection to tabling a copy of the letter that I addressed to him and a copy of his reply.

DISABLEMENT FUND

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Would the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment be good enough to table the trust deed, or charter, or whatever it was, dealing with the trust fund that we were discussing yesterday, so that we might have an opportunity of studying it while we are waiting for his estimates to come up again?

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): It was my intention to proceed with the resolution to-day, but Mr. Scammell is going to Montreal to attend a meeting in connection with the Last Post fund, and he intimated that he would not have time to prepare a complete memorandum on the subject. As soon as the memorandum is ready, I shall move the House into committee on the resolution.

Mr. MANION: Might I suggest to the minister that it would be more convenient if we could have, not necessarily the memorandum, but the trust deed itself, or at least a copy of it, tabled, so that we might see it in advance. Because of absence of documents we often argue in this House on questions that we have not had time to consider properly. Perhaps the minister could lay this trust deed on the table a couple of days in advance.

Mr. BELAND: I would be glad to do that, but I am informed by Mr. Scammell that there is no deed of trust.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): No man is giving $100,000 without saying what it is for. Undoubtedly, there may be no deed of trust in the ordinary sense, but there will be something from the man who gave the money stating what the money is to be used for. There is no excuse for that not being ready now. Something of that kind must be in existence.

Mr. BELAND: Why should my right hon. friend not accept my word conveying to him the information I received from Mr. Scammell? Mr. Scammell says that there is no such thing as a deed of trust; that after consultation with the principal donator, he was left entirely at liberty to dispose of the fund as he judged best in the interest of the returned men. That is the information I have. But I asked Mr. Scammell to prepare a full memorandum on this subject for me to present to the House, and until I have that, I do not wish to discuss the question any further.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to be in a position of leaving the minister free to state that I disputed the fact that there was any deed of trust. I did not. I did not anticipate there would be a deed of trust in the form suggested. What I did anticipate, and what I cannot help thinking must be the fact, is that there is something in the nature of a letter or other written document or correspondence which sets out the purpose.

Mr. ARTHURS: Which was quoted in the order in council.

[Mr. Beland.]

Mr. BELAND: I beg pardon, I never quoted that.

Mr. ARTHURS: There is a quotation in the order in council reciting the deed of gift.

Mr. BELAND: I submit there is no such quotation.

Mr. ARTHURS: When will the memorandum be ready?

Mr. BELAND: It is for Mr. Scammell to say. I think it will be ready in a few days, if it is not ready to-day.

QUESTIONS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY UNANSWERED

CORRESPONDENCE ON OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I asked the government to procure copies of correspondence passing between the government of Canada or the Department of External Affairs, or of Trade and Commerce, and the government of Great Britain, or the Imperial Shipping Committee, with relation to ocean transport. I have had no response to the request as yet. When may I expect it?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is absent, and when he returns I will bring the matter to his attention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will any of the matters that are still standing owing to the absence of ministers be answered—

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend cannot complain of the Prime Minister being absent. It is about the first day he has been absent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not referring particularly to him. I can recall half a dozen matters that have been spoken to on the Orders of the Day as respects which the leader of the House at the time stated that the minister particularly concerned would be consulted and a report made to the House; but we have never had a report on one of them yet.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry my hon. friend is complaining, because we are receiving commendations from all over the country on the progress made this session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman bring down the commendation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would be an easy job.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—REGULATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Two or three days ago I asked a question relative to the position of soldier settlement under the act, and I was requested to repeat the question when the Minister of Immigration was in his seat. I asked the question:

Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation during this session providing for reduction of indebtedness on the part of returned men who have taken land under the provisions of the Land Settlement Act?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): There was a report of the committee last session.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: The government is looking carefully into that. I may say that there is a possibility of bringing in some measure, or of instructing the officers to make some recommendation, but it is a mistaken idea to believe that the land was all over-valued. Since I have had charge of that department I have observed from time to time the prices at which land was sold. Perhaps a man's wife would take sick, or he might take sick himself, or for some other reason he would give up farming, and the farm would be sold, and I think I am safe in saying that in the majority of cases these farms have sold at a higher price than was paid for them. But I will admit that there are some limited districts where apparently the valuation at the time the land was bought was not as carefully made as it might have been. There is an admission that the stock, and possibly the implements, were bought at the time when prices were at the peak, and that will be carefully considered and something done.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is why I put my question in general terms, so as to include the loans made for stock and other purposes.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Can the government give any information as to when the revised Grain Act will be brought down?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce has the chairman of the grain commission working on that now. I will direct his attention to my hon. friend's question.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Public works, salaries, $689,655.

Mr. STEVENS: When this item was under consideration the other day a discussion arose which I think was of very much greater importance than, perhaps, the majority of the members of the House realized. It touched upon a very vital matter in connection with not only this department but several other departments. An analysis was being secured from the minister of the amounts annually paid to retired civil servants of his particular department, and there was difficulty in ascertaining out of what particular fund it was paid, or under what heading. The minister gave us a figure which was somewhat startling, that in the year 1924 $75,600 had been paid out for superannuated or retired servants of his department. I made a search through the estimates to find out how this was disposed of. This was in the Public Works department, of course, and I located it under "Superannuation," I will refer to that in a moment. The minister shows an apparent saving this year in salaries of some $18,000 or $19,000, but when we take into consideration the huge amount that is being paid out to civil servants in his department on being retired under the Calder Act and under the Superannuation Act, we find that as a matter of fact the cost of this department, in common with other departments, has actually increased by a very large sum. In other words, while there have been retirements brought about during the past few years, it seems that the places of those who have retired have been filled immediately and the full strength of the staff maintained. If hon. members will turn to page 25 of the Estimates they will see revealed in striking and very accurate figures the enormous extent to which this annual retirement allowance has grown. Under "Superannuation" there is an item entitled "Statutory" which reads as follows:

Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act, R.S. Chap. 17..	$ 730,000
Public Service Retirement Act..	775,000
	$1,505,000

I wish to bring to the attention of the committee that since a year ago this expenditure has been increased by $355,000. There has been a saving of $55,000 under the other heading, leaving a net increase of $300,000 in one year. Under this, of course, come the retirements from the various departments. Before I deal with that subject, however, let me point to a still more striking fact. In 1921-22 the figure was $760,000; to-day it is $1,505,000. In other words, in the space of three years the expenditure under superannuation has increased by $745,000. That we may appreciate the significance of this, let me take a couple of departments, the cost of which is very largely in the employment of help—wages. The Customs department, for instance, over the same period, has increased in cost $3,272,000; the Post Office Department, $1,710,000.

Mr. PUTNAM: Do those figures cover both salary and superannuation?

Mr. STEVENS: I am speaking of the cost of running the departments. I have cited these two departments as illustrations and to emphasize the necessity of the government being brought as early as possible to a realization of where we are drifting with these expenditures. While we are told from time to time that there is a reduction in the estimates—$19,000 in this case—yet we find in the Public Works department there is an increase in superannuation of some $75,000 for last year, showing that as a matter of fact the cost of carrying on the department has really increased by about $55,000 or $60,000. And this in face of the declaration of the government that they are economizing, that the cost of operation is actually being reduced.

Now, take the minister's own department. It is not my desire to offer any very sharp criticism of his staff, but I do say to him that certainly the Public Works department is not increasing its activities, consequently there is no need for an increase of staff, and I think we could afford—shall I say?—to carry on with a smaller staff. I am not asking the minister to discharge a lot of his employees, but I do suggest that when he retires a man or woman, as the case may be, he should not fill the vacancy until it is absolutely necessary. In other words, he should not pass a civil servant over to the superannuation fund under the Finance department estimates and then immediately appoint another person to the position thus created. It will be noted that the number of employees has been reduced by only four during the past year. This condition permeates the whole service and increases the cost of carrying on the affairs of the country, so that unless we do something in the nature of definite retrenchment I do not know where we are going to drift. A few days ago the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) in the course of a speech divided the national expenditures into what he called controllable and uncontrollable. Here is undoubtedly controllable expenditure. We are not now in the realm of statutory expenditure such as the public debt interest, we are in the realm of controllable expenditure, and under that head, notwithstanding that there is a contraction of demand upon the department for service with a diminishing expenditure on public works, the cost of running the department is kept up to this very high level, with the result that the so-called economy is wiped out two or three times over by simply adding to the superannuation estimates for all of the departments $745,000 during the last two or three years.

Mr. ROBINSON: Are not the retirements fixed by statute?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly, the superannuation is paid out under statute. When I speak of controllable expenditure I refer to this vote of $614,000 now under consideration. In order to clear up any misapprehension, I am pointing out that this is the class of expenditure which we must expect to cut down if we are going to effect any economies, and again I say to the minister, I am not arguing for wholesale dismissals, but I do submit that when the minister retires—as he did last year—186 employees, it is not necessary to fill all the vacancies.

Mr. MARTELL: How do the vacancies filled compare with the retirements?

Mr. STEVENS: The minister could not give us that information yesterday.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): Pardon me, I gave information as to retirements and the positions refilled under Civil Government.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not blaming the minister, as he would have found if he had waited a moment. He could not tell us because the 186 include not only those in the inside service in Ottawa but others scattered throughout the country. I was going to add this information. On the inside service there is a reduction of 4: last year there were 320; this year there are 316. But there were 186 retirements. The minister could not tell the committee yesterday how many of these were outside and how many inside.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, I told you that.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister tell me now? I do not want to misrepresent him; the thing is bad enough if one tells the bald truth.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There were 12 retirements from the inside service.

Mr. STEVENS: There were 12 retirements and 8 new appointments in the inside service at Ottawa. There were 174 retirements from the outside service. But let me emphasize this for a moment. In all the departments, from day to day and from week to week there are retirements, and there are those, perhaps, who give up their positions. On the other hand there are demands for additional clerical help. It may be on account of a rush of work in the Interior department; it may be a need for extra help for a week or two in some other department. But, instead of drawing upon some department that has a surplus of idle clerical help, appeal is made to the Civil Service Commission and the necessary extra assistance is obtained by additional appointments.

Mr. MARTELL: I quite agree that when extra help is required the departments are too prone to call in new recruits. That was my own experience when I was in the civil service. But as things stand to-day, can the minister obtain a transfer of employees from one department to another without proceeding through the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STEVENS: I speak subject to correction, but I am sure there is nothing in the Civil Service Act or in any other act to prevent the minister of any department from borrowing clerical help from some other section of the service. Of course I am referring to the inside service, at Ottawa.

Mr. MARTELL: How long has that been the rule? I know that right up to 1914 it could not be done; it all had to go through the Civil Service Commission, upon requisition duly made.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot go back before 1914 or thereabouts, but I know it was practised in many instances during the war. But if it is not the case let us make it the case as quickly as possible. I am satisfied that it is the case; that the pathway is open; that all it requires is that the departments exercise their authority. Now, what are the interfering influences that are preventing the government from doing this? There are perhaps two or three. There is the desire to give an opportunity to those on the long waiting list to get into the civil service. But there is an influence much more sinister than that, and it is this: under our present system of handling the civil service, we—and when I say "we" I mean the country by its policy; parliament, if you like, by the act; the government by its administration—encourage the head of a branch, by the very nature of our laws, to build that branch up to as large a personnel as he can. I will give the minister an instance in his own department that I happen to know of. I am not going to give the names of individuals; I do not want to bring the name of a civil servant in here with the idea of exposing him to ridicule unless he deserves it in a very striking sense; but there were two gentlemen in his department some years ago, both doing the same work, both having about the same amount of service to render. One of them succeeded in getting four assistants, while the other was carrying on the work by himself, and the man with four assistants was getting $1,500 a year, I think, more than the other. When this discrepancy was called to the attention of the authorities—the civil service adjustment board, I think it was—the reply was: "Oh, this man has four assistants, therefore he is entitled to a higher salary than the other man"—although the other man was doing the work without any assistants. Now, that is what is followed all through the service. I know there are many civil servants who are doing their best for the country, working overtime and never saying a word, economizing and keeping their branches well in hand—men of high efficiency. These are militated against by others who are reckless of public economy and who seek to build their branches up to the highest magnitude possible in order that they may bolster up their own importance and incidentally increase their own salaries. That is the crux of the whole business.

Mr. PUTNAM: Was the man with four assistants literally doing work no more difficult than the man without any?

Mr. STEVENS: He did his work infinitely less efficiently.

Mr. PUTNAM: I mean, was his work of the same volume?

Mr. STEVENS: The volume was the same.

Mr. PUTNAM: The responsibility, and all that?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. This practice, this habit—because that is what it is—into which we have allowed certain branches of the civil service to drift has cost this country literally millions of dollars, and we are not getting an equivalent service for the expenditure. Further, and worse still and more unjust, perhaps fifty per cent of the civil servants are faithful, loyal, hardworking and efficient, and they, to use a colloquial expression, "get it in the neck"—that is not parliamentary, but it really fits the case.

Mr. HAMMELL: What about the other fifty per cent?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, what about them?

Mr. HAMMELL: Are they inefficient?

Mr. STEVENS: I have been trying to tell my hon. friend, if his mind had been open to penetration, that not only are they inefficient but they are taking unfairly from this country literally millions of dollars, That is what I say. If my hon. friend, who smiles at that statement of mine, can give me any plainer language I will use it.

Mr. HAMMELL: It is plain enough for me. I thoroughly agree with my hon friend.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not know whether that is a compliment to my reasoning or not. Now I am exceedingly serious about this. I know the difficulty of a member standing in the House and criticizing the civil service, and I do want to make myself clear: I am personally acquainted with many civil servants—I could name them by the dozen—than whom there are no better men in Canada. But there are a lot of barnacles hanging on to this government and battening upon the rest of the service, and it is about time we got rid of them.

Mr. MARTELL: Was that always the case?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly, to a large extent.

Mr. MARTELL: I quite agree with my hon. friend, from my own experience in the service, but the present minister is not to blame. Let us get together and I fancy we can weed out forty per cent of the civil servants and have a better service.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a thing that has grown and grown. I recall that just after the outbreak of war, in 1915, I made a similar statement, but we were plunged into war and abnormal demands were made upon various branches of the civil service, some of which were worked to the point of distraction. That was an inopportune time to step in and make any such segregation. But a few years ago, I think the first year this government were in office, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) told the House about some very striking saving that had been made in his department. I have the figures before me and I am going to quote them merely as an illustration—I do not want to branch off into another department, but it will serve to emphasize this very point. The Postmaster General told us the other day that he was making a direct saving; that on account of the introduction of certain machines, which I understand are very good and which I am going to examine more closely when the opportunity offers, he had got rid of a large number of employees. But here are the facts, and this is what we have to take as the test of the case: In 1921-22 the estimate of the Post Office Department was $29,533,671; this year it is $31,254,634. The supplementary estimates are not down, but the increase already shown is $1,710,963. What is the use of telling us about introduction of up-to-date machinery and that someone has been lopped off, when the figures show an increase of a couple of million dollars in that one department in a matter of three years? Then, of course, there is an increase of $745,000 in superannuation over the same period. Here are the figures for the Customs department: 1921-22, $6,782,195; this year, $10,054,504, an increase of $3,272,309. Again you have a startling and damning condemnation of the system that we are following—there is something radically wrong with it.

Now what I am trying to point out to the minister is this: Here is a practical suggestion, here is a wholly feasible suggestion, which I think ought to be taken up at once by the government, and not be put off to be considered this year or next; let us take it up now. When vacancies occur in the civil service, turn to some other branch of the service which is over-staffed and draw men from that branch to fill the vacancies. You are then not turning people out on the street. I have heard it stated here in the House, and it has often been replied to me: Oh, you are going to turn these men and their families out on the street—perhaps in the middle of winter;—it is not fair. I admit that, and I am not asking you to do it. But, I say, stop sending out these appeals for new appointees, stop asking the Civil Service Commission to make new appointments, when the help you require can be obtained from some other department. The minister may say to me: Oh, but I want such and such a clerk for such and such a purpose—and I must say that they have some of the most meaningless names possible for some of these positions; I can pick them out at random in any department. I see here for instance, principal clerks, senior clerks, assistant senior clerks, senior quality surveyors, account clerks, law clerks, audit clerks, clerk-bookkeepers, and so on. Take, for instance, an audit clerk or an account clerk or a senior clerk; any one of these ought to be able to do the work of the other. If an audit clerk cannot do an account clerk's work, he is no good; and if an account clerk cannot do an audit clerk's work, he is not fit for his duties,—and I am talking on a subject I know a good deal about; I would not give you a fig for a clerk who was carried on my books and could not do an audit clerk's work as well as ordinary accounting work, they are both the same. Why have this multiplicity of distinctions, and then when a vacancy occurs among the account clerks, though there may be a dozen audit clerks idle, a new account clerk is brought into the service? Let us sweep aside these cobwebs of formality and dilatoriness, and attack this problem. It can be done, I venture to say that a reduction in the cost of the civil service, and in the cost of administering the affairs of this country, can be made within a year that will surprise both the government and this parliament, if we seriously attack the problem.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does my hon. friend suggest that we are not already making transfers of employees from one department to another. That is being done every day. I am not taking any credit for it, but that is actually being done every day.

Mr. STEVENS: Then how in the name of common sense does it happen that we hear daily protestations that an effort is being made at reduction, when we find that in this department, which is the one we are speaking of now, though twelve were retired last year, only four less appear here.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is the inside service.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am referring to the particular statement my hon. friend made, that no transfers are taking place, but that new individuals are being brought into the service.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that. My hon. friend has not caught either the spirit or the letter of my remarks. My remarks are based upon this plea, that instead of refilling positions that are vacated by individuals retiring, you should seek inside the service itself for individuals to take those positions.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We do that

Mr. STEVENS: But only in a trivial number of cases.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Civil Service Commission have a list of all these people. For example, we send to the commission the names of individuals who are not required in the hope that they will be put into some other department where there is a vacancy. I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I wanted to point out that what he is complaining is not done is actually being practised.

Mr. STEVENS: Now the minister says that these vacancies are filled by transfers. I find that in the Post Office Department in 1924-25 there were 796 employees, and this year there are 821. I find that in the Public Works Department there is a decrease of four as compared with last year. Let us turn to some other department. We have a shrinkage of one in the Patent and Copyright office, but in the meantime retirements have occurred: I do not know how many have occurred in Ottawa; I have been trying to get that information all session; I asked the commission for it; I asked the Statistical branch for it, and I also asked one or two of the ministers when their estimates were up, but I have not been able to get the information. All this information should have been laid on the table. I have under my hand the retirements from the Public Works department, outside and inside, showing retirements as follows: in 1921, 57; 1922, 54; 1923, 54; 1924, 186; or a total of 351 retirements in four years from that one department. But now I come back to the point I made before. Although you have had 351 retirements from this one department alone, and they are costing the country $147,515 a year, the cost of running the department is going up; most certainly it is not shrinking. The minister may not have been in his seat when I said this before and I will repeat it for his benefit. In the Post Office Department there is an increase of $1,700,000, and in Customs an increase of $3,272,000, over the cost of two years ago. So where are you going to find the value of the retirements and the vacancies?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not finding fault with my hon. friend for his criticism of the increase in the civil service; that is his privilege. All I want to say to him is that he will find as the years go by and as Canada and the business of Canada grows, there is bound to be an increase. But I want to make it plain that the particular matter of which my hon. friend complains—that there are no transfers being made from one branch to another—is not correct, for that is being practised to-day. True, it has not been practised very long, but it is in practice at the moment in the civil service.

Mr. STEVENS: I will reiterate what I have already said, and add to it this: The very mental attitude the minister takes to my suggestion is unfortunate. The minister's attitude is to justify everything. I tried to point out a moment ago that it was evident there was something wrong in the situation, and for heaven's sake—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): For heaven's sake do not put me in the position of justifying it. I agree with my hon. friend, that it is a good thing transfers should take place rather than bringing new blood into the service, and that is taking place to-day.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish the minister had listened to all I had to say from the start, and then he would have realized my point when he did pick me up. I do not wish him to steer me off the track. I have a practical and wholly non-partisan suggestion, one that I think will be accepted by all parts of the House. I tried to point out that there has been undoubtedly a shrinkage of service in this department. I said further, that I did not ask the minister to discharge employees from his department and throw them on the street without notice; but I do say, what in the name of common sense is the use of superannuating 12 employees on the inside and 170 odd on the outside, and then refilling their positions? That is not the exercise of good economy. Let me go back to figures for the benefit of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). As a matter of fact, this year the estimates show a shrinkage of $19,000 but there is represented in another account namely, superannuation, some $75,000. So that there is no saving at all. Further, there has been an increase in the superannuation account in three years of exactly double, $745,000. These are startling figures.

Mr. ROBINSON: Why was the number of retirements last year so much greater than the previous year?

Mr. STEVENS: I presume that was caused by the so called Calder Act which was extended, I think, a year ago for another year and expired some time during—

Mr. MURDOCK: On October 31.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend (Mr. Robinson) has mentioned the Calder Act, and I say it is not necessary to retire people under that act. However it was found very convenient during the last two or three years to retire public servants. I know a member of the staff of the Minister of the Interior who was—

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. STEVENS: Just let me finish this sentence: I know a member of the staff of the Minister of the Interior who was forced into retirement. He was one of the best civil servants that ever occupied a position in Ottawa, a most valuable man, in the prime of his life. He is out of the service now on an annuity of two or three thousand dollars although his valuable services might have been retained to the country. That is what I call gross extravagance.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Who was it?

Mr. STEVENS: I will not tell the minister now, but I will disclose his name when the estimates of the department are being considered.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not a fact that a lot of people took advantage of the opportunity to retire under the Calder Act during the last two or three years rather than under the Superannuation Act. If they had come under the latter statute they would have had to pay back a certain amount of their salaries at the rate of 5 per cent to the government in order to enjoy the benefits of superannuation, whereas under the Calder Act they could retire without repaying anything. I am not saying whether this procedure was right or wrong; I am simply urging that as a possible explanation of the increase. I quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) that there are too many highfalutin titles among officials and half the time one cannot understand "who is who." It would be much better to have the positions of these officials clearly and explicitly stated—for example "audit clerk" and so on. Otherwise in many cases we will not know what we are doing when we came to deal with them. I rose simply for the purpose of making it clear that I thought the increase in retirements was due to the Calder Act.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I understand there are twelve retirements and eight new appointments. How many of these new appointees have been transferred from other services?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Before answering my hon. friend I should like to reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). Had he followed the explanations given last night he would not have fallen into the error he has to-day. He represented that I showed a saving of $18,000 but said that there had been retirements involving a charge of $75,000, and that any saving made had been wiped out by these retirement allowances. If he had accepted the figures that were given him last night he would see that although there were annuities amounting to $75,000 the abolition of various positions had resulted in a saving of some $60,751, leaving a net charge of $15,000. That is an increase if you wish to call it so. Nevertheless the department is still able to demonstrate a saving of $3,000, a fact which my hon. friend ignored. The hon. member laboured the charge that the government is making superannuations without abolishing positions. I have pointed out to him, however, that last year through the abolition of positions we brought about a saving of approximately $60,000. During the last four years there has been a saving of $207,949, and that is applicable to the Department of Public Works alone.

4 p.m.

Mr. STEVENS: How does the minister establish the saving of $60,000 when the estimates this year are only about $19,000 below those of last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am rather surprised at my hon. friend asking that question, because in his opening remarks he indicated that superannuation was not charged to the Department of Public Works and is not shown in that department.

Mr. STEVENS: Neither is it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Then why ask the question if it is not charged to the Department of Public Works and would not be shown there?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend was arguing that there was a saving in his department to the amount of $60,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): To the people of Canada. If the accounts were carried under the Department of Public Works it would show a saving to this department, but that is not the case. Last evening, without unduly extending my remarks, I tried to make the position of the public works service as clear as I could. My hon. friend has suggested that there are not many retirements in this service, there being only four apparent on this year's figures. I should like to say that a comparison of the public works service to-day with the year 1914 and the intervening years since, will show that there has been an effort on the part of the department to keep the personnel at the lowest possible minimum. I will get the details to establish this fact.

Mr. MARTELL: While the minister is looking up that information I should like to say that I do not think the minister or the government are responsible for these superannuations; it has been the policy of the country. Why not pass these general items, and let us fix a day when we might discuss the whole question of superannuation? It is perhaps true that the country has gone to extremes in this matter, and that as a result of the policy pursued persons have been retired who have been able to successfully compete with outside professional men on account of the annual allowances they receive. However, the government is not to blame for the system in vogue; it is an iniquitous system that has grown up in Canada ever since confederation. I would ask that we should not delay the passing of the vote of any particular department in discussing the superannuation system, but that a day should be fixed for considering the whole matter in all its bearings.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) has wandered into the field of the service as a whole and has discussed the votes "Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act, R. S. Chap. 17, $730,000" and "Public Service Retirement Act, $775,000." Under the former statute the employee contributes to the superannuation fund, and when he is superannuated he receives a payment from this fund. This law has been on the statute book for many years. In regard to the Public Service Retirement Act the present government takes no responsibility for the enactment of that measure, although we are responsible for its administration; the act was the creation of my hon. friend's government which brought it into force in 1920. It was stated definitely in the House last night by an hon. gentleman that it had been a very bad act, and that it had led to extravagance. I am not so sure about that. There is a large body of competent men in the service to-day who are doing useful work. They were not in a position to take advantage of the Superannuation Act; and when the late government undertook an investigation, one which was very unpopular, it brought about the condition of which my hon. friend complains to-day.

The classifying of the various positions, with the different titles that were given was done during his time when his government was in office. The Calder Act was introduced at that time in order to take care of men who had worked many years in the service and whom it would be necessary to retire in the curtailment that followed. So you find in each year there have been retirements in the Public Works department. Those I gave yesterday. In 1920 and 1921 there were 57; in 1922, 54; in 1923, 54 and in 1924, 186. The question has been asked: Why so many retirements this year? The answer is obvious. The Calder Act disappeared in October of last year. In my department there were many old men who, if they did not retire before the Calder Act expired, would have retired without the benefit of any superannuation, because they were old and in the poorly paid class in the department. It would, therefore, have been to their disadvantage if they had not retired in 1924. Many of them did retire. We confined the retirements to men whose retirement on account of old age or illhealth, would be of advantage to the service and to themselves. It was the effort of the department to abolish vacancies as they occurred through death or resignation, and we find the Public Works department to-day in this position. In 1912-13 there were 311 people employed in the inside service. For 1925-26 we have 316 people employed. But in the last few years 38 employees, who were not in the inside service but who were working in other services of the department, and who were not shown in the civil government list, were brought into the inside service and are now known as inside service employees. If we exclude these 38 employees, the department to-day is working on the basis of 278 as against 311 in 1912-13. I am satisfied that there has been a serious effort on the part of the officials, and it is the policy of my department, to decrease the number of employees as much as possible in the interest of efficiency and the proper carrying on of the work of the department.

Mr. MARTELL: What were the increases from 1911 to 1921? As the minister's department was not a war department, I should like to know that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The number of employees is as follows:

1910-11	257
1911-12	272
1912-13	311
1913-14	367
1914-15	396
1915-16	396
1916-17	396
1917-18	396
1918-19	350
1919-20	350
1920-21	350
1921-22	325
1922-23	295
1923-24	326
1924-25	320
1925-26	316

It was in the year 1923-24 that we blanketed in the 38 employees of whom I have spoken as having been brought from other services into the inside service.

Last night the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) asked some questions which I think I should reply to, although he is not in his seat at the present time. The retirements from June 30, 1920, to December 31, 1924, have been 351. Gratuities amounting to $163,229 have been paid. As regards annuities under the Calder Act, 31 persons in the inside service have been retired at a cost of $28,960.10. As regards annuities under the Superannuation Act, one person has been retired at $1,470. This makes 32 persons retired with a payment of $30,430.10 for the four years. Of these 32 positions, 16 have been abolished and 16 are being continued. That statement will show that of these 32 retirements within the inside service, 50 per cent of the positions have been abolished. That will fairly meet the criticism of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in regard to the matter of retirements from the service.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister said that I had attempted to deceive the country by my statement.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not deceive.

Mr. STEVENS: I took my hon. friend's words down and those are the exact words he used.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I said that the hon. member could not deceive the House; that the House was convinced as to the fact, but that a statement of that kind could deceive the country. That was my remark.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister then proceeded to say that this Calder Act was not his baby nor his government's baby; that it was a bad act or something of that kind and the product of the previous government and that we would have to take the blame for it. In the next breath, he turned around and cited a criticism made by an hon. member here last night, and he said that he did not agree with that criticism. He justified the act and his justification is shown in the large number retired under it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would not have my hon. friend leave that impression on the committee. I did not say that it was a bad act. I said that an hon. member last night had said it was a bad act.

Mr. STEVENS: I know what my hon. friend said. He sought to lead this committee to believe that the government preceeding this one were responsible for the act and that they were culpable.

Mr. HEALY: So they are.

Mr. STEVENS: "So they are," says my hon. friend. That may be quite true, but the minister and his colleagues for the last three years and some months have taken advantage of that act. They have renewed it at least once, if not more than once, and the minister has retired in his department alone 294 employees, most, if not all of whom have been retired under that act. Last year there were 186 retirements in his department, I do not know how many under the Calder Act, but nearly all of them, 170 or 175 at any rate. What is the necessity of our wasting time in discussing who passed the act, or whether it was a good or bad act? The point which I am coming to and which the minister has evaded and escaped is the question of economy. By the way, conditions have arisen in the last two years that impress that upon our attention. I am telling the government now how I think they can economize. There is not the slightest response from the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) or the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) to the suggestion.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Actions speak louder than words.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of the Interior berated me because I brought the subject up.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is not quite fair to me. I am not criticizing him for his suggestion; I am interested in any suggestion.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister presented to my suggestion an attitude of justifying present conditions.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is very good at trying to construe what other people are saying. That cannot be read into any of the language I used. I say most emphatically that I am interested in saving money in the service.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. Let us start from that point.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I simply rose to put my hon. friend aright on one statement he made, that there were few or no transfers going on in the service.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that: I say, when vacancies occur let us fill them from other branches. The minister said that was being done. I will admit that it may be done in odd cases. If the government does not want to take the responsibility of amending the act, let parliament do so and make it obligatory upon the government to adopt such a policy. That is the only point I was trying to make. I pointed out that it was a habit that had grown up in this country. I quite agree with the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) that for years and years we had drifted into a bad habit. I do not say this parliament is to blame more than others, but parliament is to blame if it allows it to drift along. Why can we not frankly face the situation and say that we are prepared to call a halt in these matters? Taking the estimates of the Department of Public Works, we provide $614,000 for 316 employees. It is fair to say that some of those may retire and the full amount may not be required. It would be proper under the circumstances to lower the estimate a little and allow for retirements of that kind. I am not particularly urging the point, but let us give some evidence, some decision and show a fixed determination to follow the course of practical economy which will reveal itself in dollars and cents in the estimates before the House.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) spoke of the positions dropped. There were ten positions dropped. Six of them will be filled, of which two are new positions. They will be filled during the year, in all probability. And one position will be revived. And there were three persons transferred from the Ottawa building staff.

Mr. HODGINS: Has the minister any power to dismiss any of his officials or staff?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The minister may dismiss for cause. The staff is pretty much regulated by the Civil Service Commission. If we find we have an excess staff we recommend retirement, and that is looked after by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. FORKE: If there is over-manning the minister will be responsible?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. The staff has been graded and the whole service in each department has been gone over by the commission. They set the number of employees, and place them, and say "This is your duty and your position". And that is the way the estimate is made up, each position having its classification. It is true that the government are responsible for the retirements and increases in the service, but it is done through the commission, and the commission have graded the service as it is to-day.

Mr. HODGINS: In the case of a person on the staff as a permanent official, the minister cannot dismiss him—at least, if he does dismiss him the Civil Service Commission take the matter up and give the man a position somewhere else. Is that true?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the government have great difficulty in dismissing officials without cause—at least they could not retire an official and fill the position with another employee or another person.

Mr. FORKE: We hear the statement made by a responsible member of this House, who has had considerable experience, that fifty per cent of the civil service is inefficient and that the staff is largely over-manned. There is no doubt that a feeling exists in the country that the civil service costs far too much. The expenditure of the country is to a large extent uncontrollable, and if we are to practise economy it can only be in those items in which the government has control. We hear about economy, economy, all the time, and yet when it comes to the estimates we find we are just in the same place as before. I question very much if we have as large a population in Canada as we had three years ago, and yet we hear continually about the growing services of the country and the demand for more service. If our population is getting smaller and our service is increasing, where are we going? I do not feel like blaming the ministers too much, because it seems to me they are largely the creatures of circumstances. I like the suggestion of the hon. member from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), that we should get together and find some method of remedying this state of affairs; cease playing politics altogether and try to find a solution for the whole problem. It is an alarming state of affairs, and the country is up in arms about the cost of government. I sincerely hope that we can find some method of improving matters. I like the suggestion of transferring from one department to another when occasion requires, and I think economy might be effected by not appointing new officials in certain cases. I have no doubt that if anyone familiar with the service would inspect the whole system he would find that there were some departments overworked and others which had not enough work to do. We require business methods to be applied to the civil service in order to remedy the existing conditions.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think it is a fair statement to say that fifty per cent of the civil servants are inefficient and unrequired.

Mr. FORKE: Not unrequired.

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to a point of order. Both hon. gentlemen have wholly misstated my observation. What I said was that fifty per cent of the service was of the very highest type, the best in the country, men who are faithful and loyal and giving valuable services to the country, and in many cases working freely overtime and long hours. I said it was unfair to this fifty per cent, using the word in a general sense, that a large number of others who were wholly inefficient and unworthy of their positions should make it more difficult for these first-mentioned employees.

Mr. FORKE: I wrote down what the hon. gentleman said and I have it exactly.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pelletier): The hon. member from Vancouver Centre rose to a point of order. What was the point?

Mr. STEVENS: It was just to get an opportunity to explain to the minister.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It has been the desire and policy of the government to reduce the service, and I cannot give figures offhand, but I have no doubt they will be given later on in the discussion of estimates. Some thousands in the service of the government have been retired in the last few years. It is true there have been some increases. The postal service and the customs service have been increased, and those services will increase because Canada is growing in population today, despite what some people say. We know there is an increase in population. One has only to consider the school attendance in Canada, and there you will have a pretty good index as to the growth of the population. Those services will undoubtedly increase from time to time. We had a very influential delegation before the government a few days ago, and there have been suggestions in this House that the Customs department were not giving the protection they should and were not preventing smuggling. If the minister is going to give the efficient service he would like to give along the boundary, and in the patrolling of the waters of the Pacific and the Atlantic, to prevent the smuggling and the trafficking that is going on, then there will certainly be an increase in the service and an increase in the expenditure to maintain that service.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Chairman, as I have already suggested, I do not see why one minister should be put under fire as regards this question of increases in the public service. What has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is true to a considerable extent; there may not be fifty per cent barnacles in the service, but there are many cases where savings can be effected. The minister in charge of this department is not responsible for the fact that some members of his staff have taken advantage of the Calder Act. If men who had been in the service for twenty-five or thirty years, and who were not under the provisions of the old Superannuation Act which obtained prior to 1896, had not taken advantage of the Calder Act, they would have had to make a return of five per cent of their salaries to come under the new Superannuation Act. Their retirement is not the fault of the minister of any department. I know of men in the Engineering Branch of the Department of Public Works having been transferred from London, Ontario, to Nova Scotia to take engineering positions. Several of us did not like that, but it was done. The minister could not do anything else. But do not blame any minister for the rotten system which has grown up in this country ever since confederation, under which every member wants to place friends in the service. I think the proper way is to take the different items, whether for public works or anything else, and discuss each upon its merits. Let some hon. member put a resolution on the order paper which will go to the root of the whole matter; let us have a field day, laying aside all our party prejudices and party affiliations, and see if we cannot arrive at some method whereby we can have an efficient civil service without increasing the cost to the people, and wherever possible get clear of those officials who are not necessary. Because a man has been in the civil service ten, fifteen or twenty years, is no reason whatever why he should be superannuated. The country owes him nothing; he took the job of his own volition. Often, as I have already said, he takes his superannuation and then goes out and competes with other men, knowing he has the country behind him for sometimes four, five, six or seven thousand dollars a year. For instance, I do not think a judge, after he gets superannuation should be able to hold any other public office in this country.

Mr. HOCKEN: What about a deputy minister?

Mr. MARTELL: He is in the same category. I contend that any man who has taken advantage of superannuation on account of ill-health, age or any other reason should not be permitted to enter public service again. We had experience of that in the Minister of Justice of the late administration.

Mr. CARROLL: I wish to say to my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Martell) that members do not get salaries, they get indemnities.

Mr. MARTELL: In my own case and that of my friend (Mr. Carroll) it is only salary for a little lost time, and then it does not half pay us. I contend that the public owe no man a living, and no man has a right to be a sponger upon his fellow citizens. Any man who can do an honest day's work with brain or hand can earn a living in this country. It may not be an excellent living, but it all depends upon the ability and energy of the individual. But, coming back to the point, why attack one minister because of certain things over which he has absolutely no control? I agree with my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and I speak from experience. In the civil service there are lots of hard-working, honest, upright men and women who are prepared to work from nine in the morning to twelve at night, if necessary, to carry on their duties; I can point out such people in the Department of Marine and Fisheries. But I have seen officials who simply wrote out checks or put letters in envelopes, for which they drew $2,500 or $3,000 a year, watch the clock and at the proper time take their canes in hand and walk away, and half the day they were considering how they could agitate for more salary. That is the type of civil servant we have to get after. If no one else will do so, I will place a resolution on the order paper so that we may have a field day and discuss the subject thoroughly. In the meantime do not let us condemn a minister for a system that he did not create.

Mr. HOEY: Has the minister power to dismiss civil servants, provided he is convinced that his department is over-staffed? If so, is such procedure often followed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Where retirements have occurred we have tried not to refill the positions. If a deputy minister finds his department over-staffed and recommends to the minister that it be reduced, the minister would send his deputy's recommendation to the commission. The commission, I have no doubt, after investigation, would accept the recommendation.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is making an attack upon the Minister of Public Works,—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think so.

Mr. HOCKEN: —but he is drawing the attention of the committee to a situation which I think ought to be ventilated. There could not be a more severe indictment of the civil service than we have had from the member for Hants (Mr. Martell), and he speaks as one having knowledge and experience, he speaks from the inside of the service and tells the House and the country what we all know, and what the country suspects rather than knows, that a considerable proportion of the civil service in this city are simply time-killers, drawing their checks and doing mighty little in return.

One of the things I object to most has been referred to by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, and it touches the point raised by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). He says: Let us get politics out of the civil service. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is more politics in the civil service than there is in the Liberal party, the Farmer's party or the Conservative party. There are men in the civil service who are playing politics all the time. I do not mean party politics.

Mr. MARTELL: They are playing their own politics.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, and they get around them certain groups. One deputy minister says to another, "You help me here and I will help you there." Another says, "I am not getting what I should get; cannot we form some association and boost ourselves?" There is more politics in the service than in this House, in my judgment. I have seen what my hon. friend refers to—a man having charge of a branch will build it up with an unnecessarily large staff in order that he may be able to say to his minister, "Why, I have so much responsibility, I have ten people to look after." But perhaps his whole staff are simply supernumeraries, they should not be there, and if he were an energetic and faithful civil servant they would not be there. Everybody is boosting his salary. I do not think the Minister of Public Works can accomplish a reform here. If reform is to be achieved it must be undertaken by all the ministers of the government working together; the government as a body must decide on clearing out unnecessary officials, and to do this they must go through the service ruthlessly. By that I do not mean that they are to deal unjustly with any civil servant; but they should cease filling vacancies. I suggested in this House four years ago that the government of that day—which is not the government of to-day—should declare a holiday in appointments for three years. I think that could have been done then, and I think it can be done now. Whenever there is a position to be filled, with perhaps some rare exceptions in the case of highly technical help being required, a member of the service can be transferred to it if it is absolutely necessary to fill the vacancy. In the course of a couple of years you would reduce the service by about a thousand at least and you would save a large sum of money. I have had a question on the order paper for a month and have not yet been able to get an answer: I want to know how many appointments were made by the Civil Service Commission in 1924. That should not be a difficult question to answer, but it would be very interesting information for the House to have. I do not know when the question is going to be answered—

Mr. HOEY: Does the hon. member mean new men coming into the service?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes. The question I have on the order paper is as follows:

> How many appointments were made to the civil service of Canada by the Civil Service Commission during the calendar year 1924?

I propose to get an answer to that question if it can be had. I know that a good many hon. members to my left—not many across the way, I am sure—have a high opinion of the value of the Civil Service Commission. I think it is a waste of money. I said that when I think I was the only member on my side of the House who said so. But everything I predicted about that commission has been fulfilled. They can remain in existence only by making appointments; the more appointments they make, the more work they can show they are doing. Their whole interest, their permanence, really, as part of the civil service of Canada, rests upon the making of new appointments. Why should they not make appointments? Why should they not be one of the influences that are making for filling up instead of cutting down?

Mr. SHAW: When the hon. member speaks of filling up, making appointments, does he mean that the Civil Service Commission have the right to create positions?

Mr. HOCKEN: No. It comes back to this: here in the service they are playing politics. The Civil Service Commission wants to stay in business. The commission and their staffs have great influence with the deputy ministers, assistant deputy ministers, senior clerks and all the rest. These people owe something to the Civil Service Commission, and the influence that is working is upon every deputy minister and assistant deputy minister to ask that appointments be made here, there and everywhere, which gives a job to the Civil Service Commission and enables it to stay in business. We are spending over $300,000 on that commission.

Mr. HODGINS: I think the hon. member makes a mistake in offering all these suggestions in public.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, it is not the first time I have made them in public. I do not know just what my hon. friend objects to. I am stating what I believe to be the facts.

Mr. HODGINS: They will follow the suggestions.

Mr. HOCKEN: Follow what suggestions?

Mr. HODGINS: The commission and the different departments are following your suggestions.

Mr. HOCKEN: If my hon. friend knew the Civil Service Commission he would not be under the impression that they needed any suggestions from me; they can give me cards and spades and beat me even then. I say it was a mistake to appoint them. As long as you have the commission in existence you are not going to be able to cut out the unnecessary timber in the civil service. What is required in connection with the civil service is pruning. We ought to have a prime minister of the same courage as the president of the United States who says he is going to reduce the cost of government in that country; he is going to start at the beginning and make an impression right from the start. The president is reported to have stated that he is going to cut the cost of the service to a sum that will make the taxation in that country $25 per capita, while in Canada it is $47 per capita. If that does not give the members of the government cause for serious consideration, then I think it ought to. This country cannot pay twice the taxation that is being paid across the border and hope to compete with that country. The thing to do with the civil service is to reduce the expenditure by about $10,000,000. I have not gone into the figures so as to be able to say to what extent it can be reduced, but I am satisfied it can be cut much to the advantage of the country. We had this Civil Service Commission go through the service and classify every job. Well, how did that work out? This way. Here is a man who was classified as junior clerk. He gets everybody he can—his superiors, and those on the commission—to work to have him advanced a stage. He gets up to senior clerk, then he wants to be special clerk or assistant to the assistant-assistant to the deputy's assistant. There is no stopping place for a man of that type in the service, but there is a stopping place for the man who is intent upon his work and is doing it instead of simply trying to boost his own salary and to do as little work as he can. The politician in the civil service is the man who does not work and who is always pulling somebody's leg to get something more for himself. And, of course, every case of that kind is taken up by the commission, it is investigated and reported upon, and that all bulks largely in the work of the commission and adds to its superficial importance. I think a committee of the cabinet, perhaps associated with the deputy ministers, could reduce this service enormously, could get rid of the drones and put it on a better basis. You would get rid of the drones if they were in your business. No other business could be carried on the way the government of Canada is carried on.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Two years ago there was a meeting of the full cabinet with the deputy ministers and the Civil Service Commission and the suggestions my hon. friend is making were made then to the head of each department. They were impressed with the extreme necessity of reductions wherever possible.

Mr. HOCKEN: Perhaps the minister will show us what the result was.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will be shown. This discussion is foreign to the vote, and the vote under which it would be in order will come up later. However, I have no objection; this will be merely a warming-up for the main discussion.

Mr. HOCKEN: I cannot see that any good results have followed, according to the estimates which are before us to-day. If there is any reduction in the civil service it ought to show in the amount of money that is paid for that service, and if it does not show, then the conference must have been futile. The point that has been raised to-day is, I think, well worth the time that has been spent upon it. I hope the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) will carry out his promise to bring in a resolution dealing with the whole question so that we may thresh it out fully.

Mr. SHAW: While it may not be strictly in order, I do agree with the hon. member (Mr. Hocken) that no subject is of more significance to the people of Canada than that of the civil service. Anybody who has the least acquaintance with the facts will readily admit that not only is there considerable overmanning in the public service, but, what is perhaps even more important, there is overlapping as between departments. The system we are following at present is a somewhat complicated one. We have a Civil Service Commission appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the abilities of individuals to fill positions, and also charged with the duty of filling those positions. They have the power to determine qualifications, and likewise the power of appointment. They have absolutely nothing to do with the creation of new positions nor with the elimination of existing positions; the duty of creating or eliminating positions in the public service rests entirely with the cabinet council.

Mr. PUTNAM: Has the commission no power to advise on that?

Mr. SHAW: They may have power to advise, but they have no power to act on those questions. It appears that while the commission have the power of appointment, they have not the power to discharge; that power rests entirely with the council. Two years ago we had an opportunity in a committee of considering this very important matter, and I think everyone was impressed with the necessity of doing something, because it was realized that a very substantial amount of money would be saved to the people of Canada if overmanning and overlapping in the service could be prevented. I made one suggestion to the committee and I want to offer it to the House. Sometimes we cannot be a lamp unto ourselves, but there is no reason why we should not borrow a little oil sometimes from neighbouring institutions. There has developed of recent years in the United States a form of government for municipalities known as the business manager system. It has given satisfaction, and it is being rapidly established in some of the largest cities in America. Indeed, some of our own cities in Canada have adopted that plan. Now, is it not possible to make a proper adaptation of that plan to the civil service of Canada? I think it is. If I understand the constitution aright, the general manager of the services of Canada, including the civil service, is the Prime Minister of this country; that is his particular task. But, owing to the fact that he is charged with large problems of state and problems of policy, it is impossible for him to give to the civil service, for example, the detailed consideration that is necessary. Suppose, for example, that he delegated that function to a business manager or general manager who had supervision over the entire civil service, who had complete and final authority not only to eliminate overmanning, but also to prevent overlapping in the departments;—and when I speak of overlapping let me illustrate what I mean. I do not know that this situation now exists; I know it existed two or three years ago. Take the important public service of dredging. That was carried on two years ago by three departments of government, the Public Works department, the Marine and Fisheries department, and the Railways and Canals department. Each department has certain jurisdiction, in the St. Lawrence river. The St. Lawrence ship channel, the middle of that river, up and down which ocean ships come and go, is dredged by the Marine and Fisheries department. From the boundaries of the channel to the boundaries of the river on either side the dredging is done by the Public Works department; whereas the harbours are dredged by the Railways and Canals department. Now what business organizations would tolerate a situation of that kind for a single moment?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Railways and Canals department would dredge only harbours connected with railway terminals, and so forth.

Mr. SHAW: Quite right. I take it the harbours connected with the railways would be dredged by the Railways and Canals department.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Only those in which they have a direct interest.

Mr. SHAW: They would have a direct interest, for instance, in the harbour of Quebec and in the harbour of Montreal.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They would not do any dredging there.

Mr. SHAW: Probably not, but I have given two departments that do dredging in connection with the St. Lawrence river. I have heard that these three departments met at Port Nelson on Hudson bay to do dredging up there. Each found themselves armed with authority from their department, and each department refused to let the other department do the work, and the result was the work was not done that year. I do not know what truth there is in that statement, but in any event the example I have given will illustrate my point. Here are three departments with three sets of officials and three groups of equipment, all for the one purpose of dredging. Why should not one department alone be charged with that service? There would be a great deal saved not only in the way of eliminating overmanning, but also by preventing overlapping were that suggestion adopted. Now my suggestion is this, that we should have a general manager of the service, a man charged with the task of preventing all appointments of additional unnecessary men, a man who has absolute authority not only over departments but also over deputy ministers, and who would be responsible to cabinet in council, in fact, be the delegate of the Prime Minister to carry out the duties of the general manager of the civil service. That I think is something that we should seriously consider, and I think it is a matter that we can, without any political consideration arising, fairly consider in addition, of course, to any other plans for the purpose of remedying this situation. Now I am frank to admit that if the civil service commissioners had been able to establish themselves in the confidence of the people of this country, it would be the logical body which should undertake that work. I want to say now that so far as the theory of the Civil Service Act is concerned, I am in hearty accord. There are two vital principles that we must not forget in the creation of that act; one is the application of the merit principle to positions in the public service; it is essential that political patronage be eliminated. The merit system should apply so that those who are best qualified will get the positions that are vacant.

Mr. LOVETT: How would you apply that to minor positions in the country?

Mr. SHAW: I can only tell my hon. friend that in the United States they have not any difficulty in applying that system even to the lowest-paid service, and apparently they are applying it with satisfaction.

Mr. LOVETT: How could that be done?

Mr. SHAW: If you will give me the position you want filled, I will indicate how it is done. I do say that the merit principle is fundamental. The second principle involved in connection with the operation of the Civil Service Act is that an independent body, a non-partisan body, a body freed from political control, should have the carrying into effect of the merit principle. Now, I am frank to admit that in my humble judgment the civil service commissioners have failed in their duty, and I think they are chargeable before the people of this country for their failure to properly apply these two principles. I do not hesitate to say to hon. members of this House that I had thought that probably the proper thing to do was to present a resolution before the House advocating the discharge of these commissioners. But the failure of these officials to perform their duties is altogether different from saying that the merit system should not apply. I think in the Civil Service Act a mistake was made in appointing three commissioners. I think only one should have been appointed, and this country should have been searched high and low in order to get an individual to fill that position who would have commanded the confidence and the esteem of this country. I think that in the application of the merit principle to the services of Canada we made a very sad mistake at the outset in restricting ourselves to political considerations in filling these high positions.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): How would you apply the merit system to the outside service where a competitive examination is really a matter of form, and where one man is just as well qualified to fill a vacant position as another?

Mr. SHAW: If my hon. friend thinks there should be a separate test applied—for example to an audit clerk who wants a position in Ottawa—I think he is entirely mistaken. If a test is necessary it should be applicable all over the country, and not restricted to applicants for positions in the city of Ottawa alone.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): My hon. friend has not grasped my point. I did not refer to such positions as audit clerks, bookkeepers, and the like; I was referring to lighthouse keepers, lock tenders, or occupations of that kind throughout the country, in regard to which my hon. friend must admit the qualifications of one man are just as good as those of another. I do not see that the merit system would be of any benefit in such cases, and to put in force a costly and elaborate system of competitive examinations for the selection of men to fill these positions is entirely unnecessary. I should like my hon. friend to give us his opinion on that point.

Mr. SHAW: There must be ten or twelve thousand such positions that are entirely exempted from the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. LOVETT: Anything below $200.

Mr. SHAW: Anything below $200 is exempted from the provisions of the act but positions carrying with them a higher wage are subject to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member (Mr. Maclean, Prince) gave a concrete example of the class of cases he has in mind. He referred to the position of lock tender, and there are possibly one hundred lock tenders in my county. Would the hon. member kindly state what qualifications the Civil Service Commission have for making these appointments?

Mr. SHAW: I must say that I do not know what a lock tender's duties are. If they are of an engineering character there would be no difficulty in determining by competitive examination the fitness of the applicant for the post. If it is merely a labourer's position my suggestion is that the Civil Service Commission adopt the plan which is followed in many states of the American Union: Simply have some qualified official, already in the public service, decide the fitness of a particular individual for any task however minor it may be.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What about hon. members?

Mr. SHAW: I think hon. members should ask to be excused from all such duties. As I understand a member's duty he is not elected for the purpose of filling minor positions in the public service, nor, for that matter, any position. It is his duty to come here and represent the wishes of his constituents so far as legislation is concerned. He should not be saddled up with additional work which not only interferes with that duty, but makes it impossible for him to properly function in the position to which he has been elected.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: What I had intended to say has been well covered already by other speakers. However, I should like to stress one phase of the question. We have heard a good deal about the necessity for a reduction in the number of public employees. I am absolutely convinced of the necessity for such a reduction. But what are we to do in the face of the situation I am going to describe. Let me give an illustration, it will be very familiar to every hon. member. As I drew my mail from the post office box this morning I pulled out a couple of familiar brown envelopes. I think we receive practically every day a brown envelope sent out by the Civil Service Commission containing a notice asking for applications for men who will take examinations for a certain position. These requests come pretty nearly every day, all the year round; the commission is continually flooding us with these notices. What does it mean? It means that every year, every month, every day the people of this country are being invited to apply for entrance into the civil service. Now, in view of the fact that the ministers are continually making the statement—and in many instances the statement is correct—that reductions in the service are being carried out, and that there are so many fewer employees in individual departments, I wonder what becomes of the thousands of misguided applicants who seek admission into the public service? What happens to them after they take their examination? Does it mean that notwithstanding the protests on the part of the members of the government, notwithstanding the express desire of the House itself, notwithstanding the growing intensity of feeling throughout the country for the practice of economy, the civil service is actually increasing and growing all the time? I think a very sound suggestion has been made that for two or three years the issuance of these brown envelopes shall cease, and that if men are required in a particular department the proper officers in that department shall go to another branch of the public service and say "Can you spare us a man, because the law will not permit us to bring another person into the service?" I believe that would be the soundest way to proceed. I realize the difficulty of saying to a man who has been in the service of the country for many years "You are no longer necessary, you must go;" but nevertheless through deaths, sickness and retirements it is possible to reduce the number of appointments, and I would suggest that we should make a hard-and-fast rule for a certain time that these brown envelopes should stay at home, and that no more applications for admission to the service shall be sought for that period and no more admissions permitted. Let us try that system, and also endeavour to fill vacancies necessary to be filled by transfers from other departments.

Mr. LADNER: I have a word to add to the discussion in the way of a suggestion. The matter is of interest to the country generally, and if you ask citizens at large what they think of the public expenditure along this line they will ask "Why is not something done?" But the system complained of goes on year after year and nothing is done. I am told by a certain person who is an authority on these matters—I do not claim to be an authority myself—that one method that would be helpful in the reduction of expenditures would be along this line—I think perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) may have referred to it: When positions need to be filled supernumeraries should be transferred from departments where the volume of business is less than it formerly was. I am told that the work of some departments was quite extensive years ago necessitating the employment of a certain number of men, but of recent years the business has fallen off and yet the same sized staff is maintained although in certain cases the men are no longer needed. I suggest that those men who are drawing their salary and doing little or nothing should be placed on a supernumerary list, or some special list, and when vacancies occur in other departments they should be filled by appointments from this list after the proper examination required by the civil service has been passed. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has truly said that we can well declare a holiday for three years in the matter of additions to the public service, just as we could declare a holiday in many governmental expenditures. Because the need for economy is urgent and has been urgent for some years. We must have a reduction in the public expenditures when many people are practising the strictest economy in their private affairs and even undergoing actual privation. Surely it is time for the government to make a real advance and show the country that they are in earnest in practising economy not only in this department but in all the other branches of the public service.

The other day I had occasion, during the progress of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), to examine previous estimates and the Auditor General's reports. In a very large number of items one finds each year an increase. Surely these increases can be stopped, and the government is the body to take that course. The person chiefly responsible for taking the initiative in that work is, of course, the minister. I am not saying that in this case the Minister of Public Works has had sufficient opportunity to do that, but in many departments the ministers can take that step. I make these few remarks, because I believe that in doing so I am voicing the thoughts of ninety-five per cent of the citizens of my constituency and, indeed, of my province.

Mr. MARTELL: Would the hon. member be in favour of scrapping the whole Civil Service Act and the Civil Service Commission and starting out anew?

Mr. LADNER: No, I would not. I am not one of those who believe you can create something after a great deal of thought and work, and then, in some fit of mental aberration, wipe it out entirely and create some new structure. That is what they tried to do in Russia and they failed. We have an existing institution which has a great deal of merit. It has made some reforms which have been of advantage to the country. In my judgment, the proper course to take is to correct the deficiencies of this institution as we have it. By experience they can learn where the weak spots are, and by aggressive action on the part of those in control, they can eliminate the weak spots, transform them by strong methods, and enable the commission to carry on the work. Let us keep the structure that we have, develop it, build it up and make it more efficient, so that it can, perhaps, effect greater economies.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I find myself much in harmony with the hon. member (Mr. Ladner) in regard to the civil service. Our aim and object should be to develop rather than to destroy. The Civil Service Commission was created on account of a desire for it in the country. The change of officials with every election was something that the people of Canada were heartily sick of. There was a point, I believe, that was missed by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) when he spoke of this continual deluge of brown envelopes. Most of those competitive examinations mean simply a readjustment within the service itself, and the elimination of those would be one of the first things to destroy confidence in the whole system. For instance, a man may be working in the Customs department, and a position is opened up in the Department of Finance. Supposing this man who is looking for promotion is entitled to that, it is only through a competitive examination that promotions and readjustments can be effected in the civil service. The question has been asked here this afternoon who should appoint men in the outside civil service, such men as those attending the locks on our canals. I would say that the only official to appoint them would be the man under whom they are working, the man responsible for their actions. Take, for example, the position of postmaster. There is no competitive examination for the position of postmaster. But the matter is left, in almost every case of which I have known, to the post office inspector of the district, the man who should know the necessary qualifications, the man who visits the district. If there are four, five or six applicants, as there are in most cases, he will interview the men, find out something about their educational qualifications, their ordinary business ability, their standing in the community from the point of view of integrity and in other regards, and he will make his recommendation to his department. Those recommendations are forwarded to the Civil Service Commission, and in every case I have had occasion to look into, the recommendation of the post office inspector has been accepted by the commission. That is perfectly right. The Civil Service Commission is subject to a good deal of criticism from the fact that many sections of the country want the old party privileges again, patronage and nothing else. I would like to see some members come out more frankly and state what is in the back of their minds, because I think that is what it is.

Mr. MARTELL: Can the hon. member show that, as a result of the Civil Service Commission, better or more efficient men have been appointed to office than was the case when they were recommended by members of parliament, representative of either of the two old parties in this country?

Mr. CAMPBELL: That would be impossible. If I quoted figures, the hon member for Hants would not accept them. Naturally, he would think the man whom he was responsible for recommending would be more efficient than the other.

Mr. PUTNAM: Nobody expects figures.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It is impossible to deal with a technical question like that, but I believe public opinion on the whole throughout the country endorses the principle of the Civil Service Commission. It may be that the commission is not perfect, indeed, we know it is not, and I believe a good deal of politics is played within the Civil Service Commission as the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has just said. I believe very frequently where they want a certain man in a particular position, he is put in temporarily and is given an opportunity to become acquainted with the duties of that office, and by and by, after six or nine months, when a competitive examination is called, he certainly is in a preferred position. Other men coming along may be better qualified in other respects, but naturally, as he has a definite knowledge of the technical duties of the office, they are not in the same position to compete in the examination. Many faults can be found with the Civil Service Commission in that regard, but I believe public opinion, on the whole, throughout the country, is in favour of the principle of the Civil Service Commission. And my knowledge is not entirely confined to the west; I find the same feeling at Ottawa. I find it in my home in the Maritime provinces. I have never been in Hants county; the same feeling may not exist there.

Mr. MARTELL: I am afraid the hon. member has not visited very much in Canada, even in his own province of Prince Edward Island, but if he comes to Hants, I will show him that we believe in the old-fashioned system of patronage.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I congratulate the hon. member for Hants on being frank; the trouble is that too many hon. members are not. Speaking for public opinion in this country as I know it, I believe it is behind the principle on which the Civil Service Commission was based. Let us get behind the principle. If there is anything wrong with the commission, instead of destroying it and throwing it overboard, let us make it our aim and object to improve it. That, I think, we can accomplish.

Mr. HOCKEN: There is only one way in which the Civil Service Commission can test any man's qualifications, that is his educational qualifications. They do not know anything about his integrity. They have to get that somewhere else.

Mr. CAMPBELL: They require of every applicant three testimonials as to his integrity.

Mr. PUTNAM: He will admit it himself.

Mr. HOCKEN: I know a man who has been in every jail in his county, and he was able to get the necessary testimonials and receive a position under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would that not prevail under the patronage system to the same, if not to a greater extent? I can cite many examples of what is going on in my own province to-day under the patronage system.

Mr. HOCKEN: If any man has to be careful about recommending for a position a person whose integrity is at fault, it is the member of parliament. The man I mentioned was appointed in spite of the complaint of the member representing that riding who came to Ottawa and gave the man's record to the commission. No member of parliament could or would recommend a man like that. To do so would be as much as his seat was worth. But if a member of parliament recommends a man to the Civil Service Commission, that one fact damns the man for the job. I do not know whether my hon. friend knows it, but I happen to know that when the act was first introduced into this House, it contained a clause stating that any man who was recommended by a member of parliament should, by that fact, be disqualified.

Mr. LEWIS: Is that in the act still?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not think that is in the act now. The members of this House were able to swallow a good deal at that time, but they could not swallow that. That was cut out, but the principle of the clause is still operative, and if a member of parliament recommends a man to the Civil Service Commission, unless he has gone round some circuitous way—and there are circuitous ways—his recommendation, instead of having any good effect for the applicant, destroys his chances of getting the appointment.

Mr. LEWIS: Does that apply to the government side too?

Mr. HOCKEN: I think I may leave that to my hon. friends opposite. I just want to make the one point, that the Civil Service Commission, which talks about the merit system, has only one standard by which to try a man, and that is his educational qualifications, and I have known men who could pass any educational test placed before them, but not a man in the community would trust them with a fifty-cent piece. There are men like that in any community of any size. After all, what is the supreme qualification for a civil servant? Is it not integrity? I do not care how ably a man can pass an educational test, if he has not integrity he should not be in that job at all, and that is something the commissioners are compelled to leave to the man's friends.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not the case that many men who pass the highest examination are the poorest in their work? Sometimes men pass a very poor examination, on account of having less education, but from a practical and administrative standpoint are far superior to the men who pass a good examination.

Mr. LEWIS: Does that apply to the law examination as well?

Mr. MARTELL: Certainly. I have known honour men to make very poor barristers. My remark would also apply to theologians; sometimes the greatest theologians are the poorest preachers.

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend speaks from the inside, and I have no doubt he has cases in his mind where that applies, and everybody knows it. It is one thing to pass an educational test, as any schoolboy could do, and it is another matter to have experience and judgment to fill an office properly. My hon. friend talks about specifications required for the civil service. Let me give an instance which happened about two years ago which would indicate the policy of the commission. They advertised for a chief filing clerk at a certain salary, and they wrote a specification which said that the applicant must have two years' experience as filing clerk in a government office. There was only one man in Canada who could fill this specification, and the specifications were written for him. He got the job. The thing was framed up for him, and that can be done by the commission and has been done by the commission in more instances than one.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That is one of the reasons why I wanted it corrected.

Mr. PUTNAM: I am a little doubtful whether this sitting of the House has developed into an experience meeting, or an at home. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) upon his unique courage. He is the only man who would justify in toto the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I want to correct the hon. member. I pointed out there were undoubtedly weaknesses in the Civil Service Commission and I wanted to see them corrected.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does he favour that change which removes from the Civil Service Commission the appointment where the salary is less than $200.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I cannot say. There are a good many at less than that and there are a great many included in the outside service at $900. I cannot say whether I included them in that statement. The appointment of rural postmasters may perhaps not be considered an important matter, but it is left to the inspector in the district.

Mr. PUTNAM: The answer is verbose but modest. The effect of it is that he does not know. There has been a great deal said in this House in disapproval of the Civil Service Commission, and when the attention of the country is so focused upon it, I would remind the House at large, and the country also, that it was this administration which cut out hundreds of the idiosyncracies of the Civil Service Commission by exempting from its jurisdiction all those positions where the salary was not above $200. If I spoke of experience in my own constituency, I would say,—I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying,—that that was a distinct movement in the direction of common sense and in the direction of economy, with no loss of efficiency, to put it very mildly. Those brown envelopes which have been referred to no longer come trailing through the mails, with respect to little appointments of that class. I call attention of the hon. member for Mackenzie to the absurdity of saying that the salary of the amount of $205 commands a man who must be appointed by the Civil Service Commission of Ottawa, when he is not sure that a man might not properly be recommended for the job by a member of parliament if the pay does not exceed the $200 mark. That is one of the wretched burlesques of the whole civil service. I hope that, inasmuch as this administration has taken from the red tape of the civil service these small jobs commanding not more than $200, which in the estimation of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) number thousands, I hope they will proceed a little further in their good works. I am disappointed that they have not already made a better contrast with the work which had been done by their predecessors in this matter of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STEVENS: While my original observations on this vote certainly did not go as far afield as many other remarks which have been made, nevertheless the discussion is one which I am sure will have some benefit and will be very informative to the public as well as to many members of the House. I approach this question with a desire to do something practical. I was upbraided and reprimanded very mildly by one or two hon. members because I brought the question up at this particular time. Let me say in justification that I applied on one or two occasions to the Civil Service Commission, I have applied to the Statistical branch, I have applied to two or three departments, for information, and this is what I have been told in the different answers that I have received. There is a proper time to get complete information about the whole of the civil service, about the number of retirements or the number of employees, even in different branches or different departments. Then some of the departments have refused to make returns. They did not specify to me what these departments were. I asked in the House two years ago for information along this line, and I was forced to this position: that as each department's returns come before the House we must question the minister in order to secure information. If the leader of the government were here I would address this request to him, but in his absence I address myself to the minister in charge, the Minister of Public Works, whose estimates are now before us. Will he ask his colleagues to have prepared and laid on the table of the House within the next few days a complete statement showing the number of employees in the different departments, the number who have been retired from the different departments, and a complete statement of the conditions of the employees of the government in Ottawa, at least at this time, numerically, and so far as the distribution of finances is concerned, including the retirements and the condition of these retirements?

[Mr. Putnam.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am under the impression, Mr. Chairman, that such a statement has already been filed. If it is not complete I will certainly bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister so that the necessary directions may be given. There is no desire to withhold information, but I understood yesterday there was a report from the commission.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not before the House.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was.

Mr. STEVENS: I tried to get it. I wanted to study the whole statement, but I was told there were certain departments, which were not specified, that had refused to file particulars with the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will make inquiries.

Mr. STEVENS: Before we branched off into the general discussion, I was pointing out to the minister that a system should be adopted in his own department, as between branches, to utilize the services generally of the lower branches of clerks, stenographers and so forth. For instance, in the architect's branch there may be a pressure of clerical work in getting out plans for some buildings, whereas a number of clerks in some other branch may be comparatively idle. Now, what I complain of is that the personnel of that comparatively idle branch is kept up. Some hon. member stated there have been reductions in the number of civil servants. But the test I applied throughout my remarks was the test of dollars and cents, and after all that is the only way in which we can reflect economy correctly, it is the only way at least by which the taxpayer will appreciate economy. Let me say in reply to some reproof pointed in my direction in regard to this discussion, that I know of no other place where we can properly discuss this question than right here and right now. After all, it is not what some previous government has done, the government of my right hon. leader, the government of Sir Robert Borden or the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier; the point is that the government to-day are responsible for the practical administration of affairs, and it is to them that we must look for results if we are to expect anything definite.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): With regard to mobility within the service, there is to-day a certain rigidity, largely due to the classification laid down by the commission. That was brought about by the introduction of experts to go into the affairs of the civil service. A few moments ago it was suggested that the government should have a business manager. The man on the street will read that and say, "It sounds fine." But in actual practice it would not work out.

Mr. SHAW: Why not?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It would not. As I said, experts from the United States investigated the civil service, and the situation we have to-day is the result of their work. That has been the history in many cases where so-called experts were engaged in an attempt to improve the government service. Many able men are connected with the civil service, and it is unfair to think that in the various departments of government we have not officials who are each and every day giving serious thought to the development of the service and to do what is right in regard to it. Probably nothing was more disturbing to the civil service than the injection of the so-called experts from Chicago four or five years ago. The government has tried to be practical. As I told my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) the government brought the deputy heads and the civil service commissioners together, and they also advised the Auditor General that he and his audit board should make a survey of the service. I believe that a report prepared from within the government service will be more valuable and effective than the introduction of foreign or outside experts, so-called, to tell us what we ought to do to improve the service.

Mr. MANION: I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion regarding the Civil Service Commission, and I rather draw from the minister's remarks the inference that he, to a certain extent at any rate, lays the blame for the size of the civil service on the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. MANION: At least I reached that conclusion. However, I think there is too great a tendency on the part of the ministers generally to blame the Civil Service Commission for the statutory increases. I would point out what I think is correct, that after all the Civil Service Commission does not of itself enlarge the staff; it is enlarged by the Civil Service Commission at the request of the minister in charge.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That has been admitted.

Mr. MANION: I think it advisable to point that out, because there seems to be a tendency, perhaps not intentionally, to blame the Civil Service Commission for increasing the staff or holding the staff to the size that it has already reached. As a matter of fact, I take the law to be that the Civil Service Commission hires a clerk or other employee for a department only when so requested by the department.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The Civil Service Commission has the right to investigate the demands of each department, and it is in a position to refuse those demands if it chooses to do so.

Mr. MANION: I admit that is correct. But if the government is sincerely anxious to cut down the size of the various departments it does not need to ask the Civil Service Commission to act; it is primarily up to the minister in charge of the department overstaffed if he wishes to lessen the number of his employees.

Sir EUGENE FISET: But it remains with the commission to decide, and it is there for that purpose.

Mr. MANION: I think the matter remains entirely in the hands of the minister himself. If he wants assistance in his department he cannot very well be refused by the commission.

Mr. SHAW: The hon. member for Rimouski points out that the responsibility is on the Civil Service Commission to go into the departments and reclassify, eliminating positions if they find them unnecessary.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. What I said was this: If a department makes application to the Civil Service Commission for a new position, the commission has the right to go into that department, investigate the demand that is made and decide whether or not the new position is necessary.

Mr. SHAW: The Civil Service Commission has no right to create positions.

Mr. MANION: Not only that; if, say, the Minister of Public Works notified the Civil Service Commission that he wanted an officer to do certain work and the commission refused to make the appointment on the ground that it was not necessary, I am sure the minister, and properly so, would raise a pretty serious row with the commission. Even if the commission have the power that my hon. friend refers to—and I do not doubt he is right

—I question whether they would dare exercise it to the extent of refusing to make an appointment that a minister demanded.

Sir EUGENE FISET: But that is exactly what has happened. In the classification of the service the commission objected to certain classifications recommended by the departments and the creation of certain positions, and the recommendations of the commission in that respect were in most cases accepted by the department concerned.

Mr. MANION: That is simply a question of the names given to the different classes of employees; it has not to do with reducing the number of employees. I notice that the number of employees in this department this year is 316; last year it was 320. What was the number for the previous year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In 1923-24 it was 326 as against 295 for 1922-23. The increase was accounted for by the bringing into the inside service of 38 employees who had previously been carried in other services and on other pay-rolls.

Mr. MANION: I am not questioning that.

Mr. MARTELL: That was the blanketing-in order in council?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MANION: The point is that the decrease is so infinitesimal that it really does not amount to a decrease at all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In 1911-12 it was 272 as against 278 this year, deducting the thirty-eight who were blanketed in.

Mr. MANION: There are six more to-day than there were in 1911-12, and I venture to say that there were more public works going on in this Dominion at that time than there are to-day.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is true. But methods of business are entirely different to-day; more people are employed in office work than ever before, and that is true also of the commercial or business world. I think the comparison of the figures to-day with those of 1911-12 is fair and favourable to the department.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid I will have to question the minister's statement that in all walks of life there are more men doing the same work to-day than there were in 1911.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the commercial world, I mean.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: I do not imagine that in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's operations, for instance, more men are doing the same work to-day than were employed in 1911.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In their offices, yes.

Mr. MANION: Well, this is not only offices.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, it is the inside service.

Mr. MANION: At any rate, I would point out that there is throughout the whole of this country a demand, and I think a just one, that we should cut down not only the expense of government but the national expenses generally, Dominion, provincial and municipal. There is a way of cutting down our civil service expenditure; perhaps it was suggested when I was out of the room. I do not believe we should go out into the different departments, and slash here, there and everywhere, put men out of work and increase the unemployment which unfortunately is worse at this time, to my mind, than it ever was in the country before. I am not blaming on the present government the overloading of the civil service as it prevails in very many of the departments; all past governments permitted the civil service to be built up to a greater extent than it should have been. We cut down the number of employees in the Printing Bureau with good effect and there is no doubt that all the departments, or most of them, could be cut down with resulting improvement to the service and saving to the country.

Mr. MARTELL: How did the government cut down in 1911 when 11,000 Liberals who were dismissed were replaced by 33,000 Conservatives?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that that is the fact, and I shall not be able to discuss it, for that reason. I am not admitting that we did any such thing.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend was a Liberal in those days.

Mr. MANION: Probably I would have agreed with my hon. friend in 1910-11 about that, if it occurred. I do not like to keep repeating to my hon. friend that I am getting wiser as I get older. My suggestion is that when a man retires, dies or otherwise leaves the service, let the positions remain as they are or fill them by transfer from some other department.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think that is being done.

Mr. MANION: Well, I do not. I hope it is, but I cannot see it in any of the figures. The Postmaster General announced the other day that he had put in a lot of machines to cut down labour, but the fact is that the number of employees in his department has been increased. Certainly I should think there were more than four superannuations or deaths in the Department of Public Works last year. The hon. member (Mr. Stevens) tells me there were 12, so that the plan I suggest has not been carried out. We certainly could cut down the civil service gradually and work hardship to no one if we adopted this plan of filling vacancies by transfer from the same department or from other departments, and it might then be possible to establish the civil service upon something reasonably like the basis of strength of a private corporation. The minister says that is being done. Well, I hope a real attempt is being made to do it; at any rate, I think there should be a greater attempt than is shown in most of the departments. I admit that the minister's department shows a decrease, but in most of the other departments there appears to be an increase.

Mr. BELAND: Not in mine.

Mr. MANION: Oh well, we could hardly expect an increase in his. But we will attend to the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment in a few days.

Mr. BELAND: I hope the hon. member will commend me for reducing my staff.

Mr. MANION: I hope there will be something upon which we can commend my hon. friend. I repeat that we should make a greater effort than is being made at the present time—and I say it in all sincerity—to cut down the expenses of government and in that way to reduce the very high taxation we have in this country.

Mr. EVANS: That the Civil Service Commission has failed to gain the confidence of the people of the country has been due, I think, to other reasons than their inefficiency. It was noticeable at the first session of this parliament I attended that the Civil Service Commission were getting no sympathy or co-operation from the heads of government, not even from the deputy ministers. Indeed, I have known that from divisional heads the Civil Service Commission has met with opposition in carrying out its wishes. Now this is not as it should be. The hon. member for West Toronto has said that the Civil Service Commission has no way of finding out an applicant's integrity or his standing in his own community. I can very well remember conditions as they were when the old patronage system was in full swing, and I can assure the hon. member that at that time men were placed in most responsible offices whose integrity to say the least was very questionable.

Mr. KELLNER: Those are the men we are superannuating now.

Mr. LOVETT: What happened to the member appointing them?

Mr. EVANS: Often it is not the member of parliament that makes the appointment. Can anyone say that I have the patronage in my constituency?

Mr. LOVETT: Did the member of parliament who appointed them win his election?

Mr. EVANS: If the member happened to be on the opposition side, he had no say in the patronage at all; it was not given to him. In fact, the Minister of Agriculture is the ruler of Saskatchewan to-day. But this is what I want to tell the House: I believe that if the Civil Service Commission to-day had the sympathy of the heads of the government and of the divisional superintendents, and so on, we could make the commission the best system for appointments to the civil service that this country has ever seen. I want also to say that the people back in the country will not stand for the abolition of the Civil Service Commission just now.

Mr. MARTELL: Don't delude yourself.

Mr. ANDERSON: I want to make a few remarks regarding the Civil Service Commission. I have been a great deal interested in the remarks that have already been made, and I agree with a large part of what has been said, though I am not in favour with the total abolition of the Civil Service Commission. That commission was appointed some years ago, and it has given good service to the country, but I think its powers and privileges are altogether too wide, and that the outside service should never have been brought under it. In appointing officials to the outside service, the Civil Service Commission is utterly unable by a technical examination to find out who is the best qualified man for the position. They may be able to ascertain his educational qualifications, but they cannot possibly tell whether he has any ability in meeting the public, or whether he has any knowledge of the details of the department in which the vacancy occurs; nor can they tell anything about his integrity. They can only ascertain these things by applying to some person in the constituency where the appointment is to be made. Now under the terms of the Civil Service Act a member of parliament is forbidden to make any representations to the Civil Service Commission; I believe a member of parliament is prohibited under a penalty from making any representations to the committee with regard to any appointment. I believe that if he did make such representations, it would be against the best interests of the applicant.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that a member of parliament is prevented from making any representations in regard to appointments to the Civil Service Commission, and that there is a penalty under the act for so doing?

Mr. ANDERSON: There may not be a penalty attached, but he is certainly prohibited from making any representations to the commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Prohibited by statute or precedent?

Mr. MARTELL: There always was a provision in the act that no official of any department could in any way approach a member of parliament and ask his influence to be used in his promotion or anything else. That was in the old act.

Mr. ANDERSON: A member of parliament is also prohibited from making any representations to the commission regarding the appointment of any person.

Mr. EULER: Is it not a fact that it was understood at the outset after the 1918 act was passed that if a member of parliament did approach the civil service commissioners on behalf of any particular person, that person was not to be appointed at all? He was immediately ruled out of consideration. I think that was the intention, but I think it is not observed.

Mr. ANDERSON: I did not understand that that was the intention, but I have not any doubt that that is one of the results of a member of parliament making representations to the commission. The commission is therefore compelled to apply to some person in the constituency where the appointment is to be made as to the character of the applicant. They must depend upon some person in the constituency who knows the applicant and can say whether or not he is a proper person to be appointed. The Civil Service Commission depend entirely on that, and sometimes they apply to persons who are friends of the applicant, and who are desirous of seeing him appointed. The consequence is that the commission is very often misled, and the member for the constituency has very frequently to accept the responsibility for the appointment whether he recommended it or not. The public at large seem to think that he has some influence, and that it was through his influence the person got the appointment, and consequently they visit upon him the blame for a bad appointment. Now it is impossible for the commission to know whether a person is capable of meeting the public, whether he is courteous and efficient, or whether he is of good character, and the consequence is that many people are appointed who never should have been.

So far as the inside service is concerned, if you want a reorganization or readjustment made in the departments the one person who knows most about his department is the minister himself. He is the person who should be able to say whether the number of employees in his department can be cut down. He should be responsible for making such recommendations to the Civil Service Commission. He should do that, but under the act I believe he cannot.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Has the minister not that power? Also what would happen if the minister reduced his estimates after they were brought down to the House?

Mr. ANDERSON: He cannot reduce his estimates until he has reduced the number of employees.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If he provided in his estimates for only a certain number of employees, would not the others automatically vanish?

Mr. ANDERSON: Not necessarily. They must receive their discharge first. If they are not eliminated from the department and the salaries are not paid where is the minister going to be?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The minister is responsible for his estimates, and not the commission.

Mr. ANDERSON: The minister can discharge an employee but he cannot appoint one.

Mr. EULER: He can fire but not hire.

Mr. ANDERSON: I think the ministers themselves should take in hand the matter of reducing the number of employees. If you want the civil service cut down, I think you must depend on the ministers at the head of the various departments to do it. One of the criticisms I have to make at the present time in regard to the public service is that while the number of employees in the various departments appears to be increasing the work itself is really decreasing. There is certainly a lack of efficiency somewhere. I think a large number of the civil servants in Ottawa are not fully employed during their working hours; they have a lot of time on their hands and can go out around the city when they should be at work. There should be more work provided for the employees in the public service, and greater efficiency should be required. It is up to the ministers at the head of the various departments to see that these requirements are fully met.

Mr. McBRIDE: Does my hon. friend know of one person in civil life who is not employing more men to do the same work than was the case ten years ago?

Mr. ANDERSON: That may be true. We have very many more employees in Ottawa than we had previous to the war. The war rendered a lot of additional appointments necessary, and since the close of the war it has been very difficult to get rid of these extra employees. I understand perfectly the difficulty of the government in cutting down the number of additional employees which the war rendered necessary. Although the necessary work in the departments has diminished, it is really difficult to get rid of the extra employees.

Mr. McBRIDE: My hon. friend has not answered my question, which referred to persons employed in private life. I know that in Vancouver previous to 1910 I had two persons in the office; now I have six.

Mr. ANDERSON: I answered my hon. friend's question. I believe that is true in private life as well as in the government service.

Mr. SPENCER: My hon. friend places the entire responsibility for reducing the staff upon the members of the government. Does he not consider that some responsibility should rest upon the deputy ministers?

Mr. ANDERSON: The deputy minister, of course, takes his orders from the minister.

Mr. BOYS: I should like to be set right in this matter. Assertions have been made indicating that it is not in order for a member of parliament as an individual to make a recommendation on behalf of his fellow citizen who is seeking a position in the public service. I should like to find out from the minister if that is correct. I do not believe it is correct. I have always understood that the member's right to make recommendations, as he used to make them, has been taken away; in other words, patronage has been abolished. But it is absolutely news to me to hear that if a fellow citizen who is seeking a position goes to a member of parliament and asks him to certify to his ability, his integrity and so forth, the latter has no right to do so. I confess I have not done it many times but I have on a few occasions, I think probably six or seven in the last two or three years, written letters of this kind. I am not aware that I did anything wrong in so doing. If so, I should very much like to be put right; I should not like to do anything which was not right in this connection. Generally, as a member of parliament, I do not do it; I know how useless it would be to entertain any hope of appointing a Tory in my riding; but I have thought that even with a government opposed to me in politics in office that I could, perhaps, as a citizen, say a word occasionally on behalf of a fellow citizen as to his standing in the community and that it might have some little effect. In that capacity I have written a few times.

Mr. HUGHES: To whom were the letters addressed?

Mr. BOYS: The letters were addressed to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. HUGHES: And had they any effect?

Mr. BOYS: Well, now, my hon. friend is getting a little personal. However, I venture to say my letters have not had as much effect as some he has written.

Mr. HUGHES: Mine had no effect at all in favour of the applicant.

Mr. BOYS: Then I venture to say that my hon. friend has not been as insistent as some of those hon. members who sit beside him, and if he will just exercise a little more energy it will assist him to obtain better results.

Mr. EULER: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BOYS: I do not wish to be diverted from my suggestion, but if my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience for a moment he will have an opportunity of putting his question and I will endeavour to answer it. I am really quite serious in wishing to find out from the minister, or from anybody in authority, if I am wrong in the action I took in this matter.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is quite right. I understand that the act as originally drawn and introduced into the House did prohibit a member from taking such action, but it was amended and to-day it is the privilege of a member, if he so desires, to communicate with or see the commissioners and make such a recommendation. From what we have heard from hon. gentlemen to-day apparently they have not succeeded very well.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister promise in the future to intercede on behalf of some of these letters we write?

Mr. BROWN: As a matter of fact, when an appointment is vacant the member for the constituency receives a special notice from the commission calling attention to the fact that the appointment is in his constituency.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE MANITOBA AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill No. 18, respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Stewart (Humboldt).

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know the effect of this bill, but if it is a bill of the significance that the title indicates, it should receive some attention at the hands of the government. May I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals or whoever represents him what it means?

Motion stands.

CONCRETE SURFACING MACHINERY COMPANY

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill No. 20, respecting a patent owned by the Concrete Surfacing Machinery Company.—Mr. Chevrier.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the second reading, the important reading, and the sponsor of the bill is not present. There is nobody in the government who knows anything about it.

Motion stands.

PRINTING IN ENGLISH AND FRENCH

Mr. STEVENS: Might I call attention to the fact that some of these bills are not printed in both English and French according to the indications on the order paper?

Mr. SPEAKER: Nos. 20 and 21 are printed in both languages.

Mr. ARTHURS: According to the order paper that we have, they are not.

Mr. BELAND: I think the difference is that the Speaker read the numbers of the items, 20 and 21, and my hon. friend refers to the numbers of the bills. The first three bills, Nos. 17, 18, and 19, are printed in both languages. The last two, Nos. 20 and 21, are not.

Mr. SPEAKER: The first three bills, Nos. 17, 18 and 19 appear on the order paper as being printed in both languages. As to the other two, Nos. 20 and 21, I am informed by the Clerk that they are now printed in both languages and an indication to that effect was made on the sheet which I have.

SECOND READING

Bill No. 17, respecting the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company—Mr. Jelliff.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Public works—
Salaries..	$614,655
Contingencies..	75,000
	$689,655

Mr. MEIGHEN: When does the Calder Act terminate, or has it terminated?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It terminated in October last. There are no more retirements under that act. Those who retired will continue, of course—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I understand. The retirements now are under the Superannuation Act, and it looks as though the flock of retirements was multiplied under that act as compared with the Calder Act. Is that a fact?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There have been none in the Department of Public Works this year. I could not say as to the other departments, but I think not—no, none in any of them, I am informed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There seems to have been a great exodus in the last few months under the Calder Act. I see men walking around the streets of Ottawa here in the prime of life who have in the last few months taken advantage of the retirement provision. I cannot understand why the government allows those drawing salaries from the administration to multiply. Some of them I knew in the service, and I have in mind some who were certainly efficient a very short time ago, but they have been allowed to retire, and I presume are hoping, under a change of policy, to get a job in some other line of industry and draw the allowance as well. Of course at the present time there is no chance of that. Is the government considering economy now in any sphere except the relief of the unemployed and hungry?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend could not have enjoyed his dinner. As far as my department is concerned there are no retirements this year. There were fifty-seven retirements in the years 1920 and 1921. It is true that as the act expired many men, especially aged men who would probably be well out of the department as far as their efficiency is concerned, did take advantage of retirements under that act, and, on account of their age and sickness, they were entitled to it. I know that was the strict application we made of the Calder Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about Mr. Drake, of the Interior department? I know that is not in your department. If he has been ill, I have not heard of it, and I certainly would be surprised to learn that he was entitled to retire of his own free will, on account of age, because he is no older than I am. That is only one case that comes to my mind at the moment. What principle does the minister follow?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will recall that there was a considerable number of employees in the service who, under the Calder Act, could retire and secure benefits on retiring under proper conditions, whereas under the Superannuation Act those same men would not be able to retire at all and could not come under that act. Therefore, about the latter part of October last there was a considerable number of those who were old or ill, who did accept what appeared to be their privilege at that time, and chose to retire before October 31. If they had remained in the service they would have nothing in sight for themselves at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not they I am thinking of so much as the treasury. I do not think I recollect the Calder Act wrongly, but if I recollect it rightly, no man had an absolute right to retire under it. The government was empowered under certain conditions to accept applications for retirement under that act, and I think rather that the government was empowered to retire arbitrarily of its own will under the act, but I do not think any man had a right to say: "Here, I am going to quit work and draw my allowance under the act, no matter what the government thinks." Consequently the responsibility for the correctness of the age and other details of these retirements is on the government.

Mr. MURDOCK: If they made an application for retirement, that went to the Civil Service Commission for consideration and approval, and then came to the minister of the department for approval, the minister to sign the form that was sent to him, already signed by the Civil Service Commission; but I have understood that the onus was largely upon the Civil Service Commission to determine if the claim made for retirement by individual employees was sufficient to justify them in agreeing to the retirement of the employee, and if they so decided the minister seemed to have nothing else to do but to O.K. that proposal of the Civil Service Commission and permit the retirement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. minister is wrong to this extent: he intimates that all the minister had to do, once the Civil Service Commission certified as to the man's position, was to sign on the dotted line.

Mr. MURDOCK: No; after the Civil Service Commission had determined as to his age or his physical condition as entitling him to retirement,—

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, not entitling him at all. No man is entitled under the Calder Act to retire. I speak with some reserve, but very little. The Civil Service Commission would investigate his representations, and if they found them all right they would say so, and then it was for the minister to say, and I think subject to the approval of council, whether the retirement was actually allowed or not.

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No doubt the responsibility was on the minister. The minister could plead and produce any evidence to justify his jurisdiction, whatever was presented by the Civil Service Commission, of course. I cannot understand in the case I have mentioned how the minister could have justified the retirement of the man whose name I have given. I refer to Mr. Drake, a man anywhere between forty-five and fifty-five, an admirable official, appointed by the government previous to the last government; but now, unless he has got a position—and he would be very lucky if he got one just now—he is walking the streets under the Calder Act, and someone else is doing his work and getting the salary. That cannot be attributable to the Civil Service Commission but to this government.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not informed of that case. My hon. friend has special knowledge of it. But generally speaking the minister had, of course, discretion, but it went through a form, the application being made was referred to the Civil Service Commission who checked up the years of service and the age of the individual, the health condition, and that was all dealt with under their management, and then the matter came back to the minister and each case was considered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On its merits?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): On its merits. I think that is the course we have been following.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister was asked last night to supply a list of the 186 retirements in his department last year together with the age, so that we might get an idea of the prevailing age at which these civil servants have retired.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have the list here. It is very lengthy and could be tabled for the use of members if desired. It shows the name, position, place, reason for retirement, date of retirement, age of retirement, number of years' service, salary at the time of retirement, average salary last three years, gratuity, retirement and annuity, retiring gratuity. That could be placed on the table.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I realize it is a little unfair to ask the minister to give us all those details, but I should like him to take advantage of the liberty usually accorded to a minister and place the information on Hansard.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I can do that if it is the wish of the committee.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I did not want to embarrass the minister at all.

(For statement see p. 887).

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have the Calder Act before me and I find the Civil Service Commission merely reports on the correctness of the facts represented by the applicant. The act says that "the Governor in Council may order that such officer shall be retired," and that "the decision of the Governor in Council thereon shall be final." The responsibility is single, it is not on the commission at all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The commission prepare the data, make the investigation, which is referred to the minister, and the minister places it before the Governor in Council.

Item agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

Agriculture—health of Animals, (administration and enforcement of Animal Contagious Diseases and Meat and Canned Foods Acts and necessary buildings), $1,905,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister tell us what kind of health the animals have now?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, this vote is reduced by $95,000. Naturally the query is, do we intend to reduce our activities to that extent. Quite recently we worked out a slightly different system of appraisement of compensation for animals slaughtered for T.B. In addition to that we have ceased to give compensation for certain animals. We are not giving compensation for steers, for the simple reason that these animals can be fed and sold at ordinary beef prices. The same applies to animals affected with lump jaw, and to grade bulls.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is it all right to fatten a tubercular steer and sell it for beef and not fatten and sell a tubercular heifer for beef?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The steer's ultimate destiny is the block, while the female can go on reproducing her species for a long time to come before she goes to the block.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has missed my point altogether, but he has not lost his wit. I have no doubt he can answer this question if he understands it. Suppose a heifer and a steer are both affected with tuberculosis. The minister says, in the case of the female animal the department makes an allowance for its destruction; but in the case of the male animal it is allowed to be fattened and sold as beef. Why not fatten the female and sell it as beef too?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The female is a very much more valuable animal to a man building up a herd. You would be a long time building up a herd on a steer. I think we are perfectly justified. The steer can be sent to the stable for fattening and when it is sold its owner gets full value for the animal. I do not think my right hon. friend wants me to go into more minute details. If he does not know the difference between the two, I am afraid I cannot explain it further on this occasion.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is the beef of these two animals fit for food?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, yes, the carcasses are inspected at government supervised abattoirs, and if they show lesions these are cut out and destroyed.

Mr. ANDERSON: To what extent should the animal be diseased to render the beef unfit for food?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That will be according to the judgment of the inspector. If it is too far gone, it will all go into the tank.

Mr. STEVENS: Speaking from the consumer's standpoint, a great many of these tubercular animals are slaughtered by butchers not under government inspection, and there is nothing to prevent the sale of this tainted and perhaps very dangerous meat as food in shops which handle that class of beef. For instance, I will take the city with which I am best acquainted, Vancouver. I think Swift's and Burns's abattoirs are inspected, but small dealers who slaughter their own animals are not controlled at all, their slaughter houses are never inspected. Should not some effort be made, under the heading of the health of animals, if you like, to prevent these dealers from selling the meat of tubercular cattle?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All the animals condemned for tuberculosis by government officials are killed under proper government supervision at the regular abattoirs. The disposition of the other ones my hon. friend speaks of in the smaller districts is regulated by the town by-laws, if there are any.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no inspection of the carcass at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not on the part of the government. We could not put on a sufficient staff to go into every small place.

Mr. STEVENS: I appreciate that. But there is no inspection at all?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It depends on the health authorities of the respective municipalities; there is no inspection by the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I am still wanting to know why there is an allowance made for the female animal destined for the slaughter house if it is found to be tubercular, but no allowance is made for a male animal destined for the same place. If the minister cannot understand my question, I am going to ask the ex-minister (Mr. Tolmie) to give me the explanation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All countries that have adopted this system of eradication have excluded steers—the United States, for example.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Anybody who knows anything about it at all understands the difference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Had we not better have a minister who knows something about it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like to have a listener who knows something about it. I might then be able to explain it more easily to him.

Mr. LOVIE: What is the minister going to do with regard to the request made to him last August in the town of Carman, Manitoba, by the reeves of three municipalities in the restricted area, Thompson, Dufferin, and Roland—along with them was the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba—that the Dominion government assist in meeting the cost of advertising the products from that area? It is true that the Dominion government gave compensation in the matter of cleaning up the herds, but the diseased herds were slaughtered throughout that territory and they think that their dairy products at least ought to be more valuable than those of the country round about.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I remember the occasion, but I think we have gone pretty far in starting a free area there, the first in the British Empire, I understand. We have under consideration an extension of the area to one municipality north, provided they in turn do something for us. We feel that work of this nature should be worth a good deal to the locality in which it is carried out, and that they should do something to develop their live stock industry along the line of community breeding or something of that nature. We have not considered the advertising proposal as advisable. We have no money for any kind of advertising.

Mr. LOVIE: The suggestion was that the municipalities would stand a certain part of the cost of advertising, and the provincial government, through their Deputy Minister of Agriculture, promised to co-operate also if the federal Minister of Agriculture could see his way to assist. My hon. friend did not make any promise, but I am just reminding him of the suggestion that was made to him at that time to see if he feels like doing anything about it. Possibly these gentlemen would only want the services of one man and

I do not know that that would be very expensive. There is no doubt that they will be anxious to know at this time, when the estimates are going through, if they are to get any assistance along that line. It is a very live question with them

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are working largely through the Deputy Minister of Agriculture there, Mr. Evans. I have had two or three letters from him. Anything we have had in mind is along the line of the extension of the area to the north; we have not discussed the advertising feature of it. We really could not see our way clear to go that far. I think the local authorities should look after that.

Mr. LOVIE: Does the minister promise that the municipality of Grey to the north is going to be taken into this restricted area?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not an unconditional promise—if they will do something in the way of community breeding. We lay down that condition. We want to avoid doing too much without their doing something in return.

Mr. LOVIE: But it is under comtemplation that the municipality of Grey will be included in the free area?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, if they comply with the conditions laid down.

Mr. BRETHEN: I believe the impression has gone out that the total vote for health of animals, something like $2,000,000, goes to the reimbursement of owners of animals that have been destroyed on account of disease. How much of this vote actually goes to reimburse owners for the loss of animals and how much to the maintenance of public health, that is, meat and canned foods and the amount expended under municipal orders?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Roughly, the amounts are divided in this way: Contagious diseases, $1,330,000; meat and canned foods, $520,000; pathological division, $55,000; these divisions subdivided as follows: salaries, $410,000; travelling expenses, $252,000; supplies, $25,000; tuberculosis compensation, $591,000; hog cholera compensation, $4,000; glanders compensation, $7,000; mange eradication, $20,000; rentals, $7,000. The amount expended under municipal orders was $126,000. So that the amount spent for the public health rather than the health of animals would be $520,000—meat and canned foods—plus the $126,000. Of course, this is all for the health of the human race as well as for the animal kingdom. The compensation is really helpful to man.

[Mr. Lovie.]

Mr. BRETHEN: I am glad to have this distinction, because I have heard this vote for $2,000,000 referred to in its entirety as being a vote to agriculture, whereas this $646,000, as I understand it, is directly for the general human welfare, the balance going to the reimbursement of owners for the loss of animals and the expenses connected therewith. I am heartily in sympathy with this vote, and my only regret is that the government have seen fit to reduce it. I believe that the money that has been expended on the accredited herd system has been probably better spent than any other expenditure the government has made. In the last five years the results from this system and the diffusion of knowledge among the breeders of pure bred cattle concerning tuberculosis have been simply wonderful, and it has been proved beyond a doubt that if the money is expended this disease can be eradicated. There is not only a great loss in live stock through the carcasses that are condemned, but also a very grave menace to human beings. I believe that in the neighbourhood of Saskatoon something over 10,000 reactors were removed under a municipal order, and every one of these animals was a potential source of disease to the human race.

This money that is expended on the inspection of meat for the protection of the public is also well spent, but I do not think it is anything like so important as the protection of the health of the people from our raw milk supply, because practically all meat is cooked before it is eaten, and the cooking destroys the danger of infection; but raw milk constitutes a very great menace to the health of the public. There is no longer any question that a very large percentage of tuberculosis cases among human beings are of bovine origin, and I only wish there was some method whereby the knowledge that has been diffused among the breeders of pure bred cattle concerning the dangers of this disease could be brought home to the people generally, so that there might come a demand for the expenditure of large sums of public money to protect the health of the people. This may seem to be getting away from the health of animals, but there is such a close connection between the two, and you will notice that the vote takes care of both, that I think I am in order in speaking of the health of human beings on this vote. In certain sections, restricted areas are being cleaned up, but it does seem to me that the best results would be obtained if we had key herds from coast to coast in much the same way as the accredited pure bred herd system is carried on. I think in that way good results could be attained in a very few years. It is more important to have this work done in the smaller centres, because in the larger cities there is usually a pasteurizing plant which destroys any danger of infection from the milk; but in the smaller municipalities milk is generally provided in its raw state, and if these small centres were placed on much the same basis as the pure bred herds, the public in the surrounding locality would become aroused to the danger of infection from milk. I suggested something like this about a year ago, but it was about twelve o'clock at night when the vote came on, following a long discussion on another phase of this subject. I notice that within the last few days a small municipality that wrote me last year about the subject showing an interest in the vote, has taken steps through its municipal council to provide its citizens with clean milk aside altogether from any assistance from the government. While I agree that great good can be accomplished by having these restricted areas and by municipal order taking in large numbers of cattle surrounding a city I believe that if an expenditure were made from coast to coast by this government, and certain herds that are supplying raw milk and that are a direct menace to public health were taken into an accredited herd system, very good results could be attained in a short time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Of course, we are limited in this work by the amount of money available. I might draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that we have over one hundred of what we call supervised herds, which include the grade herds of which my hon. friend has spoken, where a farmer will make application to the Health of Animals branch to have his herd tested by one of our officers. He does not get any compensation, but the test will show him where he stands. The inspector puts a T in the ear of any animal that reacts, and the man then knows exactly what he has got. That costs the farmer practically nothing but he does not get any compensation. There are, however, a considerable number of grade animals for which there is compensation and that is those that are associated with a small herd of pure breds. For instance, a man may apply to have a small herd of five pure bred cattle come under the accredited herd system, five being the minimum; and he may have 85 per cent of grades in that herd. We will test them in order to protect the pure breds, and allow compensation. So in all these different ways we are covering quite a bit of ground. Before we take any forward step in the direction of covering large areas or an entire province, except perhaps Prince Edward Island, we shall have to secure the co-operation of provincial and possibly municipal governments. There is no reason why the federal government should indefinitely test all these herds free for any city and the city not put up anything towards supplying its citizens with good milk; so we hope to have the sympathies of the provincial and municipal governments enlisted in a practical way, and a system of co-operation adopted that will enable us to go forward. At the moment, times are too hard for most provincial and municipal governments to dip into their treasury for even so worthy a purpose as this. In the meantime we are doing the best we can, but I look forward to having some co-operation with the provincial and municipal governments in the future.

Mr. LEADER: Like the hon. member for East Peterborough I think this is one of the most important subjects we can discuss in the Parliament of Canada, for it deals not only with the health of animals but with the health of the Canadian people. The minister has stated that we cannot enlarge on this work owing to the fact that we are a little low in funds. I think it is to the shame of the Canadian people that we cannot find funds enough to take care of the eradication of tuberculosis not only from our animals but from our children also. I am sorry the minister saw fit to increase the grant for experimental farms by $40,000, and at the same time decrease the grant for this work by $95,000; so I do not think all the blame can be attached to the Canadian people. I think the minister should have had courage enough to have given us a grant of perhaps $500,000 more, if necessary, to take care of this work, because after all, while it is a splendid thing to have ornamental hedges, flowering bulbs and forage plants propagated, it is far more vital that we conserve the health of our children. There is no doubt in the world that this disease does menace the health of our people. I have here a poster printed by the Department of Agriculture of the United States—the minister has probably got some of these in his office—depicting a little child who has been sick by drinking milk from tuberculous cows, alongside a healthy child, a child rendered healthy by drinking milk from healthy cattle. So I say not only does great economic loss result from this disease but it is a menace to public health. I have also figures in regard to the toll this disease takes and the great economic loss which it occasions in the country to the south. In the year 1923, 49,839 head of cattle were slaughtered and condemned on account of tuberculosis—they were condemned and thrown into the scrap heap. In the same year 88,688 carcasses of hogs were condemned also on account of tuberculosis. Now the information that we get from this report, bulletin No. 1,069, says that this is probably only about one-half of the total loss in the United States; that only about 35 per cent of the animals killed there are killed in abattoirs besides which many die from the disease. So that the loss given in this bulletin only represents about one-half of the total. I will quote a few extracts from another bulletin on this subject:

What hog tuberculosis is costing farmers

Hog tuberculosis last year sent over 25,000,000 pounds of hog meat into the condemned tanks of only the federally inspected slaughterhouses. This meat, worth, except for tuberculosis, over $2,000,000, was fit only for soap grease or fertilizer.

Hog tuberculosis in one year sent 66,000 hog carcasses into the fertilizer tank.

Hog tuberculosis causes one-fourth to one-third of the hogs shipped from certain inspected farms to be rejected for meat and to be sold at tankage prices.

Hog tuberculosis causes many slaughterhouses in badly infected districts to protect themselves against such losses by offering lower prices for all hogs.

Hog tuberculosis causes other packers to refuse to accept hog shipments from certain dairy districts except as "subject" shipments; that is, "subject" to examination for tuberculosis after slaughter.

Hog tuberculosis, therefore, is causing thousands of farmers to turn their good corn, alfalfa, concentrates, and skim milk into low-priced soap grease instead of high-priced pork.

The bulletin goes on to say that hogs contract tuberculosis chiefly through dairy cows which are also very subject to tuberculosis. The disease in the cow infects her milk system, her lungs, and her throat with tubercle bacilli.

I have looked over the report of our inspector general and I have compiled some figures which I wish to give, but in doing so I will be as brief as possible. In 1924 we had 11,470 beef carcasses condemned. Over 50 per cent of these carcasses were condemned on account of tuberculosis. At the same time 5,450 carcasses of swine were condemned, and 75 per cent of these carcasses were condemned on account of tuberculosis. I have figured these 5,735 carcasses of beef at a value at $50 a carcass, so we have there a loss of $286,750. I have figured the hog carcasses as worth $18 a carcass, and the total value would be $73,566. So there we have a total loss of $360,316. If we apply the same principle to these figures that is applied in the United States they only represent about one-half of the total loss. If you consider that we paid out only a little over $500,000 on account of the accredited herd plan you can readily see that the economic loss was greater than the amount represented by the monetary payments. And yet some people have the temerity to get up and assert that we are paying out millions of dollars to eradicate this disease. As a matter of fact we are not paying out millions of dollars, we are only paying out a few hundred thousand a year. Moreover we are accomplishing something through these payments, a fact which the critics referred to ignore.

Now, can we eradicate bovine tuberculosis? I have figures here which will prove beyond a doubt that we can eradicate tuberculosis if we take hold of it man-fashion. Under the municipal testing order in 1923 we tested 54,301 head of cattle, of which 7,976 reacted. The percentage of reactors was 14.7. In 1924 we tested 60,967 head of cattle, there were 3,214 reactors, and the percentage of reactors was 5.3, less than one-half of the number of reactors in 1923 although 6,666 more cattle were tested.

Then under the accredited herd plan which is now in operation, in 1923 we tested 52,548 head of cattle. Of this number 5,484 reacted, and the percentage of reactors was 10.44. In 1924 there were 86,174 head of cattle tested. The number which reacted was 7,343, and the percentage of reactors was only 8.5 although there was an increase of 33,626 in the number of cattle tested, and the cost was less by $2,390 than that of the previous year. This is accounted for, to some extent, by the reduced compensation paid, but mainly by the decrease in the number of cattle which reacted. These facts go to prove that we can eradicate bovine tuberculosis when we tackle the problem in an aggressive way.

We have another method in operation in this country—the restricted area system. We have, so far, not branched out very far in that direction but I have some illuminating figures here. In Manitoba the number of cattle tested was 16,550. The number which reacted was 992, and the percentage of reactors 5.8. I have not the figures of all the other tests, I believe there were two others. The first test cost $3.50 per head. The cost of the last test was reduced to 50 cents per head. I think the percentage of reactors was less than one per cent at the time the last test was made. Therefore I make the claim that we can eradicate bovine tuberculosis if we go at it in an aggressive way, and we can save money too if we take hold of the matter in an effective way in time.

The United States have undertaken this work to a greater extent than we have in Canada, and here let me say that I am sorry the Canadian government does not take a more aggressive stand in connection with this work. We have one plan whereby application can be made by anybody who wishes his herd to come under test. Ap-

9 p.m. plicants are given every assistance by the department. An inspector is detailed on the work free of charge, tuberculin is furnished free of charge, but in the case of any reactors the owner of the diseased cattle does not get any compensation. I want to say that that plan of the government is flourishing, but in the case of the municipal testing order no further new herds are being taken on, and so the work is being curtailed to a certain extent.

The accredited herd plan is not being pushed, in my judgment, as it should be, because we have reduced the vote this year to take care of that work. The restricted area plan is not going ahead as it should. I am informed that we have instituted one such area in Quebec within very recent months, and the government has undertaken to carry on work on this line still further. In contrast to what we are doing, the United States are working very vigorously to eradicate the disease and have appropriated $2,000,000 more this year than they did last year. They have got over ten million head of cattle in the free areas, and they have 485 counties where the plan is in operation and 55 counties where the herds are free from tuberculosis. Therefore I must express my regret that our government are not keeping step with the United States in this great work. We should be acting on some international plan, we should not only be working in co-operation with the United States but trying to keep up with their efforts. When the United States are taking definite steps to eradicate this disease, we should endeavour to keep pace with them. A method adopted by the United States is that they will not pay compensation for breeding cattle, or cattle affected with actinomycosis or in simple language lump jaw. We find that the Canadian government has accepted that plan and has put it into the regulations. The United States have another plan. In that country, owners of grade herds can come under the accredited herd plan and take advantage of it in the same way as owners of pure bred herds. I have always wondered why there was this gross discrimination in not accepting grade herds as well as pure bred herds in this country. This seems a little like one law for the rich and another law for the poor. Again I am making my plea to-night that the government accept applications from owners of grade herds as well as from owners of pure bred herds. I am glad to hear the minister say that he is willing to go on with this work, and I hope the government will, in future, undertake a more aggressive compaign to stamp out this disease which is one of the most loathsome diseases affecting mankind.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I like to have this testimony from the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), because we all recognize that he is a practical live stock man and knows what he is talking about. With regard to the accredited herd plan not being pushed, I do not suppose we are out advertising it, but the complaint comes from Alberta that we are pushing it too rapidly. My hon. friend understands the circumstances. They complain that our inspectors go around canvassing for these herds.

Mr. LEADER: I see no evidence of that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am glad my hon. friend says that he sees no evidence of it. We have enough to do without advertising for new herds. When the committee learns that we have 180 herds waiting to be tested, it can readily understand that there is no need of unduly advertising for new herds in Alberta or anywhere else. These applications are coming in at the rate of about forty a week, so that we are behind the applications only about four and one-half weeks. We are therefore reasonably well up to the work. As regards the other places, we try to take them along parallel lines. There is only one area in Quebec, but it takes in a little more than two counties. We have completed the first go-over, and we shall soon have more men liberated so that we shall be able to catch up with these 180 applications. I do not think we can hold out any hope of grade herds being taken on just now, except those that I referred to a few moments ago that were in the same class as the small herds of pure breds. Where a man has, say five pure breds, 85 per cent of grades will be taken on in order to clean up the bunch. I have sometimes wondered whether we are justified in going that far. There is, however, no use in testing such a man's pure breds unless you test his grades and get them cleaned up too. But it is going quite a distance to help the man with a small bunch, and he should proceed along the line of increasing his pure breds rather than of making them an excuse for having his grades cleaned up. I think some are taking a little advantage of that provision for the purpose of getting their grades cleaned up.

There is a very obvious reason why the accredited herd system was devoted to pure bred herds first. It was because of the large number of sales of pure bred animals scattered throughout the Dominion. If any of them had tuberculosis, he would be a much more serious disseminator of the disease than a grade animal that stays at home. If we had abundance of money for this work, I suppose we would be justified in taking up individual grade herds, but I would rather deal with the areas because you get a solid block then. We have nothing like the percentage of infected animals in Canada that they have in Europe or Great Britain. In the first area that we tested, the percentage of reactions was not quite 6 per cent. Then we got it down to one-half of one per cent. Now it is down to one-third of one per cent. In the last area at Huntingdon, in the first test the percentage was between 8 and 9. They have done some of the second test and that shows about 2 per cent of reaction. Consequently, we have not the great difficulty that they have in European countries where sometimes the percentage will amount to three-quarters of the entire number. They are simply throwing up their hands, because they would have to clean out the entire herds. We can pursue a system of eradication without serious loss to or reduction in the herds because of the small number of reactors, though, of course, some herds will be hit seriously.

In the meantime, the problem of the live stock and veterinary world is to find some immunizing vaccine to treat the young calves with and immunize them from disease later on, if possible all through life. Some progress has been made in that respect by what is called the Calmette vaccine, but that immunizes for only from twelve to eighteen months, and only animals not previously affected by tuberculosis. The work is being prosecuted at the labaratory and in isolated herds on the other side of the line. All the veterinary laboratories throughout the world for the last twenty years have been concentrating their activities on getting an immunizing vaccine that can be used in treating the animals when they are young rather than depending upon eradication by slaughter entirely. Some of us may live to see this consummated. It may come quite quickly. Some man may be fortunate enough to discover it whom we are not watching at all. Men with great reputations like Calmette, Vallee and Smith and others may be outrun by someone who has not yet been heard of. It is not a matter of luck, but sometimes these things are dropped upon quite unexpectedly, and that may occur. But even if that does not occur, the regular men who are looked upon as being in the forefront of this work, are steadily making progress towards the desired end.

Mr. LEADER: I should like to take this opportunity of replying to the minister's statement that great pressure has been brought to bear upon the government to discontinue this work from certain sections of the country. I know that is a fact. I attended the conference of the Western Live Stock Union at Calgary this year. The deputy minister was also present. I want to pay this tribute to him, that he withstood the attacks of some of those, shall I call them fanatics, from the province of Alberta. I want to congratulate him for undertaking to stand four-square for this work in face of those attacks. The minister mentioned that he thought the provinces should co-operate with the federal government in connection with this work. He will remember that I have always taken that stand. Although I am from Manitoba, I am quite prepared to go back and take the responsibility for saying that I believe the province of Manitoba should make provision to pay some of the compensation for animals that are slaughtered. We should have the co-operation of the provinces and of the municipalities, and we must have the co-operation of the breeders too if this work is going to be a success. I am convinced that we can eradicate tuberculosis if we go at the work in an aggressive manner. We have succeeded in eradicating glanders and certain other diseases by simply going after them aggressively. I am sorry I am not a veterinary surgeon or I could use those scientific terms. It will take a long time and a good deal of money to eradicate tuberculosis, but if we roll up our sleeves and put our backs into the work, I believe we can eradicate it also.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I was glad to hear the minister refer to the little province of Prince Edward Island and say that he thought it would lend itself splendidly to a disease-free area. This matter was brought up last year on this vote, and I pointed out to the minister that we had requests from that province that disease-free areas should be established there. Since then the matter has been taken up by the Department of Agriculture of that province, and they have sent large petitions, I think, to the department here. I believe the whole province is looking to have it made a disease-free area. As we are not too flush of money down there, I hope it will not be left over until the time when each of the provinces will have to bear a proportion of the cost, because it would be a great handicap in having the work done. I may say that our province has made splendid progress in dairying and splendid herds have been established there. We have a number of accredited herds, and some of our stock sold exceedingly well. I met a gentleman here a few days ago from our province who told me that he sold Holstein cows to a farm near here for $1,000. In the light of these facts I think the department should give every attention to the request that has come in from that section. Of course it may not be very good advertising to publish the figures quoted here to-night, but the hon. member from Portage la Prairie has certainly brought home to the committee very vividly the fact that we are losing more money by not attending to this than if we throw some more money into it and have it properly done. I hope those who have the health of their fellow citizens in this Dominion at heart, as well as the great agricultural and dairying industries of our Dominion, will see that this is a very important work, and that no vote that will ever be presented in this House having this object in view will ever be challenged or in any way interfered with I sincerely trust the minister will give every attention to the request that has come from the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Having regard to the apparent likelihood of the vote going through safely, I feel that I could have a better idea how to lay out next year's work when we get it through council. In addition to that, the area in Quebec has been completed. It is the first "once over" and we have that off our hands now. I cannot make any hard and fast promises, Mr. Chairman, because after all a certain amount of duty devolves upon the provincial governments in this matter. They have to undertake to prosecute the matter in respect to organizing the campaign, and have to do some compulsory work, where the farmers refuse to have their cattle tested. The Dominion has not the power of compulsion in that regard. We cannot make the statement that we are going to do thus and so when we are co-operating with another government that is to do so and so, before we can go ahead. Two years ago when I was out at the coast I discussed this question with the premier, Hon. John Oliver, and at that time it struck me that the two best areas to conduct these accredited herd operations, because of their natural boundaries, would be Vancouver island and Prince Edward Island, one at one coast and one at the other. The great trouble with the Carman area was its lack of natural boundaries, and the difficulty of keeping the line of demarcation between what was cleaned up and what was not cleaned up, and travelling back and forth for various reasons; but in the case of Vancouver island or Prince Edward Island, you have a perfect water boundary, and I felt that as soon as the money was available these two areas would be taken up next. I think Prince Edward Island will come first, because this last year or two particularly all the federal members from Prince Edward Island, particularly the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. MacLean), his colleague from the same riding and the other two members from the province, have been pressing this matter upon me and have assured me that the time is ripe in Prince Edward Island for cleaning up the island and converting it into a Canadian Jersey island. In this island they have practically no T.B. They have one breed of animal and one breed of cow and they have practically no T.B. in the island. Why can we not have a Canadian Jersey island? We cannot hope to have one breed in Prince Edward Island, because there would be a terrific struggle as to which it would be, but there is no reason why we cannot have a Jersey island as far as T.B. is concerned. If we could do this we would have a stimulant, and we could say, "Well, we have one province cleaned up." The same may be said of Vancouver island, but it is a larger area and there is more hinterland, and it would be more expensive to go to the remote points. These are two points we have in mind, and I think everything else being all right and others playing their part in it, there is no reason why we should not take up the matter in Prince Edward Island as soon as possible this summer. That would make one restricted area in the Maritimes, one in the central provinces, one in the prairie provinces and one in British Columbia. That will give us an idea of the probable expense it would be to tackle the country as a whole. We will have some data to place before the municipal and provincial governments as to the cost, as to the percentage of reactors—that is the second and third test—before we would start the campaign. That is the position we are in, and I feel very gratified that the expense is not terrifying us. I may say, however, before we can undertake the campaign in the province of Prince Edward Island we will require to have the wholehearted co-operation of everybody that we have been referring to. They will need to get right behind us.

Mr. LEADER: Is the plan in the United States not this, that they will not take on any work unless the state or municipality or county, or whatever it is called, agrees to pay an equal amount in compensation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I think that is the position, but we do not want to impose that condition at this stage in our country. This is educational work really. The reason we started in Manitoba is that that is the first province that made the request. I happened to be discussing the matter with my staff when Mr. Evans came to see me at my office and it was purely a matter of accident where we should start. I only know incidentally that Carman is located in the constituency of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Lovie). I am not quite sure.

Mr. LEADER: In regard to the natural boundaries, it will be quite easy to extend this Carman area in Manitoba, especially northward. The county of Portage la Prairie borders on the Carman area. Already in that area 75 per cent of the cattle are now under test. I think I am right in making that statement. I think Dr. Fasken, our inspector at Portage la Prairie, has 43 or 44 pure bred herds under his supervision, and I think almost 40 are now accredited, and when I make the statement that 75 per cent of the cattle are now under test hon. members will see that it would be an easy matter to extend the boundary northward in the county of Portage la Prairie.

Mr. GOOD: Could the minister give us any information as to how far unsanitary conditions are neutralizing this work?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I thank the minister for the sentiment that he has thrown out, and the statement that he is willing to consider the request from our province. I was very much interested in hearing the gentlemen who addressed the committee on agriculture yesterday and for the information they gave us, especially along this line of vaccine. I think that is one of the most important things that can possibly engage the minds of the men who are looking into this matter at the present time. We all hope something along this line will be discovered which will supersede the present system, but in the meantime I wish to thank the minister for his cordial reception of our request, and the intimation that same will be considered.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Replying to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), I have not any exact figures to show how far this good work has been neutralized by unsanitary stable conditions. I do not think it is as large a factor in the bovine as it is in the human. I believe average stabling is all right for maintaining the health of animals, but if we neglected our housing conditions to the same extent there would be greater danger of tubercular infection. But there is no question that the better the stabling is constructed the greater the tendency will be to eliminate the disease or to prevent it from getting a footing. Our best veterinarians are of opinion that stable conditions are not the big factor we thought they were in respect to the prevalence of tuberculosis among cattle. The very fact that we have found tuberculosis in our buffaloes that never were in a stable shows that the veterinary authorities have good grounds for their opinion.

Mr. GOOD: Has the department made any investigation along that line to find out how important a factor stabling is?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have no data.

Mr. WARNER: Mr. Chairman, I do not claim to be one of the fanatics, but the Alberta stock men having been referred to as fanatical, I desire to say a word or two on T.B. testing. In my district hundreds of cows are sent to the block on account of reacting to the tuberculin test. We have cleaned up that district, and we want to be assured that untested cattle will not be sent in there. I have a lot of faith in the efficacy of vaccination to control tuberculosis, but we are not ready to abolish the present system until we know more about the merits of vaccination. These merits have not been proved yet, but I want to commend the government for the research work they are conducting or the benefits that may be derived from the adoption of vaccination in place of the present system of T.B. testing. I have been a stock man all my life, and I have always found it better in every way to keep my stock healthy rather than try to cure them when they became sick. We want to prevent T.B. Like the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) I regret the reduced vote, and I would very much dislike to see the work neglected or the present system slackened in any way until we have a better one to take its place, but we have to trust the department. In a dairy district it is perhaps a little more difficult to keep a restricted area clean of tuberculosis because infected cows are being continually weeded out and others are being brought in from outside districts. Therefore I would impress upon the government the necessity of having every animal tested before it is allowed to be brought into a clean district, and I believe the department is fully alive to the importance of this protective measure. The city authorities of Edmonton are encouraging dairy men to send in milk from tested, healthy cows, and the greater part of the milk used in the city is pasteurized, but some small dairy men are peddling unpasteurized milk. The city authorities want all milk pasteurized in order to guard the people against tubercular infection, and I do not think we can be too careful in this respect. As I understand the new method, the calves should be treated with vaccine just as soon after birth as possible, and before there is time for the disease to develop, because it is thought they do not inherit tuberculosis. Therefore vaccine is used to prevent the calf taking the disease from the mother's milk or becoming infected in any other way. As I said before, I do not want to be considered fanatical, but I do not feel it is fanatical to encourage the use of vaccine to prevent tuberculosis instead of continuing the present system of T.B. testing indefinitely.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Even with this vote reduced we hope to do just as much work this year as we did last year, not only for the reasons I have indicated but because the work is better organized. In Quebec the percentage was larger than we expected it to be; in Prince Edward Island I am sure the reactors will not be over four or five per cent, perhaps less. In fact, some hon. members from Prince Edward Island have suggested that it will be as low as two per cent, but I do not hope for that. In any case it will not be as expensive an undertaking as the work in Quebec. We have taken on a good deal more work since the embargo on Canadian cattle was removed. We are obliged by the British law to put a man on every cargo of cattle, and these veterinarians keep the animals under observation all the way across to the Old Country. So that without any addition to the staff we have taken on that new work and are still continuing the old. I assure my hon. friend that the work will not fall back or be neglected; it will be pressed forward and be quite as strong as it was last year. The vaccine to which my hon. friend refers is being tried out on herds in our laboratory over in Hull. Many other discoveries of this nature are placed before the public from time to time; every few weeks the newspaper despatches indicate that somebody has at last found an immunizing vaccine that will prevent the development of tuberculosis in cattle. Two or three weeks ago a despatch appeared in the press to the effect that a very powerful disinfectant had been discovered at the Johns Hopkins institution at Baltimore which would kill the bug in the animal without destroying the flesh of the animal, something several hundred times stronger than the ordinary disinfectant. Well, that is almost incredible, but there may be something in it. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle has a friend in his riding, a veterinary at Indian Head, who insists that he has a cure not only for bovine tuberculosis, but for tuberculosis in human beings. We would need a stable from here to the Chateau Laurier to test out all these alleged cures, to say nothing of the money required, but we do go as far as we can in that direction. We are doing all that is humanly possible to promote research work, notwithstanding the inadequate facilities we have for it here in Ottawa. There is not a more slovenly system of departmental buildings in the whole wide world than those used by the Agriculture department right in this capital. We have to make our vaccine in an old house down here on what I will call Slum avenue, between Wellington street and the river, and the research work, so important, is being carried out by Dr. Watson in a laboratory in the house in which he lives. These are not proper conditions and we are trying to correct them. Perhaps we should go faster, but if you knew how I had to sweat to get this much you would feel gratified that it is not less.

Mr. WARNER: I want to thank the minister for the information. I am glad to hear that he is able to do the work just as effectively with less money. There seems to be a fear in my part of the country that the present system of tuberculin test will be discarded before the merits of the new method of tuberculin test by use of vaccine, have been proven to be satisfactory. I hope that will not be the case.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh no, that will not be done. My hon. friend has heard the old adage "It is best to be off with the old love before you are on with the new." I think that is sound doctrine.

Mr. LUCAS: The minister stated a few moments ago that he was receiving complaints from Alberta that this work was being pressed too strongly in that province and that a number of veterinarians who were engaged in the work were occupying their time in canvassing and advertising. Would that be due to the fact that there are more men there than are necessary for the work? How many veterinarians are engaged in this work in the Dominion and how many by provinces?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: From memory I would say there are about 150 in the Dominion as a whole. Judging from the discussion this afternoon you would think every minister was trying to pad his staff to the very limit but instead of that we are keeping the staff of this department down to the point where we are in danger of losing efficiency. We have appointed practically no veterinarians for several years although we have taken on a lot of new work. In fact, we are at the point where we shall soon require more.

Mr. KNOX: A few nights ago, when we were concluding the discussion on the live stock item, the minister promised that if there were any fag ends of that discussion left over we would have an opportunity of taking them up on this vote. I have had protests from farmers' and stock growers' associations in regard to the rates charged by commission men at the stockyards for handling stock. Has parliament any control over these rates?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. The rates are fixed by the live stock exchanges, but they are submitted to this department for approval. The rate is now $17 per car. That is higher than it used to be, but everything has gone up since the war.

Mr. KNOX: I would like to point out that it was during the war years when the price of cattle went so high that these rates were raised to their present level. Since that time the price of stock has been reduced until now it is not much more than one-third of what it was then, and yet the charges by the commission men on the yards remain just the same as when cattle prices were at their peak. I think it is advisable that some steps be taken to have these charges reduced to something like the former level, or at least that they be brought down very considerably from what they are to-day, for certainly it is not very encouraging to men who are raising live stock to have to pay these high charges on the yards.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will look into that. The question has been up several times, and the consensus of opinion on the part of those who had to do with the other end and of the officials of the Live Stock branch seems to be that the charge was justified. My recollection is that the pre-war charge was $12.50.

Mr. KNOX: Something like that.

[Mr. Lucas.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If that is so, the increase is not so excessive as it has been in some other things. I can remember when the rate used to be only $10, but that was a good while ago. However, I will look into it and have the question reviewed.

Mr. THURSTON: Are the charges the same throughout the whole Dominion?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, they vary with the yards.

Mr. KELLNER: Would the minister quote the charges for the various yards?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not the record here, although we have a record. The live stock exchanges set the rates, and they are submitted to us for approval.

Mr. KELLNER: I thought the minister said his department controlled the rates.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We do. The rates are referred to us in order that we may prevent extortion; but we do not set them. The exchanges set the rate and submit them to us for approval or otherwise. This Live Stock Products Act has only been in force two years now.

Mr. HOEY: The department has the power to reduce rates if they see fit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We can refuse approval, but I do not think we can impose rates. We can send them back for reconsideration.

Mr. KNOX: Then I would suggest that they be sent back because at the present time they are much too high compared with the price received for cattle.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have seen a few references in the press about the charges, but my recollection is that there has been no serious complaint yet through the ordinary medium. However, I shall look into the whole matter, not only the rates at the western yards but at the eastern yards as well.

Mr. LUCAS: Is the minister able to give me a reply now to the question I asked a few moments ago?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My deputy has not been able to look that up yet, but it is around 150.

Mr. LUCAS: The feeling in my district is that there is a great deal of over-lapping not only in connection with this work but in all the other departments as well. I think if the minister would co-operate with the provincial governments and eliminate this over-lapping, a reduction in these estimates could be made. Work that the provincial governments can do by reason of their proximity to the field might well be left to them, and other work by conference could be assigned to the Dominion government. Has the minister done anything in regard to trying to bring about that co-ordination of work, not only in connection with experimental farms, but the other branches of agriculture we were discussing last night.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, we are working along these lines in Alberta and every other province, but I hope my hon. friend does not get that idea of over-lapping into his head so much that he cannot get it out. No matter how you arrange it, where you have agricultural activities carried on by both federal and provincial governments, you can draw no possible line of demarcation except by friendly understanding. I think I explained the other night that generally the provincial governments look after productive activities, and the federal government after the health of animals and the grading and marketing of products. I am in correspondence with all the western ministers of agriculture, not only with respect to these matters, but also with regard to the grading of hogs and other matters. I can assure my hon. friend that our veterinaries are not tripping over each other or over anybody else either there or anywhere else. I went up to Calgary last fall and attended the feeder show, and met Mr. Hargreaves, the chief inspector at Medicine Hat, and a number of the other veterinaries and a number of Alberta people, and I heard no suggestion except on the part of about half a dozen breeders that there was any over-manning or over-lapping. There are about half a dozen breeders in Alberta who have not very much use for our veterinaries; I do not know whether that is to the discredit of the veterinaries or not, but I rather think not. I think the work is being done well in spite of the opposition that is being met in a few quarters. I might say further that while the remark made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie regarding our activities was made in a more or less playful way, I can assure him that Alberta as a whole is just as sound on this question as any other province. There are a few kickers there; there are always a few who will make quite a kick. Maybe that helps to keep the rest of us alive and on our toes. I have a great respect and a great appreciation for a healthy kick if there is anything to kick about, but when there is nothing to kick about, it is about time to call them off, and that time has about arrived for that bunch.

Mr. COOTE: Is it not a fact that The Western Canada Live Stock Union two years ago at Victoria passed a resolution asking the government to discontinue testing beef animals?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think they did something like that at the tail end of the convention when nearly everyone had gone home or was checking out or something like that. My hon. friend knows how at the tail end of a convention, not only a farmers' convention but a convention of any kind, a resolution can be slipped through when nearly everybody has gone home. That is the way it was done there. But I do not see the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), here just now. He would give you a picturesque picture of what happened if he were let loose. But that never happened again. Very good care was taken that that resolution never got through the live stock union after that. It was simply a "put over." The associations of both Manitoba and Saskatchewan gathered together shortly after that, gave two or three war whoops, read the riot act to the officers of that organization, and told them that unless they conducted themselves a little differently the associations of other provinces would withdraw from the union altogether.

Mr. COOTE: I rather gathered from the remarks of the minister that the Western Canada Live Stock Union was not very sound, and I was wondering what his definition of the word "sound" was. If "sound" means that you must always agree with the department here, even as to the proper method of testing cattle, of course those men were not "sound." I must admit that I do not know a great deal about this question of testing cattle for tuberculosis, but I do not think that even the minister would deny that they have killed thousands of beef animals as reactors, and after the cattle were slaughtered they could find no sign of disease in the animals.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I do not admit anything of the kind It is not a matter of what we think at all. This whole business is entirely voluntary as far as the live stock men are concerned. We do not force them to adopt this plan, we do not even suggest that they should go into it. The merits of the system are what appeal to the live stock men, and they voluntarily come to the government and ask that their herds be brought under the accredited system. I hope my hon. friend sees the distinction. Far from us forcing or imposing the system on anybody, their entrance into it is entirely and purely voluntary. However, the system possesses such undoubted value to the prospective buyer of live stock, at least in western Canada that the live stock men have laid down the condition that before an animal is put up for sale it must be tested and given a certificate of health. This is a regulation adopted by the live stock men themselves and not by the government. I hope my hon. friend the member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) will understand the difference. We are not imposing anything czar-like on the people at all. We are very glad to serve them in the matter of T. B., or anything else, if they make the request, that is all.

Mr. COOTE: I must say the minister has just used very different language from what he did a few moments ago when he told of reading the riot act to these poor people.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, my goodness! Is my hon .friend as deaf as myself? I was describing what the live stock associations of Manitoba and Saskatchewan did to the live stock union, not what we did. My hon. friend had better get a few more apples on the scene.

Mr. COOTE: Anything for a red herring.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no red herring being drawn across the trail here. Go on with your discussion on this question. We will not talk about apples; we will confine ourselves to a discussion on T.B. in cattle as long as my hon. friend likes.

Mr. McCONICA: Does the department of hog grading come under this vote?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. McCONICA: Does it, or does it not?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it does not, but according to the arrangement the other night we intimated—I think in a moment of weakness—that the live stock question would be discussed under the vote for the Health of Animals branch. My hon. friends took advantage of it the other night in connection with experimental farms. However, we will let the matter go.

Mr. McCONICA: Is the minister satisfied with the system followed by his department? I think the object is a very worthy one, but so far as my observation has gone the system is not attaining the end that is sought. We are grading hogs with the idea of encouraging the farmer to raise a different type of hog, of enabling him to get a higher price for the select bacon type. Now, in the district where I live our hogs are sold to shippers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Drovers?

Mr. McCONICA: Yes. I have inquired of hundreds of men, but I have never found a single farmer, with one exception, that ever got a cent more for his bacon type hog than he received for his other hogs. The grading is done at the stockyard, and if there is any extra money paid it goes to the drover and not to the farmer. So the department are not succeeding in their efforts to encourage the farmer to raise any different kind of hog. The system is wrong in its application, in some way or other, and I should like to know if there is any probability of its being changed in order to accomplish better results.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend must have been absent the other night when that subject was discussed very well. However, what I said then will bear repeating possibly. The system is not a perfect one, in which respect it is like the system for combating T.B., but it is an attempt to do something along the line of grading. The correct system is that of grading hogs on the rail, but our country is too large, our abattoirs too far distant, our settlements too widely extended to adopt the plan just as it is followed in Denmark. However, we are trying to do the next best thing, and that is to introduce the principle. This grading is made in two classes—thick smooths and selects. The other grading is a matter of arrangements between the buyer and seller. The reason the average farmer who sells to the drover does not receive the advantages he should is that the drover buys on a flat rate basis. He does not grade the hogs, he buys them at a flat rate, and if he happens to get any selects among his purchases he is in that much, there is no doubt about that. But the same thing could be said in regard to wheat or any other product, if the farmer refuses to adopt up-to-date methods. In Saskatchewan when I left there they had over 400 live stock shipping associations—I do not remember whether my hon. friend had any in his constituency, I think he had—but there were that number of shipping associations acting in agreement. Under this system the farmers would telephone each other and have a day for shipping. They would bring in their hogs or their cattle, as the case might be, fill up a car, and send one of their number down to Winnipeg or wherever the hogs were going. He would attend to all the details and he and his associates would get the benefit of the present system of grading. If the farmer does that he will get the same benefit, but if he sells to a drover he will not get that advantage. As the drover profits in the latter case he discourages the whole idea, and convinces the farmer that there is nothing to the grading system. As long as the farmer sells to the drover he certainly will not get the benefit of the grading. But whenever the farmers get together a carload and send a representative with the car down to Moose Jaw or Winnipeg, or whatever point the hogs are intended for, they will get the benefit of the grade, to the extent sometimes of 10 per cent in the case of selects over the other type. Very little attention was paid to breeding bacon hogs the last few years; especially during the war, a great many of our hogs were of the fat chunky type, not of the bacon type. It is the type of animal which makes bacon that commands the price and meets the competition in the British market. But the department has not been imposing its will on the country. This plan was adopted by the Department of Agriculture, in conjunction with the Hog Breeders' Association in the fall of 1921. My predecessor arranged the plan I believe in this system, and neither the credit, nor the blame if there be any, should be ascribed to me. However I want to associate myself with the men who worked it out. I believe it is a step in the right direction, and that it accomplishes some good for those that it has reached. Those whom the system has not reached do nothing to help themselves; they sell in the old way to the drover. I do not know how we are going to reach those.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The minister said that the proper place to grade bacon is on the rail. Probably that is where the difficulty lies with respect to hog grading at the present time. The producer of hogs, whether he sells them to a drover and they are sold by that drover to the abattoir, or whether he ships them co-operatively, as was spoken of by the minister, is not satisfied with the grading as it is at present being carried out. I could tell the minister of a district where the people have what they believe to be the true bacon type of hog. When this regulation became effective, they got rid of their lard type of hog and purchased the Yorkshire breed of hogs which, I believe, the minister will admit is a bacon type. Shipping co-operatively, however, they are not getting more than one, two or three per cent of select hogs out of a carload. I believe the producers of hogs in this country are fully alive to the fact that we want to produce a first-class bacon hog if we are going to get the best price in the British market, but the producer when he produces that hog wants to know that he is going to get fair treatment at the hands of the grader. The only way to do that is not to kick this thing overboard, but to follow it through and to have these hogs graded on the rail as the minister spoke of doing. Our cream is graded into the creameries and our butter is graded out of the creameries. It seems to me that this matter will not be settled until the same percentage of No. 1 hogs goes into the abattoir and the producer is paid for that as No. 1 bacon goes out. If the minister gave some thought to that phase of the question, he might find a remedy.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister said a moment ago that the drovers discourage the farmers as to the grading. There is no need of that, because the farmers are disgusted with the grading proposition. I live in one of the oldest districts of Manitoba along the Red river where we have improved our hogs according to the instructions given by the different authorities on this subject, and we have produced bacon type hogs. But when the grader gets through with them, you do not get any bacon type, you get thick smooth. The farmers to-day are simply disgusted with this grading because they feel that the people who are taking advantage of this grading proposition are either the dealers or the packers. I know in my district the people are not going to raise any more bacon type hogs. They are going to raise thick, smooth hogs because they do not get any grade other than that even if they actually raise the better grade.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They have the option of raising any kind they like.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes, but no matter how select your hog may be, you are at the mercy of the grader there, and I know of carload after carload of bacon type hogs shipped under the co-operative system where, after the hogs were graded, the producers did not get any selects. All the farmers would get together and one man would take the hogs to the abattoir. It does not take a farmer of extraordinary intelligence to tell whether a hog is bacon type or not. The average farmer who raises hogs can tell, but if you take the market returns in Winnipeg, you will find that the percentage of selects is very small.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Possibly my hon. friend knows that this matter is going to be discussed before the committee on Agriculture on Tuesday morning and every opportunity will be given to thresh it out. In the meantime, I assume that the objection of my hon. friend and of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) is that the hog producers are at the mercy of the grader. You have to choose between being at the mercy of the grader and being at the mercy of the packer. Which will you choose? Does the hon. member suggest that the graders are not competent?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It seems so by the way they grade some of the hogs I have seen them grade.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am afraid that will bring us back to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then abolish the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not wish to pass the buck on to them, but in this case I do not think the fault is that of the commission. It is a matter of opinion what constitutes a select bacon hog. There have been very few complaints as regards the character of the graders, and I think they are a capable set of men. The farmers have been accustomed to raising any kind of hog and they do not like not only to have to grade an animal, but to feed it to get it into the select class. Any grading system is objectionable to people whose article is of low quality. If we cannot get into the top grade of wheat, you know how disappointed we are. Remember what disgust there was at the grades of wheat this last fall. Remember what objections were raised to the grading of cream at first. I remember when we started grading in Saskatchewan, many people took their cans out of the creamery and sent their cans down to the Crescent creamery at Winnipeg or Brandon. After a while, they came back. We shall not do our best in the matter of production of hogs or anything else until we realize that in order to get the top price we must have the top grade. If people do not want the top grade or the top money, this is a free country and they can do what they like. In the corn district of western Ontario, they find that it pays them better to raise the fat hog, and they deliberately do that because they are in a corn country.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think the minister has put his finger on the spot when he says that the right place to grade bacon is on the rail. It might be that the proper remedy for the trouble is to grade the bacon there and not on foot at all. Is there any record as to the quantity of No. 1 bacon coming out of any particular abattoir in the country?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, but we have pretty well under way arrangements for grading the bacon. I spoke of it the other night. We have a gentleman over in the Old Country now on the Imperial Marketing committee. When he is through with that, he will go into a further investigation as to the best kind of grades to make to suit the market. It was the first duty to grade the live hog. We cannot grade it on the rail very well in Canada. In Denmark a farmer takes his hogs to the abattoir, goes down town and does his shopping, and in a few hours there is the animal on the rail graded and he gets his money, just as we used to take grist to the mill and in a few hours get the flour back.

Mr. GOULD: A few years ago the country was filled with pamphlets instructing the farmers to raise bacon hogs that would weigh 190 pounds. It was represented that this made the ideal Wiltshire side and many farmers attempted to produce that kind of hog. Much discontent, however, prevails throughout the country amongst farmers who raise the hogs, the people who handle the co-operative shipments and even the drovers who take the hogs down to the market. There was so much protest made that the department raised the weight of the select bacon hog to 220 pounds.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Two hundred and ten pounds.

Mr. GOULD: Did this discriminating individual, living in England, advise the minister that it would be all right to raise the weight from 190 to 210 pounds, and if so, why were the instructions so positive in the first pamphlets that were issued? I do not think the discriminating individual living in England, when he sees his slice of bacon on his plate, can distinguish a difference of five, ten or twenty pounds in a hog. The people are objecting that an individual is required to produce in a bacon type a hog that weighs exactly 210 pounds, but the man on the farm who raises the hog is obliged to put his judgment against the scales in the city of Winnipeg. He has a litter of eight or nine pigs and he guesses at the opportune time to send those pigs to the market. The minister knows full well that a great many people in the west live very many miles from the railway or shipping point, and they cannot afford to divide up that litter of hogs; and yet a matter of 4 or 5 pounds of difference in the weight of hogs will penalise that individual $1 per hundred. They will be graded thick smooth, and I think either the cut or the penalty is too great, or the grade is too severe, possibly both. Shortly before I left home I was returning from Winnipeg. Practically all the shippers who live on my line of railway, who go to Winnipeg, were on the train, and the subject of hog grading was the paramount discussion, and naturally it centred around me—what attitude did I take? One old grey whiskered man was in the party and he had had a hard time, but he said "Doc Tolmie is a good old scout. He knows what he is doing". He could not justify the grading but he justified Doc Tolmie. But the people are absolutely dissatisfied with the prices and the system of hog grading and the discrimination shown. I could cite the case of the Watsons—possibly the minister knows of them—living south of Manor, great cattle breeders, who have been on record as having shown cattle at Regina and shipping overseas a number of years. They did secure the type of hogs demanded. I saw a litter of pigs owned by them taken in. I saw them in the yard at Winnipeg and no one could discriminate or see any difference in the hogs by looking at them. I think the scales could scarcely determine the difference. Yet Mr. Watson received one select hog out of the nine, and it was the talk of the whole yard that he was abused, and I really believe it. It is my opinion that unless there is an easing of the principle of grading the people are justified in paying no attention whatever to the grading proposition, or to the attempt to raise that type of hog. If the 190 pound hog was the typical and only hog that would produce the Wiltshire side in 1922, why was it that a year or so afterward we found that a 210 pound hog would make the ideal Wiltshire?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was in response to the representation made by many farmers. It was a sort of dividing and harmonizing of interests. The average grower of hogs felt that he could feed hogs to better advantage at 210 pounds, and it was felt it was a sort of compromise, and so it was raised.

Mr. GOULD: Am I right in presuming that if the protest is loud enough there may be another change—that is a change between the select hog and the smooth thick hog, or a discrimination between the hog which weighs 210 pounds and the one which weighs 214 pounds? But the owner of the hog that is four pounds over is penalized by sacrificing $1 per hundred pounds. I think some of the unrest in this regard could be settled if this discrimination were done away with. A graduated scale such as the minister referred to in the case of wheat might answer the purpose. Let us have a percentage of that, say 25 cents for the hog that weighs five or ten pounds more. A man has to use his judgment by looking at the hog and placing his judgment against the scale weight. He has no control over the trip to his destination, and by the time the train arrives, his hogs might lose or gain on the trip. It generally takes two days to get a hog down to Winnipeg, depending on the circumstances, but the man who owns the hog pays the full toll and takes all the risk. Therefore I do not think the price should be so discriminatory against the man who is only endeavouring to comply with the regulations with regard to the shipping of the hogs.

Mr. WARNER: Will the minister tell us whether there is any record of the hogs going into the packing plant that get the grade for Wiltshire sides?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. WARNER: No record kept—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is a record of all the grades, but not of the bacon. We are not grading bacon yet.

Mr. WARNER: If there is a record kept of the number of hogs that get the Wiltshire grade in going into the plant, and the amount of Wiltshire sides sent out of the plant, there is no reason for any quibbling over the grading. We can keep a direct check on it in that way, and I would advise the minister, if it is possible, and as soon as possible to see that there is a record kept of all the hogs that go to the packing plants and get the Wiltshire side grade, and of all the Wiltshire sides going out of the packing plants, that we may be able to check up and ascertain when the grading is done satisfactorily. I know there is a great deal of dissatisfaction and discouragement. The people who are raising hogs feel that no matter what the quality is they are not getting the Wiltshire grade, when they are entitled to it. We want to encourage production of more of the very best quality possible, and I think that with a small outlay, to keep a check on the hogs that get the Wiltshire grade going into the plant and the amount of Wiltshire pork going out of the plant, we could get at it in a reasonable and intelligent way, and perhaps through the use of this method we will be able to give encouragement to the people who are trying to raise this kind of hog. It is a very hard thing to do with the breed of hogs we have. It would take some time at the best, but I think that that one thing would give more encouragement than all the talking to the people that the department can do through their agents. Having a check on it and letting the people know they are getting a square deal will help to encourage production.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Referring to the remarks of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), the grading of hogs in principle is not very much different from the grading of any other product. It is more difficult to carry out, but the principle is the same and you have to have an arbitrary point between grades. The situation is that when you miss one grade and drop into another you drop some money. When you drop a grade in wheat you drop a whole lot—10 or 15 cents between the low grade.

Mr. GOULD: We drop a dollar in one grade on the hog.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a cent a pound. That is not as much proportionately as fifteen or twenty cents on wheat. You have to have an arbitrary point of demarcation between one point and another.

Mr. GOULD: Surely a cent a pound on pork is a much greater drop than ten or fifteen cents on 60 pounds of wheat.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is neither here nor there. You have to have an arbitrary rate. We started out with a weight 160 to 210 pounds. That was changed from 170 to 220 pounds, a sort of compromise. My hon. friend wanted to know whether, if a vigorous kick were made, we would make a change. When you get into the heavier animals you would not have the bacon type. We think we have gone just as far as we can without destroying the grade that is desired abroad. If my hon. friend would just simply imagine that it is something else he is more familiar with—grain—he will acknowledge that you cannot depart from any grading system. This involves exactly what he is complaining of. The only way it can be avoided is by having a straight sample market where one man dickers with another. Once you begin to grade, you must have an arbitrary line, and the moment you drop out of one grade into the lower you drop money. If it only made 5 per cent difference it would take an expert to tell it. Besides, nobody but the buyer sets the price; the market says what the grade will bring, not the grader. The packer comes along and is ready to give 10 per cent more for that kind of animal. You wonder why he will not give more, but that is what it is worth to him who is converting the raw product into the finished article to compete with other countries. Let me read the description of select bacon hogs:

> Select bacon: hogs weighing 170 to 220 pounds at stockyards and abattoirs, or hogs weighing 170 to 220 pounds at local shipping points and at such other points as may be designated from time to time; of a type and finish indicating suitability for the production of choice bacon or Wiltshire sides for export. Jowl and shoulder light and smooth; back from neck to tail evenly fleshed; side long, medium depth, dropping reasonably straight from back; ham full; good general finish; no excess fat.

It takes a bird of a hog to comply with that description. You might have a heavy shoulder and heavy neck animal with short side and fat hams; that would not do at all. The owner of any product is always a little partial towards it just as we are partial to our own children. Therefore it would not be safe to leave the grading to the owner; it has to be done by some impartial individual, and it takes an expert. These graders become so familiar with their work that although the animals pass by them quickly their judgment is very seldom challenged. I have been well pleased with any of these graders whom I have seen at work. I know the difficulty I had in converting myself from the old-fashioned idea I got when a youth down in this province. We used to think a hog was not ready for the knife until it was so fat that you had to call it three or four times before it would get up. Some education is needed to get that idea out of a man in favour of something that looks to him more like a greyhound—a thin, smooth animal with long sides—where the value is—and low shoulders —where the low price is—and a light neck. I am afraid a great many farmers are setting up the judgment of their youth against the new demand; they want to make the grade fit their hog, instead of making their hog fit the grade. I had the same difficulty myself, and it is only in the last ten years that I have paid much attention to the matter at all. I am in correspondence with the provincial ministers of agriculture, on this very thing, asking them if they have any suggestions to make to improve conditions—Do they agree with the principle? If so, what details should be changed to make it more acceptable to the farmer? If anybody does not want to comply with the grading, well, this is a free country and he can grow anything from a wild boar to a razorback, but if he wants to get the price he must raise select bacon hogs.

Mr. WARNER: I asked the minister if he thought it possible to keep a record of the hogs going into the plant getting the Wiltshire side grade and the pork going out of the plant.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I overlooked that question. When we come to grade the bacon, yes; but at present the grading does not go past the live hog. We are working on the system of bacon grading now. In a few months we hope to have it ready, and then we will have a check on the amount that goes in and the amount that comes out. But make no mistake, when we put that on there will have to be a few more men, and this increase of staff will bring a few more complaints from some people that we are blowing in too much money for the work. It must be understood that if we are going to give service we must pay the price.

Mr. WARNER: It is not satisfactory at the present time, so I am glad to hear the minister is going to see the work will be done in a better way.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a gradual evolution towards betterment.

Mr. GOULD: When on my feet before I do not think I said anything which should cause the minister to think that I object to the principle of grading.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think you did.

Mr. GOULD: I do not object to the principle of grading although I notice it is very fashionable at the present time to grade the farmers' stuff as it leaves him, but it is not as fashionable to grade the stuff which the farmer has to buy. I should like to see the same activity and persistence in the other departments of the government to grade the materials which I have to buy as is shown in the grading of materials which I have to sell. The minister read to the committee the type of hog which makes the Wiltshire sides, and one of the items was "not much fat."

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No excess fat.

Mr. GOULD: Not enough fat to put in your lard pail at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Very little.

Mr. GOULD: The market has been stolen by the Cottolene people, the people whom the minister two years ago scolded so severely because of their product entering into the manufacture of oleomargarine, but he has handed over the shortening market to these same people.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There will always be enough fat hogs to produce lard.

Mr. GOULD: Possibly, but at the present time I notice the lard pails are particularly low, and I have to go into the butcher shop to buy cottolene or crisco, which have taken the place of the real, genuine old lard that helped to make the genuine old doughnuts "like mother used to make," and which now are denied us through the activities of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will have to get oleo back then to make doughnuts.

Mr. GOULD: The minister must recognize how difficult it is for the farmer taking the chance on his own judgment to get his hogs to the Winnipeg market and have them come within this narrow margin of weight. It may be a true type that was bred properly and ordinarily would have conformed to the weight requirement had the facilities for getting to market been as they should be. But something happened; the hog was longer on the road than it should have been, or it may have been fed, with the result that it weighed a pound more than it should have weighed and the owner loses one cent a pound on that account. There is an argument in favour of the man who has made an honest attempt to turn out the proper type of hog. The people in my part of the country are dissatisfied with the principle of hog grading as it is now carried out.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend approves, I understand, of the principle of grading. What changes would he suggest in detail?

Mr. GOULD: I would be as broad in my interpretation of what the change should be as the minister was when he raised the weight from 190 to 210 pounds. If license was shown to that extent when that change was made, then I think a further license might be shown in determining what the weight and the status of the bacon hog should be at the present time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The market has to set the price.

Mr. GOULD: I do suggest the advisability of grading bacon out. I believe that the abattoirs or storage houses that check in these supposed thick smooths and bacon hogs are sending out more Wiltshire sides than they take in. I think it is the business of the government to know that and to see that the people are informed generally of the condition of affairs in that regard.

Mr. TOLMIE: This matter of hog grading is one in which everyone is interested. I am sorry to hear from the hon. member (Mr. Gould) that there is a shortage in the doughnut crop as the result of the grading regulations; but it appears to be largely a matter of education. We cannot hope to consume all the hogs that we grow in this country and we cannot hope to market them in those markets that are open to us in the face of the competition from other countries unless we produce the kind of bacon they want. It is easier to do that than to change their ideas of what they want. I would like to commend the minister for the work he is carrying on in his agricultural committee in connection with the giving of addresses by experts of the department. I understand there is to be an address on the bacon hog and hog grading next week.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Tuesday.

Mr. TOLMIE: Why not follow that up with a live hog demonstration, either at the packing house over in Hull or at the experimental farm, so that all the members of the House of Commons who take a keen interest in this matter may have the opportunity to see an actual demonstration of what the bacon hog is?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. THURSTON: There has been so much criticism of hog grading and the types of grades set out by the department that I cannot help thinking that a little support should be given to the system or to the grades as at present established, by one who feels that he knows what he is talking about. I happen to have been connected with this hog grading work—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the hon. member suggest that those who spoke against the grades did not know what they were talking about?

Mr. THURSTON: Not at all, but I claim that I know what I am talking about when I support the grades that have been established. I was interested in the agitation for the grading of hogs for some years before it was adopted and in several conferences with representatives of the packing plants of Ontario. We have demonstrated at our local shipping point at home that the farm there is receiving a benefit from the system, because as a result of it, we are getting a premium ranging from $40 to $70 on every week's shipment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What percentage goes "select?"

[Mr. Gould.]

Mr. THURSTON: It varies. When we first started to grade, our loads ranged from 12 to 15 per cent—12 was the lowest. We have gained from 12 per cent to 58, to my knowledge, and it may have increased within the last week or two. We have done that in a matter of eight or nine months. It is not hard to produce a hog that will comply with the grades laid down by the department. Care has to be taken in the breeding, and particularly in the feeding in the early months of the life of the hog. It is when the hog is young that the hog is made. You cannot raise hogs in Ontario to-day by letting them grow themselves; they have to be grown just the same as any other animal.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do you dairy as well?

Mr. THURSTON: Yes. You cannot profitably raise hogs without keeping milch cows. I hope that the campaign of hog grading will continue to the point that different hon. members have suggested, and that we will have an actual check or report on the bacon as it leaves the plant. I understand that we are allowing a great deal of American bacon to be brought into Canada, cured here and sold in Great Britain. I have tried to get a copy of the mark that is stamped on the bacon but I am told that the words "Canadian cured" appear in rather large letters and "American bacon" in small letters, and that the bacon is frequently sold in Great Britain as Canadian bacon. If we are to spend a great deal of money and time to establish our reputation as a bacon producing country we should have our markets very closely watched to see that no one else cuts in on us. I would like to be certain that this American bacon is not injuring the reputation of our Canadian bacon in Great Britain.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was a general impression that during the war the reputation of our bacon was injured a little by the American bacon that my hon. friend speaks about; and we may have hurt it a little ourselves during that period. A very large amount of this bacon comes in—about 25,000,000 pounds a year. That is brought into the packing houses. It is kept separate and put into separate vats. It is cured separately, and shipped out separately. It is one of the duties of the meat inspector to see that it is shipped out separately and marked separately, every side being marked " U.S. product." I do not think there is any abuse now. The only thing that I have felt anxious about was this: When Canadian packers could not get the amount of Canadian bacon wanted, instead of pressing for it and by offering a fair price encouraging the Canadian farmer, they turned around and bought from the United States in order to keep their plant going. You cannot blame them for that; but if that were not done, they would be more likely to pay a better price and encourage bacon production here. The idea is to make it so attractive that they could not afford to miss it. If I were a packer, I presume I would want to keep my plant running at full capacity, and the only way for us to stop them importing is to raise more bacon. I know farmers do not like anybody suggesting anything to them about hogs, because they feel they have been fooled on hogs so often they want to be left alone; but you cannot blame the packer for importing if he cannot get enough at home to keep his plant running.

Mr. THURSTON: I think it would be wise for our customs officials or for the department to see that the words "Canada" and "Canadian" are not allowed to go on the packages or on American meat shipped in here.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Those words are not allowed.

Mr. THURSTON: Not even "Canadian cured." Do not let the words Canada or Canadian appear on it at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have heard it stated that "Canadian cured" is on it, but I am sure it is not.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: To return to the item before us, I am quite sure the minister in his zeal for economy would welcome any suggestion which, if feasible, would assist him in reducing the cost of administration of this and similar acts without impairing the efficiency of the service. In answer to a question by the hon. member for Victoria, the minister stated there was no over-lapping of the work of the veterinaries employed in this department and those who might be employed by provincial departments. I want to suggest to him that it might be possible in a great many cases to use some of the local veterinaries for that work. We have a considerable staff of men employed in this business, and not only are they on salary but they also have to travel long distances, at considerable expense, to reach the scene of their operations. I believe,—as a matter of fact I know from personal observation that there are a great many local veterinaries in the neighbourhood, competent men who for a comparatively small fee would perform that work. I believe that is a suggestion that is worth considering. I have heard it stated, not only by the local veterinaries but by farmers in the neighbourhood—and I have myself seen it—that men have travelled upwards of one hundred miles by train and by car to do that work, at great expense for travelling and involving a loss of time, which means that they can do comparatively little work. I would like the minister to consider that suggestion.

I think the same principle might be applied in connection with some of the other acts; for instance the Live Stock Act; I would not have referred to that if it had not been mentioned here to-night. There are three or four items; take these stallion clubs, for example. I understand that in order to qualify, a horse must be subjected to an inspection by a qualified horseman in order to ascertain whether the animal is of the proper type. I had a very interesting experience in the city of Calgary not very long ago. I was in the Palliser hotel and saw there a gentleman very comfortably ensconced. I said to one of my friends. "Do you know who that man is?" "Yes," he said "he is a horseman from Ontario. He has come up to inspect stallions for stallion clubs." "What is the idea?" I asked. "Oh," he said "we haven't good enough horsemen in Alberta to do the work, I presume." I want to suggest to the minister that in many cases you will find in Alberta, not in the same district, for it is not always advisable to use a man in the same district, but in the neighbourhood horsemen as well qualified to do this work as any horseman anywhere else in Canada. They would be glad to do it for a comparatively small fee for each examination. If that can be done, and of course I am prepared to listen with an open mind to any reasons why it cannot be done, I am quite certain it would result in a considerable reduction in staff, and a consequent decrease in salary and travelling expenses and result in the case of examination of horses in a great reduction of fees and expenses charged by the men who do the inspection. I have men in my own district who I know are just as well qualified to pass on the pedigree and type of horse required as any man imported to do the work. They could examine a horse for $10, whereas I am sure my friend in the Palliser hotel would have charged at least $100 in fees and expenses to do the same work. I would like the minister to consider that, and ascertain if some system of that sort could not be put into force in connection with many of these acts. We have a great many grading acts now, and we will probably have more. I am not against grading acts; I would like to see the grading acts lived up to and our products standardized and improved and the health of every animal maintained, and we should have competent men to see they are maintained; but I would suggest that as we are continually multiplying these services, which means a continual increase in the staff employed, and a continual increase in expenditure, some such system as I suggest might in many cases be put into force. It would materially reduce the cost without impairing in any way the efficiency of the work done; I would be very sorry to see its efficiency in any way impaired.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the remarks of my hon. friend are worthy of some notice. His suggestions look quite plausible, but we have found in actual practice that it is better to have an outside examiner of these horses, just as it is better to have outside judges at fairs on account of the keen competition there is among the stock men. An outside examiner will be more likely to give a fair and unbiased examination, other things being equal, than the local man who is influenced by his home environment and associations, and may be persuaded into giving not quite as fair a judgment on the merits of the animal.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was not suggesting that a man in the district in which the club was formed should do that work. I am quite aware that local circumstances might influence his judgment, but a man could be brought in from a district not so very far away to do it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That often happens, I believe. In the instance my hon. friend mentions, the man might have come from Ontario, but we have no desire to pay heavy travelling expenses if we can get a good man locally.

My hon. friend's other point about local veterinaries also sounds plausible, but our certificate, whether it is on our meats or any other product, and with regard to freedom from tuberculosis, our inspection certificates of all kinds in order to have value must be given by our own men. I think that is a condition in other countries also. It must be men under the control and in the pay of the federal government. Our certificate would have very little weight unless it was given by our own men; in fact we have to comply with the conditions laid down by other countries in this respect. If those countries want their bacon certified it must be marked by a federal veterinary. If the market wants our cattle to be certified free from T.B. that certification must be done by an appointee of the federal government. We do not create these terms, other countries insist on them, and it is our duty to comply with these demands just as it is in the matter of sending a veterinary over to the Old Country with every consignment of cattle. Under these conditions, therefore, we are not permitted to use the services of local men, particularly in the case of exportations to the overseas market. As to the men who are employed by the federal department I must refer hon. gentlemen to the Hunter building—that is the place where the positions go through. We have not advertised for any veterinaries recently; there is a waiting list of about forty or more of men who have qualified. There may be some men from Alberta, I think there are some from Saskatchewan, on that list, but the general understanding is that appointments from this list will be made on the basis of eligibility. Not only that, but the order with regard to certificates precludes the possibility of appointing local men.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think the minister is mistaken in his conception of my suggestion in one respect. I am not objecting to veterinaries being appointed from other provinces and stationed permanently in Alberta, I am not objecting because they are not Alberta vets, but I was suggesting that it might be possible to have these men examined by the federal department and placed, if you like, on part time, as is done in many departments of the government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, we do that.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: These part time men would be remunerated on the fee system, but would still be federal employees who would comply with the provisions of the act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have that system now.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was suggesting you should extend that system and pay these men on a per diem basis.

Mr. TOLMIE: I wish to say one or two words in connection with the vote under consideration. The minister, with reference to the creation of isolation areas for the purpose of cleaning up tuberculosis, referred to Vancouver island and also to Prince Edward Island. The suggestion is a very excellent one for the reason the minister stated—that in both cases there are natural barriers, the areas can be easily isolated, and the needed isolation can be maintained to the greatest possible extent. On Vancouver island a great deal of testing has already been done under the provincial government. There are a number of accredited herds there, and in addition to that we have perhaps one of the best Jersey herds and Jersey equipments in the whole of Canada. So that the department when it undertakes that work, will find the conditions very good to begin with.

The minister has spoken about the provincial aid that his department should receive in carrying on the work of the Health of Animals branch. While I quite agree that that aid would be an advantage, we must guard carefully what has been built up in connection with that branch. It stands out by itself as one of the best organizations of its kind in the world, created largely on a splendid foundation laid by the late Dr. J. G. Rutherford, a man whom we all respected, and whom we all acknowledge to have been, perhaps, one of the ablest men in his profession in the country. We have attained a position that is unique from the point of view of the success that has been achieved. Perhaps the strongest arguments that were used before the embargo commission in the Old Country were first our freedom from animal contagious disease, and, in the second place, our ability to continue to protect the herds of Canada against contagious disease. So that in any arrangement that is made with any province I would advise the careful guarding of the authority of the federal Health of Animals branch in order that that authority may remain unimpaired. That branch has succeeded in the past, it is succeeding at the present time, and gives every promise of being able to succeed in the future.

There is a point I should like to refer to for a moment, and that is the cutting down of the amount of compensation paid. The compensation, as I understand it, is a means of paying to the man who is losing the diseased cattle a certain amount of remuneration so as to diminish his loss. We found at the beginning that all this health of animals work was opposed, just as hog grading is being opposed to-day, but when people began to realize the value of the work a fair compensation was a tremendous aid to the government in carrying on its operations. It is rather dangerous to lower your compensation too much. In the case of the small farmer who has a small grade herd, after he has raised his steer and his heifer to the yearling stage I do not see just what difference it will make. The value of both animals is practically the same whether yearlings or two year olds; and I think he should have compensation coming to him just as much in the one case as in the other; I am quite sure that he suffered a loss in both cases.

It has been mentioned to-night in the discussion that there was somewhat of an inclination to get away from the splendid work carried on by the Health of Animals branch at one of the meetings in the west during the past year. If that be so I think that tendency should be very strongly opposed. We find in all districts, and I have had a personal experience in this connection, that in applying the regulations of the Health of Animals branch there is always a group that will oppose you strongly under all conditions; and you simply have to go after them with a stiff upper lip and put the regulations through. If the regulations are properly applied the opponents will, in the course of time, come to recognize the value of them.

There is one criticism I am going to make —although I am not going to say it is the only one I should like to offer—and that is of the policy of spending large amounts of money on compensation while there is only a very small sum expended on research work. It appears to me that research work—good and extensive research work—should be the foundation of the entire operations of the Health of Animals branch to a very great extent, and that by carrying on this research work, by learning the very best method of conducting experiments with the proper plant, you will place yourself in a position, after a while, to avoid a great deal of the expenditure that is now made in the way of compensation. I would strongly urge upon the government that these stations be extended so as to afford the experts that you have at the present time, and very excellent men they are, a fair opportunity of developing along these lines, remembering that trying to economize will not make the germs inactive; they will continue to keep busy under all circumstances, and so there must be adequate appropriations to carry on the work in a proper way.

11 p.m.

Before closing I should like to ask the minister one question: Did I understand him to say, when discussing the Calmette vaccine that this has not reached a sufficiently high standard of perfection to be adopted as a general method of eradicating tuberculosis?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are experimenting, but we could not, as yet, recommend any general application.

Mr. TOLMIE: From the knowledge you have acquired, and in the opinion of your experts, it has not yet reached that stage?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is right.

Mr. MILNE: What amount of money is being spent in research work with the object of preventing or stamping out these diseases?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I read the item out. "Pathological division, $55,000."

Mr. LEADER: I ask the minister why he has undertaken to exempt cattle suffering from lump jaw from any compensation if they react to the tuberculin test? I, as a breeder and live stock man do not take any serious objection to the fact that this is applied to steers. But for the life of me I cannot see why they apply this to cattle suffering from lump jaw. I took occasion to write to the Veterinary Inspector General to see if there was any connection between lump jaw and tuberculosis. One clause in his letter reads:

> The whole trouble with lump jaw is that the cases are not promptly dealt with. In cases that are promptly dealt with and recover, there is no sign of any enlargement. This disease has no bearing at all upon tuberculosis.

If a breeder is unfortunate enough to have a very valuable female animal contract lump jaw, she gets over it, she has had no tuberculosis and there is no scar left from her having had lump jaw, why should the breeder of that animal be penalized to the extent that he will not get compensation for her if she reacts to the tuberculin test? The regulations call for her destruction, but there is no compensation. Why is that regulation in effect?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When this disease is in its incipient stage and can be taken care of, I think the intention is not to apply the regulation to that stage; but when the disease gets so far advanced, objectionable and repulsive that the animal should not be there at all, we want the regulation to apply to that. In the early stages we can give compensation.

Mr. LEADER: I want that clearly brought out. In the incipient stage where there are no sufficient signs, compensation would not be withheld in case of a reaction?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Has the minister control over insurance rates charged by live stock commission agents? They charge an insurance rate on each car, the premium running from eight to ten, to twelve dollars a car, to protect them against probable losses from animals that may fail to pass the test. Many complaints are made by farmers and drovers that a very much larger amount is paid in than the actual value of the losses. There are hundreds of cars on which I am assured there are no losses at all, and yet this amount of eight, ten or twelve dollars is paid on every one of them. Those men should be compelled to furnish a statement showing their actual losses and the value as against the amount that they collect in insurance premiums.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a pretty old question to open up at this time of the evening. I think the principle of charging a flat rate for insurance to take care of disease is bad, because it is charging the man with the clean stock just the same as the man with dirty stock. But in the absence of any better system, the packers have been carrying this on for quite a long time. This question has been raised, as the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) knows, at practically every live stock meeting that has been held for the last ten or twelve years and at every live stock union that has been held.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The complaints I have heard in this regard are not because the men with the clean stock have to pay the same as those with the poor grade stock, but that a much larger amount is paid in than the packers actually lose. My suggestion is that these commission agents should be compelled to furnish statements showing the value of their actual losses as against the amounts they collect, because I believe they make a good deal of money out of those premiums.

Item agreed to.

Entomology, $20,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: We have had a pretty busy night; this is the end of the week, and most of our people have gone away. I think we have done pretty well.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: This is Friday and tomorrow is a holiday. We might go on for another hour.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not reasonable. We have had an excellent discussion to-day just as we had on the previous item. The minister has carried three very large items running into about $5,000,000 besides some smaller items. I think he ought to be well satisfied with the day's work.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Béland the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

QUESTIONS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY UNANSWERED

CORRESPONDENCE ON OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) inquired concerning certain correspondence in the Department of External Affairs between the government of Canada and the British government relating to ocean transport especially in relation to the Imperial Shipping Committee. I beg to lay on the table such correspondence as I have been able to secure.

REPORT

Copies of reports of the Board of Railway Commissioners—Hon. Mr. Graham.

HEALTH OF ANIMALS REGULATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I desire to bring to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) a certain matter of importance in regard to which I shall ask him two questions. For the safeguarding of the health of animals in Canada, certain regulations were passed prohibiting the importation of goods packed in hay or straw—I think fodder is the term generally used—coming from areas in Great Britain or elsewhere infected with the foot and mouth disease. I understand that notice to this effect was given the transportation companies in November, but recently there arrived in Vancouver on one of the Canadian merchant marine ships a cargo, a large portion of which consisted of goods packed in this prohibited material. I am informed that a very substantial part of this cargo has been ordered returned, other portions having been permitted to land. I want to ask two questions: Is it not possible to permit the unpacking of these goods under careful supervision, the packing material to be immediately destroyed, and thus avert a loss to the importer who undoubtedly is innocent in the matter? In the second place, why should local importers be subjected to such loss and inconvenience when the fault rests very largely with the transportation company, in this case with the government merchant marine?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): The situation complained of is practically as my hon. friend has stated it, except that additional steps were taken as long ago as August last. The United States government had passed a similar law prohibiting the importation of goods into that country when packed in hay and straw, and as we had a working arrangement with that government whereby we should have regulations of a similar nature with regard to imports from foreign countries, we found it all the more imperative, not only in the interests of Canadian stock but also for the purpose of carrying out our end of the arrangement, to impose this restriction with regard to goods packed in this material coming from countries infected with the foot and mouth disease. However, we allowed goods to come in packed in this way wherever a certificate accompanied them indicating that there was no foot and mouth disease in the exporting country. A number of such shipments came in and we drew the attention of the importers to the fact that this certificate could be obtained from the exporting country. We also extended the time of grace to January 1, hoping that the offenders, who as my hon. friend points out are really the shipping companies and not the innocent importers, might have time to accustom themselves to the regulations. We recognized that we were in the difficult position of being obliged to protect the live stock of the country on the one hand, and, on the other hand, to give as far as possible some consideration to the shipper. So that, as I say, we extended the time to January 1, after which the rule was to be hard-and-fast; and in the meantime we did our best to fumigate and burn all straw coming with such shipments. There was a difficulty, however; we found that shipments of these goods were accumulating at such a rate that it would take an army of officers to fumigate and burn the straw. Finally, therefore, we decided to extend the time to January 15, taking the ground that, after that, under no consideration should the practice be allowed to continue. And we took this ground for several reasons. In the first place, so long as we allowed the goods to land in this kind of packing, the shipping companies apparently would continue to accept such shipments, and the evil would go on in perpetuity. In the second place, we had not a sufficient number of men to take care of all the parcels that were coming in; we could not properly fumigate and dispose of them. And there was a third reason. There is always an element of danger in unpacking these goods, because the moment you begin to fuss with them you increase the opportunities that already exist for the germs to scatter. At the beginning, we usually destroyed the straw in some of the incinerators, but it was inevitable, in the transportation of such goods, that the infection should spread; and for that reason we decided that we should have to stop receiving the goods at this end. If we did not do something of the kind the shipping companies would continue to accept delivery at the other end, and so the danger would persist. Apparently there is a hardship and I do not know how we shall overcome it, but at the same time we must protect our live stock interests. This matter was brought to my attention by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay), and if it can be shown, even yet, that a preference should be given to supplies entering into a government contract, such as the dry dock at Vancouver, I am willing to consider the matter further. The trouble, however, is that if we give a preference to one, even though the goods in that case may be delivered by the Canadian merchant marine, it is difficult indeed to see how we can refuse others. Certainly, so long as we receive goods as we have been receiving them, the shipping companies will continue to accept delivery at the other end.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to ask one other question. Could not some alternative scheme, say at a moderate cost of unpacking and destroying the material, be substituted for the arbitrary order for absolute return, which in many cases will entail very serious losses? Let me illustrate the point without labouring it. I have in mind a company that ordered goods—I am not referring to the dry dock at the moment—upon which they depended to complete a contract within a specified time. As it happens, these goods were not accompanied by the necessary certificate and consequently an order has been issued for their return, so that it may be two or three months before the contractors receive the necessary supplies. The result may be a penalty under the contract. If the minister could provide the alternative of segregating these goods and destroying the fodder, at the cost of the shipper, then at least in an extreme case such as I have mentioned the difficulty might to some extent be overcome. I ask the minister and his colleagues to earnestly consider this in the interests of trade.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have been considering it very carefully, Mr. Speaker, but the element of danger is present. I am in receipt quite recently of a number of telegrams from the western provinces urging me to continue these restrictions and to take no chances of the disease being introduced. The telegrams include one from Premier Bracken and another from the live stock interests of Alberta. I know it is a hardship to innocent shippers. In my opinion the right course is to prosecute those shipping companies that are landing embargoed goods on our shores.

Mr. STEVENS: Including the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not see why action should not be taken against them if they are landing goods on our shores that have been embargoed and prohibited. However, at the urgent request of my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) I will look into the matter further, and if there is any way of doing anything without risk to our live stock industry, and without opening the door to everybody else wanting the same treatment, I shall be delighted to act.

NATURALIZATION LAWS AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Ten days ago, Mr. Speaker, I drew the attention of the government to the debate in the British House of Commons on February 18 with reference to proposed changes in the naturalization laws to prevent a woman of British nationality married to an alien from losing her British citizenship. It was stated that the British government were communicating with the dominions in regard to the matter. I asked then whether this government had received any such communication. I repeat the question to-day to the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have some information, but I will have to give it to my hon. friend tomorrow, not having it with me at the moment.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I noticed in the press recently a report to the effect that an offer had been made for the purchase of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine as a whole. Would the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) inform the House what reply has been made to the offer, and what the intention of the government is in regard thereto?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): The attitude of the government, Mr. Speaker, has always been that it was prepared to sell any portion of the merchant marine that was not, in its opinion, necessary for the development of our trade. Several offers have been made at different times for portions of the fleet. Up to date the government has not considered any of them.

TARIFF RETALIATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to read a news item from Saturday's Montreal Gazette, and base a question to the government upon it. It refers to a statement alleged to have been made by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to the Canadian Council of Agriculture. I notice the minister is not present, but I am pretty sure the Prime Minister can answer my question; or if he cannot I know the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) would try. This is the despatch:

> Ottawa, March 6.—"If the Americans put up a prohibitive tariff against our agricultural products why shouldn't we put up a tariff against some of their products?" Hon. J. A. Robb, Acting Minister of Finance, asked a delegation from the Canadian Council of Agriculture, which waited on the government this morning.
> "The government needs to have some club to handle these fellows," he continued.

May I ask if the Acting Minister of Finance used this language, or language to the same effect?—and is it to be taken as an indication of what we are to expect in the budget? Or is it only indicative of a lucid interval?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to answer my right hon. friend, but I think he will have to wait until the minister returns.

THE RECENT EARTHQUAKE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, as I walked into the House this afternoon the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) called my attention to a matter of importance. On the evening of February 28 Ottawa and eastern Canada were visited by a very severe earthquake. As usual, the press reports were very much exaggerated, and Tadoussac, Murray Bay, Baie St. Paul and other north shore towns have been repeatedly mentioned in the despatches, which inform us that tremors continued for several days after the first shocks and that considerable damage has been done in that part of the country. I know the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) has already sent one of his officials to inspect the district, but I think he would be well advised to have an official report made stating exactly what occurred. We do not want people to imagine that we are in an earthquake belt, but earthquake disturbances may come again, and I think it would be a good thing for the minister to let us know exactly what did take place on the north shore.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I may say in reply, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Hodgson, of the Observatory staff, is now in the Quebec area affected investigating the reported disturbances in the interests of scientific research, but he has received no instructions to bring back details of the damage done.

PRIVILEGE—MR. FOURNIER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. FOURNIER (Bellechasse): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In to-day's Ottawa Citizen the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) is quoted as having used the following language in addressing a meeting yesterday in Montreal:

> Mr. Woodsworth said in part:
> "Although there are only two members of the House elected on the Labour ticket, we are not as weak as you might imagine. The Conservatives, Liberals and even the Progressives—who have asked us to join their forces—have their hands tied; they cannot say what they think, as they were elected by campaign funds and have to stick by what their leader says;

As a Liberal I protest most energetically against that statement.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am under obligation to the hon. member (Mr. Fournier) for having brought this matter to the attention of the House? It has already been suggested here to-day that we ought to have accurate statements in the press. I have already given a statement to the newspapers correcting the report. Certainly I did not say anything about campaign funds as applied to those members who come from the prairies.

Mr. CALDWELL: May I ask if the hon. member will include New Brunswick?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope hon. members will admit that it is difficult sometimes for the press to condense into a few paragraphs an address that occupies well on to an hour. I was trying to show what, from our standpoint, as we have attempted to point out from time to time in this House, is one of the evils of the present party system, that the big party requires extensive campaign funds in order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am explaining my position, Mr. Speaker. And further, that owing to the rigid party discipline which prevails it is extremely difficult for the individual member to express his own particular convictions when they differ from those of the party as a whole. That was the setting of the statements made in my speech in Montreal.

Mr. FOURNIER: Thank you for the apology.

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY OUTLET

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I would like to call the attention of the government to a special despatch to the Edmonton Journal, dated February 28, regarding an outlet to the Pacific coast from the Peace river. It says:

> The Minister of the Interior comes out flatly for the least expensive line by way of the Monkman pass.

I would like to ask if that is a statement of government policy regarding the Peace river transportation question?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): It is not a statement of government policy. The statement is incorrect so far as it intimates that I have come out flatly in favour of the Monkman pass. As one who is deeply interested in an outlet for the Peace river country, I am entirely in favour of an outlet to the westward and have never concealed that attitude. I am in favour of the Monkman pass, or the Peace pass, or the Pine pass, whichever is the most feasible, will serve the country best, and can be constructed the cheapest.

IMMIGRATION ACT—RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I would like to ask the Minister of Immigration if he would bring down the return required by subsection 2 of section 4 of the Immigration Act as amended last year. This section requires the minister, within thirty days of the meeting of parliament, to lay before the House a return of all permits, with the names and particulars, issued by the minister authorizing persons to enter or stay in Canada without being subject to the provisions of the Immigration Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I will direct the attention of the Minister of Immigration to the matter. I am sure he will be glad to comply with my hon. friend's request.

PRIVATE BILLS

MANITOBA AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY

Mr. C. WALLACE STEWART (Humboldt) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has the Minister of Railways to say about this bill?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): This is a bill for extension of time for construction. The original act was passed in 1893. With respect to several of these bills—my memory does not serve me about this one—I have received communications urging that some steps be taken to have construction proceeded with in cases where the original charters have been extended many times. However, it is the custom to accept the second reading of these bills, more as a form than anything else, and to refer them to the committee on Railway, Canals and Telegraph Lines for discussion as to details, where all the parties can appear. I suppose it is proper for the House to give the second reading, on the understanding that the bill shall go to this committee for full discussion.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

QUESTIONS

Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

EMBARGO ON POTATOES

Mr. CALDWELL:

1. Has the government been officially advised that Great Britain has put an embargo on the importation of potaties from Canada into the United Kingdom?
2. If so, when and why was this embargo put into effect?
3. What are the conditions of the embargo?
4. Was the government advised as to the imminence f such action on the part of the Imperial governn ent previous to such action being taken?
5. Was any action taken by the government to attempt to prevent such an embargo being put into effect?
6. If such an effort was made on the part of the Canadian government, what was the nature of the representations made to the Imperial government?
7. Has any effort been made to have these conditions modified?
8. Does Great Britain admit potatoes from any European countries?
9. Does the government know whether conditions alleged to be the cause for the placing of this embargo against potatoes from Canada exist in European countries from which potatoes are admitted into Great Britain?
10. Do such conditions prevail in Great Britain or n any part thereof?

11. Is the government aware that large quantities of potatoes are in railroad transit in this country, or in store at docks ready to be loaded on ship board?

12. If so, will such potatoes be allowed entry into Great Britain if sent forward?

13. Are potatoes originating in the United States of America admitted to Great Britain? If not, why?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.

2. Notification was received in a despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated February 16, that, on account of the presence of the Colorado beetle in Canada, and the possibility of its introduction into the United Kingdom through importations of Canadian potatoes, the importation of potatoes from Canada after February 20, 1925, was prohibited.

3. The embargo is unconditional.

4. Yes, but unofficially.

5. Yes.

6 and 7. When the possibility of the embargo was first reported, the following cable was sent to the High Commissioner:

Unofficially reported here that British ministry contemplate putting embargo on Canadian potatoes because of presence here of Colorado beetle. This beetle has been in Canada for half century and to take objection to it now would be extremely unfortunate and untimely in view of recent action of United Kingdom looking to promotion of inter-empire trade by establishing marketing committee upon which dominions have been invited to appoint representatives. Urge you have any such suggested action stayed until whole situation is carefully surveyed from all angles as another ill advised cattle embargo incident would be unfortunate.

The following is a quotation from a letter addressed by the High Commissioner to the Right Honourable Lord Bledisloe, Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries:

I am enclosing a little article which appeared in the Manchester edition of the Daily Mail yesterday headed "U.S.A. Bacon."

You will notice in the last paragraph of this an allusion to potatoes, in case American potatoes should find their way via Canada to this country. As a matter of fact this would be commercially impossible because the duty on potatoes from the United States to Canada is thirty-five cents per 100 pounds and the United States market is always higher than the Canadian, even in times of plenty like the present year, and if they went through Canada in bond they would be bound to be marked U.S.A. potatoes.

You are probably well aware of the care taken in grading and marketing Canadian potatoes. They are run over wire screens for sizes, then bagged, and each bag must have a tag attached by a government inspector, marked "Canadian A", and "Canadian B" or "Canadian C." I may add that the potatoes are examined by two government inspectors—by the original grader and the potato health inspector at the point of shipment.

The information I get is that it is practically an impossibility for the Colorado beetle to appear in any Canadian tuber because, as you know, the slugs feed on the leaf and then bury themselves in the earth, not in the tuber, and the tuber being run over wire screens for sizes and then run again over hand racks at the point of shipment precludes any possibility of them containing anything that might develop into a Colorado beetle.

These representations were, however, unsuccessful and the embargo was placed on Canadian potatoes. The government was, however, successful in inducing the British government to except from the conditions of the embargo any Canadian potatoes afloat at the time the embargo was put into effect.

A further attempt was made to have the restrictions removed the following cable having been sent to the British ministry.

The Entomological branch of the Department of Agriculture has just completed a close biological study of the Colorado beetle and from their study of the habits of the insect, there would appear to be no danger whatever of the beetle being transported in shipments of potatoes exported from Canada.

The Colorado potato beetle in eastern Canada disappears from the plants by the end of September and enters the ground for hibernation. In fact, the large majority of the beetles are in the ground a month earlier. Potatoes exported from Canada to England are dug in October, at which time, as stated, the beetles are inactive, being in hibernation in the ground. After digging, the potatoes are machine-graded before shipment and the danger that any beetles could remain in association with the potatoes through all this process is infinitesimal.

Our officers who have made special observations of this insect have never reported the finding of the beetles in bags, barrels, or other containers in which potatoes are shipped.

During the summer months when the beetles are active, there is a possibility of their being transported with any cargo, but it seems almost inconceivable that the beetles could be introduced with shipments of potatoes which are invariably dug after the beetles have entered the ground for hibernation.

We have no records, nor know of no cases in other countries of the insect having been distributed through shipments of potatoes.

As the department has an established potato inspection service, Canada would suggest that the Imperial government accept shipments of potatoes from this country subject to their being accompanied by certificates as to freedom from Colorado potato beetle due to having undergone such grading and inspection as would permit of such guarantee.

No reply to this has yet been received.

8. Yes.

9. Yes, the Colorado beetle is found in the Bordeaux district in France, but importations from this district are forbidden, while importations from other parts of France must be accompanied by a certificate to the effect that the Colorado beetle is non-existent in the export district.

10. The information supplied by the British Ministry is to the contrary.

11. Replies received from railway companies and the principal shippers would indicate that practically few cars were en route when the embargo went into effect, and all these were immediately diverted to other markets on news of the embargo being received.

12. Answered by No. 11.

13. No. For the same reason that Canadian importations are prohibited, namely, the presence of the Colorado beetle in the United States.

GRAIN ELEVATORS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Who prepared plans for the extension to No. 1 elevator, Vancouver, and what was the engineer's estimate of cost?
2. Were tenders called for the erection of said extension, and if so, in what manner?
3. How many firms tendered, and what are the names of such firms or individuals?
4. What was the amount of the lowest tender?
5. At what figure was the contract awarded, and to whom?
6. What is the total cost to date, based on engineer's approved certificates?
7. How much has actually been paid to said contractor?
8. Has contract been completed? If not, what still remains unfinished?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to make a reference to this question and also to Nos. 6, 7, 8, and 12. In order to answer these five questions, I may say that in the case of the first two the Harbour Commission of Vancouver has to be communicated with; in the case of the second two, the Harbour Commission of Montreal, and in the case of No. 12, the Harbour Commission at Vancouver. If it is the desire of the hon. members who propose these questions to clear the order paper, these could be put down as orders for returns and the answers would be brought down as soon as replies were received. But if hon. members are unwilling to have that done, the questions will have to stand for a little while.

Mr. STEVENS: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that if these questions are passed as orders for returns —and this applies to other cases than that immediately under the attention of the House —the returns may not be brought down until after the session is concluded. I am not injecting any complaint on that point, but I would suggest that while it may be necessary to communicate with these various harbour commissions, the notice of the questions was given on or about 21st February, and had the communications been immediately sent out, seventeen days should have been ample for the receipt of replies from even the most extreme points.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have a memorandum in my hand from the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in which he states:

Immediately the questions appeared on the order paper they were forwarded to Vancouver.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

And he intimates that the reply has not yet been received.

Mr. STEVENS: I thank the Prime Minister for that. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that they stand as questions, and I trust that the government will press these various bodies to hasten their replies.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Questions Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8 and 12 stand.

SALES TAX REBATES

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

By a return dated February 21, 1925, to an order of the House dated July 3, 1924, it is shown that as of date October 16, 1924, out of a total number of 4,486 claims for rebates of sales taxes, 1,907 claims had been checked and paid, leaving 2,563 claims outstanding. How many of these outstanding claims have been checked since the date given in the said return, and how much money has been paid thereon?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The information is not yet complete. It is being prepared.

Question stands.

GLASS PRODUCTS

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. What was the total value of glass products imported into Canada during the year 1924?
2. What was the total value of said product exported from Canada during the year 1924?
3. From what countries are these goods imported?
4. To what country does Canada export these products?
5. Owing to the specially alarming conditions brought on by the use of machinery to the detriment of the workman in the glass-work factories, has the government the intention of altering the tariff during this session in regard to glass products imported into Canada?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY (for the Secretary of State):

1 and 3. Total value of glass products imported into Canada during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1924, with countries whence received.

Countries whence received	Value

5. Announcement as to tariff changes is made only on the floor of the House by the Minister of Finance.

CANNING MACHINERY

Mr. GRIMMER:

1. During May or June, 1924, was a shipment of canning machinery, for use as equipment in a fruit or berry canning factory in British Columbia, admitted into Canada without duty being paid?

2. If so, is it the intention of the government to authorize by order in council such duty exemption or the refund of such duty if same has been paid?

3. During June, 1924, was duty collected from other importers on canning machinery similar to that mentioned in question 1?

4. If so, is it the intention of the government to make a refund of the duty paid by importers mentioned in question 3?

5. Has there been discrimination in the manner in which different importers were treated in connection with importation of canning machinery?

6. If so, what justification, if any, has the government for such discrimination?

Hon. Mr. LOW (for the Minister of Customs): This inquiry should be made an order for return as it is necessary for the department to communicate with the ports to ascertain if canning machinery of the class mentioned was imported in June, 1924, and duty collected thereon from other importers, as such machinery is not separately enumerated in the Customs statistical classification but is included in the general item of machinery.

GLACE BAY POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. CHAPLIN:

1. When did the postmastership of the town of Glace Bay become vacant?

2. Who has been filling this position and is it being filled temporarily or has a permanent appointment been made?

3. What applications were received by the Civil Service Commission?

4. Which applicants were returned soldiers?

5. Why has a permanent appointment not been made?

6. Is it the intention to disregard the applications from returned soldiers possessing the necessary qualifications?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY (for the Secretary of State):

1. 4th June, 1924.

2. Temporarily by J. D. Cameron who was formerly assistant postmaster for twelve years.

3. Joseph Robert Burchell, Charles Felix Gallant, Joseph James Gillis, Alexander McDougall, William Ogilvie McKinlay, John Duncan Cameron, Hugh Lynk, Peter A. McDonald, Peter McIntyre, Marceline Poirier, Charles Severn, Mrs. Ada Walker.

4. Joseph Robert Burchell, Charles Felix Gallant, Joseph James Gillis, Alexander McDougall, William Ogilvie McKinlay.

5. Because of financial losses sustained by the department in the Glace Bay post office and the valuable services rendered by acting postmaster Cameron in readjusting the local administration of the post office, the department and the commission have deemed it advisable to make careful inquiries regarding the character and suitability of the various applicants for the reason that Glace Bay post office is a revenue office where the postmaster engages and pays his own staff. If the latter are not skilled in post office knowledge and experience they will be of little assistance to a postmaster not familiar with post office regulations. As soon as the inquiries in question have been completed the case will be referred for action by the Civil Service Commission.

6. No.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTIES—MONTREAL

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis):

What properties, vacant or otherwise, are owned by the federal government in the city of Montreal, and where are they located?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY (for the Secretary of State):

Department of Marine and Fisheries—

All the properties under the administration of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal are owned by His Majesty in the right of the Dominion government, and are located on the harbour front from a point just below the Victoria bridge to Bout de l'isle,—not including the Lachine canal basin.

Lachine Postal Station, 384 St. Joseph st.

Department of Railways and Canals—

The land owned by the Department of Railways and Canals in the city of Montreal consists of the right of way of the Lachine Canal. This is located between the city limits and Montreal harbour. From the city limits to the Canadian Pacific Railway swing bridge, the right of way is about 450 feet wide; from the Canadian Pacific Railway swing bridge to the Canadian National Turcot yard, the width is about 600 feet; from Turcot yard to Cote St. Paul the width varies from 450 to 300 feet; from Cote St. Paul to St. Gabriel lock, the width is about 300 feet, and between St. Gabriel lock and the mouth of the canal there is considerable extra land for basins. Practically all of the land that is not required for canal purposes is under lease to industries or shippers dependent on the canal.

RECEIPT AND CHECK TAX—REVENUE

Mr. McTAGGART:

What was the total revenue in the year 1924 from the sale of stamps on receipts and checks?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (for the Minister of Customs and Excise): It is not possible to state the revenue from the sale of excise tax stamps for use on receipts and checks, as such stamps are also used on money orders, notes, bills of exchange, bank drafts and overdrafts, stock certificates and bonds.

The total revenue derived from the sale of excise tax stamps during 1924 was $9,300,714,-73.

FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL TAXATION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has anything been done by the government to meet the Ontario government and co-ordinate federal and provincial taxation to prevent duplication and overlapping, on income, amusement and other forms of taxation, since last session?
2. If so, what action has been taken?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to this question, Mr. Speaker, I would ask for your ruling as to whether it is a proper question for the government to reply to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Let it stand. I would like to consider that matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the right hon. the Prime Minister would indicate wherein that question is wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know what my hon. friend means by "has anything been done by the government to meet the Ontario government?"

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To get together. It was the policy of the government before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand there was a conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been a conference, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose a full report of the results of the conference would be necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well.

RURAL CREDIT SYSTEM

Mr. JELLIFF:

In pursuance of the 13th report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce concurred in July 18, 1924, recommending that legislation for the establishment of a rural credit system be prepared and submitted to parliament at this session, will the government submit such legislation to parliament during this session?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This matter is under consideration.

GOVERNMENT MOTOR CARS

Mr. SIMPSON:

1. How many passenger motor cars have been purchased by the government, for use in the district immediately surrounding the city of Ottawa, and including the city, since January 1, 1922?
2. What is the total amount expended for the purchase of passenger motor cars since January 1, 1922?
3. How many chauffeurs are in the employ of the government, at the present time, in the city of Ottawa and immediate district?
4. What is the total amount of salary paid to the said chauffeurs during the present fiscal year to date?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The information requested by this is similar to the information asked for in a notice of motion for production of papers by the same hon. member. There would be no objection to giving the information asked for in the form of a return, and I think that would answer the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That question cannot be dropped without the consent of the hon. member. The question is not out of order because the information is asked for in a return.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There cannot be a return also.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why can't there?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit it is in the province of the government to determine whether a question should be answered in the form of a return or by direct reply. This same information is being asked for by the hon. member in motion No. 9 on page 17. We are quite prepared to bring down the return.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Answered.

Mr. SIMPSON: This question refers to passenger motor cars, whereas the motion for a return refers to all motor cars.

Mr. GRAHAM: The return would include both.

Mr. SIMPSON: If the information is given separately in the return, there would be no trouble.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That would be done.

BLACKFOOT INDIAN RESERVE—WHEAT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What was the total quantity of wheat raised by the Indians on the Blackfoot Indian Reserve in Alberta during 1923 and 1924?
2. How much of this wheat has been marketed?
3. What was the average price received in each year?
4. Was this wheat delivered to the Alberta Co-operative Wheat Producers? If not, to whom was it sold?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. 1923, 136,114 bushels; 1924, 60,756 bushels.
2. Of this quantity all grain was marketed except that held for seed by Indians.
3. Average price received: 1923, 76 cents per bushel; 1924, $1.32 per bushel.
4. No grain was delivered to the Alberta Co-operative Wheat Producers; Grain sold to Alberta Pacific Grain Company, Parrish and Heimbecker National Elevator Co., N. Bawlf Grain Company.

MERCHANDISE IMPORTATIONS

Mr. RINFRET:

1. What was total amount of merchandise imported into Canada from England during years 1923 and 1924 respectively?
2. How much of said merchandise entered Canada through Canadian ports and how much through American ports during the years 1923 and 1924 respectively?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

1 and 2. Statistics of trade with "England" are not separately compiled. The term "United Kingdom" includes the whole of "the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1923 and 1924. Statistics of imports therefrom are as follows:

	Fiscal Years ended March 31
	1923	1924
Total Imports (merchandise) into Canada from United Kingdom	$141,330,143	$153,586,690
Imports through United States.. ..	2,914,881	932,224
Imports direct to Canadian ports..	138,415,262	152,654,466

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. RINFRET:

1. What was the amount of the public debt of Canada on March 31, 1914?
2. What was the said debt on the following dates: March 31, 1918; March 31, 1921; March 31, 1922; March 31, 1924?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (for the Minister of Finance):

1. March 31, 1914, $335,996,850.14.
2. March 31, 1918, $1,191,884,062.50; 1921, $2,340,878,983.69; 1922, $2,422,135,801.73; 1924, $2,417,783,274.88.

ONTARIO AMUSEMENT TAX

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government, or the Acting Minister of Finance, look into the validity of a certain war tax imposed during the war by the Ontario government and called an amusement tax. and since continued?

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

2. Does said tax not invade the federal field under "Militia and Defence," and is not said tax a restraint of trade and commerce, and contra to the terms and conditions on which the province receives a federal subsidy to aid maintaining provincial institutions?
3. Are not such forms of direct taxation an invasion of the federal field?
4. What is the policy of the government, if any, as a matter of policy to safeguard federal authority in such matter?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1, 2, 3 and 4. Such matters are considered by the government in due course as they arise.

ONTARIO GASOLINE TAX

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government, or the Acting Minister of Finance look into the question of the validity of legislation of the province of Ontario to tax gasoline three cents per gallon, and as to whether said tax does not invade the federal field, and also whether said tax is ultra vires of the province on the following and on other grounds: (a) That it is a restraint of trade and commerce; (b) The said tax affects the body politic, and could only be imposed by federal authority as defined in the judgment of the Privy Council in what is known as the "Through Traffic Case"; (c) It is a direct tax and not an indirect tax within the province, and is a tax outside the scope of the subjects set out in section 92 of the B.N.A. Act (1867); (d) It affects "works and undertakings" declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, and proposes to restrain the conduct of these works and undertakings; (e) The said tax is ultra vires of the province under the acts, contracts and agreements by which the federal government granted the province of Ontario federal aid to highways, and on other grounds?
2. What action, if any, is taken by federal authority to prevent encroachment as aforesaid of the federal field by the provinces in taxation matters?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1 and 2. The matter will receive consideration in due course.

MOTT'S WHARF, N.B.

Mr. JONES:

1. What was the total cost of the Mott's wharf, parish of Cambridge, Queens county, New Brunswick?
2. Were tenders called for the erection of said wharf?
3. Who were the tenderers and what was the amount of each tender?
4. To whom was the contract awarded?
5. If work was done by day labour, who was superintendent, and how much time did he work, and what rate of pay did he receive?
6. How many labourers were engaged on the work, what are their names and what amount did each receive?
7. What material was used, who supplied same, and what was the cost?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay): The wharf referred to was built by the government of the province of New Brunswick, and this department has no record as to its cost and how constructed. This was one of the wharves transferred to the Dominion government by the provincial government.

REV. FATHER MacDONNELL

Mr. BOWEN:

1. Is the Rev. Father MacDonnell, of the Scottish Immigration Aid Society, an official representative or agent of the federal Immigration department?
2. If so, when was he appointed as such?
3. What salary does he draw?
4. How much, if any, has the federal government advanced to him, or to the Scottish Immigration Aid Society, for immigration work, from January 1, 1922, to January 31, 1925?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (for the Minister of Immigration):

1. Yes, in connection with immigration to Canada from Scotland.

2. First engaged in May 1921 but not continuously in the service of the department since that time.

3. $150 per month plus actual living and travelling expenses.

4. To Rev. Andrew MacDonnell—

1922-23	$1,943 53	(travelling expenses)
1923-24	1,472 96	(salary and expenses)
*1924-25	3,740 50	(salary and expenses)
Total	$7,156 99

To Scottish Immigration Aid Society—

1922-23	$1,000 00
1923-24	4,000 00
1924-25 (To Jan. 31).	8,300 00
Total	$13,300 00

GOVERNMENT ELEVATOR SCREENINGS

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton):

Under what terms and conditions are screenings disposed of at the Dominion government elevators at Calgary and Edmonton?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

The majority of the screenings from grain received at the Canadian government elevators at Calgary and Edmonton are not the property of the elevator as they are removed from wheat carrying a dockage amounting to 3 per cent or over, and coarse grains 5 per cent or over, and, therefore, belong to the owners of the grain. Warehouse receipts are issued for these screenings and the screenings are shipped upon instructions of the owners and the surrender of the warehouse receipts. The elevators have absolutely no control over the disposition of these screenings.

In the case of screenings which accrue to the elevator in lieu of cleaning charges, that is, screenings from wheat carrying less than 3 per cent dockage and coarse grains carrying less than 5 per cent dockage, they are practically all disposed of to stock feeders in the two cities named at current market prices.

No contracts or agreements are entered into for the sale of these screenings. They are sold whenever available to any parties desirous of purchasing, preference being given to farmers and stock feeders.

POTATO IMPORTATIONS

Mr. DOUCET:

1. Through which ports of entry were potatoes admitted into Canada during the year 1924?
2. What quantities were admitted at each port?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL (for the Minister of Customs and Excise):

1 and 2. Quantities of potatoes imported and entered for consumption at each port in Canada during the fiscal year ended March 31st, 1924.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FISH SHIPMENTS

Mr. HANSON:

Is it the intention of the government to restore the so-called Modus Vivendi whereby United States fishermen were permitted to land their catches at Canadian ports and ship them into the United States free of duty, and were also permitted to outfit and bait at Canadian ports?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN: The intention of the government in this regard will be made known in due time. Meantime the present arrangement will be adhered to.

DOMINION IMMIGRATION CONFERENCE

Mr. CARROLL:

What are the names of the delegates from the Maritime provinces who attended the Immigration Conference held in Ottawa during November, 1923, and what amount was paid to each by the Department of Immigration and Colonization, as expenses?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (for the Minister of Immigration):

Nova Scotia—Hon. D. A. Cameron & W. B. McCoy, $265.00.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

New Brunswick—Hon. David Mersereau, $72.45; Hon. J. E. Michaud, $75.00.

Prince Edward Island—Hon. John Myers, $86.05.

TAX FREE BONDS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What is the total value of tax-free bonds maturing on or before December 1, 1925?
2. What is the total value of all bonds for which the government is responsible, maturing on or before December 1, 1925?
3. How does the government propose to meet this indebtedness?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (for the Minister of Finance):

1. $42,014,500.

2. Including short-term obligations, $164,347,833.

3. This is a matter of financing concerning which the Acting Minister of Finance is not in a position at this date to make any statement.

OIL DRILLING MACHINERY IMPORTATION

Mr. WILSON:

1. What amount of oil well drilling machinery was imported into Canada during the years 1922, 1923 and 1924?
2. From what countries were the importations made?
3. What duties, if any, were collected?

Hon. Mr. LOW (for the Minister of Customs and Excise):

1. & 2. Imports entered for consumption in Canada during the fiscal years ended March, 1922, 1923 and 1924 of "Well drilling machinery and parts and apparatus of a class or kind not made in Canada, drawn or seamless iron or steel, tubing over four inches in diameter for drilling for water, natural gas or oil, and for prospecting for minerals, not to include motive power."

United Kingdom	$ —	$ —	$ 1,146
Newfoundland	180	—	—
United States	47,503	45,052	62,662
Total	47,683	45,052	63,808

Other well drilling machinery is not separately enumerated in the Customs Classification of Imports but is included in the general classification of machinery. No information respecting duty paid on oil well drilling machinery is included in this classification.

3. The imports shown above were free of duty.

IMMIGRATION EXPENDITURE

Mr. KELLNER:

What amount of money did the government spend in 1924 in assisting immigration, (a) in regard to assisted railway or ocean fares; (b) for assistance in land settlement; (c) for assistance in keep of immigrants?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (for the Minister of Immigration):

(a) $290,392.58 advanced under Empire Settlement Act and to be repaid to the department by those who received assisted passage.

(b) No expenditures.

(c) The following grants for 1924 were made to organizations receiving and maintaining immigrants, pending their placement in situations,—

Calgary Hostel	$ 600 00
Halifax Hostel	350 00
Regina Hostel	750 00
St. John Hostel	500 00
Toronto Hostel	500 00
Vancouver Hostel	250 00
Winnipeg Hostel	750 00
Montreal Hostel	3,500 00
Scottish Immigration Aid Society	8,300 00
Total	$15,500 00

The grant to the Scottish Immigration Aid Society is made in connnection with its farm at Red Deer, Alta., where new arrivals from Scotland are received and maintained until employment is secured for them, or until they become established on farms for themselves. The sum paid to the society in 1924 included $1,500.00, balance of appropriation for the fiscal year 1923-24.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT LANDS—REVALUATION

Hon. Mr. MANION:

Is it the intention of the government at this session of parliament to make a revaluation upon the lands given out in past years to soldier settlers by the Soldier Settlement Board?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (for the Minister of Immigration): The matter is now receiving consideration.

LAND SETTLEMENT—IMMIGRANTS

Mr. IRVINE:

1. How many immigrants were brought to Canada in the year 1924 as a result of the services of the Land Settlement Board?

2. Of such immigrants, how many were actually employed on farms?

3. How many of these immigrants have remained on farms for a period of (a) 6 months; (b) 3 months?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL (for the Minister of Immigration):

1. The Land Settlement branch has not been engaged in the actual work of bringing immigrants to Canada but. under a reorganization of the Department of Immigration and Colonization, the duties of the Land Settlement branch have been extended to include the work of assisting in the settlement of incoming immigrants.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SPILLERS ELEVATOR

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, documents and correspondence, between January 1, 1922 and February 25, 1924, between R. H. Gale and any minister or official of the Dominion government; and, between R. H. Gale and the Vancouver Harbour Commission, and between Vancouver Harbour Commissioners and any minister or official of the Dominion government; and, between any representative of the Spillers interests and the Harbour Commissioners, and, or any minister of the Crown and official of the government, regarding the negotiations for lease or sale of certain waterfront property in the Vancouver harbour, upon which is now erected what is known as the Spillers elevator, and which property lies immediately east of the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners elevator No. 1. Also, copy of any letters, agreements, schedules of fees, assignments, transfers, and other documents appertaining thereto.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SUDBURY RENTALS

Mr. LAPIERRE:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents and communications exchanged between the officials of the Canadian National Railways and the owners of the Sudbury Star building, Sudbury, Ontario, relating to the rental of offices in Sudbury.

MRS. PIERRE F. BOUDREAU

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents received by the Post Office department, relating to the dismissal of Mrs. Pierre F. Boudreau, as Postmistress of Inkerman, Gloucester county, New Brunswick, and the appointment of the present postmaster.

[Mr. Manion.]

GRAND ETANG PIER

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

For a copy of all correspondence, vouchers, paylists, and other documents, in connection with repairs effected to the piers at Grand Etang, Inverness county, Nova Scotia, during the fiscal years 1922-23 and 1923-24.

ADAMSVILLE-BEERSVILLE SERVICE

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents received by the Post Office department since January 1, 1924, with reference to giving a direct mail service between Adamsville and Beersville, in the county of Kent, New Brunswick.

DESPRES VILLAGE—POST OFFICE

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents received by the Post Office department during the year 1924, relating to the reopening of a post office at Després Road or Després Village, Kent county, New Brunswick.

YUKON GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS—INCOME TAX EXEMPTION

Mr. BLACK (Yukon) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, statements and communications concerning exemption or partial exemption from payment of income tax on payments or remuneration, whether paid as salary, living allowance or otherwise, by the government of Canada to officials of Yukon Territory, and showing what exemptions (if any) from income tax have been allowed to Yukon officials on amounts paid them by the government of Canada during the past seven years.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I think there is no objection to bringing down any of the papers called for other than such as may properly be regarded as confidential.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—EMPLOYEES' SALARIES

Mr. CHAPLIN (for Mr. Hanson) moved:

For a return showing by districts or regions the number of employees in each of the following classes and the average annual compensation for each employee of such class of the Canadian National Railways:—receiving under $1,000 per year; receiving $1,000 per year or over but under $2,000; receiving $2,000 per year or over but under $3,000; receiving $3,000 per year or over but under $4,000; receiving $4,000 per year or over but under $5,000; and so on until all classes are complete.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member I think is not in his seat. When this was up the other day I suggested that it should be put under the notices of motion without the star, that is, under Notices of Motion. The hon. member suggested that he would talk to me about it before anything was done. It is possible this may be dropped, but I would hate to take any action in his absence.

Motion stands.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASE OF MOTOR CARS

Mr. T. E. SIMPSON (West Algoma) moved:

For a return showing the number of motor cars purchased by the government, since January 1, 1922, the make of said cars, the total price paid for each, the date of purchase, to what duty assigned or by whom used, the total amount of gasoline purchased. Also showing the number of buildings in which the said motor cars are housed, showing when owned by the government, date purchased and at what price, and when rented, what rental and when leased. Also showing the number of employees engaged in the care and upkeep of said motor cars, and the total amount spent on repairs to these cars, since January 1, 1922.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have already intimated that we will be prepared to give the information asked for. I should like, however, to amend this resolution so as to furnish the House with a little more information than is sought. The motion asks for information with respect to cars purchased since January 1, 1922. I would suggest that the motion be changed so as to apply to purchases made since January 1, 1912.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister will indicate in each case the car purchased for ministers and not in relation to officials with respect to war service.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT AND CONSTITUTION—RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY MR. SHAW

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Senate as at present appointed and constituted is not of the greatest advantage to Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I make no apology in proposing this resolution. I realize fully that many experienced parliamentarians will look askance at, perhaps resent, the humble effort of one so unexperienced as myself in proposing this problem for the consideration of the House. But I think my defence, and an ample one, is to be found in the fact that public opinion has pressed this long standing question to the very gates of parliament itself; and if, perchance, as a result of the discussion of this resolution the subject of Senate reform is pushed just a little bit closer toward a satisfactory solution, then I shall indeed have had ample compensation. I am not unmindful either that a similar resolution, perhaps similarly worded, might, with some justification, be introduced by an energetic member of the other chamber and having special application to this House, because in what I have to say with regard to whatever shortcomings there are, in my humble judgment, in connection with the operation and constitution of the Senate, I do not forget that this chamber likewise has some shortcomings.

In preparing a resolution of this character two courses presented themselves to my mind: First, I could have prepared in definite form my own convictions of the proper method to take to effect Senate reformation. I have, however, to some extent profited by the experience of the past in that regard, because similar definite resolutions, presented not only in this House but in the other chamber, have been fruitless of results. The second method is the one which I have adopted—the method of proposing a resolution which allowing the greatest latitude for discussion, and the fullest opportunity for the presentation of any plans of reformation, yet does give this House the opportunity, if it so desires, to express what it has never done before—its opinion as to whether or not it is satisfied with the constitution of the Senate as it at present exists. May I say that a further consideration moved me to some extent, and that was by reason of what I had anticipated would be the course taken by the government, in the statements at least of the Prime Minister, of an intention to introduce some measure of Senate reform. I anticipated that government action would be initiated by calling a provincial conference—that would be the initial step in the programme,—and it occurred to me that perhaps the provincial conference foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne would inquire as to what the attitude of this House was—whether or not we are satisfied—and, further, it occurred to me that the best thing to do would be to take this first step—to ascertain whether or not the House of Commons is satisfied with the Senate as at present constituted. May I say also at the outset, that to my mind no question requires a clearer insight into our constitution, no question calls for a clearer analysis of our institutions, and certainly none should command in larger measure moderation in statement and in presentation.

When one thinks of the genesis of our parliamentary institutions in Canada we immediately thrust our minds back to the British North America Act, because that is, at least, the statutory enactment which provides for this parliament. The British North America Act of 1867 provided for a parliament composed of two bodies; the Commons, the lower chamber, elected by popular vote; the Senate, the upper house, nominated for life by the Governor General in Council. So far as the British North America Act is concerned there is only one provision which in any way limits the power of the Senate, and that is a provision which declares that money bills shall originate in the House of Commons. Therefore, I think one is legally correct in stating that the powers of the Senate and the powers of the House of Commons are not only co-equal but co-extensive, with the single exception that I have mentioned.

Now, in framing the constitution which we have to-day what motives animated the Fathers of Confederation, what models had they before them, if any, to copy? There were two possible schemes for confederation: One was a legislative union, the other was a federal union. I think some of the Fathers of Confederation would have preferred a legislative union, but they were animated by the example and guided by the model which was furnished to them by our great neighbours to the south. Many of them, including Sir John A. Macdonald, frankly confessed their admiration of that constitution. They had not only the constitution itself before them, but they had the benefit of the long experience the people of the United States had had with that constitution. They observed how that constitution had served at a time when the population of the United States was less than two million people, when its inhabited area amounted to something like one hundred thousand square miles. They had observed how that constitution had fitted the desires and ambitions of that great country, even at the time when its population had increased to something over thirty-five million and its inhabited area extended to almost three million square miles. In addition to that they had observed the great political, economic and social changes which had taken place during that experiment in legislation, and they had undoubtedly admired the pliability of the constitution to meet these changing and changed conditions. Moreover, they had before them the experience of that constitution, under period of the greatest stress, the period of the American Civil War, and they had observed too that even states which desired to secede from the union had adopted for their confederacy a scheme almost identical with that embodied in the federal constitution. So it was not unnatural, with conditions not altogether dissimilar, that the Fathers of Confederation should have looked with admiring eyes and adopted as far as practicable the principles embodied in the American constitution.

But you will at once say "Why did they not adopt the elective principle as applicable to the second chamber, that principle being adopted in the American constitution?" I need not remind the House that at the time of confederation some of the confederating provinces had elective legislative councils. The Maritime provinces had not. It was I think largely as a matter of compromise that the nominative life principle was adopted. There was much criticism of it. I remember very well reading about objections raised by such statesmen as Sir Oliver Mowat to the adoption of the nominative life principle, and I remember very well too that some of those who gave their assent to that principle subsequently recanted, and I include in this number Hon. George Brown and Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, subsequently Prime Minister of this country. Both those distinguished gentlemen subsequently recanted their allegiance to the nominative life principle and therefore I say that the adoption of the nominative life principle for our Senate came largely as the result of compromise. I do not think that it was considered such a serious matter, and many who were engaged in that important enterprise of drafting a constitution for this country were forced to give way on this principle in order to secure harmony on other more important principles.

4 p.m.

That being so, the United States model being the one we adopted, paying however due allegiance to the monarchical system of government, what, I ask you, might reasonably be expected of a Senate, and what duties might it reasonably be called upon to perform? What was expected of the United States Senate? In that connection, let me quote the words of the chief architect of the United States constitution, Alexander Hamilton, showing what he anticipated would be the purpose of the Senate and what duties it should be called upon to perform. He said:

> First. It is a misfortune incident to republican government, though in a less degree than to other governments, that those who administer it, may forget their obligations to their constituents, and prove unfaithful to their important trust. In this point of view, a senate, as a second branch of the legislative assembly, distinct from, and dividing the power with, a first, must be in all cases a salutary check on the government. It doubles the security to the people, by requiring the concurrence of two distinct bodies in schemes of usurpation or perfidy, where the ambition or corruption of one would otherwise be sufficient. This is a precaution founded on such clear principles, and now so well understood in the United States, that it would be more than superfluous to enlarge on it. I will barely remark, that, as the improbability of sinister combinations will be in proportion to the dissimilarity in the genius of the two bodies, it must be politic to distinguish them from each other by every circumstance which will consist with a due harmony in all proper measures, and with the genuine principles of republican government.

Second. The necessity of a senate is not less indicated by the propensity of all single and numerous assemblies, to yield to the impulse of sudden and violent passions, and to be seduced by factious leaders into intemperate and pernicious resolutions. Examples on this subject might be cited without number; and from proceedings within the United States, as well as from the history of other nations. But a position that will not be contradicted, need not be proved. All that need be remarked, is, that a body which is to correct this infirmity, ought itself to be free from it, and consequently ought to be less numerous. It ought moreover to possess great firmness, and consequently ought to hold its authority by a tenure of considerable duration.

Third. Another defect to be supplied by a senate, lies in a want of due acquaintance with the objects and principles of legislation. It is not possible that an assembly of men, called for the most part, from pursuits of a private nature, continued in appointment for a short time, and led by no permanent motive to devote the intervals of public occupation to a study of the laws, the affairs, and the comprehensive interests of their country, should, if left wholly to themselves, escape a variety of important errors in the exercise of their legislative trust.

In amplifying this third point he mentions one or two things which have frequently been quoted, and which I desire to quote now. He said:

A good government implies two things; first, fidelity to the object of government, which is the happiness of the people; secondly, a knowledge of the means by which that object can be best attained. Some governments are deficient in both these qualities: Most governments are deficient in the first. I scruple not to assert, that, in the American governments, too little attention has been paid to the last. The federal constitution avoids this error; and what merits particular notice, it provides for the last in a mode which increases the security for the first.

The fourth purpose which Alexander Hamilton says the Senate serves is as follows:

Fourth. The mutability in the public councils, arising from a rapid succession of new members, however qualified they may be, points out in the strongest manner, the necessity of some stable institution in the government. Every new election in the states, is found to change one half of the representatives. From this change of men must proceed a change of opinions; and from a change of opinions, a change of measures. But a continual change even of good measures is inconsistent with every rule of prudence, and every prospect of success.

The fifth purpose he gave as follows:

A fifth desideratum, illustrating the utility of a senate, is the want of a due sense of national character. Without a select and stable member of the government, the esteem of foreign powers will not only be forfeited by an unenlightened and variable policy, proceeding from the causes already mentioned; but the national councils will not possess that sensibility to the opinion of the world, which is perhaps not less necessary in order to merit, than it is to obtain, its respect and confidence.

And finally as a sixth reason for the Senate, he points out the want in some important cases of a due responsibility in the government to the people, arising from that frequency of elections, which in other cases produces this responsibility. He proceeds:

The remark will, perhaps, appear not only new, but paradoxical. It must nevertheless be acknowledged, when explained, to be as undeniable as it is important.

Responsibility, in order to be reasonable, must be limited to objects within the power of the responsible party; and in order to be effectual, must relate to operations of that power, of which a ready and proper judgment can be formed by the constituents. The objects of government may be divided into two general classes; the one depending on measures, which have singly an immediate and sensible operation, the other depending on a succession of well chosen and well connected measures, which have a gradual and perhaps unobserved operation.

It is unnecessary to point out the significance of the sixth purpose enunciated by the distinguished author. Shortly, as I understand the chief purpose of the Senate, it is to put a check upon democratic intensity, if I may use that term. It purposes to set against the caution and experience of age the inexperience and the zeal of youth. I have considerable sympathy with these purposes, but I think sometimes that we may forget that since these principles have been written a hundred years of history have also been written, and I am not so sure now that, instead of trying to curtail democratic intensity, we might more properly be engaged in this case in trying to curtail reaction. In our day the reactionary has full and complete opportunity for his activities, whereas the man who seeks even the slightest measure of reform finds himself opposed by all kinds of checks and balances. After all, however, these checks and balances, I take it, cannot stem the tide. It may be well, that the tide of democracy should be somewhat delayed, but it must move on. There is another and important consideration pointed out by Hamilton in another place in his work, which is essential in a federal system of government and which gives special significance to a second chamber, namely, the necessity of preserving unimpaired and intact the sovereignty remaining in the states or local divisions and the necessity of preserving the established rights of sections and minorities. These things are fundamental in a federal system, and their preservation is the especial obligation of a Senate, these its special task.

Having these various principles in mind, I want to deal now shortly with the Canadian Senate, and I think that probably I shall be on ground which is not objectionable, at any rate to any great extent. What defects are there in the Senate as it is at present constituted and as it operates at the present time? In how far does it diverge from the original principles which brought it into being? These are questions which I shall now address to the House. First of all, I desire to indicate what I regard as the defects of constitution, if I may use that term. In my judgment there are at least three. The appointment of the Senate by the central authority, the Governor General in Council, is absolutely inconsistent with the federal system of government. The members of that body are appointed by the Governor General in Council supposedly for the purpose of conserving provincial rights and sectional interests. But they are not responsible to the people of those sections or provinces; they are not responsible to the provincial legislatures. Neither the people nor the legislature in any province have any right whatsoever in the appointment of the particular individuals who are supposed, theoretically at least, to conserve their special interests. I say therefore that the appointment by the Governor General in Council of the individuals who constitute the Senate is thoroughly inconsistent with the federal system of government. There is nothing new in that observation, for I would call the attention of the House to the fact that as long ago as 1874 the Hon. David Mills, afterwards Minister of Justice under Sir Wilfrid Laurier's regime, brought in a resolution based on that very inconsistency and asked the House to go into committee of the Whole to consider his remedial proposals. The House, by a vote of 77 to 74, concurred in his view and went into committee of the Whole; but so far as the records show, no further action was taken. That is the first point with regard to the Senate.

Let me ask at this juncture whether in all its history, in all the story of its life from confederation up to the present day, anyone can indicate any case in which the Senate has stood for the protection of provincial rights, for the protection of sectional interests, for the protection of minority rights? I know of no such case myself, although I admit that I am liable to err. I have examined with care a book written by one of the chief proponents of the Senate as it is at present constituted, and from cover to cover of that book I have been unable to find a single instance in which the Senate has in any special way shown a desire to carry out the fundamental purpose for which it was created. And surely there have been ample opportunities for the exercise of that prerogative. Surely no one as he sees this Dominion to-day would admit for a moment that there has not been ample opportunity to have prevented, or at least allayed, this sectional discord which is characteristic of almost all parts of the country. Surely there have been ample opportunities to conserve provincial rights. I recall that Sir Oliver Mowat had a very prolonged struggle with the government of Sir John A. Macdonald in his effort to conserve the rights of the province of Ontario.

The next objection I have to the constitution of the Senate is that the appointment for life is undemocratic. I need only mention that point to convince hon. gentlemen of its truth. But the difficulty is—I will put it no stronger—that appointment for life is apt to make the occupants of that chamber lose all initiative; it is apt in some cases, I trust in very few, to create an indifference on the part of the senators to their duties. After all, I wonder what it is that inspires the hon. members of this House to action, and keeps them alert and vigorous in the particular task for which they were chosen? What is it? It is simply the desire, the quite proper desire, to merit the continued esteem of those who are responsible for their presence here.

My next objection to the Senate is that it is altogether too large from the standpoint of numbers. The United States Senate, which was to some extent the model for our federal institution, has a membership approximately the same as that of the Senate of Canada. And the Senate of that great country is called upon to protect the sectional interests of something like 110,000,000 people. Surely no one would deny that it effectively performs its task. So I say that the Senate of Canada to-day is altogether too large. I believe too that the Senate should be proportioned equally as between the various provinces. Let me illustrate. Under our constitution, the province from which I come is entitled to 6 senators while the province of Ontario is entitled to 24. It may be that in a very few years, although perhaps not in my lifetime, the province of Alberta may surpass in population the province of Ontario, for it has made far greater proportionate progress in the last twenty years. Would it then be right and proper and fair that the present disproportion should continue in the respective representations in the Senate, although the population might have changed very considerably? It does occur to me that, designed as this body is for the protection of provincial rights, and the conservation of special and sectional interests, the representation might fairly be proportioned equally so far as the various provinces are concerned. These are substantially what I find to be the main defects, if I may use that term, in the Senate constitution.

I want now to deal with what I think are some of the defects in its operation. Mind you, I am not complaining about any particular members of that body; in whatever I say I am not blaming them but the system which has made the present situation possible. First of all, let me say that the Senate as it is constituted is partisan and not independent. I do not have to rely on my own judgment in that matter, but I am sure that it must appeal to everyone that such is the case. Is it not natural that the recipient of a place in that chamber should feel himself owing some allegiance to those who are responsible for his appointment? Even one of the hon. members of that body some years ago in agreeing with that view stated that if Sir John A. Macdonald—who had appointed him to that high position—should ask him as a favour to vote in a certain way on a particular measure, he would feel under some obligation to do so, because he said, "I am in the position of a delegate in the presence of the delegator."

It will no doubt be interesting to hon. members if at this stage I read the judgment of a distinguished observer of parliamentary institutions in all parts of the world; I refer to the late Viscount Bryce. He says in Modern Democracies:

> The plan of nomination by the executive is even less to be commended, because members seem to be usually selected for party reasons;

I doubt if any one here would seriously controvert that statement.

> Sometimes, as in Canada, not merely for the sake of securing for the ministry a majority in the second chamber but also in order to reward its elderly supporters, who, weary of courting constituencies, gladly subside into a dignified armchair. There are countries in which secretly rendered political services or liberal contributions to party funds are believed to open the door of the chamber to those whose merits the public had failed to discover.

That is the opinion of a distinguished observer. But when one comes to look at the political composition of the Senate itself, one finds how this pernicious patronage system has exacted its full toll of the independence of that body. I hold in my hand a statement showing the political membership by provinces of the Senate in 1896, the year in which the Liberals came into power. There were then 13 Liberals and 68 Conservatives, with one seat vacant. The House of Commons at the same time was composed of 117 Liberals and 89 Conservatives. Surely no one would suggest for a moment that the Senate represented the political views of the country at large. The next change of government took place in 1911, when the situation was almost completely reversed, there being then in the Senate 66 Liberals and 20 Conservatives, whereas in the election of that year 133 Conservatives and only 86 Liberals were returned to the House of Commons. In 1917, the year of the advent of Union government, the situation had again been changed, there being 40 Liberals and 46 Conservative senators.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): What was the political standing of the Senate at the time of confederation?

Mr. SHAW: In the course of my investigation I found it very difficult to discover the exact situation at that time, but if there were any party lines I think the parties were substantially on a parity with each other.

Mr. CALDWELL: How were the first senators appointed?

Mr. SHAW: The British North America Act provided that the members of the legislative councils in the various provinces of Canada were to notify within a limited time, I think 30 days, whether or not they were prepared to assume a senatorship in the Senate as created by the Confederation Act. I think most of them accepted the opportunity. I am going to ask, Mr. Speaker, the privilege of having this short statement placed on Hansard in order that it may be available for the information of members.

So I suggest that in operation the Senate is a partisan body; it is not independent. I do not mean totally independent of the public will, but not likely to bring to the consideration of every question a fair and impartial judgment, unfettered by partisan considerations and uninfluenced by party affiliations, with the courage to face unpopularity in its decisions. In this respect the Senate has failed. Moreover when the Senate is of the same political complexion as the party in power, it is largely a useless body, except for revising purposes, and I suggest that such revision can be done in a far more effective and adequate way. When the Senate is of an opposite complexion to the party in power then it becomes in most cases a real hindrance to effective government, resulting sometimes in near legislative paralysis.

My next complaint is that the Senate does not reflect the varied national life of this country. I do not say, mind you, that the House of Commons does either. But it is natural to suppose that most hon. members secure their right to occupy a seat in the Senate by reason of attendance in this House or association with it, and the result is that, generally speaking, they are not representative of the various sections of our national life. Viscount Bryce in his Modern Democracies also points out that a senate to be really effective must represent all the main currents of our industrial, commercial and social life—agriculture, commerce, manufacturing, and so on. I do not think anyone who has given consideration to the subject would contend for a single moment that the political method of appointment conduces to a fair representation in the Senate of our national life.

Another objection which I would urge is that the Senate sits and awaits action by this House. We have an illustration of it at present; the Senate is waiting for what may fall from the table of the House of Commons in order to amend or change it. Now, charged as the Senate is under our federal system with high and important functions, surely there is ample opportunity for that body to engage its time profitably at this juncture when the whole country is being devitalized by sectional differences and when serious industrial strife is threatened. Surely the Senate might by a careful study of our economic, social and industrial life, assist materially in solving the problems that now confront the Dominion.

Lastly, if you put the Senate on its lowest possible basis, that of a revising chamber alone, then I say it does not even discharge that duty adequately, because in the concluding stages of the session it is showered with a host of bills from this House, and it must either throw them out or pass them with scant opportunity to give them careful consideration and intelligent revision. So on that basis alone I submit that the Senate is not an efficient revising body.

Now, I could quote Viscount Bryce, a very keen observer of constitutions, to the effect that the Senate of Canada is one of the weakest second chambers of its character in existence. That is the considered statement of that distinguished gentleman some two or three years ago in his book, Modern Democracies.

Mr. STEVENS: If the hon. member will permit me, could he give us the quotation? I do not ask that to embarrass him at all, but I am deeply interested in learning how the late Lord Bryce makes that statement. I know his work.

Mr. SHAW: The hon. member will find the quotation to which I refer at page 441, volume 2 of Modern Democracies. In dealing with the various kinds of chambers he mentions those in the same category, and he says:

> Amongst these the French Senate is the strongest and that of Canada the weakest.

I want to read the considered statement of a Canadian author, himself a very astute and keen observer of parliamentary government in this country. I refer to Professor Wrong of the University of Toronto. He says:

> It is not a body that occupies an important place in the thought of the Canadian people.

He goes on to amplify that statement; I am not concerned at the moment in reading that part of it. But he says further:

> Always the senators have obeyed the mandate of party; there is no case on record in which a majority in the Senate has opposed, on an important measure, a majority of the same party in the House of Commons. Those who know what is going on at Ottawa admit freely that the Senate does useful work on non-party lines in improving bills; but they will add that it discharges no other useful function.

I see that Professor Wrong and myself disagree on one small particular in connection with that. Summing up his conclusions with regard to the Senate, Professor Wrong says:

> 1. The Senate plays a minor part in the political life of Canada, and commands but little authority.
> 2. The Senate becomes important only at the time of a change of government in Canada, and its influence is then likely to be used to hamper the new government.
>
> 3. The Senate discharges useful functions in improving the details of the bills sent to it from the House of Commons.
> 4. Experience in Canada has shown that the method of appointment for life works better than would appointment for a term of years.

Then he goes on to amplify that view.

The longest term of years to be proposed would probably not exceed seven or eight. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power in Canada for sixteen years. Had the terms of senators expired after even ten years, every Conservative senator would have been replaced by a Liberal during Sir Wilfrid Laurier's tenure of office, and the Senate would have contained only Liberals, a reductio ad absurdum.

5. In Canada the tyranny of party has been complete in regard to the Senate. But for this, more men conspicuous in the world of commerce, of letters, of education, might have found a place in the Senate and might have softened the rule of mediocrity which now prevails in the representative institutions of the New World. The party leaders, however, have willed it otherwise, and they have had their way.

But Mr. Speaker, I do not need to rely upon the judgment even of the distinguished authors I have quoted; I can refer the matter to the Senate itself. Some fifteen or twenty years ago—to be exact, in the year 1909—a distinguished gentleman who played a very large part in the inauguration of this confederation and who lived through all its adversities and many of its changes of parties, himself introduced a resolution in that chamber designed to rectify many of what he thought to be existing evils, and to impart to that body a measure of additional strength. Among other things, he sought to make membership in the Senate partly elective. I refer to a gentleman with almost forty years' experience in that chamber, the late Sir Richard Scott.

Now, if there exist the constitutional defects as well as the defects in the exercise of its functions that I have pointed out, the next question naturally arises, what remedies are available? I must say at the outset that I have no desire in any way to criticize the government for the preliminary action it has taken in connection with this matter. I think that is essential; I think that is necessary under the constitution. But I want to look beyond that; I simply want to suggest that I have in mind the preliminary steps—I do not want the members of the House to get the idea that I would ignore the necessary preliminaries toward effective action.

There are three possible ways to meet this situation: First, abolition; secondly, strengthen the chamber; thirdly, weaken it. With regard to the first, abolition is becoming increasingly popular. It is becoming increasingly popular, I am convinced, because people have not before them any other effective scheme, or any scheme which premises change or reform so far as the Senate is concerned. It arises largely because of the paucity of other schemes, and not because it is the best remedy. The advocates of abolition urge that the Senate is a drag upon democracy; that it is an intrenchment of special and privileged interests, and that any institution which is based upon a distrust of democracy is necessarily weak and should not be continued. Now, these advocates of abolition apply their theory equally to any scheme of government, be it the unitary system or the federal system. In that particular I think they are perhaps mistaken. I see no objection to applying the principle of abolition to a unitary form of government but when it comes to a federal form of government with a second chamber charged with the specific duties and obligations which I have mentioned, then I think it would be a mistake to insist on abolition. If abolition is to be the remedy, what organization, what institution, will preserve provincial rights under our system of government? What institution will preserve sectional rights? What institution will there be to preserve the established rights of minorities? Besides, I am not so sure that where a popular chamber is so engrossed in partisan controversy from time to time it has that judicial calm which is essential to the proper and expeditious disposal of all legislation. In addition to that, the chamber—our chamber for example—has not the opportunity for the social and economic study that is essential to the proper solution of many of our problems. However, the abolitionist says, in the words of that English publicist in the late eighties, "Either mend it or end it".

One other way of going about this matter is to make the Senate stronger, to cure its defects, to add strength to it. Several plans have been suggested; I propose to suggest only one or two, and that very briefly.

One suggestion is to make the Senate elective, to make it responsible to the people whose interests it is supposed to conserve and to preserve—to let the provinces themselves—the ones who are vitally interested, undertake the election of senators. By doing that you add strength to the Senate, because if there is strength in this elective chamber there will likewise be strength in an elective second chamber. The difficulty pointed out by most writers on the subject is the likelihood of deadlock between the two chambers, but with the experience of recent years—Australia, South Africa, Ireland—surely the people of this country should be able to fashion some system that will enable us to untangle readily any deadlocks that may occur.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would the Senate be elected by the provinces for life, or for a limited term?

Mr. SHAW: I think all writers on the subject agree that the senators, whether nominated or elected, should hold office only for a limited period of time. Now, that is one method, and the objection usually taken to it is that we already have too many elections in this country. We have federal elections, provincial elections, and to add another election would complicate our institutions and certainly disturb to a great extent the business affairs of this country. I do not think there is very much to that objection, because it would be very easy to arrange it so that the election for senators would fall at exactly the same time as the election for this House.

There are one or two methods based upon the nominative plan to which I want to refer. The first was proposed by a distinguished member of this House. I think because of that alone it is entitled to our serious consideration. The other reason which I think entitles it to our consideration is that it certainly is a thought provoking scheme. I refer to the plan proposed in this House some two years ago by the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, whose illness and consequent absence from this House I am sure we all deplore. This distinguished gentleman, after forty years of parliamentary experience in this country, proposed that all the senators should hold office by nomination, that half of them should be appointed by the federal government, and the remaining half be appointed by the legislative assemblies of the various provinces. One can readily see that that plan would be an improvement, upon our present system. But the right hon. gentleman only pays a sort of half allegiance to the principle of provincial rights. That would be the objection I would see to such a plan as that. If it is necessary that state rights should be preserved, if this federal part of our institutions is to be preserved, then the Senate should be chosen entirely by the provinces themselves. Mr. Fielding did not propose that the tenure of the present senators should be changed. His scheme would come into gradual operation, until in course of time it became fully complete.

There is also another very valuable suggestion made by Viscount Bryce. He suggests that life tenure should be eliminated. I do not mean to give the impression that this scheme of his was proposed for Canada alone. He suggests that life tenure should be abolished, that the senators should be selected for a term of years; but his method of selection is to be entirely different from the method now followed or from any of the other proposed methods. A committee of selection is to be set up by both chambers, in our case by both the Commons and the Senate, and this committee of selection is to recommend to these two bodies a list of men distinguished in civil life who have taken a large part in the national life of the country, or who have done honour to the nation in any way. That is his scheme for creating a second chamber, a second chamber which he limits very greatly so far as its powers are concerned.

I have referred to two methods—to the method of abolition, and the method of strengthening. I now want to refer to the third method, and that is to reduce the Senate powers as they already exist. I said at the outset that the powers of the Senate except in money matters are co-equal and co-extensive with those of the Commons. They have the widest power of initiation in measures of reform, but I think I am fair in saying that they have seldom taken advantage of this power. Now the suggestion along this line is to dilute, if you like, the veto power which now exists. The Senate now have an absolute veto power. Dilute that power until it becomes either a suspensory or a temporary power of veto. That is the plan that is followed in England. Such a scheme will reduce the Senate to comparative impotence. In connection with the English scheme, if hon. gentlemen will read the Parliament Act of 1911, they will observe there one or two very interesting things. First of all, the act itself in its preamble clearly indicates that the veto measure there taken, that is, the effort to make the absolute veto of the House of Lords a mere temporary veto, was only a preliminary step. The second and further step was to create a popular House of Lords. I will read the preamble for the information of hon. members:

> Whereas it is intended to substitute for the House of Lords as it at present exists a second chamber constituted on a popular instead of hereditary basis. but such substitution cannot be immediately brought into operation—

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Where is that from?

Mr. SHAW: The preamble itself of the British Parliament Act of 1911. The act goes on to very seriously curtail, to practically nullify the powers of the Lords so far as money bills are concerned, and to provide that after the passage of any other public bill by the House of Commons for three consecutive sessions during a period of two years, the bill will automatically become law. The dilution of the veto power, therefore, is only a bridge, if you like, only a step along which we may go in one of two different ways—first towards abolition or secondly towards reform, one or the other. Therein lies the value only, in my judgment, of the veto dilution. It cannot give any permanent reform; but it does meet the present and pressing situation. That was the situation in connection with the Parliament Act in the Old Country, and that was the purpose entirely. I do not know, however, if they have since followed along that track for the purpose of securing a popular second chamber in that country.

The ex-Prime Minister of England, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, has an idea also in connection with Senate reform. He wants to reduce the Senate to a revising chamber, and a revising chamber only. He suggests that it be lessened in number, that it consist entirely of law lords and parliamentary legal draftsmen, and that this body have power, not to change principles at all, but simply to improve the technique of legislation. These are, in short, some of the many schemes which are proposed for Senate reform. The question, after all, it seems to me, comes down to this, as indicated by one writer on the subject: "Do you want an elder brother who is going to advise, who is going to suggest, who is, if necessary, going to check his rash brother, or do you want merely a clerk who will simply cross the t's and dot the i's?"

May I suggest the following as the line that occurs to me along which we may safely travel? I believe, in the first place, that the Senate should be elected; I believe it should be elected by the provinces. If, however, any province should desire a different method of election, or desire the appointment of senators by the legislative assembly, if the majority of them should desire that and they are all prepared to accept it, I have no objection to that. But first of all, make the Senate, either by election or by provincial nomination, responsible to the people whose interests they are called upon to serve. I think also they should be reduced in number. If we had say 36 senators instead of 96, four from each province, if we could claim the services of distinguished men, I think that number would give a fair and adequate representation in that chamber. Then I think they should be chosen for a period of eight years, one half retiring every four years.

Mr. EULER: What justification would there be for giving the same number of senators to each province, so that the small province of Prince Edward Island would have the same number as the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec?

Mr. SHAW: I can only ask my hon. friend what justification there is for the present basis? The province of Alberta with many times the population of Prince Edward Island has only six members whereas Prince Edward Island has four?

Mr. EULER: Would it not be better, if you are going to make the Senate elective, to have its members elected according to population the same as in the case of the members of this House?

Mr. CRERAR: They do not in the United States.

Mr. EULER: That would not necessarily matter.

Mr. SHAW: I was going to point out to my hon. friend that in the United States the basis of Senate representation is two from each state. It is only fair to state that arrangement was a matter of compromise. However, it was felt that two members from each state could adequately safeguard the interests they were supposed to safeguard, namely, the preservation of state sovereignty. This has given a degree of security to the smaller states which otherwise they would not possess. For example, the great state of New York with a population greater than that of Canada has two representatives in the Senate, and, I think, some thirty-five or forty in the House of Representatives. The state of Rhode Island has only, I think, two representatives in the House of Representatives and likewise two senators.

Mr. EULER: There is a good deal of objection to that in the United States.

Mr. SHAW: I agree with my hon. friend that there is some objection, but generally speaking it has worked out well. While it was a compromise plan at the outset I think it has, generally speaking, given considerable satisfaction.

Then I think, for the purposes of the election if that method is going to be followed, taking for example the province of Alberta, it should be divided into large constituencies. I would say that province should be divided into two large constituencies for electoral purposes, and the election should take place on the proportional representation plan which would ensure, as far as can be done, the representation of all interests and all phases of our national life. In addition to that I think the election for the Senate should be held at the same time as the election for the Commons. That could be readily done. It is a mere matter of detail. Then, and most important of all, the power of the Senate should be increased in certain particulars. Thus constituted I think it would be a body to which it would be desirable to apportion definite, specific matters. It would be desir able, for example, to place with the Senate the matter of our foreign relations because if there is any one thing we desire it is that our policy in that regard should be consistent —that it should not be changeable and variable according to the temporary or hastily formed feelings of the people.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend said that the time of holding the election for the upper chamber would be a mere matter of detail. How would he work out the responsibility of the government? The government decides to appeal to the people, will the Senate be consulted?

Mr. SHAW: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: They would have to go to the people if the government told them to go?

Mr. SHAW: The experience in Canada has been that there is an election every four years. That, of course, is not invariable. I remember that in 1911 the government of the day only survived three years; but if you say that a senator is to be appointed for four years—or for a shorter or longer period with a certain limitation, perhaps a year—then you can provide for practically any eventuality that may arise.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps I might follow up the question of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) which deals with a very interesting point. I think it was what the minister had in his mind; I know it was something I have in my own mind. If the Senate is elected at the same time as the House of Commons is there not a danger that ultimately we may have a situation in Canada such as exists now in the United States under which the Senate is taking all the control away, at any rate very largely so far as legislative matters are concerned, from the representatives of the people themselves?

Mr. SHAW: No, not at all; that is only a question of the division of the functions of the two bodies and that, I think, can be safeguarded without much difficulty.

Then, of course, it would be absolutely essential, it would be vital, and it would be necessary that ample provision be made in the case of a dead-lock arising between these two Houses. That has been done in other countries and, I think, generally speaking, although not always, it has proven satisfactory.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I just say this in conclusion: I have sought to ascertain what principles should govern us in the creation of a Senate; what defects in my humble judgment there are in the formation, organization, constitution and operation of that body; and then I have presented to the House various plans that have been presented from time to time. I suggest only in outline my own ideas; not that they have any particular value. I simply want to point out in conclusion that our Confederation Act was framed almost sixty years ago. There have been great changes since that time. Even differing theories on government, and on organization, have been propounded. All these are more or less in the melting pot, and have passed through various stages of development. Since that time too, our whole political, social, and industrial fabric has been almost totally changed, and so these rapidly evolving conditions necessitate that we should give some consideration to the institutions which are functioning for the purpose of preserving and vitalizing our social, industrial, political and economic fabric.

We are not without some very valuable illustrations as a result of that sixty years of experience. May I just suggest some of the things that have happened. The House of Lords in that period has been reduced to comparative impotence. New Zealand with a life tenure for its legislative council has found it necessary to reduce that tenure to a period of seven years. Australia in the interim has adopted an elective system for its Senate. South Africa has adopted a partly elective Senate, with safeguards in the case of a dead-lock which merit our very serious consideration. France prior to 1884 had a life tenure for her Senate. In that year it was changed to an elective system—elected not directly by the people but by the representatives of the various local departments. Since that time too new governments have sprung up. The war created many in Europe. In some of them where the people were homogeneous, where there were not great geographical barriers, where there was not a vast difference in race and creed, they have satisfied themselves with only one assembly. I refer to the states of Latvia and Esthonia. Other countries such as Czecho-Slovakia and Poland, where there were divergencies in these matters, have adopted the federal system, and in each case have provided for an elective Senate. In addition to that we have a most illuminating experience from the country of my hon. friend the member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), a part of the British Empire which furnishes one of the most striking illustrations as to how a second chamber may profitably be constituted. The Irish Free State has a Senate of some sixty members, elected for a term of twelve years. The act under which it is constituted provides that the senators must be citizens who have done honour to the nation by reason of useful public services, or who represent important aspects of the nation's life. One-fourth of the members are chosen by the electors for three years from a panel selected by the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate. The Senate and the Chamber of Deputies choose a panel consisting of three times as many names as are to be elected, and these names are then presented to the public for their selection. In that constitution legislative authority in respect to money bills is reserved for the Chamber of Deputies alone. The Senate, however, is empowered to make recommendations. Other bills must be passed or accepted by both houses, but if the Senate does not pass a bill within two hundred and seventy days, or other longer agreed period, after it has been sent to the Senate by the Chamber of Deputies, the bill shall be deemed to have passed both houses in the form in which it last passed the chamber. The Senate, however, may demand a joint sitting of the two houses to debate, but not vote upon a money bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are all the observations I have to make and in conclusion I desire to make a quotation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member is a straight advocate of an elective senate. Has he any other alternative proposal? Suppose he cannot convince the majority of this House, or those who may have something to say, as to any amendment of the British North America Act to conform to his views, would he suggest any change in the method of the appointment of senators, the tenure of office, or kindred matters?

Mr. SHAW: I certainly think that the method of appointment, be it election or otherwise, should represent the views of the provinces. Even if the provinces desire the appointment by this House, I think that is the proper method. If, however, the provinces consider that the method of election is the proper system, I think that is the method which should be followed. There can only be, so far as I know, two methods or perhaps three, nomination by the Governor General in Council, nomination by the provincial legislature, or election by the citizens of the province whose interests the senators are supposed to support. If the provinces as a unit desire the privilege of nomination by their legislative assemblies, that is the proper method to follow, and if they want to give that power to the federal government, well and good, that is the proper method to follow. But if not, if they can agree upon the method of election, I think the particular method they agree upon should be followed.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does the hon. member take into consideration the enormous expense of running an election in a constituency? He suggests that there should be only thirty-six senators in Canada.

Mr. SHAW: Does the hon. member mean the expense for the candidate? If so, I am more concerned with the welfare of the country than the welfare of the candidate.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the welfare of the country not be greatly involved in the proposition? Because if the candidates
5 p.m. are not able to put up the money themselves, it means they must rely on certain special interests.

Mr. SHAW: Hon. members will understand that in making my suggestion I am merely proposing that the Senate should consist of thirty-six members. I think that is a reasonable proportion considering the vast extent of the country, and I know it will mean a great saving to the country. If my hon. friend wants to make the number fifty-four, I am not going to raise any special objection. I will conclude my remarks by reading a statement made by a former member of the present Senate. The debate was initiated by Hon. Sir Richard W. Scott in 1909 on Senate reform. He urged that some action be taken before public clamour demanded action, and that debate went on intermittently from January until some time in May, and like all other debates on Senate reform, no conclusion was reached. One hon. senator spoke as follows:

> But it is to the future we must look. This is a new country, immense in territory, unlimited in possibilities, now in its formative period. We are composed of nine provinces to-day, all living in peace, harmony and good-will one towards the other. Who can say what antagonism may develop in future years? What strain there may be on the unity of our country later on? It has been said that but for the Senate of the United States, a Senate representing in fact the several states of the union, the commonwealth of our neighbours to the south, would stand to-day dismembered, rent asunder.
> There is no doubt that we shall not endure eternally in universal harmony; future difficulties are sure to come, because the beginnings have been too harmonious. We shall have our trials as a confederation. What will keep the provinces together if there is no proper, strong, trusted link to hold them? That link should be here as it is in the United States, as it is in Switzerland, as it is in Australia, as it is in Germany, a Senate appointed by and truly representing the several provinces of the Dominion. As it is now constituted, it would not be equal to the task, nor trusted to perform it.

Mr. J. W. FINDLAY (South Bruce): I feel it my duty, as it is the duty of every other hon. member in this House, to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) upon the very instructive and lengthy address which he has delivered to us on the question of Senate reform. His remarks indicate great study and research and I desire to say at the outset that his proposition has my hearty support so far as it goes, but I do not think it goes far enough. I come from the province of Ontario, where this matter of Senate reform has occupied the minds of the people to a very large extent and has become a public and practical question. Reading the press of Ontario, and mingling with the people of that province, we find that there is a strong demand for the abolition of the Senate. The fact that the question of Senate reform occupies the attention of the people to a large extent is evidenced by the fact that it has been discussed many times in this House, and through all that discussion there has been a unanimous declaration in favour of some kind of reform, but apparently, the difficulty has been to arrive at some conclusion as to the nature of that reform. I have taken the trouble to go into some of these debates, and through them all I find a general agreement that reform is necessary, and I also find that the great obstacle in the way of bringing about a reform is the fact that no two people are able to agree as to what the nature of that reform should be. The fact is that you cannot find any individual who can propose a reform which will produce the benefits which that individual expected would result. As an instance of that, may I quote from the remarks of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the difficulties which he saw in the way of reforming the Senate. Speaking on a resolution introduced during the session of 1906, he used these words:

> Well, what would be the nature of a reform which would be acceptable to all? This is a question which has puzzled more than one. My hon. friends, the mover and seconder of the resolution, both referred to the convention of 1893, which was held in this city, and in which the reform of the Senate was declared necessary; but while we made that affirmation, the difficulty has always been to settle practically what reform would be acceptable. At once we were met, when we thought of reducing the idea to legislation—and it is a subject which has more than once perplexed the present advisers of His Excellency—with the difficulty of agreeing upon such reform as would be satisfactory to all.

So we find all down through the discussion the main difficulty is to arrive at some method of reform which would be satisfactory to all sections of the country. Because of that difficulty no progress has been made so far. I thoroughly agree with the resolution introduced by my hon. friend from West Calgary, but as I have already stated, its fault, if it has any, is that it does not go far enough. I shall therefore move an amendment which I hope will meet with the approval of the House and which at least goes some little distance further in the direction of providing a satisfactory measure of reform.

Why is it that all through the discussion in all these years no progress has been made in the matter of reforming the Senate? The answer is to be found largely in the fact that there has never been proposed any system which would be acceptable to the country as a whole. It is conceded on all hands that in order to bring about any measure of Senate reform acceptable to the country at large such a proposal would have to meet with the approval of the different provinces. And how are we to arrive at anything of that nature? In discussing this matter, it seems to me that the most logical thing to do if we are to make any headway at all would be to consult the people. What are the chief functions of the second chamber? It has been already stated that one of those functions is to revise hasty legislation. But can we find on an examination of our parliamentary history any instance in which the Senate as it is now constituted has discharged that function? I think we shall all agree that so far as revising hasty legislation is concerned the Senate has not served any purpose of that kind. Again, I wish to quote a distinguished leader of the Liberal party on this point. Speaking in a similar debate in 1906 Sir Wilfrid Laurier, referring to the Senate as an institution for the revision of hasty legislation, said:

> But this is an idea which has never made much impression on my judgment at all events. Considering the course of such legislatures in the Dominion which are composed of a single branch, elected by the people —the legislatures of Ontario, Manitoba, British Columbia, and some others—I do not believe that we need seriously apprehend any danger from the existence of one branch only of the legislature.

We have, I think, all agreed that the Senate as it is at present constituted does not discharge the functions of a body whose purpose is to revise hasty legislation and to act as the champion of provincial rights and minorities; and the fact that some measure of Senate reform is necessary is borne out by the proposal in the Speech from the Throne to call an interprovincial conference in the recess to deal with this and similar matters. This being the case, I do not think there should be any hesitation on the part of this House in adopting a resolution looking to that end. While I approve of the declaration of the government, that it intends calling this inter-provincial conference, I do think that the better method of proceeding would be to take a vote of the people of the different provinces in the first instance. How would the delegates to this proposed interprovincial conference know what the views of the people in their respective provinces might be regarding the question of Senate reform? I have grave doubts, for instance, whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and, say, the Attorney General of Ontario, if they met in consultation on a matter of this kind, would be in a position to represent the will of the people of Ontario on the question. I have no reason to know what the opinions of these gentlemen may be on this question, but I have strong reasons to suspect that the feeling of Ontario is greatly in favour of the abolition of the Senate, and I do not know that the Prime Minister and the Attorney General of Ontario are of that mind. I say therefore that before any interprovincial conference is called, or before any such conference can properly function, it is indispensable that the government should first learn the will of the people of the various provinces which would be represented at the gathering.

Two years ago, I think, the Canadian Council of Agriculture sent down to the United Farmers of Ontario in annual convention assembled a number of recommendations for improvements, and among those recommendations there was one calling for the reform of the Senate. The United Farmers of Ontario declined to endorse that recommendation but decided to substitute for the word "reform" the word "abolish". This, it seems to me, is evidence enough of the opinion on this question of the people of Ontario, at least in the rural sections of that province. And I would ask, where can you get a sounder or saner expression of opinion on public matters affecting the welfare of the country than in the rural sections of Ontario?

I am not a lawyer and am not trained in presenting my arguments in any sylllogistic form, but I feel that this parliament is prepared to go a step further than the resolution presented by my hon. friend asks us to go. What does the resolution say? It declares that in the opinion of this House the Senate as at present appointed and constituted "is not of the greatest advantage to Canada". Well, surely there is no hon. gentleman who will say nay to that resolution. The fact of the matter is that thirty-two or thirty-three years ago the Liberal party at a convention in this city made a stronger declaration than that, and I venture to say that if any gentleman here went on the streets of Ottawa and asked the first man he met whether he would endorse that resolution the reply would be, "Yes, everyone endorses it". For the reasons I have stated, I move that the resolution be amended by adding the following after the word "Canada":

> Therefore it is expedient that an humble address be presented to His Majesty the King praying that the British North America Act be amended so as to provide that the Dominion of Canada may have the power to make the Senate an elective body or to abolish it, as may be decided by the people in a plebiscite to be taken at the next general election.

Mr. SPEAKER: I notice there is already on the order paper a motion in practically the same wording as this amendment, and it is a rule of the House that a question already appointed for consideration cannot be anticipated by way of amendment. In the 13th edition, at page 272, May says:

> A matter already appointed for consideration by the House cannot be anticipated by an amendment, while a notice of motion as long as it remains upon the paper, whether for a specified day or not, prevents its subject matter being discussed by means of an amendment to a motion or of a motion for the adjournment of the House, including a motion under standing order No. 10.

But I find in the next line power, in my humble judgment, to permit the amendment which has just been read by the Chair.

> In determining, however, whether a discussion is out of order on the ground of anticipation, the Speaker must have regard to the probability of the matter anticipated being brought before the House within a reasonable time.

The main motion reads as follows:

> That in the opinion of this House, the Senate as at present appointed and constituted, is not of the greatest advantage to Canada.

As I listened to the address delivered by the mover (Mr. Shaw) I noticed that one of his main objections to the present constitution of the Senate is the mode of appointment. The amendment also refers to the mode of appointment, and is germane to the main motion. Therefore as there will be no other opportunity for the hon. mover of the amendment (Mr. Findlay) to move later on his proposed resolution, No. 37, basing myself on May, I am disposed to allow the amendment. Let me again read what May says, because I want to live up to the rules of the House:

> In determining, however, whether a discussion is out of order on the ground of anticipation, the Speaker must have regard to the probability of the matter anticipated being brought before the House within a reasonable time.

I find that this justifies the Speaker in allowing the amendment. Therefore the question now before the House is the amendment. Is the House ready for the question?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have spoken on the point of order, but unfortunately Your Honour has already ruled that the amendment is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should not like to debar any hon. member from stating whatever views he may have on the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to have submitted this to your consideration, Mr. Speaker, before making your final ruling. Your Honour rests your ruling upon the assumption that the order referred to, No. 37, is not likely to be reached.

Mr. SPEAKER: Oh yes, it can be reached, but then objection would be taken that the subject matter having already been discussed it could not be revived. However, I should like to hear further from the hon. member.

Mr. STEVENS: I would submit to Your Honour that before this resolution could be moved as an amendment it ought to be dropped from the order paper. I would further submit that the resolution now moved as an amendment has been called at least five or six times, precluding any possible excuse of its sponsor not having had an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I had that in mind when I gave, perhaps a little too hurriedly, my ruling. The hon. member is right, this motion cannot be revived now that it is being moved as an amendment. As I stated a moment ago, the Speaker, according to May,

> In determining whether a discussion is out of order on the ground of anticipation, must have regard to the probability of the matter anticipated being brought before the House within a reasonable time.

Resolution No. 37 could not be brought again before the House, because this amendment which reproduces it, but which as such, is germane to the main motion, could not be revived later on. It will be expunged from the order of the day as a matter of course.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And, Mr. Speaker, do not we deal with the two resolutions on the order paper, and therefore discharge something which is before the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in rising I wish to pay my most sincere compliments to the mover of the resolution (Mr. Shaw). More than once privately I have had the opportunity of telling him that I share his views entirely with regard to Senate reform. I say so now. The only question is: What is the constitutional way of obtaining that reform? I had thought that the motion as presented by my hon. friend in the negative was the best form. After considering the question again, I intend to move an amendment to the amendment in substantive form. Might I say, however, that in my opinion my proposed amendment to the amendment does not destroy the motion of my hon. friend, but simply makes it more applicable and more practicable. Again I congratulate my hon. friend on the very able speech which he made this afternoon in support of his resolution. It has been one of my weaknesses to admire men of talent, and I hope that that weakness will always remain with me. I admired my hon. friend this afternoon for the excellence of his address on the question of the reform of the Senate, and I think I can safely say that by it he has greatly added to his reputation in this House.

My hon. friend has offered several suggestions. I do not say that I do not agree with him, although it is true that the moment one turns in the direction of absolute reform he is subject to all kinds of criticism. I had this experience myself two years ago, when on the 21st of March, 1923, I addressed the House on the reform of the Senate. On that occasion I presented a substantive motion, that is, I proposed something definite, and I suggested that if the motion was not accepted as drafted, some other method might be adopted. The wording of my motion was:

> —or by any other mode of election as may be determined by parliament.

In my resolution I asked that the Senate of Canada be made elective, but my idea was that if my motion was not adopted as it stood, some other method could be determined upon as decided by parliament. On that occasion the Minister of Finance (Mr Fielding) declared very emphatically that a reform of the Senate was due. I wish to quote from page 1375 of Hansard of that year—and I desire to be excused for reading a compliment which the hon. minister paid me on that occasion; the sentence would not be understandable otherwise. He said:

> I will say this, however, that the hon. gentleman has rendered a very valuable service to the country in opening for discussion—

This is what I wish particularly to call attention to:

> —a question of great importance, one that arises from time to time and one which, if not to-day certainly at no distant day, will press for a solution.

That was the declaration of the Minister of Finance at that time, speaking undoubtedly for the government. However, in the same speech the minister asked that the motion be not pressed because the time for definite action had not yet arrived, and upon his advice I decided not to ask for a division of the House on my motion.

Now the hon. member for West Calgary comes along with a negative resolution. He has tried to avoid the difficulties which a substantive resolution might meet, and I can only commend him for that. On the other hand, rightly or wrongly, speaking in the interests of the cause I frankly and honestly think that his ends might perhaps be better achieved if a substantive resolution was substituted for his negative resolution, and that is the reason why I intend to move a substantive amendment.

From what I have said it will appear as though the necessity for the reform of the Senate is something which nobody in this country disputes. When I had the honour of addressing the House on the 21st of March, 1923, my whole argument, after long and careful study of the question, was an attempt to demonstrate that a reform of the Senate was necessary. I am happy to-day to see that what I was preaching two years ago has now been accepted by the government itself. In the Speech from the Throne this year we see that the government proposes to bring about some scheme for the reform of the Senate. I take it for granted that my friends opposite me are in favour of the reform of the Senate, and for that they must be congratulated. I must take it for granted that the government are in favour of it, and if the Progressive party, as well as many members, I hope, of the Conservative party, are in favour of it, it is evident that the great majority of those who sit in this House are favourable to a reform of the Senate. I will therefore abstain from discussing the merits of the question; in other words, I shall not go into the question whether such a reform is due, because in my humble opinion that has already been abundantly proved. As to what the reform should be, that is another question, which I hope will be settled shortly.

What I propose to do at this juncture is to move an amendment to the amendment, for two reasons. My first reason is that although I approve absolutely of the resolution of the hon. member for West Calgary, that the Senate as at present constituted is not in the best interests of this country, I think the matter should be placed in a more positive form. If the positive form in which I want to place the motion is negatived—in other words, if the subamendment is rejected—then the House will have an opportunity of voting on my hon. friend's resolution, and assuredly I will vote for it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will my hon. friend allow me a question? He says he understands that the government propose to deal with the matter. Let me put it in the words of the Manitoba Free Press:

> It is to be presumed, however, that it is the purpose of the government to have this conference consider methods by which the constitution can be amended at the will of the Canadian people, rather than itself to consider particular changes in the constitution such as the modification of the powers of the Senate.

My hon. friend is basing part of his argument upon a presumption, upon something in respect to which we have not any information except that the government may take some action. I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if he will make that point clear before we hear what the amendment is.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has my hon. friend read the Speech from the Throne?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Well, that may keep for five years.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, no.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I understand that my hon. friend wants a positive declaration from the government, but it is not in my power to give that declaration. I take it for granted that the government meant what they said in the Speech from the Throne, and it will be up to them to accomplish in some form the intent of that declaration.

The purpose of my subamendment is twofold; first, to add to the main motion and make it more practical, and secondly to destroy the amendment, because the amendment seeks the abolition of the Senate, and I am not and never have been in favour of the abolition of the Senate. If one examines the constitutions of all the most important countries in the world, one will see that with but one or two exceptions an upper chamber or a senate or a first chamber, as it is called in some countries, exists. Practically every country in the world has an upper or first chamber or a senate or superior council, which are all about the same thing. Therefore I am not in favour of the abolition of the Senate; but I am in favour of the Senate being reformed, and that is why I want to counteract the amendment with my subamendment. The subamendment which I propose reads as follows:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the governments of the various provinces to consider the advisability of amending the British North America Act with respect to the constitution and the powers of the Senate.

I will now in a few short words try and explain my subamendment. Practically all of us, I presume, are in favour of reform of the Senate; but how can this be carried out? A few days ago in this House this question was raised indirectly on the resolution of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean): How can we amend our constitution? We cannot reform the Senate without amending our constitution, and my hon. friend was asking that the constitution of Canada be amended, whenever that was found necessary, according to the terms of his resolution. The two questions in my opinion are very correlated. I followed that debate very closely, and in my opinion the arguments which were made on that occasion by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), after a thorough examination of the question, were perfectly sound. He said in substance that confederation is a pact or contract. This everybody admits to-day. This was, in fact, declared at the time of confederation by the Fathers of Confederation, and is to be found in the debates on confederation. Therefore, if we start from that principle, that confederation is a pact or contract, we have to come to the conclusion that this contract cannot be altered unless all the parties to it are invited.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Might I ask the hon. member to state exactly who are the parties to that contract?

Mr. DENIS: (Joliette): I do not think I should begin all over again the arguments that were brought forward the other day. I do not see exactly what my hon. friend is driving at. Does he mean that the other provinces that came in after the four original provinces are or are not parties to the contract?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, I go further. I say this: While you speak of the provinces, or of the thirteen original states in the United States, as making a constitution, the constitution of Canada is now practically in charge of this parliament as well as the original provinces, and I have not heard anyone yet proposing to protect the rights of this parliament in connection with this matter, or that the Parliament of Canada should be represented in the conference when it is held.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I think we are making a big mistake to compare the constitution of Canada with that of the United States.

[Mr. J. J. Denis.]

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I did not do that altogether.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): If my hon. friend will follow me, we can no more compare the constitution of Canada with that of the United States than we can compare one contract with another that is drawn in a different way, although the two might bear on the same subject. The United States framed their constitution according to their wishes and desires; that is one contract. We framed our constitution according to our wishes and desires; that is another contract. And simply because there is a constitution on the one side and a constitution on the other, it does not follow that we can compare the two. We can no more compare our constitution with that of the United States than we can compare it with that of France or Germany or Ireland, the last constitution to be written. Therefore, I cannot accept any argument derived from a comparison of our constitution with that of the United States. We have to examine our own contract and determine our own status; we have to find out what was the purport of our contract, and what was the intention of the Fathers of Confederation. Now that intention is to be found in what they said at the time, and that is why the debates on confederation are so famous. I imagine that every member of parliament has read those debates, if not entirely, at least in part. They are so important and so illuminating as to the meaning of the Fathers of Confederation when they framed this pact. My hon. friend has taken me a little away from my subject and I do not want to detain the House too long.

I was saying that confederation is a pact or a contract, and that this pact or contract cannot be altered unless all the parties to it are first brought into a conference. That is the object of my subamendment. Supposing this parliament should pass a direct and specific resolution declaring that the Senate of Canada shall be reformed in this way or that; what would be the consequences? If the provinces should be satisfied with it, all well and good; but supposing one province should say: You have no right to do that; you cannot use the supreme power of the Parliament of Canada to break a contract or to alter our status in the Dominion. Now there is no question that the reform of the Senate might bring about an alteration of the status of the different provinces of Canada. It might bring about an alteration of the status of the minorities in Canada. It is all very well to talk of Senate reform. I am in favour of it; there is no man in this House more in favour of it than I am; but we must approach the question in a legal and a constitutional way. If this parliament should take into their hands the power to reform the Senate without consulting the provinces, I am afraid that might give rise to very serious difficulties as between the Dominion and the provinces. That is why I am asking in the amendment to the amendment that the provinces convene with the Dominion in order to confer upon that subject. A few days ago the National Council of Agriculture passed the following resolution:

> That the council expresses its pleasure at the announcement that an international conference is to be held to consider the question of the reform of the Senate, and expresses the hope that the result of this conference will be a real measure of Senate reform.

We all know that the National Council of Agriculture have been preaching Senate reform. They are in favour of a reform of the upper house, and they are asking that a conference should be held with the provinces to consider the subject. Why? Because, rightly or wrongly, they believe as I do, that a question of such importance cannot be settled by the Parliament of Canada alone; it must be settled in a conference between representatives of this parliament and representatives of the different provincial legislatures.

Mr. GOOD: Did not my hon. friend commit an error in reading the resolution as he did? Did he not use the word "international" for the word "interprovincial"?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): Did I say "international"?

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member certainly did say "international".

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): It certainly should be "interprovincial".

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The hon. gentleman now admits the very point I raised in the House. He says it is to be a conference between the provinces and the Dominion parliament. We have got that fact now, and it is the first time it has been stated in the House. That is what I want, I want the Dominion to be represented in that conference.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You had that announcement before. The Speech from the Throne announced a conference between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): At any rate, we have got that far now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You had that statement before.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): There could be no mistake as to that. It was announced that there was to be a conference between the federal and provincial governments. Resuming my argument may I state my position in two words? I am in favour of the reform of the Senate, but because it seemed to me that everybody favoured that course I brought no argument to establish it. My only argument is as to the best way of reforming the Senate, and in my opinion the best course will be to follow the method suggested in the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's amendment is not an amendment to the main motion, it is an amendment to the amendment.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis). Of all the motions before the House, the subamendment is yet the best solution, and for want of a better one, I sincerely give it my approval.

However, I think it behooves this Parliament, when it is a question of possible amendments to our constitution in regard to the Senate, to invite the provinces to a conference in order to inquire as to the need of these amendments. I do not approve of this subamendment for the same reasons given by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis), but I do so on entirely different grounds. It is well, if for no other reason than courtesy towards the contracting parties of the British North America Act, that the provinces be consulted when it is a question of important amendments as the one which refers to Senate reforms, and, on these grounds I think, we should submit this question to the provinces. Moreover, if such a conference had no other result but amendments in regard to the representation of the provinces it would equally be proper to consult the provinces.

It is a fact, Sir that a certain agitation has taken place in regard to the upper house, and it is perhaps well at this time that parliament should consult the provinces so as to settle once for all that our constitution, as it exists to-day, is still the best and that we have no reason to amend it. It would perhaps be the best means of putting an end to this agitation.

On March 23, 1923, the hon. member for Joliette moved in this House a resolution asking for the reform of the Senate. He wished to have the Senate elective, so that senators should be elected for six years in special electoral divisions, half of them being returned every three years. I must say that the hon. member adopts, to-day, an attitude which is in keeping with the stand he took in 1923. He is most sincere in his convictions and I congratulate him in rising again to-day in the House to support a motion for a reform based on the same grounds as in 1923.

I had the honour, at that time, to move the adjournment of the debate. If I had spoken then, I would have done so in the same way as to-day, I would have said that this reform must be proceeded with the greatest precaution and only after a conference with the provinces. I am attached to our constitution, I like the British North America Act such as it is, because it is a pact agreed upon by the provinces, a solemn pact under which our legislative powers are defined and which confides certain powers to the provinces and certain others to the Dominion government. This legislative power of the Dominion government is exercised by the King, the Senate and the House of Commons. The Fathers of Confederation had an aim in view, in 1867, when they created a Senate composed of members appointed for life and chosen by the Governor in Council, and the reasons given at the time were very sound. After many a long discussion, at that time, between the representatives of the various provinces, it was agreed to compromise by creating an upper house composed of life members appointed by the Governor in Council. Had we thought of following the example of other countries, we could have turned our eyes beyond the 45th parallel and seen a Senate with an organization different from that of our upper house; we might have found in other countries an elective Senate; but I think, the Fathers of Confederation were right in giving us an independent upper house, composed of senators appointed for life. I prefer our constitution to that of other countries. The constitution of 1867 is much better than the one in force in the neighbouring republic or that of other nations. I am attached to our constitution and the manner in which the Senate is constituted, because I think we have in this organization an upper house composed of men unswayed by influences. Such is the opinion of all those who have made a study of the constitution of 1867. The distinctive character of the upper house is that its members are independent; they are legislators as independent as one can find in a country.

[Mr. Fortier.]

They are independent because they are appointed for life and chosen by the Governor in Council, and, they have over and above the representatives of the lower house, this liberty of conscience necessary to a legislator which gives him the freedom on certain occasions to resist popular passion and to stick to the very last to his convictions for the welfare of his country. I have been told—not that I have personal knowledge of the fact because when I compare my way of thinking with that of my electors I must say that there is nothing that divides us—I have been told that it may happen that a member might be forced to take, under certain circumstances, an attitude contrary to his personal convictions. Yes, this may happen. We represent, in the House of Commons, a section of the country, various elements which, at times, may demand from members a certain line of conduct on a public question. The freedom of action of the members of the lower house is thereby curtailed. It is well to have some display of independence and to state that a member occupies a seat in the House so as to express his personal views, but when the said member returns to his county to ask for a renewal of his mandate, will not the elector call him to task for having aired his personal views contrary to the wish of a faction or party of an electoral district? I would not have thought of it myself if my attention had not been drawn to such a fact, for in all my political career never did such a case present itself where my electors had not in me this entire confidence with which they always entrusted me. Here, as well as in Quebec, I had but to rise to express my views in regard to legislation introduced and I always found myself heart and soul in accord with the wishes of the electors of my county. I cannot imagine that at any time, I might have to set aside my personal convictions, for when I express them, I express those of my electors; I trust in them as they trust in me. It is nevertheless a fact that a representative of the people may at times be called upon to handle with tact public passion roused by certain issues and he is thus unable to entirely assert his views. On the other hand, the representative in the upper house, the senator appointed for life, is totally independent. On all issues brought before the Senate, he can enjoy full liberty of conscience and freedom of action. I think it is a well established fact that the existence of an upper house is sometimes very necessary. At times, the Commons obliged to surrender to popular clamour, adopts certain legislation, however it does so with the conviction that the Senate will deal with such a measure on its merits, that it will, if necessary, throw it out if it considers in its wisdom and from its unbiased viewpoint that such a measure is contrary to the interest of the country.

This is one reason why I am the more pledged to upholding the British North America Act and to maintaining the Senate as constituted.

Since reference has been made to constitutional law, I shall take the liberty of quoting a few comments which sum up the views of all those who have made a special study of our Constitution:

> The part played by the Senate, as a legislative body, is about the same as that of the House of Lords in England. It has the well defined right to throw out any measure passed by the House of Commons, however, it exercises its powers with prudence and discretion. We are indebted to it for the rejection of quite a number of bills inspired by ill-considered zeal or the effervescence of public opinion. With us, the ponderation of powers is settled; the Senate, in regard to legislation is absolutely the equal of the House of Commons and it has the advantage over the latter of being independent of both the power and passions of the people. If it takes its part seriously it may render us important services.

Let us now, Mr. Speaker, consider how the upper house is, at present, constituted. Does the fact of its members being appointed by the Governor in Council lower it in the esteem of the citizens of this country? Does it not compare favourably with any other chamber both in dignity and usefulness? What higher authority than the Governor in Council can make the appointment of senators. It has been stated in this debate that the upper house might be better constituted if the provincial governments were entrusted with the selection of its members or if the government requested people of high standing in this country to join them as advisers for the purpose of appointing senators. Let us be rid forever of these so called all important people without responsibilities whatsoever to advise on the appointment of members to the Senate! The best guarantee we have that the upper house is composed of citizens able to fulfil their important duties, is that the appointment of senators is left to the government. Moreover it is the government, holding ministerial responsibility, who appoint the members to the Senate, and the government represent authority, established power, in fact the country. Indeed, we have no fault to find as to appointments made up to now, for most of the time—and the government has been well guided in the matter—senators have been chosen amongst members of the House of Commons; it is precisely here where they are recruited in greater number.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Is that the best system?

Mr. FORTIER (Translation): It is without doubt the best system. Rightly has the government, in numerous instances, appointed to the Senate members who enjoyed the full confidence of their electors and had faithfully served their country during a great number of years.

It is apparent that members of this House, who have been here for a long time and have built up an enviable reputation, are most qualified to sit in the upper house, and we may rest assured that they will allow only sound legislation to be enacted. The course followed by all governments—this one as well as others that have preceded it—is the best; it is a pledge that the Senate will always be composed of worthy and experienced men, the custom followed being to select among the well deserving servants of the state, either in the House or anywhere else. I, therefore, trust, Mr. Speaker, that we shall maintain the present system of appointments to the upper house which exists since Confederation and to which there is no reason—I again state—to effect any changes.

When the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) spoke, a short while ago, with so much enthusiasm upon his subamendment, he stated, as he had done with such eloquence in 1923, that he thought the whole of the province of Quebec was behind him on this question of Senate reform. I shall not wound him by asking him to lay a wager—because I know he is very strongly adverse to wagers—but I shall take upon myself to inform him that he is greatly in error, because the province of Quebec is, by tradition, in favour of maintaining the constitution and the Senate as they are. For all the above reasons I shall vote for the subamendment.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I should like to join with hon. members in congratulating the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) on the way he presented this matter this afternoon. I must say that I find myself in almost perfect accord with the views he expressed both as to the desirability of the second chamber and as to the method of reform which he, perhaps I should not say advocated, but suggested. I think it was wisdom on his part to introduce the resolution in this negative form. By introducing it in that way, he wished to give us an opportunity to express ourselves as to the present condition of things without any reference at all to possible changes that might be made. I know it has been urged by some who have already spoken that the resolution of the hon. member for West Calgary did not go far enough because it did not advocate any definite proposal. They claim that there is practical unanimity in regard to the resolution as placed upon the order paper. That may be so. I hope it is so, but it seems to me it would have been well worth while, if that be the case, that we should have had a clear-cut plain statement going forth to the country that the Commons of Canada are not satisfied with things as they are at present. Instead of being able to express ourselves on that clear, plain, simple proposition, we have had the matter somewhat entangled by amendments and subamendments. I think our experience of a week ago has shown us that we sometimes get into almost inextricable confusion with amendments and subamendments, and it might possibly be that some members will find themselves again in an embarrassing position. I greatly regret, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members have seen fit at this stage to introduce any amendment, because it does not leave us free to express ourselves on the clear-cut proposition that the Senate of Canada as appointed, and as at present constituted, does not meet the needs of the Canadian people. Are we unanimous on that subject? I believe we are. Certainly the government committed themselves to that proposition when, in the Speech from the Throne, they promised that a conference of the provinces on the subject would be called. So far as those who sit in this corner of the House are concerned, we earnestly endorse the principle, and I have some reason to believe that those who sit on my right, the Conservative party, are also behind this proposition. Certainly their leader is on record at one time as having endorsed the proposition for the total abolition of the Senate, and if that statement is questioned—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not heard what the hon. gentleman said, and therefore will not contradict it.

Mr. BROWN: Perhaps the House would like to have my authority for that statement. In January, 1909, Mr. E. A. Lancaster of Lincoln and Niagara, introduced a resolution in the House which, after a long preamble, concluded in this way:

> We therefore respectively pray that the said British North America Act be so amended as to provide for the abolition of the said Senate.

That proposition was debated at considerable length, and at the close of the debate was voted upon and the proposition was defeated by some 22 to 111. Among the 22 I find the name of Mr. Meighen. If that is not the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition, then of course my most humble apology is due to him. I am the last man in this House who will deny to any man the right to change his mind; but if his mind on this subject has been changed we will naturally expect to hear from him; but until we have a definite announcement as to such a change we will hold that the Conservative party, as represented by their leader, is in favour of the proposition that the Senate as at present constituted is not for the welfare of Canada. I should like to suggest that we have some reason to believe that the Senate itself would be behind such a proposition. The hon. member for West Calgary this afternoon mentioned the fact that Hon. Sir Richard Scott is on record as having recognized the necessity for Senate reform. I might quote the following in this connection. Hon. Sir Richard Scott moved in the Senate a resolution beginning:

> That, in the opinion of the Senate the time has arrived for so amending the constitution of this branch of parliament as to bring the mode of selection of senators more into harmony with public opinion.

Not only was Sir Richard Scott in favour of Senate reform, but we have also Sir Richard Cartwright on record as at one time being in favour of it; and I have no evidence that he changed his mind, although he occupied a place in the Senate. Mr. Lancaster, speaking on the resolution which he introduced to the House, referred to the fact that Sir Richard Cartwright, upon the eve of a general election, speaking in Massey Hall, Toronto, used this language:

> The Senate was a millstone around the neck of the Canadian people which he prayed that Providence would soon remove.

Mr. Lancaster goes on to say, somewhat humorously:

> I presume the right hon. gentleman is still praying. But he is not praying in the form in which this House should pray, by a concrete motion to bring about a result. And if I may say so, without being flippant, I do not think that the locality in which he is praying is quite consistent with his prayer, for he is now a member of the chamber which he hoped Providence would abolish.

I referred to the debate that took place in the House on Mr. Lancaster's motion when the right hon. leader of the opposition voted in favour of abolition. I find in the same connection another well known gentleman, Mr. Sharpe of Lisgar. Mr. Sharpe also voted in favour of the abolition of the Senate, and he too occupies a seat in that honourable body. Now, until we have evidence that these men have changed their minds we can only believe that they accepted these positions in the conviction that they could serve the country there better than anybody else.

We must take it therefore that these and other hon. gentlemen, when the time comes, will willingly throw up the life appointment which they evidently accepted in the public interest. We must believe that when there is a sufficiently strong public demand they will resign their seats and do what they can to bring about the reforms which we advocate.

The hon. member for West Calgary very wisely pointed out the anomaly that exists in the Senate as it is at present constituted, its chief function supposedly being that of protecting provincial rights. Surely it is anomalous that a body should be specially charged with the protection of provincial rights when it is in no way responsible to the provinces. During a debate that was held in the session following that in which Mr. Lancaster's motion was debated, Sir Wilfrid Laurier made some remarks in this connection. There was introduced into the House by Mr. M. Y. McLean of Huron a resolution very similar to the one we have before us at the present time—

That, in the opinion of this House, the Dominion Senate as at present constituted is not in accordance with the representative institutions of this country, and the government should take the necessary proceedings to have the Senate made representatives of and directly responsible to the people.

In this connection Sir Wilfrid Laurier, while defending the system of appointments, made these remarks:

I will go further and I will give this as my very deliberate opinion, that if there is to be a reform of the Senate it should be in line with the purpose for which the Senate was instituted in this country, that is to say, to protect minorities, and to make it representative of the provinces rather than any other body of men.

He closed the debate with these words:

I am prepared to approach this question without any bias, and I am prepared to have the question examined whether or not, while we should keep the nominative appointment in the government, we should give a share of the responsibility to the different provinces. That is a suggestion which is well worthy of consideration. I agree with my hon. friend that something should be done. This is the last of the reforms which we promised the country, and which we have not yet carried out. It is a reform which we are anxious to carry out, but we wish to carry it out on lines which, I think, would be more in consonance with the spirit of our constitution.

That motion was not voted upon but was withdrawn. The member for West Calgary, in offering suggestions for possible reform, alluded to the constitution of the Irish Senate. When the act constituting that body went through the British parliament the constitution of the Irish Senate was brought to my notice and it made a more favourable impression upon my mind than any proposition I had seen presented up to that time. I think there is much in it that is well worth our consideration, and in my judgment that plan that has worked in the case of the Irish Free State, with the modifications that would be necessary to suit our conditions, might very well serve the purpose we have in view. I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be well worth while for me to read from the British statutes a few clauses of that act relating to the constitution of the Irish Senate. The British statutes in this form are not very readily available to many sections of our people, but Hansard is now widely circulated through the country, and if this matter is to be understood by the people it is well that they should have access to the British statute constituting the Senate of the Irish Free State. For that reason I shall ask leave to place it on Hansard, and in the meantime I propose to read a few clauses of the act.

Article 82

(a) The first Seanad Eireann shall consist of sixty members, of whom thirty shall be elected and thirty shall be nominated.

(b) The thirty nominated members of Seanad Eireann shall be nominated by the president of the Executive Council who shall, in making such nominations, have special regard to the providing of representation for groups or parties not then adequately represented in Dail Eireann.

(c) The thirty elected members of Seanad Eireann shall be elected by Dail Eireann voting on principles of proportional representation.

(d) Of the thirty nominated members, fifteen to be selected by lot, shall hold office for the full period of twelve years, the remaining fifteen shall hold office for the period of six years.

(e) Of the thirty elected members the first fifteen elected shall hold office for the period of nine years, the remaining fifteen shall hold office for the period of three years.

(f) At the termination of the period of office of any such members, members shall be elected in their place in manner provided by article 32 of this constitution.

(g) Casual vacancies shall be filled in manner provided by article 34 of this constitution.

There are four short articles referring to this matter. It will be noticed that the article I have read has reference only to the first Irish Senate. After it is constituted these rules will apply:

Article 30

The Irish Senate shall be composed of citizens who shall be proposed on the grounds that they have done honour to the nation by reason of useful public services or that, because of special qualifications or attainments, they represent important aspects of the nation's life.

Article 31

The number of members of the Irish Senate shall be sixty. A citizen to be eligible for membership of the Irish Senate must be a person eligible to become a member of Dail Eireann, and must have reached the age of thirty-five years. Subject to any provision for the constitution of the first Irish Senate the term of office of a member of the Irish Senate shall be twelve years.

Article 32

One-fourth of the members of Seanad the Irish Senate shall be elected every three years from a panel constituted as hereinafter mentioned at an election at which the area of the jurisdiction of the Irish Free State shall form one electoral area, and the elections shall be held on principles of proportional representation.

I shall refer to that again. Article 33 provides for the panel:

Before each election of members of the Irish Senate a panel shall be formed consisting of (a) Three times as many qualified persons as there are members to be elected, of whom two-thirds shall be nominated by Dail Eireann voting according to principles of proportional representation and one-third shall be nominated by the Irish Senate voting according to principles of proportional representation; and

(b) Such persons who have at any time been members of the Irish Senate (including members about to retire) as signify by notice in writing addressed to the president of the Executive Council their desire to be included in the panel.

I am satisfied that some modification of this scheme could be well applied to our own situation. Granting that we accept the provision that the representation should be made more directly by the provinces, why should we not have a province, such as Manitoba, with a given number of senators, constituted into one electoral division, just as is done in the case of the Free State. Nominations would be made under a system agreed upon and then the requisite number of senators elected according to proportional representation. I know proportional representation is anathema to some hon. gentlemen who sit in this House.

Mr. McMASTER: That is because they do not understand it.

Mr. BROWN: Yes. I think if the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) had understood it clearly he would not have placed on Hansard the figures that he gave us some time ago. I am quite satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that proportional representation in such a case would secure the desired result of having the members of the Senate from any given province representative of the thought, feeling and desires of its people. I am not satisfied that it would be well for us to depart from the principle of representation by population. That has been suggested, and the United States has been cited as an example. It is true that if the functions of the Senate were only to protect state rights, then the fact of the smaller states having equal representation with the larger might ensure their interests not being jeopardized by the action of the larger states. But the Senate of the United States does not by any means confine its activities to protecting the rights of the smaller states. And when it comes to dealing with larger matters of policy, I cannot at present see that it would be wise for us to depart altogether from the principle of representation by population. It may be that the numbers are too large as at present, although even that may be a matter of doubt.

I hope Mr. Speaker, that if we can vote on the original proposition as submitted to the House we will have an absolutely unanimous expression of opinion, and while that may not satisfy some hon. members, it seems to me it would be no small achievement, for it would go forth to the country that on this matter the Commons of Canada are not in favour of things as they are.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, like other members, I should like to congratulate my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) on bringing this important matter before the House. I am not so sure that I can congratulate him on his tolerance of the Senate. With the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), I should like to see everyone have an opportunity of stating his position either in regard to Senate reform or possibly to its abolition.

What is all the hue and cry about? Why is it that since 1874 various resolutions have been brought forward in this chamber and long discussions have taken place with respect to Senate reform, and yet in the end nothing has been done? What has brought this important subject once more before the public, what has focused their attention upon that honourable body? It is because in the past that honourable body has nullified certain legislation passed by this chamber. It seems to me that no matter how you may endeavour to reform the Senate, just so long as you have such a body enjoying that prerogative the wishes of the people will be thwarted. I have before me at the present time a statement of the number of bills thrown out by the Senate since 1867—about fifty-seven years—numbering approximately 150. Some of those measures, of course, were of minor importance, but many of them were of major importance and would have been of decided advantage to the Canadian people had they been placed on the statute book of this fair Dominion. It cannot be expected that the Senate will acquiesce in everything that this House does, otherwise it would be simply a duplication of the legislative machinery; and if we are to have a second chamber without power either to initiate or nullify legislation, the only logical course, it seems to me, is to abolish that second chamber.

Of course, arguments have been advanced against the abolition of the Senate, and those in favour of its retention tell us that a second chamber is necessary to check hasty legislation. But I cannot see any reason for an intelligent democracy such as ours to have its representatives held in check by an appointive body. If that body was removed altogether this chamber would be far more careful in passing legislation. There are many instances on record where parliament has passed legislation with the direct intention that it shall be nullified by the Senate, the object being to make political capital. It seems to me that the only ground upon which the issue can be sidestepped is that of political expediency; it cannot be done if the wishes of the people or the well-being of the country are kept in mind.

That the Senate exists to safeguard the interests of the provinces was a point brought out, I believe, by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) as well as by the hon. member for West Calgary. Well, when the Senate had an opportunity to safeguard the interests of the three great prairie provinces, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, in connection with their natural resources, they failed miserably. That was the time when they should have stood four-square to the wind and have seen to it that these three provinces entered the confederation on the same basis as the other provinces. If those responsible for this resolution rest their case on the argument that the Senate exerts its prerogative against the wishes of the people, the only logical thing to do is not to reform the Senate but to abolish it.

In his trip west, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) once again stirred up public opinion and focused attention on the Senate by his references to the subject, and a great many people out there hoped that something definite would be done by this parliament. Of course, the more serious minded people realized that this parliament could not accomplish anything of itself; that the only constitutional way to reform or to abolish the Senate was to call a conference of the provinces. Apparently the Prime Minister has also reached that conclusion, because what he hoped to do was announced in the Speech from the Throne this year. It seems to me that this is the only logical way out. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) in a speech delivered last year, pointed out that under the British North America Act the Parliament of Canada consists of both Houses and the only way to reform or abolish the one or the other is to get the consent of the parties to the confederation, namely, the provinces. He showed that the power was not given this parliament to change the constitution of either House.

Senate reform involves a constitutional question. This aspect of the matter was discussed the other day and I shall not enter very fully into it. There was no unanimity in the discussion that took place in the House on that occasion. Constitutional lawyers and other lawyers and hon. members generally expressed their views, but no definite conclusion was arrived at. Since abolition of the Senate is really out of the question, logical as it may seem to be, I wish to refer for a few moments to certain reforms that I think might be considered.

The hon. member for West Calgary read a part of the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) dealing with this question. You will remember that the Minister of Finance, speaking two years ago, said that the Senate was a check, not a block; that our country was variously constituted, the people of different sections of the country having different ideas on many questions, and that it was necessary to have a senate in order to place a check upon hasty legislation. Well, have they really checked any hasty legislation? In 1919 legislation which had the effect of taking away the right of trial by jury of persons born outside of Canada was passed in this House, and it was also passed in the other chamber in almost less than an hour. They failed miserably to check that legislation. Some years afterwards when we of the Progressive party came into this House we attempted to repeal that legislation, which we regarded as a blot upon the fair name of British and Canadian people, but that attempt was blocked; so I submit that the Senate has miserably failed either to check hasty legislation or—in many cases—to permit the passing of legislation of real value to the Canadian people.

The government has promised to proceed along constitutional lines, and I do not see the value of continuing this discussion unless it be to give the government the benefit of the opinion of representatives of the people when the conference of the provinces is held during the summer. I can readily understand that if this body is to continue to exist it must have certain power and it must have the right to safeguard the provinces. Some measure of control must rest with the second chamber. But when a measure has been before the people and has been discussed by them; when an issue has been placed before the electors and they have decided upon it in no uncertain way by returning representatives who, they believe, will introduce those views in the form of legislation, then I do not think it is logical that there should be any power on the part of another body to nullify that legislation. Of course if a government introduces legislation that has not been fully considered by the people, then the second chamber, if we are to have one, should have the right to nullify that legislation until such time as the electors have an opportunity to examine it fully. Subsequently, if there is no hue and cry against it; if no serious objection is urged, in the following session this House should have the right to introduce that legislation again and enact it into law.

The hon. member for West Calgary was on good ground when he referred to the equalization of representation among the provinces. I do not see any reason why Ontario and Quebec should dominate all the rest of Canada. I believe myself that the only fair thing to do would be to give equal representation to each of the provinces, especially since it is claimed that the Senate exists for the safeguarding of the provinces. I do not agree, if we are going to have a second chamber, that a membership of thirty-six would be sufficient. Canada is a great country and it would be very difficult for four representatives from each province to keep in touch with affairs in all the provinces. If there is to be a second chamber I believe those who represent the provinces should be able to keep fully in touch with them; accordingly eight or ten representatives at least for each province would be necessary to safeguard the interests of the people.

With regard to the election of the Senate, I do not see that that is at all practicable or desirable. The people have already spoken as to who should represent them in parliament; they have elected their representatives to the House of Commons. Shall they elect another body to supervise or exercise jurisdiction over the first? It does not seem to me to be necessary or even logical to have two bodies of men, both representatives of the people and one working against the other. An elective Senate would be a duplication of this chamber. I have before me the complexion of the Senate, not the political complexion, but the interests they represent. If we are going to have a Senate, it should be representative of the masses, and I would like to ask, how many representatives have the farmers of this country got in the Senate? The agriculturists number at least 52 per cent of the whole of Canada, but how many representatives of agriculture can you find in that chamber? How many working men can be found in the Senate to-day? Surely they have a right to be represented there; surely the farmers have a right to be represented there. If you will go over the list, you will find that the great majority of the men comprising the Senate are lawyers. I have nothing to say against the lawyers; they have a right to be represented there just as much as anybody else, if we are going to have a chamber of that kind; but if we are going to have representatives of the people in that chamber we have a right to see that our representatives are there. I have before me a tabulation based upon the Parliamentary Guide and the Annual Canadian Financial Review, showing the directorships which members of the Senate hold. This tabulation shows that Senators hold 266 directorships in various companies. This may seem to show that they are representative business men, but I contend that it shows also that the interests of these companies and of the great industries of this country are very particularly represented in the second chamber, and if you want any proof of that, without mentioning any names I can pick at random the directorships that some of these men hold. Take Mr. A., for instance who according to the Parliamentary Guide is a Conservative. He is a director in the following companies: Fire Insurance Company of Canada; North Railway Company; Dominion Steel Corporation; Atlantic Sugar Refinery; Canada Car & Foundry Company, Limited; Ames Holden, Limited; The Insurance Company of Canada; Mount Royal Hotel Company; Capital Trust Company; Dominion Coal Company; Nova Scotia Steel & Coal Company; Eastern Car Company; Acadia Coal Company, Limited. This one individual, Mr. A, a representative of the people, holds thirteen directorships; so I think these companies are ably represented in the Senate. I say that it would be most difficult so long as we have that type of man in the Senate to pass bills affecting any of these interests.

Here is another member of the Senate, Mr. B, a Liberal. He is a director in the following companies: Canada Cement Company; British Empire Steel Corporation; Reliance Insurance Company of Canada; Canada Steamships Company. Here is another, Mr. C, a Conservative, who is a director in the following companies: Rhodes Curry, Company; Canada Car & Foundry Company; Canadian Steel Foundries, Limited; The Pratt & Lackworth Company, Limited; Canadian Land Company; Bank of Nova Scotia; Canadian Light & Power Company; Canadian Accident & Fire Insurance Company; Cuban Canadian Sugar Company; Montreal Trust Company; Montreal Tramways & Power Company; Travellers Life Association of Canada. What I want to make known to the Canadian people is this, that these men who have been appointed to the Senate by both Liberal and Conservative governments are men who are held in high esteem necessarily by these great companies, by the capitalistic class of Canada, and how can you expect that when any democratic government wishes to bring forward legislation for the well being of the Canadian common people that these men will not nullify it? You cannot expect anything else. I do not wish to read this list, but I would like to place it on Hansard.

The list referred to is as follows:

Mr. D. Liberal, director of the following companies: M. J. O'Brien Ltd.; Delora Smelting & Refining Co.; Great Lakes Dredging Co. Ltd.; Capital Trust Co.; Canada Gulf & Terminal Ry.; Missouri-Cobalt Co.; Bank of Nova Scotia; Yellowhead Coal Co.; O'Brien Mine C; Miller, Lake, O'Brien Mine Ltd.; Boundary Investments Ltd.; Canada Paperboard Co. Ltd.; Eastern Security Co.; Inter-Provincial Flour Mills Ltd.; Renfrew Machinery Co. Ltd.; Peabody, Houghton & Co.; Herron Lumber Co.

Mr. E. Conservative, director of the following companies: Montmorency & Charlevoix Ry.; Webster Steamship Co.; Can. Import Co.; St. Lawrence Stevedoring Co.; Holt, Renfrew & Co.; Can. Salvage Association; Can. Fur Auction Sales Co. Ltd.; Quebec Apartment House Co.; Nova Scotia Steel & Coal Co.; Montreal Tramways Co.; Goodwins Ltd.; St. Lawrence Sugar Refineries Co.; Travellers Life Assur. Co.; Dominion Manufacturers Ltd.; Hudson Bay Knitting Co.; British Traders Insurance Co.; Union Insurance Society of Canton; Dominion Flour Mills Ltd.; International Trading Co.; Bankers Trust; Dryden Paper Co. Ltd.; Mount Royal Hotel Co.

Mr. F. Conservative, director of the following companies: Montreal Gazette Printing Co.; Steel Co. of Canada; Hamilton Iron & Steel Co. Ltd.; Montreal Rolling Mills Co.; Canada Screw Co. Ltd.; Dominion Wire Manufacturing, Co. Ltd.; Canada Bolt & Nut Co. Ltd.; United Financial Corp.; Montreal Trust Co.; Mount Royal Hotel Co.; Canada Steamship Lines Ltd.; Northern Navigation Co. Ltd.; Inter-Continental Transport Services Ltd.; Tide Water Shipbuilders Ltd.; Davis Shipbuilding & Repairing Co. Ltd.

Mr. G, Liberal, director of the following companies: Boivin Wilson & Co.; Bank of Hochelaga; Canada Publishing Co.; Mount Royal Assur. Co.; The National City Co. Ltd.; Montreal Tramway & Power Co. Saguenay Pulp & Power Co. Ltd.; Windsor Hotel Co.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Can the hon. member give us any example of legislation in the interests of the people that has been rejected by the Senate?

Mr. LEWIS: I have before me 150 measures that have been nullified by the Senate, and if you would like, I would place these on Hansard too.

The statement is as follows:

An Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Act, 1907. (Commons declined to accept Senate amendments).

In conclusion, I cannot see how there can be any logical reason for maintaining a second chamber to nullify the wishes of the Canadian people as expressed through men whom they have sent to parliament to put their wishes into effect. It is illogical, and any reforms we may advocate and try to bring into effect will only result in further dissatisfaction so long as the Senate is constituted as it is. I believe the time must come when, if democracy is to prevail, you must trust the people to legislate. It is the only wise thing to do, and if you say the Canadian people are not intelligent enough or are not educated enough to say what they want, then the quicker we get down and demand that they become educated, and the sooner we admit no one into this country who is not intelligent, the quicker we shall see the wishes of the people expressed in legislation that will be for the good of the whole country.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the question at present under consideration is most worthy of our attention. For a number of years past the question of Senate reform has been discussed, however, up to now nothing has been done to reform this institution which dates back to 1867, year of the Confederation.

The present government has understood and is fully aware that nothing can be done without first consulting the provinces which are contracting parties to the British North America Act. Therefore, nothing can be accomplished without their consent. This is why the Speech from the Throne mentions that the House will in the course of this session be called upon to sanction the meeting of a conference between the Dominion and provincial governments in order to consider the opportunity of amending the constitution of the Senate. Without considering the chances of success of such a conference, I think, Mr. Speaker, it is the only consistent course for us to follow. I shall not enter into the arguments for and against the project of the reform of the Senate which have been presented to this House, but I shall take the liberty of briefly expressing my personal views which are shared by a very large majority of my electors as well as those of my province. These views are that we should not interfere with the confederation pact and, in particular, the constitution of the Senate that we hold as the guardian of our rights.

I shall, therefore, for the above reasons vote for the subamendment, against the amendment and resolution.

The intention of the government is so clearly expressed in the Speech from the Throne that it seems to me that it should have been understood and the resolution should not have given rise to such a debate in the House. True, such a subject affords a splendid opportunity to some of our able debaters, but has very little economic interest for the country at large.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): In the Senate as at present constituted there are 24 members representing Ontario, 24 representing Quebec, 10 representing New Brunswick, 10 representing Nova Scotia, 4 representing Prince Edward Island, and 6 each for the four western provinces, or 96 in all. Nine millions of Canadians have the same number of senators as one hundred and ten millions of Americans. The members of our Senate are selected by the government of Canada really as a reward for partisan services; they are not elected at all by the provinces they purport to represent. And furthermore—

Mr. MARTELL: What better services could a man be appointed for than for partisan services in respect of either of the old political parties, especially when they have the endorsation of their constituencies?

Mr. EVANS: If the hon. gentleman will keep his seat and pay attention I think I will answer every question he may put. I repeat, all our senators are selected by the government of Canada as a reward for partisan services, and not at all by the provinces they purport to represent. Furthermore appointees must be acceptable to members of the government representing Ontario and Quebec which provinces to-day hold half the veto power of the whole Dominion. The senators are all appointed for life. True they may resign but this is not very likely. The purpose of the Senate was primarily to protect the weaker provinces by preventing hasty legislation, and to temper the national action with national caution. That it has failed in this purpose is seen in the fact that it has tempered national action with partisan caution. That the Senate has failed to protect the weaker provinces is seen in the fact that it is controlled by the two major provinces of the Dominion, Ontario and Quebec, by the method of appointment, and also by the excessive representation of these two provinces. The excessive representation of Ontario and Quebec has, up to this time, served no legitimate purpose and is useless for any other purpose than domination. The Senate has maintained its domination of Canada by Ontario and Quebec, in conjunction with the domination by these two provinces in the House of Commons since confederation. This domination has made these two old provinces—or the old union of Ontario and Quebec—think consciously and sub-consciously of Canada in terms of two provinces only. It has really prevented these provinces from realizing the viewpoint of the other provinces. It has made them incapable of taking an ocean to ocean viewpoint of this Dominion, it has imbued them with an unwillingness to conciliate and compromise, and they are ever ready to use their power to dominate. These evidences of political unfitness are specially characteristic of the citizens of Montreal and Toronto, and the effect this has had upon the policies of Canada is that it has made them sectional rather than national. It has evolved a national policy based on the establishment of an industrial area within Ontario and Quebec, unique among industrial areas in that it is not founded on iron, or steel, or coal, it has imposed tariff restrictions and custom regulations on the whole of Canada for its own benefit, almostly exclusively for the advantage of this one industrial area. It has imposed or prompted the imposition of transportation rates both by rail and water, rates well calculated to prevent the establishment of industrial areas in other parts of the Dominion where coal and iron are abundant. It has evolved a domestic policy based on the appropriation of the public domain of the unborn provinces, and which has resulted in the disposition of very large areas of this public domain as public lands for Dominion purposes on the false assumption that these western areas were purchased and annexed by the Dominion instead of being admitted into the union of Canadian provinces. I refer to Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territory. In pursuance of that domestic policy the balance of confederation has been disturbed by increasing the area of the two major provinces out of all proportion, and has delivered to them for their sole use and benefit the public domain within the areas included by the extension of their boundaries.

It twice goaded the native inhabitants of Rupert's Land into rebellion as a protest against domination; and by persistent disallowance of provincial railway charters and prevention of railway competition all but precipitated an armed conflict at Fort Whyte in Manitoba in the early eighties. From the Atlantic to the Pacific disunion has resulted from the domestic policy of subordinating all other interests to those of the dominating provinces, a policy which has so recently found aggravating expression in preventing extension of branch lines of the Canadian National railway to productive areas lacking transportation; and in preventing competitive transportation routes by way of the Panama canal and Hudson bay.

What is the remedy? Real Senate reform: the replacement of the present Senate by one in which every province, large or small, will be represented on the floor of the Senate by the same number of senators, preferably not more than five or six for each province. This is no new idea. It has been the basis of representation in the Senate of the United States since 1789. It is the basis of Senate representation in Australia and South Africa except as to representation of the natives in South Africa. It is the system adopted by all or nearly all nations having federal government except our own, and it is enunciated and but partially applied in our constitution. Sir Wilfred Laurier suggested this reform in the parliamentary sessions of 1906, 1908 and 1909. On both occasions he was discussing as premier, certain resolutions before the House of Commons relating to Senate abolition and Senate reform. In 1906 this great statesman said, among other things:

> A second chamber seems to me absolutely necessary for two reasons. It is supposed to be a check on hasty legislation, but one consideration which to my mind is absolutely conclusive and paramount is that under our system, composed of federal units, a second chamber is an absolutely necessary safeguard against a possible invasion of the rights of the smaller provinces. But if we are to have reform, I would not be averse to adopting the system of our neighbours and have each province represented by an equal number of members, whether that province be large or small.

In the session of 1907-08 Sir Wilfrid Laurier is reported by Hansard, page 1570, as having said:

> In the United States Senate, the state of New York has two members, and the state of Rhode Island has also two members, so that while in the House of Representatives each state speaks according to the numerical strength of its population—

Thirty-six against two.

—in the Senate each state has an equal voice.

He further states:

> If I had to offer a reform it would be that all the provinces should be represented by an equal number of senators. There are nine provinces, and if each province were represented by, let us say six senators, that would give us a senate of fifty-four members, which would be a pretty strong body, a body sufficiently large and not cumbersome.

He further said:

> I would like to ask the House to consider this proposition: that the number of senators ought to be limited to a fixed number, and that each province should be represented in the Senate by an equal number of senators. I mentioned six, but that is arbitrary; it may be five or it may be seven, or it may be eight, or it may be ten; I do not care which for the present moment. But what I would insist on is that each province should be represented by an equal number of senators.

He said further:

> Beyond this and the suggestion that the appointment should not be for life but for a limited period I would not be prepared to go.

That Sir Wilfrid did not go the length we thought he was prepared to go in Senate reform is due to the fact that it would have involved a change conferring on the provinces that right to equal Senate representation for which they had not asked, but for which they have a perfect right to ask. Canada is a federal union of nine provinces, legalized by the British North America Act of 1867. The object of the act was neither to weld the provinces into one nor to subordinate provincial governments to a central authority. It was to create a federal government in which all should be represented, such government to be entrusted with the exclusive administration of affairs within its own jurisdiction. The provinces were to have a common interest, each retaining its independence and autonomy, and these independent autonomous provinces have a right to seek changes in the constitution of that branch of the Parliament of Canada composed exclusively of persons appointed to represent them. Amendments have been made to the British North America Act on the address of the Dominion parliament without the formally expressed consent of the provinces or even of a majority of them. One of these amendments violated a fundamental provision of the federation compact, upon which the British North America Act is based, namely that providing for representation by population in the House of Commons. During the war the Conservative government did secure such an amendment without the formally expressed consent of the provinces. This establishes a precedent that amendments may be made without the formally expressed consent of any of the provinces. It also establishes a precedent that fundamental provisions of the confederation compact may be violated on motion of a parliament of Canada willing to be guilty of a breach of faith; provided the governments of the provinces again wilfully or negligently fail to protest. But that does not preclude their formally expressing consent or protest. In respect of any constitutional amendment not involving a change in any of the fundamental provisions of the confederation compact, an address from a majority of the provinces asking for such change would weigh; but if a fundamental provision of that compact were involved, addresses from all the provinces would be necessary, or at least the protest of any province should be sufficient to prevent the amendment. By a fundamental provision of the confederation compact I mean that the union of the provinces was voluntary. Those provinces who did not express a desire to be federally united into one dominion were not included until they expressed that desire. Newfoundland is not yet included. Fundamental provisions are those, the inclusion of which in the compact was necessary to evoke a desire in any one or more provinces to be federally united with the others. That there should be a Senate was a fundamental provision of the confederation compact. Unanimous consent is necessary to its abolition.

The preponderant representation of Ontario and Quebec in the House of Commons would perpetuate their domination of Canada and make real national union forever impossible. The procedure necessary to reform the Senate requires addresses to the Imperial parliament from the House of Commons and from a majority of the provincial legislative assemblies, all of which being elective have an inherent right to speak for the people and provinces they represent. No address to the Senate is necessary. They being non-elective the Senate has no inherent right to speak for either the provinces as provinces nor for the citizens of Canada as citizens of Canada. It has a right to address the Imperial parliament independently of the House of Commons even as the British House of Commons and the House of Lords have from time to time addressed His Majesty quite independently of each other. After all the Senate is a part of the Parliament of Canada. As such it has had delegated to it by the British North America Act power to do certain legislative acts, but delegated powers must be construed strictly and addressing the Imperial parliament either in prayer or protest is not a legislative act. Anyone may do it. Amendments to the British North America Act are not amendments to an act of the Parliament of Canada where the consent of the Senate is necessary.

The constitution of Canada is the legal expression of the will of its people as to their machinery of government and its operation, and to allege that the consent of an irresponsible body in no sense representative is necessary to their deposition is to allege that constitutional change cannot be made constitutionally should the people of Canada so will. The fact that they have been appointed for life does not alter the right of the people to change their tenure of office. The tenure of office of other servants of Canada has been shortened, ostensibly in the public interest with the tacit approval of the Senate, and a precedent well established. Consent of the Senate is not necessary. The Imperial parliament will follow its time-honoured policy of bestowing on the dominions, whose equal status it acknowledges, all the powers they ask for. Failure to recognize the expressed will of the people of Canada as to its machinery of government, or an attempt to make legalization conditional on the continuance of the present Senate in office, would raise a much larger issue than that of Senate reform. When Canada sees fit to cease expending any portion of its revenue in payment of sessional indemnities to appointed senators no British parliament will intervene. Constitutional fictions to the contrary notwithstanding, the fact is that the Briton abroad is not in Canada a subject of the Briton at home. The senators vigorously contend that the Senate cannot be reformed without their consent, but in doing so they are alleging that the Senate cannot be reformed except by revolution.

The reformed Senate should be chosen by proportional representation for fixed terms, not subject to dissolution, with the whole province as the constituency. They should be elected for some fixed period, not less than seven and not more than ten years. Why proportional representation? Proportional representation ensures the representation of minorities, and a Senate so elected will be more considerate of the rights of minorities than one elected by majority vote in single constituencies. It is desirable that it should be, and proportional representation will ensure it. Should each province elect six senators any minority numbering one-sixth of the population would be sure of representation. If partisanship be discriminated against by making senators ineligible for cabinet positions, election by proportional representation should fill the Senate with well assorted senators specially qualified to temper national action with national caution and to conciliate the conflicting interests of the provinces. The very existence of a real federal Senate would itself obviate the need for much conciliation and compromise.

Unlike the House of Commons the votes and proceedings of a real federal Senate will not be an accurate measure of its functioning. Sponsors of bills will inevitably consider before introducing them, their chances to pass the Senate on their merits.

Other unnamed "important particulars" are to be submitted to the conference. The omission from the British North America Act, of categorical mention of those provisions of the act which were fundamental to the confederation compact, should be supplied as one of the next amendments. So soon as, but not before, a Privy Council decision has determined whether the public domain in the three prairie provinces is vested in the crown in the right of the provinces or in the right of the Dominion; so soon as a real federal Senate is established, and provisions have been added to the British North America Act specifying what provisions of our constitution require unanimous consent for their amendment; and so soon as the act shall have had its deadwood eliminated and its provisions consolidated, provision should be made for the future amendment of our constitution. This must be made subject to the specified fundamental conditions of the confederation compact, but not before the aforesaid conditions shall have been fulfilled. Those provinces whose minority rights and privileges are incorporated in the British North America Act very naturally require assurance that these rights and privileges shall not be abrogated by a parliamentary majority in Canada. The underprivileged provinces may very properly demand that, before Canada is empowered to amend her own constitution, there shall be no overprivileged and no underprivileged provinces in Canada. The prairie provinces which believe and know that their public domain has been illegally appropriated by the Dominion, naturally do not intend to consent to Canada's being empowered to amend her own constitution until it shall have become impossible for a Canadian parliamentary majority to confirm Canada's spoliation of the public domain within their respective borders. Unless and until these matters are settled, the conferring on Canada of power to amend her own constitution, will only jeopardize that national unity so necessary to the progress and prosperity of Canada. We must do first things first.

What then is the conclusion of the whole matter? That the British North America Act should be amended and consolidated, and that as amended and consolidated it should provide a categorical declaration as to those fundamental provisions of the act which shall not be amendable without the unanimous consent of the provinces. We need real Senate reform, and amendment thereafter by the Parliament of Canada, and for deferring the coming into force of the provision empowering the Dominion parliament to amend the constitution until the respective rights of the Crown, in the right of the provinces, and in the right of the Dominion, to the public domain of the prairie provinces, shall have been determined by the legal tribunal of last resort.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): The question of Senate reform is about as old as confederation. There have been in this country very many people, among them some very eminent statesmen, who during their public and political careers have stood for Senate reform, and the advocates of this reform have been agitating from 1861 up to the present time. But so far there has been no reform of the Senate, and in my opinion it will be some years yet before there will be any such reform of great importance. And that is due entirely to our constitution as it stands. A great many objections are offered to the present constitution of the Senate. Some of them may be well founded while others are not, but the principal objection as I see it is that the Senate is not in touch with the public pulse, it is not in touch with public opinion, and therefore its decisions on legislation received from the House of Commons is not at all times according to public opinion. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who think that sometimes even public opinion is astray, and that although a popular outburst may for the time being carry the Commons off its feet, that opinion may not be founded on mature consideration and cool judgment of the question at issue.

I have heard it said to-day by hon. gentlemen, who no doubt have given this question serious consideration, that the Senate should be abolished, indeed, that it should never have been in existence. Well, I can point to two decisions of the Senate which, I think, have fully justified its creation. May I refer to the gold rush to the Yukon? At that time the public were carried off their feet, they were amazed at the marvellous gold discoveries in that great northern country, but they did not consider for a moment how long those discoveries were going to continue. Insistent demands were made upon the Liberal government of the day for the building of a railway into the Yukon at a cost of millions of dollars, and public opinion was solidly behind those demands. The great statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was Prime Minister, and a measure for the building of the railway passed this House with very few dissenting votes; but fortunately the Senate killed it. I think by that act alone the Senate fully justified its existence, for undoubtedly by the course they took they demonstrated that they had greater vision than those who at that time thought they were representing public opinion. On that occasion we had a Liberal House of Commons and a Conservative Senate. I do not say that the Senate killed the Yukon railway bill because it came from a Liberal government, for this would be tantamount to saying that any bill originating in this House might be thrown out by the Senate to gain a political advantage. That is not the history of the Senate in its attitude towards legislation initiated in this chamber. Again, in 1913-14 the Senate—then Liberal—threw out a measure introduced by the Conservative government. I happened to be a member of this House in those days. I presume, Mr. Speaker, that never in the history of this parliament was there a greater debate than that which became known as the naval debate, when politics was at fever heat. The Conservative government took the position that this country should make a monetary contribution to augment the Imperial navy; the opposition took the stand that we could best help the imperial authorities by organizing a Canadian navy. The bill passed the House of Commons, but the Senate killed it. There again I say the Senate justified its existence.

The speech of my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) was a very fair presentation of the constitutional position respecting the Senate; but I do not agree with him that the Senate is undemocratic. The ideals of democracy, of course, have never been realized in this or any other country; but nowhere in the wide world has democracy achieved a greater practical success than in the British Empire. In this Dominion we have democracy in its truest form, and I am prepared to stand for a constitution which has weathered the storms of political crises and reached its present well-ordered development—the constitution of Great Britain. Some of the greatest statesmen of the world have helped in the development of that constitution which has made England supreme commercially and politically throughout the entire world. If democracy has been a failure, it has been so in those countries which did not have such safeguards as the House of Lords of England and the Senate of Canada. Certain hon. gentlemen referred to some of the European states before the war and to some of those created after the war where they had no second chambers. Well, when it comes to making a choice between the constitution of some of the European countries with unspeakable names and the constitution of Canada, I am for our constitution.

Some speakers on the other side, my Progressive friends I think, urged that the Senate does not feel the public pulse, that it is out of touch with public opinion. Are we so childish in this House, Sir, as to think that by our speeches and our votes we are always truly representing public opinion? For example, next year, the year after, or ten years hence, a minority in this House may actually be representing the majority of the people. Can it be said that under those circumstances the House of Commons is responsive to public opinion? No. I venture the statement that very often in this House we vote against what we well know to be public opinion in order to satisfy our own conscience—those of us who have any; I hope we all have. After all, public opinion at times is just as mistaken as anything else in this world. I venture to say that on some of the questions that have been debated and voted decided in this House for the past twenty or twenty-five years, very often a private ballot would have resulted in those questions being negatived which were answered in the affirmative. I think that if it had been possible to have had a private ballot on some of the public questions which have been debated and voted on in this House, and which appeared to have public opinion behind them, it would have been a revelation—perhaps not so much to this House as to the country.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would that be responsible government?

Mr. CARROLL: Oh, responsible government may be a myth. There are different ways of saying what is responsible government. Responsible government has been employed in the past in such a way as to make public opinion. We have responsible government, I say, in this country and in Great Britain on nearly as well developed a basis as we can get it; but like all other earthly institutions, governments—democratic, monarchical, communist or otherwise—make mistakes. If I were to point to the country which made greater progress in a short time than any other I would name the country which for four hundred years was ruled entirely by a senate. Rome became mistress of the world under a senate. She did have the happy faculty, of course, of getting the very best men—statesmen, generals, ambassadors, consular agents; these were the people who made the laws and guided the destinies of Rome. From a mere municipality she grew to be mistress of the world; there was really no civilization outside of Rome. So much for what a senate has done for one country.

Mr. IRVINE: Does my hon. friend mean to say that Rome fell under a senate?

Mr. CARROLL: No; I said Rome became great under a senate. She might have become great under any other form of government, but I could cite instances to my hon. friend of countries which have fallen flatter than Rome, and that under a supposedly ideal democracy.

Mr. IRVINE: Does my hon. friend mean to say we have irresponsible government now?

Mr. CARROLL: I know some people who are trying to carry on the government of this country—not perhaps, in the inner circles—who are not very responsible.

Mr. IRVINE: Is the hon. member speaking personally?

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend may take it to himself if he wishes; or I may take it to myself. I know that my hon. friend has given votes in this House which he would not have given if he had his finger on the pulse of public opinion and was guided by its indications. So have I, and so, I daresay, has every man who has ever held a seat in this House.

Mr. IRVINE: I will have to protest against that. The hon. member may confess his own faults, but he must not confess mine. I will do that for myself.

Mr. CARROLL: My life, I am afraid, would be too short to admit my undertaking that stupendous task.

Now, one of the cure-alls for the defects of the Senate is alleged to be the appointment of our senators by the provincial legislatures. Well, from what body would they appoint them? What would prevent our legislatures from appointing partisans to the Senate? There is no provincial government that is not more or less partisan, and if a vacancy occurred in the Senate the provincial government would appoint, I have no doubt, a partisan supporter. Would the mere fact that the government or the legislature of a province appointed a senator make him non-partisan? Would it raise him above the ordinary man we find in the Senate to-day? I do not see how it could. Under our present system senators are appointed by the Governor in Council, and the appointment must be made from the province where the vacancy occurs. It is part of our constitution that the senator must have his residence in the province he represents. By what manipulation of imagination can one conclude that a man would make a better senator from Ontario, from Quebec or from any other province simply because he was appointed by the provincial legislature or the provincial government rather than by the Governor-General-in-Council?

Another reason offered by an hon. member for the abolition of the Senate is that the Senate was designed for the protection of minorities, and he says he has failed in his reading to come across any case in which the interests of the minorities in this country were protected by that body. Well, I have not gone into that question, but I have faith enough in humanity, faith enough in even the present Senate, faith enough in this country from having read its history, political and otherwise, to come to the conclusion that we have not had and will not have a Senate which would deliberately attempt to dominate minorities in such a way to as take away from them any of their rights.

Another hon. gentleman contended that provincial rights had not been properly adjusted and protected, and in this respect he attributed fault to the Senate. If my hearing served me rightly, I think he urged that the western provinces—and I am not entering upon a discussion of this question; I will leave it to the western members to discuss it and decide it for themselves—would have had control of their natural resources were it not for the Senate. I may have misunderstood the hon. member, but I do not know that when the provinces were carved in the great west any senate did anything to prevent the people of those provinces from having their natural resources.

Mr. LEWIS: It was I who made that suggestion, but not in the way the hon. member has put it. The argument was raised that the Senate had been designed to safeguard the interests of the provinces, and I said that they had failed to safeguard those interests when the bill creating the provinces went through.

Mr. CARROLL: Well, by twice as much did the people who represented western public opinion at that time fail to respond to the needs of the provinces which were being formed. Moreover, there were a large number of western people in this House at that time. But there were no western provinces until provision for them was made, therefore there were no provincial rights to protect, speaking of provincial rights in the sense of those supposed to be protected under the terms of the British North America Act.

Mr. LEWIS: Was it not necessary to change the British North America Act in order to withhold from the newly formed western provinces the right to control their own natural resources?

Mr. CARROLL: If that is so I would point it out to those who are so very anxious to make it easy to amend the British America Act.

One of the hon. members who spoke on this question urged that there was too large a representation in the Senate, and I think the same hon. member went on to say that all provinces should be equally represented in that body. I do not argue against that principle, but I would point out that there are insurmountable difficulties in the way of its adoption. We are told on the best of legal authority that before we can amend the British North America Act we must have the consent of all the provinces. Do you think that Quebec or Ontario, with their larger populations, would gracefully submit to Prince Edward Island having the same number of representatives in the Senate as they did?

Mr. LEWIS: I certainly do not, but just the same I think Nova Scotia would be in a much better position to-day if she had equal representation in the Senate.

Mr. CARROLL: She might have a preponderance of right on her side. I am not saying anything with respect to Nova Scotia at the moment, but I simply warn my western friends of this: It may not come in our generation, but those of us who know anything about the west will have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that before very many decades the bulk of our population will be west of lake Superior, and then hon. gentlemen from the west who to-day say they have not sufficient representation in the Senate may have another song to sing.

Mr. LEWIS: By that time I hope the Senate will be abolished.

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend has made several assertions. First, he said he wanted the Senate abolished; then he said it could not be abolished in view of a learned opinion given by the hon. member of Hants (Mr. Martell). Then he went on to tell us how the Senate might be reformed in this, that and the other respect. Suppose the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate to-day from the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba,—if any have spoken from Manitoba—suppose they represented the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta and Manitoba; what a nice fix we would be in then! They would undertake to fix the constitution of the Senate, to reform it and do other things. Would there be any unity amongst them? I am simply pointing out the difficulties we will have under our constitution in amending the Senate in any particular.

The mover of this resolution, who has given the subject serious study and is a good sound lawyer, has made a splendid presentation of his case. He did what every man should do when he asks that a change in our constitution be made; he indicated what he thought that change should be; but hon. gentlemen who followed him, the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis), the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans), and other hon. gentlemen have not followed him in that respect. It simply goes to show that the way set out in the Speech from the Throne is the only way by which we can arrive at any conclusion as to what amendments the people as a whole or the provinces as a whole are prepared to make. There is very little use in our discussing the question in this House in an academic way. We are going to arrive at no unanimous conclusion because the reforms which we have in our minds are so numerous and so varied that they will not be accepted by one-third of the other members of this House. I believe that every member of this House has some ideal in his mind. Ideals are splendid things to have, but they are difficult to bring into effect. I do not think you could get ten members of this House who would sit down and come to a unanimous conclusion as to what reforms of the Senate they would undertake in order to improve it. That is going to be just our difficulty when we get the representatives of all the provinces together. We talk of public opinion, but whom are we going to get from the provinces to represent public opinion? Does the government of a province represent public opinion in that province? Maybe so, maybe not. Does a provincial government which got its mandate four or five years ago on the question of, say, prohibition—I mention that just for the sake of illustration, I am not sneering at it in any way—would that government represent public opinion in its province to-day on the question of reforming the Senate? This question is far more serious I believe than any person who has not given it serious thought conceives. Let us take the province of Nova Scotia, for example. Supppose there was a conference held at Ottawa to-morrow on the question of Senate reform. The government of Nova Scotia has been in power for five years the next 10th of July. Will anyone say that the government of Nova Scotia could come up here and would fairly represent the people of that province on Senate reform when they say: This is what we think should be done. They might, and they might not, be representing public opinion in that province; I would rather think they would not be representing it, after being four or five years in power without making an appeal to the people of that province.

My own idea is that if we are going to get any Senate reform, we must have a definite and concrete proposal to place before the people of the various provinces, and I think that if we will attempt to live up to our ideals of what a democracy should be, the question should be presented to the people by means of a plebiscite. I would, as a matter of fact, ask the Dominion and provincial governments to set aside a sum of money for the purpose of placing before the people of this country from the constituency of Cape Breton South all the way across the country to Vancouver the pros and cons of the definite and concrete proposal which should be submitted to them. In that way, and in that way only, can you ascertain what public opinion is in this country on the question of Senate reform.

According to the Speech from the Throne, perhaps next May or perhaps the middle of June, there will be a conference of provincial premiers, probably accompanied by their provincial secretaries and attorneys general, and possibly by their whole cabinets, held here at Ottawa. They may decide on some concrete proposition. But will any gentleman in this House dare to say that in that they will be representing public opinion in this country? I say no, decidedly not, for the very good reason that they do not know what public opinion is on this question, and therefore cannot represent it, even though they might stumble into the way of doing what the people think should be done.

Mr. MARTELL: Supposing the question was submitted in a plebiscite, and one province voted in favour of the retention of the Senate and the others against; what would be the outcome?

Mr. CARROLL: The outcome would be, if my hon. friend is right in the law he gave us in his address the other day, that the Parliament of Great Britain would not grant us a change in our constitution by which we could make effective the reform that the majority of the provinces had voted for. That is why I say we are going to be up against a proposition that is far more difficult, far more momentous than we think, perhaps even than the government itself thinks, though I presume they have given this matter serious study.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the question were submitted to the people in a plebiscite, and the people of a province should not vote in harmony with the position taken by the government of that province, where would we be then?

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. member for Hants asked me the same question in a different way. I say that the Imperial parliament would not consent to the amending of our constitution if any one of the provinces said no to the concrete proposal put before it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the hon. gentleman hardly caught my question. I said that supposing within the bounds of one province, in carrying out the plebiscite he suggests, the people should vote in contradiction to the expressed will of the government of that province; which should prevail, the plebiscite or the will of the government?

Mr. CARROLL: If a provincial government consented to the plebiscite and there was a strong majority one way or the other I would say that that government would not dare to enter the conference and say that notwithstanding the popular vote it would take another course.

Mr. CALDWELL: How about the temperance act in Ontario?

Mr. CARROLL: I have heard that name before.

Mr. GRAHAM: We can compromise on 4.4.

Mr. CARROLL: I am not going to discuss the Ontario Temperance Act in connection with our constitution.

Mr. CALDWELL: I was referring to the plebiscite there, and the action of the government, not to the merits of the Ontario Temperance Act.

Mr. CARROLL: That is a proper question but I am not going to say anything about it.

Mr. MARTELL: That has nothing to do with amending the British North America Act.

Mr. CARROLL: If the Premier of Ontario did wrong he will be punished. I am not saying that he did wrong. I think, after reading the speech which he made in the legislature of Ontario the other day, that he is pretty nearly right. However I am not to be led away into a discussion on a question of that kind. I am discussing a concrete proposition as to the reform of the Senate. If we reform the Senate we must amend our constitution, and I am pointing out some obstacles in the way of that amendment.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would the hon. gentleman have any Senate reform?

Mr. CARROLL: I would not have very much. I was going to take that point up later. I was dealing with propositions which have emanated from other hon. members, and I was arguing the point that the only way in which we can get the proper pulse of the people of this country on the reform of the Senate, or any other change in our constitution, is by a plebiscite, in view of the fact that we may have governments that should have gone to the country long ago and do not at present represent popular opinion. I am not mentioning any particular government. I referred to the government of Nova Scotia because it has been the longest in power. I hope it represents public opinion in that province, but it cannot say that it represents public opinion on a question which has never been submitted to the electors of the province, and if we are going to live in accordance with democratic institutions in Canada such a question as this should be submitted to the people.

I was asked the question what amendments I would suggest, and I replied very few. I am not one of those who think that because the Senate should, forsooth, use its constitutional veto and turn down legislation which has been sent to it by this House, we should therefore reform the upper chamber. I think the members of that body have as much brains, as much judgment, and as much good sense as the members of this House, and they can focus their views on any particular question with just as much acuteness and intelligence as we can. I have been at some of the Senate committee meetings occasionally and have been impressed by that fact. I say this because the Senate is spoken of sometimes as a body of old, worn out politicians. I venture that statement and I say it boldly—and it is no insult to the members of the Commons to make the statement. In any event such a statement does not justify making constitutional changes in the Senate.

Mr. MARTELL: Is my hon. friend going to the Senate?

Mr. CARROLL: I am afraid that I will never have the financial qualifications to get into the Senate. If there was a Senate vacancy to-day and the Prime Minister and his government should come to me at midnight and ask me to take a seat in the upper chamber unfortunately I could not do so, because I have not the necessary financial qualifications; I have too many mortgages attached to my little home. Therefore I am not looking for a Senate position for the next few years to come. However, that is by the way.

Some hon. members say we should reform the Senate because it is partisan. Do the gentlemen who advance that statement consider for a moment how they are going to render the Senate non-partisan? In British countries we have had partisan government for generation on generation, and I say on the whole we have been fairly well governed. As I said a few moments ago the British Empire has progressed under partisan government through the ages, and is to-day as great in her strength and glory as she ever was. The United States has progressed under partisan government; so have all Anglo Saxon countries. They have all made mistakes but who in this world does not err. Point me out a man who has reached maturity and who has never made any mistakes in his life, and I will show you an individual who has never accomplished anything. There is only one way to avoid criticism, it is to do nothing, to say nothing and to be nothing. Criticism is indispensable. Governments, at times, should be criticized. It is a good thing to criticize, but when an hon. member says the Senate is partisan how is he going to make it otherwise? Would the Senate be rendered less partisan by appointing a few of the followers of my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke)? They would be Progressive partisans. Would the Senate be made less partisan by appointing followers of the gentleman who leads the labour forces of this country? I presume they would be partisan also. I have only to point out to those who say we should make the Senate non-partisan that there are partisans in the upper chamber to-day and will be for many generations in the future. To have it otherwise as things are would be an impossibility. I am not blaming our farmer friends for being partisan; they must be such, their very constitution requires them to be partisan.

Mr. MARTELL: Narrow-minded partisans.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not say they are narrow-minded partisans.

Mr. MARTELL: Well, of one class.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not say they are of one class either. I affirm that they are just as broad-minded as the Liberals or Conservatives in this House. Still they are partisan, the very nature of the constitution to which they give their adherence, makes them partisan; and if we to-day put six representatives from each of the prairie provinces in the Senate they would be Progressive partisans, and would look out, perhaps, more for their own friends than they would for persons of the Conservative or Liberal stripe of politics. I repeat I should like to get some concrete illustration of how hon. gentlemen are going to reform the Senate so as to make it non-partisan.

Miss MACPHAIL: Abolish it.

Mr. CARROLL: I am against the abolition of the Senate.

Miss MACPHAIL: The hon. gentleman asked for our opinion.

Mr. CARROLL: I am not finding fault with the hon. member. However, I am against the abolition of the upper chamber upon what appear to me to be very strong and sound grounds. The abolition of the Senate would perhaps result in greater difficulty than would be the case if the upper house were simply reformed. Another hon. gentleman states that we should abolish the Senate because it does not represent the national life of this country. That is a question which I have not studied. I presume the Senate should represent all phases of our national life—commercial, political, religious, and all the rest. However, I do not know what the present complexion of the Senate is in these respects, I have never gone into that phase of the matter. If such is the case it is not the fault of the constitution of the Senate but rather the fault of the persons who made the appointments to the Senate; and if the appointments were to be made in some other way I do not see that it would mend the situation in the least.

I would not have an elective Senate because if its members are partisans now they would then be twice as partisan. We have too many elections in this country at the present time under our present system, and we do not want to have any more.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARROLL: Some hon. members laugh, but I say that we are cursed with too many elections, civic, provincial and federal. I would not have an elective Senate; I would not amend the constitution from that viewpoint. I would have the Senate appointed as at present. I am now coming to the question of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean): Would I reform the Senate? Very little. I am no prophet, but I want to make a prophecy here to-night, and it is this: we will see no reform in the constitution of the Senate of this country for many years. We may have our conferences with provincial premiers and attorneys general. I am not criticizing the government for calling these conferences, because that is the first tangible step which has ever been taken in this country to arrive at a realization of what should be done towards the reform of the Senate. I prophesy to-night—it does not cost much—that when that conference meets here there will not be one concrete proposition on which the representatives of all the provinces of Canada will agree, and that will cause the breaking up of the conference.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And of the government perhaps.

Mr. CARROLL: No. I do not think the government is bound by the result of a conference. I think all the government has promised to do or is bound to do, after the Speech from the Throne, is to call a conference, and I think that is all that will be done. I hear applause from the other side of the House, but I would rather have it come from this side. When I say that is all they will do, I mean that is all they are capable of doing. I hear loud applause. What little things my friends will applaud. They will not give me a chance to finish a sentence. That is all they can do or are capable of doing, in so far as this conference is concerned.

Mr. HOEY: Why not have the conference bring down its proposal first and have that constitute a basis of negotiation?

Mr. CARROLL: I would say the government has already brought down its proposals, if we consider what the Prime Minister said in the closing days of last session.

Mr. HOEY: That was a year ago.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes. Does my hon. friend suggest that the Prime Minister should undertake to amend the constitution during vacation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did undertake it.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not think my hon. friend would consider he was capable of doing that; and I think he is capable of doing almost anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quite admit that he is capable of doing anything.

Mr. CARROLL: He cannot do anything that is impossible and to amend the constitution in vacation time is an impossibility.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not amending the constitution in vacation time that was suggested. What my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Hoey) suggested was that the undertaking given last session be made the subject of a government measure now for submission later at a conference. That seems a pretty good idea. What does the hon. member think of it?

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend has spent a long enough time in public life to know that that would be a clumsy way of doing business. It would be dictation to the provincial governments, and if there is anything the provincial governments resent, it is dictation from the federal government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it any more than a declaration of policy, without any suggestion of conference?

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Mr. CARROLL: The suggestion is that the conference should take place first. The first intimation given of the conference was in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. When the bald announcement was made I asked the Prime Minister if he had considered the matter, and asked the provinces what their will was, and he made no reply; on the contrary he went through the western provinces and never mentioned the conference at all, but declared to the whole country that he was going to reform the Senate.

Mr. CARROLL: I know the Prime Minister loves the leader of the opposition very much, but he does not love him well enough to tell him six months ahead of time what the government policy is going to be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I told him.

Mr. CARROLL: I doubt if he would follow the hon. gentleman's advice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has followed it—a year late.

Mr. CARROLL: That is the situation as I regard this matter. I believe there should be some suspensory power in the Senate. And why? Three, four, five or six bills are sent to the Senate in the dying days of parliament. They are thrown in there. They may have passed this House with little or no debate. They are sent over to the Senate, to be dealt with in one day, or perhaps two or three days. I think that is very unfair to the the Senate. I say that in a case of that kind the Senate should have what I would call a suspensory power, and should say to the Commons, "We do not know sufficient about this particular measure to say whether we will agree to it or not. We will suspend judgment for the present session of parliament and will take the matter up next year". If they do not deal with those bills the next year or the following year, say in two years, then I say there might be, in connection with that suspensory power, the right in the House of Commons to pass those bills, so long as they obtained the signature of the King's representative in this country. I think that is a fair proposition; it would be a different matter if some important question arose which should have full, free and fair discussion, and in regard to which the Senate was aware of all the intricacies and the pros and cons of the measure. In such a case I would say they should have the suspensory power. I can well understand why the Senate of this country would be loth—and we would all be loth—to vote on a subject without knowing anything about it.

I do not blame the Senate for their conduct in the past, because they refused to pass bills in the dyings days of the session when they could not give them fair consideration, nor will I criticize them adversely in the future for such conduct. Hon. gentlemen may tell me they have a right to remain here and give these measures consideration. Well, we know that some members in this House do not love them very much, and we know how very much less we would have loved them if, on the eighteenth day of July last, we were told by the Senate that they were going to remain in session another month to give further consideration to certain measures. I say the only solution is the suspensory power, coupled with the provision that there should be no return made of a bill suspended by the Senate unless they had taken some specific action on it, and if they failed for two years to take that specific action there should be some power in the House of Commons, with the signature of the Governor General, to make that bill law. That is as far as I would go in any reform as far as the Senate is concerned.

I have spoken a great deal longer than I intended to owing to a great many interruptions, for which I am not criticizing my hon. friends. I think the Senate as at present constituted is a very important part of our constitution, and in looking over the political history of this country, I do not know if there is any great reason for any reform of the Senate, either the one suggested or any other reform. I do not think they are made of the stuff which on all occasions would like to be opposed to public opinion in this country all the time.

I do not see why the House of Commons should assume an attitude of superiority and infallibility; why should we presume to say that we can never go wrong? Kings have been beheaded for having that obsession, and it is tantamount to taking up that position for this branch of parliament to say that, because it has passed a bill, in the belief that public opinion is behind it, it therefore follows that the Senate must be quite wrong if it takes a different view, and that in consequence the Senate should be reformed or put out of business or both. There is nothing faulty with the resolution of my hon. friend from West Calgary in so far as it asserts that steps should be taken to consider the reform of the Senate. Nor do I think that any hon. member in this House, whatever may be his opinion on the question of Senate reform, will vote against such a proposition. As to any amendment to the resolution, I must vote against the first one that has been proposed, inasmuch as it declares for the abolition of the Senate. The amendment states in effect that in the opinion of this House it is expedient that an address be presented to the King praying that the British North America Act be amended so as to provide that the Dominion of Canada, > —should either have the power to make the Senate of Canada an elective body, or to abolish it, as might be decided by the people in a plebiscite vote to be taken at the next Dominion general election.

I am opposed to that because I am opposed to the abolition of the Senate, and I am opposed to an elective Senate for the reasons I have given. I shall therefore be obliged to vote against the amendment.

Mr. FINDLAY: Is the hon. member opposed to obeying the will of the people?

Mr. CARROLL: No; when the will of the people is right I always bow to it.

Mr. FINDLAY: Well, the amendment simply asks that the people be consulted in the matter.

Mr. CARROLL: I am afraid that they might go wrong in this instance and vote for the abolition of the Senate.

Mr. FINDLAY: Then the hon. member would not obey the people?

Mr CARROLL: This is one of the cases where I would think the popular will had gone astray. Hon. gentlemen should not forget that we are all part of what the hon. member is pleased to include in the term "popular will". Now, there is no popular proposal which has ever been before any government that has not had some opposition; there has never been any question that has come up in this country, never any proposal, except in trivial matters, which has not been opposed by some section or other of the country. And surely my hon. friend will concede to an opposition, even though it be in a marked minority, the right to consider its own opinions right. That is entirely a matter for the conference to consider. I shall vote for the amendment to the amendment because I think it is in keeping with the only course we can pursue to-day, either in the matter of amending the constitution or reforming the Senate, and that is the calling of a conference. I do not say that it will necessarily amount to very much, but I do think that the members of this House are desirous of ascertaining what is, not the public opinion but the sound public opinion in this country on our constitution so far as it relates to the Senate.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): It would be rather amusing to fol low some of the arguments which have been advanced on this question if there were not other matters of very great public importance demanding the attention of parliament. We have heard a good deal during the present session about amending our constitution, and this talk is becoming so general that I do not feel like sitting in my place and allowing it to go unchallenged all the time. I question whether there has ever been a session of parliament during which so many hon. members have expressed dissatisfaction with the existing constitution as during the present session. I regret that this should be so. The constitution was framed by those who brought about confederation in Canada, at a very difficult period in the life of our country, and it seems to me that the mere fact that it has stood the test of time so far and so well is a great tribute to the wisdom and the foresight displayed by the Fathers of Confederation. I am inclined to think therefore that this passing wave of attack on the constitution will not amount to very much.

In the present instance I would point out how the viewpoint of some people changes according to the different positions in which they find themselves. It is apparently a very common and a favourite relaxation on the part of some when in opposition to attack the Senate and make every effort they can to concentrate the attention of the people to the institution, with a view to representing the constitution in this particular respect as being all wrong. I have heard this line of argument advanced quite often by gentlemen who were afterwards members of the upper chamber, and once they entered the sacred precincts of the Senate no more was heard of their objections to the constitution of that body as it stands.

Personally, I do not say that there are not times when the people have reason for finding some fault with the way in which the Senate is constituted; this has been the case in the past, and I suppose that occasions will arise in the future when the same thing may perhaps be felt. The method of appointment and the lack of care shown sometimes are doubtless responsible for this. I think that on the whole my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Carroll) has indicated that he does not attach very much importance to the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne relating to this question of Senate reform, nor to the resolution which was moved this afternoon by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw). And he does not anticipate that the government will take any action in the matter. So that the discussion is not going to bring about any very great results. I think myself that the resolution might very well have been ruled out of order by reason of the fact that it is beyond the jurisdiction of this House to deal with the matter therein suggested. But I am not going to argue that point.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond, however, touched upon a matter which I do not feel like allowing to pass without some comment. When asked about his personal ambitions, and whether he had any inclination or desire to qualify for the Senate, he replied that he had not the necessary financial qualifications for a senatorship. Let me point out, he has the financial qualification to be elected as the representative of his constituency, and he has had those qualifications for quite a number of years. I have known the member for Cape Breton South and Richmond for a long time, and if senators are to be appointed from the different parties, I do not know of anyone that I would rather see in the Senate from the other side of the House than my hon. friend, and I am sure that he would render good service to the country in the upper chamber, for we all admire the frankness with which he discusses public questions in this House. But for the present at least I think he will render better service where he is.

Now, I happen to have on my desk a report of a committee of the Senate. I was looking at this when the member for Cape Breton South and Richmond spoke, and I had no intention of taking part in this debate had he not referred to the financial qualifications necessary for a seat in the upper house which this report refers to. It may be remembered that some years ago there was quite a scandal about the sale of senatorships, it being charged that a price was placed upon them. Some of you may not have remembered the circumstances as I have, for the reason that the member for the constituency which I now have the honour to represent was the minister who to a certain extent was implicated. An ex-member of parliament alleged that a demand had been made upon him for $10,000 for a seat in the Senate. This naturally caused a good deal of comment throughout the country and resulted in a special committee of the upper house holding an investigation, the charge being considered to be a serious reflection upon the members of the Senate. The investigation took place in 1901. I remember it very well because one of the parties implicated had also sent a letter which was read at the Liberal convention in my constituency. When the Liberal candidate was nominated, in which he pointed out the reason why a certain candidate who was much talked of and was likely to be selected by the Liberals should not be given the nomination, simply because he had absolutely refused to contribute funds towards running the machine, and had stated he had no money to contribute for elections and consequently he was not deemed to be a desirable man even to receive a Liberal nomination. Such things have caused a good deal of discontent and suspicion among the people with regard to appointments to the upper chamber, but fortunately we have not had any such scandal for many years. I think I might very well read some of the evidence which was taken before the special committee of the Senate on that occasion. The party who made the charge was Mr. H. H. Cook at one time Liberal member for South Simcoe, I think. He was defeated in 1896 and felt himself entitled to a senatorship by reason of his party services. With respect to Mr. Kerr's appointment to the Senate, Mr. Cook referred to the agent who had approached him in the matter and who claimed he represented the government or Sir Richard Cartwright. He was asked to tell what took place between him and the agent. He answered:

The party wrote me a letter. I was away from home at the time. The letter was written stating—

The question was objected to.

Q. Just tell the the interview, what took place.

By the Hon. Mr. Dandurand:

Q. Could you fix the date?—A. No.

Q. Or about?—A. No, it was before this appointment was made, before Mr. Kerr was appointed. He came to my office and said that he had just a short time ago come from Ottawa, and he was instructed to ask me for $10,000 for a senatorship.

By Counsel for Mr. Cook:

Q. How did he greet you?—A. When he came into my office, from the corridor, from the hall, to my outer office, he passed through the outer office, and he said, "Good morning, Mr. Cook"—or rather, "Good morning Mr. Senator." I said, "Good morning." Then he walked in and closed the door behind him and said that he had returned from Ottawa, and was instructed to ask me for $10,000 for the appointment. He told me either—I have forgotten whether he said the government or Sir Richard Cartwright told him to come and see me, and I told him most emphatically that I would not give him $10,000, or the government, or Sir Richard Cartwright, or anyone else, for a senatorship. "Well," he stated, "if you don't give it to me you wont get the appointment."

And he did not.

"They are very desirous of giving it to you, and want to give it to you, but they wont give it to you unless you pay them $10,000. You are able to pay it, and they want the money for party purposes." That is about the gist of the conversation, and he went out of the office.

Now the evidence which Mr. Cook gave was substantiated by the evidence of Mr. Hieland Hancock. He was sworn and examined by Mr. Ritchie, counsel for the committee, as follows:

Q. You are bookkeeper for the Ontario Lumber Company?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Of which Mr. Cook is president, I understand?—A. Yes.

Hon. Mr. Dandurand suggests that as this is a witness for the prosecution he should be examined by counsel for Mr. Cook. Mr. Ritchie, counsel for the committee, assents.

By Mr. Marsh, counsel for Mr. Cook:

Q. You remember the occasion of Mr. Preston visiting the office of Mr. Cook?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you tell us about what time that was?—A. It was in the fall of 1898.

Q. Tell me what happened when he visited the office?—A. When he came into the office, as soon as he reached the door of Mr. Cook's room, he said, "Good morning, Mr. Senator."

Q. And then what happened?—A. Then he went in and closed the door.

Q. He went into Mr. Cook's private room then, and closed the door?—A. Yes.

Q. About how long were they together?—A. I should say about fifteen or twenty minutes, I would not be positive as to that.

Q. I presume you could not hear anything that took place while they were together?—A. No, sir.

Q. Then what next happened?—A. Mr. Cook and Mr. Preston came out, and Mr. Cook saw Mr. Preston to the outer door of the office.

Q. They came out of Mr. Cook's private room?—A. Yes.

Q. Through the room where you were?—A. Through the room where I was.

Q. And then what was done?—A. Mr. Cook saw Mr. Preston out.

Q. Out of the door?—A. Out of the outer door.

Q. Then what happened?—A. Mr. Cook came back to the desk where I was, and seemed very indignant—

Mr. Blake, counsel for the accused parties, objects to this evidence. Objection overruled.

Q. You say that when Mr. Cook took Mr. Preston to the door, immediately upon closing the door Mr. Cook returned to you. In what frame of mind was he or what condition did he appear to be in?—A. He appeared to be very angry.

Q. And what did he say?—A. He said to me, "What do you think of that damned scoundrel Preston?"

Q. And then what happened?—A. I said, "What is the matter Mr. Cook?" He said, "He wanted me to pay $10,000 for a senatorship."

Q. Anything further?—A. Nothing further.

And so on. Now, this was one Mr. W. T. R. Preston, at the time of this investigation immigration agent over in England, brought back to give evidence at this inquiry; formerly organizer for the Liberal party; librarian at the parliament buildings, Toronto, at the time of the famous election episodes throughout this province; the man who was responsible for raising the funds to grease the machine; the man who sent the famous telegram to Donald McNish the night of the election in West Elgin in 1899 to hug the members of the much abused threshing machine for the days of auld lang syne. Fortunately there was an end to the regime of those years, and a general clean-up took place in 1905. Mr. Blake, who was counsel at that time for the accused, was the man who came out and denounced more vigorously than anyone else in the Liberal party the things that had been done by those whose names I mentioned in a previous debate and the members of the machine. Fortunately for the public life of this country and for the reputation of the people of this Dominion we have not lately had much of that sort of thing to contend with. I had hoped that we would hear nothing further with regard to those who were connected with these events of about a quarter of a century ago, but I regret very much indeed that there is considerable evidence to-day of their activities in the public life of this country.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, however interesting the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Sutherland) may be to certain members in this House, they do not pertain very directly, I think, to the resolution under consideration.

I have sometimes wondered whether the Canadian Senate might be described as a comedy or as a tragedy. In fact, I sometimes wonder whether this House is a comedy or a tragedy. I remember a few years ago being told by a friend of mine who was rather prominently connected with the farmers' movement in Ontario that he had been offered a senatorship. I do not think he spent two seconds in deciding what to do, and I should have decided the same as he did; because if he had ever consented to accept a senatorship under the existing conditions he would have been everlastingly condemned by the farmers of Ontario. There is no doubt that the farmers of Ontario, generally speaking, are strongly in favour of the abolition of the Senate. I would suggest to the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll)—I am sorry he is not in his seat,—that there is another motto different from the one which his speech exemplified, namely that "the wish is father to the thought." There is another motto, I say, that he ought to keep in mind and it is "Where there's a will there's a way." He has magnified the difficulties before us in the way of Senate reform. I am free to admit the difficulties; we face difficulties wherever we turn. But I should like to commend to him and to the House that old motto, "Where there's a will there's a way."

In regard to the point raised by the last speaker, I too, heard some years ago about the purchase of senatorships. I hope that is something of the past. But there is no doubt in my mind that the evidence which was presented and the tales that were told some years ago have helped to bring our Senate into disrepute. The views that are current regarding our Senate are very well exemplified in the following clipping from the Victoria Times:

[Mr. Sutherland.]

The Canadian Senate is the most reactionary legislative body in the English-speaking world. There is no other institution with such far-reaching powers in any British Dominion. It would not be tolerated in Britain, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and the fact that in its present form it has been tolerated so long in Canada is not a healthy symptom in our people. It should be made more responsive to those who pay for its maintenance and whose will it ought to carry out. Its members should have to give an account of their stewardship to the electors from time to time, if for no other reason than to remind them that they are the servants and not the masters of the public. If this were done the Senate would cease to be the trump card of small but powerful elements who for selfish purposes desire the rejection of legislation affecting them which has been passed by the House of Commons.

Whether right or wrong, that is the situation that faces us; that is the opinion that prevails very largely throughout this country and it is something which we shall have to reckon with.

I hold in my hand a rather interesting document which has been referred to by a former speaker, A Political Cathechism, written by T. A. Patrick, who, I understand, is a resident of the province of Saskatchewan. Let me quote just a few sentences from this document, which I presume has been sent to all members of the House:

Q. Who other than senators are opposed to real Senate reform?—A. Every actual or prospective political derelict, lacking sail, ballast, or cargo, fearful of foundering, is eager to be taken in tow. Every political jobber who values the Senate patronage for the support it will buy; every sectional interest, and every selfish interest that thrives best on unfair advantage and special privilege.

Such is another expression of public opinion in regard to this matter, and in spite of all difficulties, whether public opinion is right or wrong, it is going to make itself felt pretty soon in one form or another. I should like further to direct the attention of the House to something which I think is also partly responsible for the formation of public opinion in regard to the Senate. I have in my hand a clipping from the Farmers' Sun of 1922—I have not the exact date of it, but it is some time during that year. It contains a copy of a letter sent out by a certain W. O. Sealey, of Hamilton, who was at that time striving for a senatorship. This letter is quite worth while placing on Hansard. I read:

Hamilton, Ont., March 8, 1922.

Dear Sir:

Owing to the death of the late Senator Milne, the Hamilton senatorship is now vacant.

Having been a continuous worker and supporter of the Liberal party for the past forty years, a candidate in five campaigns for the Dominion parliament, necessitating the expenditure of the greater part of my time, I acquired a good parliamentary experience, and our continued success seemed assured until we were defeated with the government in 1911.

My political merits appear to be most worthy, and at least a good average for the whole province.

I am now a candidate for the Senate vacancy, so if my comparison of merit appeals to you as being about correct, then I wish you would be kind enough to write the Premier, Hon. Mackenzie King, Parliament Building, Ottawa, (as well as any other Ontario member of the cabinet you may know), immediately, recommending and urging my appointment, believing that if honoured with the appointment, I could still continue to be very useful to the party and community—

Party first, of course.

—as most people feel I was during my parliamentary career—

I do not quite understand him, Mr. Speaker, when he refers to his parliamentary career. I presume it was his participation in five campaigns. I continue:

If by chance you don't find the time or convenience to write quickly, and the enclosed draft letter expresses your sentiments, then kindly date, sign and mail at once and much oblige.

Our Wentworth candidate, Mr. W. T. Evans, suggested that he would be glad to have the views of the Liberal friends of Wentworth on matters of patronage or appointments, so if the enclosed card expresses your views, kindly date, sign and mail same.

Thanking you in anticipation for your immediate attention to the above, and with best wishes as usual.

Yours truly,

W. O. SEALEY.

And enclosed there are very eloquent appeals to the Prime Minister and to Mr. Evans on behalf of Mr. Sealey, so as to save the recipient the labour of composing a letter of his own. I shall not read them, as it is not necessary.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read them.

Mr. GOOD: Very well then; they are not very long. This is the one to the Prime Minister:

Dear Sir:

I am informed that Mr. W. O. Sealey is a candidate for the Hamilton vacancy in the Dominion Senate.

Having known Mr. Sealey for many years as a consistent and enthusiastic Liberal, I take pleasure, as a member of the Liberal party in giving Mr. Sealey my support, and I respectfully ask your favourable consideration. I assure you that should he be thus honoured (which I trust he will be), the appointment would be very much appreciated in this locality, as well as the province throughout, and that you would find him a most useful and creditable member of your upper House.

Thanking you in anticipation of your personal support and action, believe me to be,

Sincerely yours,

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend say that Mr. Sealey has been appointed?

Mr. GOOD: Oh no. I am sure I can commend the Prime Minister for not listening to such appeals as these. I think it is greatly to his credit, if I may be allowed to express an opinion, that an application of this kind was turned down.

Mr. GRAHAM: Whose upper house did the letter say?

Mr. GOOD: "Yours," referring to the Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is hardly borne out by history.

Mr. GOOD: Not as yet, but the time may come, if the right hon. gentleman remains in power long enough, when he can with some propriety call it "his" upper house. The letter to Mr. Evans is as follows:

Dear Mr. EVANS:

I am informed there is a vacancy in the Dominion Senate, and I heartily recommend Mr. W. O. Sealey for the appointment.

I would consider it a favour if you will write the Premier, endorsing Mr. Sealey, and also use your utmost influence to urge his appointment.

I remain,

Sincerely yours,

I suppose this is comedy in a sense, but after all, from the standpoint of the country's welfare, it is very tragic; and if I may be allowed to say so, I think it is a very serious reflection upon the party system. Surely we can develop a system which does not lend itself so well to iniquities of this sort as our present party system seems to have done.

I do not wish to speak at any length in regard to the matter under discussion. I would like to suggest, however, that a number of thoughtful people have really turned their attention to methods of reform. We have a number of proposals that have been put forward, and I sincerely trust that these may receive sympathetic consideration at the proposed conference. I am not going to take the time at this late hour to outline any of these proposals.

I should like, in conclusion, to refer to the resolution, the amendment, and the subamendment that have been moved. There is a little confusion possible in the minds of hon. members regarding the subamendment. I think it would be wise before we vote on the subamendment to have this possible confusion cleared up. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) moves in amendment to the said amendment:

That all the words after the word "That" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the governments of the various provinces to consider the advisability of amending the British North America Act with respect to the constitution and the powers of the Senate.

Now when this subamendment was moved I thought it might have reference to the first "that" in the first line of the resolution, but I think, however, that the meaning is, and it ought to be, that the reference is to the second "that", namely, the word "that" in the first line of the specific amendment. If that is the meaning, which I take it to be, the subamendment will read as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Senate as at present appointed and constituted is not of the greatest advantage to Canada.
> Therefore it is expedient that the House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the governments of the various provinces to consider the advisability of amending the British North America Act with respect to the constitution and the powers of the Senate.

That, I take it, is the motion as sought to be amended by the hon. member for Joliette. If that is the correct interpretation, I would like to say that I shall support the subamendment heartily. I am prepared to go further than the negative resolution. If the subamendment is carried it will include the original motion. If it is defeated, then we shall have to vote on the amendment. I intend to vote against the amendment, not because I am not in sympathy with its purpose, but because I think that at this juncture it is the wrong way of tackling the problem, and I therefore feel compelled to vote against it. If the amendment is lost and we reach the original motion, I shall vote for it.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to the point of order that the amendment is void for ambiguity and inconclusiveness. The last speaker (Mr. Good) has made reference to the fact that the word "that" referred to in quotation marks in the subamendment may be the first "that" or the second "that" in the amendment. He seems to assume it is the second, but the House has no right to refer to anything but the words of the resolution in determining its validity and its order. One member might vote for the resolution on the assumption that the word "that" in quotation marks was the first "that" in the amendment; another on the assumption that it was the second. The resolution has a different meaning altogether according as one assumes it to be the first or the second. Nor can the effect be cured by any statement of intention on the part of the mover. It can only be cured by amendment, and an amendment now cannot be made. I think I have made my point clear. There is nothing more clearly established than that any motion that is ambiguous as to meaning, which may mean one thing or may mean another, which has not stated its purport altogether cannot be under consideration in this House. I am free to admit that if the subamendment had read so as to make it clear that the quoted "that" was the second "that" in the amendment, it would be an amendment perfectly in order. Therefore I say it is void for ambiguity and inconclusiveness.

Mr. PUTNAM: Would the right hon. leader of the opposition kindly give us the full reading of each branch of what he alleges as the ambiguity?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the quoted "that" in the subamendment refers to the first "that" in the amendment then I would argue that the subamendment is wholly out of order. But I am not arguing that now; it may mean one thing or it may mean another. It would then read in this form: The first motion would be:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Senate as at present appointed and constituted is not of the greatest advantage to Canada.

Mr. PUTNAM: What would be the reading if we take the tangent at the first "that"?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Assuming that the quoted "that" means the first "that" then the subamendment would read as follows:

> That the House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the governments of the various provinces to consider the advisability of amending the British North America Act with respect to the constitution and the powers of the Senate.

It would be another resolution altogether, it would not be in the nature of an amendment to the main motion, consequently it would be out of order. But I am not on that point at all.

Mr. PUTNAM: The word "therefore" does not settle it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The word "therefore" would not be in it at all if it refers to the first "that". The point I am on is this: That the subamendment as it reads is void for ambiguity in that it has no definite meaning whatever. It may mean one thing, it may mean another thing, and each is equally applicable and equally open. Hon. members of this House cannot be asked to vote on an amendment in that condition.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): It seems to me that the purport of the amendment to the amendment is not difficult to discover, and that anyone who brought to the consideration of the resolutions before the House not only a critical mind but a desire to arrive at a decision, and a desire to have the opportunity of arriving at a decision, would find no difficulty in understanding exactly what the amendment means. I also would submit that a rule of construction of statutes is applicable to the rules of this House, namely, that you are to construe a statute in order that it may have a meaning rather than that it should not have a meaning; and I think that you are to construe the resolution in such a way that the amendment will fit into it, rather than in a manner in which the endeavour is to make the amendment a misfit to the resolution. It seems to me, also, that there is a further argument in support of the contention that the amendment to the amendment is in order. The resolution as originally moved is as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House the Senate as at present appointed and constituted is not of the greatest advantage to Canada.

That is the substantive resolution placed before the House. Now then Mr. Findlay, seconded by Mr. Black (Huron) moves an amendment thereto:

That the following words be added to the main motion.

Then follows what he proposes should be added to the main motion:

Therefore it is expedient that a humble address be presented to His Majesty—

And so on. Then Mr. Denis (Joliette), seconded by Mr. Mercier, moves an amendment to the said amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference—

And so on. There is no difficulty to those who really wish to arrive at the meaning of what is before the House in coming to the conclusion that the "that" referred to is the "that" in the amendment proposed by Mr. Findlay.

Mr. IRVINE: Which "that?"

Mr. McMASTER: The "that" which follows the "therefore," because that is the substantive amendment:

Therefore it is expedient that the House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the governments of the various provinces—

That is the expression of opinion that it is desired the House should give. Both amendments are true amendments in the sense that they add something to the original motion. The original motion is the substantive proposition; the two amendments are amendments of procedure as to how this expression of opinion should be put into effect. Two members have proposed that the expression of opinion should be put into effect by "the presentation of a humble address to His Majesty." Two other members have proposed that the substantive expression of opinion should be made effective by the summoning of a constitutional conference. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is no necessity to have the issue beclouded by any technical objection as to the impossibility of knowing what "that" is meant. Surely the resolution and the amendments should be interpreted in a way to give them an effect. A reasonable interpretation rather than an unreasonable interpretation should be given to the resolution and the amendments before the House, and I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that what is meant is that the "that" mentioned in the first amendment is the "that" which follows the word "expedient."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like to add a few words in reply, I am, of course, suffering from the natural humiliation of being lectured by the hon. member for Brome.

Mr. McMASTER: There was no intention to lecture, merely to enlighten.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am going to try to reflect a little light back on his very brilliant dome. The hon. member says that the real construction should apply, that the reading should be taken which gives a meaning. One reading gives a meaning, the other reading gives a meaning. Both meanings are perfectly clear and perfectly distinct; I am sorry if the hon. member has difficulty in seeing either. I will read the amendment in the form in which he says it is not a meaning which appeals to him. It would read this way:

That the House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference between the government of the Dominion and the governments of the various provinces.

Has any hon. member of this House any difficulty in discerning the meaning of that? I have not. It is a perfectly good piece of English construction; its meaning is as plain as day:

That the House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference between the government of the Dominion and the governments of the various provinces to consider the advisability of revising the British North America Act with respect to the constitution and powers of the Senate.

This is the way it reads if the first "that" is taken to have the intention of the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis). That is the main motion is amended to read this way.

That in the opinion of this House the Senate as at present appointed and constituted is not of the greatest advantage to Canada, and that the following words be added to the main motion:

Therefore it is expedient that the House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference—

The meaning is perfectly clear, it could not be clearer, but the English is not as well expressed as in the first motion. As the hon. member intended, his resolution would probably have read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Senate as at present appointed and constituted is not of the greatest advantage to Canada, and therefore the House approves—

He would not say "Therefore it is expedient that the House approves." I am not saying that the latter is not perfectly clear as to its meaning. It is. But it is not the natural method of expression. The words, "It is expedient" are wholly superfluous. So that if there is any argument at all, the argument would tell in favour of the first "that" as having been in the mind of the hon. member. All I am submitting to the House is that it is open to two constructions with a wholly different meaning and effect, and the House cannot be asked to vote upon it in that condition.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to be heard on the point of order? I have listened with great care to the point of order raised by the right hon. member (Mr. Meighen) and much as I respect his ability to discern and interpret the rules, I am of opinion that the amendment to the amendment is quite intelligible as it is drafted, and as I understood it when I put the question to the House. The objection is purely technical in my humble opinion. And what is the question? The main motion reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Senate as at present appointed and constituted is not of the greatest advantage to Canada.

That motion is moved by Mr. Shaw and seconded by Mr. Irvine. Then an amendment is moved by Mr. Findlay and seconded by Mr. Black (Huron), which purports to add to the main motion the following words:

Therefore it is expedient that a humble address be presented to His Majesty the King praying that the British North America Act be amended so as to provide that the Dominion of Canada may have the power to make the Senate an elective body or to abolish it, as may be decided by the people in a plebiscite to be taken at the next general election.

Then Mr. Denis (Joliette), moves, seconded by Mr. Mercier, in amendment to the said amendment: That all the words after the word "that" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The House approves of the convening at an early date of a conference between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the governments of the various provinces to consider the advisability of amending the British North America Act with respect to the constitution and the powers of the Senate.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Which "that" is to be taken into consideration at the present moment? Clearly the one in the amendment. The hon. member for Joliette, mark well, states "all the words after the word 'that' in the amendment." The first "that" is in the formula preceding the amendment, but the essential "that" is in the main body of the amendment. The hon. member says quite logically that all the words after the word "that" in the amendment should be struck out. Having that in mind, how will the amendment to the amendment read if accepted by the House? It becomes the main motion amended and reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Senate as at present appointed and constituted is not of the greatest advantage to Canada; therefore it is expedient that the House approve of the convening at an early date of a conference between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the government of the various provinces to consider the advisability of amending the British North America Act in respect of the constitution and the powers of the Senate.

It seems to me that it reads very clearly and very intelligibly. It is true that the hon. member for Joliette might perhaps have omitted the words "it is expedient", but I am sure the right hon. member (Mr. Meighen) does not think that this is more than a technical objection. At most, it is surplusage in the phraseology and quite easy to understand in the case of an hon. member who does not use the English language as his mother tongue. A mere surplusage does not render the amendment unintelligible.

The amendment is on the contrary quite intelligible. If the word "that" applied to the formula preceding the amendment I would agree with the right hon. gentleman and I would rule the motion out of order; but with ordinary common sense I must accept the second "that" and thus construed, the amendment is intelligible. My ruling is that the amendment is in order. There are three principles put in concrete form before the House; the main motion which sweeps away the Senate as appointed and constituted; the second principle indicates the procedure which ought to be followed to reform the Senate; that is to say, by an amendment to the British North America Act; the third principle put forward by the hon. member for Joliette favours the calling together of a conference of the governments of the Dominion and of the various provinces to deal with the issue. That is my understanding of the three questions before the House.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The House divided on the subamendment (Mr. Denis, Joliette) which was agreed to on the following division.

ADJOURNMENT—CORRESPONDENCE, Dr. MAGILL

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to call the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to a file of correspondence tabled this afternoon. The correspondence is manifestly incomplete as filed. For example there is a letter from myself to Dr. Magill, but the reply of Dr. Magill does not appear. There was also some further correspondence subsequent to that. I am sure this correspondence is on file in the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I observed, as my right hon. friend has mentioned, that there was communication with Dr. Magill and I have been inquiring of all the departments to find out if there was a reply. I have not been able to trace it. However, there are further papers that have come from the Department of Trade and Commerce which will be tabled to-morrow, although they do not include any communication from Dr. Magill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It must be there even though it may be difficult to locate it. I would suggest that the government get a copy of Dr. Magill's reply from him. He was here last week but I did not think of the matter then.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have already suggested that he be telegraphed to concerning it.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.45 p. m.

Tuesday, March 10, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

COPYRIGHT ACT, 1921, AMENDMENTS

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford) presented the first report of the special committee appointed to consider and report upon Bill No. 2, an act to amend and make operative certain provisions of the Copyright Act, 1921, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS: Should not notice be given, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is generally a formal motion, but it is the privilege of any member to ask that notice be given.

Stands as notice of motion.

AUDITOR GENERAL AND ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table certain correspondence exchanged between the Auditor General and the Acting Minister of Finance, asked for by my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton).

CORRESPONDENCE ON OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the House a copy of the correspondence asked for yesterday by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) in connection with ocean rates.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, last night my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) asked me with respect to a report on ocean rates from Dr. Magill to himself. I mentioned at the time that I had requested one of my colleagues to telegraph Dr. Magill for the report. This morning he received the following telegram in reply:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Hon. T. A. Low,
Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Winnipeg, March 10.

Did not undertake work offered in Mr. Meighen's letter February 16, 1921, because Hyndman Commission on grain trade appointed about that time.

R. MAGILL.

There appears to have been no report.

With reference to the correspondence which was tabled yesterday on the subject of ocean rates and the correspondence which has been tabled to-day from the Department of Trade and Commerce, which correspondence was requested by the right hon. leader of the opposition, I think the House should have the advantage of perusing it, and I therefore beg to move:

That one thousand copies in the English language and five hundred copies in the French language of the correspondence between the government of Canada and the British government in regard to the subject of ocean rates and especially in relation to the Imperial Shipping Committee laid on the table of the House on Monday, March 9, and one thousand copies in the English language and five hundred copies in the French language of the correspondence from the Department of Trade and Commerce regarding trans-atlantic freight and passenger rates, laid on the Table this day, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no objection to the correspondence tabled on the 9th, which I asked for, between the Prime Minister's office and the British government or the Imperial Shipping Committee, being printed. But I know nothing about this subsequent correspondence which has been laid on the table to-day; it was not included in what was asked for by me. I have no personal knowledge of it so far as I know. It is somewhat voluminous and I only had about three seconds to look at it, but I note that many of the letters addressed to the minister are marked "private and confidential"; I have not noticed whether any of his are or not. It seems to me that probably we would not be acting rightly in having the correspondence published without the closest investigation and perhaps the consent of the correspondents.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know what "private and confidential" correspondence my right hon. friend alludes to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is marked.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is some marked "private and confidential?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection to the "private and confidential" letters not being brought down, but I think the rest of the correspondence should be available at the earliest date. It was asked for by my right hon. friend, who requested production of correspondence not only from the Department of External Affairs but also from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I asked for was correspondence with the British government or the Imperial Shipping Committee. From what I have seen, this is correspondence written by various people in Canada to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and is all marked "private and confidential" or "personal and confidential." I have not read any of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How many letters are marked "private and confidential?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have only had time to look at a few. The last one is; the next one is, apparently most of them are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are there any others?

Mr. LOW: I may say that that letter was placed on the general file by the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce when he left the office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may be all right. I am not saying any of it is necessarily private and confidential; I have not had time to read any of the letters. We are asked to order the printing and publication on one second's examination. I suggest that as to this correspondence the motion be postponed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to press the motion for the printing; it can be moved to-morrow if my right hon. friend would like to have an opportunity to look over the correspondence. I suggest, however, that the first part of the resolution, in respect to the correspondence laid on the table yesterday and to which my right hon. friend has no objection, be adopted.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion will therefore read:

That one thousand copies in the English language and five hundred copies in the French language of the correspondence between the government of Canada and the British government in regard to the subject of ocean rates, and especially in relation to the Imperial Shipping Committee, laid on the table of the House on Monday, the ninth of March, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Is it the pleasure of the House, by unanimous consent, to adopt the motion as amended?

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

PENSIONS AND RE-ESTABLISHMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I would like to ask the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Beland), in view of the fact that it was stated by the Senate last year, when amendments respecting pensions and re-establishment came before them, that they came too late to be properly dealt with, whether any amendments contemplated this year will be brought in sufficiently early to permit a thorough discussion of them, and to give the Senate ample opportunity to consider them?

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): It is my intention to bring down the legislation as soon as possible. It will be delayed a few days longer because I have been notified that a delegation of returned men intend to interview myself and perhaps the government as a whole in connection with the proposals to be brought down. That is the only reason for postponing the presentation of the bill.

MINERS AND STEEL WORKERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): I desire to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King): if he has received the following telegram from Mr. A. C. McCormick, mayor of Sydney Mines:

Large citizens' meetings held here, third. Committee of town council urging clergy, board of trade and business and professional men appointed to draw up resolution to correct false impressions arising through speeches of Cape Breton representatives in parliament. Conditions here exceedingly bad. Work very slack since New Year and many in distress. Churches opening food depots and British-Canadian Co-operative Society opening soup kitchens. All members of this committee are outsiders and have no connection with labour union and deprecate efforts to make it appear that conditions anything but bad. Besco has cut off credit at its store to workmen. Wish to impress upon the public that grave situation exists and repudiate statements to the contrary made in parliament. Last week 127 families, 254 adults, 640 children supplied food for one week by citizens relief committee from contributions of citizens of Sydney Mines. Soup and sandwiches to 886 school children Thursday to Monday supplied by British-Canadian Co-operative Society. This week's requirements for week's food supply estimated 210 families, 420 adults, 1,050 children. Doctors report many cases influenza. Receiving no assistance from outside sources. Situation very grave, local resources about exhausted. Would earnestly implore financial assistance from the government of Canada as the provincial government sending no relief.

If the Prime Minister has received this telegram, has he made any inquiry as to its authenticity and is any relief proposed for what would appear to be a very grave situation in that district?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I received last night a telegram in the words, I think, of that which has just been read by my hon. friend. I instructed my secretary to acknowledge it and say that its representations would receive the government's consideration. I brought the representations set forth in the telegram to the attention of my colleagues in council today. The position the government takes in the matter is this: The Premier of Nova Scotia has already intimated to the president of the Mine Workers' Union that the government of Nova Scotia would be prepared to co-operate in any matters of distress where it appears that the municipalities are not able to take care of the situation. This government, therefore feels, that unless requested by the government of Nova Scotia so to do, we should not intervene at this time.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CARROLL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I notice that in a telegram read by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), Mr. A. C. McCormick states that he wishes to correct a wrong impression conveyed by members for Cape Breton regarding the situation in his district. I may say that I made but a passing reference to the district of Sydney Mines, which is not in my constituency. In my speech on this question I dealt almost wholly with the situation as it pertained to the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and therefore could have created no wrong impression.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): I would like to ask when I may expect an answer to my question, which stands No. 1 on the order paper?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As soon, I think, as the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) returns, which I am told will be tomorrow.

ALLEGED MERGER OF POLITICAL INTERESTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (East Elgin): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question based on a report in the issue of the Toronto Globe of March 9. The heading is, "Liberals and Progressives Join to Back Low Tariff Candidate." It reads in part as follows:

Representatives of both Liberals and Progressives, at a meeting in the Battersby house here, unanimously agreed on a merger of political interests in Norfolk county. . . . The following resolution . . . . was unanimously adopted:

"That this meeting expresses its approval of the nomination of a low tariff candidate to contest the riding of Elgin-Norfolk—

It should be Norfolk-Elgin.

"—in the coming Dominion election.

"That to this end a convention, representative of all low-tariff electors of the riding, be called to make the said nomination.

"That the said candidate, when elected—"

Evidently they are sure of election.

"—is pledged to give independent support to, and join the caucus of whichever low-tariff party may be in power, whether it be under the leadership of Mr. King or Mr. Forke."

Now, I know well the abhorrence that this government has always felt in regard to mergers and combines, and I wish to—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may not make a speech on the orders of the day. He may simply put a question to the government.

Mr. STANSELL: The question I wish to ask is this: In the event of the success of the merger or combine, whichever you wish to call it, in the various ridings, will the government abandon the idea of the single transferable vote?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I will answer that question after the event to which my hon. friend alludes has taken place.

NATURALIZATION LAWS AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On the orders of the day yesterday I promised the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) that I would give him a statement to-day with respect to a question he asked. The question was——whether the government has received any communication from the British government relative to the amendment of the naturalization laws to prevent a woman of British nationality married to an alien from losing her British citizenship except by declaration of alienage, and providing for the re-admission to British citizenship of British women married to aliens where the marriage state, although officially existing, has for all practical purposes terminated?—and, if so, what measures the government proposes to take to secure the removal at the earliest possible moment of the disabilities in this respect now resting on Canadian women?

Perhaps my hon. friend will pardon me if I read the reply as well:

A despatch dated November 6, 1924, was received from the Colonial Office on November 17, enclosing for consideration a draft bill which embodied two amendments to the Naturalization Acts, 1914-1922, carrying out recommendations of the Imperial conference of 1923, one providing for issuing naturalization certificates to inhabitants of mandated territories, and the other providing for the readmission to British nationality of natural-born subjects married to aliens where the married state, though subsisting in law, has to all practical purposes come to an end.

The despatch also suggested for consideration two other changes which were under consideration, but as to which no definite recommendation was made; one of these suggestions was that a British-born woman should not on marriage lose her British nationality if and so long as she does not acquire the nationality of her husband under the law of his country. No proposal has been received from the British government to the effect indicated in the first part of the question of the member for Lisgar, that a woman of British nationality on marriage to an alien should not lose her British nationality except by declaration of alienage.

As to what measures the government proposes to take to secure the removal at the earliest possible moment of the disabilities in this respect now resting on Canadian women, I would say, that this matter has been referred to the departments of the Secretary of State and of Justice for consideration and report to council, and an announcement with respect to the action of the government thereon will be made at a later date.

GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Medicine Hat): On February 27, the Minister of Trade and Commerce laid on the table of the House the evidence taken before the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission. On going over the evidence I find that the evidence that was taken at the special session at Vancouver from May 16 to June 5 inclusive is not included. Is it the intention of the minister to table that evidence?

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I thought that evidence had been included with the other. I will see that it is tabled.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): I would like to ask if the government have made any progress towards bringing down an Old Age Pension Act, and if we may expect such an act this session.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): The matter has received further consideration by the government as a result of the answers received from the various provincial governments, and within the next few days we shall be in a position to further advise the House as to what action will be taken.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Can the Solicitor General give us any intimation as to the time when the amendments to the Elections Act will be brought down?

Hon. E. J. McMURRAY (Solicitor General): We are giving attention to that matter now, and expect to bring down the amendments very shortly.

RURAL CREDITS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Finance if he is now in a position to make any announcement of governmental policy in regard to rural credits.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): I have nothing further to add to what I stated the other day.

CORRESPONDENCE ON OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I am sure the Prime Minister will welcome another word in regard to this correspondence. I find on this file a letter marked "personal and confidential," written by myself when I was Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1921 to the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, enclosing a letter marked "confidential". This enclosure was a letter addressed to me at Vancouver and in my letter to the deputy I pointed out that, being absent from Ottawa it was impossible for me to take action regarding it, and I submitted it to the deputy marked "personal and confidential." That letter certainly should not appear on this file. There is nothing damaging in this letter, nor anything that could not be published, except that the party who wrote the letter marked it "personal and confidential", and he cites personal experiences which I do not think any manufacturer or tradesman would like to have published to the world without his consent. I have no objection at all to the rest of the file: but I am surprised that this particular letter should appear on the file at all.

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can only say in reply to my hon. friend that I asked my deputy to have a copy made of the correspondence, and the file is just as it was handed to me. I take it that the letter my hon. friend refers to which was marked "personal and confidential" was placed on the general file when he was Minister of Trade and Commerce. If he had considered it a personal letter I have no doubt he would have taken it with him when he left the department.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not a letter addressed to me. I have not the custody of it. It is a letter addressed by me to the deputy minister enclosing a personal and confidential letter.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend is referring to a letter addressed to him as Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. STEVENS: No. Show the two of them to the Prime Minister. He will understand it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend is quite right in saying that there is a letter addressed to himself as Minister of Trade and Commerce marked "personal and confidential"; then there is also a letter addressed by himself to the deputy minister marked "personal and confidential", and signed "H. H. Stevens, Minister." I assume the reason this letter has been kept on the file is that the deputy minister regarded it as a request for departmental action. However, Mr. Speaker, as far as these letters are cocerned, if my hon. friend would like to have them considered as personal and confidential I am sure that every member of the administration will wish to have them withdrawn from the file, and I shall be happy to have that done. But I would take it for granted that personal and confidential letters, the minister would take with him on leaving the department.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend mistakes the situation. It is a letter from me. I was not in custody of the letter at all; it left my hands in Vancouver, and was sent to the deputy minister in confidence, enclosing a confidential letter. I had not it in my custody; so I could not take it out of the file.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These letters have been laid on the table of the House, but I presume the House will give its consent to the letters to which my hon. friend refers being withdrawn. If so, I would like to request that they be withdrawn. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition has intimated that with these letters withdrawn he is agreeable to having the rest of the correspondence printed. I think it would facilitate the debate if all the correspondence were printed at the same time; so if we might return to that motion, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall have to put the question again. By unanimous consent, it is moved:

That one thousand copies in the English language and five hundred copies in the French language of the correspondence between the government of Canada and the British government in regard to the subject of ocean rates, and especially in relation to the Imperial Shipping Committee, laid on the table of the House on Monday, March 9, and one thousand copies in the English language and five hundred copies in the French language of the correspondence from the Department of Trade and Commerce regarding transatlantic freight and passenger rates, laid on the table this day, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as re-amended?

Motion as re-amended agreed to, by unanimous consent.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): While on this subject,—the former Minister of Trade and Commerce asked some little time ago if there was any other material that could be presented to the House besides the Preston report. The Prime Minister was at that time of the view that there was not. It occurs to me there probably is some other correspondence between 1921 and 1925 having to do with the same subject passing between the government and other parties, of the same nature as that ordered to be printed now. If so, it should all be ordered to be printed together.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure it would be satisfactory if there are any such letters, to have them laid on the table and printed. I will ask the departments to make a search and see that any such letters are brought down if possible to-morrow.

TORONTO VIADUCT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the provisions of section 6 of the Act respecting the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, chapter 70 of the statutes of 1924, whereby the Canadian National Railway Company was authorized to issue bonds, debentures or other securities to an amount not exceeding seven million dollars, in addition to the issue authorized by subsection two of the section enacted thereby; and to provide that such bonds, debentures or other securities may be used,—

(a) in the purchase at par of securities issued by the Terminals Company not exceeding, together with the securities purchased under the provisions of subsection two, one-half of the total securities to be issued by the Terminals Company for the purpose of its undertaking;

(b) in defraying the cost of portions of the said viaduct and works, which will not be included in the works to be owned by the Terminals Company, and will have to be constructed for or by the Canadian National Railway Company itself.

He said: The object of this resolution is to amend the statute passed a year ago in reference to the construction of what is known as the viaduct in Toronto. The construction of that viaduct will take place under the purview and control of what is known as the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, made up of the two railway companies, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. It has been found that each railway company has certain works that come within the viaduct agreement but are outside of the purview of the Terminals company, and this is merely to allow the Canadian National railway, because that is the only company we deal with, to spend a portion of the money in constructing the works that belong to it solely. This resolution makes no difference as respects the expenditure or the bonding powers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It simply enables the work to go on?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, respecting the Toronto Terminals Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Graham moved that the bill be now read a second time.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Does this motion require the unanimous consent of the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Then I object to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Objection having been taken the motion stands until the next sitting of the House.

Motion stands.

OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

AGREEMENT WITH SIR WILLIAM PETERSEN—MOTION FOR RATIFICATION DISCUSSED

The House resumed, from March 3, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. T. A. Low (Minister of Trade and Commerce) to ratify and confirm a contract between His Majesty and Sir William Petersen providing for the establishment of a subsidized steamship line on the Atlantic, and government control of certain ocean rates.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Burrard): In debating the government's resolution to approve of an agreement with Sir William Petersen whereby the country is obligated to pay £275,000 annually for the next ten years in return for the establishment of a fleet of ten ships for a service between Canada and Great Britain and Ireland or Europe, I should like first to examine some of the reasons and conclusions given to the House by the Minister of Trade and Commerce why this agreement should be adopted. At the outset I think it would be pertinent to refer to a statement which the minister made in submitting the resolution on March 3. He said on that occasion: "I intend to try and establish that these rates are exorbitant and unjustified. In my endeavour to prove that I propose to call as my star witness the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton)." Now, Mr. Speaker, I have carefully examined every word of evidence given by the hon. member for West York before the Dominions Royal Commission. I have also carefully examined the report which he made in October, 1913, and I cannot find one word that would justify the minister in stating that the hon. member for West York has made a finding or given evidence that ocean rates are exorbitant. I might refer very briefly to what the hon. gentleman did say. It is part of the paragraph quoted by the minister, and I think it might be as well that the House should have before it the whole paragraph and not simply a portion of the paragraph as was quoted. Before the royal commission, in October, 1916, Mr. Sinclair asked Sir Henry Drayton this question:

Q. When you were speaking on ocean freight rates you gave us some every interesting figures. I was not quite clear with regard to your view of the ocean freight rates that obtained before the war. Did you regard them as satisfactory or not?—A. No, I felt that it was absolutely necessary to ascertain, in the interest of the traffic, whether the increases were just or not. Of course, the companies have claimed that the cost of operation has gone up tremendously, that wages have gone up enormously, and that docking dues have increased, and that a thousand and one things have gone wrong, but the interests of the traffic render it absolutely necessary to find out whether these statements are correct or not. My own conclusion, from the little investigation which I was able to make, was that the companies were perfectly right in saying that the costs have largely increased. But while all that was true, the increased carrying facilities of the boats were so great that when you came to prorate the increase over your carrying unit—the marine ton—the cost per carrying unit had gone down, although the cost per vessel for operation per trip had gone up very much. Of course, the cost per carrying unit is the decisive matter on which your rate should be based.

Again, on cross-examination by Mr. Tatlow, he said:

Q. You said that you recognized that the cost of working steamships had greatly increased in recent years?—A. Yes.

Q. I think you also said that you did not know whether or not that increase would justify the increase in rates which had been made?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know whether in consequence of these large increases in rates, which in a number of instances have appeared to be high, the dividends of these large steamship companies have been increased?—A. They have been very satisfactory.

Q. Admitting all that, do you think that before anything is done in regard to imposing maximum rates for steamship services, there should be some public inquiry by a well constituted tribunal to determine whether the case has been made out or not?—A. I should have said that this Imperial committee would do that.

Q. It would be a big inquiry?—A. I think this would be a very careful commission and that no injustice would be done to anybody.

Q. You could not do it without hearing from the other side?—A. No.

It will be observed that the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) agreed that an investigation into the rates charged was justified. He stated emphatically that both sides should be heard and he suggested that governmental control was necessary; he recommended that a board should be appointed to fix maximum rates. But he gave no evidence which would justify the minister in making the statement to this House that the member for West York had declared that ocean rates are exorbitant. That is my first point.

In the second place I would point out that the hon. member for West York flatly contradicts the statement made by the minister in his presentation of the matter to the House, that the preference which the dominions have given to the Mother Country has been nullified in many instances by the actions of this combine. I will refer again to the report made by the hon. member for West York in October, 1913, upon this subject. This is what he says:

The claim that importers made to the effect that the British preference was absorbed by increased rates does not appear to be borne out. The following statement would seem to be approximately correct:

	Value	Preferential	Rates 1910	Rates 1912	Increase
	£		s d	s d	s d
Woollen goods	90 per 40 cu. ft.	5 per cent 90 0 per 40 cu. ft.	27 6	30 0	2 6
Cotton piece goods	80 per 40 cu. ft.	5 per cent 80 0 per 40 cu. ft.	22 6	30 0	7 6
Carpets	50 per 40 cu. ft.	5 per cent 50 0 per 40 cu. ft.	20 0	25 0	5 0
Felt hats	30 per 40 cu. ft.	7½ per cent 45 0 per 40 cu. ft.	15 0	20 0	5 0
Cutlery	150 per 40 cu. ft.	7½ per cent 225 0 per 40 cu. ft.	25 0	35 0	10 0

No shipper has supplied me with any information which supports the general proposition that is that British preference has been absorbed. I have no doubt, however, that, on articles sold on the Canadian market by the British exporter in close competition with exporters in other countries, the increases in rates of recent years have a detrimental and injurious effect on the traffic, and may account in part for the fall in ratio of British exports.

This is borne out by the findings of the Dominions Royal Commission given in 1918. It is contended by the shipping companies to-day that the same ratios exist now as existed then; yet the minister states that the British preference has been absorbed by the increase in ocean rates. It might be well, when considering the question whether this British preference has been so absorbed, to refer to some of the resolutions passed at meetings of the Canadian manufacturers, who have complained bitterly throughout the country regarding increases in the British preference. These also show quite clearly that there is nothing in the minister's assertion that the increase in rates has resulted in absorbing the British preference.

So that it may not be thought that I am arguing that the rates which at present prevail are fair, or that there is no room for improvement, I should like at this point to refer the House to the final report of the Dominions Royal Commission. That report I am prepared to adopt, and I think this House might well adopt it, and future action based thereon. The recommendations made by the commission in that final report may be found at page 316, paragraph 594. They are as follows:

594. We are, however, unanimous in thinking, as we have indicated in the preceding paragraphs, that some measures of supervision are needed. In our opinion, the line which should be taken is as follows:

(1) The contractors for the new mail services which we have recommended earlier in this report, and for all other mail services subsidized in the future by Your Majesty's government and by the oversea governments, should be required to submit a schedule of freight rates on the chief articles both of import and export, supervision of which is of importance in the national interest, for the approval of the government or governments concerned; these rates when approved should not be altered without consent. Adequate penalties should be provided under the contracts for any breach of these provisions.

(2) Similar action should be taken in the case of all vessels to the construction or operation of which contributions of any kind are made by Your Majesty's government or the oversea governments.

(3) We are of opinion that the competent ministries of Your Majesty's government and the Dominion governments should be empowered each to set up a board for the purpose of making inquiry where a prima facie case is established, that the interests of shippers are adversely affected by the action of steamship owners, or steamship conferences.

Suitable division of functions of these boards would, of course, be necessary in order to avoid overlapping, i.e., to secure that two boards should not deal with the same cases as imports and exports respectively.

(4) With a view to securing for such boards the necessary information required for the proper performance of the proposed duties, all steamship owners trading with the parts of the empire concerned should be required to file with the competent departments:

(a) copies of all written agreements (or memoranda of oral understandings) with other shipping companies, British or foreign, and all modifications in these agreements or understandings;

(b) copies of all similar agreements, etc., with individual shippers (whether British or foreign) and with railway and other transportation companies. These boards should also be given full powers for taking evidence and for ordering the production of documents.

(5) The boards should be empowered to investigate fully complaints regarding the unreasonableness or unfairness of rates. They should also be able to initiate inquiry where they may deem it necessary.

(6) In particular, the investigations of the boards should extend to freight classifications and to complaints relating to the adjustment of rates between classes of commodities. They should also extend to complaints regarding (a) failure to give reasonable notice of changes in classification or rates; (b) unfair treatment of shippers in the matter of cargo space, etc.; (c) the existence of discriminating or unfair contracts with certain shippers; (d) unfairness in the settlement of claims and indifference to the landing of freight in proper condition.

(7) The investigations of the boards should be held in public, and their action should be especially exercised along the lines of conference and conciliation, with a view to dissipating misunderstandings, and the bringing about of amicable agreement between shippers and shipowners. We believe that action in this direction, combined with press publicity and an immediate report to the ministerial and parliamentary authority concerned, ought to suffice to rectify and correct abuses, and, therefore, we do not recommend that the boards should be empowered to fix freight rates. We recognize, however, that some of the governments may think it advisable to give judicial powers to their boards, in addition to those suggested above, in order to enable them to enforce their decisions if and when conciliation fails.

(8) The case of differential freight rates should, in our judgment, be treated exceptionally. The boards, in cases of this kind, should be entrusted with wider functions, including not only powers of conciliation and arbitration but authority, at their discretion, to order the abolition of differential rates which are found inimical to Imperial trade.

Now, it is strange that the recommendations of this government, with this report as well as the Drayton report before them, should be so diametrically opposed to all the recommendations therein contained, especially in view of the fact that the minister seems to attach so much importance to the Drayton report, which, I may say, agrees with the report of the Dominions Royal Commission. These commissions have studied the question for years, taking exhaustive evidence upon it and going fully into the matter. Yet, without any investigation at all, except for one made by a single individual, whose report, which is before us, is so replete with inaccuracies as to merit no credence whatever, this government undertakes to reject the findings both of the minister's star witness and of the royal commission that reported on the subject.

I now propose, Mr. Speaker, by an examination of the agreement to discuss the wisdom of the government's policy in asking this House to adopt the agreement.

Paragraph 1 reads:

That the contractor shall and will either personally or by a company which he may form—

—do certain things. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low), in presenting this resolution to the House the other day, stated that he considered that Sir William Petersen's covenant is vital. There is no covenant by Sir William Petersen. He will escape every liability that could attach to him under this agreement. I venture to say that Sir William Petersen has already assigned his interest under this contract and that the government now has no hold over him personally.

Mr. PARENT: Would the hon. gentleman repeat the same statement outside of the House of Commons?

Mr. CLARK: At any time and any place.

Mr. PARENT: We shall see that later on.

Mr. CLARK: It is quite obvious that Sir William Petersen need not even submit to the government an assignment of the subsidy. Whenever he sees fit to assign this contract, he can do so and then the government will have no hold upon him. He need not even advise the government that he has assigned the contract. Moreover, he may assign this contract to a stock-jobbing company anywhere in the world, to any promoters, if he so desires, despite the fact that that company which he forms now may have no other capital in this world than the subsidy which is referred to in this agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not the practice of shipping companies, after a ship has been built, immediately to transfer that ship to a separate company, the idea being, in case of damage or loss at sea, to limit the liability of the company? Was that not the practice that was adopted by the preceding government with respect to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

Mr. CLARK: I do not dispute anything the Prime Minister has said, but he should have safeguarded the interest of the taxpayers of this country by having in this agreement some provision whereby the government could scrutinize the company to which this subsidy is to be assigned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Scrutinize the ships?

Mr. CLARK: Scrutinize the company, see that the company is a reputable company. That is my point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The contract is so drawn that not a single cent is contributed by the government to the company unless the service is actually performed.

Mr. CLARK: That may be; but my point is this, that Sir William Petersen may assign this contract to a wildcat company, and we all know that some wildcat companies have succeeded. I venture, however, to prophesy now that the company to which this subsidy is assigned will not succeed.

The next point in this contract to which I wish to direct attention is in paragraph 1 (a) and (c), which must be read together. This provides that the company must build ten ships. Why should any company be required to build ten ships when, according to Lloyd's register, six million tons of shipping are laid up and available for this purpose? When the government in this contract admits and recognizes, as does Sir William Petersen, that a sufficient quantity of that tonnage is of modern construction and properly equipped, when you can go into the open market to-day and purchase tonnage at rates for which it cannot be built, why insist upon the building of new ships? Furthermore, under this contract, why permit the money of the taxpayers of this country to be used in building ships not only outside of this country, but for that matter in Germany or in any other foreign country, if the company so desires? Under this contract these ships may be built anywhere. For instance I noticed in this morning's paper that a German company had outbid British companies and had obtained a great contract for shipbuilding. May not the same thing happen in this instance? The thought is preposterous, that, with unemployment existing as it does in Canada with industry in its present deplorable condition, the money of Canadian taxpayers may be permitted to be used in constructing ships in foreign countries. Moreover, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) the other evening asserted that these ships could be built for $600,000 apiece. I thought surely that could not be the case; that the government would not give Sir William Petersen a million dollars a ship when he could get these ships for $600,000 apiece. I have investigated that and I am assured that these ships can be built in England for £150,000 apiece.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend ought to be more careful in the statements he is making. The government is not giving Sir William Petersen any money for building ships. The contract with him is a contract to allow the government to control ocean rates, and in consideration of the government being given control of ocean rates, of fixing whatever rates it wishes on whatever commodities are transported, the government proposes to give Sir William Petersen a certain amount after the service is performed. Nothing is said as to where the ships are to be built.

Mr. CLARK: That is what I object to. I object most emphatically that nothing is said as to where the ships are to be built. What I wish to point out is this, that though the money is not being advanced merely for the purpose of building the ships, the subsidy actually exceeds the cost of the ships. If we are going to advance nearly twice as much as is necessary to build these ships, why not own them ourselves? Then, we might have an opportunity of fixing the rates. At this point, it might be fitting to refer to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. If this is such a good scheme, why not turn these ships over to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine which has available to-day sixty ships with a total tonnage of 360,000 odd tons as compared with the Petersen tonnage of 90,000 tons? The Canadian Government Merchant Marine has available to-day over 400 per cent more tonnage than Petersen will have when he gets all his ships built.

4 p.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are no good.

Mr. CLARK: Oh, I am glad to hear the Prime Minister assert that the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are no good. I have been assured by shipping men on the Pacific coast and on the Atlantic coast that these ships are suited for the trade. On the Pacific I see these ships going out and coming in with full cargoes, I see them performing a great service to us in British Columbia. And I raise this objection right now, that the Prime Minister under this contract has made no provision for the Pacific coast. That is another discrimination against the western route and the Pacific coast for which he is personally responsible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will study this contract he will see it contains a provision whereby the government is free to make the same arrangements with any other shipping companies—the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, the Canadian Pacific or any other shipping company. The government reserves that right and may exercise it at any time from any port.

Mr. CLARK: I am objecting that the Prime Minister has not made that arrangement now with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. If it is such a good proposition, why pass over our own ships?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Wait and see how this works out. We are not taking chances of any loss on the contract.

Mr. CLARK: The Prime Minister stated the other day that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine was not withdrawn earlier from the combine because he was afraid the combine would immediately attempt to put the Canadian Government Merchant Marine out of business. In other words, he was afraid to have the Dominion of Canada go to war with this combine. But he selects Sir William Petersen—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he did not select him.

Mr. CLARK: Sir William Petersen—a man without a fleet—the Prime Minister selects him to go to war with this combine. Some one remarks that you might as well go to war against the combine or conference with a hay rake or with a bow and arrow, and it is only too true. If this is a good scheme, and even assuming—which I flatly contradict—that, as the Prime Minister says, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships are no good,—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those that are not in use, yes.

Mr. CLARK: That is qualifying his first assertion. There are only nine not in use on the ocean.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh no.

Mr. CLARK: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon. I see the 1924 report states there are fifteen ships out of commission, leaving forty-five ships in commission—over four times the number that Petersen will have when he is fully equipped. And ours are bigger ships. We have twenty-five ships of over 8,000 tons and two of over 10,000 tons. I suggest that if this scheme is a good one, and if the Prime Minister has confidence in the management of Sir Henry Thornton and the officials of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, then, even assuming for the sake of argument that these ships are no good, as the Prime Minister asserts—the Canadian Government Merchant Marine might be made a great paying proposition. At present they are losing in operating expenses approximately $2,000,000 a year. Now, this is a good proposal, and if we gave Sir Henry Thornton these ten ships which the Prime Minister is having Petersen build, what would be the result? I would refer the House to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which will be found on page 722 of Hansard, that one of these Petersen ships operating from Montreal to Liverpool with a certain cargo and back again in ballast could make a net profit on the round trip of £3,000. Now then, taking the Minister of Trade and Commerce at his word —and I assume the Prime Minister endorses his colleague's statement—that would mean that each of these Petersen ships in five trips from Montreal to Liverpool would make £15,000 apiece, or for the ten ships a total net profit of £150,000. That is for only a portion of the year. It is fair to expect that they might double that profit, but let us say that they make a further £125,000 profit, that would give Petersen a total net profit for the season of £275,000, or $1,350,000. Now, Petersen's net investment is going to be approximately $6,000,000, so this return gives him 20 per cent net profit on the investment of which he does not put up a cent. The taxpayers of this country put up the capital and he makes 20 per cent on the investment according to the minister's own figures. If we could add that net profit to the net revenue of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, we would pretty nearly wipe out the deficit, and with a few more ships we would turn it into a profit; that is, if the minister's argument is well founded.

Furthermore, assuming its soundness, if Sir William Petersen, without putting up a cent of capital, with his ships built at the country's expense, can make 20 per cent net profit per annum on their cost, why give him a subsidy? Why not allow him to build his own ships and make the 20 per cent? What necessity is there for any subsidy?

Mr. McMURRAY: If it is a fact that under the contract the government controls the rates, will they not necessarily control the man's profits and his rate of profit?

Mr. CLARK: I suggest that if the government does not allow Sir William Petersen to charge exactly the rates which are being charged by the conference lines to-day, he will say, "The subsidy is of no use to me; I withdraw." Then the government can do nothing, for there is no penalty provided. He gets the subsidy, that is all.

Mr. McTAGGART: What did the hon. member say it would cost to build those ships?

Mr. CLARK: It will cost $600,000 apiece; $6,000,000 for the ten.

Mr. DUFF: Does the hon. member say that the government is going to put up $6,000,000 to build the ships?

Mr. CLARK: No. If the hon. member had been here a few moments ago and heard the discussion between the Prime Minister and myself on that point he would not have asked the question.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, I was here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The government only pays a little more than twice that.

Mr. PARENT: That does not make it any clearer.

Mr. DUFF: Will the hon. member answer my question: Does he say that the government intends to put up the $6,000,000 to build those ships?

Mr. CLARK: Most assuredly I will answer the question. What I say is this: The government is giving a subsidy to Sir William Petersen of $1,300,000 odd when he provides the ten ships.

Mr. DUFF: That does not answer my question.

Mr. CLARK: I will answer the question if my hon. friend gives me the chance. I have already answered it, but I will try to oblige my hon. friend. Sir William Petersen or his company will get $1,300,000 odd annually. All he must do is supply a fleet of ten ships, which will cost him $6,000,000. If Sir William Petersen is any sort of financier he can have the ships built on credit and he will not have to put up a cent himself. At the end of ten years he will have received from this country about $13,330,000 and his capital investment will have been only $6,000,000.

Mr. DUFF: Will my hon. friend allow me another question? Suppose three weeks after these ten ships are built and put in operation they are all lost, will Sir William Petersen get the $13,000,000 that the hon. gentleman is talking about?

Mr. CLARK: No, but I presume he will get the insurance.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, out of which he would have to meet the cost of his ships; he would not get it from this government. My hon. friend said he would get it from the government.

Mr. CLARK: Oh, the subsidy might end in many ways. Sir William Petersen may say at any time: "This government is not dealing fairly with me," and he may quit when he pleases without penalty.

An hon. MEMBER: In that event he would not get the subsidy.

Mr. CLARK: It might be interesting at this point to consider the capacity of these ships and what effect this contract will have upon the rates fixed by the conference lines. The total capacity of one of these ships for one season, if engaged exclusively in the carrying of grain out of the port of Montreal, would be a little over 1,300,000 bushels. This is on the basis of four and a half trips a season, on the average, so that the total fleet would carry about 13,000,000 bushels. Now, in 1924 there were shipped out of the port of Montreal about 152,000,000 bushels of grain, and of that amount over 80,000,000 bushels consisted of grain that came from the United States and was shipped out by the harbour commission. So that if we extended this subsidy five-fold, if we gave Sir William Petersen a fleet of fifty ships, the best he could do would be to carry out of the port of Montreal about 65,000,000 bushels of grain in one season. He could not even carry the American grain that goes through that port; with a subsidy amounting to considerably over $6,600,000 a year. Thus if an attempt is made to make the service worth while, a subsidy five times what is now proposed would not begin to meet the case. We might involve this country in the payment of nearly $70,000,000 by way of subsidy, but even at that we could not move the American grain that annually goes through the port of Montreal.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Why not make it $100,000,000 while you are at it?

Mr. CLARK: Well, you can make it $100,000,000 in all, and over a period of ten years the Minister of Agriculture will not succeed in moving much more than the total amount of American grain offering for shipment at Montreal.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Keep on figuring and make it $200,000,000.

Mr. CLARK: I am putting these figures on Hansard; if the Minister of Agriculture sits down and works them out he will find them to be correct.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested the other day that the government was going to control the situation, that only Canadian commodities would be carried on these ships. Now, let us see what this cast-iron contract provides in that regard. Paragraph (d) of clause 1 says:

> That the control and regulation of the rates to be charged by the contractor shall rest with the government of Canada and that the government shall fix such transportation rates on all commodities from time to time.

There is not one word in this contract which enables the government to say what commodities shall be carried. The government may fix a fancy schedule of rates covering hundreds of commodities; it may fix rates on three or four commodities which may be regarded as favourable to the carrier. Sir William Petersen may under this contract carry those commodities on which favourable rates are fixed to the exclusion of all others, and there is no power on the part of the government to say he must not do that. I am quite prepared to have my opinion on that point submitted to any reputable lawyer in this country, even to Mr. Lafleur, who drew this contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is aside from the question. I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but does he contend that the government has not the right to fix rates on the commodities?

Mr. CLARK: I am not talking about that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the whole point. The government can fix whatever rates it pleases on whatever commodities it pleases.

Mr. DUFF: On all commodities.

Mr. CLARK: Most assuredly; and if the government fixes favourable rates on a few commodities Sir William Petersen may carry those commodities to the exclusion of all the others upon which the government has fixed lower rates. That is the fact, under this agreement.

Mr. DUFF: Will my hon. friend refer to clause (d), in which it says—

Mr. CLARK: I have given it.

Mr. DUFF: Will he refer to it again? He will see it provides that the government can fix the rates on all commodities, not on some commodities. Does that not cover everything?

Mr. CLARK: Certainly; the government may prepare a most complicated schedule covering every known or imaginable commodity, and Sir William Petersen may pick from that schedule the commodities he chooses to carry. He may carry those commodities upon which favourable rates are fixed, and he may do so to the exclusion of those commodities on which low rates are fixed.

Mr. DUFF: No, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not?

Mr. DUFF: It says "all commodities."

Mr. CLARK: Further, if Sir William Petersen so desires, under this clause he may carry American grain to the exclusion of Canadian grain. I do not say that he will; I do not suggest that at all; but I do suggest that it will be impossible for the contractor or any carrier to distinguish between American and Canadian grain. They are mixed, and Sir William Petersen may carry, and will carry, American grain out of the port of Montreal; in other words the Prime Minister is subsidizing Sir William Petersen in order to relieve the already overburdened taxpayer of the United States by carrying the commodities that are grown in the United States and shipped through the port of Montreal. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. PUTNAM: If the grains are mixed, is not that the utmost physical proof that the government could control the rate on Canadian grain?

Mr. CLARK: I am not talking about rates, but about the Prime Minister's suggestion that he can insist upon Sir William Petersen carrying Canadian commodities to the exclusion of American commodities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but he keeps referring to me all the time and misrepresenting my point of view. I hope he will not think if I sit silent that I agree with what he says. By specifying the commodities on which the low rates are to be given, and with the rates fixed by the government, I think the matter would be settled as to carrying Canadian commodities.

Mr. CLARK: Is there a difference between Canadian wheat and American wheat?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A very distinct difference. The government will fix a rate for Canadian wheat, and Canadian wheat and no other wheat will get the benefit of that lower rate.

Mr. CLARK: How can the Prime Minister distinguish between Canadian and American wheat? Will he have American wheat come into one elevator and Canadian wheat into another? Must they be kept separate, or is he going to prohibit American wheat from coming into Montreal at all? That is what will happen if he attempts any such thing.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Why does the hon. member pick out wheat alone? We are practically all aware that wheat is not included in the conference rates.

Mr. CLARK: I chose wheat only for the purpose of illustration, and because it is the commodity that probably fifty members to my left are more interested in than any other. I might just as well take half a dozen other commodities.

Mr. LEADER: Take cattle.

Mr. CLARK: I will take cattle, but if my hon. friend will bear with me, I will take cattle when I come to the Preston report.

There is one other paragraph in the contract to which I would like to refer. It is paragraph 1 (f), by which the contractor agrees to:

> Carry emigrants from Great Britain or the continent of Europe at rates to be fixed by the government and carry all Canadian mails free if and when the parties hereto agree upon the establishment of a passenger service or other steamers suitable for the carriage of emigrants in conjunction with and under the control of the shipping company.

Now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in introducing this resolution, stated repeatedly that there was nothing retarding immigration to this country more to-day than the action of this gigantic combine. The tragedy of this covenant is that there is no provision in these ten ships which the subsidy covers for the carriage of one single immigrant; no provision whatever, and yet the minister as his main point in favour of this subsidy says that nothing is retarding immigration to this country to-day more than the action of this gigantic combine. That is the reason he advances why we should adopt this agreement. There is a real tragedy in this covenant. We have to-day space in the ships which are coming to New York and Montreal for well over a million immigrants a year for Canada. We have space in the ships which call at Canadian ports alone for over 350,000 immigrants to Canada annually; and that space is not being utilized. In the United States, until they introduced their quota law they were securing upwards of one million immigrants a year on these same ships which are still travelling the same routes; but when the quota law came into effect, immigration to the United States was cut down to about 360,000 annually. The United States have now a waiting list of would-be immigrants, probably the pick of the immigrants from the whole of the Mother Country and Europe, sufficient to fill their quota for many years to come, showing full well that there are immigrants who are ready and willing to come to Canada, and to pay the rates at present existing if we have anything here to offer them. The tragedy, Mr. Speaker, is that we have no attractions to offer immigrants to-day; we have the immigrants ready and willing to come, but we have no work for them. The minister says that nothing is retarding immigration to this country more than the action of this gigantic combine. He might just as well say that the exodus annually to the United States of 200,000 of our best young men, upon whom we have spent millions of dollars to rear and educate, the very life blood of this country—he might just as well say that that exodus is due to the action of this gigantic combine. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that until this country has attractions to offer, we cannot hope to have a free flow of immigrants to this country, and I want to say this to my friends particularly to my left: Until this country has a general tariff equal to that of the United States—and some time my hon. friends to my left will be believers in that—we cannot hope to make this country attractive to immigrants, because we shall have no work to offer them. If we do not encourage industry, and if we do not stop the flow of manufactured goods from the United States to this country, we cannot hope to offer opportunities to immigrants.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the hon. member not realize that in the year 1913, when we had a tariff, conditions were just as bad as they are to-day?

Mr. CLARK: In 1913, in my city, and in nearly every city and town and village of Canada, we all had full pockets, and we had 400,000 immigrants in that year. While I am on that point, let me suggest this to my hon. friends to my left: Supposing we had a free flow of immigrants to this country, supposing that every inch of space in these immigrant ships was taken up, that we had say 350,000 immigrants a year; that would provide a return cargo from the Mother Country which is not being provided to-day. The shipping men complain that there is no return cargo. Well, there is an opportunity to provide a return cargo, and if it is provided—

Mr. MARTELL: If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt I should like to ask him what the bringing in of immigrants has to do with this question? My hon. friend is a lawyer, he knows the rule, res inter alios acta, as regards evidence.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend possibly was not in the House when I took this matter up.

Mr. MARTELL: It has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. CLARK: I was reading from a covenant in the agreement with respect to the bringing in of immigrants.

Mr. MARTELL: I do not speak merely for the sake of interrupting, but I point out to my hon. friend that we are dealing with freight, not with immigrants.

Mr. CLARK: I am dealing now with the covenant contained in this agreement with Sir William Petersen that he will carry immigrants from Great Britain or the continent of Europe at rates to be fixed by the government, and so on. In addition to the argument that the free movement of emigrants into this country would assist all of us in securing cheaper rates on cargo outbound I suggest this: That if we stopped the present tremendous flow of manufactured goods from the United States, we could then negotiate proper and advantageous trade treaties with the other British dominions and with the Mother Country herself, and thus provide infinitely larger return cargoes which would react to our benefit when we were shipping outwards. It is only by filling these ships both ways that we can hope to secure a really equitable distribution not only of cargo but of freight rates.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does the hon. gentleman realize that a reduction in the duty on British goods coming into Canada would help to fill these ships with return cargoes, and would he be in favour of that policy?

Mr. CLARK: Absolutely no, and I will tell my hon. friend why: My whole argument is to stimulate Canadian industry first. Secondly, having stimulated Canadian industry and having made it possible for emigrants to flow into this country our next duty would be to stimulate trade with the Mother Country, and with the other British dominions as well, by diverting trade from the United States. I will show my hon. friend the great necessity for that. In 1923 our total imports amounted to $802,579,244. Out of that total the United States sent us $540,989,738, while the Mother Country only sent us $141,330,143. Now, what I say is let us divert some of that trade with the United States to the Mother Country. But first of all let us stimulate Canadian industry.

Mr. EVANS: What means would the hon. gentleman use as a stimulus?

Mr. CLARK: I mean just what I said. We should have a tariff on a parity with that of the United States, wherever possible, first of all in order to stimulate Canadian industry, in order to provide employment for our idle workers, and in order to stop the exodus of 200,000 of our best young men annually to the United States. When we do that we will attract other people to our country.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): How do you account for the unemployment situation in the United States? According to the official figures last year was the worst year they had in that respect, and there were in the city of Brooklyn alone over 300,000 persons out of employment.

Mr. CLARK: I am not discussing conditions in the United States just now but I will tell you this: In the year of the presidential election there is always depression in the country to the south. If my hon. friend will examine the figures issued by the United States Steel Corporation, or any other great corporation throughout the American union, he will find there has been a tremendous increase in the orders placed with industrial concerns, and there is no longer much unemployment in the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer very briefly to the Preston report. I am going to take several statements from that report, chosen at random, for the purpose of showing that that report might just as well be thrown into the waste paper basket and the country saved further expense in giving consideration to the recommendations made therein. On page 3 Mr. Preston says:

> I was in a position to get in touch with all the interests concerned, without unnecessary delay.

Every interest concerned denies that Mr. Preston was ever in touch with it. On page 4 he accuses the Canadian Pacific of having bought out the Elder-Dempster Steamship Company in order to destroy it as a competitor against the interests of the combine. Now, the Canadian Pacific Ocean Steamship service have issued a statement that the Elder-Dempster Steamship Company was purchased long before they were ever a member of the conference. I am prepared to accept the statement of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Steamship service, because I do not believe it would make such a statement if it were not perfectly true. Then Mr. Preston says on page 6:

> According to the records of the Department of Trade and Commerce, a pronounced discrimination was immediately declared against Canadian ports and in favour of American ports as the settled policy of this steamship combine.

I do not know much about rates, but I do know that Canadian goods can reach American ports as cheaply in many instances as they can reach Canadian ports, and yet we find that Canadian goods are exported via Canadian ports despite the allegation that ocean rates from American ports are lower than from Canadian ports. I have not the statement before me but I think it will be found in the form of an answer to a question in to-day's Hansard that during the last two years less than three millions out of nearly three hundred millions of imports from the Mother Country came via Canadian ports. Now if there is discrimination in favour of American ports why would not more of these goods come via those ports? If there is that discrimination why is American wheat not exported via American ports? Why is the port of Montreal chosen? Think of it, eighty million bushels of American grain, more than one-half the total shipment from the port of Montreal, are shipped through that port in preference to New York, or other maritime ports in the United States. Why do we have that situation if the assertion in question is true?

Then on page 23 we find the assertion to which I have already referred, that the advantages intended to be given by the British preference have long since been swallowed up by the increased cost of ocean transportation.

The answer to that was given by my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) years ago and was confirmed by the Dominions Royal Commission page 11. There is a significant paragraph on page 25:

> The conclusion is inevitable that a combine exists between all trans-Atlantic shipping lines running regularly between Great Britain and the continent of Europe and the Dominion of Canada.

You will note that the whole Dominion of Canada is included; yet I say again that the western route has been once more given the go-by by this government. This simply adds to the record of the government's attitude toward British Columbia on the question of the mountain scale, the western grain rate and the customs officer at New York. And now we find in this Petersen agreement no provision for sailings from Vancouver. Judging from the rates charged on wheat from the port of Vancouver, one would take it that if there is a discrimination that discrimination is against the port of Vancouver rather than the port of Montreal. I find that the rates on wheat from Vancouver to the United Kingdom ranged between twenty-two and twenty-six cents for the first part of 1924, and were around nineteen and twenty-two cents from July on. The rates from Montreal to Liverpool ranged from 6.8 to 10.3 per bushel during May, June, July and August; between 8.3 and 9.3 in September; between 9.1 and 9.9 in October and around 10.6 in November. The distance from Vancouver to London is 8,852 miles while the distance from Montreal to London 3,241 miles. This would seem to indicate, as I say, that if there is any discrimination in ocean rates it is as against Vancouver on the western route. But no attempt is made by this government to take care of that situation. One more statement appears at page 26:

> The effect of the administration or operation of the Atlantic steamship combine in connection with Canadian imports and exports is to almost isolate Canada from other ports of the world to which communication can only be secured by ocean route.

The extravagance of that statement needs no comment. There is one other statement which my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) asks me to discuss, and that is the question of cattle shipments. At page 21 the Preston report states:

> The tragedy of the Alberta cattle industry must be largely laid to the determination of the north Atlantic steamship combine to keep the ocean rate at an exceptionally high figure.

I suggest that the tragedy of the Alberta cattle industry must be largely attributed to the determination of the United States to enforce the Fordney McCumber tariff, and I will prove that assertion by the figures. In 1920 the number of cattle shipped to the United Kingdom was 479, the value being $70,200; to the United States in the same year there were shipped 415,956 head of cattle, the value of which was $41,226,445. In 1921 we shipped to the United Kingdom 131, the value of which was $19,350, while to the United States we shipped 221,278, the value of which amounted to $19,759,329. This shows a shrinkage of considerably over fifty per cent in one year under the operations of that tariff. The next year, with the embargo off,—that is to say, in 1922—we shipped to the United Kingdom 35,418 head of cattle the value of which was $4,139,391 and to the United States 121,060, the value being $3,299,633. In 1923 we shipped to the United Kingdom 25,758 the value of which was $2,809,786 and to the United States 199,272 the value of which was $5,609,998. I come now to 1924, when we shipped to the United Kingdom 59,486 valued at $6,287,815 while we shipped to the United States 98,322 the value being $3,683,836.

That table will show conclusively what a remarkable business was built up in two or three years with the United Kingdom in the cattle trade. It may be quite true that improvements can be made in the matter of ocean transportation; I do not dispute that for one moment. Indeed, I hope that improvements can be brought about; and if the rates are not satisfactory now I sincerely trust they will be made so, in order that the Alberta cattle industry may prosper, as it deserves to prosper, through a substantial trade with the Mother Country. But let us bear this in mind. The British mercantile marine has rendered this country, throughout its history, signal service in building up its trade. It has carried practically all the trade of this country and made it possible for us to become the fifth or sixth greatest exporting country in the world to-day. This is due, I say, largely to the British mercantile marine. Nor can I forget that during the war it made it possible not only for agriculture but for the industries generally in Canada to expand, as they had never expanded before in the history of the country. Once more, it was the British mercantile marine that did duty for Canada when Canada had no ships and no protection for her trade routes. At that time she relied for her mercantile service upon the British mercantile marine, and for the protection of her trade routes upon the British navy. Had it not been for the export trade which Canada was able to build up with the Mother Country in those days the financial interests of this country would have been crushed, and Canada, to use a popular expression, would have gone broke. It was, I emphasize, due to the British mercantile marine and the British navy that we were able to continue our trade and to expand. Now, under these circumstances, I suggest that there is no justification for an open declaration of war on the British mercantile marine on the part of this government. The course suggested by the Dominions Royal Commission is the proper course to adopt; that is to say, there should be a conference between the dominions and the Mother Country and if necessary joint action by all. Certainly, there should be no isolated and foolish action on our part; there should be no attempt to attack with a pea shooter as this government proposes to do by means of the Petersen contract. That is not the sort of action we want; we want action that will display some vision. And the only way we can accomplish anything satisfactory is by means of a conference between the dominions and the Mother Country, in an attempt to solve the question of the control of ocean rates. In my opinion there must be an Empire board if results are expected.

I therefore move:

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the chair but that it be resolved: That effective control of ocean rates can be exercised only with the co-operation of all portions of the empire, and by a body on which all are represented, and the contract made by the government with Sir William Petersen, based on the report of W. T. R. Preston is ill-advised, costly and futile and unworthy of the serious consideration of this House.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to be any Heracles, undertaking some difficult labour like that distinguished hero of Greek mythology, but I have to put my hand to something to try to clear up the situation now before the House. I am impelled to do this by reason of the proposal introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low). I agree with a good deal of what he has said as to a shipping combine known as the North Atlantic Shipping Conference, existing, as it does, to the prejudice of Canadian farmers and shippers generally. The evidence that has been offered here is in the direction that such a combine exists. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) quoted the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), when he was head of the Board of Railway Commissioners, as encountering that combine in England. We have heard the evidence of the Masseys and many other importers and farmers in Canada who have run up against this combine. No matter what is said in the way of justification, I believe absolutely that the shippers of Canada have a grievance against the concerns that are in this combine, this "conference" as it is called —they have a fine, mellifluous, nosegay manner of calling themselves a "conference," but it is a combine against shippers, farmers, manufacturers, indeed, against everybody in Canada who is trying to do business. There have been a dozen commissions investigating it, over a period of, not one year or two years but ten or fifteen years and this work still continues. Wherever you go, you hear of it.

The government has introduced a proposition to do away with it, and it may be possible for the government to do something to improve the situation. My contention, however, is that the government has not approached the problem in the right way. I am going rather out of my way, perhaps—and this is altogether on my own account—to suggest a way out of the difficulty and to start business and everything else in Canada on the up-grade again. What is my suggestion? It is this, that an effort ought to be made to incorporate the Canadian Pacific Railway and its steamship lines with the Canadian National Railways on fair terms. In that way we would start with a very high-class steamship line, with not only passenger vessels, but freight steamers and lake steamers of all kinds, and we would have something on which we could rely. That is a big proposition, but it is not an impossible one and it is one well worthy of consideration. I am not proposing anything that might be a financial failure. Everybody knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway, with its steamship lines, has been a successful proposition. It has made money from the start. It is a company that has not only a great railway doing a big business, but these steamship lines. It has a huge cash surplus and another surplus of undivided profits out of the land grants it received earlier in its career.

We have before us great problems of every kind and we are trying to solve these problems by creating new companies and making new deals and agreements with people outside this country. That has been tried long enough and we have failed. We propose, however, to continue these experiments in the same direction. I venture to predict that the agreement now submitted to the House will end where the Crowsnest pass agreement ended, it will end in a dispute which will go to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and we shall have no relief for years. We must originate something in this country, and in doing what I suggest we shall be doing something towards clearing up the railway situation. Canada has been over-railroaded to death. We have all the roads that have been built in this country one after another for one reason or another during the past sixty or seventy years. We have had to take many of them over, and we have gone into debt in connection with the Grand Trunk, Grand Trunk Pacific, Canadian Northern and a number of other companies. Others wish to impose themselves upon the country. The Canadian Pacific is the complement of the Canadian National if the two can be put together in some fair way. I believe that is possible and I want to suggest to the government that, instead of dealing with the Petersen syndicate, they ought to see if there is not a way of making an arrangement between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National to consolidate the two into one system owned absolutely by the people of Canada. As to how that is to be brought about, I am not going into details at the moment but will refer to that later on. Let me point out the immediate and absolute advantages of any such combination.

5 p.m.

As I said, the country is over-railroaded and we want relief from that. Just to show what the extravagance has been in the past—and it has not ended—we hear that the Canadian National, the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario, a provincial road, and the Canadian Pacific are all laying plans to build lines into the new mineral country in Quebec and Ontario. One company could do all that work instead of three lines being built, and great economy could be effected thereby. There are other cases where immense savings could be made. By consolidating the two roads, you cut out all unnecessary services, and what is more important, you re-route the services on the combinations that are available. For instance, you would re-route the great freight lines across the continent and all the local services in all the provinces.

At the present time one road has the best grade here, the other road has the best grade there; one system has the best passes through the mountains, the other the best bridges over the rivers. But if we consolidated these lines and took advantage of the economies that come from re-routing and stopping of unnecessary rivalry, we would save millions of dollars to the people of Canada, and we would at the same time acquire a great railway service and a great steamship service; and the latter would do everything that we seek to accomplish by this contract, and moreover the ships would be absolutely our own.

But that is only a few of the economies that might be effected. How much longer can this country stand the competition that is now going on between the two great systems? I live in Toronto, I go between there and Ottawa every week, and I see the two systems competing for business that one system could handle just as well and save a great waste of money. There are three or four transcontinental trains daily that are unnecessary, probably they are losing money, and a consolidation would put an end to that loss. As between Toronto and Montreal there is unnecessary duplication of service. The same remark applies to the local services, for example, out of Toronto, where two lines are competing for traffic that one line could handle just as well and with a great reduction in cost of operation.

My suggestion therefore is that an effort should be made to effect a combination along the lines I have stated in order to solve our transportation problems both on land and sea. And undoubtedly our ocean-borne traffic has been held back for many years and the attitude of the shipping companies is a menace to this country. Some people will ask, "Could Canada run a steamship service?" Well, I answer that the officials of the Canadian Pacific steamships, having made a great success of their business, would make an even greater success of such a consolidated steamship service as I am proposing. In a hundred other ways there could be effected great savings, to the advantage of Canada generally and to the building up of our commerce and industry. Unfortunately Canada is to-day affected by pernicious anaemia, in other words, over-railroading. But, by consolidating and developing our own steamship lines instead of attempting to make a deal with an outside shipping company we would benefit the whole country.

When I suggest consolidating the Canadian Pacific with the Canadian National, I am not proposing anything in the way of taking over a non-paying railway. The Canadian Pacific to-day is one of the most successful railways on the North American continent. It has been built up, it is true, after the granting of large bonuses by the government, but it is a success, and if it were incorporated with the Canadian National system to-morrow the consolidation would improve the whole railway and economic condition of the country. A good many million dollars would be needed to finance the consolidation, but in effect it would finance itself. Some people may be alarmed at the idea of our incurring further liabilities. But they are mistaken, the consolidation I propose would carry itself absoluely and would strengthen the railway situation. All we need is courage to go ahead. Unhappily, some people are trying to promote the idea that there should be a continuance of this unnecessary competition in railway and marine transportation. That is wrong. The consolidated railways and the consolidated shipping systems would be a success from the outset, and we would begin to save millions of dollars, and, furthermore, we would begin to build up the country. But instead of taking this course it is proposed to embark on a deal with a shipping company in England over which we would have no effective control, and I fear if the contract is confirmed by parliament it will result in lawsuits and will delay the solution of the problem of ocean transportation.

I appeal to the House and to the government to see if it is not possible to put our own railways and our own steamship lines into one consolidation. To-day the Canadian National railway is one of the greatest public-owned transportation systems in the world, it is rapidly growing into a profitable business, and it has the absolute confidence of the people to-day. That is its great merit. The one flaw in the record of the Canadian Pacific is that it is not owned by the people of Canada. The control of it is not in Canada, it is in the investing public, who make their headquarters in London and New York, and any day that line may pass out of our hands. Now is the time to secure it. If I can read the signs of the times, and I do read some of the propaganda that I see in the papers, I imagine—although of course I have no authority from the Canadian Pacific to make the statement—I imagine that that company would be prepared to enter into a reasonable arrangement for consolidation with the Canadian National, especially if it imposed no real charges upon the people of this country. Such a consolidation would improve the railway service and, most important of all, the road would be absolutely the property of the Dominion. Can that consolidation be worked out? I say it can. I am quite sure that if the president of the Canadian National and the president of the Canadian Pacific sat down together they could conclude a satisfactory arrangement. Really it is very simple, for there are no financial propositions to be taken care of. Indeed, the consolidation takes care of itself, and for the first time it would take from the shoulders of the people the burden of operating lines that do not at present pay.

Some critics would of course raise objections to my proposal. I cannot help that. Let us find out if it can be effected. When it is objected by my critics that such a consolidation cannot be effected successfully, I say that what the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific have done as two single lines can be done even more effectively when they are combined in one great system. And the same remark applies to the steamship services, especially if supplemented by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. "Oh," other critics say, "Australia has failed in its steamship venture." Perhaps it has, but perhaps it did not have the efficient management which we have and which would ensure our consolidated steamship lines being a paying proposition. My further answer to that is that we have accomplished it so far as the Canadian Pacific is concerned. They can handle a steamship line and succeed, and I am quite confident it could be successfully handled in connection with the consolidated national lines.

Mr. PUTNAM: All government owned?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): All government owned, absolutely. There is another criticism of this course, namely, that if we had only one road in this country we would not be able to handle the labour unions. Well, that objection disappears when you take into consideration the fact that the brotherhoods of to-day, while they do deal with two roads, are united. They will be united, and I am confident that there will be no trouble in that connection. There has been no trouble since the Canadian Pacific achieved its success and since the Canadian National started. The result has been better service, and that would be the case under the new status.

The question may be asked: How could this be done—it is an enormous proposition. The common stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which is really the only thing you have to consider, is valued at about $300,000,000 and to-day it is paying ten per cent. That common stock could be changed, perhaps, into a five per cent debenture carrying no voting power, which would sell at 120 or 130 in a market like that to-day; it would be one of the great securities of the world. By proceeding in that fashion there would be no great commitment upon the country—nothing like what is involved in the proposal now before the House for the creation of a steamship service.

I want to refer to some of the advantages that would come from this consolidation. I have spoken about the unnecessary competition of two lines when one line would do. There is also the unnecessary competition in getting and retaining business. Does anybody know what the cost of the personnel to canvass for railroad freights in this country is? Has anybody any idea of the law costs in connection with two big systems, one fighting the other? Has anybody an idea of the cost of the propaganda that these two roads are now spending their money on? Practically all that would disappear under the system. Some men might be put out of employment, but these men could be taken care of as regards their wages and still great saving could be made. All I am urging is that the government take this into consideration; I am simply throwing out the suggestion in order that the people may be seized of the fact that it is within the realm of possibility. It would be an ultimate solution of our transportation problem both by water and by land for all time to come. Are we to continue our present foolish over-competition as between these two lines, at enormous expense? Are we to continue building unnecessary lines? I attended the conference where the proposal came up in connection with a railway outlet from the Peace river country. After a great deal of talk there, and after it had been suggested that either the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National, or both, should build into that country, the conference at last got wise—the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) and the premiers of the visiting provinces who discussed the question all spoke of one thing, namely, the necessity for co-operation and the cutting down of unnecessary expense with the ultimate object of reducing freight rates and getting better service. The people are sick and tired of the unnecessary railroads we have in Canada to-day and of the suggestion that they are to be increased and extended for generations to come. Let us stop all that.

Many other savings could be accomplished; I have not time to mention them now. But let me say just here that the decision of this House yesterday marks a new era in the history of our country. After a great deal of discussion the House of Commons decided that they would begin—and properly so—to consider the question of constitutional amendment as the right of this House. I say that was one of the most significant things that ever took place in this country, and an even more significant thing would be to decide upon the consolidation of our railway lines and the taking over of the steamship lines of the Canadian Pacific, thus not only effecting great saving of money but also increasing by three-fold the efficiency of our transportation system.

Now I want to come back to the steamship combine. I am told that my good old friend Aimé Geoffrion is coming here to present the the case of the North Atlantic Shipping Conference. That "conference" is a great word. It reminds me a good deal of the evangelical attitude of men like Gladstone and John Bright in the old days when they were speaking against the opium evil. That same attitude seems to be adopted by these—I shall not call them pirates, but they are pretty nearly that if we are to believe half of what is said about the shipping combine. Well, Mr. Geoffrion is to come here, with tall black hat, I suppose, umbrella or cane, and white spats, and he is going to tell us in the manner of some of the Englishmen: "Oh, my dear fellow, it is all in the drafting; it is not in the rates." But it is in the rates; it is in the four-ply charges that the people of Canada have to pay in connection with shipping.

I can go to history for an example of a cure for an evil like this. Oliver Cromwell three hundred years ago had under his command during the civil war in England a number of hard riding cavalry men. One day one of his fodder sergeants came to him complaining of the prices he had to pay for the hay, straw and oats which he picked up as best he could from among the dealers in England. Cromwell listened to him and said: "Go back to these men and tell them that I want my penny's worth for my penny." Now, the people of Canada who have this grievance against the shipping conference should say to them, "I want my penny's worth for my penny"—and they will get it. But they will have to get it in some better way than by making a proposition to the Petersen Company, and the way to do it is by a consolidation of the Canadian Pacific with the Canadian National, making the two the property of one company, and putting the management under the two presidents and some members associated with the two lines.

Mr. PUTNAM: Would not that be very long delayed?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, it could be done in three weeks; this other proposal will take three years, and we will make no headway. Speaking of how an arrangement of this kind could be worked out, I saw a rather prominent citizen of Canada not long ago who had an agreement to draw. He met the other side; they came to see him from New York, and they brought with them several geologists, lawyers and other experts. But this man said, "No; if you want to make an arrangement with me, I will sit down and draft it," and he drafted it on a single sheet of foolscap paper; and the other fellow said, "That is exactly what I want," and they sent home all the lawyers and experts of various kinds who were there to check over the agreement. I believe an agreement could be drafted between these two great railroad companies in very short order, and once the agreement was drawn up, and the property became the property of the people of Canada, after provision had been made for the interests of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific, there would be no more disputes over that agreement, and no more going to the courts. We have put off matters year after year; you ought to see the documents that are accumulating. We had brought down to us the other day the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Crowsnest pass case. Do you think that is going to be settled now? No, the case is going to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for settlement, I suppose; and so will this Petersen agreement. But, once we had our own railroads and steamships, and the government took the responsibility of administering them, we could settle all these transportation problems, all these rate and traffic problems right here in parliament. We ought to keep the authority here. We should not have to go to the courts; we should not have to carry all these unnecessary expenses with which the country is now burdened. Not only would there be that advantage, but it would stop all this unnecessary competition, all this waste of money, and we would get a real steamship line, and get it this year.

I say that such an agreement could be closed within six weeks or three months from to-day. I got a card to-day from a prosperity league telling how to build up Canada; they have various proposals, but I say that the one thing that will do more in the way of bringing prosperity in this country will be to stop all this unnecessary competition between the railroads by consolidating these services. Look what you would get, for instance, by the consolidation of the telegraph and express business under one management, instead of two competing all the time for business. The competition may be good, or it may not be; but it is a great waste of money, and we cannot afford it. We must reduce these rates and get some better system. We can spend years from now on in the way we have spent them in the past. The Crowsnest pass agreement, for instance; we have not got anywhere in connection with that yet; there is still a dispute there, and there are disputes in many other directions.

There will be this objection to my proposal, that public ownership is not quite a success these days. I want to answer that, and in doing so I am going to refer to the fact that President Coolidge of the United States, in his inaugural the other day, which I read through very carefully, rather took credit to his administration and to his party that they had got rid of public ownership. Now public ownership as I know it here in Canada has proved itself, and is proving itself, a real success. Who will deny that it is a success with the Canadian National Railways? Who will deny, after the experience we have had in Ontario with public ownership of hydro-electric power, that it has been a success? It has been a great success. Even in the street car system in Toronto, public ownership has been a great success; and when the President of the United States actually rejoices in his party having got rid of public ownership, I want to tell him that the greatest example of public ownership in the world to-day, even above the railways or anything else, is the national reserve bank system of the United States. That is an absolute public ownership proposition that Canada and Great Britain and the other countries of Europe must come to. There is nothing like the strength and the efficacy of that system, owned by the people of the United States, backed by all the gold, by all the notes, and by all the credit of the United States. That system has been the marvel of the world, and it is absolutely a public ownership proposition. It is true, I got a letter from a banker here in Canada the other day saying: Oh, that is really owned by the member banks. But that is not so. It is owned by the people, and it is able to finance the whole world to-day. It is financing the world to-day in the reparations proposition more than any other country. It does it because of the fact that it is something new, and because it is based on public ownership as against the banking systems which have existed in the past. So successful has the system been that all other countries are going to adopt it. We shall have to adopt it in this country. Its strength, as I have said, is that it is public owned; the credit of all the people of the United States is behind it, and with such a credit behind it, it is finding for all the industries, all the farmers and all the people of the United States cheaper money than there is in any other country. I am not afraid of public ownership.

While the President of the United States in his recent inaugural made this apostrophe, as he did, to the rights of property—and it was a great declamation in that respect—I want to say that five lines of Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg hymn of freedom is worth ten times that apostrophe. Freedom and public rights are greater than the rights of property. I am not an enemy of property; I am not a Soviet believer or anything of that kind; but public ownership is a new idea, and it is growing. It is the solution of the world's economic problems, probably; it certainly is the solution of the world's problems in regard to financing. I am convinced more than ever that the only way out of our transportation problems is to follow up what was successfully done by the recent government in clearing up all the transportation mess created by the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and a lot of other lines. If you do that, and bring in a good line like the Canadian Pacific, you will get in a great steamship line, and get all those steamships within six weeks after the agreement is made. I know there are lots of difficulties that will be raised by members of this House, by the press and by others, but I want the idea to get through the minds of the people, and I believe it will come, that this consolidation offers a real solution of our transportation problems.

I will give the government credit for trying to do something in this direction. They may succeed by this agreement with Sir William Petersen, but there are twenty millions involved in the arrangement. We do not know that it will succeed, we are almost certain that the matter will end in litigation, and that we shall not make any real headway. What I am suggesting of my own volition, as one ordinary member of this House, is to take time, and try and stop this over-competition and over-railroading, all these attempts to attain something that we do not achieve and our failure in which leaves us just as badly off as we were before.

There are hosts of propositions being made, but there has been, as yet, no earnest attempt to arrive at a real solution of the transportation problem. We are asked by the Maritimes to give them special consideration, and they certainly have a claim. There is another madness prevailing in this country, and that is that every port in Canada, whether it is on the Pacific or on the Atlantic, wants to be made an expensive terminal port at great cost to the people. Enormous proposals in this direction await the consideration of the government. We cannot carry out such extravagant projects, we have not the money to do so, and yet these projects are being pressed on our attention by the various provinces and ports interested. Let us concentrate and consolidate our energies in trying to create a first-class transportation system with no frills, no unnecessary lines, no unnecessary officials, or anything of that kind. Let us make a fair deal with the Canadian Pacific company. Let us ask them to come in and sit down with this government and earnestly discuss the best solution of this problem. If we do that I believe that for the first time in our history we shall make some headway. I am sure that the people of Canada will insist on something of that kind being done if it is at all possible. In saying that I am going to leave the question to the House.

As to the amendment proposed I want an opportunity to look into it and possibly I may extend my support to the proposition. But really I cannot see why all these unnecessary expenditures should be incurred without any real assurance that relief will come. I should feel more sanguine if the government could show that they can provide relief, and could name a probable time when it would be forthcoming, in a word if they could guarantee that really effective action would result, and that this combine would be met. I do not believe that the combine can be fought by one single proposal; it must be fought by some system of national co-operation backed by national capital. And one way to begin the encounter is to tell this combine that the people want their penny's worth for their penny. They will then have a little more respect for this country and, after we have made such a declaration they will doubtless be more willing to offer us reduced freight rates. But the desired result will never be achieved in the way proposed. We will never get anywhere, as far as I can see, by that method; we will only get into debt. Relief will not be brought about in that way, neither with respect to this grievance nor the many other grievances of which our people complain. I am not going to enter upon a discussion of the other questions which are associated with this problem—for example the tariff and matters of that kind. I want to get the present situation straightened out before we dissipate our energies in other directions. I want to see a consolidation of the two great railroad systems of Canada, with the betterment in railroading that comes from that consolidation, and the cutting out of unnecessary services. This will go a long way towards providing cheaper and more efficient transportation, and if we get this, improved services will follow. Then the people of this country will experience a glimmer of hope. What they want to see is some kind of a change for the better, and the ending of all this over-railroading, and over-competition. All this kind of thing must stop, and we must also stop creating more ports. I have seen elaborate plans for the creation of new seaports on the Atlantic and on the Pacific which are not needed at present, although I hope they will be established ultimately. I hope the world's business is getting better, and that there will soon be more business for our railways. One essential thing is to arouse a spirit of hope in our people. We must do that immediately. If parliament applies its energies to this great purpose I believe the sun will shine again on Canada, the outlook will brighten, and we will proceed towards a better and more successful career than we have as yet encountered in our history.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker before discussing the question which is before us I should like to say how much we in this corner of the House appreciate certain of the suggestions which emanate from the hon. member who has just taken his seat. It is a very encouraging sign, it denotes a very cheerful state of affairs, when the nestor of this House, the oldest member of parliament and the oldest member of the Conservative party brings forward from time to time such comprehensive ideas as he presents. I think, Mr. Speaker, that every hon. member has a full realization of the vital import of the question now under consideration. The high cost of ocean transportation has its effect upon the export trade and upon the general business prosperity of Canada. Therefore its possible reduction is a subject of importance to the country as a whole and to each of us who sit here. To none, I think, is it of greater importance than to the hon. members with whom I am associated here and the people whom they represent. It is, I think, an incontrovertible statement of fact that, to a very great extent at least, the costs of ocean transportation rests upon and are borne by the export trade of Canada; and that in proportion as individuals, occupations, and sections in this country contribute to our exportable surplus, in that proportion they must pay their share of the cost involved, and in that proportion are they interested in the possible solution of the problem.

Again, I think the statement will hardly be challenged that a large part of the exportable tonnage of this country originates in and comes from the agricultural sections of Canada that we in this corner of the House more particularly represent. This peculiar interest has been recognized in this House before now. Two years ago, when a special committee was appointed to consider the conditions of the agricultural industry, the question of ocean freight rates was then recognized as having a peculiar application to those conditions. A good deal of the time of that committee was spent in that investigation, in that discussion, and certain conclusions were arrived at and presented to the House in the form of a report. To those conclusions I shall refer later.

Again, during the last session of parliament when the appointment of Mr. Preston was under consideration, a number of us in this corner of the chamber dealt briefly, but I think forcibly, with one phase of the situation, the live stock industry in this country. At that time we pointed out,—and many of those arguments have been repeated during the present session with additional arguments by the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader)—that the continued increase in transportation costs as applied to the live stock industry, has had a paralyzing and crushing effect upon that industry, and that if the industry was to survive steps would inevitably have to be taken to deal with the situation thus created. I shall refer to that later.

As I see it, this question resolves itself into two definite parts. First of all there is the question which we must ask ourselves and answer conclusively: Is there a combine?—and when I use that word I mean it in the commonly accepted sense; is there a combine having for its purpose the unreasonable increase of transportation rates to an excessive height, yielding exorbitant profits, and having for its object also a discrimination as between one port and another, one country and another, as well as a restraining of legitimate trade? That is the first question which we must consider and answer. The second question is this: If these conditions are ascertained to prevail, is the method proposed by the government of dealing with the situation sound in principle and adequate in the performance of its functions?

As to the combine itself and whether it exists, this is a question which has concerned us for some time. We have had during the last few years investigation after investigation; we have gone into the subject through commissions and parliamentary committees, and two or three facts at least are definitely established. The first fact which can be considered as having been absolutely proved, inasmuch as the parties concerned have acknowledged it, is that a conference does exist. I am somewhat at a loss at times to say where a conference ends and a combine begins, and I find myself in the same situation as confronted us when we heard eloquent gentlemen in this House discussing the line of demarcation between a convention and a treaty. That question seemed to me, as does this one, to be purely a matter of degree; it is only a question of degree as to how far the conference was in fact a conference and not a combine. The conference taken for granted, what are its legitimate objectives? It may have for its objective the stabilization of rates at a fair and equitable level. It may have for its objective the giving through co-operation of better service. In a word, it may have for its objective the improvement of service, with an increase of profit to itself without inflicting hardship on any of its patrons, by a system of co-operation which will eliminate unnecessary internal competition. That may be. And I do not think that any member of this House, more particularly the members in this corner of the House, who believe absolutely in the co-operative pool system, can take exception to such a condition. I may extend the same principle to our labour friends, who believe in labour organizations for the purpose of ensuring that labour may deal collectively and not individually with the questions confronting it. The same thing applies to our pools. All commercial pools have for their objective the stabilization of prices with an increase of profit to the members of the pool, but without increase in price to the consumer of their goods, and this by means of co-operative methods that eliminate internal competition. That is the purpose of such organizations, as I see it. So that no member in this corner of the House can very well take exception to a conference of any nature so long as its ends are legitimate. The question, however, is whether the conference in this instance operated within legitimate bounds or exceeded their rights. Here is the peculiar danger of a conference of any kind, which must be borne in mind and guarded against at all times; the same weapon and machinery which can improve a service and lower costs can also be used just as effectively for oppressing the people with whom business is done. That is what we must guard against. In the case of the pools I have mentioned, however, that danger does not at present exist, because they deal with such a small part of the world's produce that it is impossible for them to create a monopoly in that direction; and world conditions themselves would automatically prevent these organizations from assuming such an attitude.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman recall that the head of the largest pool, Mr. Stewart, made the claim that the control of the western crop had a measurable effect in appreciating the Canadian price and the general level of world wheat prices?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I might point out that a government monopoly of that nature, which could enter into negotiations with a buying agency in Europe, stands in a very different position from that of a co-operative pool, which must market its goods in competition with all others.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman say there is no difference between the two? Is there not now control of the western crop, which did not exist before?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have pointed out that not only was there a control of the Canadian crop at that time but also a central buying agency. There were not a number of buying agencies competing with themselves for that crop, and there is the difference. However, that was rather a digression. I only wanted to use the pool as an illustration of the statement that a conference is not necessarily a menace so long as it is well regulated. The question before us now is this: Has that conference gone beyond its legitimate purposes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member has some reasoning power and I want to follow his reasoning. Is not the point he makes against himself? With a central buying agency, and a control here of the western crop, then, unless there was collusion between the buying agency and the controlling agency here, there could be no increase in prices. But without any central buying agency, and without collusion, the control would be far more likely to increase prices.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The right hon. gentleman would seem to suggest then, that at that time there was collusion between the buying agency in Great Britain or in Europe and the board here. In that connection I might point out this, that although Mr. Stewart is no doubt an authority, notwithstanding what he may say, popular opinion maintains that, had it not been for the board of control, prices, owing to competition, would have been higher than they were. The question as regards this conference is, as I have stated, whether it exceeded its legitimate functions. So far as we can judge—and we are judging on insufficient data—one thing stands out certain, that since the organization of that conference the cost of the service it renders has immeasurably increased. That is a statement that cannot be challenged; it rests on no report or investigation but on facts within the knowledge of every hon. gentleman in this House as well as of every business man in the country.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

WEST VIRGINIA PULP AND PAPER COMPANY

The House in committee on Bill No. 13, respecting a patent of West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company.—Mr. Jacobs—Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) be good enough to explain this bill?

On section 1—extension of time for payment of fees.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the absence of the sponsor of the bill or any member of the government, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

EDGEWORTH GREENE PATENT

The House in committee on Bill No. 14, respecting a patent of Edgeworth Greene—Mr. Jacobs—Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has this bill been referred to committee?

The CHAIRMAN: It has been referred to committee and been reported on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I make the same motion that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

AGREEMENT WITH SIR WILLIAM PETERSEN—MOTION FOR RATIFICATION DISCUSSED

The House resumed consideration of the proposed resolution to ratify and confirm an agreement between His Majesty and Sir William Petersen, providing for the establishment of a subsidized steamship line and government control of certain ocean rates, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Clark.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: When the House rose at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to point out that, whether as the result of a combine or not, ocean rates in the last few years had risen very materially and, indeed, in many cases to an excessive height. I had also pointed out that this statement was not based upon any report of a commission, but was a matter within the personal knowledge of every member of the House and of every business interest in the country. I might point out by way of illustration one or two of the items upon which those rates have so risen. I will refer first to rates in connection with the live stock industry, not because the increase has been greater on that industry than on others, but because I am more familiar, perhaps, with the effect of the increase upon that industry. As has been pointed out, since 1913 and 1914, rates upon live stock carried overseas have increased from about $7.50 on an average a head to about $20 to $25 a head at the present time.

It has also been pointed out on other occasions that this increase of rates has nullified, to a large extent at least, the advantages we derived from the removal of the embargo upon our cattle entering British ports. It was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) that this was a comparatively minor circumstance, that our true market lying, in his opinion, to the south, the effect of the Fordney tariff and of the special rates imposed on our live stock by the government of the United States was infinitely greater than the effect of any increase which has taken place in the cattle rates overseas. As I said before, I am inclined to agree with that statement to a certain extent; but I should like to point out that because our market to the south has been limited by the Fordney tariff, the imposition of increased rates upon our ocean-borne cattle has become of even greater moment than it would otherwise have been; that, barred as we are from exporting a great number of our stock to our natural market across the line, the development of other markets has become of far greater necessity than would have been the case had that tariff not been imposed.

I would point out another circumstance. This question was first considered and first pronounced upon in 1911, when a move was made by the Dominion government, in furtherance of an agreement arrived at with the United States, to bring about reciprocal trade relations between the two countries, and that had that agreement gone into effect we would not now be suffering to such a tremendous degree by the oppressive action of any ocean combine, if such there be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. gentleman just be a little closer in his reasoning and tell us how he comes to that conclusion?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: If the right hon. gentleman had waited I would have endeavoured to arrive at that conclusion by a logical course of reasoning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will wait.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was stating that at that time the sympathy now so manifest was not apparent, and that while I cannot say that the hon. member for Burrard was himself guilty, the party of which he is a member was guilty of barring us from our natural market to the south. Later the United States erected the existing tariff barrier against us.

Mr. ARTHURS: Does the hon. gentleman say that that was in consequence of the action taken in 1911?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: If the hon. member will possess his soul in patience I shall answer a good many of these questions when I reach them in the course of my remarks without giving him the trouble of asking them now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are very patient.

Mr. CRERAR: That is a virtue.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I pointed out that since that time the United States had put in force a tariff against our stock which had resulted in a practical cessation of exportation to that country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has missed an incident in the meantime, that after the rejection by this country of the reciprocity treaty the United States' first step was to put in a tariff on stock lower than that provided for in the treaty itself.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think that is a statement of fact. But it hardly alters the position which I am about to assume, which is that some years after our rejection of the reciprocity treaty the United States raised the tariff to its present height, forming an effective bar to the movement of our stock across the line. It is purely a matter of conjecture and opinion to say what would have happened had reciprocity been agreed to by Canada. The advantages of that pact may have been so apparent to the United States that they would not have raised their tariff against our cattle.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): When we had reciprocity before with the United States who abrogated it?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: To what reciprocity arrangement does the hon. gentleman refer?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): To the reciprocity agreement of 1854.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am afraid I cannot follow my elderly friend back seventy years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just go back four years, then, when we had reciprocity in wheat and flour; who was it cancelled that arrangement?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The right hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in his implication. I am merely stating a fact without implication, the fact that it is a pure matter of conjecture what would have been the result in later years had that reciprocity pact been agreed to by Canada, and pointing out that the sympathy now expressed would have been better shown at that time. I further pointed out the fact that through the action of the United States in raising the tariff against our cattle, our market overseas has become of greater importance to us than would otherwise have been the case, and that consequently the present high rates upon our cattle overseas has become a still greater burden.

Anyone familiar with the cattle industry in western and, I think, in eastern Canada, will admit that whatever justification might be offered by the transportation companies for that increase, the fact remains that it is a crushing and paralyzing burden upon the stock raising industry of Canada, and that any effective measure tending to reduce these excessive rates will be welcomed by those engaged in the industry.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is it or is it not true that the shipping companies have reduced the rates since the United States put an embargo upon Canadian cattle?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The rates have been reduced since they reached their peak—whether as a consequence of the Fordney tariff or not I am unable to say. On other lines which are familiar to hon. members—I am not going to burden the House with statistics now—the same course has been followed and the same effect has been produced. We have only to read the communications from manufacturing and other concerns to show that the country as a whole realizes that the export trade has been hampered and that an unjust burden has been placed upon it, and that any measure to effectively relieve the situation will be welcomed and will be in the best interests of the Dominion. These facts are so apparent that it is not necessary for me unduly to elaborate the point.

The question, to be concise, is this: whether those rates rose as a natural consequence of increasing costs or whether they were put into effect of set purpose by a combine which controlled them. That is a point that has not been brought out clearly in the report which now lies before us. We may, however, hold opinions upon it; and taking into consideration all the facts of the case—the magnitude of the increases, out of proportion to the increasing costs; the fact that through this admitted conference they had the machinery in their hands to raise the rates to excessive heights; the conclusions arrived at by the special committee on Agriculture sitting two years ago—taking all these things into consideration I can only conclude that the presumption is in favour of the supposition that to some extent at least a combine did have the effect of raising rates beyond a necessary limit.

May I here refer to what I consider as one of the most glaring inadequacies in the so-called Preston report? All these facts were in the hands of hon. gentlemen; they had all been established beyond peradventure during the last year. But what we did want to know, at least what I wanted to know, was this: did the raising of these rates result in undue or exorbitant profits to the companies involved? Upon that point this report throws no light, yet it must be taken into account when any proposal to control or reduce these rates is being considered.

Another inadequacy might be shown. Statistics are placed in this report to show the discriminatory increases put in force by these shipping companies. On page 14 of the report there appears comparative table of shipping costs based upon the mileage and the tonnage. It is clear enough as far as it goes, but there are two or three factors which are essential to a proper consideration of the case but which have not been presented or even touched upon. The first is this: that while it does give a comparison by mileage and by tonnage it gives no inkling as to the class of goods involved. It might be a ton of wheat in the one case and a ton of silk in the other, for all this report shows; and unless the comparison is given between similar commodities as well as between similar tonnage and mileage, it is of no value whatever. Again, this report fails to take into account the percentage of available space occupied on each of these trips from Canadian ports to the Old Country, yet that is an essential factor in considering the costs. Again, it makes no reference to the return cargoes, another point which must be had in mind in that connection. So I think the House will agree that we should not attach too much weight to the report which is before us but that we should rather discuss the matter from the point of view of common sense and ordinary judgment, as well as of those facts which are familiar to all of us.

Having come to the conclusion, however, that excessive rates exist and that those excessive rates have been at least partly brought into being through the efforts of a combine, we come to the question of how that combine shall be controlled and how those rates shall be reduced. A suggestion is placed before us by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low), namely, that a certain line of steamships consisting of ten vessels shall be subsidized by this country with a view to reducing rates. Now, on analysis, what does that mean? I may say in parenthesis that it is impossible to know just what it does mean in the absence of any explanation in the report of the points I have mentioned. Unless it can be shown that exorbitant profits have been made, of what avail is it to speak of subsidizing vessels in order to reduce the costs? We are on the horns of a dilemma in this matter. If exorbitant profits have been made, what has prevented independent steamship lines, such as the Petersen line or the tramp steamers in different parts of the world, from taking part in this trade and enjoying part of those profits?

Mr. MANION: Or the Canadian Merchant Marine from making good money?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes, if exorbitant profits have been made why has the merchant marine, engaged in that traffic within the conference itself, carrying goods at conference rates, shown a deficit? Is it due to bad management on the part of the officers of the merchant marine? Is it due to some inherent incapacity on the part of the vessels themselves? Or to what is it due? It seems to me that before considering the subsidizing of any other line we should look well into the question whether the merchant marine has been employed to its utmost capacity and in the best possible manner.

I am aware that while on one side of the House the merchant marine has been extolled as a very fine fleet of vessels, modern in their specifications and well adapted to the business of ordinary freight transport, on the other side of the House the position has been taken that those vessels are totally unfitted for the service. Between these two varying opinions, neither backed up by any official statement on the part of shipping experts, what are we to think? Are we to suppose that the reason that the merchant marine has not been developed to its whole capacity and has not been used as it should have been is due to a desire on the part of hon. gentlemen on the government side that no vessels built under the auspices of a Conservative government shall succeed? Is the praise bestowed upon this merchant marine by gentlemen to my right due to the fact that it was under the auspices of their government that these vessels were constructed? Or to what may these divergent opinions be due? I do not know. But I do know this: that if these vessels are at all adequate to the service they should have been used to demonstrate the actual costs of ocean transport.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to lie under the implication of seeking undue credit. I may inform my hon. friend that hon. gentlemen opposite supported just as enthusiastically as ourselves the building of these vessels, as well as the type of vessel built.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. CAHILL: Not at all. It was put through by closure.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I will leave that to be argued out between those on the government side and my hon. friends to my right. The fact remains that these vessels are in existence and that an honest and thorough trial should have been given them, in my opinion, to ascertain whether or not they were fitted for the service; to ascertain through their use, before a subsidy was proposed, what the actual cost of ocean transport was. And while I am speaking of the proposed subsidy, may I say this: The people in my part of the country have always been dubious about the granting of subsidies. We in this country have had some unhappy experiences in the granting of subsidies to private corporations or companies supposedly for the public welfare. We have found that while those subsidies were welcome and of benefit to the companies and corporations themselves, they seldom resulted in real benefit accruing to the country, and therefore, as a matter of principle, in the light of history I would be very dubious of this method.

The question then presents itself as to what effect these subsidized vessels would have upon our present situation. The proposal is that ten vessels of a modern type and of fair capacity shall be subsidized and used in this service, and that if this proves a success the system may be extended to include more vessels of perhaps a similar type. I want to point this out: In the first place, unless it is proved that exorbitant profits are made, what does this policy mean? It means that the government as a part of government policy will be going into the business of paying part of the necessary cost of transportation by subsidy derived from taxing the people. That may sound absurd, and yet it is logical. If the profits are not exorbitant, it simply means there will be no combine breaking; there can be no reduction of rates through this action, for to be effective the subsidy must be applied to all of the vessels engaged in our ocean transport, and in effect the subsidy must pay part of the necessary costs of that transport. Mr. Speaker, before we adopt such a policy I think we should consider well.

There is another point in that connection. The statement has been made, and I think it was a correct statement, that this proposal was suggested as much for the benefit of our manufacturing industries as of agriculture; that is a perfectly proper state of affairs. No one is asking for a policy which shall be of benefit to only one section of this country or to only one class in this country. But the question then arises, in what proportion may these various industries take advantage of these proposals? Can the cattle industry, for instance, derive any great advantage from these proposals? I do not think so, for the simple reason that the bulk of our cattle are shipped in a comparatively short season, a large portion of them being cross-fed stock, and the percentage of those cattle that could be carried on these ten vessels would thus be very, very small. So much for the cattle industry.

What about the grain industry? The amount of grain that could be carried by that number of vessels would be trifling, so trifling indeed as to be hardly worthy of consideration. And again, is grain suffering from the effects of the conference? I hardly think it is. If you take the grain rates charged on ocean transports during the last term of years, you will find that in each of those years there has been a great fluctuation as between the charges of one cargo and the charges of another. No stabilization of rates there. You will find, moreover, that the average increase since pre-war days has been comparatively small as compared with the increase in other lines of industry; and for another reason the very nature of the freight itself makes it impossible for it to be taken over by any combine. I am not relying upon the philanthropic intentions of a combine to safeguard any industry. I have not that high opinion of our steamship companies, valuable though they may be, that is possessed by our friend from Burrard (Mr. Clark), who felt that the shipping men themselves were of such high calibre and were so patriotic in mind that they would not, even if they could, take advantage of any conference; I am not suggesting that at all. But what I am suggesting is that the very nature of the freight, the fact that in many cases it is moved out as distress or ballast cargo, the fact that it is a class of freight that appeals to and can be carried by any tramp steamer that comes along, renders it impossible for any combine limited to liner freighters to effectively control grain rates.

Then what have we left? We have dairy products, fruit products, and some smaller products, which though smaller still form a very important part of our ocean traffic; and in these lines, I believe, it is quite possible that agriculture would receive its share of benefit. But I wish to point out this: One of the obvious reasons why rates are high is because we have so little return cargo; I think that is so obvious that it does not require stressing. Now why have we so little return cargo? One of the reasons is the fact that we have a tariff which places a restriction on imports. And then what is the situation so far as our manufacturing friends are concerned? We have in this country a tariff placed there as a matter of public policy, but placed there in accordance with the wishes and desires of the manufacturers of this country, and held there because of their wishes and desires, and, as they express it, because of their interests. Through the operation of that tariff, indeed that is its purpose, the prices to the consumer at home are increased; and now we have the proposal that these same manufacturers shall receive a subsidy from the public treasury to remove from them the handicap placed there at their own request. It is a peculiar situation to my mind, and it is still more peculiar when you consider this effect; that the very same people who now pay the increased cost of goods at home will through taxation pay their share at least of that subsidy. I think it is a most peculiar situation. However, that is merely in passing. I have no intention of being diverted, as some hon. members have been diverted, into discussion of the tariff at this time, but I wished to point that out because in this connection it has a direct bearing on the question. I would also like in the same connection to point out, as has been done by other hon. gentlemen, that a logical method of increasing our return cargoes, and thereby decreasing the cost of ocean transport would be to substantially increase the British preference or to wipe out altogether the duties against British goods. I am quite certain that in taking such action the government would find themselves supported unanimously by the members with whom I am associated.

Now what other weaknesses may be apparent in the proposal of the government?—and in discussing this question let me say that I am endeavouring at least to express opinions that are sincere opinions. I am not endeavouring to make this a political issue. There is nothing that this country would so strongly resent as to have any member of parliament or any party in this House make of this tremendous issue a political football. There is nothing that would so redound against a member or a party as such tactics. This is a business question. It is a question which affects business solely. It is a question which can only be settled satisfactorily upon absolutely business grounds, and a question which can only be settled upon business grounds when we are in receipt of the necessary information upon which to act. In speaking on this question I am endeavouring, from my point of view to impress upon this House the objections which we honestly hold. We have another objection to this particular method, which has been largely voiced by hon. members to our right, and it is this: That the agreement as brought down does not give adequate control on the part of this government. It does definitely stipulate what this government shall do, and what this country shall do—it definitely states what assistance shall be given by ourselves—but it does not definitely state, in my opinion, under what conditions the ships themselves must operate. For instance the contract does not state, although it may be implied, what commodities shall be carried at reduced rates. It is left to the discretion of one party or the other; it is left to the discretion of the steamship company itself or with the government. I do not consider that is a healthy state of affairs. I think if an agreement is entered into it should be made so clear and so binding, that not only are our obligations set forth but also all the obligations of the other party of the contract. It does not state, for example, the numbers of sailings that must take place. It does not state that there must be sailings at any given intervals. It does not state how many sailings there must be in the course of a year—it simply states that so many vessels must be employed. Thus if vessels were laid up and were not giving the service the subsidy would still continue, and to my mind that is something which must be considered. We are not criticizing this method because we object to control. We are giving the government credit for having taken cognizance of the seriousness of the situation, we are giving them credit for having brought forward some measure which would suggest relief; we are giving them that credit, but we also feel that the method suggested is inadequate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend suggest a better method?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I will come to that in a moment if the Prime Minister will permit me. Therefore, what action can this House take? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the only reference it logically can take is the reference to a committee. But in that connection may I point this out: When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) made that suggestion we felt that it was a reasonable one. He suggested—and I think I can use his own words—"that it be sent to a special committee who should have the power to ask questions and make suggestions". And may I say, in passing, that asking questions and making suggestions is one of the best things we do.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Did the minister not state that it was a cast-iron contract which could not be changed in any particular?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think the hon. gentleman is attributing the statement to the wrong minister, and is also anticipating what I am about to say. If this committee is empowered only to ask questions and make suggestions, if there is no intention of putting any of the suggestions into effect, then I say the committee would be a mere farce. And yet what are we to think? The statement was made by the Prime Minister—and I must say I listened with some apprehension to it—that this agreement must stand as it is; that it is susceptible of no trimming—to use the exact words of the right hon. gentleman. Now, Mr. Speaker we know the elasticity of the word "trimming". When your butcher trims your roast he removes any objectionable fragments. When the milliner trims a new chapeau for the madam she adds a touch here and a feather there with entrancing results. I am sorry the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) is not in his seat at present because I look to him for some assistance when in deep water. I understand that in navigation you "trim your sails" thereby coming a little closer to the wind. But this agreement cannot be trimmed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if he thinks it is a correct method to enter into a contract with other parties and make that contract subject to all kinds of change? The contract is subject to the approval or disapproval of parliament; that is the object of referring it to a committee. If the committee, after studying the contract and hearing all the circumstances, come to the conclusion that it is not in the public interest it is not only their privilege but their duty to so inform parliament and throw the contract to one side. But if, after having heard all the circumstances, they come to the conclusion that the government has acted wisely in making the contract I do not think they should find fault with the government in having first taken the only step that was possible to get a contract and to carry out the wishes of parliament.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I hardly think the Prime Minister has quite caught my point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I have.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I quite appreciate that the committee has the power to report for or against this agreement, but I appreciate also the fact that in view of the statement of the right hon. the Prime Minister the committee has not the power to modify any of the conditions made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid my hon. friend does not get my point which is that the government would not have had any contract at all to place before parliament if it had adopted the method he is suggesting. There are two parties to a contract when entered into and it must be understood that if it is subject to approval there it stands. You could not get another party to enter into a contract with you and agree to carry it out, if you made it subject to alteration or change at the will of another party.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Then I merely wish to point out this further fact: In view of that statement, in view of the fact that the committee only has the alternative of accepting or rejecting in toto the agreement as presented, then the usefulness of that committee will be very small.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would point out to my hon. friend that it is quite possible that the committee might recommend certain changes. Those changes would have to be subject to the approval of both parties, but that does not prevent the committee from recommending changes if it thinks alterations should be made. What I want to make clear is this: The government could have made no contract with anyone, with no responsible person whatever, without undertaking to say that the contract if submitted for approval as it stood should not be changed except with the consent of both parties.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I quite appreciate that fact. I appreciate the fact that in entering into a signed contract the wishes of both parties must be considered and that no change can be made without the consent of both parties.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what I am arguing.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I quite appreciate that fact, I appreciate also that unless the government is willing to give every consideration to any suggestion, that it is willing to withhold the contract until suggestions for modification have been made, and then enter into further negotiations on the basis of those suggestions, if thought wise by the committee, the committee can be of very little value.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will say at once that the government will not only do that but will be very glad to welcome particular suggestions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the government does not stand or fall by this contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government stands or falls by the contract most decidedly so, but the government will be quite prepared to discuss with the other party to the contract any suggestions which the committee may make, and we believe that the other party to the contract will be just as reasonable as the government when what is proposed is in the public interest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not standing or falling by the contract.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I must confess that the explanation of the Prime Minister has not made matters much clearer. It may be that the fault is in my mind, it may be that the obscurity is in the explanation; but I do wish to point out that if this is introduced as a government measure, and if, as stated, the government must stand or fall by the acceptance or rejection of this agreement in its present form, then the government is not in a position to receive suggestions nor is it in the position to even discuss a modification of the agreement. As I understand it, the government's statement, by which they are prepared to stand or fall, is that you may add nothing to the agreement, take nothing from it, nor bring it any closer to the wind, so to speak. Therefore we must consider that the contract partakes of the nature of the law of the Medes and Persians which cannot be altered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is usually very reasonable in these matters and I do not think he desires to misunderstand me. In fact, our points of view are similar if not identical. This is a contract between two parties and it may not be altered except by the consent of both. The purpose of the government in referring the matter to a committee is to get the committee's approval or its disapproval of the contract. If the committee disapproves of the contract in its present form and has recommendations to make regarding it, the government will certainly consider such recommendations and will be pleased to take them up with the other party to the contract. As I have already stated, the other party to the contract, I believe, would be just as reasonable and just as desirous as the government to meet the wish of the committee with respect to any change that was thought advisable. If, however, the other party to the contract should not be agreeable to this, then it would be the duty of the government to stand by the contract in the form in which it is. But once the matter is brought before the committee and the committee has the fullest opportunity of considering it from all angles, there will be time enough then to consider whether or not the recommendations of the committee may be such as both parties could accept.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: As I see the situation, then, the government will stand or fall by this agreement but they will be prepared, with the consent of the other party, to modify it upon the basis of such recommendations as may be submitted by the committee. May I say this, that the good faith of the government in this matter will be tested, first, by their willingness to refer this matter to the committee before a definite pronouncement is made in the House and before the House commits itself to the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The House cannot commit itself to the contract until all three readings have gone through. When the minister brings in the bill, it will be referred, immediately after its second reading, to a committee which will discuss it before it is brought into the House.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: A bill after it has had its second reading is accepted in principle; the principle of the bill is accepted when the House agrees to its second reading. So that parliament, having accepted the principle of the bill in this instance, the bill itself could not be subject to any severe modifications on the part of a special committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would point this out to the hon. gentleman. A railway bill, for example, gets its second reading and is referred to a committee. That committee has the power, and often exercises it, to throw the bill out altogether.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister know of any railway bill or of any other bill embodying a contract, which a government has made, which has ever been altered upon a recommendation of any committee? Does he know of anything of that kind in the history of any parliament?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have known railway bills to be introduced into this House—

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the point.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the point, exactly. My hon. friend is afraid because he knows that I have him absolutely in a box. A railway bill gets its second reading and is referred to a committee and time and time again the committee has made changes in such measures.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say to the contrary.

Mr. GRAHAM: It can make changes in a bill, and only when a bill gets its third reading is it a contract with the parliament of Canada; not before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister think he has answered my question?

Mr. GRAHAM: Certainly; my hon. friend does not know what he is trying to get at.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: If this debate on the side is concluded I shall proceed. I simply wish to emphasize again the fact that the good faith of the government will be tested, first, by their willingness to submit the bill to a committee before this House necessarily endorses the main principle of the agreement.

Mr. MARTELL: Would not the principle of the bill be approved by the House, after which the bill itself would go to the committee for the purpose probably of fixing the terms based on that principle?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In the second place, the good faith of the government in this matter will be shown by the facilities which they afford the committee to obtain all the information necessary to deal with the subject. And thirdly, the good faith of the government will be evidenced by their readiness to consider, and consider favourably, the suggestions advanced by that committee in the light of such information as it has received and after adequate discussion of the whole matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would the hon. member repeat what he defined as the first test of the good faith of the government? I did not understand it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Let me point out for the information of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) just what the position is of a good many members in this House on this question, at least as I see it. We are satisfied, many of us, that through the efforts of a combine, together with natural causes, rates have increased beyond the normal and satisfactory point. Further, we are satisfied that some method must be devised of dealing with the situation and settling it. But many of us are not satisfied that this particular method which is proposed is the best that could be evolved.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member says that the good faith of the government will be tested by sending this bill to a special committee, without asking the House to commit itself to the principle. What does the hon. gentleman suggest? I am sure the government will be prepared to meet his views, and if he wants we can send the bill right away, to-night.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am suggesting that this committee should be given an opportunity to receive all the information necessary—

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the third point; but what is the first?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I say that the committee should receive all the information necessary to come to a satisfactory conclusion on the subject; that it should have an opportunity to examine into the absolute authenticity and accuracy of the report that is before us as well as of others, in order to ascertain whether or not exorbitant profits have been made; that it should have an opportunity to consider the attitude displayed by the British parliament and such action as may be adopted by the other dominions;—in short, that it should have an opportunity to take all these things into careful consideration in deciding the best steps to be followed. And after all this was done the committee might come to the conclusion that some other method was better than the one now proposed, and might suggest it. That is what I meant when I made the first statement. If the committee is given, as far as it can be given, a free hand to suggest the alternatives which have been asked for and which I am not prepared to suggest, not having the information before me that is essential if one is to suggest anything reasonable; if the committee, I say, is given an opportunity to study the question throughly and make suggestions, even though they take some other form than the present, then I should say that this was a real test of the good faith of the government. I do not say it would be necessarily a test of the good faith of the government as applied to this particular agreement, but of the good faith of the government in endeavouring to settle the question on the best possible basis, a basis which is not political, which has nothing to do with subsidies to one man or another, which has nothing to do with friends or with favouritism, but a basis that will appeal to the business sense of the country as one calculated most effectively to reduce the cost of ocean transportation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has the hon. member any other method to suggest than first submitting this resolution to the House? Is there any other way of bringing the matter before parliament than by introducing a resolution?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have no quarrel with the government on the score of introducing this resolution, if it acts on a suggestion of one of its members that the matter be referred to a committee in the form of a bill, without the House being asked to commit itself to the principle of that bill. That is a different situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows that bills before going to committees pass a second reading. So far as this bill is concerned, the principle is the desirability of controlling ocean rates, and that is all that the House commits itself to on the second reading. It commits itself to the desirability of controlling ocean rates, subject to the approval of parliament. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) introduced his resolution, he stated the position of the government, that as soon as the second reading of the bill was over, the government intended to refer the bill to a committee so that it might consider and discuss whether or not the proposed contract was acceptable. I think that makes the position of the government clear. I want to be perfectly fair with my hon. friend. I do not want him later, when the second reading comes along, to say that the government has broken faith. I desire to point out just this, that the government is very anxious to have the committee investigate the agreement, and it is taking the one step it thinks necessary to arrive at that committee stage as soon as possible.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: If I understand aright the statement made by the Prime Minister, the principle to which the government adhere and by which they stand or fall is the principle of reducing the cost of ocean transportation by any method which will be proved to be the best method.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would use the word "control".

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Or control. The principle to which they are committed and by which they must stand or fall is not the principle embodied in the agreement itself, but rather the principle contained in the preamble to the agreement which states that it is necessary or proper to reduce rates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has made it perfectly plain, for example, to Sir William Petersen that the contract does not go into force unless it is approved by parliament. The government might have drafted a contract and said: We will stand or fall by this contract passing, because we have pledged ourselves that it is going to pass; but that is precisely the course which we did not take. We were careful to tell Sir William Petersen that we knew very well that there would be gentlemen in this House who would object to any contract being formed; that the government was prepared to enter into a contract on certain conditions, but one condition was that the contract must be subject to the approval of parliament. If parliament does not approve the contract, it will not be entered into. But as regards the government being committed to a policy of desiring to control ocean rates, that is a policy to which we are committed and we think it ought to be adhered to by this House.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Does the government approve the contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government would never have signed it if it had not approved it. We believe, when this matter is referred to the committee, that the committee will approve it also.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But if not, the government will change it to suit the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If not, the government will do the best it can to try to bring in a measure in accordance with the general will of the House. In that respect we differ from my right hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The situation is considerably clarified now in this second statement—and I am sure it is a statement welcomed by many members of this House—that the policy by which the government stands or falls is not a policy of subsidizing this or any other line, but a policy of controlling by the best possible method the cost of ocean transportation; that the committee will be empowered to make suggestions and if the committee reports and suggests what, in its opinion, is a better method of controlling ocean rates, the government may then adopt the suggestion of the committee in preference to the resolution before the House, without in any way imperilling its own position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will not do that.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think the members of this House will agree that that is about as fair a statement as can be made under the circumstances. That has largely met the point which I first suggested as to testing the good faith of this government.

Having reached that point and having elicited that statement, I think I can very well come to a conclusion. I wish to conclude simply by making this statement, and I am speaking rather generally now, because after all, this is a subject with which we can deal only generally at the present time. The general statement is this: I and other members have been asked to suggest an alternative. It has been pointed out that we have criticized and criticized severely, perhaps, in the opinion of hon. members opposite, unjustly, the provisions of this agreement and the principle of this contract. If we were in a position now to offer a satisfactory alternative, we would not be supporting the demand that this should be sent to a committee. We realize that whatever information the government may have upon those points which I mentioned and other important points, this House does not possess that information, and any alternative presented unintelligently, without due consideration of all the business facts involved in an exceedingly difficult and complex situation, would be an alternative without value. For one, I am not prepared to offer an alternative unless I have studied the question and understand what that alternative will imply in all its bearings. May I say further—and perhaps in saying this, I am repeating to a slight extent what I said before—the public generally, I think, believe that this is a question which must be considered and solved, but it must be solved in such a manner that the solution itself will not bring about greater difficulties than now exist. We have had examples—and I am making no particular reference—of legislation introduced to solve some problem, which legislation has resulted in the enhancement of that problem or the creating of other and greater problems. We must avoid that, and we can avoid that only by having ample access to all the facts that are necessary in order to reach a successful solution. The government might have adopted the attitude that they were in possession of all those facts and that, on the authority of those facts and on their own responsibility, they have introduced this measure. I am glad to see that they did not take that attitude. But this House in ratifying any agreement, in supporting any solution, must incur a measure of responsibility itself. Every one of us, whether we support or oppose any suggestion, must take our own individual responsibility for that action. We must realize what may be the result of that action.

In that connection, may I make just one reference to the amendment which has been introduced? I speak of it with diffidence as it has been introduced so lately into this House that I have not had time to consider it fully, and so I make no definite pronouncement of opinion in that regard. The weakness I see in it at a casual glance is this: The suggestion as to joint action between the various dominions and the Mother Country may be a sound suggestion. That is a matter which must be considered. But the amendment in its own terms precludes the possibility of this or any other suggestion being considered by the committee. To accept this amendment—and I am not absolutely certain whether I shall accept it or not—would mean that we would commit ourselves to a particular line of action, a particular method of dealing with the situation, without having before us information whether that line of policy is the best or not. There to my mind is the weakness. The committee itself, in possession of all those facts, might recommend such a solution as has been offered by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark). On the other hand, the committee might recommend some other solution which might be more effective. Again, I reiterate that the weakness of the amendment lies in the fact that it precludes the obtaining of that necessary information and foundation of facts on the part of this House.

In conclusion, there are many points to consider in connection with this matter. The attitude assumed by the British parliament in discussing this question must be taken into account. A few days ago I read a brief despatch in the Manitoba Free Press in which it was pointed out in the British House that this same Petersen had been guaranteed by the Service committee a bonus of some £600,000 for the construction of these same vessels, and it was further intimated that as a result of the action on the part of this government that guarantee would be withdrawn. Now, I want to ask hon. gentlemen if it would not be wise, before committing ourselves to a policy of expenditure, to consider, in the first place, whether Sir William Petersen might receive a bonus on the one hand and a subsidy on the other, and so be placed in a very enviable position indeed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Unenviable?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Enviable. If he received a large bonus from the British parliament and a large subsidy from the Canadian parliament I think he would be in a very enviable position indeed. All those points must be considered by the committee and dealt with upon their merits in reaching a decision. Personally I am not unalterably opposed to this contract, if it is proved beyond peradventure or doubt that this is the only possible method, and that there is some hope of its being successful. I realize that while the principle is unsound, the cost great and the value dubious, yet sometimes desperate diseases require desperate remedies; and I think this might be considered as falling within the class of desperate remedies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would it help my hon. friend in clearing up what he has in mind if Sir William Petersen were asked to come out and appear before the committee? If so, I think we ought to send him word at once and I imagine he would be very glad to come.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think it would be for the committee to say what witnesses they want to call. I should think that the members of the committee would request the attendance of all witnesses whose evidence would be of any value.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend must realize that Sir William Petersen is a busy man, and therefore if he is to be summoned to appear before the committee I think it would be advisable to let him know immediately and ask him to arrange his plans accordingly. I am trying to oblige my hon. friend by assuring the attendance of Sir William when the committee is ready to take his evidence.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I appreciate the kindness of the Prime Minister, but as a private member I have no authority to request that any witness be brought before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes you have, as a member.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The committee itself must decide what witnesses it will summon to appear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend as a member of this House not only has authority, he has responsibility to see that the right people do appear before the committee.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: If the Prime Minister wishes my individual opinion, I should very much like to hear what Sir William Petersen has to say in the matter, I should also like to hear what Mr. Preston and what the representatives of the companies attacked by Mr. Preston have to say. In fine, I should like to hear both sides so that any opinion I form may be based upon as accurate a knowledge as possible of all the facts and circumstances of the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I undertake to tell my hon. friend right now that the government will immediately ask Sir William Petersen to be here; it will also expect Mr. Preston to appear before the committee and the representatives of all the companies mentioned in his report.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am very glad indeed to receive the Prime Minister's promise, and I appreciate it the more in the light of certain evidence which was placed before this House by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) in discussing the costs of transportation incurred by vessels of the type proposed by Sir William Petersen, and in stating what profits were to be expected under existing rates—because I wish to point out to hon. gentlemen on my right that when they discuss the enormous profits to be made by the Petersen Company under the contract they neglect to take into account that the profit of £3,000 per voyage is based on existing rates, the very rates that must be lowered when the agreement comes into effect—in stating those profits the minister quoted a letter from Mr. R. B. Teakle, apparently an expert connected with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, endorsing Sir William Petersen's statements as to costs. I would point out that Mr. Teakle was careful to observe that as to wages to be paid the crew, insurance on the vessels, and the manner in which redemption and depreciation are to be taken care of, and also the oil consumption, he could not check these points without going so closely into the proposition as might necessitate inquiries to be made, but he had no reason to think that the figures were materially out of line; and that also as Sir William Petersen had furnished no plan of the proposed vessels he had had to work on the general details given by that gentleman. In other words, he was not able to verify the four main items of expenditure and the specifications of the ships. So it seems to me that this endorsation is worth about as much as the paper it is written on.

Mr. LOW: But he also said that he did not doubt the figures of Sir William at all.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: He also stated that as far as accurate knowledge went he was dependent upon the statement issued by Sir William Petersen himself. That is one reason why I certainly would be glad to see Sir William Petersen appear before the committee to verify the statements and figures furnished to Mr. Teakle.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have taken up sufficient time of the House. My few remarks have not been in vain, as now we understand perhaps better than we did before the attitude of the government and what its policy is in this case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the hon. member define it in his own words?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SPEAKMAN: For the present I shall defer my judgment on the amendment because I have not yet had time to consider it. On the resolution itself I shall also defer my judgment, because I wish to make it absolutely clear that no matter what method is adopted of bringing this subject before the committee, no vote of mine shall be interpreted as committing me to support this method of dealing with the situation. I base that statement upon the Prime Minister's explanation of the circumstances of the case. Further, I would state that in voting for this I am voting in accordance with the expressed intentions of the government to reduce or control ocean transportation rates, nothing more and nothing less, and when any method comes before this House for final ratification I shall deem myself free to vote in support of or against it as at the time my judgment shall dictate when in possession of all the facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, although this debate has only continued into the evening of the second day, it has cleared the air considerably compared with the first day. On that occasion the official opposition had grave misgivings as to whether there was any grievance at all in respect of ocean freight rates. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) intimated that if there was a combine it was a very harmless one, it was not vicious at all, it was somewhat domesticated and tame. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) had very much doubt whether there was anything wrong at all or not, so far as I could gather from his remarks. To-night the government believes, as it did then, that there is a combine, a vicious combine, and that the way to remedy it is embodied in this resolution and bill. The official opposition also think there is a difficulty or they would not have moved their amendment. They believe there is a difficulty, but they think it can be removed in the way set out in their amendment. The last speaker, I think, is equally satisfied that there is a combine and an objectionable one. While I was just wondering at the beginning how he proposed to remedy it, I noticed before he got through that he was not satisfied with the amendment; therefore I assume that with certain reservations he is prepared to support some such form of remedy as is proposed by the government so long as he gets results. Well now, you cannot tell that until we get through with the committee stage. As a matter of fact the situation is so bad that the government is prepared to take chances on getting results with this remedy. Something must be done; everyone is agreed on that. People have been talking around the question for years and years and getting nowhere. Now we have a concrete proposal before the House, and like any other legislation it has to go through the various readings before it is referred to a committee. We are making no difference in this respect. There will be the first and second readings of the resolution, the first and second readings of the bill based upon the resolution, and then, in order to give everybody the fullest possible opportunity to get at the bottom of the whole subject in the clear light of open day we propose to have the matter referred to a special committee where evidence can be heard and all information brought out. This is no new method; it is done on many occasions every year. Nearly all my bills go, not to a special committee, but to the regular standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization, and the same applies to railway bills.

Let me take up some of the attacks that have been made upon the resolution. It is said that the best form of defence is attack. Well, I wish to refer, not in too aggressive a way, to some of the attacks made by the opposition on this resolution. We will take them in the order in which they have been made by hon. gentlemen who have spoken.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Centre (Mr. Stevens) was disposed to admit there was an arrangement, there was a conference. What does "conference" mean? A getting together, an arranging of things quite comfortably and satisfactorily to the parties concerned. But somehow or other my hon. friend thought it was not a very vicious thing. Then after that there followed what I thought was a very vicious attack on Mr. Preston, as if he were on trial. Mr. Preston was delegated to inquire into this matter. This House made an inquiry into it two years ago, and the report of the House committee and that of Mr. Preston are very much alike. But for some reason the hon. member (Mr. Stevens) does not like Mr. Preston, and he confined most of his remarks to him rather than to his report. What did he say of Mr. Preston? He was narrow; he was prejudiced; he was jaundiced, and there were a lot of other adjectival appellations that I have forgotten. Anyway, according to my hon. friend he was everything but the right thing. But do you not think that if the report of Mr. Preston, a man of standing and a very great deal of ability, had any really serious defects my hon. friend would have put his finger upon them? I read my hon. friend's remarks very carefully—I did not trust to my ears alone—but I could not find where he put his finger on anything. He did say that Mr. Preston was a very unreliable man to get a report from, but that is a matter of opinion. Mr. Preston's statements have been assailed also by anonymous attacks, attacks appearing in the Ottawa newspapers in the form of advertisements—at least, they were not signed by anybody. These were not on the editorial page, not even on the front editorial page—if there is such a thing, and not even in the news columns, for which responsibility is sometimes taken to some extent by the editors. These anonymous attacks, plus those of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre are the only direct attacks that I have heard against Mr. Preston's report. Now, let us see what else there is.

My hon. friend says we need return cargoes, but he has done the very best he could to stop return cargoes by opposing the British preference. Well, we cannot get it both ways; you cannot vote against the British preference and increased inter-imperial trade and then complain about the lack of return cargoes.

Then, the hon. member interrupts my hon. colleague—Mr. Low— when he is in the midst of his very excellent address, and rather exultingly says: "Well, there are four things that are not under the combine, wheat, sugar, cattle and flour." Let me see what he did say, because it is quite interesting:

> May I say to my hon. friends who are seriously interested in arriving at some proper solution of this problem, that wheat, flour, sugar and cattle have never been under the conference rates? They are not controlled by this alleged combine at all. They are excluded from it and are free from these rates.

That is an interruption by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. BOYS: Will the minister kindly inform the House if that statement which he characterizes as an interruption is a correct statement?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, we may take it as a correct one, but it will be all the worse for my hon. friend if we take it that way.

Mr. BOYS: Will the minister permit—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would say, however, that it was not a correct statement, it was a bluff.

Mr. BOYS: I may tell the minister that I am not bluffing now, and if he will permit me I want to put the question; if not, I will sit down. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was asked that question, as also were the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), but no one has answered it. In all sincerity I am asking the Minister of Agriculture whether or not the statement is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What statement?

Mr. BOYS: That wheat, flour, sugar and cattle were not included.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Was my hon. friend not in the chamber when the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) presented the evidence in the matter?

Mr. BOYS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will my hon. friend wait until I am through? He will have no doubt as to where he stands.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend talks about bluff and evasion; I think we are getting a little of it now. I am asking the minister to say whether these articles have been under the conference rates.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Sit down and give me a chance to talk. In reality the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was not quite sure himself whether it was correct or not, because he repeats it not once, not twice, but thrice. If my hon. friend will wait I will read the question as it was put on those three occasions.

Mr. BOYS: Give us the answer, that is what we want. Do not let us have a burlesque made of this.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have my own way of making my remarks.

Mr. BOYS: All right; go ahead then, you are harmless.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre, putting the question again, said:

> I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, his colleague; Am I right or am I wrong in asserting that wheat, flour, sugar and cattle are exempted from the conference rates? He can accept the advice of my hon. friend behind him. Not one of them will dispute it. They know perfectly well I am right.

Then he went on to say: "I make the statement and you can prove I am wrong." That was certainly a fallacy that I have never before heard enunciated in this House. Well, the hon. member goes at it again, and he says:

> I repeat that wheat, flour, sugar and cattle are not, and never have been, included in the conference rates.

[Mr. Boys.]

> I state further that I have this from shipping authorities both in Montreal and in other sections. I am not going to go any further in regard to quotations.

He has it from those who are under suspicion. What a delightful authority that is! "I have it from the combine itself," he says. And what more need be said? He prefers to accept that evidence—until the sworn evidence is produced which was taken before the special committee of which the hon. member for Brome was the chairman. When that sworn evidence was brought down showing that all these articles except sugar were under the conference rates, then my hon. friend, with the greatest grace, crawls down and says: "I never said so." The hon. member for Brome had the sworn evidence and he was showing that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was wrong, when that hon. gentleman interrupted him:

> Mr. Stevens: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt?
>
> Mr. McMaster: Yes.
> Mr. Stevens: The hon. member is not quite right. I said that these articles were not now and had not been for some time affected by the conference rates.

"Were not now, and had not been for some time;" that is quite a different statement altogether. He goes on:

> They were at one time, because I am quite aware of the fact that the United States government interfered in regard to flour, so that my hon. friend is quite right in regard to that.

Oh yes, that is quite a different story. On three successive occasions he said they were not now and had not been under the conference rates, and then when the hon. member for Brome draws attention to the fact he was not correct, he points out that he did not catch that right; and I want to give my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre credit, I think he thought he was telling the truth. We have never found him otherwise, but he knows when to crawl down, and that is what some people do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Might I remark it is very evident tonight this government does.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is all right; I will attend to my right hon. friend in a few minutes. Here was the evidence given:

> There is no fixed rate on flour. We have what might be called a gentleman's agreement as to rates on flour.

Then we have the evidence of another gentleman by the name of Cunningham. He says there is a fixed rate on grain. So the evidence they got from the combine itself was not very reliable, and if they had got a little more information about sugar the chances are it would be under the combine too, and that is the only one left. But supposing it had been true, and they could truthfully sav that here were three articles that were outside the combine; is not that an admission that everything else is inside? What kind of consolation would it be to shippers of thousands of other articles to know that four of them were not in the combine? Only the shippers of those four articles would care much about them; all the other articles would be under the combine. After all, there was nothing to it had it been true, which it was not, but I absolve my hon. friend from any guilty intention. Does the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) understand now where he gets off at?

Mr. BOYS: As clear as mud.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have got you on that, anyway.

Mr. BOYS: You are entertaining anyhow, nothing else.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, we have got you on that point. Here is the next one. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) said that we could not specify the commodities. Well, how many commodities are there left when you control them all? The agreement provides in paragraph (d):

> That the control and regulation of the rates to be charged by the contractor shall rest with the government of Canada and that government shall fix such transportation rates on all commodities from time to time.

Now how many do you leave when you get them all fixed? The opposition must be up against it very badly for argument when they think there is something left after you include them all. They are up against it pretty badly. Everybody has been commenting on the weakness and feebleness of their attack; it is lamentable, it is pathetic. After all the bluster and braggadocio and filibustering they have done, that is the sole result after the attack by one of their best men—because he is one of the best of them over there, and that is saying a good deal because there are some good debaters over there.

Another complaint was that we could not send any of these ships to the Pacific coast. If that were true that would be a real grievance, because I think Vancouver is one of the most promising ports in Canada. But what does the agreement provide? Paragraph (a) provides that the contractor shall:

> Build, equip, provide, establish and during this contract, continue and in the manner hereinafter mentioned, operate a regular shipping service between such ports in Great Britain or Ireland or the continent of Europe, and Canadian ports as may be designated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce for Canada or his representatives from time to time.

Canadian ports—that means all. Again, how many are left when you include them all? That includes Vancouver, Prince Rupert, the ports on Hudson bay, if you like, St. John and Halifax, Montreal and Quebec, and any others there are. Why it is a barn door; how much wider does my hon. friend want it? It must be a pretty watertight contract when that is the weakest spot they can pick on.

Another point made by hon. gentlemen opposite was that this contract may be abandoned over night; but the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) thought the contract was so good that if it was his he would stick to it all his life. Now what are you going to make out of that? It cannot be good and bad at the same time. I want to say that the hon. member for Centre Torontc made some of the most pertinent and I think some of the most effective remarks regarding the contract and the way it would work out, provided we went the wrong way about of putting it into effect, that is, if we attempted to put a low rate on everything and act as if we did not know which side of our bread the butter was on. The hon. member made some very sensible remarks in connection with that contingency, which we do not intend to run the risk of; no sensible person would. Let us see what he said besides,—and this shows the bent of the Tory mind on the control of rates. The hon. member for Centre Toronto takes the ground that after all, we are all liable to error, and that if this rate-fixing institution called a combine has made a mistake here and there, it is only what the railway commission has done. Now what do you know of that, Mr. Speaker. If they made a mistake, it is only what the railway commission has done, and they should be given the same fair consideration. He puts this rate-controlling institution known as the combine, which this gentleman recognized as a regular institution apparently with somebody in authority, on a parity with the railway commission. He says:

> They should be given the same fair consideration which the railway commission gives the two railways of this country in the matter of fixing rates for their traffic.

The right hon. leader of the opposition never misses an opportunity to castigate the Minister of Agriculture for some alleged statement he made regarding the railway commission. That was when I was a private member. Of course, I had no right to say anything against the railway commission then, but I said it just the same. Now here is someone quite a little closer to my right hon. friend than the Minister of Agriculture, and he brackets this institution called a combine with the railway commission. I would refer the right hon. gentleman to his recalcitrant follower to see if he cannot fix him up, and I wish him more success than he had with the Minister of Agriculture. Mark you, that was no slip of the tongue by the hon. member for Centre Toronto. He said the same thing more than once. It just showed the natural bent of the Tory mind. He said:

> First of all, I do not believe there is a combine in the sense that it is a combine to restrain trade.

He also thinks it is a docile institution with no teeth, and that if it had teeth, it would not bite anyhow. He goes on:

> I have too high an opinion of the Canadian Pacific and of these other lines to believe they are doing anything more than trying to get a fair rate which would keep them going. There may be mistakes made, just as there have been in the fixing of rates on our transportation lines in this country: there is a little one, for instance, on the Crowsnest pass.

Who made that mistake, if it was a mistake? The Parliament of Canada. And this rate fixing institution, known as the combine, has the same right to make mistakes that we have. What do you know about that? Well, words fail me, Mr. Speaker, to do justice to such a statement as that. I will not read any further. My hon. friends opposite are looking nearly as serious as when these files of earlier correspondence were tabled; they are looking as though their last hour had come. "Cheer up, the worst is yet to come." I think I have got through with the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol).

I come now to the first gentleman who spoke to-day, the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark). His first complaint was a very terrible one. "Why, these boats may be built in Germany." I suppose he thought that would arouse everybody's anger. He must have thought that we were in the middle of the war again. Let me tell the hon. gentleman the war has been over for some time. However, he made the statement twice, and I suppose he will go on repeating it all over Canada trying to make capital because these vessels might be built in Germany. As it happens they will not be built in Germany. My information is that all these contracts have been already let to British shipyards. That should satisfy my hon. friend; I hope he will sleep tonight when he knows that.

Mr. BOYS: Have the contracts been signed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is for Sir William Petersen to say; we are not building them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You said they were a moment ago.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Another fallacious notion my hon. friend is getting into his head is that we are going in for building ships. we have got about enough ships now of the kind that were built by my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You are only subsidizing them?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are paying for the right to control the transportation rates, and we are going to control them.

Then my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) goes further with regard to wheat shipped to Montreal. He stated that these ships are actually going to haul American wheat in competition with ours, and notwithstanding that fact they are going to be subsidized out of the treasury of Canada, and then he asked the question "Is this wheat of ours going in there with the American wheat? That in order to draw our wheat they must draw American wheat and it will be mixed together in the same bin." My hon. friend is a legal gentleman, I understand that is his profession, and he must know that every article that enters Canada that is dutiable must either pay duty or go into a bonded warehouse of some kind. If he does not know that he is not very well posted on wheat; he may be a good lawyer in other respects. But any dutiable article that comes into Canada, which is just moving through Canada, enters at one point and goes out at another.

Mr. CLARK: Will that wheat definitely go into elevators at Montreal?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just a little louder if you please.

Mr. CLARK: Will the wheat that comes through from the United States in bond definitely get into the elevators at Montreal?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Surely but it will be kept separate in special bins. Surely my hon. friend has heard of that before?

Mr. CLARK: It will be separated from the Canadian wheat?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Surely.

Mr. CLARK: And never mixed at any time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Surely not. No wonder we need to send this contract to a committee; I see there is a lot of information required round here. American wheat! Why, you would have every farmer in this House on his hind legs almost if we mixed that Kansas wheat in Montreal with our wheat? It is practically all Kansas wheat that goes through there at a certain period of the season. They would be subject to prosecution if they mixed that grade and sold it out in any other way than it goes in. The customs officers of this country guard wheat from the United States carefully because otherwise they would lose the duty on it. The evidence given at the grain investigation showed quite distinctly that we are on guard all the time to see that there is no mixture of wheat going by boat to Buffalo and New York. If the hon. gentleman has any doubt about that I can quote from the report of the grain commission but I do not want to read too many harrowing documents. My hon. friend (Mr. Clark) in the two hours he spoke was at least very gentlemanly, but that is about all. I can prove absolutely from the report of the Royal Grain Commission that there is no mixing of our grain except by mistake. It is absolutely prohibited and the whole staff of custom officials of the United States are also on guard to prevent it, otherwise they would be defrauded of their duty. Therefore, wheat intended for American ports goes into bond at Buffalo and is shipped out via New York. When their wheat comes through Montreal it is not only carefully watched but it is graded by our officers. You will find that last year $64,000 was paid by the United States government to Canada for grading her wheat in Montreal. Wheat from the United States is kept in a separate bin most assuredly. That is the whole crux of the situation in connection with the grain trade to keep these wheats separated—not only the American wheat but our wheat of different grades is separated. I do not criticize my hon. friend for his misconceptions but if he is going to be a party to the building up of a great port at Vancouver he had better get acquainted with these matters. I think myself that the most difficult man in the world to explain the grain situation to is a lawyer. I think my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) also made mistakes, but perhaps I have roasted him enough.

The next matter that I wish to refer to is the probable millions, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, that this contract may cost us yet. Of course, there is only a trifling difference between £275,000 per year and millions. But what are a few tens of millions anyway when it comes to exaggeration? My hon. friends might as well have made it a hundred millions when they were about it. Before this arrangement is through I will venture a guess that the estimate will be up to two or three hundred millions, and that will be modest for my hon. friend opposite.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) had two or three objections and they were very well taken. He complained that the Preston report does not indicate the profits of the combine. But how could Mr. Preston get that information in another country? If there is any way of getting it maybe we will send Preston off again. He is a pretty good hand, he is quite a Sherlock Holmes in these matters. But how was he to get the profits of this combine whose ramifications extend pretty nearly from pole to pole and throughout the seven seas. Anyway that information is held in another country. Mr. Preston is no doubt some man, but I am afraid that task would be too much for him. Let me say to the hon. member for Red Deer that it would be very difficult to find out what profits the combine make. But we all know from the condition of our pockets that they are squeezing us, and if we have not got the money they must have it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The hon. member for Red Deer would be quite satisfied if he learned the profits made in the Canadian trade.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a different thing getting information at home; but this concern is operating in another country. I do not know that Mr. Preston could get the information unless he was equipped with judicial authority; he certainly could not get it except in a voluntary way in another country.

Then it is suggested that the Canadian merchant marine should be tried out. But we have given it a critical trial, and those who have tried the merchant marine most think the least of it. The objection is raised that most of those ships are too small for ocean traffic and too big for the canals. That is the trouble. They were made for war purposes, and the war is over as I have already indicated. Now we have to use this merchant marine for peace purposes. I think the Canadian merchant marine could be made an auxiliary to the Petersen fleet of ten ships if necessary. The offer has been made to all and sundry of Canadian ships, both the Canadian merchant marine and the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What offer? Will the minister answer?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The contract. My right hon. friend apparently has not awakened to the fact that we are discussing a contract. I can understand the dilemma which my hon. friend from Red Deer is in to-night. He felt the awkwardness of making the choice between this ridiculous amendment, and submitting the contract to the committee. That is the custom; the second reading is had and then amendments are suggested. And very often owing to the number of amendments that are introduced bills have to be reprinted. But as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has indicated, whatever alterations are made must be such as both parties can agree to; otherwise there is no contract. We are following in this case the method that is pursued in connection with any other bill. The friends of the combine have instilled into the minds of some people the idea that an attempt is being made to do something underhand. That is absolutely not so; our desire is to have everybody on the face of the earth who wants to be heard given an opportunity to come before the committee. There is no juggling whatever; everything is absolutely straight and above board. But it is a strange fact, Mr. Speaker, that the most straightforward people are sometimes the most suspected.

I think I have dealt with most of the remarks of one kind and another that have been made by those who have attacked the agreement. And those attacks were very feeble indeed. Most of the criticism has been directed against Mr. Preston. But suppose hon. gentlemen could succeed in annihilating Mr. Preston, what would be the situation then? Why, the contract would still be there. And Mr. Preston, I fancy, can look after himself before the committee.

Now I shall refer as briefly as possible to some points with regard to the defence which has been made in behalf of the combine. Of course, we are all agreed that there is a combine; there is no reason why we should spend any time labouring that point. But I did not suspect that we should all come to that agreement so quickly. I have therefore taken the trouble to look up the reply of the steamship companies in which it is contended that no combine exists but that there is just a friendly little get-together. I shall read briefly from this document, which by the way is unsigned. No one has undertaken to put his name to this reply, but I may say that at least Mr. Preston put his name to his own report. That is more than has yet been done by any of those who have come to the defence of the combine, and it is worth something at any rate. The extract from which I am about to read is interesting; it is what convinced the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that there was no combine.

> As mentioned previously in this report there is no "combine" (which in the present day acceptation of the term implies a monopoly), but merely an association of the regular lines, constituting a very small portion of the carriers on the Atlantic, who have agreed among themselves to quote on various commodities equivalent rates subject to change on notice; the object of this is simply to prevent the complete demoralization in rates which occurs when there is no such agreement under the keenly competitive conditions which prevail in the north Atlantic trade.

You see, the idea is to keep down competition. When you are anxious that a certain rate shall prevail you naturally do not want some other fellow to come along and vulgarly cut it down. To proceed:

> It is practically the same arrangement which obtains as between all large distributors of staple commodities, with the same object, i.e., to prevent uncontrolled price cutting, which, as it destroys proper service, in the end benefits no one. If it were not possible to maintain ocean rates on a reasonable basis of freight the result could only be the elimination of all but the strongest lines and a practical monopoly of the traffic by such lines.

This is so familiar! You can read it in the dark, and it is the kind of thing we have all heard as long as we can remember. It is the old contention, that if you do not control the competition you are going to wipe out everybody and that finally you will have to resort to the sailing vessels of old, and all that sort of thing. There are two or three other gems which I should like to read if I could find them. It would be too bad to miss them, for they are well worth reading, as a defence of the combine. I thought I had turned down the places in which I marked them, but evidently they are so ashamed of themselves that they got under cover. But they are all unsigned; no one has ventured to put his name to the document. Well, of what value is a document of this character to which there is no signature? What kind of campaign do they conduct when they refuse to come out in the open with the name of a responsible person? I would ask hon. gentlemen, how many men do they think will fall over one another in their endeavour to secure a hearing before the committee? They are making much ado about a supposed grievance, but if I were a betting man I would take odds on the number of these gentlemen who will cross the Atlantic to expose Mr. Preston. I can scarcely see them tumbling over one another in the corridors of the Parliament Buildings to get to the committee. But, as I say, if they cannot put their name to an ordinary document like this published in a newspaper, it is not to be expected that they will submit themselves to the searching light of cross-examination. If they come, however, I will welcome them; possibly we will give them a banquet.

10 p.m.

Mr. LADNER: I presume the minister wants to be fair in his statements as regards the signing of the various documents. If he will look at page 46 of the reply of the steamship lines he will find the signatures of various companies such as the Anchor-Donaldson, the Canadian Pacific Steamships, Limited, the Furness line, and fifteen or twenty others.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But they are not signed.

Mr. LADNER: The companies have signed the document.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will any of these people come forward and assume responsibility for what is stated in the document?

Mr. LADNER: But here are their signatures.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Those are merely the names of companies. Does the hon. member think that Mr. Beatty, for example, will hold himself responsible for this document, which he did not sign?

Mr. LADNER. The minister has been joking all the evening; but seriously, does he suggest that the signatures here, purporting to be genuine, are forgeries, without the authority of any individual company in any case?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are no signatures there at all. I think my hon. friend's law needs brushing up a bit.

Mr. LADNER: Are these not copies of documents properly signed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is not a signature there at all, but just the names of companies. If that is all my hon. friend has to say I will proceed. Here is another extract:

> In fact the struggle became so keen that many of the lines had to withdraw, and the remainder, with a view of self-preservation, began to draw together so as to avoid bankruptcy and disaster by coming to a mutual agreement with shippers.

I wonder how many hon. members who are farmers ever heard of this combine sitting in with them and deciding on any rate. I will tell you of a case in which they did, but it was only after a club had been held over them. In the Annapolis valley some time about 1920 or 1921 it was costing the fruit growers $2.50 per barrel to ship their apples to the Old Country, as against a previous rate of 70 cents. The United Fruit Growers of Nova Scotia got after the combine and they soon made them come to terms. The apple growers got hold of tramp steamers, and while these vessels did not give them the service they wanted they were able nevertheless to cut into the apple rate to $2.00, $1.75, $1.50, until the combine came to them and said that if the apple growers would guarantee their ships all their apples they would reduce the rate to 90 cents per barrel. And that bargain still stands. They sat in delightfully that time, but they sat in when they were simply compelled to. And that is a fact; the ship owners will sit in with the shippers, but only after the shippers have indicated quite plainly that there is going to be competition with a consequent control of rates. I have that information from the apple growers' association, whose representatives were here last week fighting another combine, which was exposed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) and his commission. Here is another extract:

> The North Atlantic steamship conference is not in any sense a combine—

That is where my hon. friend got his authority.

> —but the interests of the large number of individual companies operating steamers from north Atlantic ports required some form of joint action in respect to rates. It may be here stated that the United Kingdom conference does not direct or in any way interfere with the making of eastbound rates by the north Atlantic freight conference, the rates being made to equitably permit steamers to pay expenses and the manufacturer to export.
> Furthermore, in the list of eastbound rates promulgated by the north Atlantic conference, no rate or agreement is made in respect to grain, flour or cattle.

Even the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has gone back on that authority, so I will not refer to it any further. This is the defence. Why, it is an admission of guilt except as to four articles, three of which have been proven under oath to be under the combine, leaving only one article, sugar, and the chances are that it is under the combine also if the facts could be arrived at.

Mr. CHURCH: Is there any reference in the Reply of Steamship Lines to the Preston report which the minister is quoting from in reference to the elevator combine, the grain growers' trust or the wheat pool trust, and would the minister approve the subsidy policy of government aid to a few private concerns or private companies with a view of breaking up these combines and checking rates?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is only ten o'clock, and if my hon. friend will keep quiet long enough, I shall get around to the elevator combine, how it is controlled and who controls it.

Why have ocean rates increased so much? Let me make some comparisons. Have ocean rates increased more rapidly than land rates? That, at least, will guide us in coming to a conclusion whether there is anything in this or not. The argument is advanced that transportation on the ocean is higher than it used to be. That is true, but in my estimation it is much more expensive relatively than on land. This is a table I have compiled in regard to butter, cheese, bacon and cattle, showing the pre-war ocean rates for ordinary and refrigerator stowage, the 1924 rates and the proportion and percentage of increase for 1924 as compared with the pre-war rate:

	Pre-war 1914		1924		Ordinary		Refrigerator
	Ordinary per 100 lbs	Refrig. Per 100 lbs	Ordinary	Refrig.		Percentage
Product	Cts.	Cts.			Proportion	Increase	Proportion	Percentage
Butter.. ..	37.17	54.17	100	165	1 : 2.69	169%	1 : 3.0	204%
Cheese.. ..	31.5	40.0	70	105	1 : 2.22	122%	1 : 2.6	162%
Bacon.. ..	23.77	35.3	50	100	1 : 2.1	110%	1 : 2.83	183%
Cattle.. ..	$7.30 each		$20 each		1 : 2.74	174%

What are the increases on land? The average increase on land, according to a computation of many articles, is about 30 per cent. Some computators make it more nearly 40 per cent. Supposing we make it 40 per cent, there would still be an increase of 300 per cent more on water than on land. That is to say, the rates on water have increased over 300 per cent more than rates on land.

Mr. TOLMIE: What year did the hon. member say that the rate on cattle was $7.30 a head?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The year 1914. I have figured this out carefully and this is the conclusion from this schedule. The average percentage of increase, 1914 to 1924, is 143 per cent for ordinary stowage and 183 per cent for refrigerator stowage. The average percentage of increase, 1914 to 1924, for ordinary and refrigerator stowage, is 160 per cent. The approximate percentage of increase in railway rates between 1914 and 1924 on the same commodities is 30 per cent. Taking 30 per cent as the average increase in railway rates, ocean rates have increased exactly five and one-half times as much as railway rates. That is, uncontrolled ocean rates have increased 435 per cent more than controlled railway rates in the ten year period 1914 to 1924. In face of that, we need not doubt any longer the existence of a combine on the ocean. Where the rates are controlled on land and there is the expense of keeping up the right of way with large labour bills as compared with those for ocean transportation, it seems to me the expenses must be greater on land, and yet the increase at most is not over 40 per cent as against 160 and 180 per cent that I have spoken of for ocean transportation. The uncontrollable ocean rate has increased five and one-half times as much as the controlled rates on land. Surely it is high time that we looked into these things and we are not the first to look into them. Long ago, the entire official opposition were cognizant of all these things. May I read some of the correspondence that was brought down yesterday?

Sir George Perley reviews the history of the government's efforts in this matter. He starts out: "You will remember that during the past ten years the question of ocean freight rates has been discussed many times, as they often seemed higher than was reasonable, and some of us thought that a way might be found for controlling them by a body similar to our Railway Commission."

This is a cable Sir Thomas White sent tc the High Commissioner in April, 1919:

In that month it will be recalled Sir Robert Borden was attending the Peace conference in Paris and Sir Thomas White was the Acting Prime Minister. Sir Thomas cabled to the High Commissioner as follows: "Canada much concerned about ocean freight rates—Inquire and cable whether British government would co-operate with Canada in giving effect to report of Royal Commission on Natural Resources. Trade and Legislation of certain portions empire as presented to Imperial parliament in March 1917. This report finds that it is not desirable that operations of steamship companies carrying passengers and freight between Canada and England should remain longer, without government supervision."

Then, later on:

Sir Robert Borden, however, had been considering the question and about this time drew up a memorandum "respecting necessary control of ocean rates and disposition of available shipping."

Further on:

Government Strongly Impressed

He then says: "The government of Canada is strongly impressed with the view that this condition is not sound; that the policy and methods hitherto pursued have not been characterized in some respects by wise or comprehensive outlook, and that the future relations of the British Empire depend very materially upon the immediate remedy of existing conditions."

Think of it. Here are four knighted gentlemen hovering around this question, but taking care not to singe their wings in any way. Yet they feel the empire trembling! Think of that from a Tory! These four knighted, belted gentlemen, going to look into this question, and then with a combine in their centre playing the old-fashioned school game, "ring-around-a-rosy." They give a squint at it, they all admit the situation, but they never get to grips with it. And look at them to-night! Then later on let us see what the right hon. leader of the opposition had to say:

He writes: "You will observe that the Canadian government have attached great importance to the desirability of securing, if feasible, some control of ocean freight rates." Continuing, he remarks that the Imperial Shipping Committee hitherto had not considered this angle of the problem.

"However," he wrote, "the government have now decided that the time is opportune to put before the committee this question of the control of ocean freight rates."

And in the meantime the right hon. leader of the opposition asked Dr. Magill to report on the situation; but Dr. Magill says his hands are full with another commission appointed by the right hon. leader of the opposition, the Hyndman Grain Commission, and that he cannot take care of it. As a matter of fact, they did not take care of either of them. That is a habit the old government got into. They twit us about appointing commissions, but as far as I recall we generally get reports from them. On the other hand, three at least of the commissions appointed by the old government failed to make any report. There was one—I forget its name, it was as long as the official name of the late government, and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Hopkins) was a member of it—you cannot find it anywhere. It never reported, it simply died on the roost over night. Then we had two more. I wonder why the right hon. leader of the opposition did not write Dr. Magill to find out why he could not report. Dr. Magill just wrote back intimating that there was another commission to be attended to around the grain exchange. That is all. I think I have the key to the difficulty. There was at that time another combine forming in Canada, a combine of the people to get rid of that government, so no wonder they had not time to wait for reports from the Hyndman commission on grain or this commission on freight rates—they had to look after themselves.

It is sometimes asked, Mr. Speaker, how we are going to bring about control of ocean freight rates. If we go about it the wrong way there is bound to be failure. But why should we? I have a summary of all the sailings from Montreal during seven months of last summer for cheese, eggs, butter, meats, lard, fruit—104 sailings in all. My dairy commissioner and my deputy have worked this out carefully, and during the seven months covered in this summary the ten Petersen ships, if they have the ordinary cold storage space which I understand they will have, that is, an average of 50,000 to 55,000 cubic feet each, they will be able to take care of all these commodities that are offered, and use only one-tenth of the space. That is worth something. The freight rate on cheese, we will say, is lowered 15 or 20 per cent, or even 10 per cent, and eggs, butter, meats and fruit also benefiting to the same extent—will not that be worth something? These ten ships with five or six of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine will take care of the entire offerings of all these commodities from Montreal for the seven months; then they will be able during the winter months to take care of the offerings from our other ports. If we take on some of the other Canadian Government Merchant Marine boats—and I understand there are a number of them trading already on the Pacific through the Panama canal—we will have still more freight accommodation. Then there are the boats belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. You cannot expect them to come in at this time. They are a member of the combine, and they will be loyal to it so long as business considerations permit, but when the time comes to make a choice between loyalty to the combine and loyalty to the people of Canada they will not hesitate. This is a free country, the offer is free, and we do not expect the other shipping companies to tumble over each other to take advantage of this arrangement, but the more we get in the quicker the remedy will be effected; the slower they come in and the more opposition we encounter, the slower will be the remedy, and those who obstruct will have to take the responsibility of results coming thus slowly. These will be the factors determining the people's attitude on this matter.

I have every sympathy with my hon. friends of the Progressive party. But they are suspicious. There is no question about that. I do not know what they are suspicious of. Let me recite right now the struggle connected with the breaking of the grain combine in the west, and I am glad the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is present; he will probably confirm what I say.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When a handful of farmers in the northwest stood out to fight the grain combine they had even a more feeble weapon in their hands than what this Petersen fleet is alleged to be. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) ridiculed this feeble weapon. Our farmers of the northwest were apparently in an absolutely hopeless position, but they had to do something, and they went out and did it. A handful of men gathered at Indian Head in 1901, and formed the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association. Some time later on Mr. E. A. Partridge and three or four others formed the organization to fight the elevator combine. Why, it looked preposterous to attempt such a fight, but they stuck at it year after year, they started a journal of their own, they established locals here and there, until they had developed a spirit of co-operation and loyalty. Then a little later on in Saskatchewan there grew up another big institution under the support of the Saskatchewan government. That was in 1909 or 1910, and we do not hear to-day, Mr. Speaker, anything about a combine there. That teaches us not to despise the day of small things. These organizations at their inception were much smaller than the despised ten ships of the Petersen fleet and our own merchant marine. What surprised us the other day was when we had before us Mr. Maharg, a former member of this House and later a member of the Saskatchewan government, who expressed far more suspicion with respect to this matter than the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) expressed this evening. Mr. Maharg enunciated the somewhat heretical doctrine preached by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre: You are to be judged guilty until you prove yourself innocent. That coming from a gentleman whose company was subsidized from its inception, and rightly so, for it would never have opened its doors if it had not been so assisted, rather surprised us. The Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company was started with a $6,000 organization grant. I was a member of the Saskatchewan government at the time, and know the facts. I believed it was a good policy then, and I believe so still. Eighty-five per cent of the total capital expenditure necessary to build a line of 400 elevators—$4,000,000—was loaned by the Saskatchewan government to this company, of which Mr. Maharg is the president. They got that money at an average rate of 5½ per cent,—2½ per cent less than the current rate of interest at that time, representing a saving of $750,000. That is the gentleman who objects to subsidies!

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does not the minister draw a distinction between a subsidy and a loan which has to be repaid?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thought I had touched on that, but I will touch on it further. It was a loan at 2½ per cent less than they could get it anywhere else. Therefore the $750,000 saved was a subsidy, a grant, or whatever you like to call it. It was straight aid.

Mr. EVANS: I would like to ask the minister—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Now, just a minute. I know that some of my hon. friends do not like to hear this, but the same men from Saskatchewan know it is true and they do not object to having it recited. They know that Mr. Maharg was inconsistent. They got a straight subsidy in the form of an interest saving of $750,000, and in addition to that their trading account was guaranteed 100 per cent by the government, and that ran into tens of thousands each year. In this way they were assisted in getting their loans through at the bank. Now, you may not want to call that a subsidy, but I do not care what you call it; it is money, it is assistance.

Mr. EVANS: Will the minister say that 5½ per cent was less than it cost the government?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I do not say that. I said it was the average price. I suppose the government could get it at that price or perhaps at a little less, but that is not the point. The point is what the elevator company would have had to pay if they had borrowed in the ordinary course of business and if the government had not taken the action it did. That is the point—and the difference is the subsidy. You cannot wiggle away from that. You cannot take the ground that a subsidy is all right for me but all wrong for the other fellow. You cannot say: "Do not do as I do, but as I tell you."

Mr. EVANS: There was no subsidy given; it was only an organization grant.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will the hon. gentleman tell me where he could get the money at 5½ per cent?

Mr. EVANS: From the government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I say there was a saving in interest of $750,000 by actual computation. I do not know how much the saving on the trading account would be, but it must have run up just as high as the other because they had the government behind them and therefore the banks would make loans at a more favourable rate, knowing that they were taking no chances. The benefit in respect to the trading account ceased only two or three years ago. Now, I was jointly responsible for that, and we thought it was good business. The purpose of this payment is identically the same, that of breaking a combine, and of assisting not only the farmers but every citizen of the country. If that were not the object we would not be in it; why should we be? The other day a fruit combine was unearthed by Commissioner Duncan—and I may say in passing that you will live a long while before you will find the Tory party digging into a combine. Oh no; they would rather snuggle up to it. I had an opportunity of discussing this fruit combine with my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) and he indicated in a general way what was coming. Before the report was tabled or even printed we were taking action to meet the situation. Representatives of the fruit and vegetable trade all over Canada were convened in Ottawa, working out a policy to combat that combine through the establishment of a nation-wide brokerage agency of their own. You never heard of anything like that under a Tory government. Look at the story of it! I have here a report on ocean freight rates by the present hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton)—one of the knighted gentlemen who were looking into this matter. He never got close enough to it, however, to hurt either it or himself. I see that my hon. friend is just coming into the chamber, and I am glad, I ventured the prediction a while ago that he would not speak on this question, and I am going to keep to that guess. Now, this is a report by H. L. Drayton, K.C.—I assume that is my hon. friend—printed by the Government Printing Bureau at Ottawa. There is nothing wrong in it, and from what my hon. friend says in this report I am sure he can conscientiously support this resolution. He says:

> With this end in view, I endeavoured to obtain the appointment of a joint commission to make a thorough and complete investigation of, and to report on the methods and practices, and rates and charges of ocean carriers doing business, or from time to time doing business, between ports in the United Kingdom, or any of them, and ports in the Dominion of Canada, or any of them; and also of all terminal companies or port authorities of any port in the United Kingdom or in the Dominion of Canada through which traffic, whether of passengers or freight, between the United Kingdom and the Dominion of Canada passes, and also to investigate into and report on all insurance charges or other expenses that shippers from the United Kingdom to Canada, or vice versa, are subject to as the case may be.
> I further represented that the commission, in addition to reporting its findings in the above matters, should also recommend what, if any, legislation the commission deemed advisable should be passed by the Imperial parliament, or by the parliament of the Dominion, or by both.

He suggests the advisability of legislation. Well, we have legislation before us. My hon. friends opposite promise or suggest, while we perform—that is the difference. I quote further:

> I further represented that it was necessary that the commission should have authority to sit at such places it might desire, either in the United Kingdom or in the Dominion of Canada, with authority to compel the attendance of witnesses, production of documents, books, papers, etc., and to administer oaths; and also that the commission should have the right to employ accountants, etc.

We did that two years ago before what was called the McMaster committee. The inquiry went on for weeks—I do not know how long; we thought it was going to drain the treasury to pay the expenses of the witnesses. That committee submitted three or four interim reports. The hon. member for West York, in this report, suggested investigation either in Great Britain or in Canada. We have had it in Canada, and in a week or two we will call to this country everybody in England who wants to come and attend the hearing before the special committee. In his report the hon. member for West York also said:

> I further impressed upon the Imperial authorities that it was the desire of the Canadian government that the investigation should be entered on in the near future, and, if possible, a report made so as to enable any necessary action to be taken by that government at the ensuing session of parliament.

He suggested that steps should be taken to make action possible "at the ensuing session of parliament." This was in 1913; so that the hon. member had in mind exactly what we are doing. I do not know how he can object to our legislation, unless it be from the point of view of party loyalty. I have a high regard for that myself, and that would be the only justification for taking a stand against the report. However, I will not take any delight in seeing my hon. friend try to look both ways, because we all have to do it sometimes; in this team work we are engaged in it cannot be avoided. But under ordinary circumstances, where party fealty or party loyalty was not involved, I am sure that if my hon. friend were of the same opinion now that he was when he submitted the report frow which I have quoted, he would support this resolution without reservation.

No combines ever admit guilt; they are not expected to, except indirectly, in their defence. My experience with wrongdoers is that they are not very courageous; throw the light of open day upon them and they soon take cover. That was the experience in the case of the elevator combine, and also in the case of the fruit combine, in the western country and again in the Annapolis valley. What is all this commotion about throughout the country? What is all this lobbying for? What is all this advertising for? As a matter of fact this institution, this conference—that is its Sunday name—has been torpedoed amidships and is in distress; it is flying the signals right now and sending S.O.S. calls all over the country for someone to come to the rescue. I know what it is because I have been in these fights many a time. Sometimes I come out on top and sometimes not; but the combine never came out on top and it will not come out on top this time.

The time will come when we all in this House will have to show our colours and line up either with the people of Canada or the Atlantic conference; we shall have no other choice. I have a clipping here showing that South Africa is suffering under the same difficulty. Here is a little story, and I assure you it is right, to the effect that they are looking about for some way of escaping the irksomeness they feel in respect to ocean rates; they are in exactly the same position we are in. We expect to get recruits and reinforcements in our fight. You may recall, Mr. Speaker, how little Belgium undertook to challenge the marching hordes of Germany. It looked preposterous for her to stand up against such an onslaught of superior force, but her action challenged the admiration of the whole world, and the whole world rushed to her assistance, with the result that we all know. Our action is also going to challenge admiration. Not only that, but it will enlist the support of other countries that are situated just as we are in respect to ocean rates; there is no question about that. But even if they do not come to our assistance, it will only take us a little longer, that is all; and we are going to stay with it until we get results.

Just one word, and I will be through. There is only one move required. You may scoff at this, but you will recall, Mr. Speaker, how at the beginning of the war the British army was spoken of as "the contemptible little army," and I say in this matter you may scoff if you like, but we have a right cause, and it is only a matter of time until we get results. How quickly, will depend upon the opposition to the proposal. If you want to delay results oppose this move; but those who oppose it will have to take responsibility not only here but in the country. Results will be attained in a short time if we get the support of the Canadian Pacific, but we shall not get it at the beginning. First of all we have to show that we mean business; that we are right behind this contract, behind the principle of it. Hon. gentlemen may talk about changes being made, but every bill can be changed for the better without altering its principle at all. The Prime Minister has indicated, in order to satisfy the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark), that he is willing to make a change with regard to the word "commodities," to which the hon. member objected on the ground that it might mean American commodities, commodities from Honolulu, Jericho or some other place. The Prime Minister indicated he would be willing to insert the word "Canadian," if that were thought necessary to show that Canadian commodities were meant. If there are any t's to be crossed or i's to be dotted, we will make these changes; but the principle of the bill stands. This government, like any other government, is always ready to make changes that will improve a bill so long as they do not interfere with its principle, and this government has indicated its readiness to do that.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, if anything were needed to convince this House that the whole proposition which it is discussing at the present time was in the nature of a burlesque—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh yes, I knew that would come.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is a good judge of himself. If anything were needed, I say, we have it in the speech of the hon. minister (Mr. Motherwell) who has just sat down. If I did not know that the minister is an absolute prohibitionist I might have come to the conclusion on listening to his speech that he had already taken advantage of the loosening up of the temperance legislation in Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: There is this to be said about the hon. gentleman: While he is always entertaining, he is very rarely instructive. I think he can say less in more time than any other hon. gentleman in this House. I notice that his last remark was "One word more and I will be through." The hon. gentleman was through an hour before that, but he did not know apparently how to stop.

I notice that one of his statements—and I do not intend at this late hour to take up much time—referred to the signing of letters and editorials and other documents, and while he was criticizing people for not signing letters and statements, he was holding in his hand this statement which is a reply of the steamship lines engaged in the Canadian north Atlantic trade to the charges made by Mr. Preston. My hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) very properly pointed out that this reply of the steamship lines was signed by the different companies. I am not speaking for them, but I think the minister might have had the fairness to admit when he was speaking on the matter that this statement was signed by the companies putting it out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does it contain the name of any responsible officer of any of the companies, the president or secretary?

Mr. MANION: I do not think any company would require to have their secretary's name there in addition to the names of the companies. I can read the names of the companies who are responsible for this statement. They are as follows:

Anchor-Donaldson Line, Ltd., Cunard Line.—The Robert Reford Co. Ltd.
Donaldson Line, Ltd.—The Robert Reford Co. Ltd.
Cairn Line of Steamships (Thomson Line).—The Robert Reford Co. Ltd.
White Star-Dominion Line.—
Canadian Pacific Steamships, Limited.—
Furness Line.—Furness, Withy & Co. Ltd.
Manchester Liners.—Furness, Withy & Co. Ltd.
Head Line.—McLean, Kennedy, Limited.
Scandinavian-American Line.—McLean, Kennedy, Limited.
Inter-Continental Transports, Limited.—Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who signed for the Robert Reford Company?

Mr. MANION: It is signed "The Robert Reford Co., Ltd.".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who signed for that company?

Mr. MANION: It is signed by the company itself. Does the Prime Minister mean to suggest that these companies who have put their names to this statement would deny that they are the authors of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend would not take as a contract the signature of a firm without the name of some officer of that firm.

Mr. MANION: Nor would you take as a contract a resolution in printed form before the House. As a matter of fact, the very weakness of the hon. gentleman's argument is this: The Minister of Agriculture, when he was making these charges about statements and letters being unsigned, spoke of the Preston report. I glanced at it while he was speaking, and on page after page I find that Mr. Preston quotes statements by correspondents who say this, that and the other thing, and he does not even mention who they are.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does he not sign the report?

Mr. MANION: Yes, but he bases his report on the statements of no one that we know. For example, he has a memorandum on the export of sole leather, and simply introduces it with the statement that "the largest sole leather tanners in the British Empire explain" such and such a thing; but he does not say who that is, and there is no signature.

Mr. HAMMELL: I will tell the hon. member who that is if he wants to know.

Mr. MANION: That is not the point. My hon. friend may tell me all kinds of things. He will have a chance to speak later on. I am simply quoting Mr. Preston's report to show that he does not quote any authority by name for his statements.

Mr. HAMMELL: Everyone in Ontario knows who that is.

Mr. MANION: Everyone in Ontario does not know, because I am in Ontario myself and I do not know.

Mr. HAMMELL: You do not know anything about the leather business.

Mr. MANION: I hope my hon. friend has more knowledge about that business than he shows in discussing many other subjects. Mr. Preston goes on and gives a quotation from "Another factory seriously affected." All he gives in that case is "A prominent manufacturer of agricultural implements"; but he does not say who that is. On the following page I find this: "From other sources the following complaints are made"; but there again no name is given, and there is no signature or anything to show where he got the information from. Again, "A very large manufacturing company in Toronto" writes and tells him something; but he does not say who it is. Again "The chairman of an Ontario city chamber of commerce" writes; but he does not say what city or what chamber of commerce that is. There is page after page of that sort of thing. So the Minister of Agriculture, in accusing some of our party of using statements which were unsigned, overlooked the fact that he was supporting a contract that was based upon a lot of statements that were not signed by the companies that gave them to Mr. Preston. I do not wish to waste any more time on the minister's speech because throughout the whole of his remarks I do not think he put up an argument either for or against the contract; he simply wasted the time of the House for about an hour and a half.

I wish to mention just one other thing, as other speakers have done, before I go on. The Prime Minister said here to-night, in reply to the member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), that even if this contract went to a special committee the government was ready to accept whatever proposal the special committee made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend referring to my remarks? I do not think I used the word "accept" at all, I said the government would be prepared to consider any suggestion that might be made by the committee.

Mr. MANION: I will accept the Prime Minister's statement but he went further and said they were ready to deal with any suggestion which the committee might make. I put it to any hon. member in the House if the right hon. gentleman did not go that far.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that the government would "accept".

Mr. MANION: The other evening in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) the Prime Minister made the statement:

Mr. Mackenzie King: The agreement will be passed just as it is, it cannot be trimmed up.

Which statement from the Prime Minister are we to accept, the statement made the other day or the statement made to-night?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will read the words that occasioned that reply he will see the relevance of it.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to waste the time of the House, but if the Prime Minister insists I will do so. This is before the reply in question of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Stevens: I rather suspected that—

In reference to some remark by the Prime Minister.

—I rather suspected that the government would be anxious to get this agreement to a private committee away up somewhere so that they could trim it up in order that it might be a little more presentable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, exactly.

Mr. MANION. I go on to quote:

Mr. Mackenzie King: The agreement will have to pass just as it is. It cannot be trimmed up.

Then a little lower down Mr. Stevens said:

My right hon. friend stated a moment ago that this agreement stands and not a letter of it can be changed.

Mr. Mackenzie King: It does stand.

So it is the case of the gentleman who said "You can pay your money and you can take your choice." We can either take the statement of the Prime Minister to-night in reply to the hon. member for Red Deer, or we can take his statement the other day in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

[Mr. Manion.]

Now Mr. Speaker, I am not going to deal with this agreement from the standpoint of a transportation man, nor from the standpoint of a lawyer, nor from the standpoint of a shipper; I am going to try to deal with it in a very brief way from the standpoint of the ordinary man in the street, the man who looks at the agreement just as the ordinary citizen should look at it, and I am going to make whatever brief observations I have to offer from that attitude.

In the first place the thing that strikes me and, I believe, the thing that strikes anybody in looking at this proposition is, that it is either based upon or supported by —we understood at first "based upon" but now they say "supported"—a report of W. T. R. Preston. I do not know Mr. W. T. R. Preston but I do know that very many charges have been made against him of political trickery, if you wish to put it that way. I do know that Mr. W. T. R. Preston is a man who is discredited among ordinary people. That is the feeling of the ordinary man towards W. T. R. Preston; and I find myself asking why this government, representing the people of Canada, should have chosen Mr. W. T. R. Preston, when they had so many respectable outstanding lawyers, so many respectable business men in the Liberal party to choose from. If you look over the report—and I have looked it over and studied it fairly carefully—you will feel that the report is plainly the irresponsible report of an irresponsible man. It is particularly notable for its attacks upon outstanding men in the shipping business, not only in Canada but in Great Britain. It goes so far, Mr. Speaker, as not only to accuse these men of being crooked but to accuse them of being traitors to their country. Because if you read the report you will find that again and again Preston gives evidence—evidence, according to this statement, satisfactory to him —which proves to himself at any rate, that these men are conspiring—I could quote his actual words but I shall not take the time— are conspiring against Britain, are conspiring against Canada, in favour of Germany, in favour of Holland, in favour of the United States, and in favour of practically every other country in the world. Well, I have no brief in any shape, manner or form for the shipping men, either in England or in Canada —I presume they are well able to defend themselves—but I must confess that I believe somewhat in the old British principle that men should be regarded as innocent until they are proven guilty. But Mr. Preston takes the reverse attitude; he believes, apparently, that men should be considered guilty until they are proven innocent.

There seems to be throughout the whole country to-day a tendency to accuse any men who are in big business of being crooked, just the same as there is a tendency throughout this country to-day to accuse any man who is in politics of being a grafter. It all comes apparently from the same line of thought. It is, apparently, due to a diseased mentality on the part of a great many people that they seem to think that most of the members of this House, of any party are out for graft or crookedness. Well, I might say this now, although I did not intend to, that I have been a member of this House for eight years and never have I heard or seen of any crookedness going on, never have I been offered graft in any shape, manner or form.

As to the lobbying which the Minister of Agriculture spoke of a few moments ago, and which he says is going on at the present time in regard to this contract, I have seen nothing of it and I doubt whether anybody else has; I do not think there is anything in the charge. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that most men, whether they are big business men or small business men, prefer to deal with their fellow beings, with their fellow corporations, in an honest manner. For example would it be fair to assume that the leading men of the great Canadian Pacific Railway—Mr. Beatty, Mr. Grant Hall, Mr. D. C. Coleman, Mr. Lanigan and the others, the chief men of that company—have not the interests of this great Dominion of Canada at heart? Why the Canadian Pacific Railway is as much dependent on the success and prosperity of the Dominion as any individual in this country is dependent upon the success and prosperity of Canada. So that I think the whole attitude that Mr. Preston took in dealing with this investigation—if investigation it can be called, because most of these companies, in a statement that all hon. members have received, claim they never saw or heard from Mr. Preston, so that I doubt if what he did can be called an investigation—is open to suspicion. Anyhow I believe we should regard most of these men as innocent until they are proven guilty.

There is another observation I wish to make, and that is as to the uselessness of the scheme as proposed in this contract. Here we have a proposition to engage from Sir William Petersen ten ships. Now it has been shown here again and again—by statements which have not been refuted and which nobody attemps to refute—that these ten ships could make perhaps 5 per cent of the trips next year to Montreal if they were all on duty, perhaps 4 per cent. According to figures I have seen there were some 1,200 trips made by various lines of steamships to Montreal last year. The most anybody claims for these ten ships is that they could make fifty or sixty voyages to the port of Montreal. Now what possible effect could fifty or sixty trips have upon the other eleven hundred trips into the port of Montreal? What possible effect could 5 per cent of shipping have upon the other 95 per cent? It appears to me like an attempt to dam back Niagara with a broom. And for these ten ships the people of Canada are asked to put up in round figures $1,350,000 per annum, and with any increase in the number of ships that subsidy will be increased pro rata; and it has been pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the hon. member for Burrard, and by others, if these ships were used, for example, in the handling of wheat alone they could not handle more than about 13,000,000 bushels out of the 150,000,000 bushels that were shipped from Montreal last year—in other words they could handle about 8 per cent of the wheat shipped from Montreal if they had nothing else but wheat to carry throughout the whole season. What effect would the lowering of the rates on that eight per cent of wheat have on the other ninety-two per cent?

I am not so sure of this fact, but I am informed that if the ships were devoted to the cattle trade alone they would be able to handle only one-half of the cattle leaving the port of Montreal. That I suppose is correct; I do not think I have over-estimated it. But if they could handle only half of the cattle shipped out what would be done to take care of the other half? Are we to subsidize a shipping concern merely for one group, and that a small group, of people doing business in the country? What about the exporters of wheat, the manufacturers, and the other shippers in the country?

It is true that the rates have been increased since 1913; no one disputes that. But everyone admits, as does the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), that the expenses of the companies have also gone up. That hon. gentleman speaking on the floor of the House of Commons the other day admitted that the expenses of the companies had gone up one hundred per cent. If this is so, the companies have only increased their rates in accordance with the advance that has been made in their expenses, according to the hon. member for Brome. Now, to make this scheme effective at all, there is only one thing to do, and that is to subsidize a larger number of ships. In other words, at a rough guess, I should say that to make the scheme reasonably satisfactory, it would be necessary to subsidize forty more ships, so that there would be five hundred trips. This would be indispensable if it were really intended to control Atlantic shipping rates to any extent. That would be fifty ships in all, or five times the number now proposed; that is to say, we should have to spend five times the amount of the present contract of $1,350,000. That would represent a total expenditure of some seven million dollars per annum. How long would the people of this country consent to put up even half that amount every year for the purpose of subsidizing just a portion of our shipping?

There is another clause in the agreement which I desire to touch upon, and as I am not a lawyer I shall give to the House the interpretation which a prominent legal friend of mine has placed upon it, and which interpretation, I may say, has been endorsed by two other lawyers of my acquaintance.

Mr. POWER: Will the hon. member give the names of those lawyers?

Mr. MANION: Oh no, that is not necessary, but I will introduce my hon. friend to them outside, one of these days. Let me read from the third clause of the contract:

3. And it is mutually covenanted and agreed between the parties hereto that the subsidy payable to the contractor in the preceding paragraph is based on the operation and maintenance of a service of ten ships and the subsidy aforementioned shall be increased or reduced as the case may be in proportion to the number of ships operated and maintained by the contractor in the service aforesaid from time to time and such increase or reduction of subsidy shall be added to or deducted from the monthly payments hereinbefore provided for in paragraph two.

I have consulted a prominent lawyer on this clause and his interpretation I have submitted to two other legal gentlemen both of whom concur in it. According to this interpretation, clause three of the contract gives to Sir William Petersen the right to increase the number of ships to any extent he wishes, and he may come to this government at any time and demand an increased payment in proportion.

Mr. CAHILL: How would the government obtain the money without its being voted?

Mr. MANION: The government has signed a contract by which it agrees either to increase or decrease the number of ships that are to operate, and I submit that once the agreement is accepted and ratified by parliament Sir William Petersen can increase the number of ships and the government, without coming to parliament, can pay any increased amount he may demand. At all events, Sir William Petersen, if the interpretation which I have received of this clause is sound, could sue for damages in those circumstances if he were not reimbursed for any further expenditures he might make in connection with the increased number of ships he might put on. Of course, I am simply placing this interpretation before the House as it has been given to me. My authority carries no weight; in fact, I have no authority so far as the legal aspect of the case is concerned, for I have not had the training of a lawyer. But reading the clause as it stands in the contract, I should think that the interpretation I have cited is reasonable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has Mr. Lafleur's opinion to the contrary.

Mr. MANION: That may be so, but one of these gentlemen whom I have consulted is as prominent as Mr. Lafleur.

Mr. DUFF: Whereabouts in the contract does the hon. member see any suggestion that the number of ships may be increased above ten?

Mr. MANION: Clause three distinctly declares that Sir William Petersen may increase the number if he desires to do so.

Mr. DUFF: Not the number of ships.

Mr. MANION: Let me read a part of the clause again:

And the subsidy aforementioned shall be increased or reduced as the case may be in proportion to the number of ships operated and maintained by the contractor in the service aforesaid.

Mr. DUFF: Read before that; the number may be up to but not above ten.

Mr. MANION: It does not say so; that at least is not my interpretation of the clause, nor is it the interpretation of these lawyers.

Mr. DUFF: Who are these lawyers?

Mr. MANION: That does not matter; my hon. friend can get the opinions of other lawyers if he wishes.

Mr. DUFF: The meaning is obvious enough without the opinions of any lawyers.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend may be able to see these things with a clear eye, but lawyers who are trained in interpreting matters of this kind do not see eye to eye with him on this particular question.

Mr. DUFF: Lawyers differ.

Mr. MANION: So do shippers.

Mr. DUFF: No, they agree, and that is why there is a combine.

Mr. MANION: At any rate, according to my interpretation of the clause, which as I say is only the interpretation that competent lawyers have put upon it, this whole contract is made to take care of Sir William Petersen and not to protect the interests of the country at large. A few weeks ago I read a quotation from one of the English newspapers in which Sir William Petersen was represented as having advised his shareholders not to sell stock. "If you wish to sell any stock," he is reported to have said, "sell it to me; I will buy it from you." That was quoted from the English newspapers, and this was before the contract had been laid before parliament. It is no wonder, then, that he takes that attitude, for the contract is all in his favour.

Now, I will consider the contract from the financial point of view. The cost of these ships is admitted to be about six million dollars, that is to say, some six hundred thousand dollars each.

Mr. MARTELL: I presume that the hon. member has read subsection (c) of section one. That paragraph provides that the service shall begin with ten ships, and towards the end it states:

> The said service to commence with at least six ships not later than June 15, 1925.

Now, I do not want to oppose my knowledge of law to that of eminent lawyers who have considered this contract. But where the minimum is prescribed as six, how can you fix a maximum higher than ten, when the contract provides that the number of ships shall not be less "than ten?"

Mr. MANION: But there is a subsequent clause which provides that by mutual agreement the number may be increased above ten.

Mr. MARTELL: I do not know that anyone is objecting particularly to that. Speaking as a private member, I should say that no one would take any exception to such a provision, for if the scheme is to be effective there should be some leeway. But under subsection (c) of section one it would seem that a minimum of six is provided, and the maximum is laid down at ten.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member will see at a glance that it is a maximum which is compulsory on Sir William Petersen; that is all that he is obliged to provide. But the clause quoted by the hon. member (Mr. Manion) shows that if Sir William Petersen provides more ships he must be paid accordingly.

Mr. DUFF: The maximum is ten.

Mr. MANION: Hon. gentlemen may interpret the contract for themselves just as they please. I have given the interpretation of three lawyers, and that interpretation appeals to me as reasonable. To proceed with the financial aspect of the matter. It is admitted that if these ten ships are built they will cost some six million dollars, and the subsidy is to be $1,350,000, which amounts to about twenty-two per cent per annum on the total. Now, if Sir William Petersen runs these ships so as barely to clear his expenses he can use ten per cent of that twenty-two per cent to pay off a sinking fund and interest on his loan and he can take the other twelve per cent for himself. This would be a pretty fair return for Sir William Petersen. Let me put it in another way. Let me take the same figures again, $6,000,000 as the cost of the ships. Supposing Sir William Petersen borrows this money and wishes to pay it back at the rate of 10 per cent per annum. That would mean that he would pay back $600,000 of principal each year for ten years. As this money would be advanced on a government guarantee, he would get it at 5 per cent interest, and his interest on $6,000,000 would be $300,000. That means that he would have to pay $900,000 out of his $1,350,000 in the first year. If he can, in the first year, run his ships without loss, just with them paying their way, without any profit—and it must be remembered that he is going to be provided with cargoes because the government naturally is going to help him to get cargoes through the Canadian National railways—Sir William Petersen will have $450,000 profit in his first year. The second year he will have a profit of $480,000—I am giving round figures because I do not wish to get down to exact figures—for the reason that in the first year he will have paid off 10 per cent, or $600,000 on the principal, and, therefore, will have $30,000 less interest to pay. The next year he will have another $30,000 less interest to pay and so on. At the end of ten years Sir William Petersen would own the ten ships. He would have paid off the 100 per cent at the rate of 10 per cent per annum. He would have paid off his interest and sinking fund completely and he would also have a profit of from six to seven million dollars.

An hon. MEMBER: Plus the ships.

Mr. MANION: Yes, plus the ships. That is provided that he just carried himself along.

Mr. DUFF: Would it not all depend upon what rates the government would fix upon the commodities those ships carried?

Mr. MANION: Yes, it would.

Mr. DUFF: For instance, if the government fixed the rates too low, Sir William Petersen or anybody else would lose a good deal of money.

Mr. MANION: He would quit.

Mr. DUFF: If the government fixes the rates high, he makes money.

Mr. MANION: If the government makes the rates too low, Sir William Petersen quits and there is no penalty clause.

Mr. DUFF: Then my hon. friend's argument falls to the ground.

Mr. MANION: If the government fixes the rate so low that Sir William Petersen will quit, then the agreement is a bigger bluff than we thought it was.

Mr. MARTELL: There is no penalty clause provided for either party, but would Sir William Petersen not be amenable according to the ordinary principle of law, to damage for breach of contract?

Mr. MANION: There is no sign of any clause to that effect in the agreement. The penalty, so far as I can see, will come in on the people of Canada.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend knows quite well that it is incident to every contract that if a man is guilty of a breach, he is liable for damages.

Mr. MANION: I understand Sir William Petersen is going to hand this over to a company, but the company is not liable under the agreement. There is no penalty clause in any manner, shape or form so far as I or anybody else can find out.

Supposing this is going to be made effective; supposing the government carries this out with Sir William Petersen, Sir William supplies more ships, and the thing is so effective that Sir William Petersen is carrying enough freight to interfere with rates on the Atlantic, then there is the risk of bringing about on the ocean the same condition as this government brought about on the lakes. In other words, there is the danger of driving the tramp steamers from the ocean altogether. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) is a good shipping man and he will remember that when the legislation in regard to freight rates was passed, which the Minister of Labour claimed was going to burst up some of those combines, trusts and mergers of which he talked so much, what it did was to drive from Canadian lakes American shipping which stayed away from the lakes until the Board of Railway Commissioners, on the advice of the Department of Trade and Commerce, went across to the American shippers and asked them to come back into Canadian waters and to ignore the law which this government had put on the statute books.

Mr. DUFF: My stand was quite all right on that.

Mr. MANION: I am not questioning my hon. friend's stand in that regard. He is always right. The only thing I would suggest to him would be to join up with the party in which he believes and that is over here.

Mr. DUFF: I have had an invitation already.

Mr. MANION: The danger, to be serious, is that our last condition may be worse than our first, because we must not forget that these tramp steamers have been handling a large proportion of the grain out of Montreal. Last year tramp steamers out of Montreal handled from fifty to sixty per cent of all the wheat that went from Canada and they got at the same time higher rates in handling it than were given to the ships in the conference, the reason being, as I figure it out, that the conference lines have a regular schedule of trips. In other words, they have to sail from Montreal on certain stated days, and they have at times to take wheat, for example, at lower prices for ballast. Therefore, they do cut down below the tramp ships in rates. It is stated in some of the statements that we have received here,—and it has not been refuted—that tramp ships handled one-third of the grain that went from Montreal last year to the United Kingdom.

An hon. MEMBER: Sixty-two per cent.

Mr. MANION: According to my figures, two-thirds of the wheat going to British ports was handled by the conference ships and one-third by the tramp steamers. But of the wheat handled all over the world, that is to Italy, France, Spain, Germany and so forth, about 62 per cent was handled by the tramp steamers. As I say, of wheat going to the British Isles, the tramp steamers handled one-third last year. On that one-third, they got eleven pence per quarter, which, according to my figuring, is 22 cents for eight bushels, or roughly, a little less than three cents a bushel more, for the 15,000,000 bushels they handled than the conference got for handling the 30,000,000 bushels which they handled.

Mr. MARTELL: If by this agreement the government is to pay only for services performed, that is, if the services have to be performed before the government pays anything, how can the government be mulcted in damages by an action at law?

Mr. MANION: That is a legal question and I do not wish to get involved in legal questions. I am not a lawyer. My hon. friend is a lawyer and he can make a speech later on and argue as he chooses. I have given the interpretation as it was given to me by three eminent lawyers.

Mr. MARTELL: I was asking my hon. friend only for information.

Mr. MANION: I do not mean to be offensive towards my hon. friend, but he will pardon me if I go on with my argument. We all take the attitude that a fair day's work ought to be given for a fair day's pay, or, putting it the other way, that a fair day's pay ought to be given for a fair day's work. Exactly the same thing should be true in regard to capital and labour. One is about as important as the other. You cannot very well develop a country just by labour or just by capital. You need both capital and labour. Therefore you should give a fair return to capital. Yet, practically all these steamship lines, in their statements which have been placed in the hands of every hon. member, claim that within the last few years they have been hardly holding their own, or they have been losing. In the face of that, we are out to cut down the rates. I have a statement here in which they state that three or four of the conference lines running out of Montreal have offered—and the government will deny it if they do not agree with this statement—to permit this government to send any reputable corporation such as Price, Waterhouse and Company, or any other reputable accounting firm, to examine their books in order to see exactly how they have been getting along during the last few years, because they claim that their net earnings have been less under the high rates now prevailing than they were under the comparatively low rates of 1913. In addition to this, it is stated that there are to-day six or eight million tons of shipping tied up for lack of business, and much of that tonnage is made up of tramp ships. Well now, if these were only conference ships the retort might be made that they were being kept idle in order that higher rates might be charged on the ships remaining in commission. But, if the shipping business is such a paying proposition to-day, why do not those tramp ships engage in the business and reap some of the rich profits? It is also stated on the authority of Lloyds that there is to-day fifteen million more tons of shipping in the world than in 1913. Yet under this contract the government is asking Sir William Petersen to still further increase the surplus shipping for which there is no business. This lack of cargoes is one of the reasons why the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is operating at a deficit every year; it cannot get business on a paying basis.

Another point I wish to touch upon very briefly, and I wish to draw it particularly to the attention of hon. members from Montreal, is the danger, which I should like some of them to look into, of American traffic which is now going through the port of Montreal being diverted to United States ports if the Canadian government, by subsidizing certain shipping cmpanies, interferes with shipping from Montreal. I do not wish to elaborate this statement, which I have had from good authority, but in such a way that I do not think I have any right to discuss it further at the moment.

In his report Mr. Preston quotes individuals for the most part, he does not quote groups at all. Since his report came out we have had statements from one group at least, the Canadian Council of Agriculture, that it is opposed to the whole proposition as it stands to-day. We have also had an editorial in the Grain Growers Guide quoted in the eastern papers to the effect that the Guide is not enamoured of the proposition.

If I had my way, Mr. Speaker, I would move an amendment that the resolution be taken up this day three weeks, which would bring it forward on April 1, because I think it is one of the best jokes the government has ever put over on the people. This government has put over quite a number of jokes. For instance, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) had his famous joke that I have already referred to about combines, trusts and mergers, which he threatened to wipe out as soon as he got into power. Of course, he had to have his little joke. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) who gave us his fine vaudeville entertainment to-night, told the people of the west that if elected he would come down here and have the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners wiped off the map. That was one of his little jokes. And we have had a number of others. For example, the Prime Minister put a good joke over on the people when he was talking of bringing in free trade to satisfy the west and was advising the east to stick to protection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hold on! Joke as much as you like, but keep to the truth. When did the Prime Minister ever talk of bringing in free trade?

Mr. MANION: He talked of it in his 1919 platform to a great extent, and, furthermore—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no joke in putting on record a number of things that are not true.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend the Prime Minister is pretty much an adept at that himself. He went out in the prairie provinces and told the Progressive members, not once but many times, to link up with him because his and their platforms were the same. Would the Progressives claim that their party is not for free trade? They are all for free trade.

Mr. JOHNSTON: No.

Mr. MANION: I do not know what the hon. whip of the Progressive party would claim. He has been more things than I have.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The hon. member for Fort William has made a direct charge that I have been more things than he has. I have at least stuck to principle. I have never, Mr. Speaker, departed from principle, and that is what my hon. friend has done.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend makes a mistake. He means he has never departed from party. I have stuck to principle, but he has stuck to party. Of course, he has got as a reward recollections of a very pleasant trip to Wembley exhibition at the cost of the people of this country. What I was saying when the Prime Minister so jovially interrupted me was that the right hon. gentleman has had a lot of jokes at the expense of the people of this country on many occasions, for example, first implying to the western people that they were going to get free trade if they joined up with him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never implied anything of the kind.

Mr. MANION: And then he told the people of the east that he was sticking to protection. At the present time the joke is that we are going to have a pause in tariff tinkering, but nobody knows for how long. But of all the jokes ever put over on the people of Canada I sincerely believe the present is the best. If the Minister of Agriculture would support me I would move that we take up this question this day three weeks, when it could be brought forward on April 1, all fool's day.

Mr. MARTELL: Who is going to be the April fool, you or the Minister of Agriculture? I think you will be.

Mr. MANION: I think we will go down to Nova Scotia and get the fool.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, I do not want to find any fault with the government; I think it deserves a great deal of credit for investigating a problem of this kind that has been before this House at least since I came to Ottawa. Now, Mr. Preston states that there is a gigantic organization, indeed a conspiracy, to prevent competition in ocean transportation to and from Canada, a combine which, according to his statement, includes the British steamship companies. There is also, he says, an insurance combine. Indeed two gigantic organizations united to work against the interests of the agriculturists, manufacturers, fruit producers, importers, merchants, lumbermen, the pulp and paper industries, labour—in a word, against the great struggling masses of the Canadian people. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, that last sentence is what one might expect from a third-class tap-room politician, and should never have been recorded in a report of this kind.

Now, according to his report, he has secured information from many sources. Where does he get it? He gets some of it from the manufacturers, a class of people enjoying from twenty to thirty per cent protection, and now they want freight rates lowered so that they can make still greater profits. Was that a proper organization for Mr. Preston to get information from? I would say not. He also gets information from the Lethbridge Board of Trade. What does that board know about the difficulties of navigation? They passed the following resolution:

> Therefore be it resolved that the Canadian government be urged to take such steps as may be necessary to have Atlantic rates on cattle reduced to a point where cattle from Alberta can be profitably exported to the United Kingdom.

But they do not say that they should bring profit to the steamboats.

Now, in regard to freight rates I do not know that I will cover the ground that has already been covered, but I will give my personal experience in that connection. If the government want to verify the figures that I am about to give, they can go to the firm of T. G. McBride and Company at Vancouver and get them. In 1904 I went into the freighting business. I built a steamer. At that time and for many years afterwards we carried lime, for instance, at 10 cents a barrel of 225 pounds, and if we got a full cargo we often carried it at 8 or 9 cents a barrel. At that rate we made a profit on our investment. To-day we are getting 25 cents for a barrel of 200 pounds, and we make less profit than we did when we were carrying the lime at 10 cents a barrel. Now, the question may be asked, what accounts for the difference in the expense? I will give you some items, and I may say I got the figures from my office at Vancouver. In 1900 and up to 1912 a captain got $85 a month, which included board and a place to sleep on the boat; now he gets $170 a month. An engineer at that time got $65 a month; now he gets $150. The mate then got $50; now he gets $110. The second engineer got $40; now he gets $105. The deck hands then got $35; now they get $75. The cook got $26; now he gets $80. These wages are not at all too high. From 1896 up to 1912 the poorest paid class of labour, taking into consideration the responsibility involved, were the steamboat men and the railway men. Now they are getting a fair wage, and the consequence is that freight rates have to be increased to meet it. But that is not all. In 1900 and up to 1912 our fuel cost us $2.75 a ton; now we pay $7.50—quite a difference. Not only that, but take the question of insurance. A boat is insured for what it is worth. At that time if a boat cost $20,000 and was insured at her full value, the cost at the usual rate of 7 per cent would be $1,400. To-day that same boat is worth $40,000—cannot be replaced for less; therefore it is insured for $40,000 and instead of paying $1,400 for the insurance we pay $2,800. But that is not all. You have to keep the crew insured; there was none of that in previous years. You have got to pay harbour dues; that was not done previously. You have got to pay sick mariners' dues—I may say that that act was passed in 1920 by the previous government. Moreover, we carry most of our freight on the Pacific coast on scows, upon which there is no crew.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend allow me to correct him? I simply wanted to point out that the law with respect to sick mariners' dues was passed long before 1920.

Mr. McBRIDE: It was passed in 1920. I can show that by a letter I have from the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MARTELL: The same principle had been adopted before.

Mr. McBRIDE: According to this letter from the department the act was passed on July 1, 1920. We have to pay sick mariners' dues on these scows, under the act. Then we have to pay personal property tax on the boat, to the provincial government. Then we have to pay income tax, if there is any income, not only to the Dominion government but to the provincial government. Taking all these things into consideration, how can it be expected—and this is one point, I notice, that has been left out of this debate—

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend refers to coastal shipping, not to Atlantic or Pacific shipping?

Mr. McBRIDE: I am referring to shipping on the Pacific coast. How can people expect the same rates to prevail now that prevailed some years ago? In the United States the government fixed the rates on the Pacific coast, minimum and maximum, and if those rates are cut or exceeded there is a fine of anywhere from $5,000 to $10,000. That means that they get a better rate; in fact, they are getting anywhere from 10 to 57 per cent more in Puget Sound than we do ni the British Columbia waters. It means that when there is a slack time they can operate their boats even at a loss, and keep their crews working whereas on our side of the line we are working very largely without profit or rather we are not making a fair profit on our investment and we have to discharge our men and tie up our boats when the slack time comes.

We have heard a great deal about the carrying of passengers. Mr. Preston points out in his report, if I remember rightly, that about 1894 passengers were carried from the Old Country to Canada for $17. I will admit that passengers were carried for $17 at that time, for that is the amount I paid when I came to Canada. But what was the accommodation given? What did we get for $17? Well, I will tell hon. members, for their information; there were two men in each stall —I will not call it a berth. The stall consisted of a compartment, I would say, four feet wide, six feet long and about seven feet high. There were two shelves in each compartment, made of boards each nine inches wide, no mattress, no blanket; absolutely nothing to lie on except those two nine-inch boards. Give some of our immigrants that accommodation to-day and what would they think of it? As for the food, at no time during that voyage did any of the steerage passengers get sufficient food to satisfy hunger, unless they went to the galley and bought it. They had to supply their own utensils and keep them clean. Will any person who wants to be honest and fair make a comparison between what the rates were then and what they are now? Last Easter I was down at Halifax and I had the privilege of going through one of the passenger boats there. I took particular care to go through the steerage department. What did I find? Good clean mattresses in each compartment. Some of the compartments would contain two berths, some three, and some four to accommodate families, and in every one of them you would find every accommodation that you would get in a hotel. Their food is first-class, and is served at the table on clean tablecloths. Is there any comparison between the accommodation the people are getting now and what they got then? If the government would take five or six of their merchant marine ships and provide the accommodation that passengers used to get at the same rate, I venture to say they would not get twenty-five passengers a month. The trouble with the public at the present time is that they demand a certain standard of service, and those engaged in the business are willing to provide them with that service, but the public are not willing to pay for it; they want to let the other fellow pay. And why should the taxpayers of this country be assessed, to give accommodation to a certain class of people?

In conclusion, I can see no good point in this Preston report from start to finish. It says a whole lot about insurance and a combine on insurance. I have been insuring boats for the last twenty years, and I will say this for the insurance companies: I have always got a square deal. I have always found them wanting to give a square deal to their customers. They have to do this to get the business. There are different ways of insuring boats. In some cases an insurance company will take off 33⅓ per cent, new for old; that is, if a boat goes on the rocks and loses her keel, and a new keel has to be put in, they will take a third off, new for old, considering the new keel is worth one-third more than the old. There are other ways of insuring. In some cases you will get no insurance unless damage is done to the extent of 10 per cent of the total value of the boat. Others will insure in this way; If you knock a blade off your propellor, they will replace it Taking them as a whole I have found insurance companies willing every time to act fair and square with the people if the people are willing to act square with them. I have done shipping to Australia; some years ago I did quite a lot of shipping to Honolulu and the Old Country, and I have got considerable material from the Old Country in the days when it came round the Horn, and I found the shipping companies as a whole always wanting to do what was right. Their freights might be a little high sometimes, but they must have a profit, for their ships are often tied up and they require a profit that will allow for depreciation. When I came to this country first the Canadian Pacific had three of the finest ocean going steamers, I guess, that ever were launched—the Empress of Asia, the Empress of China, and the Empress of Japan. They were a credit to any port, but within the last six years the Canadian Pacific has had to scrap those steamers. Why? Because the public in general demands a better service. They want swimming pools aboard their boats; they want baths and gymnasiums and the like; but the trouble is they do not want to pay for the accommodation. I cannot support this resolution.

On motion of Mr. Duff the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.41 p.m.
