House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Speaker:
The Honourable RODOLPHE LEMIEUX

Thursday, February 5, 1925

The parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the fifth day of February, 1925, met this day at Ottawa for the despatch of business.

The House met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

APPOINTMENT OF CLERK AND CLERK ASSISTANT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that Arthur Beauchesne, Esquire, K.C., F.R.S.C., has been appointed Clerk of the House of Commons, in the place of William Barton Northrup, Esquire, M.A., K.C., retired;

And that Thomas Munro Fraser, Esquire, LL.B., has been appointed Clerk Assistant.

FOURTH SESSION—FOURTEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

Mr. Speaker read a communication from Mr. A. F. Sladen, Governor General's Secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion Parliament.

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And the House being returned to the Commons chamber:

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that during the recess I received communications from several members notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz.:

Of Joseph Emile Stanislas Emmanuel d'Anjou, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Rimouski, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Of John Morrissy, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Northumberland (N.B.), by decease.

Of John Armstrong MacKelvie, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Yale, by decease.

Of Charles A. Gauvreau, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Témiscouata, by decease.

I accordingly issued my warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts respectively.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that during the recess the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz:

Of William James Hushion, Esquire, for the electoral district of St. Antoine.

Of Sir Eugène Fiset, Kt., for the electoral district of Rimouski.

Of William Bunting Snowball, Esquire, for the electoral district of Northumberland, N.B.

Of Grote Stirling, Esquire, for the electoral district of Yale.

Of Charles Edward Hanna, Esquire, for the electoral district of West Hastings.

Of Jean Francois Pouliot, Esquire, for the electoral district of Témiscouata.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

William James Hushion, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. Antoine, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. P. J. A. Cardin.

Sir Eugène Fiset, Kt., member for the electoral district of Rimouski, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Ernest Lapointe.

REVISED EDITION

William Bunting Snowball, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Northumberland (N.B.), introduced by Hon. A. B. Copp and Pius Michaud, Esquire.

Charles Edward Hanna, Esquire, member for the electoral district of West Hastings, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. James Murdock.

Jean Francois Pouliot, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Témiscouata, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Ernest Lapointe.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

I have pleasure in welcoming you to the fourth session of the fourteenth parliament.

Since prorogation, the economic situation throughout the world has notably improved. For Canada, the year 1924 was a period of substantial progress. In trade alone, the excess value of exports over imports was more than $260,000,000. The present year opens with prospects of sound and steady development. The financial and trade situation justifies the expectation of an early return to the gold basis.

The problem of the cost of living is the most important that my ministers have in mind at the present time, and every effort is being made to improve conditions with respect thereto. It is apparent that even the most rigid economy in public expenditures will not suffice to solve this pressing problem and the problem of taxation incidental thereto. Their ultimate solution lies largely in increased production and the development of new and wider markets. It is to be borne continually in mind that the existing burden of taxation is due mainly to uncontrollable expenditure in the nature of payments and obligations arising out of the war, and to the encumbered position of the National Railways.

To aid in an increase of production, through the development of our vast natural resources, every effort is being made to attract the right class of immigrants to Canada, and to secure their settlement in the undeveloped areas served by our great transportation systems. In due course steps will be taken to further colonization and settlement in other fertile regions such as those of the Peace river.

The cost of production of raw materials and the necessaries of life has been lessened by the reductions in the tariff and the sales tax effected at the last session. It is becoming increasingly evident, however, that quite as important a factor as the customs tariff in their effect upon production and living costs are transportation costs and rates, by land and sea.

[Mr. Speaker.]

It is the opinion of my advisers that the attention of parliament at the present session should be directed more particularly to the desirability of effecting a freer movement of commodities through an equalization of railway freight rates as between provinces and localities, and through a lowering of carrying charges upon shipments by water of the products of the farm, the mine, the forest, the fisheries, and of our manufacturing industries.

Some measure of control of transportation by land and sea is obviously essential to the promotion of interimperial trade, the expansion of export trade generally, and the development of Canadian trade via Canadian ports.

The procedure it may be advisable to follow with respect to railway freight rates will in some measure necessarily depend upon the decision of the Supreme Court in the appeal respecting the Crowsnest pass agreement. With regard to ocean freight rates, action is being taken to overcome the restraints on export trade due to the exactions of the powerful steamship combine known as the North Atlantic Steamship Conference. Your approval will be asked of a measure aimed at affording the government of Canada a control of ocean rates.

It is the intention of the government so to equip our important ports on the St. Lawrence route, and on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, as to enable them to meet all requirements of modern navigation.

To secure greater co-operation in the administration of the laws of the two countries respecting smuggling and the prosecution and extradition of persons violating the anti-narcotic laws of either country, treaties between the Dominion of Canada and the United States have been negotiated and signed. They will be submitted for your approval prior to their ratification.

You will be asked to sanction the calling of a conference between the federal and provincial governments to consider the advisability of amending the British North America Act with respect to the constitution and powers of the Senate, and in other important particulars.

Your attention will also be invited, during the course of the session, to certain trade agreements, to legislation respecting the handling and marketing of Canadian grain and to other important matters.

Members of the House of Commons:

The public accounts for the last fiscal year, and the estimates for the coming year, will be promptly submitted. In the preparation of the estimates, regard has been had to the need for continued economy with respect to the public services and public works.

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the Speech of His Excellency, the Governor General, to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this House under rule 10, said committee to be composed of Messieurs. Béland, Copp. Low, Kyte, Papineau, Tolmie, Boys, Johnston (Last Mountain) and Halbert, and that that portion of rule 10 limiting the members of the said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable H. S. Béland, Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; the Honourable Thomas A. Low, Minister of Trade and Commerce; the Honourable J. H. King, Minister of Public Works, and the Honourable John E. Sinclair, Minister without portfolio, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the eleventh chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, intituled "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

REPORTS

Report of the Chief Electoral Officer in conformity with the Dominion Elections Act. —Mr. Speaker.

Joint Report of the Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms, with my approval, has appointed Edouard Taschereau, Esquire, to be his deputy during the present session of parliament.

DECEASED MEMBERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the interval which has elapsed since the last session of parliament two hon. members, very highly respected by all in this House, Mr. John Morrissy and Mr. Charles Arthur Gauvreau, have been taken from our midst. It is fitting before we enter upon the work of a new session that we should pause to pay a passing tribute to their memory and to express the sympathy which hon. members of this House feel with those who have been thus greatly bereaved.

Both hon. members were for a long time in public life, and both were very highly regarded. The late Mr. Morrissy entered this parliament only three years ago, at the general election of 1921, as the member for Northumberland, N.B. He had, however, been interested in the public affairs of his own province for a long time, having served in no less than three successive administrations of the province of New Brunswick, and having held the important post of Minister of Public Works for something like nine years. Mr. Morrissy had a keen liking and a genius for public life. It is said of him that he entered more political contests than any other public man in his province. Out of fourteen political contests he won as many as he lost. That under these circumstances he should at the time of his death have had, as he did have, the universal regard of those among whom he lived, and whose interests he strove so earnestly to serve, is perhaps the highest testimony that could be paid to his sterling integrity and to his fine independence, qualities in him which all of us well knew. It is a further testimony to his name and public example that the constituency which he represented in the provincial legislature should to-day be represented by his only son.

By all of us on this side of the House Mr. Morrissy will always be remembered for his kindly and generous disposition, for his loyal and helpful support, and for his fine public spirit and public service.

Mr. Gauvreau was one of the oldest members of the House, having entered parliament as the representative for Temiscouata in the by-election in 1897. He was returned to parliament in the general elections of 1900, 1904, 1908, 1911, 1917 and 1921. For the quarter of a century that he thus represented that constituency he faithfully served the interests of his constituents and the people at large.

Mr. Gauvreau was one of the members of parliament who followed the proceedings of the House with a very keen interest. His talents were employed, however, even more in writing than in speaking. He did not take much part in debate; it was characteristic of him that he was prepared to leave the expression of views to others, and if he felt that his views were clearly enunciated that the right word had been said by others, he was content to leave matters there.

By profession Mr. Gauvreau was a journalist and a notary. He took a keen interest in the history of his native province and in literary pursuits generally, and he has left to our country contributions in prose and in verse which entitle his name to an honourable place among the authors of Canada. It is a tribute to his spirit of patriotic service, and to his example that both his sons served with great distinction in the Canadian naval service during the period of the war.

Mr. Gauvreau will be very much missed in this House, particularly by members who likewise have been privileged to enjoy a long association with parliament. He was always active in matters pertaining to affairs of the House and of his party. He was very regular in his attendance, and took a keen interest in the work of committees. He was a faithful attendant at the party caucus, over which he not infrequently presided. There were about Mr. Gauvreau, the qualities which characterize the man of thought, conviction and determination. There was strength in his silent reserve, and a resoluteness of character to which his quiet demeanour lent emphasis. I do not know that anything more worthy could be said of him than that he was as much beloved by the members of this House who knew him, as he was honoured by the unbroken confidence of his constituents over a period of nearly twenty-five years.

Though past the age of sixty, neither of the honourable members whose deaths we deplore to-day had reached the allotted span of three score years and ten. Mr. Morrissy died in his sixty-seventh year; Mr. Gauvreau at the time of his death was in his sixty-fourth year. It is not by number of years but by reason of service that the memories of men are cherished. Whilst we honour the years of our late fellow-members, their names will command for all who knew them a deeper reverence.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): It seems inescapable that at each successive opening of parliament necessity arises for a reference to deaths that have occurred among us. On the present occasion those we lament were members of the Liberal persuasion, and the Prime Minister has outlined the chief incidents of their lives and their great services to the country with a familiarity and a knowledge that I could not rival. Suffice it to say that neither gentleman during his identification with this House deserved aught but kindly reference; they were men whose records were honourable and sincere.

Mr. Morrissy's contributions to public service were mainly, of course, in the provincial sphere. His career in the province of New Brunswick is known to all—his long succession of political encounters, his gallant victories, his honourable defeats, his fine domestic life, and I join warmly and sympathetically with the Prime Minister in offering to his widow and his family this testimony of the reverence of the House.

Mr. Gauvreau was the better known among us. He was one of our members of the longest standing. Very seldom is it the lot of anyone to sustain public confidence in a single county for a quarter of a century. He who achieves that result must have sterling qualities; he must not only be able to command respect but, by talents that few possess, be able to preserve it.

It has been said that Mr. Gauvreau, unlike too many of us in Canadian public life, devoted himself with some energy and some success to literature. I have had the pleasure of reading one of his historical works, and can bear testimony not only to its literary quality but to its value in substance. Gladly I accord him a place among Canadian writers.

The services of his family in the war is something also that we record with pride. His two sons offered themselves in the navy in the early hours of their country's need. Both acquitted themselves creditably and gained a record that is honourable to their family and to their race.

To have been elected seven times a member of this House is itself an achievement greater than anything which might find mention in any eulogy after death. I assure all those who loved Mr. Gauvreau that he gained the esteem of political foes as well as political friends, and that we bear him now in honourable memory by reason of his personal qualities and his public services.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I would only add a few words to what has been so well expressed by the right honourable Prime Minister, and the right honourable leader of the opposition. Amid life's activities we are being constantly reminded that we have here no abiding state, and that two respected and esteemed members who have sat with us in this House shall know their places no more.

I did not have the opportunity, being a comparatively new member of the House, of forming a very intimate acquaintance with the two honourable gentlemen who have departed from us; but I knew both sufficiently well to respect and admire their character, their ability and their devotion to their duties in this House. I am sure they did their duty to their constituents and served Canada well; and I think the House, as a unit, will pay every respect to their memory, believing they did their best in the service of Canada and on all occasions acted honestly and uprightly.

We can now only tender our sympathy to the families of the deceased members and express the hope that they may find some consolation in the long and honourable records of those who have gone.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 4.27 p.m. until Monday, February 9.

Monday, February 9, 1925

The House met at three o'clock, the Deputy Speaker, Mr. George N. Gordon, in the chair.

BEREAVEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have just been reminded that the unavoidable absence of His Honour the Speaker from this chamber to-day is owing to the death yesterday of his elder daughter. I know that I express the wish of the House when I ask you kindly to convey to His Honour and to Madame Lemieux the very deep sympathy which we all feel with them in their bereavement.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is only within recent hours that I have heard the sad news referred to by the Prime Minister, and I had intended making some reference to it when I spoke later. His Honour the Speaker has suffered in late years more than his share of domestic affliction. His only son lies buried in France—the greatest single sacrifice a man could make for his country. Now this is followed by the loss of a daughter. I assure you on behalf of the party in this section of the House that we deeply sympathize with His Honour and Madame Lemieux.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members who sit in this part of the House I beg to express our sincere sympathy with His Honour the Speaker in the great loss which he has suffered by the death of his daughter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I shall have the honour of having transmitted to the honourable the Speaker the words of sympathy of the Prime Minister, the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Brandon.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY SIR EUGENE FISET AND SECONDED BY MR. CHARLES HANNA

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski) (Translation) moved:

That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, offering the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I regret that my first words uttered within these precincts should be to express the very deep sympathy which I feel for the loss sustained by His Honour the Speaker. Allow me, Sir, to associate my self to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) as well as to the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), to offer to the so afflicted family my very sincere and deep regret.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that I may be allowed, without infringing on parliamentary customs, to express to the right hon. Prime Minister our sincere and heartfelt thanks, for having so highly honoured the electors of the county of Rimouski by choosing their humble representative to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I hope you will further excuse the very legitimate pride which I feel in representing in this House this county of Rimouski, so liberal in traditions, and whose political history is written in gold letters in the annals of our confederation.

I feel, Sir, a very deep emotion when I recollect that to-day I fill the place of my father as representative of this beautiful county. During twenty-five years of his political career he devoted the whole of his heart and energy to the fulfilment of his mandate, and in following in his footsteps I cherish but one thought, it is to live up to this reputation of courtesy, sincerity and frankness which characterized him. There are very few in this House, Sir, who, as colleagues, sat with him in the old parliament. The Hon. Mr. Lemieux was one of them and his old friend had predicted at the very outset his brilliant political career which has brought so much credit to our race. This political career, Sir, he has crowned by occupying the Speaker's chair and fulfilling the duties attached to it with so much courtesy, ability, tact and fairness. May I hope that he will share with the son a little of this good friendship which he had for the father, and, especially, that he will be very indulgent towards me in the first efforts of my political career.

Mr. Speaker, may I further be allowed to recall to this House your ex-colleague Mr. Emmanuel d'Anjou. He has thought proper to retire from the federal arena to accept a position in the public service. He left behind him, in the county of Rimouski, the reputation of a gifted young popular speaker who expressed himself with ease and warmth. He did honour to his mandate, and I am sure that all his old colleagues associate themselves with me in wishing him joy and success in his new career.

The task, Mr. Speaker, which has been entrusted to me weighs heavily upon me, and with some anxiety, I realize that if it was rather easy to sit on the floor of the House and help my ministers in answering questions in connection with the estimates of a department, it is an entirely different proposition for me to rise from my seat and attempt to fathom the important question that His Excellency the Governor General has just submitted to the consideration of this House.

However, remembering that the motto which we adopted in Conventum on taking leave from our Alma Mater was: "Audaces fortuna juvat," I dare to be bold and submit to the House a few remarks which the Speech from the Throne suggests to me.

There is, Sir, in the Speech from the Throne a brief and very precise passage, and of such importance to the economic life of the nation that it overshadows all other questions. We notice in this speech that the government realizing the capital importance of this question intend taking up the railway freight rates and tariff.

We now come, Sir, to the great stumbling-block of the natural development of our trade, the main impediment to the increase in our exports, and especially the greatest factor hindering our farming population from realizing the sale and marketing of their products. This problem affects the whole country, and, if the recriminations of the west seem to express themselves in a louder tone, I can assure you, Sir, that the calmer agitation of the east is no way less forcible.

May I suggest to the government, while considering this question, to apply those same principles of scientific evolution and political economy that were adopted at the last session regarding tariff reductions on raw material. Let them classify as raw material, the products of the soil, our coal and our fisheries. By applying this economical principle to the natural resources of the soil, and by reducing as much as possible this special form of taxation which weighs so heavily on all classes of our population, you will get to the root itself of the greatest obstacle which hinders the development of our national life, you will reduce the cost of living, and by allowing the masses to realize the ready cash so necessary for purchasing power you will help the producer and consumer as well as all classes of society. In my opinion, sir, that is the most important part of the sessional programme and I can vouch for an unanimous approval throughout the whole country if we, belonging to the federal deputation, find a solution to this problem. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that besides our transportation problems, the development of our seaports, those of our great river in particular, must be the special object of consideration by the government. Here is at last Sir, the dawn of that day so long awaited, and we all have the firm hope that the development of our national deep water harbour of our beautiful port of Quebec, will materialize at last. Is it necessary for me, Sir, to draw the attention of this House to the fact that before considering this undertaking the government gathered data and expert information of such a definite kind, thanks to the admirable report, plans and estimates of the Quebec harbour commissioners, that our large shipping concerns, as well as the railway companies, have already given the assurance of their full and entire approval to the carrying out of this project. Is there need, Sir, to add that this all important project is not a local one; it is a national undertaking which affects not only the province of Quebec, but the whole country, in particular the west. We can but congratulate the government as to this initiative, and we are all convinced that the relatively small outlay required will be a hundred-fold recuperated by the material and economic advantages which will ensue.

A third point which I want to broach, Sir, is immigration. Let us bear in mind the principle that we have an enormous national debt, one incurred through the mobilization and demobilization of the Canadian army, sacred obligations and which cannot be disavowed towards those of our people who sacrificed their life, their blood, their health to rescue humanity in danger. This amonuts to a preferential obligation on the revenues of the country. Such a liability is positive, unalterable, cannot be denied nor repudiated. Whatever be the principles of tariff reform that you may adopt, call them protection, free trade, preferential or tariff for revenue, we cannot hope, as long as our population will remain what it is, to reduce the capital of this debt. We are, therefore, forced to find new means of raising revenue, and these, Sir, are of three orders: the increase of our population, the development of our natural resources and production. These three factors are so closely related to one another at an economic point of view, that you cannot separate them.

To develop our natural resources, we need labour. To increase our production we need labour. But, Sir, in order to avoid injuring our industries, increasing the number of unemployed and burdening our economic life, we must apply to immigration those economic principles that we have embodied in our fiscal policy. Human energy that we intend to import must be considered as raw material. Our immigration must have but one aim: cater to the ever present needs of the development of our natural resources, and superproduction. This immigration must be classified, grouped, selected, mentally as well as physically, and especially its absorption must be provided for. That is, Mr. Speaker, what the government has in view, and if the problem, as I have just outlined it is placed before the people you may rest assured in advance of its approval.

The fourth point that I wish to submit to the consideration of this House, is our relations with the empire. On January 16 last. before the Canadian Club of Quebec, the right hon. Prime Minister in a masterly exposé which raised the enthusiasm of his audience, defined in such a clear, precise and almost scientific way the government's attitude in regard to Canada's relations with the Mother Country ,that I think it is the duty of every citizen to seize every opportunity to place before the public which is so interested, the facts of this much discussed problem. The lecturer, proceeding by elimination, establishes first that the idea of an Imperial parliament, neither in principle nor in fact can no more be acceptable than that of a Council of the Empire, that such an Imperial parliament or Council of the Empire would undermine the very foundation of our constitution and destroy that principle of responsible government which is the "criterium" itself of our parliamentary institution. He showed the relative responsibilities of the Prime Minister to his colleagues; the government to parliament; and parliament to the people. He pointed out the impossibility of confiding to a parliamentary delegate, may he be Prime Minister or not, the power or authority to pledge the country without previously consulting, first the government, if necessary, parliament, and finally the people. He further defined the formula which was adopted at the last conference in regard to the classification of our treaties: treaties directly negotiable by the Canadian government after consultation with the Imperial government and treaties negotiable by the Imperial government after consultation with the Canadian government.

I have pointed out, Sir, in broad outline the scope of this economic conference which, coming from the lips of the Prime Minister, with its full authority, has made a deep impression on the people of our beautiful province and has contributed more than any other factor to attenuate this semi-anxiety, this uneasy feeling which seems inclined to spread amongst us

There is no use concealing the facts, Mr. Speaker, a number of our large newspapers have for a year or so, been spreading through the country a message of pessimism, of discouragement and fear which fortunately has not attained its object and that our sound and energetic population has refused to accept. Unfortunately, Sir, if we no longer hear the "whisper of death" whirling around our ears, there has of late appeared new tactics, hushed rumours, carrying half-truths, vague assertions, insidious alarms, having for aim, as it seems, not only to inspire distrust, but I might even say to sow dissension. Are we to witness in this grand country of ours, this conflict between the wealthy and the labouring classes? Shall we see appear among us, a new prophet, preaching a new doctrine? Shall we, at last, witness a new regime composed of supermen, advocating most stringent measures of economy, and wanting to force the present generation to pay for the burden which we willingly assumed, to allow future generations to live and exist.

Such is the question, Sir, on everyone's lips. For my part, although realizing the absolute necessity that exists for us not to exceed our revenues, I am one of those who believe that economy carried to excess is equivalent to folly. With many others I believe that one must not think or hope to pay or materially reduce in the present generation, our national debt. I am one of those who believe that by developing our natural resources, by increasing our population, by affording the chance to the present generation to exist, we shall in a nearby future, attain a more tangible result than by stifling all initiative, or raising the cry of distress and disaster.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, for having allowed myself to drift to such thoughts, but I reflect here the views of my electors and I think I am performing my duty as a good citizen by expressing my absolute confidence in the future, and firmly believing in the happy destinies of this beautiful country of ours.

I had no intention, Sir, to touch upon all the important questions which are submitted for our consideration in the Speech from the Throne; but before closing my remarks, allow me to bring before the House the material needs of this beautiful county which I have the honour to represent. Back in my seclusion after having given two years of study to local problems which especially affect our lovely region of the lower St. Lawrence river, I was able to ascertain that the economic life of our beautiful counties of Rimouski and Matane had as its basis three great factors, our forest industries, agriculture and our transportation routes.

Our forest industries have, of late years, taken such an impulse, that we can say with pride that Matane and Rimouski surpass, by the example they set and the development they attained, all other regions of our beautiful province of Quebec. Would you believe it Sir, in addition to the five large companies that operate in those counties, there exists another one which itself alone, works on the south shore 1,100 square miles of limits, exports to England and the United States about 30,000,000 feet of manufactured lumber; would you ever think that, through concessions granted by the provincial government, vast timber limits on the north shore, concessions situated opposite to Rimouski and Matane, at a distance of 30 miles on the opposite shore of our beautiful river, where hardly five years ago there was but a wilderness, now villages and immense lumber camps have sprung up, such as Shelter Bay, Godbout, Franklin, Bersimis, Sault-au-Cochon, Portneuf and many others, you will understand the great importance of attracting to us the immense trade which is bound to follow. Rimouski and Matane are the natural outlets of this trade, and already we possess almost all the necessary facilities to provide for it.

As to farming, Sir, nature has almost forced us to specialize in one industry alone, owing not only to the nature of our soil, but especially, because we have in abundance and in its natural state fertilizers of sea-weeds. We produce yearly, in the county of Rimouski, more than 2,000,000 bushels of potatoes, and thanks to the initiative of the provincial government which has undertaken to build in each parish situated along the Canadian National and the gulf and terminus railways, heated storage, supplied with the necessary sorting equipment, we shall therefore at last, be able to realize what had become to us of primary necessity to enter into competition with the other provinces and take advantage of the benefits of foreign markets.

However, an obstacle exists in the realization of this dream: it is our transportation rates and this transportation problem, owing to our geographical situation is for us a vital question. We are located at the tail end of the western markets and at the head of the eastern markets. The freight rates which we are forced to pay are so prohibitive that it is almost impossible for us to deal with our local markets and still less with the foreign markets. We do not ask for special privileges, but we are glad to notice that the government has thought this question to be of paramount importance and we have the firm hope that the needs of our region will be considered on an equal footing with those of other parts of the country.

I leave, Mr. Speaker, to hon. gentlemen who are better qualified than I am the task of developing the other points of much importance, contained in the Speech from the Throne. However, allow me to state that this sessional programme that the government submits to parliament, is the logical continuation and reasoned development of the Liberal manifesto of 1921. It is a programme of harmony, union, peace and good understanding. It is legislation beneficial to the masses without consideration to sectionalism, divisions, territories and classes. It is a programme for the people, the principles and development of which have been submitted to the electors of my county and relying on the approval of my electors having absolute confidence in my leaders, it is for me a pleasure and an honour to move the motion of which you have been given notice.

Mr. CHARLES E. HANNA (West Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to second the resolution that an Address be presented to His Excellency, the Governor General, offering the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament.

And, Mr. Speaker, in doing so, may I crave the indulgence of the House in the few remarks I shall make? I am a novice to parliamentary life, and as all hon. members of this House have at one time or another been new members of the House, may I throw myself on their mercy, asking their sympathetic memory in my own behalf.

I recognize that the honour shown me in granting me this privilege to-day is in no way a personal one, but a very direct tribute to my constituency and the people I represent, and a fine courtesy from the House to a new member. The riding of West Hastings, which has entrusted me with its responsibilities in this honoured House, is neither a small nor an unimportant one. It is one of the few so-called rural ridings of this province which did not recede in population in the years 1911 to 1921, but actually recorded a considerable increase in population. It is a riding which, with its sister riding of East Hastings, has a long and honourable history in the annals of Upper Canada. Drawing a great part of its original settlement from the devoted group of exiled patriots, the United Empire Loyalists, it received in later colonization large groups of excellent farming stock from the Old Land, and to-day presents a prosperous, steady development, well balanced as between agricultural and industrial, and reflecting a solid growth in education, in expansion and in community spirit, founded on a homogeneous population. It has given to Canada one of her most revered and honoured Prime Ministers in Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and has sent forth to literary fame and a seat in the Mother of Parliaments, Sir Gilbert Parker.

At the present time, when the scarcity of free land and the pioneer effort required for the settlement of available land in northern Ontario and Quebec and the more remote districts of the prairies dampens the ardour of the immigrant, I may be forgiven a reference to the development of Hastings county. Much of our land was naturally neither rich nor productive; in fact, many stretches of our northern areas are still wild, rugged and unbroken. Yet the practice of thrift, steady if small returns, and intensified farming with special concentration on dairying, have made Hastings a county of pleasant, productive farms and prosperous homes. Perhaps no great over-night fortunes have been made, perhaps no booms have been recorded; but the sturdy, steady growth of this farming population, who are providing themselves with all moderate comforts, educating their children and sending them forth in Canada's development, affords, I think, an example not unworthy of note in Canada to-day.

According to the 1921 census, the 5,597 farms in the county of Hastings comprised a total acreage of 796,787. The value of these farm lands totalled $12,786,065; buildings $9,718,439; implements $4,065,489; live stock $5,969,413. His Excellency in the gracious speech just delivered has made reference to the probability of this House evolving some system of relief from the heavy ocean freight charges, against which Canadian export trade must struggle. Might I mention particularly the handicap imposed on stock farming, by this item? When I mention that on these farms in Hastings there were over 80,000 head of cattle, over 34,000 head of sheep and some 40,000 head of swine, while the stock sold yielded almost two million dollars, it will be realized that the relief suggested will not be confined to western Canada alone. Commenting on this item may I also draw attention to the desirability of greater refrigeration accommodation on all boats engaged in our ocean carrying trade. Animal products in my county in this year brought over $3,000,000, and I am confident that there, as in all rural Ontario, this amount could be greatly increased if we were only assured of wider markets.

The efforts of the Department of Agriculture to obtain a better standardization of agricultural produce will be warmly supported in Hastings. It is in dairy produce particularly that we are interested. There are over seventy dairy factories in the county, with an output running over two million dollars per annum. Butter produced in 1923 totalled 1,377,129 pounds, and cheese 7,712,034 pounds. These figures will illustrate to what great extent the prosperity of the district is dependent on the maintenance of a good export trade. I am confident that the encouraging messages of trade consolidation and expansion mentioned in the Address will find hearty support throughout mixed farming circles in Canada.

Canada's prosperity to-day rests in the first degree on the energetic development of her natural resources, whether the direct cultivation of the land to agricultural production, the utilization of her great mineral resources, or the encouragement and export expansion of her fisheries. Hastings county is very similar to the rest of the Dominion in that within the county we have great mineral wealth, the fisheries of the bay of Quinte, and splendid industrial development at Belleville and Trenton. In 1922, the commercial fish caught and landed in the bay of Quinte fisheries totalled about 1,500,000 pounds, valued to the fishermen at $134,835. While this may seem small compared with British Columbia and the Maritimes, it is nevertheless an industry of tremendous importance to the district and makes for a bond of understanding and sympathy between us in this matter that may not be so strong in some of the inland counties. I think that is well, for I feel that the intangible danger of sectionalism springing up in Canada is one more to be combated than many a more material bogey, and that it is by understanding among widely separated groups with common interests that we shall build up a united Dominion.

Growing evidence that our mineral resources are possibly the richest in the world makes it imperative that provincial and federal governments should unite in conserving those resources, promoting continuous production and maintaining within Canada capital, labour, transportation and power.

The county of Hastings is heavily mineralized. Among the non-metallics found are talc and fluorspar which occur in the vicinity of Madoc; limestone suitable for cement making, near Pointe Anne, seven miles from Belleville; marble and feldspar near Bancroft; actinolite near the municipality bearing that name; and garnet in the northern part of the county. There are two cement plants in Belleville, and there are four brick-making plants in the county. Metallic ores found in Hastings county include iron both as hematite and as magnetite; mispickel ore which was mined some years ago for the recovery of gold and arsenic; iron pyrites near the village of Sulphide, mined by the Nichols Chemical Company, for the production of sulphuric acid at that point; copper ore in Madoc and Marmora townships; lead in the townships of Lake and Tudor; and molybdenum in Dunganon and Monteagle townships. There are many other mineral deposits in the county of Hastings which so far have not been exploited commercially.

As a business man in the city of Belleville, I am in a position daily to see the inseparable interrelation of industry and agriculture and the constant interplay of one on the other. There are some fifty manufacturing concerns of varying size in the city of Belleville, and about twenty-five in Trenton. The capital invested runs well over seven million dollars, with a pay roll of over a million, and some three and a half millions to four millions annual gross production. Agricultural conditions have improved. The budget resolutions of last year did not increase imports to our district —they merely reduced the price of the articles affected. This gave a very evident stimulation in the general condition of agriculture, mining and fishing in our district, which was reflected in the neighbouring towns and villages. Basing my judgment solely on evidence within my own knowledge, I find that both agriculture and industry were aided.

The Address gave intimation of reduced expenditure. There is nothing more urgent in the interests of agricultural and industrial development, trade expansion, a renewed flow of population, and a consequent lowered average cost of transportation, than some shifting of the very heavy burden of taxation, federal, provincial and municipal, that young Canada bears upon his shoulders. There can be no division of opinion herein as between party and party, or between dominion and province, province and municipality. And, in the earnest hope that we may all unite towards attaining this desired end, I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, to second the motion moved by the hon. member for Rimouski.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege again to be the first in extending to the mover (Sir Eugene Fiset) and the seconder (Mr. Hanna) of the Address the congratulations of the House on having discharged acceptably a difficult task. We never had any fears as to the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset), and it is very apparent that the House of Commons is to have no terrors for him. This is not the hon. member's first experience in public circles. As we all know, he has been connected with the service of Canada for some decades, and I take the opportunity to bear testimony to the efficiency with which he discharged his duties. I hope his career in the higher sphere, as we call it, will be equally creditable to him. His health appears abundantly restored.

Speaking in somewhat different strain, maybe he will permit me to extend to him the sympathies of all who have laboured with him, in the fact, as it appears from very recent utterances of his, that for many years he suffered torments and anguish taking the part which it was his duty to take in the enforcement of a law very abhorrent to his sense of justice and of right.

We are joining in an Address of thanks to His Excellency for the gracious Speech he has been pleased to deliver. Without in the least degree reflecting on His Excellency, for we all know that no one except ourselves here had less to do with the Speech than had the Governor General, I think this gratitude on the part of the House is a tribute to our sense of humour. There is not much in the Speech but water. What there is of substance will prove very indigestible if I judge it from past experience.

I comment first on the absence of a reference which was to have been expected. The real problems of Canada are domestic. Fortunately we have no very serious or troublesome outside problems now. But one event has taken place in very recent times in which the government has participated, an event of considerable consequence, to which reference might have been expected—I refer to the meeting of the Assembly of the League of Nations, and especially to what is known as the Geneva Protocol. This was a protocol in which the great majority of the league concurred, including, as the report showed, the British government and the representative of the government of Canada. I do not feel that I should discuss the protocol at all, much less go into it in detail. But, inasmuch as Canada's representative there, if I may refer to him by name, Hon. Senator Dandurand, concurred in the terms of the protocol, and we are to presume that Canada adheres thereto until at least we are differently informed from the government, ratification is, of course, in order if we as a parliament are to concur. If the government does not feel like asking parliament for ratification a statement of its attitude would undoubtedly be in order. It is of immense importance to us whether we are to concur or not. This protocol embodies a series of sanctions applicable after the event of a disarmament conference and applicable then to any agreement which may be arrived at at such conference and, as well, to the general relations of the concurring powers thereafter. To me it is difficult to understand why at least the example of the British government in this respect should not have been followed. It was the late administration there, the Labour government, which gave its adhesion to the protocol. The succeeding government, that of Mr. Baldwin, holding apparently somewhat different views, declines to ask for ratification for the present, but gave a resumé of its position and stated that negotiations with regard thereto are being carried on. In the Speech from the Throne we are left entirely in the dark as to what the mind of the government is. I make only this comment, and I do so at present in no spirit of criticism: I do not think we have yet arrived at the time by many years when the League of Nations, of which I am a sincere supporter, can become anything in the nature of superstate or other than a new and better method for conducting international affairs; and I think it would be a very grave step on the part of this country to so contribute its own view as to virtually advise Great Britain to underwrite the security of the world.

There are one or two other features of the Speech from the Throne to which I now make reference. It is much shorter than last year. It contains the customary eulogy to the government itself, and the customary proclamation that everything is going well in the country. We are making, it says, substantial progress. It was declared substantial two and, as well three years ago, and it is now more notable than ever. To this I will return later.

Following those words, however, the Speech goes on to mention that the cost of living is now the chief subject which possesses the minds of the administration, and states that, exercising all the economy in their power, they are not able to take care of it. Something it says beyond economy is essential. Then the government states the reasons for its impotence. What the object of the paragraph could have been I am at a loss to know: It is a compound of retrospection and despair without what you would expect—an element of remorse. There is nothing in the way of a promise of legislation; it has no useful place in the Speech at all.

From this, reference is made to the need of immigrants. We are assured that the government has been exerting every effort to attract the right class of immigrants to Canada, and in the same paragraph we are told that though every effort has been exhausted they are going to exert some more. I am not sure whether this is the thirteenth or fourteenth statement of immigration policy which has come from the administration. The only comment I make at the moment is: Where are the immigrants? Last year there was some accretion, an improvement over 1922; I think the numbers were about 137,000. For the year 1923, this is reduced to 124,000; but the trend is the more apparent from taking more recent months of each year. For the last nine months of 1923 the immigration was one hundred and twenty-four thousand odd and for the corresponding nine months of last year it was one hundred thousand odd. The multiplication of policies does not result in the multiplication of immigrants.

Then a reference is made to the tariff reductions of last year which are said to have resulted in a lessening of the cost of production of raw materials and of the necessaries of life, and the intimation is that because of that legislation we are enjoying a lower cost of living in Canada. As a matter of fact, as all are aware, the cost of living has increased. There may have been reductions in the cost of production of certain articles, but the public gets the benefit when the reduction reaches the public and, as official statistics of the Minister of Trade and Commerce disclose, the public is paying higher than ever.

Coming to the next paragraph in the Speech we are advised that something must now be done in the way of control of transportation by land and sea. This it is stated is "obviously essential to the promotion of interimperial trade, the expansion of export trade generally, and the development of Canadian trade via Canadian ports." The procedure that is to be followed with respect to railway freight rates, we are told, will depend upon the decision of the Supreme court in the case of the present lawsuits which are under consideration there on the question of the Crowsnest pass agreement. But as to ocean freight rates "action is being taken to overcome the restraints on export trade due to the exactions of the powerful steamship combine known as the North Atlantic Steamship Conference." The address continues:

> Your approval will be asked of a measure aimed at affording the government of Canada a control of ocean rates.

Obviously the government is determined to get away as far as possible from tariff discussions this session. To-day some new subject has to be hoisted to the fore. They have chosen transportation for the purpose. As to land rates, their policy cannot be disclosed till they know the decision of the Supreme court on the Crowsnest pass agreement. Well, may I ask, why not? I thought their policy had been disclosed, not only disclosed but proclaimed all through the length and breadth of half of Canada—not widely emphasized in the eastern portion, but boasted of with unlimited adulation in the west. Why wait for the decision of the Supreme court before deciding to continue the policy so long proclaimed? Did the Prime Minister not go through western Canada turning handsprings on platform after platform, telling the people that he had restored the Crowsnest pass agreement and was entitled to their everlasting gratitude? This was the policy of the government last summer, why is it not their policy to-day? The Supreme court may decide whether or not the government actually did restore the Crowsnest pass agreement—whether or not the legislation, or the absence of legislation, the course they pursued legislatively, resulted legally in the restoration of the agreement. This they can decide and this only; but whether the agreement stays or does not stay, the Parliament of Canada can decide, and the Parliament of Canada alone. No one has ever called in question the power of parliament to legislate yes or no as to the Crowsnest pass agreement. It is not a question of powers that is before the Supreme court at all—not in relation to parliament. Whatever the Supreme court may decide, this parliament alone controls the destiny of the Crowsnest pass agreement. Therefore, if it is still the policy of the administration to do what the Prime Minister proclaimed—and, I have not the slightest doubt, believed—that he had done, why is it not revealed in the Speech from the Throne? Why are we waiting for a decision, on the result of which nothing depends at all in so far as the policy of parliament is concerned? But the fact of the matter is, as everybody knows, and as the government was warned, that by the course they have pursued they have precipitated transportation anarchy and chaos in this country. They have shifted their ground month after month. We have had various sets of rates one month and other sets of rates another month, and the result of it all is to put the government in a position where it either has to reverse its own action or to compel chaos again. But when they come to the water they have no doubts. Both on the Great Lakes and on the ocean their policy is clear. A year ago we were told that there had to be "equalization" of transportation rates on the lakes, and the government brought in legislation amending what it had done the year before. Now they are going to proceed from the Great Lakes to the ocean and control the rates there. Is it worth while inquiring what their success has been on the lakes? Will any member of the government suggest that within the past year there has been one atom of control of one rate on the lakes? The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) knows there has not. He knows the legislation was precipitate and abortive. He knows it was hastily computed. He never had any faith in it; in fact I am informed he warned his colleagues against it. But whatever may be the various opinions of the government, we all know there is no regulation to-day. We all know that the grain commission which is supposed to have certain powers to define shippers or shipowners, has never exercised those powers, and does not control the rates at all. We know, as well, that the attempt this government made to establish control of rates on the lakes resulted only in the humiliation of the Dominion and in compelling us to throw ourselves at the feet of vessel owners in the United States and beg them to come back and violate the law of Canada. This government had to eat crow at the hands of American vessel owners. Such was the result of their attempt to control freights on the lakes. But, undaunted by their failure in that attempt, they now take to the broad Atlantic, and there they hope to succeed. I am reminded of a quotation given only a few days ago by the versatile member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), from Childe Harold. As I heard it I thought he probably had this government in mind:

> Man marks the earth with ruin—his control
> Stops with the shore.

Singlehanded they expect to control ocean rates. I do not know what the plan is; it has not been vouchsafed to us. But the newspaper reports indicate that some arrangement has been made with Sir William Petersen, or the company he controls, under which subsidies are to be paid in large amounts from the Treasury of the Dominion, in return for which, deductions in rates or control of rates is to be secured.

I had placed in my hands just before entering the House the account of an address delivered by Sir William Petersen before the shareholders of the company of which he appears to be the head, two or three weeks ago. In this address he intimated as follows:

> The business that I have been about is a little off the beaten track. You have to go out in search of business nowadays. It does not come to you. I have been on a business trip which I think may have resulted in some amount of success and may bring a considerable amount of success to this company. I am not in a position to disclose what the business is, except that it will materialize within the next few months, and I hope that in the early spring we will be able to see our ships sailing under very much more prosperous conditions than at the present prevail, conditions such as most shipping companies are subject to, dependent as they are on the existing low freights.

Sir William Petersen's interpretation of the agreement he appears to have made is that it will relieve his company from the hardships under which they have suffered because of the low prevailing freight rates. Then he adds a word of advice to all the shareholders of his company assembled there not to do as they had been doing, sacrificing their shares at a discount, but to hold out for par, for if the shares were not worth it then, they soon would be, and he advised them in a very practical way that if any one of them got impatient, just to be good enough to come to him and he would buy the shares from him. So I think it may be fairly presumed that whether this venture is going to be better than the attempt on the Great Lakes for the taxpayers of Canada, it is fully expected to result a great deal better for the shareholders of Sir William Petersen's company.

I wish to make some reference to the Speech from the Throne of last year, just by way of comment on how seriously these prognostications in a Speech from the Throne really should be taken. The first two paragraphs I will read a little later. I start now with the third:

> My ministers are strongly of the opinion that a reduction of taxation is of first importance, and that to this end the efforts already put forth to combine strict economy in the administration of the public services with rigorous retrenchment in public expenditures, should be furthered in as many directions as may be possible.

This was the promise of a year ago. The economy so far exercised was to have been furthered in all possible directions. I have in my hands the financial statement of this country to the end of the last day of January, and I find that the result of this promise to curtail expenditure and to exercise rigid economy in all possible directions for the ensuing year has been that the government have spent some $2,300,000 more than they spent the year before up to the same date, and this in the presence of a loss of revenue of $50,210,000. This shows that at the end of January, although at that date, $3,000,000 less in interest was paid on the public debt than had been paid at the same date the year before, we were behind last year the total sum of $52,601,031. This is "substantial progress"—progress in the way of building up a deficit. The next paragraph went on to say:

> My ministers believe, however, that in virtue of economies already effected they will, when the present financial year closes, be able to announce to the country that for the first time since 1912-1913 the national budget has been balanced. They are further of the opinion that when the budget for the ensuing fiscal year is introduced it will be found that the relation between public revenue and public expenditure is such as to justify some immediate reduction of taxation.

How far was that vindicated by the event? I do not care what speech of a member of the government you refer to, you will always find that last year they reduced the debt of Canada by $35,000,000. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is especially emphatic in his boast of this magnificent achievement. It is only insulting the intelligence of parliament to say that the achievement was brought about by the endorsation of $72,500,000, worth of bonds for the Canadian National Railways instead of by borrowing the money, thus adding it to the debt, and lending it to the railways. Of the plan adopted I have never made criticism, but of the concealment of the result I have made criticism, and make it now. That endorsement, in the present condition of the national railways, not resulting—as had been the case in previous years—in a corresponding, or any, reduction of its funded debt, was the same to the taxpayers of Canada, in so far as liability goes, as a direct borrowing of the money. An indirect liability in relation to a company that cannot pay its way is of equal seriousness, indeed, it is the same thing as direct liability. The Prime Minister says: You endorsed before and did not add that to the debt. I think I showed, and I believe to-day I can show again that this was not added because there was an offset of equal amount in reduction of the railways, funded debt. But, suppose in this I am wrong, how does that affect the case? If the Prime Minister is right, this means merely that our debt at that time was so much greater than represented. Therefore, our debt now is $72,500,000 greater than this government represents, and to make the matter perhaps clearer, if anything could, that very indirect obligation of $72,500,000 gives rise and will give rise this session to a portion of the estimates which this government is bound to present, because this parliament has to vote the interest on the very money represented by the guarantees. Thus was another promise fulfilled. But I pause only to comment that there is a significant absence of both sentences from the Speech from the Throne this year. Evidently the government despair of presenting, even by the device of endorsing the bonds of the Canadian National Railways, a balanced budget in 1925. Evidently, they despair of being able to convince even this parliament that they had the faintest justification for reducing taxation in Canada in the face of her increasing liabilities.

I read the next paragraph of the Speech from the Throne of last session:

> In the opinion of the government, such reduction of taxation as it may be possible to effect should aim primarily at reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, thereby aiding materially in the development of our natural resources, and, through cheapened production, effecting a diminution also in the cost of living.

Whatever else may have been the consequence, there has been no diminution in the cost of living. I hold in my possession the chart of the Department of Labour, from which chart it appears that at the time the policies boasted of in this speech went into effect, the cost of living was 149 in the scale of the chart, and that at present the cost of living stands at 154. This is not reducing very fast. The cost of living stands to-day exactly where it stood at the beginning of 1924; it stands to-day three points higher than it was when the first budget of hon. gentlemen opposite went into effect. I am entirely aware that the chief reason for the cost of living figures is the increased price of breadstuffs. For that increased price it is quite true that the government has no responsibility; but what I am arguing is that no difference whatever in the cost of living figures has been effected by anything the government has done. But there have been a whole lot of other things that I can trace to the government's own action. The cost of living is higher than it was, but the industries of Canada are in a condition in which, as the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) knows, they cannot compare with the condition they were in a year ago. It was not the farm implement industry that was chiefly affected, if indeed it was affected at all. I never stated to this House that the action of the government would make worse the position of the farm implement industry last year. Indeed I predicted, as hon. gentlemen to my left will recall, that all the actual protection that would be removed from farm implements would be molecular. I was somewhat bandied on account of that prediction, but it was absolutely correct. The industries that produced the goods that went into the manufacture of farm implements were seriously affected, and the production of those goods in steel and in various other articles has fallen off by huge percentages, resulting in the throwing on the street of thousands, yes, tens of thousands of the workmen of this country. To this I will return later, because for each statement I have the proof out of the government's own departments and out of the figures presented to the administration by their own supporters. I find, as well, in a pamphlet issued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the index figure for wholesale prices registers to-day the highest level since August 1921. It registers to-day 165.2; at that time it registered 165.5. Thus has another prediction been verified.

Now I read the following from last year's Speech from the Throne:

The stabilization and control of freight rates on grain from the head of the great lakes to Canadian ocean ports and thence to Liverpool, are receiving the closest attention.

The only thing incubated last session had reference to the rates on the lakes. I do not know what was equalized; I never could see what that word meant in this connection at all. But whatever was done in the way of pretended control resulted in a complete fiasco.

I pass from that to something else which was stated to be also in the government's mind.

The important subject of marine insurance as affecting our ports; the permanent equalization of the rate on Canadian flour, and the removal of discriminations in ocean rates on other Canadian products are receiving attention.

Parliament has not yet been informed what the result of the attention has been in so far as this insurance question is concerned. Has nothing at all been the consequence of all the mental worry of the administration? And what has been done about the equalization of the rates on flour? What have they been "equalized" with? I asked last session what in the world the clause meant, and I got no answer. I find now that it meant nothing, for, so far as parliament has been advised, nothing whatever has been the consequence. Last session it was "receiving attention." Now we are advised in the Speech from the Throne of this session that there is to be a bill to control ocean rates.

Now I return to the feature of the Speech from the Throne common to this session and to last. Possibly I had better read the words of the Speech in this regard as it appears in Hansard of last Thursday:

Since prorogation, the economic situation throughout the world has notably improved.

I do not dispute the facts of the case. It certainly has improved in the United States. I fancy the general assertion is true.

For Canada, the year 1924 was a period of substantial progress. In trade alone, the excess value of exports over imports was more than $260,000,000. The present year opens with prospects of sound and steady development. The financial and trade situation justifies the expectation of an early return to the gold basis.

Let me follow this with the reading of the corresponding subjects in the Address of last year:

I am glad to be able to congratulate you upon the many evidences of increased prosperity. Though the general economic situation still reflects the consequences of the World War, the records of production, trade, transportation, employment and public finance have been uniformly increasingly favorable throughout the Dominion. The state of general employment has been distinctly better. The volume of business has steadily increased, especially has the country reason to feel gratified at the expansion to a notable degree of its public revenues and decline of its expenditures.

Then comes this paragraph couched in apostolic diction:

I am persuaded that a reduction in taxation, and in production and transportation costs, such as will encourage the investment of capital in industrial enterprise and attract settlers in large numbers to our Dominion, are all that are necessary to effect an economic development hitherto unparalleled.

Forthwith the government commenced to effect just what they said they were persuaded would bring about this very desirable result, reduction in taxation and in production and transportation costs, "such as would encourage the investment of capital in industrial enterprises." I am going to make an examination of what really has followed these prognostications. I do not propose to say that there has been no encouraging feature at all in the twelve months that have gone by. If there is one, it is to be found in the import and export trade returns. I do not dispute the accuracy of the statement that our exports for the calendar year 1924 showed over imports a favourable balance of some $260,000,000. Hon. gentlemen in other days were accustomed to ridicule the boast by any government of a "favourable" trade balance. I never had any sympathy with that ridicule. I like a favourable trade balance. But a favourable trade balance under certain conditions means one thing, and under other conditions does not mean that thing at all. A favourable trade balance produced by sound policies arising from sound conditions is certainly something to be desired. In Canada we must have a favourable trade balance of about $300,000,000 to avoid going back in outside obligations alone, because our debts to the outside world compel us to send that amount annually to creditors beyond our shores. But how does the trade balance to-day arise? Is it sound in every respect? In many respects it is. The trade balance is accounted for by a very heavy harvest in 1923, by very favourable weather conditions the export extending into the year 1924, and, as well, by high prices for the year 1924, prices which have undoubtedly resulted in amelioration of conditions in western Canada—not to any very marked degree, I am sorry to say, but that there has been amelioration there can be no doubt. These things are sound and right, but nobody could argue sensibly that they flow from any government policy. The government had no more to do with them than with the eclipse of the sun last month. There are other things, though, which while equally foreign to government policy are not fundamentally as sound. Our wood exports have grown since 1921—I mean unmanufactured wood—by some $38,000,000, and that does not include the export in the more advanced stage, which has grown by vast sums besides. The latter, of course, is not to be deplored, but the whole results in a reduction of the irreplaceable resources of this country, of any reduction of which we must take very serious account. In addition to an increase in wheat exports alone from 1921 of 68,000,000 bushels and some $38,000,000 worth, as I say, in unmanufactured wood, we find raw mineral production going out in tremendously increased quantities. That is not in itself in all respects unsound, but nevertheless it is something for which the government has not the least occasion to credit itself—something which results not only from the enterprise of the Canadian people, but, so far as government is concerned at all, from the enterprise of provincial governments. Our gold, for example, has grown from an export of $2,500,000 in 1921 to $28,500,000 in 1924, and almost similar figures pertain to any of those things which in the main, account for the surplus of our trade—none of them going to the making of work for any appreciable number of the labourers of our country. For none of them in the least degree is any policy this government ever initiated, or continued, responsible.

When I have referred to external trade I have referred to what undoubtedly is the most attractive feature of conditions at the present time. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, are we to hesitate in this parliament to disclose what the actual condition of Canada is? Are members of this House to be cowed by the practice and the threats of hon. gentlemen opposite—I refer to members of the government—when they call a man "no patriot" and "traitor" if he tells what the real state of the people of Canada is? Is it an answer to a demonstration of fact to be described in the language of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) as a "Jeremiah"? Have we got to the stage when the people of this country are afraid to know the facts, prefer to bury their heads in the sand like the most brainless of animals? How is parliament to determine what the right course or the right policy is to be if we are not to take account of the state of affairs which surrounds us, by the results of policies in effect? Is this government to be permitted to place on the record of parliament such statements as this, that as a consequence of the government's policies, as the Prime Minister so often describes them, this thing has resulted and that thing—"substantial progress" in 1922; "substantial progress" in 1923; "substantial progress" in 1924; and is no one to be permitted to show that such a statement is not true at all? I do not propose to be deterred. I think the Canadian people are in a serious mood. I do not think the Canadian people think that even in the face of the repeated bounties of Providence we have enjoyed real progress at all.

Now I proceed to make inquiry into what the evidence is of what the government claims as "substantial progress" throughout the year 1924:

> The records of production, trade, transportation, employment and public finance have been uniformly increasingly favourable throughout the Dominion.

It will be noted that of all these records only one is dared to be mentioned this year, that of trade; and even our trade in its total is less than for the year 1923.

> The state of general employment has been distinctly better.

I will read another.

> The volume of business has steadily increased. Especially has the country reason to feel gratified at the expansion to a notable degree of its public revenues and decline of its expenditures.

Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, why none of these are mentioned this year? For the simple reason that the condition in every instance is distinctly the opposite: instead of a decline in the public expenditure and an increase in the public revenue there has been to date a decline of $50,000,000 odd in the public revenue and an increase of $2,300,000 in public expenditure. Passing back to the speech of last year:

> The state of general employment has been distinctly better.

Since the House prorogued last year no less than 94,000 people in this Dominion have gone out of employment. That figure left alone is not fair. It is usual in this country—I think it is inevitable—that in the later months of the year there is a diminution of employment. The minister cannot point to a diminution equal to what has occurred since we prorogued this House. I have the figures before me—and this is a fair comparison: In the year 1924 the diminution of employment was approximately 39,000—it was that much less on the first of January, 1925, than on the first of January, 1924. This is all according to the employment records, not of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), but of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low), the author of that celebrated piece of Liberal propaganda circulated at the expense of the people of Canada, known as "Canada is Coming Through." The way I arrive at these figures, I may say for the information of the minister, is this: I take the percentages; I know that each one per cent represents about 8,000 or a little less, and I allow for the amount less. The number employed last first of January less, then, on the first of January, 1923, is some 20,000. It is true that there were about 45,000 more than on the first of January, 1922. That is a fact. But there is not much to be cheerful over in that respect; 1921 represented all over this continent, indeed over the world but especially on this continent, the dip of the after-war reaction. The United States suffered equally with us and as a result millions of their workmen were roaming the streets. The United States has recovered, and steadily recovered. We had a very slight recovery in 1922, but we have gone back, and we are going back still. We have to-day 16 per cent less employed in Canada than on the first of January, 1920. That 16 per cent would represent approximately 125,000 people.

Mr. MURDOCK: Does the right hon. gentleman know that he is quoting from only one side of the figures, and those figures secured from his friends the employers, and prepared, I think it can be shown, for a specific purpose? The right hon. gentleman is not giving the figures that have been secured from the labour organizations and from other sources, and which should be given in order to show the correct status.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing could have been more helpful than the interruption of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). He has impugned as seriously as he can do anything, the publications of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he tells me I am not justified in standing in parliament and depending upon the official records of a department of this government. These records he says, are prejudiced. Instead of relying on those figures, he says I ought to base my statements on the report of the trades unions of Canada. Well, I have some trade union reports before me, I had almost forgotten about them; and, though out of turn, perhaps I could not do better than refer to them just now. These were brought to light on the day parliament opened this session, so they are very recent. I quote from a newspaper report of 6th February, of a meeting of the Montreal Trades and Labour Council:

> Unemployment statistics for forty unions were submitted at the Montreal Trades and Labour Council last evening, showing that out of 48,000 men covered by these unions, 9,324 are out of employment, and 22,463 are working on short time.

That is, sixty per cent either out of employment or on short time. I go on:

> The extent of unemployment was greater than in the same period last year—

"Substantial progress"!

> —and a very serious condition of affairs existed among the working classes of the city. Aside from the reports of institutions the committee had been informed from other sources and individuals that more calls from distressed people for personal aid had been received than during last winter or the winter preceding.

The report concludes:

> Whatever may be said about the need for a greater population in Canada, it cannot be denied that thousands who were born in this country are unable to find in it the opportunities for earning a livelihood. No more substantiation of this is necessary than figures given by the Secretary of Labour of the United States, Mr. James J. Davis. In the three years, 1921-1924 there legally entered the United States from Canada over 400,000 people, but according to Mr. Davis 850,000 persons clandestinely entered the United States in the year 1923-1924 alone, much of which came over the Canadian border.

I would think it would. It goes on:

> The Dominion Labour Bureau of Statistics estimates that through immigration and births in the past three years there has been added to our population 700,000.

Seven hundred thousand people added through immigration and births in three years. It goes on:

> In the United States' estimate there has legally and illegally entered that country from Canada over 700,000.

I do not see very much more sunshine in the reports of the trade unions than I do in the reports of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It might be added that the index figure now is 83.9 showing that more than 16 per cent less are employed now than on the 1st January, 1920. I would like the corresponding figures to be produced from the United States and to ascertain if there has been 16 per cent, or even 1 per cent reduction in the same period in that country.

Now I want to read the other references in the Speech from the Throne of a year ago, and show what has been left out this year:

> Though the general economic situation still reflects the consequences of the World War, the records of production, trade, transportation, employment and public finance have been uniformly increasingly favourable.

I have shown the record of public finance. It has been uniformly increasingly worse. The record of transportation I have before me, and that record shows that to the end of November last, the latest figures that could be procured—I cannot find the figures at the moment, and I am willing to let it go on Hansard at this, but I know it is more—there was some 8,800,000 tons or $23,000,000 worth of transportation less in those eleven months than in the eleven months preceding. Trade also in its total is less, though the favourable trade balance is equal or perhaps a little more. If this clause of a year ago were sought to be reproduced to-day, and there was any fidelity to truth displayed, it would read as follows: "Through the general economic situation still reflects the consequence of the World War, the records of production, trade, transportation, employment and public finance have been uniformly increasing by worse throughout the Dominion. The state of general employment has been distinctly worse. The volume of business has steadily decreased"—as I shall show a little later. "Especially has the country reason to feel mortified at the expansion of the public expenditure and the notable decline of the public revenue."

The reason is apparent why the government did not follow the phraseology of last year. Now I want to make some comment on the next paragraph in the Speech of last year:

> I am persuaded that a reduction in taxation, and in production and transportation costs, such as will encourage the investment of capital in industrial enterprise and attract settlers in large numbers to our Dominion are all that are necessary to effect an economic development hitherto unparalleled.

This has been supplemented by a speech of the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Beland), who true to the mottoes of his party and his colleagues announced even last night that Canada was "on the eve of a great wave of prosperity, the greatest in the last fifty years." I wonder what day there has been in the three years that have gone that we have not been told about that "eve" on the edge of which we are continually standing. Has anybody witnessed an eve that lasted quite so long? How is it the dawn never comes? How is it that none of these things result that the government predicts session after session? There was going to be a reduction in production and transportation costs following reductions in the tariff, and as a consequence there was going to be a flow of capital into investment in industrial enterprise, and settlers were to be attracted to this country in large numbers. The records of the Immigration department show that instead of attracting settlers in large numbers, the numbers are far smaller, and they are getting smaller continuously. In December last, only some 2,000 came to this Dominion. We have heard a very great deal lately about "returned Canadians." I do not know how the records are kept, but I do say that the numbers vary materially from those given out by the United States. In the reports of the United States the number of Canadians returning per year is not so great as the number this government says came back during a month—namely about 4,000.

But here is something very interesting indeed: If the minister will look at the returns of his own department he will find that the total number of Americans who came to Canada—American citizens, aliens and all the rest outside of Canadians—was, in the month of December, 741. My figures are tolerably close. But he says some 3,000 returned Canadians came in. Therefore, we are asked to believe that of all immigrants coming from that great republic, extending, as it does, east and west for a distance of nearly four thousand miles, four out of every five are returning Canadians! We do not see many of them here, and it would be very remarkable indeed if such a proportion as that could prevail. But let us assume that it does; what is the consequence? The emigration from Canada to the United States in 1923 was 181,973; in 1922, 62,289; and in 1921, 52,929. For the eleven months of 1924,—the figures are the latest I can get,—the recorded emigration to the United States alone is 147,330.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: From what source are those figures taken?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I sent to the Immigration Department of the United States direct and got them; they are quoted everywhere and accepted. But those figures only include the number who report themselves as going to the United States to remain; not those who report themselves as going there to visit, nor to others who get through by one surreptitious method or another; and the United States Minister of Labour reports that 850,000 have so crossed, not our borders merely, but all borders, in two years alone. In this connection I do not quote from any source the government can attack. The Trades and Labour Council of Montreal in their report, which I read to the Minister of Labour, declare that in these three years 300,000 of our people crossed over illegally and 400,000 legally. That body gives 700,000 as the number entering legally and illegally, and it bases its estimate on the report of the United States Minister of Labour. Mr. Grant MacNeil, Secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association, who has been appointed to a responsible position by this government and against whom I do not think they will comment, in the course of an article expresses the belief that a most conservative estimate of those who go, besides those who are counted, would place it at fifty per cent of the number who legally leave the Dominion. This is the lowest estimate I have seen anywhere. Now, let us keep within it and we have passing from Canada, in these three years of substantial progress, no less than 600,000 of our people. The Prime Minister says there have returned, in the last nine months, some 37,000. I have already stated my reasons for questioning the accuracy of that return, but assuming it to be correct what does it amount to? Why it means this: That there are at least four and one-half going out for every one who came back during these years of "substantial progress". All through these years when Canada has been reaping the rich reward of what are called "government policies" immigration diminishes. If I may be allowed to compare what has taken place in this respect in the three years that have gone with the three years that preceded them I shall present a few figures all taken from the government returns. Commencing with March 31, 1922, when, I suppose, this government had got fairly under way, the number who have entered Canada since, up to the end of 1924, according to the government records, is 322,017. The number who entered in the previous three years during exactly the same dates was 355,812. To bring in those 355,000 there was spent $4,713,000. To bring in the 322,000 in exactly the same period under this government the sum of $9,102,000 was voted. And while the three years preceding were passing, while the 355,000 odd were coming in, this country returned to its shores and absorbed in civil life no less than 400,000 of its soldiers from overseas. After they have returned, after they are all absorbed in civil life, this government spent over nine millions to bring in 322,000 immigrants; and while those 322,000 have been coming, 600,000 have been going from Canada to one country alone. This is the "substantial progress" which resulted from the enactments of the policies of this government.

Now, I want to make some reference to a publication which has gone out with the signature of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, gone out at very considerable expense. The title of this publication is: Canada is coming through! Stand by her; in your faith lies her strength.

None of us fail in faith in Canada, but do not let anybody confound faith in Canada with faith in Canada's government. Here is proof of the case. I will read a few of the statements made. In commenting on these statements I do not pay any attention to outside opinions, especially those expressed in after-dinner speeches. The House will note I have not quoted any. I believe in quoting facts based on the best authority that can be reached. Now to test the accuracy of the minister's proclamation:

Employment: Canada began the year 1924 on a considerably lower level than the United States, but has ended the year considerably above the latter. In January, 1924, our index number was 88.7. In November it was 93.0.

Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) say that is true? He says it is. Well, his department says it is not. The official figures of his department state that on January 1, 1925, our index number of employment was 83.9.

Mr. LOW: Use the same dates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am doing that very thing. So on January 1, 1925, our index number was 83.9 whilst the index number of the United States on the same day was 89.4.

Mr. LOW: The leader of the opposition is quoting January 1, 1925?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. LOW: I was not quoting January 1, 1925.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Ah! But the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that Canada began the year 1924 at a considerably lower level than the United States but ended the year at a figure considerably above the latter. How do you end the year 1924 until you get to the first of January 1925?

Mr. LOW: Stick to the dates I have quoted, and you will find the figures are correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. minister mean? Why did he tell the public that at the end of the year 1924 we were higher than the United States? We were nothing of the kind. That is the statement I am contradicting. One needs only to take our own government reports, the report of the minister himself, to show that the conditions of employment in the two countries are not comparable at all. In the last report I have in my possession, published by the minister for January, 1925, he said that there was last month a heavy reduction in employment. It also shows that we have lost in the year approximately 38,000, and the same report shows that taking the United States—and numbers of them are quoted here—during the same period there was improvement in employment. These reports are published by the minister himself. In the face of reports of his own department which I hold in my hand, he tells the public, at the public expense—because he charges them for the misrepresentation—that though we began the year worse than the States we ended it far better. He says:

The net operating revenue of Canadian railways showed an increase of over two and a half million in 1924 compared with the preceding year. The Canadian National lines in Canada have increased their net operating revenue in 1924 by over one and a half million.

I state, Mr. Speaker, in your hearing that not one word of that is true; quite the contrary is true, and I hold the official reports to prove my words.

Mr. LOW: It is very easy to verify the figures, and I think my hon. friend will find they are correct if he will take the trouble to look them up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hold in my hand the report of the hon. gentleman's own department. This is the report up to the end of November; the report to the end of December is not yet published, it cannot be got; I tried at the minister's department to get it this morning, but could not do so. I quote a paragraph which refers to the Canadian National railways in Canada.

For the eleven months, January to November, gross revenue showed a decrease of $23,173,053.

I stop there only for a moment to remark, that it is gross revenue which really reflects the condition of the country, it is net revenue which reflects the management of the road, or at least contributes to decide on the merits of the management. I proceed to read all of this report:

For the eleven months January to November gross revenue showed a decrease of $23,173,053.
Expenses, a decrease of $21,927,997, and net operating revenues a decrease of $1,245,056.

Why does the minister give, through his department, the facts as obtained from the railways showing a diminution in net of about one and a quarter million, and then publish Liberal propaganda at the public expense to say there was an improvement in net of $2,250,000? The minister cannot escape by any differentiation, because his own department assures me those figures refer to railways in Canada. The figures are worse when they refer to the two companies, United States territory included.

I proceed to examine the second sentence, because I said it was not correct either. It says:

The Canadian National lines in Canada have increased their net operating revenue in 1924 by over one and a half million.

The House will note the minister only mentions the Canadian National lines "in Canada." Unfortunately he is wrong even then, because his own department has shown that to the end of November there was an improvement of only about half a million dollars. I do not know what occurred in December, it was a bad month as every one knows, but to November 30, eleven months, the whole improvement in net of the Canadian National lines in Canada was limited to $593,701. How does the minister justify charging the public of this Dominion for circulating entirely misleading and false propaganda for his party? I do not want the House to get the idea that this is the full extent of the falling off for 1924, because this report goes on to say that when there is included the Canadian National lines in the States, the whole system, the reduction in net—and this is in operation alone—is $2,239,121. In addition to this loss, the failure to come up to last year in net operation, we have some five to six millions increase in fixed charges; so that there is no possibility—for December is past—of justifying the statements which have been made. The figures already known show that we will be seven to eight millions worse than we were a year ago. And this is considered as authority for the assertion that Canada is "coming through." I have not any doubt Canada "came through" with money to pay for the advertisement. Another paragraph states:

On December 31, 1923 the Canadian people had on deposit in banks (chartered and savings) $1,274,326,346. This has increased to $1,274,427,867, by September 30, 1924.

That is an increase—to show that "Canada is coming through,"—of $101,341, or about a cent and an eighth each for the people of our country. Verily, the "policies" of this government are making us rich. Of course the minister adds—and I have not had time to look into it and therefore do not question the accuracy of his statement—that there had been an increase of ten million in deposits in provincial savings banks. The whole added together would be an increase of a dollar and fifteen cents for each person in this period of time. The minister says this is a demonstration of "substantial progress." Very well, when this government came into power deposits in our chartered banks were $1,387,084,646. They are now $1,274,427,867, and have thus diminished since this government came into power by $113,000,000. How is an increase of a dollar and fifteen cents in these months for each person in Canada to be called evidence of "substantial progress," if the large decrease which I have mentioned extending over the past three years in the deposits in chartered banks is not an evidence of actual retrogression? In fact, all this "substantial progress" the minister talks of, so far as finance goes, is progress in building up a deficit, and so far as industry goes, is progress in liquidation and so far as population goes, is progress towards the equator.

I come now to the question of industry, but before I do so there is a paragraph to which it would be really a shame not to refer. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, because I know you are possessed of this quality of mind, just to meditate on the exquisite humour latent in this boast:

> The housing scarcity which was so serious as a result of the cessation of building during the war has now been fairly met and the nation is free to turn its capital into more immediately productive channels.

I do not dispute the fidelity, to truth, of that paragraph. Far be it from me to deny this government the capacity to solve any housing problem that ever affected a nation. Put this government in charge of any country on earth and in two years there will be no housing problem to solve. They will solve the housing problem, not by building houses for the people, but by chasing the people from the houses. It may be worth while to add that the decrease in building permits last year from the year before was, according to the minister's own return, 7.3 per cent and from the previous year 17 per cent. What is to be thought of this conglomeration of falsities by which the minister seeks, at the expense of the people, to parade the alleged achievements of this administration?

Let me now make some reference to another question which has received some discussion during the summer. It has reference to a statement I made in the city of Stratford on the 20th day of August last, this statement which, according to the newspaper reports I have here, was to the effect that one thousand factories—

Mr. RANKIN: Two thousand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will come to that—had gone out of business since this government came into power. My words just now were "according to the newspapers." I think I said two thousand, and I know that later on I said two thousand after the violent and rather offensive contradictions of the Prime Minister had been adduced. By the figure two thousand I am prepared to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Give us a list of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I could give the Prime Minister a list.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will he?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: In fact, I think a list of most of them is in the hands of the Minister of Labour now.

Mr. MURDOCK: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask my right hon. friend—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think I should be asked to give publication to individual names, but I will give the proof of what I said right now. I hold in my hand the report of R. G. Dun & Co. for the last three years. Does the Prime Minister dispute that R. G. Dun & Co. is a responsible firm?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will quote to my right hon. friend from R. G. Dun & Co.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated was that that number had closed their doors. I did not state that that number had failed. Many a business closes its doors that does not fail.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On Saturday night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a quotation in Saturday Night from R. G. Dun & Co. The number of failures, not including those who merely closed their doors, was 625 in 1924. These would not all be included prior to the 20th of August, and I will come to a division later. In 1923, there were 792 and in 1922, 857. The first two years, 1922 and 1923, added together total 1,649 in failures alone. The proportion of the number given for 1924 which would be prior to the 20th of August is exactly 399, and I do not think it will be asserted that there were more failures in the latter part of 1924 than in the former part. Adding 399 to 1,649 we get a total of 2,048 failures according to R. G. Dun & Co., from the advent of this government up to August 20, 1924. In these figures, I repeat, are not included those, too many of them, who closed without the process of liquidation at all. For example, the big glass factory which was referred to last session in the budget speech did not go into liquidation. Have I established what I said? I asserted at the same time, from the same platform, that in the same period other industries had opened, but I stated what was the absolute fact, that in employing capacity they did not compare with those which had closed. This is what has been going on. This is what is supposed to satisfy the people of Canada. The debt of our country grows day by day, month by month. It is not possible any longer to conceal the truth; it is not possible to remove it if present policies are pursued. According to the government records this country is at the present time $52,000,000 behind where it was at this time a year ago, and when the railway returns come in, that sum is bound to be increased. The actual deficit last year was about $38,000,000. Where are we to land at the end of 1924-25? Are we supposed to presume that sound policies are being pursued which result in this culmination? Is all this satisfactory to the people in Canada? Is this progress comparable with the position disclosed by our neighbours to the south, who are situated much as we are and whose debt after the war and three years after the war was virtually the same proportionately as our own? It is entirely out of the question to appeal to this government to surrender the sweets of power; these are dearer to them than life. But I hope it is not out of the question to ask them, in the sight of conditions which prevail to-day, taking into account and giving every weight to those few which present any favourable aspect at all, to admit their error, reverse their policy, and give Canada a chance.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in joining with my right hon. friend in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the Address. The hon. member (Sir Eugene Fiset) who moved the Address is anything but a stranger to this city, though he now comes to parliament for the first time. For many years his distinguished record in the public service has been well known, not only throughout this country, but in all parts of the British Empire. During the South African war he rendered gallant service in South Africa, and through the whole of the late war he rendered as important service as any administrative officer in this country could have rendered the empire at that time. We are, indeed, proud to welcome him to this parliament for his known ability in an executive and administrative capacity; after hearing him this afternoon I feel sure that welcome will be extended not less on the score of his qualities as a parliamentarian and his admirable gift for public speaking. It is, I am sure, a source of pride and pleasure to the hon. member to realize that he succeeds in this parliament his distinguished father who, for many years, represented here the constituency which the hon. member to-day represents and was also for many years a member of the Senate of Canada.

May I, in making mention of this fact, draw the attention of the House to the circumstance that of the five new members whom we had the privilege of introducing on the day of the opening, and who sit on this side of the House, no less than three succeed their respective fathers to representation in this House of their respective constituencies. The hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. Snowball), bears a name which is familiar to all who have followed the public life of Canada. His father was not only an hon. member of this House but was also later a member of the Senate and subsequently lieutenant governor of the province of New Brunswick. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) comes also of a family whose name is well known in our political history, his father having also represented the present member's constituency with great distinction. Of the two other members who were introduced on the day of the opening, I think I can say that in the short time they have been before the public their names have become almost household words in the Dominion. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Hushion) has not been long in this House, but I venture to say that from one end of the country to the other the campaign which he waged so successfully in the city of Montreal during the recess is as well known as any recent political event.

May I, too, congratulate most heartily the seconder of the address, the hon. member who now represents in this House the constituency of West Hastings (Mr. Hanna)? I am sure my right hon. friend will agree with me that the constituency of West Hastings is to-day better known throughout Canada than it ever was before. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that my right hon. friend himself opened the constituency last session in order to test public confidence in the present administration. In his courageous way, he chose a constituency that from the days of confederation had been the most strongly Tory of any in Ontario. He chose a constituency in which he thought it would be impossible for anyone other than an opponent of the government to be returned. He took a very active part in the fight, he brought forward the policies he is advocating in the most forcible way, and after the election had been fought his candidate was defeated by an overwhelming majority by the new member for the constituency. The hon. member for West Hastings will long be remembered by that well merited victory. By his speech in the House this afternoon, he has added laurels to those already won.

My right hon. friend is accustomed to say that the government of the day does not enjoy public confidence, and he is continually putting forward his pet panacea of increased tariffs as a means of remedying the ills of the country. Knowing his faith in his patent remedy I marvel that in the course of his remarks to-day he did not speak at greater length on that particular theme. Perhaps he had in mind his somewhat unique procedure of presenting to the public on the eve of the opening of the House a manifesto in the name of his party which sets out his particular remedy for all existing conditions, and may have felt that the manifesto had received sufficient publicity for the present. What I should like to draw to my right hon. friend's attention is that his panacea was before the country in 1921 and met with a very poor welcome at that time. He started his campaign in the month of August, and continued it on into December; at the end of all that time, after telling the country that the one great remedy needed for its ills was increased protection, he was left without a single follower in six of the nine provinces of this Dominion. When parliament assembled he told us that the people had been deceived and that the government did not enjoy public confidence. Since last session six vacancies have given rise to contests in as many constituencies and five out of the six have returned supporters of the present administration. The one remaining constituency, a constituency in which my right hon. friend himself also participated in the campaign, sent his supporter back by a very considerably reduced majority. In view of all this, I should think he would feel that the remedy which he is proposing is not one that the people of this country deem essential at this time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not think it would be possible that my right hon. friend would be satisfied with the Speech from the Throne. Last session when a number of subjects were enumerated in the Speech he told us that we might better have omitted some of them; to-day when one or two matters are not referred to in specific terms he tells us they ought to have been included. It is apparent that no matter what the government might attempt in that regard, it would be impossible to satisfy my right hon. friend.

However, he did make a reflection upon the Speech from the Throne which I think was scarcely justified, though possibly the reason for it may not be far to discover. He said that he thought the speech was mostly water, and that what there was in substance would be found indigestible. As I listened to my right hon. friend's halting and faltering review of the speech, I could not help thinking that he must be suffering from the indisposition to which he had referred.

My right hon. friend spoke of the Geneva protocol and asked why no reference to it was contained in the speech, why the government had not declared its policy. He made some reference to the effect that the British government had announced its policy in the Speech from the Throne. If I caught his words aright, I would say that my right hon. friend is not correct in that statement. The British and other parliaments of the empire have met recently and so far as I am aware the government of not one of them has announced its policy with respect to the Geneva protocal in its Speech from the Throne; and I presume for the same reason—a reason that I think will appeal to hon. members of this House. As hon. members are aware, the government of Great Britain a short time ago made inquiry of the several governments of the dominions as to whether or not it would be possible for some of their members to be present in England during the spring of this year to discuss the Geneva protocol. On account of the opening of parliament members of the present administration thought it would be inconvenient, if not impossible, to be absent at this time, and so informed His Majesty's government at Westminster. A similar reply, I think, was sent by practically all the other self-governing dominions. The suggestion was made that it should be possible, by means of correspondence between the dominion governments and the government of Great Britain to work out this matter in a manner that would be satisfactory to the empire as a whole. That position was accepted by the British government and we are at the present time in communication with His Majesty's government in Britain and with the other governments of the Empire, but in view of the fact that up to the present, the matter has not been disposed of in any final way, as advisers of His Excellency we thought it desirable and proper that no allusion should be made by him to the subject in the Speech from the Throne. The government will make its position known at the right time, and ample opportunity will be given to hon. members to discuss the protocol in all its bearings.

Now, my right hon. friend referred to a number of matters dealt with in the Speech from the Throne of the present session, and to the Speech from the Throne of last session —I do not know how he overlooked the Speech from the Throne of the year before— I shall not try to follow him in any detail; rather I shall take up the more important points which he endeavoured to discuss in the course of his remarks. First, may I deal with the question of immigration, because it helps to illustrate as well as any the difference in point of view between my right hon. friend and myself. He said he did not propose to be bullied or bludgeoned or cowed into not making any statement that he thought it was right and proper that he should make. I do not think anyone has ever tried to bully or cow my right hon. friend, and were such an attempt made I may say for him that I do not think it would be successful; my right hon. friend would say what he intended to say, no matter what the consequences were. He said that he thought it was the duty of a public man to state the facts, and he raised the point of patriotism in that regard. Now, I agree with him in that; I think it is the duty of a patriot to see that his country is fully informed in regard to its own affairs. But I would say to my right hon. friend that patriotism extends beyond the mere statement of facts to the interpretation that is put upon the facts, and the true patriot to my mind is the man who will endeavour to put the facts relating to his own country's affairs before the people in such a light as will best serve the interests of his country. In other words he will not seek to interpret the facts in such a way as to serve party rather than public ends, which is, I regret to say, what I am afraid, my right hon. friend has been doing in some of the statistics and alleged facts he has been quoting of late.

In regard, then, to the question of immigration let me give the facts in as few words as I can, and in the light in which I think they should be presented to the country. We do not pretend that during the first year or two we were in office we were successful in bringing immigrants into this country in large numbers. That was no fault of the administration. My right hon. friend had been in office the year before, but at that time, when arrangements should have been made preparatory to the bringing of immigrants from the Old Country, sowing the seed abroad so that results of some value could have been produced, he was not concerned about emigration affairs in Great Britain or elsewhere; he was thinking of a general election which he brought on in Canada in the fall of 1921. The result was that when we came into office we found that for a year or more practically the whole machinery of immigration had been stopped, allowed to run down and to rust, that nothing had been done; that as a consequence the flow of immigration had virtually dried up at its source. Naturally, until it was possible for the government to reopen the offices abroad and get the machinery of immigration effectively at work, there could be no such quick returns as might otherwise have been effected. Let me say this in fairness to my right hon. friend: I think there was some excuse for his attitude at the time. We were just succeeding the period of the war. We had but recently been in the period of demobilization. Men had been brought back to this country by thousands and had to be re-established in industry. To have added large numbers of immigrants at that time, especially when there was the amount of unemployment as had existed during the preceding two or three winters, would not have been to help any immigration policy but would rather have created discontent and discord throughout the country, a condition which would have operated very seriously against the coming of immigrants to Canada later on. I want to put the facts clearly, as I think it is only by a plain understanding of the circumstances that the country will get a true appreciation of what has taken place.

May I draw attention to another fact, namely the position of Canada with respect to immigration as contrasted with the position of the country to the south? I need not remind this House—and by the way, I would like hon. members to keep this fact in mind throughout the discussion of questions relating to the conditions in Canada as compared with those in the United States, that Canada went into the war in August, 1914, whereas the United States went into the war in April,—I think it was April,—1917. While we with our much smaller population were spending over a million dollars a day in the maintenance of troops abroad, the United States was producing munitions, was producing ships, was selling vast quantities of supplies to Britain and the allies, and receiving in return vast sums of money. When the war was over we found ourselves with our public debt increased to the extent of two billions of dollars, $1,650,000,000 of which had been added as the capital cost of the war, every single dollar of which was borrowed money and not a cent paid back. There is a circumstance which I think hon. members will do well to keep in mind—the whole capital cost of the war, so far as Canada is concerned, was met by hon. gentlemen opposite out of borrowed money. To-day we have to pay interest on that vast sum; we have to find means of paying off that principal. Yet my right hon. friend criticises us because public expenditures are so large.

As a matter of fact, two-thirds of the public expenditure is uncontrollable; it cannot be altered one way or the other, no matter what the government may do. As against that increase in our public debt, the United States has been claiming payments from Britain, for supplies furnished during the war, an amount which, if I mistake not, is twice as large as our entire public debt after the war—something like four billions of dollars which will be paid in full over a series of years. When the conditions in Canada are compared with those in the United States, the true patriot is the man who will emphasize to the Canadian people the condition in which this country finds itself at present and the reasons why it has come into that position relative to the great country to the south.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Prime Minister permit a question? Will he not admit that the American debt per capita three years ago was as great as the debt of Canada per capita? Does not that answer his whole contention?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the figures of the debt per capita, but I have given a statement, which I think my right hon. friend will not question, as to the different positions occupied by the two countries at the time of which I speak. Now, may I continue what I was saying bearing upon immigration?

At the time that large numbers of men were coming back to Canada for demobilization here; at the time that we were suffering from a surplus of labour seeking occupation, there was a very considerable boom in the United States. Men in the United States who had made vast sums of money during the war were spending money freely. Then the United States decided—and this helps to explain the immigration that flowed from Canada to that country—to introduce what is known as its quota law, designed to prohibit more than a certain number of persons from coming into the United States from Europe. They passed a law which provided that after a certain percentage of the existing number of peoples from the European countries had come in, no other persons from those countries were to enter the United States in that year. But that law did not apply to Canada, and the result was that with the boom prevailing in the United States at the time, with the vacuum created in the labour market of that country by the quota law, a large number of mechanics and others from Canada crossed the border, as they are accustomed to do and have been doing from the days of confederation down to the present, to seek temporary employment and to get what benefit they could from the building boom to the south.

There is one further point to be remembered in connection with the crossing over to the United States, and it is this: no man can leave Canada to take up employment in the United States under contract expressed or implied; otherwise he is violating the Alien Labour Act of the United States and is liable to be returned. The only way a man can get into the United States and hope to enjoy the benefit of an opening in a trade or industry, of which he may have learned from a friend or in connection with which he may have received some promise of employment, is to declare that he is an immigrant. The result is that thousands of men who had no thought whatever of becoming permanent citizens of the United States, men who were out of employment temporarily in Canada and desired to take advantage of the boom in the United States, declared that they were immigrants. When the particular work that they went to the United States to engage in was over—it may have lasted two, three, up to four, five or six months—they came back to Canada.

Unfortunately our immigration department kept no statistics of those who came back; there are therefore no statistics to set over against the figures recording the numbers who crossed over to the United States temporarily. We did start keeping a record in the month of March last, of those coming into Canada from the United States last year, who had been in the United States at least six months and under three years, and the figures show that they have been returning at the rate of 4,000 a month. Some 50,000 odd have come back within the last year who had been in the United States over six months and under three years. Our records do not show those who have been over there under a period of six months, but as every hon. gentleman who has a constituency alongside the American frontier, or even some distance remote from the frontier, knows, persons are crossing over to the United States at all seasons of the year—a certain number of men and some with their families, who go over there for a short time, very frequently, less than six months, and come back. All these people are shown by the United States authorities as immigrants. No record is kept in our department of their return to this country. Now may I be permitted to ask, is it not the part of patriotism, when people are struggling, as our people are, to improve conditions, to let the country know the truth, to put plainly before the people a circumstance as vital as that?

Let me go one step further. I asked my right hon. friend where he got his figures, and he told us he wrote to Washington for them; he got them from the Immigration Department at Washington. But did my right hon. friend write to the Census Department at Washington to get their record of native-born Canadians registered in the United States? This is what I wish to point out to him: During the time he was a member of a government, from 1910 to 1920, according to the records of the Immigration Department of the United States, the department to which he wrote for his information, between 700,000 and 800,000 Canadians, 742,000 to be exact, went over to the United States as immigrants from Canada. That is according to the statistics of the Immigration Department of the United States, one-tenth of the population of this country emigrated to the United States, during a part of the time my right hon. friend and his party were in office. Now, if I wanted to condemn him and his government, if I wanted to misrepresent the facts so as to confuse the public mind as he has been doing, I would begin to make capital of that sort of thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister could not, because they are going at twice that rate now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend had better not make the situation worse for himself. Let me finish what I was going to say. Those are the figures of the United States Immigration Department, but the United States Census Department also keeps a record of the persons who remained in the United States, and that record shows that in the year 1920 there were 78,000 fewer native-born Canadians in the United States than were recorded in the census ten years preceding. Now, where is my right hon. friend and his figures? I contend, Mr. Speaker, that exactly the same kind of thing is true to-day. I contend further that no man is a patriot who will quote the figures of the Immigration Department of the United States in the way in which my right hon. friend assumed to quote this afternoon, without at the same time making the kind of explanation which I have made here. He told the House, and it is to go out to the country, that 600,000 Canadians have gone to the United States as immigrants during the three years this government has been in office; that is one-fifteenth of the total population of Canada. Now, who believes that? Who can possibly believe it? Yet my right hon. friend stands there as the leader of a party, and for the sake of trying to make propaganda to put into his patent medicine tariff scheme, he tells the people of this country that 600,000 Canadians have gone over to the United States as emigrants, and to prove it he quotes the figures he got from the United States Immigration Department. I would ask my right hon. friend, before he repeats those figures, to communicate with the Census Department of the United States and get public records that are authentic, that represent the true state of the case.

A word, now, in regard to manufactures. My right hon. friend went through the previous Speech from the Throne and found there some mention of increasing employment, increasing transportation and trade, increasing savings, and the like, all of which statements were absolutely true. Then he takes the Speech this year, and because mention of the same facts was not made in the same words, he would have the people believe that, relatively to the United States, this country has been going behind. As I recall his words—and he will correct me if I am wrong—he said that while conditions had been improving in the United States they had been growing worse in this country. He referred first to a depressed condition that existed for a time some years ago in the United States, then he came up to the present and said that while matters had been going behind in this country, they had not been going behind in the United States in the same way, and he gave certain figures of employment and living costs in an effort to substantiate what he was saying. I thought that possibly he might be repeating this afternoon some of the things he has been saying during the recess, so I went to some pains to get exact information to give to the House in regard to these matters, and if the House will permit me I shall quote a few reliable statistics which show the relative positions of the two countries during this past year, to have been the very reverse of my right hon. friend would have the House believe, namely that conditions were very much worse in Canada during 1924 than they were in the United States.

May I first of all remind him and other hon. members of the visits which we have had in this country within the last few months of two or three distinguished Americans, men of international reputation in the world of finance, statistics and economics, men who are accustomed to use care and caution in what they say about the conditions of any country of which they speak? May I recall that without exception these gentlemen have referred to the relatively prosperous condition of Canada as compared with conditions in the United States? There is no name better known in Wall street than that of Mr. Otto Kahn. He delivered a notable address in this city only a few weeks ago in which he told Canadians that to all intents and purposes, so far as he could see, no country had ahead of it quite the future that Canada has at the present time.

Mr. BOYS: That is a different thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Different, in what particular?

Mr. BOYS: The difference between prospects and realities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend wants realities I will give him a quotation from another authority. He may have heard or read of some of the speeches made by Mr. Roger Babson, who, as I think hon. members know, is an outstanding statistician in the United States. Here is what Mr. Babson had to say, speaking at Toronto on the 25th of September last:

> The situation to-day in Canada is fundamentally much better than in the States, I say that as a statistician not as a publicity man, and my reasons are that in the States we have had this temporary inflation of six month or a year, which suspended the period of re-adjustment.
> Conditions in many of the United States cities are worse than in Canada. The boom of 1923 is over and the reaction is taking place; whereas in Canada the re-adjustment of the past twelve months is now behind us instead of ahead of us. Now business has dropped off in the States, factories are working to fifty or sixty per ecnt capacity.

Is that reliable enough for my right hon. friend?

Mr. MEIGHEN: When was that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was in September, 1924.

> In the States they are working fifty or sixty per cent capacity, the credit situation is very poor and your workmen who went over the line a couple of years ago are very glad to come back here because conditions at the moment are better in Canada than in the United States. I believe you will return to normal conditions and a period of prosperity sooner here in Canada than we will in the United States.

Now, there is reliability, patriotism if you wish.

Mr. BOYS: I hope he is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can assure my hon. friend that Mr. Babson makes no statement unless he is convinced that it is right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You can quote him on anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING. I have given a quotation from the speech of a distinguished statistician of the United States who, coming to Canada, makes the statement to which I have just referred. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition says that Mr Babson can be quoted in different ways. Very well, I will take the official statistics of the United States and quote to my right hon. friend from that source. I think that probably the bulletins of the Federal Reserve Board are as authoritative and conservative in their statements as any that are published in the United States. I have the latest number, the January issue, of the Federal Reserve Bulletin here which gives industrial and commercial data relating to November, 1924. It says that in that month in the United States there was decreased production in the basic industries, decreased railroad car loadings, and decreased wholesale trade. For the six months ending November the production in basic industries for 1924 is 21 per cent lower than in 1923, and employment is still 12 per cent lower than the year before. Wholesale trade for November, 1924, is only 84 per cent of that of the same month in 1919. For the six months ending November, railroad car loadings in 1924 are 5 per cent smaller than for 1923. Factory employment for November is the same as for October—9 per cent below the 1919 and 1923 level and 20 per cent below the high peak of June 1920.

I have here a statistical table which appears in the Federal Reserve Bulletin on the production in basic industries which gives the whole industrial tale in a nut shell, by comparative months, 1924 as against 1923. I myself have added a column giving the 1924 shrinkage. Here we have the percentages for the five months' period, June to the end of October. I would pause to remind the House that the production of the basic industries determines in a very exact and direct way the production of all the secondary industries. If the basic industries have fallen off in production, the secondary industries will also fall off considerably. Now, what do the figures from this source show as to the conditions in the United States from June to the end of October last year? Let me give the figures:

United States Basic Industries, 1923 and 1924

Month	1923	1924	1924 shrinkage
June	122	94	28
July	121	94	27
August	120	94	26
September	114	103	11
October	118	109	9
5 months average	119	98	21

The table shows that in the five months ending October, 1924, the basic production in all lines of industry in the United States was 21 per cent less than during the same period of the year before. Could there be more convincing evidence of the very considerable depression existing in the United States last year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has my right hon. friend figures comparing conditions in the United States during the past year with conditions in that country three years before? It is that that I referred to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have some figures here covering that period, but I thought my right hon. friend had made a comparison between the years 1923 and 1924, these being the years mentioned in the Speeches from the Throne to which his references related. It was his argument along that line that I was endeavouring to answer.

Now to present further particulars. My right hon. friend referred to the iron and steel industry in Canada, and spoke about the falling off in the production of those commodities, leaving the impression that Canada alone in this particular had suffered. Let us examine first the situation with respect to iron and steel in the United States. The United States Federal Reserve Bulletin for December, 1924, at page 953, sets out in parallel columns the iron and steel activity for October, 1924, compared with October, 1923. Against these items I have added the percentages of 1924 shrinkage. Here is the table:

United States Iron and Steel Production

Commodity movements	October 1924	October 1923	1924 decrease per cent
Iron-ore shipments at Lake Superior (long tons)..	5,597,000	8,100,000	44½
Pig-iron production (long tons)..	2,477,000	3,149,000	27
Steel-ingot production (tons)..	3,111,000	3,577,000	15
Unfilled orders, United States Steel Corporation (long tons)..	3,525,000	4,673,000	32½

These figures give as true an index of the depression in a basic industry of the United States as it would be possible to find.

On page 951 of the Federal Reserve Bulletin it is shown that pig-iron for September, 1924, averaged 33 per cent below the 1923 level for the same month. Steel ingot production was 17 per cent lower. The total iron and steel production for September and October, 1924, was only 77 per cent of the production for the same months in 1919, five years before. Only 45 per cent of the total number of blast furnaces in the country were in active operation at the end of October, 1924. I submit that if my right hon. friend takes the trouble to compare the statistics in this country with the statistics which I have just quoted from authentic sources in the United States he will find that, having regard to the tremendous influence which conditions in the country to the south have upon conditions in Canada, our showing is considerably the better.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the House took recess at six o'clock I was speaking in reference to a remark made by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) to the effect—and I have the exact words this time—that while the United States was recovering, and steadily recovering, we in Canada were going back, and going back steadily; and he stated with reference to some of the figures which he had quoted that he would like to have the corresponding figures produced for the United States. Fortunately I have with me the figures that I think correspond, so far as the United States is concerned, and I purpose this evening continuing to give further statistics illustrative of the truth of the remark which I was making, namely, that while there has been during the past year a slight falling off, in some directions in the industry and trade of this country, it has not been anything comparable to the falling off that has taken place in the United States; indeed if an opportunity were given to study the matter thoroughly, one would very probably find that in very considerable measure the slight falling off in employment in this country was directly attributable to the much larger slump in industry and trade which had taken place across the border during the same period of time. I pointed out that in gauging the industrial situation economists have always had particular regard to the basic industries, and that the iron and steel industry is usually regarded as the most significant. The figures that I gave the House indicated I think conclusively, how very considerable had been the falling off in the production of the basic industries of the United States during the period I mentioned, and in particular the falling off in the production of iron and steel. I should like to supplement the figures as to iron and steel by those of a table which is to be found in the Iron Age, a journal that relates more particularly to the iron and steel trade, and which contains official data on that industry. I should like, if the House will permit, to place these figures on the record as they appear in this table. These figures give the total production of pig iron for the years 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923 and 1924. They show that during the year 1924 the total production of iron and steel in the United States was 31 million tons; the total production of the preceding year, 1923, was 40 million tons. In other words, in the year just concluded there was less production by 29 per cent of pig iron in the United States than in the year previous, and there was less production by 19 per cent than in the year 1920. The table is as follows:

Production of pig iron in the United States, 1920-24, as shown by the Iron Age. Official data of the iron and steel trade.

Mr. WHITE: What is the date of the publication?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is for the month of January.

Mr. WHITE: But the date of the Iron Age in which that table appears?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Last month, but it relates to the last calendar year.

Mr. WHITE: The paper is published every week, and I should like to have the date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will have to get the date for my hon. friend. It is one of the first numbers of this year. So far as Canada is concerned there has been a falling off in the iron and steel industry this last year as compared with the previous year, but the total production of iron and steel in 1924 was considerably greater than in 1922. The falling off has been, perhaps, a little greater than in the United States, but that was to be expected having regard to the relative size of the steel interests and to the relative demand in the two countries for iron and steel products.

My right hon. friend sought to convey the impression that the employment situation was very much worse in Canada last year than in the United States. I have here some figures taken from the Federal Reserve Bulletin for the month of December which reduces to a scientific table, on the basis of an index number, the conditions of employment in the United States for the months of June, July, August, September, and October. I take these particular months just because they happen to have appeared in this number, and were the latest I was able to find at the time at which I was investigating this subject.

Month	Employment Index No. in the United States		Decrease
June	103	90	13
July	101	87	14
August	101	87	14
September	101	90	11
October	101	91	10
Average for 5 months	101	89	12

If we take the average for the five months, there was a decrease from the average of 101 as the employment index number for 1923, to 89 as the index number for 1924, or an average reduction of 12.

I have had corresponding figures for Canada prepared by the Bureau of Statistics with respect to the five months ending October, 1924. Instead of showing an average decrease in employment for the five months, of 12 as in the case of the index numbers in the United States, they show an average decrease over the same period in this country of 6.6 for the five months ending October, 1924, as compared with the corresponding months of 1923. I will give the figures by months:

	Employment Index No. in Canada		Decrease in Canada	Decrease in United States
Month	1923	1924
June	93.5	88.4	5.1	13
July	93.6	87.7	5.9	14
August	93.5	86.2	7.3	14
September	93.0	84.5	8.5	11
October	91.8	85.7	6.1	10
	93.1	86.5	6.6	12

If we take the average for the five months in Canada, the average during 1923 was 93.1 and during 1924, 86.5, or an average decrease of 6.6 as against an average decrease of 12 in the United States covering the same period.

In other words the decrease in employment in the United States for the period mentioned was nearly twice as great as in Canada.

Regarding employment, the Federal Reserve Bulletin for December, 1924, at page 919, has the following editorial comment:

As compared with previous years the general index of employment is 10 per cent lower than it was a year ago, and about on a level with that of September, 1922. The iron and steel and automobile indices are about one-sixth less than in October, 1923, but correspond rather closely to the level of two years ago. Textiles, owing largely to the small volume of employment in the clothing industry, appear to be still below all months since 1921. No group index is as high as in October of last year, 1923. . . . Earnings, however, were 13.3 per cent less than a year ago, and as in the case of employment were about on the same level as two years ago. . . . Wage rate decreases averaged 9.5 per cent and affected 20,000 employees.

These are accurate statistics with respect to the depression in the United States, and I venture to say that anyone who compares them with corresponding data in this country will find that conditions in the United States were relatively very much worse than they have been here.

I have in my hand a statistical table which, with the permission of the House, I should like to have inserted in Hansard without being obliged to read the details. It gives by a series of index numbers the position of employment in the manufacturing and transportation industries of both Canada and the United States for nearly every month during 1923 and 1924.

Index numbers of employment in manufacturing and steam railway operation in Canada and the United States, based upon the average index numbers reported by employers in 1923 as 100.

The significant feature of this table is that it shows that employment conditions are more rapidly approaching normal in Canada than in the United States. The monthly statistics of employment in Canada, are reported by employers in all industries other than agriculture to the general statistics branch of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. In the United States monthly statistics of factory employment are compiled by the Bureau of Labour Statistics, while those of employment on railways are compiled by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The results are published in the Survey of Current Business, which is published by the United States Department of Commerce. The United States figures for railway employment used in the tables which I have quoted will be found on page 152, those relating to factory employment on page 156 of the November 1924 issue of this publication. In order to facilitate comparison the average employment for 1923 has been taken as 100 in each of the series considered. As I have said, it will be seen from the tables that the latest figures show that both manufacturing and transportation more nearly approach the 1923 level in Canada than in the United States. As regards manufacturing, the latest comparative figures for October are 96 in Canada as against 88 in the United States, whilst as regards transportation, the September figure for Canada was 99.3 as compared with 95.8 in the United States.

My right hon. friend spoke this afternoon of commercial failures and referred to Dun's report. I should like to direct the attention of the House to the difference in the impression left by the remarks of my right hon. friend this afternoon and that created by remarks which he has been making since last session and which have been retold throughout the country from month to month, up to the present time. If I am not mistaken, when he addressed a meeting in Stratford and meetings in several other cities and towns during the summer, the right hon. leader of the opposition created in the public mind the impression that the number of factories that closed was something like 2,000. Now, I do not wish to do my right hon. friend an injustice. If that was not the impression which he sought to convey I would be glad to have him say so. I venture to say there is not an hon. member who did not gather from his statement, when he said that two thousand factories had been closed that he meant factories, and that he was trying to lead the public to believe that such had been the disastrous effect of the changes made in the tariff at the last session of this parliament. When this afternoon he was questioned as to the list of factories closed which he said he had—for he told the public that he had a list, but did not want to give away the names of the manufacturing concerns that had failed—he quoted as his authority Dun's reports on commercial failures, reports which include under the heading of failures all kinds of commercial, manufacturing and other failures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not quote any except manufacturing failures as given by Dun's reports.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my right hon. friend has pointed that out, because it shows he has very much in his mind what I am coming to. He says he only quoted manufacturing failures from Dun's reports. But he never told anyone till he was questioned in the House this afternoon that it was Dun's reports of failures he was quoting. He spoke of two thousand factories having been closed. Now, every hon. member knows that when Dun's report refers to manufacturers' failures it does not refer to factories in the sense in which that term is generally understood by the people of this country. There are many little concerns employing four, five or half a dozen hands that start in business with borrowed capital and do not succeed, and they are put down in Dun's report as manufacturers' failures. Those are the concerns my right hon. friend included in his two thousand factories that had closed their doors. But my right hon. friend did not bring out another very important and salient point in connection with the figures he was quoting; he said that many of these failures were the result of changes in the tariff which were made last session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the right hon. gentleman just quote what I said? My statement was a definite one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am trying to be fair to my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend might as well keep in mind that the impression created by words used is the important consideration. He may twist and squirm and manoeuvre, in conjuring with figures to make an impression, but if that impression is false or distorted he is giving a false idea of the situation, no matter what language or figures he uses.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Quote my words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The words which my right hon. friend used throughout this country created the impression that some two thousand factories had been closed as a result of the tariff changes which were brought about through the introduction of the budget of last spring.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Quote my words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will quote some of my right hon. friend's words. I did not bring all his words here; he is quite well aware of that fact.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If any.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can probably quote one or two for my right hon. friend. I have quotations here from a speech made by him at Stratford on August 20 of last year. He is reported as follows in the London Advertiser of August 21, 1924—possibly he will say he did not use the words:

King closed factories, put workmen on the streets by thousands, reduced output of industries, but has not reduced the price of a single implement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are those headings by the London Advertiser?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, those are quotations from my right hon. friend's speech.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Take another paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will take the Hansard reports of 1924, page 2114, of a speech made on May 15 by my right hon. friend in this chamber in the presence of many hon. members who are here to-day. What did he say then?

There is alarm, there is dismay; there is a stoppage of expansion; there is depression. . . . We are circumscribing the area of employment every day. The inevitable consequences are upon us. Capital alarmed, business harassed, production dislocated, agriculture unassisted, labour contracted, tens of thousands of our children exiled, the debt heavier, taxation multiplied, the budget juggled, these are the reapings of thirty months of this government, the cruel cost to date of its brief and inglorious career.

Then he went out into the country and at Stratford employed the language I have just quoted. The following appeared in the Toronto Globe of April 7, 1924, in the report of a speech delivered at Windsor just before the budget was introduced in this House:

Our factories are closing down, our industries are crippled, our people are leaving the land of their birth. How long will Canada allow this condition of affairs to continue?

In the London Free Press of August 22, the following report appears of a speech delivered by the leader of the opposition at Eugenia Falls on the preceding day.

The past has demonstrated that each tariff reduction means the closing of new industries, and the closing of industries means that thousands of other workmen must go to the United States to make a living.

The point I wish to make and which I think my right hon. friend will recognize as pertinent is that he has been using the terms "factories" and "industries" very freely all over the country, but while doing so he has carefully kept from the people the information that the figures which he said he had in his possession, which he stated were authoritative were quotations from Dun's reports of failures, and that he was speaking without regard to the way in which those particular statistics are made up. My right hon. friend, as I have said, was trying to create the impression that those failures were the result of the tariff changes made last session. That was the point of his attack. It was bad enough to describe as factories the many small establishments which had gone into bankruptcy according to Dun's reports, but it was infinitely worse for him to try to make it appear that the legislation introduced by the government last session changing the tariff had brought about such a condition. Moreover, and this is much to the point, my right hon. friend never mentioned that the number of failures, according to the report that he himself was quoting, was fewer last year than the year before, and fewer the year before than in the year again preceding.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are getting fewer to-day, so there are fewer of them to fail.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me add, he also endeavoured to create the impression that the manufacturing failures in this country were much greater relatively than the failures in the United States. When trying to create that impression he did not read this paragraph from Dun's report:

Unlike the statistics for the United States, the Canadian returns for last year show reductions in both number and liabilities of commercial failures. The numerical decrease reached nearly 24 per cent, but the falling off in indebtedness was only 2 per cent. Numbering 2,474 and involving $64,000,000, the Canadian defaults compare with 3,247 for $65,000,000 in 1923, and with 3,695 for $78,000,000 in 1922. There were fewer defaults last year than in 1923 in manufacturing, trading and other commercial occupations. Geographical analysis of the Canadian statement shows that a smaller number of failures occurred in all of the ten provinces included in the record.

So, taking the total failures, not closing of factories, in this country, commercial, manufacturing, trading and others, as reported by Dun's—the small and large failures generally throughout the country in 1922—a year for which this government cannot be held responsible because the failures then were pretty largely the result of what had taken place in the years preceding—there was a total of 3,695 contrasted with 3,247 in 1923, contrasted again with 2,474 in 1924. Of the so-called manufacturing failures that my right hon. friend speaks of, according to Dun's there were 857 with liabilities of $39,000,000 in 1922—just a year after he had gone out of office and before this government had any chance to get under way with its policies. In the year following there were 792 failures with liabilities totalling $31,000,000; and this last year there were only 625 failures with total liabilities of $36,000,000. This shows conclusively, if statistics mean anything, that conditions so far as manufacturing is concerned have been steadily getting better since this government came into office, and according to Dun's report, which my right hon. friend brought into the House this afternoon to quote from as authoritative, were never better than they were last year.

R. G. Dun & Co. has a report on failures in the United States, and we find from it in contrast to conditions in Canada, that instead of getting better from the point of view of numbers of failures, conditions in the United States in the last two or three years have been growing worse. Here is the statement in the Dun report in that connection.

The third quarter of 1924 breaks the record with the heaviest volume of failure liabilities for that quarter in the history of the United States.

That helps to illustrate the condition of manufacturing in the United States in the last quarter of last year.

The month of March, 1924, holds the country's record for the largest volume of failure liabilities for any single month. The 1924 total of commercial failures was 20,615 in number and $514,225,000 in volume of failure liabilities. This is an increase over 1923 of not quite 2,000 in number and $4,000,000 in volume. Although 1921 and 1922 slightly exceed 1923-24 in number and volume of failures, the year 1924 easily holds the banner over the twenty-five years preceding. It exceeds by a fairly wide margin the combined totals for the years 1919 and 1920, and very largely exceeds the total of the panic of 1908.

This is Dun's record of failures in manufacturing, commercial and trading establishments in the United States. Now, may I add to that the record of bank failures in the United States? We have had one or two recent bank failures in Canada, but I do not recall any of record this last year. Here is the record so far as the United States is concerned:

There were 613 banking failures in 1924, the largest number of any year during the present generation. Liabilities of the 613 banking failures were $202,000,000, which has been exceeded only twice in twenty-five years. The table found on page 10 of Dun's Review for January 10, gives the number and liabilities of bank suspensions in the United States for the twenty-two-years, 1903 to 1924 inclusive.

I shall not ask permission to put that entire chart on the record, but I have quoted from it sufficient figures to show the contrast with Canada.

I have pointed out that Canadian failures have been growing less and less in each of the years 1922, 1923 and 1924; in the United States it has been the other way. In 1922 the bank failures numbered 277 with total liabilities of $77,000,000. In 1923 they numbered 578, with total liabilities of $203,000,000; in 1924 they numbered 613 with $202,000,000 of liabilities. I think, Mr. Speaker, that shows pretty conclusively, quoting from the source from which my hon. friend says he has been deriving his information, that so far as conditions in the two countries are concerned we in Canada are infinitely better off industrially and financially than our friends across the border.

The only remark my right hon. friend made this afternoon that was at all appreciative was one which he could hardly avoid making, namely, that made respecting the balance of trade in Canada having exceeded something over $260,000,000. That was one feature in the Speech from the Throne which my right hon. friend commented on favourably. He said, we ought to have something like a favourable balance of $300,000,000 odd in order to be on a sound basis. Well, I wonder where the country was when he was in power, because the balance of trade was altogether unfavourable at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In 1921?

Mr. MEIGHEN: One year of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, one year—the year that closed when my right hon. friend went out of office, the year he had the handling of the country's affairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the other years?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the only year that my right hon. friend was at the head of affairs. From that time to the present, ever since this government, as he calls it, has been in power, the favourable balance of trade has been increasing by leaps and bounds. Not only has that favourable balance been increasing year by year, but, in comparison with the United States again—my right hon. friend has been comparing the conditions in the two countries—the balance of trade has been favourably increasing in Canada while in the United States instead of increasing, it has been steadily decreasing since 1921, excepting during 1924, when, due to some large loans made by the United States to European countries in 1924, there was a tendency toward an increase in her export balance passing out in goods. I would like to give the House the figures to verify what I have just been saying in that regard:

United States Foreign Trade—Calendar Years

	Imports	Exports	Favourable Balance of Trade
1921..	$2,509,147,000	$4,485,131,000	$1,975,984,000
1922	3,112,747,000	3,831,777,000	719,030,000
1924 (11 mos.). .	3,277,023,000	4,145,324,000	868,301,000

So far as Canada's position is concerned, I regret that I have not the figures here, but they will be found in the financial records and they will show that in the year my right hon. friend was in office there was an unfavourable balance of trade. The next year there was a favourable balance, in the year following a very considerable increase, and last year the favourable balance was so much in excess of that of former years that the total ran to over $262,000,000.

The point that I wish to bring out is this: In the latest period the United States favourable trade balance represented about $8 per head of their population, while the Canadian balance represented about $28 per capita of our population. That, I think, answers pretty conclusively the relative position of the two countries judged at all events by the gauge which protectionist propagandists seem to regard as the one by which the prosperity of a country should most accurately be measured.

My right hon. friend said: Yes, exports are all very well provided they are the right kind of exports. He did not go very fully into what he meant by that. He seemed to endeavour to create the impression that in some way or other it was not a good thing to export any raw material, that the resources of our country were distinctly limited, and for that reason we should be careful about exporting any raw material. When one considers that half of our arable land has not yet been occupied that its estimated total is 300,000,000 acres, not the half of which has been taken up and of the half taken up that not one half of that has yet been improved, I do not think we need have very much alarm about what we do in the way of exporting raw materials that may be raised as the products of the soil.

So far as the timber of this country is concerned it is difficult to form an estimate of its total amount. It is estimated by the Bureau of Statistics that the total forest area of Canada comprises 1,200,000 square miles of which about 40 per cent is covered with mer-chantable timber. We have reserves in this country which are unsurpassed by any country in the world, except possibly Russia and Siberia, and with our modern methods of forest conservation, reforesting and the like, I do not think Canada will be running any very great risk in parting with some of her raw material in that particular. Some of it we undoubtedly shall have to part with in order to get the country properly settled, because many forests will have to be cleared before the lands on which they stand will admit of colonization and of settlement.

As to our minerals, there is not a man living that knows the mineral wealth of this country. All we do know is that Canada is a highly mineralized country; has tremendous areas indubitably highly mineralized and the possibilities of which have been no more than scratched. The amount of our mineral wealth surpasses possibly the imagination of the soundest statistician. Our coal reserves in the western field alone represent a very considerable fraction of the total coal deposits of the world. It is estimated that 16 per cent of the world's known reserve of bituminous, sub-bituminous and lignite coal is to be found in the four western provinces of Canada.

So far as gold is concerned, at the present moment we have one mine which alone is at present turning out the second largest gold production in the whole world, and is the centre of a great mining district which at the beginning of this century was unknown.

If we stop to consider mineral exports, we need not fear that we are parting with the nation's inheritance. Our development is pretty sure to be along lines that will help us to discover untold fields of wealth hitherto unknown.

Coming to the fisheries, I think we are all pretty well aware, that no fisheries in the world surpass in size, variety and excellence of product those surrounding our shores, those in our Great Lakes and in our rivers; here again I do not think Canada is going to suffer materially through parting with a certain amount of the raw material arising out of a development of her natural resources, not at least, until her population becomes vastly larger than it is at the present time.

My right hon. friend's point, as I gather from his remarks not merely to-day but on previous occasions, is that it is a very bad thing to be parting with natural resources in the form of raw material though all right to do so in the form of manufactures. That is the point I think he was seeking to make, but what he appears to have missed seeing and what is very pertinent to his view is that, since this government, as he calls it, has been in power, not only have exports of our raw materials been increasing, but the exports of partially manufactured goods have also been increasing, and also the export of fully or chiefly manufactured goods. More than that, the increase in manufactured goods has been relatively considerably greater than the increase in raw materials.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the Prime Minister selecting one year and always comparing with that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, the Prime Minister is not like the leader of the opposition; he does not pick and choose just to serve his purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What year is he comparing with?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is taking all the years one after the other.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then what he states is not correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give my right hon. friend the figures. I will read them to the House:

Exports of Canadian Produce by Degree of Manufacture for Fiscal Years Ended 1914, 1921-24

I should draw the attention of the House to the fact that the year 1921 was still a part of the period in which the volume of our exports had been considerably increased due to the war and the effects of the war, and therefore it was natural to expect there would be a larger export in that particular year.

Hon. gentlemen will notice this significant fact, that the raw materials we exported this last year represented 43.39 per cent of the total exports, as against 44.69 per cent in 1923, 44.49 in 1922, 44.07 in 1921, and 63.16 in 1914. In other words, since this government has been in office there has been a material reduction in the amount of raw material exported as compared with the total exportation of the country.

Of partially manufactured goods we exported in 1914, 10.12 per cent of the whole; in 1921, 16.20 per cent of the whole; in 1922, 14.49 per cent of the whole; in 1923, 16.21 per cent of the whole, and in 1924, 16.83 per cent of the whole.

Let us now look at the figures for goods fully or chiefly manufactured, and I should like my right hon. friend to get their significance. In 1921, 39.73 per cent of the total export; in 1922, 41.02 per cent of the whole; in 1923, 39.10 per cent; and in 1924, 39.78 per cent; whereas the percentages of export of raw materials for the same years stood at 44.07, 44.49, 44.69 and this last year, the year of the budget of 1924, 43.39.

I should like to quote further figures of importation and exportation by way of showing that the excess in our imports of manufactured goods over our exports of manufactured goods has been steadily diminishing for the last three fiscal years, so that we now export nearly as great a value of fully or chiefly manufactured goods as we import. If the House will permit me, for the sake of accuracy, I shall read a statement which I have carefully prepared from the figures in my possession. It will be seen from this statement that the Canadian manufacturer who it is alleged has had a hard time in the last two or three years, has nevertheless been able to export his products in increasing quantities to other countries where he receives no protection.

The exports of Canada are classified into raw materials, partly manufactured goods, fully or chiefly manufactured goods.

Now, our exports of fully or chiefly manufactured goods, which amounted to $303,000,000 in the fiscal year ended 1922, before any tariff changes were made, rose to $364,000,000 in the fiscal year ended 1923 and to $415,000,000 in the fiscal year ended 1924—an increase of about 37 per cent in two years. Our exports of partly manufactured goods, which stood at $107,000,000 in the fiscal year 1922, advanced to $150,000,000 in the fiscal year 1923, and to $175,000,000 in the fiscal year 1924, an increase of 64 per cent in two years.

The position of our Canadian manufacturing industries, taken by and large, may be estimated in another way. By considering the relative values of manufactured goods imported and exported, we can form some idea as to the relation from year to year of our national production of manufactured goods to our national consumption of such commodities. Perhaps it is natural that so young a country as Canada should import a greater value of manufactured goods than it exports. The table I have compiled enables us to set off against each other the total imports and exports of manufactured commodities for various years, so as to show how far the nation's production of manufactured goods covers its consumption.

From this table it appears that the excess in the value of manufactured goods imported over manufactured goods exported, which was $264,786,191 in the fiscal year ended 1921, was only $120,485,841 in 1922, $59,377,908 in 1923 and $47,514,339 in 1924. Thus since the present government assumed power, the production of manufactured goods in Canada has been becoming more and more nearly equivalent to its consumption of such articles. If our manufacturers are not as prosperous as we should like to see them, it is mainly because of the restriction of the purchasing power of their chief customers, the farmers of Canada; and with the now visible return of agricultural prosperity the manufacturers will undoubtedly at no distant date reap their share of the gain arising out of the re-established purchasing power of the agricultural community.

Imports and Exports of all Manufactured Goods, 1921-24

Fiscal year ended	Imported	Exported	Excess of imports over exports
Mar. 31, 1921..	929,874,130	665,087,939	264,786,191
Mar. 31, 1922..	531,355,579	410,869,738	120,485,841
Mar. 31, 1923..	574,551,323	515,173,415	59,377,908
Mar. 31, 1924..	639,343,645	591,829,306	47,514,339

From this table it will be seen that since the present government assumed power the production of manufactured goods in Canada has been becoming more and more nearly equivalent to its consumption in such articles.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about paper and pulp.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The diminution to which I refer is due to improved conditions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My right hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The next topic to which my right hon. friend devoted his attention was the cost of living. There he seemed to feel it was necessary and desirable to create the impression that the cost of living was greater to-day than in previous years; and he produced a chart, which he said he got from the Department of Labour, I think it was, showing the change in the cost of living by months from 1913 to 1923. It was extended, I believe to include 1924. My right hon. friend will tell me perhaps, if I have not got hold of the same chart. At any rate it was issued in a special report by the Department of Labour in January of this year. My right hon. friend stated that that chart showed a rise in the cost of living, during the past year. Perhaps my right hon. friend will loan me his chart, the one of which he himself made use.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now that I hold in my hand my right hon. friend's chart he certainly will not be able to dispute what I am about to say. If he will look at this chart, he will see that in the year 1924 for the first time since the year 1918, the cost of living mark dropped below the 150 line. Will my right hon. friend dispute that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was just before the policy of the right hon. gentleman of last spring came into effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was not just before. My right hon. friend is seriously astray in making that statement, it was just after as a matter of fact. The point I should like hon. members to observe is the method my right hon. friend adopts of quoting from public documents so as to serve his particular purpose at the moment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The chart shows the figures just as I stated. The Prime Minister can give the whole of the chart if he wishes it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want my right hon. friend to tell the whole truth. If he had given the whole truth he would have made the statement to which I am now drawing the attention of the House, namely, that last year for the first time in seven years the cost of living living line dropped below 150, the average prices in 1913 being taken as equivalent to 100. There is no denying that fact. I will return the chart to my right hon. friend and he may verify my statement.

May I draw the attention of the House to this further fact: Everyone knows that the cost of living varies according to the seasons. One does not contrast the cost of living in the month of December with the cost in the months of June and July. In the first named month there is coal to be bought and additional clothing to be worn and additional food to be consumed. My right hon. friend, if he had been fair to the House and to the country would have taken from this report by corresponding months in the respective years figures dealing with the changes in the cost of living from 1913 to 1924. And what would he have found? He would have found that while for the month of December in the year 1913 the index number was 100 in December 1921 the index number was 156. In December 1922 it was 153. In December 1923 it was 154; and in December 1924 it was 152, the lowest it has been since the days when my right hon. friend was in office. It was 156 in December 1921 at the time this government came into office and his government went out. To-day it stands, according to the records of the Department of Labour, or rather it stood in December 1924 as 152, showing clearly that the cost of living has been going down steadily in this country during the intervening period.

Before I leave the subject I shall touch upon the index figures of the United States. If my right hon. friend were to carry his comparisons to that country, he would find that the figures show a relatively higher cost of living in the United States than we have in Canada, that is contrasting the principal cities in the adjoining republic with the principal cities in Canada, thus verifying further what I said a moment ago about the relatively better conditions in Canada. My right hon. friend quoted from some report, which he said was one of the government reports and therefore should be correct, a list of prices on which he based his remarks respecting the cost of living. Because these prices showed an increase on the whole, he said the cost of living had gone up. There are two points which I would like to make in this connection. First, the cost of living estimate is not based on wholesale prices. It is based on retail prices. The second point is, it is based on the grouping of commodities in accordance with average quantities which the average family consumes. In making up cost of living schedules you do not put down to the consumption of the family equal amounts for grain, preserves, biscuits, boots and the like; but you take for the average family the quantities that would be consumed or used on the average. When my right hon. friend was dealing with figures on the cost of living he was quoting wholesale prices, indices based on some 200 commodities not corresponding in selection or weighting to their importance to the consumer. The wholesale prices, on this basis, on the whole show a slight increase. But, as my right hon. friend knows—and no one knows better than the hon. members of the Progressive party—fortunately for this country the prices of agricultural produce have gone up within the last year. Fortunately in the level of prices, so far as the products of the industry of agriculture are concerned, we approach now a level of comparison more nearly in accord, by comparison, with the level existing in relation to manufacturing prices prior to the war. The position of agriculture towards manufacturing in this regard has been considerably improved. It is due to the fact that prices of agricultural products have increased as they have that there has been on the whole this larger increase in wholesale prices. Grains, fruit, vegetables and their products in 1923, as compared with the figures of 1913, average wholesale prices for that year being taken as 100, came to 144.2 in 1923, and rose to 153.8 in 1924. All the other groups of commodities were on a lower index number:

Cost of Living 1923-4. Average Wholesale Prices of 1913 = 100

Grains, Fruit, Vegetables and their products	144.2	153.8
Animals and their products	134.1	129.4
Fibres, textiles and textile products	200.9	202.5
Wood, wood products and paper	176.8	165.8
Iron and its products	168.0	161.0
Non-ferrous metals and their products	96.8	96.3
Non-metallic minerals and their products	183.8	183.4
Chemicals and allied products	164.8	161.8
Total	153.0	155.2

The official index number of wholesale prices, 236 commodities rose from 153 in 1923 to 155.2 in 1924, but it should be noted that this rise was chiefly due to higher grain prices. The index number of six out of eight main groups declined. The rise in the textile group was due to the world-wide increase in wool prices.

What I wish to draw to the attention of the House is that while this is the showing of a schedule with respect to wholesale prices, when it comes to fixing the cost of living by the prices that determine the cost of living, namely retail prices, one finds that the cost of living has substantially decreased in this country during the last three years. I wish to give the House the particulars based on the retail prices, which are the prices to be considered in that connection. These facts and figures have been supplied officially by the Internal Trade Branch of our Bureau of Statistics. The cost of living in Canada, as reflected by retail prices of staple articles of domestic consumption, has been fairly steady for the last three years with a tendency towards lower levels. The average cost of a weekly food budget for a family of five from 1921 to 1924 was as follows:

1924	10.31

The average cost of a similar budget including food, fuel and light, and rent was as follows:

1924	20.80

The records show that the Dominion average retail price of the following foods declined from April to May 1924: Salt pork, bacon, biscuits, raspberry jam and canned peaches. The influence of reductions in the sales tax may also be traced in the official wholesale price records. Examples are: Biscuits, linseed oil, white lead, turpentine, black iron sheets, galvanized sheets, some lines of boots, binder twine, agricultural implements, etc. The result of tariff reductions on boots and shoes, cotton and woollen goods is difficult to trace. A number of influences have been affecting the prices of these commodities and it is difficult to isolate the result of any one of them. Index numbers of wholesale prices of boots based upon the year 1913 as 100 may be of interest.

Boots (4 lines)	165.5	146.4	141.9	133.2

As to prices of agricultural implements, a representative list of agricultural implements, consisting of plough drill, hay rake, binder, mower, drag harrow, disc harrow, wagon, and sleigh sold in Ontario for $953.50 before the 1924 budget and afterwards for $905.50. A slightly larger list sold in the Regina territory before the budget for $1,358 and afterwards for $1,291.

I will not take up further time quoting from comparative statistics as between the United States and Canada, but I think it would be of advantage to members of the House and of advantage to the country to have placed on the record comparative tables of the cost of food in a Canadian budget in Canadian cities contrasted with the cost of a similar food budget in the United States in certain of their cities. This table has been prepared at my request by the Internal Trade Branch of the Bureau of Statistics. I have asked to be supplied with a comparative statement showing the difference in the cost of commodities in daily use in the principal cities of Canada and the United States, and with the permission of the House I will insert these tables on the record:

These figures show—and I think it is important to have the fact generally known—that the cost of living is less for the great body of the people in this country than it is in the United States.

I have only one further reference to make to these statistical matters, and it relates to the agricultural implement industry. My right hon. friend said—and I think it was somewhat of a surprise to a good many members of the House this afternoon—that he had never contended that anything the government was doing or had done was going to be an injury to the agricultural implement industry. I think hon. members will agree that only five or six months ago that was the one industry which we were told we were ruining. I am sure that during the debate on the budget last year everyone got the impression that the government was being attacked because it had singled out this particular industry for its tariff reductions. Now the leader of the opposition says, no, he never even thought we were doing an injury to the agricultural implement industry. I hope his words will go broadcast throughout the country. I hope that from one end of Canada to the other the agricultural implement workers and the heads of implement factories will understand that my right hon. friend and I are at least agreed on one fact, namely, that no injury has been done to any agricultural implement industry as a consequence of the budget introduced last year. But may I draw my right hon. friend's attention to this fact, that while we have not, as I think he has rightly said, done any injury to the agricultural implement industry, we have as a matter of fact reason to believe that we have helped that industry in some particulars. The statistics for the nine months ending December give the total importations of farm implements into Canada and the total exportations of a like class, and these statistics show that while we imported into Canada during the nine months ended December 1924, farm implements and machinery to the value of $5,208,041, the agricultural implement industry exported during the same period implements of a total value of $8,203,711. That is, $3,000,000 worth of farm implements more were exported from Canada than were imported into this country during the last nine months of last year, practically the period covered by the time which elapsed after the budget announcements were made public.

My right hon. friend said in a speech from which I quoted a moment ago that the government, while it had made changes in the budget, had not reduced the price of agricultural implements in any particular. The price of agricultural implements has been very substantially reduced. I have in my hand a statement issued by the Massey-Harris Company and given to the public on December 11. It appeared in most of our papers:

It is customary at this season for the Massey-Harris Company to determine the price of its farm implements for the coming year, and, in the general consideration of the subject at this particular juncture, the approach has been made with the aim, if at all possible, to establish even lower prices than those which prevailed during the past season, believing that it is in the best interests of both farmer and manufacturer to bring about a closer adjustment between the prices of the things which the farmer has to purchase and the prices which he receives for his product.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Having these views uppermost in mind, we have decided to reduce the price of practically all of our implements, although we cannot feel that actual costs justify such a reduction in view of present manufacturing prospects. Many examples of price reductions could be enumerated, but the following will approximately indicate what has been done in the way of reduced prices: Binder reduced by $10, mower by $4.50, rake by $2, hay loader by $5, gasoline engine by $15.50, wagon by $5, and gang plough by $5.

The report winds up by stating:

On the whole, it looks as though a decided change for the better has come to agriculture, and that our farmers, east and west, can, with reasonable hope, look forward with greater confidence for prosperity in the outcome of their labours than they have been able to do for several years past.

Another important company manufacturing agricultural implements in Canada is the International Harvester Company. I have been able to obtain from that company a statement of the reductions they have made in their price lists. With the permission of the House, I will insert this table in Hansard, it is based on the price list schedules of the company itself. The statement is as follows:

I have also a copy of an article which appeared in the newspaper of which the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) is editor, the Kitchener News-Record, and which gives the impressions of President C. W. Snider of the Waterloo Manufacturing Company with respect to the effect of the tariff changes on the important agricultural industry which he directs. In the issue of November 26, 1924, of that paper, the president of the Waterloo Manufacturing company in an interview says:

The tariff changes haven't hurt us at all, said Cranson W. Snider, President of the Waterloo Manufacturing Company, in discussing the effect which the changes in the tariff rates made by the Hon. J. A. Robb, Minister of Finance, in the last federal budget brought down last spring, had on the local business. The duty on harvesting machinery was reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent in the last budget, but despite this reduced tariff Canadian manufacturers are able to compete successfully with the United States manufacturers owing to the fact that the duty was at the same time removed from the raw material entering into the manufacture of the machines made at the local plant.

With the duty off our raw material we can manufacture our machines so much cheaper that we can undersell our American competitors without much difficulty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some hon. gentlemen seem to think that it is a misfortune to improve in any way the conditions of the farmers by making implements of production available at lower costs.

"With the duty off our raw material we can manufacture our machines so much cheaper that we can undersell our American competitors without much difficulty," said the president of the local plant.

Mr. McMASTER: What was the paper?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Kitchener News-Record which, as I have already mentioned, has the distinction of being edited by the hon. member for North Waterloo.

In other parts of the country, the press records similar statements. The Smiths Falls News-Record of December 30, 1924, contains the report of impressions gathered from an interview with Mr. J. E. Ruby, General Manager of the Frost & Wood Company:

Mr. J. E. Ruby, general manager of the Frost & Wood Company, arrived home last Wednesday from a three months business trip to Europe during which he visited the British Isles and the principal European countries and North Africa. . . .

Mr. Ruby was successful in obtaining some excellent orders for Frost & Wood Company machines, and it will be cheerful news to the people of the town that the present force of 175 men employed will be increased as rapidly as production can be got under way, up to 300 or 350. The orders in hand will keep the plant busy for the next four months and by that time it is hoped the Canadian trade will be sufficient to keep running full time for the balance of the season.

In addition to the reduction in the price of farm implements announced last April, further reductions became effective on December 1, and it is hoped that these lower prices to Canadian farmers will stimulate the placing of orders held back by the higher prices which have prevailed during the past few years. . . .

Referring to industry generally, but more particularly to the implement industry, I notice a despatch to the Globe appearing on the front page of the November 20 issue and headed:

Factory whistles blow at night. Industries take on more men.

—there is the following announcement:

Woodstock, Nov. 19.—The sound of factory whistles blowing at night, indicating that industries are working overtime, is welcome to the people of Woodstock. The Bain Wagon Co., the Canada Furniture Mfg. Co. and the Bickle Fire Engines, Limited, are now working extra hours, and two other industries have had to engage additional employees during the past few days. These are the Eureka Planter Co. and the Woodstock Wagon Co.

It is highly desirable, in view of some of the reports that have been circulated during the last few months, that the people of our country should have a clearer appreciation of just what the effect upon industry has been of the changes which were made at the last session of parliament.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Do the reductions which the Prime Minister has placed upon Hansard include the reduction in the sales tax, or are they attributable entirely to the reductions in the tariff?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In a word, they are due to the reductions in taxation which this government made last session.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And put on the session before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is wrong there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Very largely put on the session before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I may say that the reduction in the sales tax had an effect, and certainly the reduction in the duties had an effect.

There is one important news item that I think my hon. friend will be particularly interested in hearing, and that is that, for the first time apparently for some years past, the Massey-Harris Company, which is, as he knows, a very important agricultural implement manufacturing concern, had a profit. We were told that we were ruining these industries. I will quote from the Mail and Empire which my hon. friend will probably credit as authoritative, this statement, the issue of January 31:

Massey Harris Company's net profits $87,710. Believed agricultural implement business is now on upward trend.

That is the heading to the report of the president of that company. The article goes on to state:

Mr. Vincent Massey, the president, in his report to the shareholders, says that the net profit, after making adequate provision for depreciation and possible losses, although small,—$87,711—is significant in the light of the previous losses amounting to $1,456,000 in 1921, $643,000 in 1922, and $409,578 in 1923 (after eliminating the profit realised from the sale of timber lands, which formed a part of the income in that year). The improvement, therefore, in operating earnings over those of a year ago is $497,288.

In other words, the report of the Massey-Harris concern shows that each year since this government took office, as my right hon.

friend says, that important concern has been getting a little better off, until at last, it has actually been enabled to pay a profit instead of suffering further loss.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He might follow up with the steel and fertilizer industries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have already spoken of the steel industry. I will leave my right hon. friend to talk about fertilizer.

Let me correct another erroneous impression fostered by the remarks of my right hon. friend this afternoon. Last year he and his followers of the opposition sought to create an impression throughout the country that the reason the government's budget, as respects the surplus shown, was so satisfactory was because of an alteration in the bookkeeping methods of the Department of Finance, namely—the elimination entirely by the administration of items which the government of my right hon. friend had charged up against the public debt of this country. Now, I have in my hand the public accounts for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924, and I should like my right hon. friend and his followers to look carefully at page 3, where there appears a statement signed by the auditors appointed to audit the accounts. It reads as follows:

> We have examined the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada as at March 31, 1924, and we certify that the balance sheet conforms to the balance sheets of previous years in not including in the net debt of the Dominion issues of the Canadian National Railway Company and companies included in its system which carry the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada. Such guaranteed issues are shown year by year as indirect liabilities.

> Dated, Ottawa, Canada, January 27, 1925.

The auditors, I need scarcely say, are chartered accountants having no connection whatever with departmental work, but brought in from the outside as independent auditors to go through the books of the government with a view of making an accurate statement of the situation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have said a word or two more on evidences of prosperity, as I think after the dismal picture which my right hon. friend has been endeavouring to paint in this House and throughout the country during the past year, it is due to the people that the other and the truer side should be brought to their attention, but I will content myself by quoting from the annual statements made by one or two of the presidents of our great chartered banks. Possibly no more conservative men are to be found in the country than the heads of these banking corporations, and in making their annual statements these gentlemen are, I think, inclined to be very guarded in the language they use. Sir Herbert Holt, President of the Royal Bank, said on January 8, 1925:

> I have never been more optimistic in regard to the possibilities of this country than I am to-day. We have been held back by agricultural depression since 1920, but this should disappear as normal conditions are returned throughout the world. . . . I feel sure that great prosperity is ahead of the United States in the next ten years, and that we shall find in that country a market not only for larger amounts of lumber and paper, but for increasing quantities of foodstuffs as well.

Sir John Aird, President of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, said on January 12, 1925:

> Commercial failures have decreased, there is a slight reawakening of immigration, and the outlook for the lumber business seems to have distinctly improved. A good crop has been harvested for which high prices prevail, and the maladjustment of the farmers' position has thus been largely corrected.

Sir Vincent Meredith, President of the Bank of Montreal, on December 1, 1924, said:

> I am satisfied that a gradual improvement in the trade situation is occurring. Statistical returns support this view, and while there is a regularity in the movement in the main the trend is upward. There has been a better demand for steel in various forms, especially from railroads; textiles trades are gradually recovering from the slump, and dealings in hides and leather have broadened.

Mr. R. S. White, Editor-in-Chief of the Montreal Gazette,—I do not know whether my right hon. friend regards this paper as his organ or not, but its financial review of the year he will accept, at any rate, as accurate I suppose—in the issue of January 9, 1925, has the following:

> Canadian bond sales amounted to $562,000,000 in 1924, $42,500,000 more than in the previous year, and of this amount the Canadian people took no less than $346,000,000, the remainder having been placed in the United States. It is true that some of these sales were for purpose of conversion and did not involve new money, but a country cannot be called poor whose people increase savings deposits in banks by nearly $50,000,000, and purchase three and a half hundred millions of new bonds in a single year.

Mr. Speaker, may I say in conclusion that I think this House and the country had a right to expect from the right hon. leader of the opposition something more than mere criticism and denunciation of the administration. I think I have shown pretty conclusively that when the statistics on which his criticism was founded are examined carefully and the truth made known the situation is not at all that which he had depicted it to be. However, apart from that, I think we were entitled to have something of a constructive character from my right hon. friend. I think he owes it to the country to tell us wherein, if in office, he would improve the situation. I notice that he has in the name of his party given out a manifesto,—I referred to it a little earlier to-day,—as to changes in the tariff which he thinks are all-important. I do not know just what his reason was for issuing that manifesto at this particular time. Probably recalling the majority of 121 registered against his party's amendment last year, he felt it would save him the necessity of moving any amendment in his speech on the Address this afternoon, seeing the subject is on the order paper and therefore cannot be dealt with in that way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not issued any manifesto. I give notice of a resolution on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry, I was judging by the way in which the notice appeared. The subject matter I refer to appeared in the evening press the day before parliament opened and the day before the order paper was printed. What I saw in the order paper was a reprint. I apologize if I have spoken wrongfully of it as a "manifesto"; it did seem to me that the manner in which it was issued and its length gave it more or less that complexion, in fact, I think it was so referred to by his own press. However, all that my right hon. friend suggests, in the light of the criticism he has made this afternoon is that the national situation is to be improved by increased taxation. He calls it protection, meaning thereby increased tariff, but I hope this House and the country will not forget that a tariff is a tax, no matter by what other name one may seek to describe it and that higher tariffs mean increased taxation. My right hon. friend contends, as nearly as I can gather, that what should now be done to help meet the condition under which the country is labouring as a result of the heavy legacies of debt to which it has fallen heir in recent years, is to increase taxation, and increase it all around. Apparently he not only wishes to increase the protection afforded to manufacturing industries—I think that is what he says should be done—but he suggests that agriculture should be protected in a similar manner. I am sure my agricultural friends will find a lot of consolation in that thought, particularly, when they realize that their commodities are sold in world markets where prices are determined regardless, for the most part, of conditions in any particular country. Then he suggests that certain industries—the coal industry, I think—should be further protected. I do not think he mentions other branches of mining or lumbering, and he does not mention the fishing industry. I do not know whether he intends to leave that out; perhaps he will tell us when he comes to the discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did mention that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I apologize; he did mention it, my right hon. friend in mentioning these particular industries clearly has in mind the protection of special interests. The fault I find in his programme is that there is an absence—at least, I am unable to discover the presence—of any concern for the one class to which every man, woman and child in this country belongs, namely, the consuming public.

Mr. BOYS: Are workers not consumers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Workers are consumers, yes, when in the capacity of consumers, but in that capacity protection is of no service to them, it is a detriment. My right hon. friend said this afternoon that he was unable to discover the necessity in the Address for any mention of the cost of living. It was natural he should make that remark. Clearly in what he has expressed he has not had in mind the great body of the consuming public in this country. If he is not exclusively concerned with these special interests, why does he not take some steps to protect the professional classes? My hon. friend (Mr. Boys) belongs to the professional class—

Mr. BOYS: They do not need it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, my hon. friend is very fortunate. I think in that respect he differs from most members of the professional class.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think my right hon. friend needs it either, does he?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He needs it very much; I am sorry to have to say I cannot agree with my hon. friend. If protection is to be worthy of the name, it should have regard for the interests and well being of the great body of the people as a whole, not merely for the special interests. It should include protection of members of the professional classes—which include lawyers, doctors, teachers, preachers—also for those who make up the trading public; those engaged in wholesale and retail trade; for the great body of civil servants, throughout this country; clerks in shops, stores and offices and for the women and children who have to be provided with the necessaries of life, with food and clothing, in a word it should have equal regard for all classes of the community. It is for that reason that the government takes the position that the cost of living is the most important of all the questions which this country has to face at this time. It is a question that cannot be met simply by tariff changes here and there, no matter how considerable they may be. The problem before Canada to-day is how for a population of between nine and ten millions of people the cost of living is to be decreased—how it is going to be possible to reduce taxation from its present large proportions owing to expenditures incurred during the period of war and of railway obligations which have been so considerable during the last couple of years. The only remedy that my right hon. friend has to propose is to increase the tariff, in other words, increase taxation here and there to help special interests. We say the situation cannot be improved in that way. We say that the only way to improve it is, first of all by strict economy on the part of the administration, and, secondly, by the government adopting policies which will increase production in this country in the quickest and most effective manner possible.

It is in regard to the policy of increased production that the government has come forward with a constructive programme which, if given an opportunity to be worked out, will help to meet the situation. Part of that programme was outlined in the Speech from the Throne last year and was given expression to in this House in the changes that were made in the tariff at the last session. A further stage in that programme is announced in the Speech from the Throne this year. The two are parts of the one constructive programme which the administration is placing before the country as a means of help to solve its great industrial, financial and social problems. In a word, that programme is, having regard to Canada's vast resources, to increase production by the only possible effective means. As I intimated a moment ago, we have untold natural resources, whether they be of the soil, the mine, the forest or the fisheries. We have as well great water-powers; we have all that is needed to enable us to be a strong, a great and a prosperous people, a people for the most for whom there should be every necessary comfort and every opportunity. But to develop the natural resources labour and capital are essential, and markets in which to dispose of the commodities which are produced by the application of the people's capital and labour to the natural wealth of which we have such an abundance.

We have taken steps to improve the labour situation as regards the development of the natural resources by strengthening our immigration programme. As I said this afternoon, there are reasons why immigration has not been developed as fast as many of us would like to have seen, but those reasons will not obtain as much in the future as they have in the past. We must keep in mind that Europe and the British Isles do not serve as recruiting grounds for immigrants, as they did prior to the war. It is not possible to bring immigrants from the Old Land in the numbers in which they were readily brought before the war. In addition to that, we have learned from the experience of other countries that it is inadvisable to bring in immigrants without a careful process of selection; that it is much better to pay attention to quality than merely to seek to increase immigration so far as numbers are concerned. For this reason the government has taken steps to exercise care in the selection of immigrants. We have sought to bring as many as we can from the British Isles and from the northern parts of Europe. But the chance of getting people to emigrate to-day is not what it was a few years ago. In the old days the government was free to offer any number of homesteads, to offer to settlers inducements of many kinds. We cannot do that to-day as it could be done some years ago, and for that reason it is more difficult to get the labour into the country which is needed for the development of our resources. But the tide has set in, and now that agriculture is beginning to attain, as evidenced by the current prices of agricultural commodities, a position similar to that which it formerly held, we will expect to see a large immigration to Canada which will result in a distinct note of prosperity.

In regard to the implements of production which constitute the capital required for the development of our resources we have as I have shown tonight, through our legislation of last session, made the cost of these implements less to the settlers of the country. Whether engaged in agriculture, mining, lumbering or fishing this government has helped to make it possible for persons going into these industries to obtain the capital that is necssary for the carrying on of their activities at a lower cost than prevailed before. When the capital requirement is lessened, the cost of production is lessened, and it stands to reason that the whole industrial life of the country must as a consequence be materially prospered. All manufacturing is based on the cost of raw material. All manufacturing, no matter of what branch it may consist, depends on the raw material supplied by one of the four great basic industries, agriculture, mining, lumbering or fishing. If the cost of raw material can be reduced in those industries, then every manufacturing concern in the Dominion will stand to gain, because when you reduce the cost of the raw material there can follow a lowering in the price of the commodity produced, and that without any loss in either profit or in wages. But this is even more important than it appears on the surface. In the building up of this country what is needed above all else is a great export trade. Now the price at which commodities can be sold in a foreign market depends upon world factors of competition. In this country we are trying to maintain a certain standard of labour, and we do not want that standard to be lowered. On the other hand, we have to go into a market and compete in foreign trade with other countries that have standards of labour lower than our own. If we can reduce the cost of raw materials entering into our manufactures, be the amount ever so little, it may be just sufficient to give our manufacturers a chance successfully to compete in that foreign market against the other countries of the world, and it is that foreign trade that we must go out to capture in every way we possibly can.

Now what has the government found in viewing the situation from that standpoint? The government has found with respect to foreign trade, that year by year, within the last few years, a great combine of shipping interests has been shaping up on the oceans of the world, a combine that seeks to control the entire ocean commerce of the world, a combine of shipping companies so closely knit and interlocked in its workings and operations that within certain limits it can fix pretty much at its own will the price at which commodities can be transported to any part of the world. This House will be favoured shortly with a report which I think it will find illuminating on the subject of this combine and its control of rates across the Atlantic. There are many circumstances that have been affecting the cost of production of late. Speak of the bringing of immigrants to this country! I have mentioned one or two difficulties, but they are not comparable to the difficulty that is encountered in the cost of transporting the immigrant from Europe across the Atlantic. A few years ago the immigrant from Europe could be brought to this country at a cost of from fifteen to twenty dollars a steerage passage; to-day something like seventy or eighty dollars is required for corresponding accommodation. These exactions we believe are largely due to the monopoly that shipping interests enjoy and which enable them to control rates across the north Atlantic ocean. That monopoly thwarts Canada's effort to increase its production in this one way but unfortunately that is not the only way in which the country is adversely affected. Our commodities have to search out the markets of the world, and what do we find? We find that the rates on the transportation of our export commodities have been going up steadily and steadily for years. They went up during the war; that was bad enough, but since the war they have been going up higher still, with the result that our agricultural industry is suffering the severest of handicaps while manufacturing industries of this country which a short time ago were shipping commodities to the Old Country find, many of them, that they cannot profitably ship commodities at the transportation rates prevailing to-day. As a government we have felt that if we are to work out in a constructive way this programme of the development of the natural resources and the basic industries of our country and of the manufacturing industries based thereon, if we are effectively to further manufacturing as well as agricultural development, we must seek to make freer the channels of trade by which the products of the farm, the mine, the forest, the fisheries and of our manufacturing establishments reach consumers in different parts of the world from the factories, the farms and other sources of supply where they may be produced. Hence we contemplated the step referred to in the Speech from the Throne which will be announced in detail to parliament in due course and which we hope will be a further factor in helping to solve our great national problems.

My right hon. friend in referring to this matter made a quotation, from Byron's Childe Harold I think it was. He referred to man's control stopping with the shore. Man's control may stop with the shore, but the control of government ought to go beyond the shore, and in this matter we intend to extend our control beyond the shore, if that is possible at all. We hope so far as our effort in this regard is concerned, that the Canadian government will not have to battle alone, but that it may look to the governments of all the other self-governing Dominions and to the government of the Mother Country itself to co-operate with us in fighting this great combination that exists on the Atlantic, to the detriment not only of Canadian trade, but to the trade of Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and all parts of the British Empire. We believe in developing trade within the empire, but we have reason to believe that this great combination has been thwarting the full development of inter-imperial trade and so far as our country is concerned has been discriminating against our Canadian ports. We believe it can be shown conclusively that there has been a real discrimination so far as Canada is concerned in the matter of transportation costs across the Atlantic.

As I have said, parliament will be presented shortly with a report dealing with this whole question of Atlantic trade, and the House will also be informed in due course more exactly and in particular of the steps the government is about to take in an effort to cope with the exactions of this powerful combine. The point I wish to make clear at the moment is this: The government's action in this regard is only part of a great constructive programme which has for its objective the development and increase of the wealth of this country, the bringing about of a freer distribution of commodities within the country, and the development of wider export markets as well. We believe the step that was taken last session has already in this short time fully justified itself, and we believe that the legislation which we are going to introduce during the present session if it receives the support of this parliament, will materially assist us to further the diversified industries of this country, agricultural, mining, fishing, lumbering and manufacturing, that it will help the whole industrial life of Canada, and by so helping our industrial life will improve the lot and the well-being of the men, women and children who inhabit this Dominion from one coast to the other.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I would crave the indulgence of the House. This is the first working day of the session, and I did not expect to be called upon to-night. I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—NEXT WEDNESDAY SITTING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this House adjourns on Tuesday the 10th instant, it stands adjourned until Wednesday at three o'clock in the afternoon.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

He said: This is just to ensure that the House will meet on Wednesday at three instead of at two o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

Tuesday, February 10, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Report of the Department of Health for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1924.—Hon. Mr. Beland.

Copy of order in council No. P.C. 1876 setting out a regulation under The Proprietary and Patent Medicine Act.—Hon. Mr. Beland.

Annual report of the Department of Railways and Canals for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1924.—Hon. Mr. Graham.

Annual report of the Commissioner of Highways for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1924.—Hon. Mr. Graham.

Report of work done and expenditures made during calendar year 1924 in connection with Acts (Chapters 14 to 32 inclusive of 14-15 George V) respecting construction of Canadian National Railway lines.—Hon. Mr. Graham.

THE IRON AGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for London (Mr. White) asked me last night during the course of the debate on the Address to give the exact reference to the statement I quoted from the Iron Age with reference to the production of coke, anthracite and pig iron in the years 1920 to 1924 inclusive. I was sorry I had not the number of the Iron Age before me at the time. The reference will be found in the issue of January 8, at page 153.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Monday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Sir Eugene Fiset for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, we have had the Speech from the Throne, and now it has been moved and seconded that an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of the King's dutiful and loyal subjects in parliament assembled for the gracious speech which His Excellency was pleased to address to both houses of parliament. This very pleasing fiction, the Speech from the Throne, has been put in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General; as a matter of fact we know it is a pronouncement by the government.

I have much pleasure in tendering my compliments to the hon. members who moved and seconded the Address. Unfortunately I was unable to follow the remarks made by the mover (Sir Eugene Fiset) but judging from his past history and from the delivery of his speech I have no doubt that he will be a valuable acquisition to the debating power of this House. To the seconder (Mr. Hanna) I also extend my congratulations. He did the work that was allotted to him in a very creditable manner. I am sure that his entry into this House must have afforded the government a great deal of satisfaction, judging by the royal reception they gave him when he was introduced.

We have had two further speeches in the House on the Address, one delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) one by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). In some respects it was a case of the story being told in a pessimistic way on the one hand and in an optimistic way on the other. It makes a great deal of difference sometimes on which side you happen to be, from which point of vantage you look at the situation. Judging from the remarks made by the leader of the opposition, things are in a bad way and the quicker we realize this the better. I am sure he ably presented that side of the case. Then the Prime Minister made his address, and he took the view that after all we were in a happy condition; that without question Canada is a land of hope and glory; that compared with the United States we are living in a very fortunate condition indeed. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, we can have a fatal pessimism and a foolish optimism—though I do not want for a minute to insinuate that either of these two right hon. members went to that extreme. But if we are too pessimistic we are apt to lose heart. People sometimes get too sorry for themselves, they have too much pity upon themselves, and when they reach that stage their courage is apt to ooze out at their fingers' ends, with the result that objects aimed at are not accomplished. On the other hand it is sometimes just as foolish to underestimate the magnitude of the task that lies before us. While the Prime Minister was very optimistic I hope he realizes that we are not yet out of the woods, that we have a great many difficulties to overcome and that everything is not just as happy as it ought to be.

I happened to be reading the other day a biography of Sir John A. Macdonald and I came across the statement that he was the originator of the phrase, "Canada is a difficult country to govern." Now, I have no doubt of that fact, having regard to the physical characteristics of our country, reaching as it does from ocean to ocean, divided by natural physical barriers; and to the fact that the different sections of our population do not always take the same point of view and that, unfortunately, their economic interests do not always run parallel. We have a sparse population, compared with the great extent of our country; consequently it is difficult at all times to have legislation that will be in the interests of every section of the community. The factors bearing upon government are very numerous—international relations, manufacturing, trade and commerce, agriculture and all its allied industries—consequently we find that the functions of government are being widened day by day and the position is becoming more and more difficult.

Another point that should be considered in regard to all governments, provincial and municipal as well as Dominion, is the increasing wants of the people, the increasing demands of the people for further public services and utilities. Unfortunately these demands are not always accompanied by a desire to pay the taxes and to bear the burden of debt that is incurred in instituting and carrying on these public improvements and public utilities. I have heard it stated that progress first began when men began to live beyond their income. I feel perfectly satisfied that if that saying is true we have been progressing at a very rapid rate during this last number of years, individually and provincially as well as from the Dominion point of view. However, I am inclined to question the truth of that saying. It has been said also that the people to-day are eager for legislation but impatient of law. I do not know whether that is as true of the Dominion government as it is of the provincial governments, but we find a tremendous demand all the time for new legislation, and it is very often the case that just as soon as the legislation is placed on the statute book it seems to be passed into the limbo of forgotten things. I am one of those who believe that governments, whether Dominion, provincial or municipal, should be careful in passing legislation; should see to it that the legislation is really wanted, that it is really in the interests of the people and not merely the whim of the passing moment.

There is a cry everywhere at this time for a forward-looking policy. Among people on the street, in the public press, all over the Dominion, you find a feeling of dissatisfaction, a feeling that something might be done more quickly than is being done at present to help the situation. There is a looking for someone to lead us out of the land of bondage into the promised land. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to find any supermen; I do not think they make them nowadays. No doubt we need good government, but at the same time the continued prosperity of the people of Canada, the practice of the quality of farsightedness, will rest mainly upon the industrious effort of the great masses of the people. Governments cannot make people industrious or happy; governments can remove obstacles and make it possible for the people to do these things for themselves. One of the wrong tendencies of modern times is for people to look to governments to cure every evil of the body politic, things which sometimes they can do much better for themselves.

There is no doubt that we have been passing through very trying and difficult times, and they are still with us; but we are not going to get out of them unless we face the situation and look to the future with cheerfulness and courage. I am going to read a short extract from a speech delivered by a gentleman in Ottawa not long ago. The Prime Minister quoted from his speech last night. I am inclined to believe that the Canadian people must have treated this man very handsomely judging from the remarks that he made during his visit here. I have no doubt he was quite honest in what he said, and I think perhaps he spoke the truth. I refer to Roger Babson, head of the Babson Statistical Corporation, Wellesley Hills, Massachusetts. He said:

> I am not indulging in exaggerated language or in flattery, but am soberly measuring my words, when I say that the growth and development of Canada have been of unalloyed benefit to the world. The Canadian people have added to the value of the world's common assets; they have grown to wealth and power; they have so conducted themselves that everywhere the name of Canada commands both goodwill and esteem. A daughter of the Empire, grown to be a potent partner, your nation stands, strong in self-reliant independence, but equally strong in loyalty to the British Commonwealth, clear-visioned, sound in mind and limb, coveting nothing, fearing no one. A great race in a great country is shaping and working out for itself, with high courage, energy and ability, a great destiny.

I do not know if all that he said is exactly correct, but it does us a great deal of good anyway to hear these things. I think I can say without exaggeration that we have an intelligent and industrious population, one that will compare favourably with that of any other country in the world. In these days we need to have faith in ourselves and in our country. Given these two requisites, I think perhaps we shall yet be able to solve the problems that seem so heavy to be borne at the present time.

Now I want to say a few words in regard to the Speech from the Throne. The first paragraph is very optimistic. Of course the reports we are getting from the government side are all very optimistic in character. We are told in that first paragraph that there is an excess of exports over imports to the amount of $260,000,000. That in itself is a very satisfactory statement. I might also mention just at this point that the big increase in our exports is largely due to the products of the field and of the forests; I think we should bear that in mind. The first paragraph then goes on in a very optimistic way and says that everything is very satisfactory, and that prospects for the future are very bright. Well Mr. Speaker, although we may be climbing the hill, I am perfectly sure that we have not yet reached the summit.

The second paragraph in the Speech deals with the cost of living, and says that this problem is to be solved by increased production. I am rather puzzled over this paragraph. High cost of living causes high cost of production; and high cost of production causes high cost of living. Now how are we going to get out of that dilemma? It seems to me that we are going round and round in a vicious circle; we get nowhere; we do not solve our problem.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has a panacea for all our ills, and I will pay him the compliment of saying that he has been very consistent ever since I came into this House in preaching that one doctrine, the doctrine of protection. The latest resolution he has placed on the order paper is a very happy document. I think it is even more encouraging, perhaps, than the speech of Mr. Roger Babson from which I quoted a moment ago, because the leader of the opposition has something good in his knapsack for everyone, no one is going to be left out; he includes the farmer, the merchant, the artisan, the manufacturer and the labourer—they are all going to be protected.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FORKE: Hon. gentlemen say, "hear, hear." I am waiting with a great deal of anxiety to learn just how all this is going to be accomplished. At all events, we are told that no one is going to be left out in the cold, that every one is going to be protected. I notice that one paper in the west says that this solution of the leader of the opposition is something like a Christmas tree; there is something on it for every one. There is green for those who are green, and tinsel for those who do not believe that all is not gold that glitters.

There is one thing I would like to make plain to this House. It is sometimes taken for granted that some of us are not friendly to Canadian industries. Now I want to make it plain beyond any possibility of equivocation that nothing would please me better than to see the industries of this country thrive and prosper and serve the people of Canada. But if we are going to have industries we want them about one hundred per cent efficient. We want all the water squeezed out of the stock, and no dividends paid on watered stock. We want exotic and artificial industries wiped out of existence. And when that is done, I feel perfectly sure, the industries of our country are not going to suffer so very much after all.

We have cheap power in Canada. Two years ago, while the premiers of two of the states of the Australian Commonwealth were here, I heard them again and again express admiration for the great rivers we had in Canada and for the tremendous water powers that were available to the people of this country. One of them said that Australia had no such privileges as Canada enjoyed in the way of cheap water power. We want to take into consideration the fact that we have this cheap water power, and that our people are just as energetic, just as intelligent, and just as industrious as the people of any other country in the world; and, given equal conditions, equal facilities and some privileges I wonder why our manufacturers cannot compete with those of any other nation in the world to-day in industries which are suited to this country. We sometimes hear about mass production, the low cost of living, depreciated currency, and a great many other things that we have to contend against in this Dominion. There may be a little in some of these factors, but I have never attached a great deal of weight to this factor of the high cost of living, because where you find underfed and underpaid labour you will generally find that that sort of labour is inefficient, while the well paid labour in this country, living under proper conditions, is able to compete, I believe, with the labour of any other country in the world. Besides, I do not think you will ever find that by taxing people to keep industries alive you are going to solve the problem of unemployment. The whole thing is economically unsound, and is no solution of what I know is a very difficult problem at the present time. Sometimes we hear of a national policy. Yes, we want a national policy—a national policy for all the people, a policy that will suit the people of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Since the days of Sir John Macdonald we are living in a new Canada. This is not the Canada of Sir John Macdonald. Since his day a vast consuming and producing population has come into existence between the head of the lakes and the Rocky mountains. That fact must be borne in mind when reference is made to the national policy of the late Sir John A. Macdonald; and let me state that no amount of reasoning, no amount of argument can ever convince the people dwelling upon the prairies that a protective policy can be of any benefit to them.

Sometimes we hear a great deal about the home market. And here let me make myself quite plain; we all understand the value of a home market; every one would rejoice if Canada were able to consume all that she could produce, it would be an ideal situation. But we know the facts. We are aware that in some parts of our country production reaches such a volume that it has to find a sale in the markets of the world, and the home market, while valuable in itself, certainly will not solve our problems.

The third paragraph in the Speech deals with the question of production, and also refers to the subjects of immigration, the development of our natural resources, and the need for colonization. I should like to place emphasis on the word "colonization" because I do not believe that we should have immigration unless we can properly absorb the people who come here, unless we are able to provide them with employment, or place them upon the land or in some position where they can support themselves. Unless we can do this it would be far better not to induce immigrants to come here simply to swell the volume of unemployment which exists in Canada at the present time. The keeping of people in Canada after we get them here is a very difficult problem. I listened to the opposing speeches delivered yesterday with respect to the size of the movement of population across our borders into the United States. I do not know which speaker gave the correct figures, but I do know that more people are leaving Canada to-day than we like to see quitting this country. I am aware of the fact that living as we do beside an immense country like the United States, containing a vast population of one hundred and ten millions which is rapidly growing, that the country to the south will always offer an attraction for some of our people because of the wider field there for the exercise of their talents and the greater opportunity for employment. To my mind the problem presents itself in this form. First, how can we retain our native born people? In this regard a difficulty arises, and I want to state it as plainly as I can without any misunderstanding. Who comes, and who goes? Who are the people who come to our shores, and who are the people that are leaving? I have been very much interested in the question of education and for a very good reason. I have noticed the large number of young people who attend our high schools, our colleges and our universities, and I have wondered what becomes of the immense number who receive such a splendid education in Canada. In speaking upon this subject I do not want to be misunderstood. I think it is a splendid thing that Canada is able to offer such an education to our young folks but here is the difficulty: A great number of these young people who have been educated in Canada—of course the parents paid for that education but in the long run the cost devolved upon the country—find no scope for their activities in this country and they cross the border into the United States. There are the answers to the questions: Who come to Canada?—Some immigrants from eastern Europe; who go from this Dominion? —some of the brightest and best minds that we have. I cannot help mentioning these facts. My only regret is that I have no solution for the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear; support ours.

Mr. FORKE: The right hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I did not catch his other remark.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say "Support ours."

Mr. FORKE: I cannot see that that would help the situation in any way. I think if we could make certain occupations in Canada a little more attractive, a little more remunerative, it is possible we would induce the bright young Canadians to whom I have alluded to stay and engage in them, a thing they will not do at the present time. If we want people to stay in Canada we must make the Dominion a good country to live in and to do business in.

My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler)—and I am sorry he is not in his place this afternoon—

Some hon. MEMBERS: He is here.

Mr. FORKE: My hon. friends are quite right; I observe the hon. gentleman now and I am glad he is here. The hon. gentleman made a speech in Montreal not so long ago which I must say was most admirable in tone, and a good deal of what he said I appreciate. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I am going to read a few sentences from the speech in question; to my mind they embody good sense.

Mr. MARLER: Hear, hear.

Mr. FORKE: By that remark I intended no insinuation whatever. This is the paragraph I have in mind:

> There is only one way and that way is to make living profitable not only in one section but in every section of the country, because one depends on the other and on the prosperity of the whole depends the general advancement. There is no other solid foundation on which we can build any immigration policy—money spent otherwise is fruitless and at the best only leads to temporary and not to permanent colonization. That is clearly shown by the results of experience in immigration. In the twenty years (1901-1921) the first ten of which should be remembered were the greatest spending and immigration period in our history—had we retained our natural increase and our immigration we would have increased our population by 5,580,797 people. We only increased it by 3,417,168. In other words, people who were Canadians or who had come in with the apparent intention of settling left to the extent of 2,163,629. Had we retained these people our population in 1921 would have been 10,952,112, whereas it was only 8,788,483. We spent in these twenty years directly on immigration over $22,500,000. I am attributing no particular blame to anyone in this regard except to repeat that I do not think we were building on a solid foundation.

Now, I think that in those words the hon. member spoke very sensibly. But I am beginning to wonder why he should now preach as a remedy for the existing state of affairs more protection.

Mr. MARLER: No.

Mr. FORKE: Or protection.

Mr. MARLER: No.

Mr. FORKE: I think that was the statement the hon. gentleman made.

Mr. MARLER: Let my hon. friend read my speech right through.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARLER: The hon. gentleman is quoting an editorial from the Manitoba Free Press.

Mr. FORKE: I do not want to be unfair to the hon. gentleman, I wish to be fair in every way, but I understood from his remark that he believed in the protective policy for the central provinces, and a bonus to the railways for the west to meet its difficulties. Am I correct?

Mr. MARLER: To a moderate extent, yes.

Mr. FORKE: That is all I wanted to prove. I am surprised that the hon. member should point out that that policy was a failure for twenty years, and now should want a little more of it.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend is misinterpreting my remarks. I think that if he reads carefully what I said in Montreal he will find that what I said was very fair and just towards the west, and a very fair exposition of the feeling in Montreal towards the west. My hon. friend is not fair in the attitude which he has assumed to-day. The feeling in Montreal is one of sincerity, fairness and justness so far as the west is concerned.

Mr. FORKE: I do not doubt for one moment the sincerity or good will of the hon. gentleman. I think he really meant well towards the west in the statement which he made in Montreal at the time referred to. But I differ from the conclusions which he draws from the conditions which now exist. Apparently he takes the ground that central Canada could not possibly get along without some means of protection, but that the west would not be helped by protection. I would infer that they could not, because in return for protection to the central provinces you are willing to give a bonus to the railways carrying freight from the west. Is that not a fair interpretation of the hon. gentleman's argument? That is all I have tried to prove. I think the address of the hon. gentleman was one of good will and showed what might be called a very reasonable spirit. However, I am inclined to think that the idea of a bonus to the railways is not going to solve the problem either of the west or of the Maritime provinces. I had another extract taken from a Maritime province paper that I might have read, but I will not do so. I am inclined to believe they are in as difficult a position in regard to railway transportation as we are, if not more difficult.

Speaking about industries, I feel perfectly certain that an increased population and an increased purchasing power of the people of Canada will do very much more to solve our industrial problem than any question of tariff policy is likely to do. I noticed that in the Speech from the Throne the government almost despairs of any reduction in taxation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last night pointed out the large volume of taxation that can be attributed to the war and he also pointed out the deficits in the operation of our Canadian National railways which could be attributed to the same cause. I hope the government has not given up the idea of economy. Drastic economy is necessary in the public affairs of the country at this time. Taxation is pressing heavily on all classes of the people. The tremendous taxation, not only Dominion and provincial, but also municipal, is perhaps the one drag on our prosperity at this time. There is no doubt that all governments indulged in a policy of rapid spending, and now after the money has been spent we are trying to pay the bill. In regard to taxation, I should like to see the field of taxation accurately defined between the Dominion and the different provinces, so that there will be no overlapping and no extra expenses incurred in the collection of taxes.

Another matter that I think should be settled at an early date is the question of the natural resources of the different provinces. If our field of taxation were properly mapped out, and if the question of the natural resources of the provinces were definitely settled, there would be no necessity for those pilgrimages of provincial premiers and other officials to Ottawa, to confer with the Dominion authorities here. If these questions were settled, it would make no difference which party was in power in the Dominion or which party held the reins of office in the different provinces.

The fourth paragraph of the Speech from the Throne states:

> It is becoming increasingly evident, however, that quite as important a factor as the customs tariff in their effect upon production and living costs are transportation costs and rates, by land and sea. It is the opinion of my advisers that the attention of parliament at the present session should be directed more particularly to the desirability of effecting a freer movement of commodities through an equalization of railway freight rates—

And so on. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this paragraph is rather adroitly worded. It mentions tariff, taxation and transportation in almost equal terms. I am quite willing at this time to admit the tremendous importance of transportation and the great significance of having that question settled definitely and rightly at the present time; but I want to give notice to the government that members who sit in this part of the House at least have not yet given up the idea of tariff reduction, and do intend pressing for further reduction along this line. I am greatly encouraged in this after listening to the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last night. I thought perhaps that, having made some little movement last year he felt now that he might rest upon his oars and leave things alone for some time. But he was careful to explain to the House last night that the manufacturers were never so prosperous as they are to-day, especially those who had been affected by the reduction in the tariff. This being so, I expect he will come forward with renewed courage and touch other fields that have as yet been left untouched.

I wish to say a few words with regard to transportation. What the arteries are to the human body, transportation is to the industrial and economic life of a country. The transportation system is really the very centre of our national life. The whole question of railway rates to-day is now before the country, and we want to have it definitely and rightly settled. I mentioned the Maritime provinces some little time ago. I notice they are also in earnest in this matter. I have learned to know just a little during the last three years about the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec. No one can admire those provinces more than I do, and no matter what the future may hold, I expect that they will grow and become prosperous. But I desire to make a prophecy. I predict that in the not distant future, under proper conditions, the great majority of Canadian people will live in the territory west of the Great Lakes. I make that statement at this time to the people of eastern Canada, just to remind them that when the balance swings the other way, we will be just as ready to do justice to them as they are willing to do justice to us at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: Is that a threat?

Mr. FORKE: No threat is intended. I desire to say a few words about the province of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). The future of British Columbia is all right—no question about it. I believe the great arteries of trade in the future will be on the Pacific ocean, and nothing in this world can prevent the province of British Columbia growing in numbers and prosperity.

An hon. MEMBER: Chinamen.

[Mr. Fofke.]

Mr. FORKE: No. But at the present time transportation to the prairies is a question of tremendous importance. Situated as they are in the centre of the continent from east to west, and denied, Mr. Speaker, an outlet to the north at the present time, it follows that any system of railway freight rates is a great problem to the people living in those provinces.

Another point is that any railway situation which rests upon high rates is not resting upon an economically sound foundation; increased population, increased production and increased traffic would be a very much safer basis for our railways than extremely high rates imposed upon a small population. There has been a great deal of misunderstanding in the west with regard to freight rates, and I believe for that reason more attention should be paid to this matter than has been given it in the past. The Premier of Manitoba made a statement the other day, and with permission of the House I should like to read what he said. This was a communication to the Montreal Herald of January 10. He said:

> Railway lines have been built and equipped and goods are transported into and out of the country, but shippers are asked to pay a freight charge which is excessive. There is also imposed upon the people of the province—

> —a tariff on imported goods which renders their position most difficult. The people are convinced that this arbitrary economic arrangement is unjust and unfair, and it may be taken for granted that the fight will never cease, until there has been a more satisfactory arrangement.

The fifth paragraph of the Speech from the Throne deals with ocean freight rates. The government has been twitted a good deal about the legislation that was passed in regard to lake freights, and perhaps the whole thing did not turn out as satisfactory as might have been the case. I have never felt inclined to blame the government for any mistake or miscarriage that has occurred respecting legislation passed in this regard. Everyone is aware to-day that lake freights are in a very unsatisfactory condition; that one-half of our grain is at present being carried to American ports; that it can be carried from Fort William to American ports at a cheaper rate than it can be transported a shorter distance to Canadian ports. As long as this condition of affairs exists, do hon. gentlemen believe that the situation on the lakes is what it ought to be? When we come to deal with ocean freights we are, perhaps, grappling with a wider question, but we can let this matter stand until we hear what proposals the government has to make in regard to it. I would make just this comment, that the whole question of the cattle trade between Canada and the Old Country rests, at the present time, upon this question of freight rates. I have no hesitation in saying that if the present rate continues, the traffic will dwindle and die, because farmers will soon get tired of raising cattle just to create freight for ocean steamships, just as they will soon get tired of raising grain in order to provide traffic for railways. There must be a reasonable profit for the man who is carrying on the work.

I was rather surprised when I read the seventh clause in the Speech from the Throne, dealing with the Senate. Some reference had been made to speeches delivered throughout the country during the recess; and from some speeches delivered by the Prime Minister we expected that something drastic was going to happen to the Senate at this session. But the language now in the Speech from the Throne is much more careful and guarded, and I am beginning to think that the Senate are getting more firmly placed in their seats and they are not likely to be disturbed, at least for some years to come. While I believe in a second chamber, my little experience in this House having led me to the conclusion that it is quite possible that ill-considered legislation may slip through and that some check is necessary, I think it is an anachronism to have a non-elective body, a body whose members are appointed for life, which can permanently defy the enactments of this House. Certainly some other system of carrying on the business of the country will eventually have to be adopted, and I hope this government will have the courage to tackle the question in the very near future.

We are promised some amendments to the Grain Act which will be a very important document, and we are also asked to deal with some trade agreements. These matters I will leave for discussion at a more opportune time.

We are told that the estimates are being prepared with extreme care and with economy kept always in mind. I do not mind expressing my opinion as regards the method in which the estimates come before this House. I have always felt, coming into this House as a layman, knowing nothing about the situation, that our method of criticising the estimates is very lame, the idea being to drag the information out of the minister, to get all we can out of him. I am not casting any blame on any particular member of the government, but it is evident very often that the least said the soonest mended and the minister, perhaps, sometimes knows just as much about the subject—I say this quite candidly and not in any derogatory manner—as the member who asks for information. For instance, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) may have thousands of employees in his department and it is impossible that he should be familiar with all the work they are doing. The system is wrong and a better method should be devised whereby members can criticise the estimates more intelligently. Every year estimates are brought down for improvements all along the Atlantic coast. Probably we devote our energies to blocking something the blocking of which is an absolute necessity, yet at the same time we let some vote slip through that is not needed at all. That is not the proper way to do business. I hope the government will practise every possible economy, do no unnecessary work and do what is necessary in the most efficient manner. The country is impatient as regards taxation. We know that every government professes economy and every government, to some extent, practises extravagance. The sooner that sort of thing stops, the better.

I want to make just a few general observations in closing. Perhaps a better day is dawning for Canada and I am hopeful for the future. I know very well that we are not yet out of the woods; that we have many troubles to meet. The other evening I picked up a Scottish newspaper that a friend had sent me and I read a speech that had been delivered in the town of Berwick, which is neither in Scotland nor in England, but just between the two. This speech was delivered by an Alberta farmer who gave a most glowing account of conditions in Alberta and of what could be accomplished in the way of wheat growing. In fact, he pointed out that Canada, western Canada in particular, was a most desirable place to live in. He also made this statement which I hope will go abroad, that it was a paradise for women. The same evening, in discussing western conditions with a friend, I heard the story of people living on the prairies who were unable to secure the bare necessities of life. I have no doubt as to the truth of both of those statements. And that just explains how difficult it is for an easterner to get an accurate conception of conditions in western Canada. We have a good country and under proper conditions I can, without any hesitation, advise immigration into that country; but we want to see conditions made suitable for people who desire to earn an honest and decent living.

At the present time we hear a good deal about our natural resources and we sometimes get tired of the term. A section of the richest agricultural land in the world is of no value until it is cultivated and producing crops; the richest mines in the world are of no value until they are developed. Therefore, while it may be quite true that we have great natural resources, they are of no use to Canada until they are developed.

I should like to have said a few words about the minerals of Canada, but I am not going to take up the time of the House. Not long ago I listened to a speech delivered by Professor Wallace of the University of Manitoba dealing with the great pre-Cambrian shield which occupies about sixty-five per cent of the whole area of the Dominion. He pointed out the fact that the Sudbury mines were discovered only by the building of the Canadian Pacific railway; that the Cobalt mines were only discovered during the building of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway through the finding of a lump of silver in a rock cut. The fact was also pointed out that it was highly probable that riches just as great existed throughout that great area if only they could be discovered. Let me say here that for three hundred miles along the shores of lake Winnipeg, and for a distance back of some four hundred and fifty miles, there exists the same pre-Cambrian shield which is supposed to be rich in mineral wealth and which can be developed when the Hudson Bay railway is in full operation.

It is my desire to see Canada a land of happy homes and of moderate wealth widely distributed; I do not want to see it a land of multi-millionaires and poverty-stricken people living side by side. This ideal is what I stand for, as far as it lies within my power to bring it about, in any public policy I advocate. I have no quarrel with any sections of our population; I believe that to some extent at any rate there will always be rich people and poor people. At the same time, however, I do think that there should be equal chances for all, and I certainly do not think that riches should grow like a rolling snowball with some while others have to struggle to secure a bare existence. I hope that in the days to come our country will prosper and that this nation will be a people happy and contented in every sense of the word.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Whatever else may be said with regard to the Speech, it probably indicates fairly well the policy of the government—a policy which we must say consists very largely in the enunciation of some vague generalities rather than in the bringing foward of concrete proposals; a policy which perhaps gives the appearance of activity while actually marking time; a policy which resorts to the use of catch words without advancing any definite solutions for the new and pressing problems that face us at the present time. Indeed, I think we might go further and say that this policy even fails to recognize these new and pressing problems. It is interesting to note that a conference is being suggested to deal with the question of the Senate, and possibly to consider wider revisions of the British North America Act. Whether this conference between the Dominion and the provincial governments will achieve any further results than have been attained by other conferences of a similar character, remains to be seen. There is not the slightest doubt, however, that, as we tried to point out last year, there is an urgent need of a revision of the British North America Act. This has been brought very forcibly to our attention by the recent decision of the Privy Council touching the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, which decision must have very far reaching effects indeed. Much of the Dominion legislation as it now stands on the statute books may well be called in question; an appeal might show that it is ultra vires of the Dominion parliament. Further this decision may handicap us in this House in trying to place any progressive legislation on the statute books, inasmuch as we are at an utter loss to know what is and what is not within the power of the Dominion parliament at the present time. Without laying blame on any one government, the fact is that our constitution, which was drawn up nearly sixty years ago, was framed at a time when conditions differed very fundamentally from the conditions that exist to-day. I am not reflecting in any sense whatever on the Fathers of Confederation when I state that some change is necessary. There is no doubt at all that they did the best they could to provide for the needs of their day; but their day is not our day, and if we wish to be true to them we must do in our day what they did in theirs—make such necessary changes as shall provide for the needs of our own times. It would be absurd to imagine that private business could be conducted to-day in precisely the same way that private business was conducted sixty years ago. When we think of all the modern inventions that have been instituted, the modern complicated organization of industry and commerce and finance, it is absurd to think of going back to the methods of sixty years ago. Yet we in Canada in the conduct of public business are practically confined to an instrument that was created so long ago.

With regard to conditions in general in Canada, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) declared last night that we might well listen to what the bankers had to say. It seems to me that he was quite right in that, because under the existing financial arrangements the bankers can very largely decide what the conditions shall be. If they decide that there is to be another wave of prosperity at the present time, I have no doubt that the wave of prosperity is already under way. But it may be said, nevertheless, that even they are unable to decide, under the economic conditions that prevail, whether prosperity will remain for any time. The Speech tells us that for Canada the year 1924 was a period of substantial progress. Listen to what one of the bank managers has had to say—and the Prime Minister did not quote him. Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, the general manager of the Bank of Montreal, at the annual meeting, to which the Prime Minister did refer, said:

> My view, in brief, of the situation is that business generally in Canada is unsatisfactory, but with some bright spots. This expression of opinion may not be popular, but it seems to me much better to look the matter squarely in the face than to allow ourselves to be led astray by popular delusions. That general trade is dull, to put it mildly, is no delusion. Many of our industries are running on half time, with diminished profits or no profits at all. Taxation is heavy to an extent which discourages new enterprises. The cost of living is high and our population in point of numbers is at a standstill or worse.

Here we have a frank recognition of our heavy overhead charges, high taxes and high cost of living, and factories running on half time. So far as labour is concerned, the high cost of living and half time work means unemployment and suffering; it involves in its larger social aspects sickness and crime of all sorts. Right here in the city of Ottawa we have had in recent months several cases of suicide which appear to be directly traceable to despondency owing to lack of work. Within the last few days the press has been telling us of a poor fellow who has been imprisoned in a cave and to rescue whom every effort has been made and every expenditure possible incurred. Millions of people throughout the country have been interested in his fate. Yet there are tens of thousands who are suffering to-day very acutely because of unemployment. I am not very much concerned whether the unemployment in Canada is greater than the unemployment in the United States; the fact is that unemployment exists here and we have its consequences to deal with. Last autumn a conference was called by the government to deal with this matter. That conference might almost be described as a cruel farce. There were some fifty delegates representing the Dominion and provincial governments, as well as the municipalities, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian bridge and construction industries, labour, the Canadian railways, and the employment services of Canada. After all these delegates had assembled, the Minister of Labour stated on behalf of the Dominion government that nothing could be done by the Dominion. He simply, as it were, flourished the British North America Act and said it was impossible to do anything. His statement included this:

> If indeed, the matter were one of other than financial assistance, the participation of the Dominion government might be regarded as interference with provincial rights.

Thus a very real and pressing need is brushed aside as of comparative unimportance and we have a purely technical, legal, constitutional attitude presented. Even then the Minister of Labour might have remembered that so far back as 1920 a report on this subject of the draft conventions was submitted to the Governor in Council by the Minister of Justice on March 2 and duly concurred in by the council and approved by His Excellency the Governor General on November 6. In that report we find the following statement:

> Unemployed insurance has a pronounced federal aspect and on the whole the minister thinks the establishment of a system of unemployed insurance is competent to the Dominion in the exercise of its residuary legislative power with regard to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

As I think I said last year in this House, where there is a will there is a way and where there is no will there is no way. The position of the Minister of Labour was very largely backed up by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). In flat contradiction to the representations at the conference of Canadian manufacturers and to the evidence submitted by mayors and responsible officials from Halifax to Vancouver, he said:

> I say trade in this country is good. . . . That is the reason for unemployment. . . . There are too many people flocking to the cities. . . . There is work for them on the farms if they want work.

Where can we get with statements of that character, in the face of the undoubted evidence to the contrary? Since that conference conditions have not improved. According to the press despatches as published, we had a deputation here a few weeks ago from eastern Canada headed by Premier Armstrong in which he is reported as having stated:

> That at the Sydney mines in one of the coal towns, so acute is the situation that people were suffering from hunger and some were actually living on mushrooms picked in the woods. Such a situation, he said, required action by the government. There were 23,000 people unemployed and more than 100,000 dependents affected.

In my own city of Winnipeg we have at the present time some 1,200 married men and 800 single men in receipt of relief very largely owing to their unemployment. Large and influential deputations recently waited on the city council of Montreal to bring to the attention of the council the extremely serious situation which prevailed. Within a few days we have had deputations from Toronto and Ottawa. We had evidence presented at the unemployment conference with regard to the serious conditions even among the immigrants from northern Europe. The Danish Consul and the Scandinavian Emigrant Station have both protested in the very strongest terms against the bringing over of Norsemen into the midst of a population where there was a great deal of unemployment.

I do not wish at this time to discuss the responsibility of the federal government, but I should like again to take the position I have taken on previous occasions, namely, that the body which is so largely responsible for the immigration policy and for the financial policy of this country cannot possibly escape responsibility for the unemployment which is largely the result of those policies. The government which through its arrangements fails to make it possible for people even to obtain the necessities of life—food, clothing and shelter—cannot possibly have a claim upon the loyalty of its people. It may be a government of certain interests; decidedly it is not a government representative of the great masses of the people.

The Speech suggests with regard to our big problems that their ultimate solution lies largely in increased production and the development of new and wider markets, apparently ignoring the fact that already from one end of this country to the other we have production that is altogether in excess of the buying power of the people. Surely it does not require a man of any great economic knowledge to recognize that if we have already too great production we shall not solve our problems by having still greater production. It would seem almost obvious that what we need to do is to increase the buying power of our people. That is the point of view which again and again during the past two or three years members in this quarter of the House have been trying to urge upon the government. There are only three or four factors necessary to production. We need the natural resources; we need labour; we need equipment, and under the present financial system we need financial capital. It is not necessary to speak of the natural resources of Canada; the Prime Minister has already waxed eloquent on that. It is not necessary to say anything in regard to labour; I have already indicated that there are vast numbers of our Canadians who are not able to obtain work and who could readily be utilized in developing these natural resources. In regard to equipment, you will permit me to quote just a few of the recognized authorities along this line. Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, says:

Canada is blessed with more railways than she has traffic for.

The Journal of Commerce declares:

We now have a plant capacity which in many lines is 20 per cent ahead of domestic consuming demand. In order to run full, 20 per cent of the output must be sent abroad.

The Shoe Manufacturers' Association declares:

The productive capacity of the Canadian shoe manufacturing industry and the distributing facilities of the shoe trade of Canada are much in excess of the requirements of the present Canadian population.

Mr. S. G. Latta, of Saskatchewan, said:

My province is now producing enough to feed approximately thirty million people. Our population is about three-quarters of a million and we are not making a living out of our production.

So much for the equipment that is necessary to develop these resources. But we have been told all along that in addition to these primary factors we must have financial capital. Well, that problem is now solved for us; for Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor at the last meeting of the Bank of Montreal stated:

It is a matter of national importance that the commercial loans in Canada of all our banks are $100,000,000 less than a year ago. . . . These figures indicate the ability of the banks of Canada to finance a trade revival when it occurs. Furthermore, while there is this excess banking capital in the country, borrowing abroad, which increases our interest remittances—already too heavy—is not a necessity.

At present, then, according to one of the outstanding authorities in banking circles, we already have more than abundant financial capital to carry on the affairs of this country, and that without resorting to any of the changes which have been advocated by my colleague and other members of this House. I am speaking of the economic system as it now stands. We already have our natural resources, our labour, our equipment, our financial capital; what more do we need? I think that the real difficulty was indicated many years ago by the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, from which I should like to quote a few sentences:

> A careful analysis of all available statistics shows that in our great basic industries the workers are unemployed for an average of at least one-fifth of the year, and that at all times during any normal year there is an army of men who can be numbered only by hundreds of thousands who are unable to find work. . . . fundamentally this unemployment seems to rise from two great causes, though many others are contributory. First, the inequality of the distribution of income, which leaves the great masses of the population, the true ultimate consumers, unable to purchase the products of industry which they create, while a few have such a superfluity that it cannot be normally consumed, but must be invested in new machinery for production, or in further monopolization of land and natural resources. . . .
> The result is that we have an equipment in plant and developed property far in excess of the demands of any normal year, the excess being in all probability at least 25 per cent. Each of these plants keeps around it a labour force which on an average can get work for only four-fifths of the year, while at the same time the people have never had enough of the products of those very industries—have never been adequately fed, clothed, housed, or warmed—for the very simple reason that they have never been paid enough to permit their purchase.

I think surely that is all that needs to be said to indicate the way out.

The Speech goes on to speak of the existing burden of taxation as being due mainly to uncontrollable expenditure in the nature of payments and obligations arising out of the war, and to the encumbered position of the National Railways. The burden of taxation no one will deny. Will you permit me, Mr. Speaker, to quote a few figures, because in this connection we should think not merely of the taxation under the Dominion government but of the other taxes which Canadians must bear. The gross debt of the Dominion is $2,940,099,088.35. The securities guaranteed by the Dominion amount to $590,510,932.55. The funded and floating debt of the provinces amounts to $697,785,627. The funded and floating debt of the municipalities amounts to $706,644,567. That gives a grand total of $4,935,040,134.90; that is $548 per capita on a basis of 9,000,000 of population, or an average capital debt of $2,740 for a family of five. That is the burden of debt which we carry at the present time. But should the expenditures involved be regarded as uncontrollable? A great many people of this country are beginning to ask questions along these lines: Why should bondholders be exempted from the ordinary vicissitudes of life? Why should the value of bonds be nearly doubled since their issue and their enhanced value held sacred? Why should the Canadian Pacific Railway be permitted to take 10 per cent as a first charge on industry? Why should the banks, after the most lavish overhead expenses, be permitted to declare 12 per cent and a bonus? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that sooner or later the war debt itself must be tackled. We cannot forever allow the people of Canada to be saddled with this enormous debt.

According to the Bankers' Trust Company the net result of the war so far as it concerns most of the people of this country has been the transference of wealth from one group of people to another group. In speaking of this redistribution of wealth caused by the war the Bankers' Trust Company in a little book, the Inter-Ally Debts, says:

> The actual wealth of the country in real estate and other tangible assets has not changed materially, but the mortgage on that wealth, if we may use such an expression, held by the owners of the government's debt, has materially changed.

According to the figures of this authority the pre-war wealth was per capita $1,831.25. On the supposition that we have now 9,000,000 people the post-war debt is $1,666.67, almost as great. The pre-war income was per capita $250; the post-war income is per capita $266.67. That is, we are on the average better off since the war than we were before the war, and still we hear about bad times, still we are bearing enormous burdens.

I have spoken of our enormous war debts. What about the cost of government? The cost of federal government, from the latest figures available for last year, was $424,645,217. The cost of the provincial governments was $130,887,303. The cost of municipal governments was $247,255,345. These make a grand total of $802,787,865. That is $89 per capita on an estimated population of 9,000,000, or $445 of an average annual charge for a family of five. These are some of the enormous burdens which we are carrying at the present day It may be of interest to note, by the way, that if the figures of the Bankers' Trust Company are correct, and comparing those with the figures which I have just now given, it would seem as if one-third of the average income goes to keeping up the governments of the country.

Last night the Prime Minister quoted Mr. R. S. White, in the Commercial and Financial Review of the past year. Mr. White says in a passage not quoted:

> On November 30th the funded debt of the Dominion was $2,593,000,000, of which no less than $1,929,000,000, or upwards of 70 per cent, is payable in Canada. Approximately $100,000,000 of interest on debt is being paid annually to Canadian bondholders.

That is, the war had this effect: It transferred the wealth of this country into the hands of a very small group of people or perhaps, to put it a little more accurately, put into the hands of a little group of people mortgages on the entire wealth of Canada. The result is that to-day a comparatively small group of people is receiving an annual tribute from the rest of the citizens of Canada of $100,000,000 per year. Further than that, of this enormous tribute over one-half is tax free.

Mr. LANCTOT: That is worse.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Much worse. That is the thing to which we need to pay attention. That is the situation with regard to our internal affairs.

I should like to ask, in passing, one other question: How was this debt created? I think attention has been drawn within the last two or three years to a little pamphlet issued by the Liberal party, back in May, 1915, with regard to war contract scandals—horses, boots, drugs, binoculars, motor trucks, and so on. This same matter is alluded to in a motion already on the order paper of the present session. It was stated at that time:

> One outstanding fact in connection with the investigation should be kept in mind. The total amount of money involved in the purchases investigated was no more than $3,000,000. This included the price of the submarines. In other words, the Public Accounts committee's investigation touched less than one-sixteenth of the $50,000,000 voted by parliament in August for war purposes.

What about the other two billions that were spent on the war? What are we going to do about it? Simply forget all the past and burden ourselves, and our children, and our children's children with these enormous loads? Have those who looted the public treasury been prosecuted? This is the question that many are asking to-day, though it may not often be asked in this House. Has the government sought to recover the loot? No. On the other hand we continue to pay interest on the graft. It may very well be said that many of the present bondholders are innocent. That may be true, but I submit that in ordinary legal practice the receivers of stolen goods, although they may suffer hardship, are not protected in this way.

I should like to pause for just a few minutes to consider another development that has taken place in Canada that will bring us under bondage not merely to a portion of our own people, but ultimately to an outside nation. In a review of the United States investments in Canada, issued by the United States Department of Commerce under the direction of Herbert Hoover, the following statement is made:

> Economically and socially Canada may be considered as a northern extension of the United States, and our trade with Canada is in many respects more like domestic trade than our foreign trade with other countries.

The United States capital invested in Canada, the department shows, has increased from $420,000,000 in 1915 to at least $2,425,000,000 in 1922, or nearly six-fold. In the same period British capital in Canada has remained very nearly stationary, amounting to $1,860,000,000 in 1915, and to $1,980,000,000 in 1922. Further than that, the United States in recent years has largely replaced Great Britain as Canada's banker. In the eight years just preceding the war 73.5 per cent of all of Canada's borrowings were from Great Britain and 9 per cent from the United States. In the eight years ending with 1922 only 2 per cent of Canada's borrowing came from Great Britain and 33 per cent from the United States. I might add, on the authority of Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor that in 1924 Canada's borrowings in the New York market amounted to two hundred millions which, as he quite correctly points out in a passage already quoted, means a definite added interest charge on the people of this country. It would seem that if these conditions continue very much longer Canadians may be reduced to the position of being literally hewers of wood and drawers of water for the capitalists of the United States. Then too, it should be noted, these enormous incomes that are being enjoyed by the people of the United States are not taxed as the Canadian incomes are taxed. According to the Commissioner of Taxation "under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act, 1917 a non-resident is not liable to income tax in respect of dividends or interest paid to him by the Canadian company." So there we have the situation, that although enormous wealth is being produced in this country a very considerable proportion of it is being drained away to others who do not assume their fair share of the load. I have nothing whatever against the capital being American in ownership; but this condition enables us to see very clearly the character of the great economic movements of the present day. There are some in the west who will tell us that the solution is to break up confederation. There are some from the east who are inclined to echo the same doctrine. I do not wonder very much that this position is being taken by those who are carrying an undue proportion of this load. But I should like to urge that economic questions are deeper than political questions, and that economic questions cannot be solved by mere political methods; they require economic solutions.

I should like now, for a few moments, to come particularly to the Speech as it refers to the labour people of Canada. I do not know that it was any great surprise but certainly it is a matter of keen regret to the labour men across Canada that the Speech contains no intimation whatever that the government is proposing at the present session to carry out its pledges made to labour. I hold in my hand a copy of a pamphlet entitled Liberals and Labour. A pre-election appeal to labour issued by the Liberal committee in October, 1921, at the very forefront of which stands the name of Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Liberal leader. This document begins by criticising the Conservatives for their action, or rather inaction, with regard to labour affairs.

The Conservative government failed to act. It was all a case of promise and pretence used only to fool the labour vote on the eve of elections.

I wonder whether this document can be said to differ very largely from those issued by the Conservatives, and I consider that it ought to be known to the labour people across Canada from coast to coast that the actual record of the Liberal government during the past three years has been almost barren of any enactment that is in the interest of the group commonly known as labour. The Liberals advocated at that time, the placing of the implements of production and food on the free list. I waited for three years for something along that line, and then last year introduced an amendment to the budget—but without any very noticeable results. In addition to the tariff policy referred to this document goes on—

Resolved that the committee recommends that the National Liberal Convention accept in their entirety, as a part of the Liberal platform in the spirit they have been framed, and in so far as the special circumstances of the country will permit, the terms of the Labour Convention and general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporated in the conditions of peace.

Now, let me remind the House that these general principles incorporated into the treaty at the Peace Conference of Versailles are just as vitally a part of that treaty as were any of the international boundaries drawn up at that time, and labour had a right to expect their fulfilment. And further, we have here the promise that the Liberal party would carry out these provisions to the utmost of their ability. I propose to read these clauses with very brief comments, asking what the government has done with regard to these reforms to which it is solemnly committed.

These methods and principles for regulating labour conditions so set forth in the treaty are as follows:

First, The guiding principle that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

I should like to ask the government to point out any specific cases in which they have regarded labour, or enacted legislation providing that labour should not be regarded, as anything else than a commodity. I fail to see any application of that principle in the immigration policy or in the provision for unemployment for example to which we have already referred.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What would the hon. gentleman say with regard to the appointment of the president of the Trades and Labour Congress to the Board of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I quite intended to recognize that the government had carried out that provision, but I fail to see how he connects the appointment of the president of the Trades and Labour Congress to the Board of the Canadian National Railways with this principle that labour is not to be regarded as a commodity. I am quite open to any suggestion along that line, but I cannot quite see how this action is an application of the principle.

Second. The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

The only opportunity that we have had of testing the government on that was a resolution I brought forward two years ago, asking that bank clerks be given a right to organize, which resolution was voted down by the government.

Third. The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

It is pointed out here repeatedly that the average wage paid to the employees in this country is far below the average minimum set by the official government standard. Furthermore, many of the government employees are receiving far less than the standard which the government itself sets up as being the minimum for a decent standard of living. As I think I pointed out when the estimates were before the House dealing with civil service employees, there were postal workers, in the city of Winnipeg, employees of this government, receiving a smaller amount than was being paid in doles to those in receipt of charity from the city.

Fourth. The adoption of an eight-hour day or a forty-eight hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

The government has sought to escape responsibility for this by saying that this was not within the province of the Dominion government; but last year when they were pressed on this matter by an amendment which I introduced, the Minister of Labour said that it would not be possible to put into practice this principle of an eight-hour day on the government owned public works, because that might involve unfair competition with the private employers.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not desire to make a statement that is not correct, but he does make a statement which is not correct when he says the Minister of Labour said it would not be possible. If the hon. gentleman would stick to the record it would be better I think for him and all concerned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall be glad to have members of the House refer to Hansard for what was said in regard to that matter.

Mr. MURDOCK: Will the hon. gentleman correct that statement by reading Hansard himself and giving the House the statement made by the Minister of Labour? The reason I make that request is that all over the country according to the press, the same misstatements have been made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I can only reaffirm what I said. My recollection of Hansard—and I think I am correct in this—is that what was said was in line with the statement I have just made. I have no desire to misrepresent the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), and if on reading the statement in Hansard I find I have not quoted him correctly I shall be very glad to bring the correct statement before the House.

Fifth. The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours which should include Sunday whenever possible.

Yet we have had for example the steel works in Nova Scotia when they are in operation working their men eleven and thirteen hour shifts, and every other week twenty-four hours on end. We have even had the seven-day week existing here in the city of Ottawa among some of the government's own employees.

Sixth. The abolition of child labour, and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

I am glad to know that the Liberal Association recognized their responsibility along educational lines, even although that is not expressly stated under the British North America Act. I am quite aware that the actual conduct of education comes within the scope of the powers of the province, but the fact is that there are thousands of children across Canada to-day who, because of the prevailing economic conditions, are being withdrawn from school. In my own province we have had a large number of schools shut down because of insufficient financial resources. Further than that, we have had the government carrying on the existing system of juvenile immigration which has involved a very large supply of child labour for the farms and homes of this country.

Seventh. The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

I can find no effort whatever in the civil service even to carry out this principle.

Eighth. The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

I cannot find that any effort has been put forth to make good this promise. As a matter of fact, we have not even the political rights that ought to be accorded to labour, and to all citizens. We still have on our statute books legislation by which certain groups of people born outside of Canada are deprived of the right of trial by jury, and other legislation very decidedly limiting freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of assembly. I am not entirely blaming this government; I want to point out conditions as they exist, so, perhaps, I should say in fairness to the government, that one or two efforts have been made to amend the Immigration Act but that these amendments have been rejected by the Senate.

Ninth. Each state should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the unemployed.

I cannot learn that any action has been taken along this line. Further, this document goes on to say:

1. That the introduction into the government of industry of principles of representation whereby labour and the community, as well as capital, may be represented in industrial control, and their interests safeguarded and promoted in the shaping of industrial policies.

That has not been carried out even in government departments. In the Department of Public Works for instance, and in our other civil service departments, especially the Post Office Department where it would have seemed possible to introduce something along the line of the Whitley Councils, so far that has not been done. I read further:

2. That in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the Dominion and the provinces by effective co-operation between the several governments.

Up to date there has been no provision whatever for unemployment insurance. Last year's committee of this House prepared a report on old age pensions. That report, however, was only presented and was not recommended to this House, and the Speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever that action along this line is contemplated. As to maternity benefits and sickness benefits, these have not even been mooted.

3. The representation of labour on federal commissions pertaining to labour matters.

We might very well have representation, as has been asked for by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, on the Industrial Research board and other boards. That seems a very reasonable request.

4. Effective legislation for the conservation of human life and health.

In the past year or so there has been a distinct tendency to cut estimates along these lines rather than to make more abundant provision for the conservation of life and health.

5. The representation of labour on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

I gladly admit that this has been done, and we have the president of the Trades and Labour Congress, one member on the board, representing labour.

6. That the system of re-training soldiers, unfitted for their past work because of physical injuries, be extended to disabled workers in industry.

I have been unable to learn that any steps have been taken to make good this pledge.

7. More effective restriction of Chinese immigration.

In face of this, we had last year the iniquitous regulation—I can call it no other —of permitting Chinese in bond to work on the boats of the British Empire Steel Corporation.

8. The federal incorporation of co-operative associations.

This has been urged again and again. What action the government will take on a resolution in this regard before the House at this session remains to be seen; but when two years ago we in this corner of the House pressed for legislation that would permit of the organization of co-operative banks, it was refused us.

9. The acceptance of the principle of proportional representation.

The government may possibly say that it agrees with the principle. Certainly, it has not put it into practice because we have had that proposed from this side and it has not received government support.

10. Immediate and drastic action by the government with respect to the high cost of living and profiteering.

Perhaps we should hope along this line, for at this fourth session of parliament the Governor General's Speech offers to us the prospect that the government may still continue to consider this matter.

11. Restoration of the control of the executive by parliament, and of parliament by the people through a discontinuance of government by order in council and a just franchise and its exercise under free conditions.

I do not know that we have had government by order in council. I think we have been a good deal freer in that regard than we were during war-time. But I would point out the danger that we may substitute government by commission, because in recent years, not altogether by this government, but by previous governments, there have been erected powerful commissions that are not very directly responsible to this parliament. Further, we have had one or two examples of what might be termed government by department. I think of the case of a man refused entry to this country not in accordance with regulations passed by this parliament, but because of certain regulations decided upon by the then Minister of Immigration. We have had placed before us this charter of Labours Rights by the Liberal Association, and no doubt many labour men have been induced to support the Liberal government because they believed the government would carry out at least some of the provisions contained in this charter. Labour has been patient, perhaps too patient. At this fourth session of parliament we might surely have expected that something would be done. I do not intend here to urge in detail what could be done even under existing circumstances. I should like to suggest to this House, as I have done before, that as we gather together in the comfortable surroundings of this chamber and discuss general principles and statistics, we are very far removed indeed from the great masses of the people of Canada. During the past recess, I have had an opportunity of going across Canada from coast to coast, and I do not find that the people in the east, or the west, or the centre, are very happy. Possibly the Prime Minister and those who accompanied him may have had opportunities of meeting with the well-to-do and those who are profiting by, and comfortable under, existing conditions. I have had an opportunity of coming into very close contact with those who are anything but comfortable or satisfied. I would urge that we should not, for the sake of mere party advantage, neglect the pressing problems of the hour, nor fail to carry out the principle that underlies one of these clauses of the Liberal platform which I have read—that human values are of infinitely more importance than mere material considerations. We should recognize clearly that the interests of labour and of the common people of the country ought to receive the first consideration. There, it seems to me, is the fundamental question that confronts the people of this country. Everywhere we are told that property must be protected, that the bondholders must be made secure, and so on. The time is coming when the people will rise in their might, not by means of armed strength, for they do not need that in this country, but in the full force of their intelligence, and demand that the governing bodies of this country see to it that their welfare shall receive first attention.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) will not consider it amiss if I do not follow his address in detail nor attempt to reply to the various arguments he has made, whether I disagree with him or approve wholly of anything in particular which he has said. I do wish, however, to observe that the hon. gentleman's remarks on this occasion have been very moderate, in large measure reasoned, and in some respects, I think apt and timely. I cannot always follow him in some of his views, nor can I endorse his policies, but we can all agree that he is at all times most earnest in the advocacy of whatever views he happens to hold.

The hon. gentleman somewhat severely arraigned the government for its dereliction of duty in the carrying out of its pledges to labour. I think he has done the government in this regard a slight injustice, which I am sure they will welcome my hastening to rectify. If the hon. gentleman had read carefully the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), or if he had listened with keener attention to the right hon. gentleman's speech as he delivered it, he might have observed that the Prime Minister does set forth what the government proposes to do for labour. As a matter of fact, it is the only reference to the subject which I can find, and I hasten to give the government full credit for it, even though it is nothing very substantial. The Prime Minister said:

> We have taken steps to improve the labour situation as regards the development of the natural resources by strengthening our immigration programme.

I think my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) ought in justice to the government to give them credit for what they are attempting to do: they are going to cure the unemployment evil and appease the dissatisfaction in regard to short hours, and all that, by bringing in more labour. That is the government's policy, and as far as it goes it deserves recognition. I shall have something to say later on however, concerning the wisdom of this policy.

I followed with a great deal of care and interest the speech of the Prime Minister yesterday. The right hon. gentleman spent, I think, about two hours placing on Hansard long lists of statistics to demonstrate that the conditions in the United States were worse than they are in Canada, in some regards at least. He quoted copiously from Iron Age, Dun's, and Bradstreet's and other periodicals of that kind, including certain government publications. In my opinion the Prime Minister may quote from now until Doomsday without once persuading the people of Canada that conditions here are at all liquid—I am not referring to the province of Quebec but to the whole country. To put it more positively, so far as industrial development is concerned the conditions in this country are stringent and there are difficulties facing the people which they are most anxious to see tackled, with some solution in view. But the present pressing problems apparently are receiving no attention from the government from the practical standpoint of providing such a solution, and the lengthy quotations of the Prime Minister certainly will not convince the people that things are as happy as he tries to make out. I do not intend, however, to follow the Prime Minister's example and quote endless lists of other statistics to disprove what he has said. Rather, I shall endeavour to place before the House certain major problems which I believe the House should consider and which I conceive it to be the first duty of the government to take hold of and if possible remedy, at least so far as they can.

There are three main problems which, I think, should receive consideration and which I shall examine in some detail. These problems are: First, the question of taxation; second, the great problem of transportation; third, the paucity of credit and capital and the alarming depopulation of Canada. I purpose following these questions with some care and I trust I shall be able to offer to the House some suggestions of a practical nature. I am, of course, not so foolish as to suppose that either this government or any individual or group of individuals is capable of at once offering a policy that will remedy all these conditions, but I do think that we should make a most strenuous effort to provide some adequate solution, a practical solution moreover, and not suggestions that are merely visionary.

Let us take first the question of taxation. I shall refer first of all to some of the contents of the Speech from the Throne and I shall do so in my own language. The government refers to the question of taxation—or rather to put the matter more accurately, it brushes the question aside with the somewhat gloomy comment that the most rigid economy will not solve the problem. Let me offer two observations in that regard. In the first place there is no evidence of rigid economy, and in the second place the government has not tried to apply the principle of economy to the solution of the taxation problem. As a matter of fact they have not sought to solve the problem at all. I am not disputing the statement of the Prime Minister, which has been made by other gentlemen, that taxation is heavy, and necessarily heavy, because of the war and the war debt. That is admitted. We also admit that we must have extensive taxation in Canada to meet the needs of government and of the country. On the other hand, it must be obvious, I think, that the problem of taxation is not merely a question of quantity; the important question is the method of applying the principle of taxation. I want to draw the attention of the government to one or two matters in connection with taxation which I think can readily be met and which at present are working to the detriment of the development and advancement of business in this country. I will not go into any close analysis of the whole situation, but I shall refer to one or two very important facts. Let us take first of all the question of income tax on business, that is to say, the income tax as applied to corporations. All corporations outside partnerships are taxed by the federal government 10½ per cent on their net profits, while, in addition to that, certain provinces impose a further tax. In the case of British Columbia the provincial tax is 9 per cent. So that in that province the total tax on business is 19½ per cent; I am not sure what the tax is in other provinces. Some have no income tax. Manitoba has, and I think Saskatchewan has, though I am not quite certain. At any rate, some of the provinces have an income tax. But this is what I want to bring to the attention of the government; and if the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will give me his attention for a moment I will offer him a problem which I think is worthy of his consideration. We will take a lumber exporter or a fish exporter in British Columbia—I use these for purposes of illustration because I am familiar with them. A Canadian business man in British Columbia buys or sells lumber or fish upon the world market. He pays to the provincial and Dominion governments 19½ per cent in taxes on his net income. The business man in Seattle can send an agent into British Columbia, buy timber in the same market, sell it in the same market, ship it on the same vessel,—and he pays no income tax to this country. I ask the government, which is going to persevere. Which is going to last in his business, the Canadian business man or the American business man? Unquestionably the American. So far as British Columbia is concerned—and mark you, the same thing applies in other sections—one-half of our lumber export business, or nearly so, is being done to-day from the United States, by business men in the United States, and we are not getting a revenue from that business. Furthermore, many Canadian business men are considering the removal of their head offices to Seattle and the operating of their businesses from that point.

Let me give an illustration in connection with the fisheries. Certain Japanese fishery companies export fish from British Columbia. I will name one, a very noted company—one of the largest in the world—Mitsui & Company, with head office in Seattle. A white fishery company, operated by Canadian citizens and with head office in Vancouver has to meet the competition of the Japanese company with headquarters in Seattle. Both handle Canadian fish, on the same markets. The Canadian company pays a 19½ per cent tax, whereas the Japanese company, established in Seattle, gets off free. I use this illustration for the purpose of pointing out a gross inequity in our income tax law. And I am not going to leave it there. What do they do in the Old Country? In the Old Country when an outsider comes in and does business in that way the Tax Commissioner or his agent presents him with an assessment, whether or not he is resident in the district, as representing a foreign firm. The assessment is made without any access to the books of the company, and usually it is made very high, forcing the company's representative to appeal the assessment and then to disclose what his earnings in the country have been. By that process they get the income tax.

Now, I want to point out to the Prime Minister that this is a type of taxation that is steadily driving business out of Canada and will drive more out. And it is a type of taxation that is capable of being remedied by a very minor amendment to the act. I bring that to the attention of the government and point out that while the Speech from the Throne says that the most rigid economy, and so on, does not solve the problem, the adjustment of these inequities in connection with the administration of the act will aid in the alleviation, of the burden of taxation upon the Canadian people. I shall refer to taxation in a general way a little later.

Let me now turn briefly to transportation. I do not intend to deal at great length with this matter, because we are severely handicapped in that regard. The ministry have the advantage of knowing what they purpose doing in respect to a certain reference made in the Speech from the Throne; we have not that advantage. So far as I am concerned I propose to suspend all criticism, friendly or unfriendly, of the government's proposal until I see the proposal in all its details. But there are certain observations I am justified in making in connection with the government's position on transportation. As regards freight rates, I shall not go into those at great length because the land freight rates question has been very thoroughly threshed out in this House and out of it. But I wish to say to my hon. friends to my left that whatever the Supreme Court of Canada may see fit to do with the Crowsnest pass agreement, whether they restore it or do not restore it, the transportation question so far as freight rates are concerned will not be solved. If they restore the Crowsnest rates on the prairies it simply means continued chaos and confusion in the matter of the freight rates of this country. So far as my province is concerned it means an increase of the gross discrimination which already exists. As to some of the prairie sections and some sections in the east it simply means further discrimination against particular parts of the country. If Canada is to expand and develop there must be found in connection with transportation, as in other lines of public activity, some harmony, some equity.

It will not do for the government simply to say that as the matter is before the courts nothing can be done in regard to the freight rates question. The Prime Minister indicated in his western speeches that he was very much alive to the need of a solution of this question. While he did not say so in express terms or in language that would justify the claim that it should later be given expression to in legislation, yet his remarks on the subject to the people all through the west implied that this government was deeply concerned with the freight rates problem, was seeking a solution of it, and would offer to parliament a solution at the coming session. I want to say to him in all courtesy that the fact that the Supreme court is studying this technical and legal point does not in the slightest degree absolve him and his government from responsibility in the matter.

In regard to ocean rates I have already stated that I am necessarily precluded from offering any criticism or any approval of the government's proposal. I will say that any proposal which will bring about the carrying of the produce of this country to its ultimate market at lower cost than at present will undoubtedly be welcomed by Canada. But when I heard the Prime Minister last night in the closing remarks of his speech—the last fifteen minutes—preface his discussion of this problem with the word "combine", I knew at once that he was simply seeking first to create in the public mind the impression that a combine existed, and then to make the subtle suggestion to the people that he was about to dissolve or dispose of this combine in some way. So far as the north Atlantic freight rates are concerned there is just one point I might suggest to the Prime Minister. It is not a question of combine; it is a question of whether the freights of this country are being carried at a fair cost and a fair rate to those who carry them. I want to remind the Prime Minister that for three years he has had under his control a splendid fleet of ships.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends laugh, and what they are laughing at is this, that during the war the cost of producing shipping was higher than it is to-day. That applies to every private shipowner in the world; many of the companies have gone into liquidation and bankruptcy because of that fact. So that will not excuse them for neglecting an opportunity of dealing with this problem. I say they have had under their control a splendid fleet of ships, some of them operating on the Pacific, others operating in different parts of the world. Why is it necessary—I ask this question in reference to this proposal, whatever it may be, and of which we can learn only through the newspapers—to ask the taxpayers of Canada to subsidize a privately owned line when you have ships, a large number of ships and better ships than they have, already in your possession and operating allegedly at a loss? Here we have ten or fifteen ships, or thereabouts, operating in this Atlantic combine to-day. The government have for three years sanctioned, blessed, approved and supported the membership of their own ships in this combine, and now they come forward and say: The combine is an iniquity; it must be smashed. This combine question is simply something that is reared for the mystification of the public mind: that is all.

My hon. friend the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) a moment ago referred to the Great Lakes freight bill as not being a success. Not only has it not been a success, but my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen), some of my colleagues and myself, told the government two years ago when the bill was introduced that it was a farce, a hopeless piece of legislation that could not be enforced. The result was, as my right hon. leader stated yesterday, that a year ago last fall the government went on their knees to Cleveland, Buffalo and Chicago to beg American shipping to come into the lake carrying trade. Last year the government brought down an amendment to that legislation. We told them then that the amendment would not work; we pointed out the weaknesses in it. But they insisted on carrying it through. After wrestling with it for two days the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) went away with some sort of a nervous breakdown, knowing perfectly well that the bill was a piece of abortive legislation, simply an effort to hoodwink my hon. friends to my left, to induce them to believe that the government was looking after their interests. I want to warn the government before they bring down this new legislation respecting ocean freight rates that, in the light of the fact that they have for three years had it in their hands to do without subsidies what they now propose to do with subsidies, we are justified in expecting this new legislation to be more or less abortive.

The great problem in transportation, as far as it can be practically dealt with here, resolves itself into this—the carrying of the major or basic product of the west, wheat, to the seaboard at a lower cost than at present. Why? It is a simple economic problem and ought to be faced. When I say simple, I mean it is a problem simple to see: I do not say it is simple to solve. The problem is this. The wheat of western Canada must compete on the foreign market at Liverpool—Liverpool being the centre—with the wheat of the Argentine, India, Egypt and some other countries, but these in particular. The wheat of the Argentine and Egypt is within a few hundred miles of the seaboard; the wheat of Canada is approximately from one to two thousand miles from the seaboard. How can we give the Canadian farmer a fair, equitable chance to compete with this other wheat? If we can get his wheat to our seaboard at a cost commensurate with that paid by his competitor, he has a fair chance of competing on the world market. How to do that is the problem that this House ought to attempt to solve. Shall it be by absorbing a part of the mileage cost? I think that is a good idea; I think it is worth studying. But the government offer no solution of that problem. They offered nothing last year but an abortive lake rates bill, which after two years of trial and amendments has proven to be useless and a farce.

The other problem is the question of transporting coal and iron from the Maritime provinces to the great consuming centres of Ontario and Quebec, and of transporting the coal from Alberta to those markets. What are the facts? Last year $120,000,000 was sent from Canada to the United States for coal. Yet Canada possesses within her borders, so I am told, upwards of twelve hundred billion tons of known coal. I am told that this is approximately one-half of the known available coal deposits of the world. In Alberta alone there is 17 per cent of the available coal resources of the world, and yet last year we imported $120,000,000 worth of coal from the United States, and the same the year before, and for many years before that. The question Canada must face is this. Is there not some way of using this Canadian coal, and of using our great transportation systems for handling it, and thereby save sending out of this country to the United States $120,000,000 every year for coal? When I say sending it to the United States, that has significance. Why? For fifteen—yes for fifty—years, we have had a strong adverse balance of trade with the United States. For fifteen years our adverse trade balance with the United States has averaged $250,000,000 a year. But the significance of that figure can only be appreciated when you realize that we must export to the United States a very large sum every year to pay interest on the money we borrow from them. We have borrowed from the United States two and one-half billions of dollars for industries, upon which we pay interest. That interest is paid in the export of goods. But when you have an adverse trade balance such as I have mentioned, and built up in the way I have mentioned—whereas as a matter of fact the exact reverse should be the case—if we are to break barely even with the United States we ought to be shipping to them $250,000,000 a year more than we buy from them; that is in order to pay for the goods we buy and to pay the interest on what we borrow. But exactly the reverse is the case. We ought to correct that situation. It is sound business to tackle that problem. Why does not the government tackle it? The subject has been brought up in the House time after time, but the government have always turned a deaf ear to it; they have offered no suggestion, they have made no effort to meet the problem. We say this great question of transportation applies particularly to coal and iron from the Maritimes, and to coal from Alberta.

There is also in connection with the transportation problem the great waterways scheme. We have heard nothing from the government on this problem. I have no suggestion to make at this time other than this: The people of Canada ought to be and must be adequately and properly protected in whatever negotiations are carried on in connection with the great waterways development. We have in Canada tremendous water-powers, tremendous hydro-electric development and hydro-electric possibilities, but we must be mighty careful not to commit ourselves to our friends to the south in the way of contracts which later on will be construed as a vested right in Canada. That is the problem we are facing. What is the government doing about it? Is it doing anything? We have nothing said about it in the Speech from the Throne; there is not a particle of evidence that there is any interest taken in this great, practical problem by the government. Why, the development of hydro-electric power in Canada will do more to contribute to prosperity throughout the country than any other single thing. And yet this great question does not seem to concern the government at all; no attention is paid to it, no mention of it is made in the Speech.

Let us examine briefly the government's policy. I have here an excerpt from the Prime Minister's speech, and he will forgive me if I do not quote his policy in exactly the words he used, because it is quite lengthy. I have attempted to reduce it to one or two phrases. The government's policy is this: (a) To lower the cost of production. We agree on that. But how is it to be lowered? By removing the duties on instruments of production. Then (b) transportation; (c) markets. This is their programme. Now we take clear-cut issue with the government on this programme so far as we here are concerned. We are not objecting to lowering the cost of transportation; we are not objecting to getting markets for Canada; but we are objecting to the government's methods of doing these things. I want to examine the government's methods. I want to show, as I think I can, that these methods will not solve the problem at all, but rather will accentuate the sufferings and the losses to Canada itself. Let me emphasize what I intend now to say, giving utterance perhaps to an axiom with which all may be familiar:—wealth, the national wealth of a country, is made up of the things that are produced in that country by its people. I am quite aware that some may hasten to interject here that perhaps wealth may be got through trading. I am quite aware of that, but it ought to be apparent to anyone that Canada is not necessarily a trading country, that is, it is not necessarily a country of traders. Take a country like Greece or like Great Britain particularly; its people are essentially and primarily traders. Canada is not in that category at all. But even where a country is a trading country the greater amount of wealth comes out of the working up of the materials possessed by it into their higher degrees of development and production and marketing the products among their fellow men. That is where the maximum of wealth accrues to a nation; and there is no country under the sun to which that principle applies more definitely and clearly than Canada. The Prime Minister, in his speech yesterday, very properly said this: We have great natural wealth, we have great water-powers, we have unlimited coal resources, we have a tremendous mineral deposit, of the extent of which we do not dream, we have vast areas of fertile land to produce food, and we have great fisheries. All these things are perfectly true. These resources constitute a great asset placed in the hands of the government, and of each succeeding government, to be developed in the interest of the people. Now I come back to my principle, that the wealth of this country can be increased and built up. How? It can be increased and built up by taking all these resources co-ordinating them, and producing from them the very best and highest articles we can, to market in the consuming centres of the world.

Now, I want to proceed to analyze that a little more definitely. Canada requires citizen workers; that is the class of people we require in Canada—prosperous, happy, industrious, well paid citizen workers. The leader of the Progressive party this afternoon described Canadian labour as being superior to all other, and I may say that I support him in the statement that Canadian manhood is capable undoubtedly of the best. Certainly we all admit that. But my hon. friend said this further: Canadian labour ought to be able to compete with labour in all parts of the world. Now that is where we commence to take issue not only with my hon. friends to my left but with the government in their policy. We take issue with them and we say that while we know that, as far as the bone, and brawn and brain is concerned, Canadian labour is equal or superior to that of any other country, it is not fair to ask Canadian labour to compete with the lower standards of living of the labour of Europe. In other words: It is utter nonsense and absolutely incapable of being supported to say that Canadian labour shall compete on an equally free market with the labour of Europe and still maintain a Canadian standard of living. You cannot have it. There is no escape from that position. There is just one of two alternatives and that is this: Either Canadian labour will sink to the level of European labour or you have got to give them some protection. My hon. friends to my left talk very glibly about free trade. The leader of the Progressive party, for example, said a few minutes ago that as far as he was concerned he would wipe out exotic industries. He failed to tell the House what an exotic industry is, and I would ask him to get down to facts: Is the woollen industry an exotic industry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No answer.

Mr. STEVENS: Would my hon. friend (Mr. Forke) be pleased to answer?

Mr. FORKE: I would not suppose so.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not catch the murmur of my hon. friend.

Mr. FORKE: I would not suppose so.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says that he would not suppose so. Very good, that is a frank answer. My hon. friend says that he would not suppose the woollen industry is an exotic industry. What are the facts? We told them to the House last year; let us look them frankly in the face. By law—a law supported and enacted, I think, by my hon. friends to my left—the Ontario legislature says to the woollen manufacturer: Pay your help twice what is paid by the woollen manufacturer in England. That is an economic fact; there is no argument about it, it is a fact. The next step is this. Fifty-five per cent of the cost of your woollen goods is labour. What is the third step? The third step is simply this, that by statute you put a 27½ per cent handicap on the Canadian worker. Is that what he is entitled to? Is not the Canadian workman entitled to protection?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): What act of the Ontario legislature declares we must pay the Ontario workmen such a wage?

Mr. STEVENS: The Minimum Wage Act. Under the Minimum Wage Act the minimum wage which is paid a worker in a Canadian woollen mill is double the wage paid by the British woollen manufacturer to operatives in England where there is no minimum wage act.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Does not my hon. friend know that the Ontario Minimum Wage Act applies only to female labour and not to male labour?

Mr. STEVENS: In that case the situation is so much the worse because in the woollen industry practically all of what we call the lower paid grades is female labour. The same thing applies to the cotton industry and to many other industries. It is very humane legislation which I approve of, which my hon. friends approve of—at least they always say they do—it is a very humane thing, it is a recognition of the necessity of protecting labour. But I want to make this perfectly clear: We stand not for the protection of individual manufacturers, we stand for the protection of manufacturing industry. When I say that, I speak for every man and woman that works in a factory.

Now, let me take a step further in this matter. I remember that Mr. Drury once said before a committee in this House that if he had his way he would wipe out every industry that was not indigenous to the country. It is a case of playing with words—whether an industry is exotic or indigenous. Canada has certain resources capable of development, of utilization, and I want to examine a few of them briefly if I may. First, take pulpwood—and I want to appeal to my hon. friends from Quebec, because they perhaps are more largely affected than any section in Canada. Last year we produced in Canada—speaking roughly, I am not giving the exact figures—4,300,000 cords of pulpwood. Of this quantity 1,337,000 cords went out of the country as cordwood. Another one-third was manufactured into pulp and a further one-third was manufactured into paper. The price received for that pulpwood, putting it into terms of paper, amounted to half a cent per pound; the return for the pulp on the same basis was three cents a pound; the return for the paper and paper goods was approximately six cents a pound. The question we ask ourselves is this: What pays Canada best—selling paper at six cents a pound or selling pulp at half a cent a pound?

I leave that subject now and turn to the case of copper. Eighty-eight per cent of Canada's copper leaves this country in an unrefined condition; that is, in a condition below the condition of refined copper. A large portion of it goes out in ore, just taken out of the ground, common rock, until the smelting processes are applied; and some of it is copper matte. But 88 per cent of our copper—that is the point—leaves this country in an unrefined condition. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) talks about markets. He says we must have markets. I will give him an opportunity to get a market now. Great Britain purchases the largest quantity of copper of any country in the world. Over 100,000 tons of refined copper per year are purchased in Great Britain. Germany comes second with about 95,000 tons. Where does Great Britain get her copper? She gets a substantial portion of it, I venture to say over fifty per cent, from the United States, 7 per cent from Canada, some from Spain and some from other countries. Germany, by the way, gets 84 per cent of her refined copper from the United States. What are we doing? We ship 88 per cent of our copper production to the United States in an unrefined condition. Is not it the part of wisdom for the government to bring about a co-ordinating of Canadian production with British consumption of copper? Is not that a sound principle? And in this my hon. friends will acquit me at once of talking even tariff. I am not talking tariff but talking simply business sense. Let us get round the table, consider this matter and bring this market to Canada. When I told some of the large consumers in the Old Country a few months ago about the tremendous production of copper they were amazed and they said, "We buy on the general market." Let me point out the iniquity—the tragedy, I might say—of the situation. We ship 88 per cent of our copper to the United States, they receive that copper, they refine it. And they control the refined copper market of the world, largely or substantially with our copper. They add the refining cost and the speculative profit as well, and then it is sold to Germany and Great Britain at the highest peak market price. This is the process that has been followed for thirty years. The Americans get it at a low price. It goes to the American Guggenheim interests, the great American copper trust interests. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister may talk about combines if he likes, but what do the Guggenheims do? They make their bargains with the British Columbia mines and other Canadian mines at the low price. Once they get their contract, up goes the price, and the copper is marketed at their own figures all over the world, one, two, three and five cents profit above the refining cost. Here is a great resource in Canada; let us take the necessary steps to bring that great resource directly to the market in the Mother Country.

Mr. HUGHES: What does the government do to prevent the business men of Great Britain and the business men of Canada from getting together?

Mr. STEVENS: I would not like to say. I want to be kind and charitable. I know of some things which I will criticise before the session is over, but I do not wish to say anything now. I am placing a positive duty on the government. The leader of the Progressives said that the government could give a lead in this matter. I am asking them to give the lead.

Then I take a third illustration, iron and steel. My hon. friend knows something about that or at least he ought to. The iron and steel industries of Canada were languishing last year. I do not see present in the House some members who are more directly interested in this. The chief whip on the government side (Mr. Kyte) is directly interested. However, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) is in his seat, and he knows that what I am saying is true. While the iron and steel industry was languishing in Canada last year we bought $140,000,000 worth of iron and steel products, of which we obtained $128,000,000 from the States. At the same time we had in Canada eleven hundred billion tons of known ore deposits in British Columbia, northern Ontario and the Maritime provinces, the vastest supply of iron ore I think of any country in the world. We bought $140,000,000 worth of iron and steel products. I am not saying that all of these products should be made in Canada, but a very large portion of them should be made in Canada. We bought $128,000,000 worth of iron and steel products from the United States at a figure a little higher than the price of the same products in Great Britain. You ask me, why?—facility—the long distance phone from Toronto to Pittsburg, and easy access to the source of supply made it desirable to pay the little higher price. But—and I am putting this proposition from the standpoint of my friends to my left—suppose that Canada increased her general tariff and left her preferential tariff where it is, we would at least divert some of this business to Great Britain. Is that sound? Great Britain buys about $225,000,000 more from us than we buy from her; for the last fifty years the balance of purchases has been on the same side. Is it not desirable that we should divert to Great Britain, if we can do so, some of this business of which I have been speaking?

Now I will address myself to my hon. friends to my left. Great Britain last year bought $337,000,000 worth of our agricultural products. She is the best customer you have outside of Canada. I am quite certain and satisfied that our present method of administering this great estate of ours is not in the best interests of Canada, does not conduce to develop Canada's trade and industry as it ought to be developed. Now I want to pass on to another phase of the matter. The Prime Minister last year said: We did a great thing for Canada; we lowered the price of machinery on basic industries. I am going to refer to one case and give an illustration of how it works, and I want you to tell me, if you can, where Canada gets any benefit from it—there are many other things that I could refer to, but I want you to consider this particular case. In Canada we had factories building logging machinery, working up a nice business, employing 250 or 300 men, the best type of labour; I mean that class of labour which is generally paid a wage which is looked upon as a fair and decent one. The employees were well organized and well protected by their organization; they bought Canadian material and Canadian goods. Last year the government took off the duty, and what is the result? The factory is closed, the men are dispersed, I do not know where; many of them have gone to the States. What are these companies doing? They have taken agencies for American machinery; they are acting as agents for American firms to-day. Where does Canada get the benefit in that? Do our people get cheaper machinery? Not a particle.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend forgets the purpose for which the machinery is used.

Mr. STEVENS: Tell me where anybody gets any advantage. I do not care what it is used for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We do.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend does not get my point at all. Let me make the point clear to him again. We had these factories building these machines, employing 250 men or thereabouts. To-day these factories are closed and the men are out of the country. These same firms are acting as agents for United States companies, selling American machinery in Canada and Canadians are paying the same prices for it. Nobody can gainsay that. If anybody can tell me where there is an advantage to Canada in that, I should like to hear it.

Mr. DAVIES: If the machinery did not become cheaper, what would cause the factories to close?

Mr. STEVENS: That is a very simple question, and my hon. friend should not have required an answer.

Mr. CRERAR: It is a very pertinent question.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a very simple one and I will answer it. The hon. member knows quite well, if he has given the question any thought at all, that what we are up against in Canada is American competition. You open your market to the American competition; you share your market with them and you have no access into theirs; we are absolutely shut out of their market. How in the world can we expect to compete under conditions of that kind? Let me illustrate this with a very homely illustration. Let us take Bank street running straight through Ottawa. Suppose the stores on one side of Bank street were altogether limited to business on that side, whereas the stores on the other side could deal anywhere they liked; which set of stores would prosper and survive? If my hon. friends will realize this fact and admit it, contrary to the statement of the leader of the Progressive party who a moment ago said that no amount of reasoning would ever persuade them that it was possible to have protection and to be successful in Canada—

Mr. FORKE: On the prairies.

Mr. STEVENS: I have his words here:

> No amount of reasoning will ever convince the prairies in regard to protection.

We have an international boundary 3,000 miles or more in length, from one end of the country to the other, with 108,000,000 people to the south, a huge market for their factories. On the other hand, we have Canada with a comparatively limited market. We open our doors and say to the American manufacturers: Share our market with our factories, but we cannot come into your territory. You cannot live under such conditions. It is all very well for my hon. friends to my left to state frankly, as I admit they do, and honestly, and for my hon. friends opposite inferentially to state, that Canadian industry, if it cannot survive, can sink. But when you are doing that you are dealing with blood and bone, and with the lives of people. The time has passed when we can look upon these questions from a detached, academic standpoint. This country, we know, is filled with unemployed. There is not in Canada a city of any size that has not its bread line to-day. My right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day said to the provinces: This is none of our business. My two hundred and fifty fellow citizens who were put out of business by his act last year —what is his answer to them? His answer is: I have nothing to do with you. You may be idle—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says that citizens were put out of employment by an act passed by this government last year. I should like him to prove that statement to the House.

Mr. STEVENS: If he will give me Hansard I will show him the discussion on the legislation of last year. He knows the act, the amendment to the Customs Act. I have here a petition which he has received, in connection with the boot and shoe industry. Where is the hon. member for Quebec East, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)? Do I strike a sympathetic chord in his heart, I wonder?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Always.

Mr. STEVENS: He has a smile on his face. I should be glad if he would pass a little of that smile over to the Prime Minister. I have in my hand a petition addressed to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, signed by two hundred and some odd workers. The Prime Minister will not be so facetious as to ask me to read the names and addresses. Will he take my word for this?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend would answer this question: How does it happen that in the United States, where protection, which he is defending, is so high, unemployment in the boot and shoe industry is relatively greater than it is in Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: If my right hon. friend expects to draw me off into that endless—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: That was a pretty vacant laugh. This is a rather serious question. If the Prime Minister expects to draw me off into an argument on long lists of statistics such as he gave to the House yesterday, he will be disappointed. Let me tell him where the competition is coming from. As regards boots and shoes it is not coming from the United States; it is coming just where the woollen competition is coming from,—from the Old Land and from Germany. We are being forced into competition with conditions of Great Britain and Germany. My hon. friends may say: Well, we must stand by Great Britain. I want to stand by Great Britain; but when I was over there a few months ago, I told some of the people—and I found a great response from many—that it was about time Great Britain put up her own fences and looked after her own interests. Simply because Great Britain, by her big banking institutions, her big carrying institutions, the shipping group, persists in the old free trade fetish, is no reason why we should do so.

To come back to the boot and shoe industry, my right hon. friend tried to draw me off into a discussion of figures of which I have no immediate knowledge and which I cannot give; but I know what is happening in Canada and I am not going into a long dissertation on figures which becloud the issue. My point is this, that as a direct result of the action of the government in the reduction of duties in 1922, 1923 and 1924, Canadian industry has suffered. I have this petition in regard to the boot and shoe industry, from all the boot and shoe workers. Every one is a worker.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Where is it from?

Mr. STEVENS: Vancouver. My right hon. friend has received petitions from other sections. Will the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) question my presenting this petition?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, to some extent. My hon. friend says it is a result of the changes effected in the tariff last year and the year before.

Mr. STEVENS: In 1922.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend not remember that many of his friends on the other side of the House said that the boot and shoe industry was not affected at all by the changes in the tariff owing to the Minister of Justice looking after that?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend cannot get away with that, for the simple reason that there was a reduction in the British preference.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but the leader of the opposition, (Mr. Meighen) and many other hon. gentlemen said that it was so slight as to be of no effect at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no.

Mr. STEVENS: I am happy that the minister reminds me of this. What we complained of then and what we complain of now is the drift of this government into worse or more dangerous waters still. It was the statement of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) that this was the death knell of protection, and of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) that this was the death knell of protection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I never used such a word. Let the hon. gentleman produce it if he can.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend said that they were going on and on until they fulfilled the 1919 platform.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is plenty of time yet.

Mr. STEVENS: Where is the death knell of protection now, and where is the 1919 platform? We might ask the Prime Minister: Are they going on? He told them in the west that they were. In that triumphal tour through the prairie provinces and through British Columbia, the Prime Minister, on platform after platform, told them that this policy enunciated a year ago and two years ago was going to be carried on in growing fulfilment. In Toronto he said; no, the time has come to stop; we are going to stabilize this thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say anything of the kind in Toronto.

Mr. STEVENS: I am wrong, it was in West York.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will have lots of time to see how far the government will proceed with its policy.

Mr. STEVENS: The Prime Minister is getting anxious. In West York what he did say was this,—"It is not fair to this government to ask them to go further. Let us pause and see how this is going to work out."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Pause" is right; my hon. friend is quite right in using that word.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, I am absolutely right, and I am going to show as I proceed just how it is going to work out. But in the meantime, how long shall we pause? How long is this time of uncertainty and anxiety going to last? I am trying to show the Prime Minister the result of his first step. Here are boot and shoe workers, every one of them a decent, honest citizen toiling daily for his bread, and it will not do for my hon. friends either to the left or opposite me to say callously, "Oh, if these industries cannot survive let them go down."

Mr. NEILL: Is it not a fact that it was recorded in the British Columbia papers last year or the year before that Messrs. Leckie Brothers, the biggest manufacturers of boots in Vancouver, proposed to spend a very large sum in enlarging their factory?

Mr. STEVENS: That may be so, and I hope it is.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Why the laughter? Hon. gentleman break out into bursts of ironical laughter simply because some factory in Canada proposed extending its business. What is the offence? I want to see every factory making money so that it can expand; I am sure that everybody wants to see industries making sufficient money to pay labour a decent, living wage. And while I am on that point, let me say that every dollar that industry can save and put into further development is infinitely better spent than if it were taken into the exchequer of the government. Is that a crime? It is the acme of perfection in economic development.

Mr. NEILL: I did not say it was any crime for a factory to undertake developments, but I did think that this might be a place for the 250 idle men to get a job.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is, without question, the wit of the House, but it is a pretty callous thing for him to suggest with a witticism of that kind, no matter how clever it may be, that this petition is a huge joke and that the answer of the Prime Minister should be; go and look for work in this prospective factory which it is rumoured is to be built in the future. These people are suffering in common with boot and shoe employees throughout the country, and I had no idea of making political capital in referring to the matter; I simply wanted to bring the matter to the attention of the government. It seems, however, that the government is inclined to make political capital of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You might open a seat, for instance.

Mr. STEVENS: These workers are in need of protection and they have every right to expect it.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was examining the government's policy as it relates to the problems at present facing Canada. Frankly, I had hoped to finish before six o'clock, but there are a few more things I desire to say before I conclude.

Before leaving the subject of increasing production, and so forth, and the government's policy of finding markets, it seems to me that there is a most excellent opportunity for the government to find markets. I have pointed out to the government the huge importations of coal and iron and the opportunity of a market for copper which I think is worth most careful study. Indeed, I am convinced that it is not sound business policy for us to continue importing $120,000,000 of coal and $140,000,000 worth of iron and steel products every year while within our own territory we have vast deposits of both these useful materials.

I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not in his seat, because I wished to press home the point with which I was dealing when the House rose, as regards the intention of the government. Last year we were informed by one of the responsible ministers of the crown that it was the intention of the government to pursue the course they were following until they had brought about the death of protection.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend allow me, before he leaves the coal question—does he advocate an increase of the duty on coal? Is that the argument?

Mr. STEVENS: As far as I am concerned, yes; because I think the Maritime provinces will never have prosperity until they get some definite protection for their interests as regards the production of coal and iron and steel. I am glad the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) interjected that question, for this reason—and I am not saying this simply to win a little sympathy or support from the Maritime provinces—I look upon the Maritime province problem as perhaps one of the most serious problems facing Canada. There is the problem of the great prairie provinces; we know of it; they have able representatives here and we have had it debated; it is a problem that has to be faced. The problem of the Maritime provinces has been presented here occasionally, but apparently it has not gripped the attention of the people of Canada as it should. I think their main difficulty is that of getting their basic products, coal and iron and steel, to the great central provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and having a reasonable share in that market.

Mr. ROBB: I just interrupted my hon. friend because, as he represents British Columbia, I wanted to find out if that was the opinion of British Columbia. It has been represented to the government that the duties on coal should not be added to because the United States might retaliate and destroy the market British Columbia now has for coal in the United States.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I am aware of that. my attitude on that question is this—and I will say it for the benefit of my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) who said "hear, hear" a moment ago—so far as Canada is concerned a policy of protection must be a policy which applies from one end of Canada to the other. It is a policy, as I intimated a few moments ago, of protection, not of a few individual manufacturers—which so many seek to imply as our intention,—but a policy that protects the workers in these factories as well as the owners of them. I know perfectly well you cannot apply such a policy at a water level throughout the whole of a country so diversified in interests of this kind, but it should be a policy that serves the interests of the whole country as against the interests of the few. I am quite prepared to stand by the solution of this Maritime province question by a reasonable protection on iron and steel and coal. My hon. friend (Mr. Robb) has mentioned British Columbia. We have—within, I was going to say a stone's throw of Vancouver city, certainly within half a day's journey of it,—millions of tons of iron ore, lying in the mountains, capable of development, contiguous to fine coking coal; yet throughout the whole of our country we have been importing our iron and steel products—and we have quite a market for iron and steel. My point is that the policy of this country must be so framed and so directed as to make it possible and profitable to develop these natural resources and these industries. I hope the government will take notice of that. Proposals are before them at present having regard to the establishment of iron and steel industries in that section.

Mr. HUGHES: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES: Is an industry that has to be supported continuously by the state, in whole or in part, no matter how that support may be given, no matter what form it takes—is that industry or business an asset or a liability?

Mr. STEVENS: I will answer my hon. friend just as frankly as he asked the question. I consider that an industry established and made prosperous in Canada is a positive asset to the country. I do not agree with the inference in his question—it is only an inference—that the imposition of a customs tax is state support of industry. There is a great deal of difference—

Mr. CRERAR: A species of state socialism.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good; my hon. friend may interpret it as he will. I am not going to let my hon. friends escape from this point: the imposition of that customs duty is necessary to preserve the standard of living in Canada for our people in competition with a lower standard of living, chiefly in Europe and in other countries.

Mr. HUGHES: How about the United States, where the standard is just as high?

Mr. CRERAR: Higher.

Mr. STEVENS: And with a 4,000-mile boundary and a tariff three times as high as ours. In view of these interruptions, Mr. Speaker, I may as well pause to illustrate the point again. I have done it more than once in this House and I am going to insist on getting it through if I can. It is, as I said this afternoon in answer to a similar question, a simple economic problem. The facts are these: In the United States under one hundred and thirty years of more or less protection, but with high protection for at least six decades, they have built up the finest, the most efficient and the most modern machine shop in the world. In addition to that, they have a market of one hundred and ten millions of people. There is mass production. You may ignore these facts, but they are there just the same. Canada, on the other hand, has for years been going along under a comparatively low tariff. A few years ago our tariff was much higher than it is to-day, but for twenty-five or thirty years we have had a comparatively low tariff. Canada has nine millions of people—a sparsely settled country, a small market. Our manufacturers are barred from the United States market, while the manufacturers of that country have not only that one hundred and ten millions of people, but our nine millions too, for their market. Is there any ground of fairness in that competition? I have no hesitancy in stating my position on this question, and it is a policy which I believe this country will accept if it gets a chance.

Mr. GOULD: Never.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says "never," before I announce what the policy is. That is an echo of his leader's statement this afternoon, when he said that there was no reason discovered or undiscovered that could persuade the prairie provinces to protection. Let me state my policy in regard to competition with the United States. It is this, that Canada ought to have a tariff in regard to American products entering Canada commensurate with the tariff on Canadian products entering the United States. I will explain to the House my reasons for that position: In the first place the unfairness of the competition otherwise; in the second place—and I want my friends to my left to get this—you talk to Uncle Sam in his own language, dollars and cents, and protection, and he will open his eyes and consider whether or not he will give you any advantages in his market. You put a tariff on against the United States, or a general tariff applicable to the United States commensurate with their tariff against us, and I venture to say they will be knocking at our door asking for consideration of favourable treatment, just as other countries have done. Then we can consider the question of an agreement with the United States, just as we have done with France, Italy, Belgium, Norway, Sweden or any other country, but on our terms, not theirs.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would my hon. friend think it rude if I asked him a question?

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all. My hon. friend is the most courteous man in the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: I take a great interest in the question of using our own coal, but here is a difficulty that has arisen, and that does arise. We now in our railways pay 53 cents a ton on coal more than the railways of the United States pay, and we are in competition with them for transcontinental traffic. To that extent our cost of operation exceeds theirs. If we placed a higher duty on coal would not our transportation companies be at a further disadvantage? And would it not add to the cost of transportation to such an extent as to possibly do away with any advantage that might be gained by putting a duty on coal?

Mr. STEVENS: That is one of the problems. I presume my hon. friend is referring to this immediate locality, around Ontario.

Mr. GRAHAM: Central Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: In the first place let me answer my hon. friend in this way: If it costs Canada 53 cents a ton more for her coal, and we can make Nova Scotia prosperous, I would pay the extra 53 cents and make Nova Scotia prosperous. Or if by paying a little more for coal we can develop the immense coal fields in Alberta, develop a great industry there, and have an industrial population that will consume the agricultural products raised by other parts of Canada, it may pay Canada to do it. As a matter of fact, it pays this country or any country situated as we are, to pay for a higher standard of living if we can get the work in this country for our people. A low cost of living is not an indication of prosperity in any country, as any student of economics knows. Every student of economics I think will admit without question that the countries with the highest cost of living and the highest standard of living are usually the countries that are most highly prosperous. I do not want to be misunderstood and have someone come along with the specious argument: Therefore, let us boost the cost of living. For the sake of illustration, take the standard of living in Italy or in Czecho-Slovakia, from which countries we are getting a lot of goods. We cannot expect Canadians to live on the standard that prevails in those countries. I am not going to ask them to; I do not think we should expect our people to live on that standard. But we are asking them to compete with men who are living on that standard, and we have certainly got to face that question in Canada.

What I would have liked to ask the Prime Minister is this, and I wonder whether the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) or the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), under whose department it more nearly comes, would answer: A year ago they were on the way to the death of protection; the "death knell" had been sounded according to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). They were going to carry out to the full the 1919 platform. Is the "death knell" still sounding? Will the Minister of the Interior tell us if it is, or has he muffled the gong of that bell?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS: We have then a declaration from the Minister of the Interior that the "death knell" of protection is still sounding. Will the Acting Minister of Finance say that? He will not. I challenge him to. No, all we get is a smile. Will the Acting Minister of Finance say the government is still persisting in that policy? Where do they stand? This Speech from the Throne does not tell us, and it ought to. Where does the Minister of Railways stand?

Mr. GRAHAM: He sits here; he does not stand.

Mr. STEVENS: I paved the way for this. I said a moment ago that my hon. friend was the most courteous man in the House, and he is. We all honour and revere him. Perhaps he will now do me the courtesy of disclosing whether or not the government is in harmony with the Minister of the Interior in persisting in sounding the death knell of protection. Will he do me that courtesy?

Mr. BOYS: Silence is golden.

Mr. STEVENS: It may seem humorous, but I want to say that this is the key to our whole economic situation in Canada to-day; it is the crux of the whole question, the very pivotal point—whether or not the government of Canada is going to go on reducing the customs duty in this country, or whether it is going to take cognizance of the situation and put on a protective duty sufficient to make Canadian industry thrive? That is the issue. You may be as silent as the tomb in the Speech from the Throne, but that is the issue and you cannot escape it.

My hon. friend the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) last year officially thanked the government across the floor of this House, for what? For the start they had made towards the abolition of protection on Canadian industry. I do not know what he is saying to-day. He is supporting the government fairly well, but he has not thanked the government particularly for the Prime Minister's speech in York. He did thank them for the Prime Minister's speech in Winnipeg, and in Saskatoon, Regina and Calgary. The Prime Minister said: I am on the same road, going with the same volocity as the Minister of the Interior was last year. We are going straight through on "the death knell of protection." That is what he told them all over the prairies, all over the west. In the constituency of North York—which elected him to this House—did he say the same thing? Oh no, he said: We must pause. We must pause? How long is this government going to pause? How long can the country stand a pause?

My hon. friends opposite know. The Minister of Railways, the Acting Minister of Finance particularly, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) know. Yes, it is subject for comment what the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is on the question. Does he agree with the Minister of the Interior? Will he go through on "the death knell of protection," or has Canada turned a corner and are we going back to protection? He said in some of those high-paid ads to which attention has been drawn, that Canada had "turned the corner." We will hope for some declaration from him on this subject.

Now, I want to take another step. Looking at Canada's condition there is one stubborn fact staring us in the face. The net public debt of this country is $178,000,000 greater to-day than it was on December 31, 1921, three years ago, when this government took office. Fifty-one million dollars added to the net debt, $128,000,000 added in the form of guarantees of railway bonds, a net increase to the obligations of this country in three years of $178,000,000, in the face of a policy declaredly for the reduction of customs duties and for the protection of Canadian industries, resulting, as the Acting Minister of Finance knows to his sorrow, in a reduction of—how much? A reduction of $35,000,000 in customs collection or something like that, a tremendous loss in revenue, something that is agitating his mind and worrying him every day and every hour. And well it might. Then I want to tell him that there is no hope for Canada on that course—nothing but chaos and ruin. I do not want to be charged with talking too much blue ruin, but here we have stubborn facts before us: An increase of our debt and a steadily increasing public debt, whereas we ought to be reducing our public debt; taxation increasing as a consequence, revenues falling off, employment falling off, and unemployment increasing. These are the problems facing us.

I wish to refer, perhaps at some little length, to one other problem. The Prime Minister referred to the policy of the government but he wholly overlooked one or two important matters. Last year we heard a great deal about rural credits, we heard something about trying to face this problem of credit in the interest of those who need it in the country—small business men, farmers and others. It was admitted in the Banking and Commerce committee that it was not the business of the banks to cover this field of what you might call long-term credits. The government virtually promised some action on it, but we heard nothing about it in the Speech from the Throne. The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) this afternoon referred to the huge bonded indebtedness of Canada—some $2,000,000,000 of victory bonds alone, added to which are provincial bonds and many others amounting in all to some four and a half billions of dollars. Of this amount, I venture to say that in victory bonds, which are Dominion bonds, to the amount of two billions, are held by Canadians or Canadian companies. What does that mean? First, let me make my position clear. I am not criticising those who bought these bonds; they did it under the impetus of the times and the moment and under the distinct encouragement of parliament and the people of Canada for purposes of war. But where did this money come from? Where was it withdrawn from? It was withdrawn from mortgages, industrials, and loans and stocks of various kinds. Now, it stands to reason that this country is short of working capital when it has frozen in victory bonds some two billions of dollars, and what I want to ask the government is this: How can we liquefy that frozen credit of some two billions of dollars tied up in victory bonds? It may be said at once that we cannot do it, but I think we can. Let me point out the further fact that during the last few years, say the last ten years, the United States has increased its holdings in Canada from something like three hundred or four hundred millions to two and a half billions of dollars, for which we must pay tribute. If it is possible to find some method of liquefying the two billions of dollars' worth of victory bonds held in Canada it would go a long way to solve the problem of rural credits or the financial stringency in this country. My hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) who is a radical—he will not criticise me I am sure for using that term, I use it in its ordinary sense—would advocate, and others also, that we repudiate the public debt in probably much the same way, perhaps, as Germany did it, by inflation of currency, or a process of that kind. I am not making any such suggestion but I do believe that, while respecting and observing all our obligations, that it would be possible to have the large insurance companies, the large loan and trust companies, others who are large holders of these bonds, big commercial concerns, and the banks, to get together and see if it is not possible to have these companies function once again as money loaning institutions. Let me illustrate what I mean. Take an insurance company; I am not criticising these companies, I want to make that perfectly clear; I am merely trying to face a problem which I think is at the root of our money stringency in Canada. Take an insurance company; we will say it has $10,000,000—some of them have over $100,000,000—of victory bonds. Can we provide that by hypothecation the banks from time to time can advance half the value of these bonds to industries, for the development of the country generally? If this were backed up with the expert knowledge and the experience that their officers had in the past, and which I think will be readily available again, then, I believe, there might be released some of this frozen credit. This, I suggest, can be done. I believe it is the duty of the government to face a problem of this kind. It will not do for us to say: These bonds are a debt, they are an obligation, they are tied up, they are frozen, and all we have to do is to pay $140,000,000 a year interest. That does not meet the situation. The government, and parliament as well, is called upon to give this question most intimate study with a view to seeking the release of some of this credit which is at present tied up.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to detain the House longer. Let me summarize very briefly what I have said, or at least a part of it. I referred to Canada as a great estate. I referred to the duty of the government as the directors and administrators of that estate—parliament being associated with them in the task—to look over the estate and see how we can direct affairs so as to develop it in the best possible manner, so that we can give to the people of Canada a full return from that estate.

One point I had overlooked but of which I desire to make brief mention is this: In connection with the policy of protection it must always be borne in mind that a factory in Canada is worth from four to eighteen times as much to our transportation companies as the importation of goods equal to the product of that factory. For instance, in the case of a ton of manufactured goods imported, it simply supplies a ton of freight to our railways which need freight very badly; but a ton of goods manufactured in Canada means the hauling to that factory of three tons of material of one kind and another, in other words increasing the transportation in Canada four times. That scales up as high as eighteen to one. I am giving utterance to a well-known fact, but I think it should be kept in mind at this time, when we are studying the dual question of the languishing industries and the high cost of transportation, and seeking to meet all the overhead charges and obtain good results. We must bear in mind that for every ton of goods taken out of a factory in this country over four tons of goods are brought into that factory, and you must add to that the value of the labour expended on the production of the goods that enter that factory. I believe there is for Canada one method of resuscitating trade, and that method is to so direct the fiscal policy that we can take the materials afforded by our great natural resources and apply to them our own water power or coal power or steam power, apply all the ingenuity and skill of our people, and then bring them to the highest degree of production possible, so that we can dispose of them in the markets of the world.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Before proceeding to make a few brief remarks in this discussion I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the reply to the Speech from the Throne on the able manner in which they discharged their duties. The first paragraph in the Speech from the Throne to which I will direct attention is that which states that Canada is making substantial progress. While it may be true that Canada as a whole is making substantial progress, I believe it is a fact that large parts of Canada are not prosperous at the present time. I believe the provinces which are not prosperous are the Maritime provinces and the prairie provinces, and possibly the fruit lands of British Columbia. In the early stages of this parliament, the first session I attended, I felt it my duty to strongly stress the distressing conditions through which our farmers were passing; but the time having arrived it seems to me, when the public is pretty well convinced that there is a problem in that regard which must be met, I feel it is wise not to stress those conditions too strongly, and yet I have a reason for drawing attention to some of those conditions to-night. It seems to me it is well that this parliament should try to make a careful analysis of what is really wrong, and when we have done that we will have taken the first step towards applying a cure. I speak with a more intimate knowledge of the prairie provinces; I do not know so much about the Maritime provinces or British Columbia. Referring to the prairie provinces, I think I may say that the cause of our distress is four-fold. Three of the reasons I will give as follows. First the crop failures, or partial crop failures, due to climatic conditions over which of course the people have no control. Second, of late years, the advantage of having virgin soil free of weeds, high in fertility and easily worked, which we formerly had over other parts of Canada and of the world, has passed or is rapidly passing. The matters to which I wish to refer are the mistakes, the unsound policy, and I think I may say the blunders sometimes of which this Dominion parliament has been guilty.

Let me go back a little in history. One point to which I wish to refer, but not to dwell on, is that I think a mistake was made in allowing our people to spread, when we were only nine million strong, over half a continent. I do not know who was to blame for it, or if anyone was to blame. A different policy entirely was followed in the United States, perhaps intentionally or perhaps accidentally. But in that country it was not until they possessed some thirty million people that they commenced to extend their settlement into the central and western states. The fact that we are spread over such a considerable area has led to some of our troubles and forced some problems upon us. The first is the railway question. The settlement in the west led to the building of far more trunk lines than we required. A rather false optimism has caused our legislators in times past to build, or permit the building of three transcontinental lines. They are found to be a gigantic burden. I desire to refer to this a little later on because I fear there is another blunder in the offing, and that is one point I want to deal with later. When we consider that one of those transcontinental lines was built to the city of Quebec for the avowed purpose of carrying grain to the port of Quebec, and the rate on that line was so high as to be absolutely prohibitive, it seems to me a queer anomaly. We have had a great deal of discussion about the customs tariff. I will not dwell on that. A great deal of effort has been made to convince the people that all our unemployment and languishing industries have been occasioned by the action of the government in lowering the tariff. I doubt it very much. I would just say in passing that it is rather strange that after we have a high tariff in Canada for upwards of forty years that the condition of our country is as bad as it is, if that proposition is correct. One of the troubles which we have been called upon to deal with is combines and monopolies. The complaint of our people in the west is largely that we are not being treated fairly. I do not want to appear as whining against the conditions under which we must live; but it seems to strike our people as unfair that, when it comes to such matters as freight rates, we are called upon to pay higher rates than the central provinces, and possibly higher than the eastern provinces, simply on the unsound argument that because we have not water transportation we should have higher rates. It seems to me that is all bunkum. I do not think there is anything sound in it at all, and when the railway commission take that attitude it seems to me they are practically saying to the railway, "When you have people in any part of Canada in a tight place, where they cannot help themselves, then go after them; we give you a free hand".

Referring to the matter of interest rates, banks and mortgage companies, we have to depend, in a new country, to a very large extent on these companies to secure capital, and we are forced to pay a higher rate. That is a handicap and it is a big factor in holding back progress in western Canada. It seems to me that the reason that is so is not because it is more expensive to do business there, or that their losses are greater there. It was found when the Home bank went to pieces that their losses were not in the west at all. They had been gathering money there, but their losses were elsewhere. It is a relic, a practice handed down to us from the days when the west was so prosperous because of conditions to which I have referred, because of cheap land, the price of land going up and being rich and conditions being favourable, that it was felt we could stand a higher rate and a higher rate was charged. There has been a great reluctance to bring that rate down and, so far as I can see, that is the only reason why we are being charged a higher rate at the present time.

Let me refer to another mistake. Over-optimism in building railways is only second brother to over-optimism in starting the Welland canal far too soon. We have railways enough for a population of 20,000,000. It is right that the Welland canal should be built, but it was started at least a decade too soon. We have people requiring an expenditure of money, sadly in need of money, and yet a sum amounting to $100,000,000 is going into the Welland canal before we shall get one cent out. That has been going on for some years, and it must, I understand, go on for about four years more before the people of Canada will receive any return outside of the money that is being expended in building the canal. The present time is just when we need that money elsewhere. While that construction work is taking place, the condition of some of our people in the western provinces is distressing through lack of railway facilities. In many places there are railways running side by side for fifty miles, forty miles, or less, a mile, two miles or five miles apart, and yet at the same time there are districts to the north, south, east and west where farmers have to drive eighteen or twenty miles in order to get their crops to market. Such a district lies to the south of one such point served by two railways. I have travelled over those lines several times and there are places where the railways are not more than a mile apart. Right to the south of that very district where there is duplication of railways, a man lives who wrote this letter. Listen to his words. This might be a little warning to some who have objected to building branch lines and I wish some of our senators were here. He says:

> For myself I do not care which line is built, but for heaven's sake it is time something is done, for if there is no prospect for a railway this summer I am going to dispose of my property and if I get rid of what I have Saskatchewan would not hold me and probably not Canada. I have to team my grain eighteen miles and I have had my share of it. It is high time that the government took the matter in hand and saw that railways were built where districts are already settled.

I should like to make a remark about the Welland canal and the deepening of the St. Lawrence river. By the time the money is fully expended in deepening the St. Lawrence waterway, the St. Lawrence route is opened, and the vision of our grain boats passing from Fort William right through to the Atlantic ocean is realized, the time will have arrived when the bulk of our grain will be going to the Pacific. Whether that is pleasant news to Montreal or not, the trend of the North American continent has been for grain-growing, wheat-growing particularly, to move westward and northward. The time was when Manitoba was the banner wheat-growing province of Canada. It gave place to Saskatchewan, and, although I reside in Saskatchewan, I believe that our sister province of Alberta will see the time when it will be the banner wheat-growing province of Canada. When the Peace river country is opened up, the greatest grain ports are going to be on the Pacific coast. There will come a time later on when the customs barrier between Canada and the United States as regards grain foodstuffs will be brought down, and then will be the time when western Canada particularly will have a harvest. We can supply grain to the grain markets of Minneapolis where they have a capacity of 96,000 barrels a day, cheaper than can any other place in the world, and I am convinced that the time will come when a great deal of our grain will go south. Therefore, while it is wise that we should have sufficient facilities at Montreal and other eastern ports to handle our commerce, in providing facilities for handling the grain of the West we should keep in mind the trend of our grain-growing and shipping business.

I am going to voice frankly some of the causes of dissatisfaction in the west. It strikes the west as very strange that the central provinces have approved the Hudson Bay railway as far as a certain point, until $21,000,000 have been expended there, and then they suddenly felt that it was only a joke; that it was not feasible, and that it was time it should be stopped. I think the central provinces and those who oppose the Hudson Bay railway are making a very grave mistake. It would open up a country that would constitute a market for their manufactured goods; it would bring about a better feeling, and I intend to point out a little later on where that better feeling is very necessary, where greater unity is required, where there is a grave danger of driving the western people into a corner where they will turn.

As regards the project of opening up the St. Lawrence waterways, our engineers tell us that it will cost $252,000,000, to be divided between Canada and the United States, and we know, from past experience, if that is of any value, that the cost will be twice that amount. I have referred to the over-building of railways, to the feverish haste in opening the Welland canal, and I have done so for a purpose, namely, to make this more impressive. I think the climax of an orgy of this sort in spending money for services in advance of population will be reached if our government at once, or in the very near future, plunges into this project of opening up the St. Lawrence route at an enormous expense. The time will come when the St. Lawrence route should be opened, but the eastern provinces or, more correctly, the central provinces, who are urging this, would be very wise if they would stop and consider the wishes of other parts of Canada that are not so well-off, that are passing through very hard times. If they will just have a little patience and wait for eight or ten years, it may be that Canada will then be in a position to open the St. Lawrence route without imposing upon Canada a burden that she cannot carry.

I said that there were four causes for our distress in the prairie provinces. I am going to refer to one that is very seldom touched on and that is inflation and deflation. It seems to me that this has been a large factor. Let me read some words of Abraham Lincoln, that great statesman, in reference not only to the question of inflation and deflation but also regarding the practice of governments undertaking heavy obligations, as our government did in selling victory bonds and then bringing about deflation. President Lincoln said:

> If a government creates a large debt when there is a certain volume of money in circulation and then contracts the volume of money it is the most heinous crime that government can perpetrate against its people.

I am not going to impute motives to Sir Thomas White or to anyone else in regard to the inflating of money during the war, but I simply state, what is a fact, that money was inflated until the purchasing power of the dollar was only about fifty, sixty or seventy cents and then millions upon millions of dollars' worth of victory bonds were sold, some of them tax-free, while money was cheap. That having been done, suddenly the money was deflated. I was in conversation with a bank official in the year 1920 and he told me that they were not loaning any money; he said, "our government has instructed us that deflation must take place in order to force prices down." I did not realize at the time what that meant, but I do now: it simply means that the people of Canada are compelled to pay millions and millions of a debt in bonds for which those who hold the bonds paid in some cases only fifty or sixty cents in the dollar. In other words, the Canadian people have incurred an enormous debt by means of this system of inflation and deflation which took place in the way I have stated.

There is another side of this question which is still worse, and that is the effect which it has had on the people of Canada not only in the prairie provinces but throughout the country. During a period of four or five years when money was so plentiful the people were encouraged in extravagance; they were encouraged to expand their business, and some borrowed money in large quantities while others bought houses and farms at high prices. Just at the moment when they thought that everything was in a settled condition, when they little realized how soon the change would come, the ground was suddenly cut from under them. What happened at that time reminds one of the practice which prevailed in the early days in catching rats. A barrel was filled almost to the top with something that the rats liked; all that the rat had to do was to climb up to the rim and jump in to get his fill. After the rat had acquired the habit of climbing up and jumping in, automatically as it were, the food was removed and water was put into the barrel in its place, so that when the rat got up to the top of the barrel he jumped into water before he knew what he was doing.

I think it is unfair to bring about arbitrarily a condition of affairs that inspires the people with a false sense of prosperity, and when they have incurred heavy obligations in the belief that a permanent state of prosperity has set in, suddenly bring about a situation that makes it impossible for them to meet those obligations. Logically, one would expect that all prices would be equally forced down by such a process, but this was not the case; the products of the farm went down suddenly because the control of prices was not in the hands of local people. The fact is that the prices of farm products were controlled by the importer in Europe and elsewhere, whereas the prices of commodities which the farmers and other people bought were controlled locally by combines which were more or less hard and fast, or at all events by gentlemen's agreements. The consuming public had been educated into paying ten dollars for a pair of shoes, and it was not difficult by means of these combines for the prices to be kept up, so that one would have to pay ten dollars or fifteen dollars as the case might be for a pair of shoes, and other prices in proportion all along the line. Such a terrible condition was brought about that we saw in this country such peculiar anomalies as this, for example, where the hide from a beef animal would not buy a hame-strap. Let me mention a concrete case. Walking down the street in my own town a few months ago I saw a bay team of horses. Two years ago I purchased that team for fifty dollars, and while they were a little undersized they were very good animals. If I had told the man who was leading them away to take them over to the blacksmith's shop and have them shod it would have cost me from eleven to sixteen dollars for the new shoes. Imagine one buying a team of good young horses for fifty dollars and having to pay from eleven to fifteen or sixteen dollars to get new shoes for them. The hon. member (Mr. Stevens) says that it is absurd to expect people to succeed under certain conditions which he has indicated; but it is not nearly so absurd to expect success in that case as it is to expect people to succeed under the conditions that I have described. And those were the conditions.

I am very doubtful whether it was necessary to borrow as much money as was borrowed during the war years; I think it was a gigantic mistake. When money was so plentiful why was not the war paid for as we went along? Had that been done, it seems to me that our present troubles might have been avoided to a large extent. We talk of unemployment, but I think that what I am about to quote upsets in part some of the arguments which we heard this afternoon. Arthur Kitson who, I understand, is one of the leading manufacturers of Great Britain and one of the world's highest authorities on monetary subjects, dealing with the subject of unemployment and progress in relation to the countries that were at war, and touching the question of deflation, concludes thus in an article of his published on December 9, 1924:

> It is a significant fact that all the British colonies are suffering the same as the Old Country, and they have all been pursuing the same contraction policy—contraction of currency. On the other hand, France, Belgium and Italy have been enjoying prosperity and have escaped the scourge of unemployment.

I came across a clipping a few days ago from which I learned that the wheels of industry in France are humming, and that there are not sufficient men in that country to keep their machinery going and that they are obliged to import labour in large numbers. I do not pretend to be an authority on the banking question and consequently I do not speak with great assurance on it, but I have studied it enough to feel that it is a great misfortune that deflation took place so suddenly. Had the deflation, if it was necessary, taken place after ten years, say, after some of these victory bonds had been paid off—bonds that were bought with inflated money and which should have been paid off with inflated money also—it would have been much better. I certainly think that the deflation should have been brought about gradually until the gold basis was restored; I do not think that the hardship in that case would have been anything like what it has been.

I shall speak for a few minutes now on some of the features that have tended towards bringing the prairie provinces back to normal. Three years ago we got back what we called the Crowsnest rates. I assure hon. members that the effects were marvellously beneficial to our western people. Every carload of grain going out from there since that time has gone out for about $60 less. I would like the government to know that when they apply remedies that are real remedies the west responds at once. All that is necessary to bring prosperity there, to make the people happy and contented and to enable them to take their places among those who constitute the buying portion of Canada's population. is to apply remedies that will be effective, such as the one to which I refer. By that simple redress, by that change, many farmers have been saved from bankruptcy and others have been driven to it only more gradually.

Another remedy that has been attempted by the present government—and I wish to give them full credit for their part in it; I wish to encourage them to continue in the same direction—is the reduction of the tariff. It was small indeed, but it brought some relief—not very much, but some nevertheless. I do hope the government will follow up that policy. I believe the proper thing for me to do is to continue to press for further reduction in the tariff. It has been suggested by my friends to the right that the manufacturers have not been injured by the reductions; at least I understood it that way. I assure the House that the part of the country to which I belong has certainly benefited by the reductions. That being the case, why not give us a bigger dose? If it helps all round, why not have a little more of it?

There are some other redresses which I think ought to be afforded to us in the west. I have already referred to the high rates of interest on the money we borrow. It may be a difficult matter to deal with, but the government should keep that in mind and should lend their efforts to having these rates reduced. Land rates and water rates are also matters of paramount importance. Perhaps it is not generally understood—well, I will not say it is not generally understood, but I believe it is not always understood—that if we were to go back to the Crowsnest rates on the thirteen commodities covered we would still be paying a higher rate than those applicable to the same commodities in central Canada. When it comes to water rates I do not know that I am so optimistic of success, because I realize that the north Atlantic combine is a gigantic body. But the government should bend every energy to a solution of the problem; they should fight the thing to the end, because the saving of a few cents on a bushel of wheat or of a few dollars on a beef animal means all the difference between success and failure to those who are producing those commodities. Premier Dunning, speaking on this subject, put it this way: "I did not have any profit," he said, "on my farm this year. If I could have got the grain threshed for a little less, or if the freight rate had been a little less, or if the labour had been a little less—any one of these—I would have made a profit." While we cannot at present engage to any considerable extent in the raising of cattle, if that freight rate question can be solved so that cattle can be carried to the Old Country market at a reasonable price, you will at once see a revival of that industry, and it will become a great industry. We would then be in a position to buy the manufactured goods of the east and any loss that would be sustained by the eastern and central interests would be more than made up by the increase in business.

Let me say a word or two on the immigration question. There are different ideas on the subject. Some would entirely prohibit immigrants from coming to Canada until conditions are better and they would have a better chance to succeed. Others would bring in immigrants as fast as possible, believing that that would make Canada prosperous. I do not think either course is wise; I think either would be a mistake. We need immigrants in Canada, but we need the right sort. To bring in a large number of immigrants might result in figures which, when read in the House, would make a good showing politically, but Canada might be very much worse off. If you look over the reports with respect to the nationality of inmates of gaols, or of hospitals where unmarried mothers go at times, you will find that the percentage of immigrants there is alarmingly high. What does that indicate? It indicates that there has been too much laxity in respect to the admission of immigrants; that the feeble minded, delinquents, and those having defects of various kinds have been admitted when clearly they should not have been allowed entry into Canada. What we need is the best kind of settler. Immigrants should be well selected, and we should get as many of that selected class as possible.

You cannot conclusively say that because an immigrant has $100 he should come in, and because he has not that amount he must stay out. By following a policy of that kind we might keep out such men as James Mitchell of Dahinda, Saskatchewan, a great asset to our province and to Canada. In the British Isles he was a cotton mill operator in 1907; in 1924 he was the wheat king of the world—a romantic story. He was a man with no previous experience of farming, no previous experience in Canada; yet from 1907 to 1924 he sprang to that position. The romantic character of the story is enhanced by the part played by his wife this last year. While Mr. Mitchell was attending the meeting of the Seed Growers' Association at Regina she telephoned to him and said, "It is raining here; what shall I do?" He said, "Cover up the stooks." She covered up enough stooks in the rain to save the bushel of wheat that took the world's prize. We might by any such narrow policy as I have suggested keep out another type of man who is also a great asset. It gives me pleasure to refer to this incident because we do not get many men like this. In a Lethbridge paper recently there appeared an account of the heroism of a Scotch shepherd, by name Jack Ray, employed on the Ray Knight ranch at Brooks, Alberta. Last December he was herding 2,000 sheep when he was caught in a blizzard. With the thermometer fluctuating between 40 and 50 below zero, he drifted for three days and three nights rather than leave the sheep, with no shelter for himself except for an hour or two when he could get something to eat and have a chance to get warm. If we can get that type of men as a foundation stock for our future citizenship it will be well for Canada. There are not many men in Canada or in the world of such fidelity that they would endure what Jack Ray endured on the open range in order to save his flock of sheep. That is the type of man we want as immigrants.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) made a remark to which I wish to refer. He said that it was absurd to expect the manufacturers of Canada to compete against the cheap labour of countries on the European continent. Let me point out that because of our advanced methods of farming, because of the greater efficiency of our intelligent labour, the farmers of Canada are able now to compete against the cheap labour of Europe, if you would only give them half a chance. They do not want any favours. Much of the wheat that is being placed on the European markets in competition with ours is grown only three or four hundred miles from the seaboard; much of it is right beside the water; but our wheat must be drawn hundreds and in some cases thousands of miles to the seaboard. But if you will remove our disabilities and give us a fair chance, we can compete against the cheap labour of Europe simply because they are less efficient. If the time comes when they are as efficient and their methods of agriculture become as advanced as ours, then it will be, I admit, absurd; but we can do the very thing now that the hon. member says cannot be done.

In closing, I think it is high time that we should quit haggling about who is to blame for our troubles. Two years ago, speaking in this House, I sounded a gentle warning. I said: Don't drive the west too far. My friends to my right interpreted that as a threat, but it was not so intended, I assure you. What has taken place since that time two years ago. To-day there is one subject being talked about that attracts interest, and that is the question of secession. I regret that there is any sentiment at all in favour of secession on the prairie provinces. I do not think it should be encouraged at any time, but I would ask you not to underestimate that sentiment. The time was in the history of Great Britain when they ignored the just complaints of the American colonies, and it cost them the colonies. Later, in our early history the time was when the Canadian government ignored the not very unreasonable claims of the half-breeds of the northwest territory, and that caused a war. I hope nothing serious comes of this talk of secession, but I would ask you to draw on your imagination a little and try and understand that there are thousands in a condition that would drive one to almost anything. Just to drive that point home, let me give you a concrete case. Two months ago I was riding on the train and got into conversation with a sheriff. He said, "Recently as I sat in my office an old man came in and said to me, 'Well, sheriff, I guess I have made a sad mess of it.' I asked him what was the matter, and he said, 'My stuff is all seized.'" The sheriff asked him his name, looked up the file, and then went back and asked the old man. "What sort of a crop did you have last year, in 1923?" "Well, sheriff," he said, "I cannot tell you exactly how many acres we cut because it was so poor we did not cut all we sowed. Neither can I tell you how many bushels we threshed because after it was all cut some of it yielded so poor that we did not thresh the rest of it, but I will tell you what I got for it. I got $380 for it all." The sheriff asked him, "How much did it cost you to thresh that?" "It cost me $280," said the old man "and I paid it. The grain was rusty, there was lots of straw, and the thresher would not thresh by the bushel; he must have so much per day. It cost me $280 to thresh that grain for which I got $380." The sheriff asked, "What did you do with the other hundred dollars?" "I gave it to the storekeeper," was the reply, "he had carried me for a year." "What did you live on?" the sheriff asked. "I would not like to tell you what I and my family lived on," said the old man; "I have had a good crop this year, 1924, but it is all seized. Part of my trouble has been caused by an accident I had three years ago, and I have not been able to do a full day's work since then until this year." The result was that the sheriff who was a humane man, and of good common sense, said, "I am not going to allow your creditors to take that crop and sell it at a disadvantage," at what we call street price, which meant that the farmer would not get full value. So the sheriff took possession of the crop and divided it among the creditors, giving each one a little, and leaving the farmer enough to carry on with.

Now that is not a very isolated case. The conditions are bad. Perhaps I am stressing them too much. I know the effect on immigration and on capital, but when I see these cases before my eyes I feel that I should try and persuade this House that the time has come for further redress. As I have tried to show, the west will respond immediately if the remedies are applied. Is there any reason why we could not to a greater degree forget party politics, unite our forces, and bring our best brains to bear on these problems and apply the remedy so quickly that the talk of secession will disappear. I believe it would be a calamity if confederation were to break up. I know that many will pooh-pooh the idea that there is any possibility of such a thing happening, but when you see thousands of people in that condition, when they feel their life's savings are being swept away and they soon will have not a dollar left in the world, and many of them with families, when the sheriff is knocking at the door, can you blame them for taking any way out? Hardly, I think. It is all right for one to shout about loyalty and to feel that Canada is a good place to live in when he is living in a mansion and has everything his heart can desire, but it is another thing when a man is turned out of doors and he and his family have to leave the homestead with the work of years gone for nothing; and that is the situation of many of our people. The country is all right; it is only man that is vile. I would say to the members of the government: Continue and move very fast to give us measures of redress as effectively as you did in lowering the freight rate to the Crowsnest rate. If you give us redress for those grievances I do not think you need worry at all about the west. We will help to solve the unemployment problem; we will employ the men, and the manufacturers of the east whose shops have been closed will be able to reopen their doors.

Mr. HOCKEN: Does the hon. member intend the House to understand that in his judgment there is a serious prospect of the secession of the west from confederation?

Mr. MILLAR: It is very much more serious than the general public appreciate.

Mr. SPENCE: That is a threat.

Mr. MILLAR: No, it is not a threat. My remarks were misunderstood before. There is one other matter I wish to touch on. The manufacturers of the east seem to have experienced a change of heart to some extent. At any rate the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), in a speech which he delivered a short time ago, seemed to have modified his views to a certain extent and was inclined, apparently, to hold out a friendly hand to those who differed from him on certain trade questions. The Manufacturers' Association have adopted a somewhat similar course. I would say to the manufacturers that I believe we as farmers—I speak as a farmer as well as a representative of the people in this chamber—will be prepared to meet them half way just as soon as they realize that the manufacturers are sincere in their desire to bring about a better feeling and to co-operate with agriculturists rather than act in a manner antagonistic to them.

There is one way in which the manufacturers can demonstrate their sincerity and it is in the matter of the standardization of machinery. I have here a clipping which I might read to illustrate my point:

Secretary of Commerce Hoover says in the foreword of a booklet entitled "Simplified Practice—what it is and what it offers" issued by the Division of Simplified Practice of the Department of Commerce:

"The necessity of maintaining a high-wage level requires that all processes of manufacture and distribution be reduced to the lowest possible cost. This can be done through the elimination of those wastes arising out of too high a degree of diversification in certain basic products.

"To-day dozens of different sizes, styles, types and patterns of the most commonplace articles are placed in the market by manufacturers who must possess special equipment and skill to produce these endless variations. Merchants accumulate great stocks which turn but slowly because of the excessive diversity and lack of interchangeability in their components. Because of this situation many manufacturers and distributors favour co-operation for simplification and standardization.

"The saving in national effort through such co-operation as demonstrated by many well known examples of simplification and standardization runs into millions of dollars. There is a great area still untouched in which the application of these waste-eliminating measures may well save not millions, but billions. The rate of our advance must be, and will be, in proportion to the extent in which we all co-operate for the elimination of waste."

A farmer who throws aside a binder and buys one of the same make breaks, perhaps, a small wheel. There may be a wheel, scarcely worn on the abandoned binder which he could use, but cannot do so because there is a very, very slight difference in the two wheels. Consequently he is compelled to buy a new wheel. I really believe the failure to adopt standardization is a deliberate policy on the part of the manufacturers. In fact this policy has been carried to such an extreme that in one province it has been found necessary to enact legislation to prevent a machine company selling binders and other machinery for a certain length of time and then withdrawing from the market and taking away the repairs. Such companies, if they sell binders must keep repairs for a given number of years after the binder is withdrawn from the market, thus recognizing that it has been a practice on the part of manufacturers to deal unfairly in this matter with the consumer. Only last fall I was talking to a farmer who had obtained a piece of sheet iron for this threshing machine. I could not give the dimensions but some of you hon. gentlemen who own threshers will understand about the size when I state it was to cover the lower part of the machine. Now it would appear that a sum of ten or fifteen dollars would have been a sufficiently high price and yet it cost this man $28. If the manufacturers are sincere in their desire to bring about a better understanding with the producers of grain and those who are buying their machinery, let them adopt a different attitude in this matter, as well as in respect to some other questions, and we will meet them half way.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat at a disadvantage. I had expected that there would be another speaker from the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite before my turn came. Seemingly the hon. gentleman in question is not in his place. Not anticipating having to take the floor so soon I have not my notes with me. I would therefore ask permission to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am shocked at this unpreparedness on the part of my hon. friend. I should have thought he would be able to speak at almost any time during this debate; I thought he was full of the subject.

Mr. HOCKEN: Have you got any speaker over there?

Mr. GRAHAM: We do not have to speak; we are satisfied with conditions. However, I realize the situation my hon. friend finds himself in, although I think he would, perhaps, do better without his notes. As the whips have talked this matter over I think we had better let the hon. gentleman move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. CALDWELL: If we are ever going to close the session we should not adjourn at such an early hour. I do not think there is sufficient justification for it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I draw the hon. member's attention to the rule that a motion such as this is not debatable. Shall the motion carry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CALDWELL: Certainly not.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose that to-morrow we can go on with the same business?

Mr. CALDWELL: Will anybody be ready then?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is what I wanted to find out. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) assures us that he will be ready to-morrow.

Mr. ANDERSON: I was quite prepared to speak to-night but I understood that an hon. member opposite wanted to speak. Had I known the situation earlier I would have been prepared to go on.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will not regard this as a precedent because we shall have to sit later other nights. However, we will treat this as a special case.

Mr. CALDWELL: Will the government inform us what will happen to-morrow in the event of hon. members not being ready to go on with the debate?

Mr. GRAHAM: I may say that my hon. friend, and every other member who has a motion on the order paper, will have a chance at it to-morrow if we reach Notices of Motion.

Motion (Mr. Anderson) agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 9.30 p.m.

Wednesday, February 11, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

REDISTRIBUTION

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I am in receipt of a communication from the Chief Electoral Officer, Colonel O. M. Biggar, as follows:

Dear Mr. SPEAKER:

I enclose two copies in French and two copies in English of my report of rulings on the subject of the boundaries of electoral districts under section 4 of the Representation Act, passed at the last session of parliament.

Yours faithfully,

O. M. BIGGAR.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Report of the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1924; Militia Service and Air Service.—Hon. Mr. Macdonald.

Report of the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1924; Naval Service.—Hon. Mr. Macdonald.

Copies of General Orders, Promotions and Retirements, Canadian Militia.—Hon. Mr. Macdonald.

Annual Report of the Department of the Secretary of State for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1924.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend and make operative certain provisions of the Copyright Act, 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explain.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is substantially the same bill as I introduced last year to amend the Copyright Act. There are very slight modifications, but substantially it is the same. The bill was not reached last year because time would not allow of it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What is the object of the bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The object of the bill is to afford sanctions for certain dispositions which were not contained in the original bill. It is to repeal certain sections of the bill. I do not need to go into it at any length because, as was pointed out last year, the modifications are completely set out in the marginal notes, and in order to give the whole effect of the bill one would have to read all the amendments.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. C. ST-PERE (Hochelaga): May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister if the government has any announcement to make with respect to the Home bank depositors?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I expect to be in a position to make a statement to the House in respect to that matter in a very short time, shortly after the conclusion of the present debate.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Sir Eugene Fiset for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of interfering with the government's evident desire to bring this debate to a close when I moved the adjournment of the debate last evening. I wish to thank the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) for his courtesy in allowing the motion to pass. I was somewhat interested to note that the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) objected to the motion on the ground I think, that the time of parliament was being wasted. I would like to say that possibly no member takes up more of the time of parliament than the hon. member himself.

Mr. CALDWELL: Wrong again.

Mr. ANDERSON: He occupies more pages of Hansard than many of the ministers of the crown, not excepting the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) himself, nor the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau), nor the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin), nor even the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), who can ramble over the political scenery about as nimbly as any person I know.

Mr. CALDWELL: If the hon. member will permit me, I was not objecting to him speaking; I was objecting because he would not speak.

Mr. ANDERSON: That is not the point. The hon. member objected to the business of the House being held up because I wanted to adjourn the debate.

The Speech from the Throne, if it serves any useful purpose at all, should give a clear and concise statement to parliament of what legislation the government intends to bring down during the session. Such a statement would enable the members of the House to prepare themselves on any subject they wished to discuss, would expedite business, shorten the session, and promote economy. The Speech from the Throne delivered last Thursday meets very few, if any, requirements, excepting that it is a resolution to which hon. members may speak in addressing the House.

The Speech itself requires little comment. Like Old Mother Hubbard's cupboard it is bare. There is scarcely a bone of contention for the members of parliament to scrap over. During the years I have been in the House I have seen nothing like it. It is quite evident the government has reached the end of its resources, but has not the courage to step out. The Speech can scarcely be called an election document, unless its very emptiness presages the dissolution of parliament.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the fourth session of the fourteenth parliament, a parliament marked by several outstanding features, one or two of which I shall discuss.

It marked the appearance in the House of a new party which appealed to the people on a policy supposedly national in its scope but which was dictated only by sectional and class interest. It has given an object lesson to the country of the uses and abuses of the group system in Canadian politics. As the sessions followed each other the utter futility of a multiplicity of groups in the House was clearly demonstrated. The weaknesses of such a system were made the more apparent because the government had not working majority over all and were compelled to depend on the support of one of the opposition groups to keep them in office. This led to bargaining between the government and the Progressive group, with the result that the national interest was sacrificed because of party exigency. The Progressives held the balance between the oldtime parties and used their advantage to bludgeon the government into giving concessions not entirely in the best interest of all Canada. This position was very tersely stated by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Preston) last session when he said: "The government—Liberals—hold office but the Progressives hold power."

The experience the country has had during this parliament may be said to be a fair test of the usefulness of a third party. The position was the most favourable for the Progressives to exercise their influence in the national interest; to show a broad conception of the needs of Canada as a whole and advocate reforms in the interest of agriculture, since they could dictate terms to the government. Had the government a clear working majority over all, the situation would have been the same as if only two parties were in the House, and the influence of the Progressives nil. As it was, how did the Progressives fulfil their pledges to the people in 1921 to use their influence in the interests of all classes and all sections of Canada. How did they succeed in giving effect to those policies? One of their first claims was for the creation of a wheat board. The necessary legislation, as a result of the efforts of the best minds in both parties, was passed but it proved a complete fiasco. The act was such a poor one that not a man of outstanding ability in the Dominion, even at a salary of $50,000 per year, could be found to assume responsibility of the measure. The consequence was that hon. gentlemen at my left were compelled to fall back upon the suggestion made by the right hon. leader of the opposition, of a wheat pool, which, I am pleased to know, has been a real success.

Another question which they brought prominently before the people was reciprocity with the United States. That proposition, like many of the others, has gone into the waste paper basket, and seemingly nothing can be done in that direction.

They also requested the government to complete the Hudson Bay railway, but after two or three years have been spent in negotiations nothing has been effected along this line. That, too, remains to be dealt with in the dim and distant future.

They have often given utterance to their free trade proclivities on the floor of this House. A few efforts have been made in that direction by the government. There has been some reduction in customs duties, but the changes have not proved to be in the national interest.

Furthermore, a request was made that the freight rates on the Great Lakes should be controlled. Legislation for this purpose was passed, through the co-operation of both parties, but the act became as great a fiasco as the wheat board statute. The result was practically to make conditions worse than they were before. Consequently, the measure had virtually to be nullified until parliament could either amend it or put it out of existence.

Although the Progressives form a very strong party in this House they have not been able to enforce their views upon the government to any extent, notwithstanding that the ministry regards them with favour. There is a moral which I draw from all this and it is very clear that a class makes a serious blunder when they segregate themselves from other classes and come out as a distinct political entity.

The progress of disintegration is pretty well advanced amongst our Progressive friends. Three distinct groups have emerged as a result of a cleavage of opinions and policies which are as divergent as the individual members themselves, and the real Progressive party is revealed as farmer bloc from the prairie provinces. This group is distinctly a class group wedded to sectionalism. The fourteenth parliament is nearing its end and it has not accomplished anything in the interest of agriculture. Whether because of the blundering of the government or of the impossible nature of the demands. I cannot say, but the fact remains that nothing has been accomplished that could not have been better attained if these gentlemen to my left had retained their old time party allegiance.

A great deal has been heard in this country about blue ruin. On the other hand, the Prime Minister, in particular, has stated that Canada is more prosperous than the United States. That is something the average citizen of Canada finds it very difficult to credit when he realizes that six hundred thousand of his fellow citizens have left this country within the last three years and are now engaged in occupations in the United States. This fact alone constitutes a very strong argument against the claim of the Prime Minister.

I visited the province of Prince Edward Island last summer, and a banker in a small town where I stayed informed me that he had never seen so much American money coming into the place as he had that year. When asked how he accounted for this he replied, "Because so many of our citizens have gone to the United States and located there. Now they are sending this money back to help to support the remainder of their families who are still in Canada." A gentleman said to me the other day and the remark made me smile, that the Prime Minister was a very clever politician. His reason for saying this was that the Prime Minister had brought the Canadian dollar back to par. Well, if the Prime Minister was able to bring back our dollar, why cannot he bring back to this country the six hundred thousand Canadians who have gone to the United States in search of that dollar? Why cannot he bring back the 162,000 Canadian soldiers who have gone there in search of employment? If the process of bringing the Canadian dollar back to par involved losing one of our greatest assets to the United States then it is a very expensive operation.

In spite of all these adverse conditions I must admit that I am a consistent optimist so far as Canada's future is concerned. This country is bound to go ahead and nothing can stop it. The government by its retrograde policies, may delay the wheels of progress for a time, but Canada will overcome every obstacle and will march forward to the great destiny which the future has in store for her. But to facilitate its progress certain things are necessary. We have large natural resources which must be conserved and developed in the best interests of our citizens. I believe the raw material from those resources should be manufactured into finished products in this Dominion, and that we should devote all our energies to bringing that result about. Those resources belong to the people of this country. They are so multifarious that they lend themeslves to every kind of human effort, and they should be developed as a whole, the one assisting the other. We want to attract to Canada not only money but men who will come here and develop our resources, bring out the wealth that lies hidden here and make it available for our people. Those who have the best right to that wealth are Canadians who pay the taxes and keep the country solvent. It is upon Canadians that we must rely for the payment of our taxation. Our huge debt of two and a half billions of dollars must be paid. The annual interest is large and must be met. In addition a large amount must be raised in order to provide for the national services. There is only one class of people to whom we can appeal to meet this taxation and that is our own citizens. It is the duty of the government to make every effort possible to reduce the burden of taxation. In order to accomplish that desirable result the strictest economy must be practised in every direction. While doing that, the government should see to it that our people are not unduly burdened in paying their fair share of necessary taxation. In the payment of taxation there are comparatively few shirkers; the majority are willing to do their share if they can only earn the money. If they cannot do that they must emigrate to other countries, or become a burden upon the state and a menace to society. The only way to make Canada prosperous is to protect our industries and our agriculturists to such an extent that a profitable home market can be maintained. They must be protected from cheap labour and the depreciated currencies of foreign countries. Our basic industry is agriculture, and it should be developed to its highest perfection, but we should not forget that a prosperous agricultural community depends upon the growth of large industrial centres. Our industries also are dependent upon the prosperity of agriculture. The two should go together, each is dependent upon the other, and both should be developed to a just and equitable degree. The people of the towns buy the product of the farms; the people in the rural sections purchase the articles produced in the towns. By an interchange of this character both industries benefit, and greater wealth is produced and remains in the country. If we want to make Canada prosperous that is the only way to go about it.

There is little need to detail the advantages of the home market. Everyone knows, and few will deny, its superiority over the foreign market. It is easy of access, the returns are quicker, transportation costs are less, the prices offer the greater profit and the demand is steady. Not only that, but the growth of cities and towns increases the value of farm property in their vicinity and improve the living conditions in the country in many ways.

There should be the most friendly relations between rural and urban people since they are dependent upon each other. The farmer buys the product of the industries in our cities and towns and the people of the towns and cities buy the product of his farm; each buying from the other and both growing richer from the interchange since what they sell is the product of labour and is created wealth which remains in the country. This would make us a prosperous and contented people, and the only way to bring it about is to protect our manufacturers and agriculturists by means of the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald which has already laid the foundation so well that the ultimate objective is almost within our grasp. The foundation so well laid has been undermined by the unwise and ill-considered tariff reductions of the present government to such an extent that the whole fabric of our national structure is threatened with disaster.

We have our fruit growing section in Canada dotted here and there across the continent. They are to be found in the Maritimes, in Ontario and British Columbia, and the fruit produced is the best of its kind to be found in the world. The industry is therefore of national importance and any policy designed to benefit it can be said to be for the benefit of Canada. It is a live industry in which many millions are invested and in which many thousands of our population are engaged and they are heavy tax payers. Fruit is a necessary article of diet for our people and they must have it to keep physically fit to meet the extreme changes in our climate. When the returning sun melts away the snow and frost of winter and warms up our atmosphere to sixty and seventy degrees, a person's being clamours for a more cooling diet than ham and eggs or bully beef. Nature tells us our needs by this craving, and to ignore the voice is to pay the penalty in disease. This craving must be satisfied and our citizens are willing to pay the price, and do pay it to the Americans, for the fruit that first appears on the market. Nature is wise and provides the fruit at the psychological moment it is needed. Our strawberries come on the market at the proper time for our climatic conditions. Our American cousins need this fruit sooner than we and their climate produces it for them and thus enables them to anticipate our demand by putting their early fruit on our market fully three weeks before our own early fruit is ripe, thus creating an artificial desire in our people. By this means the Americans skim the cream of our prices and cheat the Canadian fruit grower out of his birthright. This should not be and it should be remedied by an increased protection on fruit. The duty should be ad valorem and not specific as now, to meet the situation adequately. I would advocate an ad valorem duty of at least 25 per cent so that the early American fruit would pay a duty in proportion to its price, which is usually about 40 cents per quart, and produce more revenue if the fruit must come in. Just as soon as our native fruit is ripe, competition or supply and demand, regulates the price and does so all the more promptly because the product is perishable. For this industry the home market is essential as the Canadian cannot compete in the American market on account of the increased cost of production due to the following causes:—

(1) The American fruit is two or three weeks earlier and the cream of the prices is gone before our fruit is ready for sale.

(2) The cost of production in Canada is greater on account of climatic conditions. More labour is necessary to protect the plants from the frosts of winter and spring. The grower must provide himself with frame-yard room, sash, and fertilizer, to grow his seeding plants. This is not necessary or as expensive in a warmer climate.

(3) Top dressing with straw, involving time and labour is absolutely essential in this country and not necessary in the United States. The Canadian producer must employ his help longer in the year on account of these extra precautions which add materially to the cost compared with North Carolina and South Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee and New York. This applies to the production of fruit all over Canada and furnishes the reason why our fruit industry requires adequate protection. The same policy for the whole country and not for one section of it to the detriment of other sections.

[Mr. Anderson.]

The canning industry is intimately bound up with the fruit and vegetable industry and a fiscal policy that injures the one, hurts the other. The canners buy the raw material from the producers in their vicinity, give employment to many hands and put the perishable product of the gardener on the market many months after it is picked. But for this industry the gardener would be compelled to produce less or allow his product to rot in the field. There were forty-two canning factories in Canada in 1921 with an output of $16,000,000 annually, and employing 3,000 people and buying the product of 5,000 farmers.

In order to give the discussion somewhat of a home touch, I am going to tell you something about the county I represent, Halton. Agriculture and industry are represented in that county in the same proportion as in the Dominion at large. It is a district fairly representative of the needs of the whole country, and anything that injures Halton will injure the rest of Canada. Mixed farming is carried on to a considerable degree in all parts of the county—fruit growing, cattle raising, dairy products, and so forth. The home market in this country is estimated to consume from eighty to eighty-five per cent of the produce of our farms. It is absolutely essential that these farmers should have their home market.

Mr. CRERAR: In that is included what the farmers themselves and their families consume, of course?

Mr. ANDERSON: I think the farmers must live, and they consume their product.

Mr. CRERAR: It rather knocks the bottom out of your home market argument.

Mr. ANDERSON: I did not catch the last remark of my hon. friend. If a Canadian farmer is going to make a success I do not see why he should not consume some of his own product. I do not know how he is going to maintain himself and family if he does not sell some of his product in order to buy the products of industry and maintain himself in decency. The fruit industry of the county of Halton extends across the whole southern section, and the product is sold in the nearby towns and cities; and anything that injures the cities and towns injures the fruit growing industry of that part of the country. That is their home market and it is absolutely essential that that home market should be preserved for them. If it is not preserved, fruit growing in that county and all other parts of Ontario with which I am acquainted must languish and die. These market gardeners require protection for reasons which I have already detailed. They require it in order that the fruit growers may have this home market, and the two cents of specific duty at present in force is entirely inadequate for the purpose. There is little use in reducing the duty on the implements they use in their business if they cannot sell their product in the market at a profit. A much more sensible policy would be to allow the duty to remain on their implements and to leave them a market in which they can sell all they produce at a fair profit. Those implements could be manufactured in Canada and the manufacture of them would assist in maintaining a home market for the producers. Those things must go together, and if we are really interested in the welfare of this country, every member of this House must consider these questions seriously. A fiscal policy which shuts down our factories and drives our artisans and labourers across the border does away with the very market upon which the market gardeners depend, the consequence being that not only the cities and towns, but the country districts as well are injured.

During 1924, we imported from the United States fresh fruits to the value of $5,000,000 and fresh vegetables to the value of $2,500,000, making a total of $7,500,000 of these two products alone coming into this country from the United States to displace an equal quantity of the products of our own market gardeners. I can say with much confidence that if that money had gone into the pockets of our market gardeners, if their produce instead of American produce had been bought, no fruit and vegetables would have been rotting in the fields of our market gardeners during the last year. That money goes into the pockets of the American to help him to flourish, while our people find it barely possible to make ends meet.

During 1923 we imported over 6,000,000 pounds of strawberries valued at $785,150, and in 1924 over 5,000,000 pounds valued at $740,699, which was bought by the Canadian people at higher prices than the Canadian market gardener received for his produce. The quantities of some of these small fruits imported into Canada are as follows:

Small Fruits—Imports into Canada

	1923	1924
Strawberries	6,122,000 lbs.	5,014,000 lbs.
Grapes	6,836,000 "	10,469,000 "
Pears	15,267,000 "	17,864,000 "
Peaches	10,825,000 "	13,405,000 "
Plums	111,000 bus.	140,000 bus.

We imported from the United States vegetables, exclusive of potatoes and tomatoes, in 1923, $1,676,000 worth, and in 1924, $2,000,000 worth. During those two years, nine million Canadians imported from the United States $16,000,000 worth of small fruits and vegetables, while the United States with a population of 113,000,000 took from us in small fruits and vegetables of the same kind $1,287,000 worth. The American does not reciprocate very generously in the matter of fruit. He buys from us to the extent of about ten cents per head of population while the Canadian reciprocates by buying from him to the extent of $1.60 per head, or sixteen times as much. This generosity is on the wrong side of the ledger and it is time that we called a halt. Surely nine million Canadians, living in a country which produces in abundance fruits and vegetables of a quality that cannot be excelled, should have a home market protected sufficiently that the Canadians themselves would eat their home product.

I excluded the item of potatoes from the previous list because it represents a unique situation. In 1924, we imported 24,867,000 pounds of potatoes, mostly from the United States, for which we paid $576,664; and we exported in the same year 181,800, 000 pounds for which we received $2,856,000. We paid the Americans 2.3 cents per pound for the potatoes we bought from them, and we sold our own potatoes for 1.1 cents per pound, or just about half as much. This quantity of potatoes coming in from the United States displaces just that much from our home market and cheats the Canadian farmer out of that much in price. The same thing is done every year. In 1923, we imported 21,050,000 pounds of American potatoes and sold in the English market 167,785,000 pounds, with the Canadian producer accepting a lower price. Similar statements can be made in regard to almost all our products. And at the same time the American is practically refusing to buy from us.

We imported vegetables in 1923, paying therefor $4,904,734, and in 1924, $5,479,700 worth, four-fifths of them being from the United States, and in the same years we exported $3,229,320 and $4,906,825 worth respectively, the imported articles displacing almost an equal amount of the Canadian product and forcing it to an outside market at a loss to the Canadian producer.

Our trade in canned vegetables furnishes another example of loss on this exchange of our products. Imports of canned vegetables, nearly all from the United States, were, in 1923, 7,890,537 pounds, costing $806,286, or 10.2 cents per pound; and in 1924, 9,270,126 pounds costing $925,449 or 10.4 cents per pound. The total exports in the same years were: 1923, 11,033,107 pounds valued at $841,401, or 7.6 cents per pound, and in 1924, 16,606,115 pounds valued at $1,193,450, or 7.2 cents per pound; 3,650,000 pounds and 4,340,000 pounds respectively going to the United States. Thus it will be seen again that we imported vegetable products in 1923 and 1924 respectively, mostly from the United States, at 10.2 cents per pound and 10.6 cents per pound, and exported our own at 7.6 cents and 7.2 cents per pound, with a heavy loss to the Canadian market gardener. We imported canned vegetables from the United States in these two years amounting to approximately 12,000,000 pounds averaging 10.3 cents per pound, and we sold them back 8,000,000 pounds at 7.4 cents per pound. This makes a huge loss to our market gardeners and is rather a high price to pay for the privilege of enjoying the American market. On this exchange the American is ahead of the game some $360,000, and on the total imports and exports for the two years of fruit and vegetables, the loss to Canada was $510,000. And this is duplicated year after year.

The farmers of Canada are interested somewhat in pork. We raise about 20,000 hogs annually in Halton and they must find a market. During the years ending February, 1923 and 1924 respectively, we imported from the United States pork products as follows:

Pork Products—Imports into Canada from the United States

	1923		1924
	Pounds	Value	Pounds	Value
Bacon and Hams	4,560,187	$ 670,976	6,652,399	$ 818,976
Fresh pork	35,035,192	5,495,129	21,135,387	2,699,364
Pork in brine	12,246,671	1,331,611	9,611,282	1,023,197
Totals	51,850,050	$7,497,706	37,499,068	$4,541,157

In the same years we exported, mostly to England:

	1923		1924
	Pounds	Value	Pounds	Value
Bacon and Hams	101,830,400	$23,011,923 or 22½ cents a pound	96,108,800	$17,651,133 or 18.4 cents a pound

The point about this particular item is that it is hardly known how much of the American pork—which is cheaper than the pork produced in Canada inasmuch as it is corn-fed whereas the Canadian product is hard grain-fed,—is imported here and re-exported to England to compete there with Canadian pork. I am told that this American pork that comes here is re-cured to the extent of being smoked and dried, after which the hams and the bacon are sent to England in competition with Canadian produced pork. I am informed by the Department of Agriculture that the American pork is marked as such, and while I do not know to what extent it affects the market, the fact remains that it comes into Canada and is shipped out again through Canadian ports to compete with the Canadian product, and is sent abroad by Canadian exporters.

The dairy industry is an important one and one in which our farmers are very greatly interested. There are 3,072 plants in Canada employing 10,394 persons and paying an annual wage of $8,500,000. The raw material used amounts to $77,000,000 per annum while the manufactured product is worth $100,000,000 per annum. This applies particularly to the creameries and cheese factories in the country and does not include the dairy products of the farm; it does not include dairy butter but simply creamery butter and cheese from the various factories. Every province is interested in this industry, which is growing throughout the whole country, and the prairie provinces are stimulating production in this particular direction. Our imports of butter have declined considerably during the last two years and I have the figures which have been compiled by the Department of Trade and Commerce in regard to this item. In the year 1923 we imported 3,767,000 pounds of butter for which we paid 38½ cents per pound, while we exported 21,994,000 pounds for which we received 37½ cents per pound, or a loss of 1 cent per pound to the Canadian producer. In 1924 our exports totalled 1,558,000 pounds for which we paid at the rate of 38½ cents per pound, while our exports totalled 13,648,000 pounds for which we received at the rate of 37¼ cents, representing a loss to the Canadian producer of 1¼ cents per pound.

Cheese furnishes another example of loss from imports, although this product varies in price, according to quality, much more than butter. It is difficult to know to what extent our Canadian producer gets the worst of the deal. Our imports and exports of this article for the years 1923 and 1924, with the respective prices per pound which we paid and received, will be seen in the following table:

Imports	Exports
916,000 lbs.	114,548,000 lbs,
$327,000	$20,528,000
34 cents lb.	19 cents lb.
1924
Imports	Exports
1,688,000 lbs.	116,777,000 lbs.
32 cents lb.	20 cents lb.

Canada produces 135,000,000 pounds of cheese annually, the greater part of which finds a foreign market, largely in the United Kingdom.The imports and exports of cheese to the United States for the years 1923 and 1924, according to the returns of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year 1924, known as the Condensed Preliminary Report, were as follows: In 1923, we imported 614,872 pounds, for which we paid at the rate of 29.1 cents per pound, and exported 5,902,000 for which we received 16.6 cents per pound, or a difference of some 12 cents per pound against the Canadian producer. These products may differ in quality and variety; it is difficult to say, and I could not get at the exact facts. In 1924 our imports totalled 592,196 pounds for which we paid at the rate of 30½ cents per pound, while our exports amounted to 3,347,000 pounds for which we received at the rate of 17.6 cents per pound, or a loss of about 12½ cents per pound to the Canadian producer. These exchanges were with the United States and they show a balance against the Canadian producer very much the same as in the case of the vegetables which he had to sell.

As I have already said, the county of Halton is represented in industry and agriculture in the same proportion as the Dominion at large. The industries of Halton in 1920 numbered 143, having a capital invested of approximately $8,000,000, and paying $1,517,000 annually in wages and using $4,610,000 of raw material which was manufactured into the finished products valued at $8,500,000. None of these industries is large or has a great amount of capital invested, but their maintenance and prosperity is vital to the people of that county. If they should shut their doors and close their plants, fully 4,000 people in the towns would be in want and distress. Not only that, but in a short time half the population of the county would be seriously affected and a little later the whole county. Every constituency in Ontario, and for that matter in the Dominion, is situated similarly to Halton and would be affected in the same way just in proportion to the number of industries and employees. The effect of this lack of business in our manufacturing plants falls first and most heavily on the workingman and his family; then it spreads to the merchants and professional men and other classes until it affects every person in the community, and finally the municipal corporation itself; the artisan limits his purchases to the direst necessities, there is less money in circulation, business stagnates, and a feeling of pessimism and unrest pervades the community.

The industries of Halton require protection to enable them to attain their fullest development and to give continuous employment at fair wages to the working class. It is exceedingly discouraging to a thrifty, energetic workingman, who owns a home and has a family, to be out of employment from three to six months in the year and to find himself unable to better his financial condition from year to year. Yet that is exactly the condition we find to-day: he can get only part-time employment at reduced wages just sufficient to provide him with the bare necessities of life. Most of the industries in the county are carrying on at a loss for the sake of keeping the men in hand in the hope of a revival in business. This condition has increased with each reduction of the tariff until the limit has been reached beyond which it cannot go without closing most of the industries. When you consider that over 1,300 factories have closed their doors within the last two years, the management of those in Halton must have been sound to have kept them solvent at all. But this cannot go on indefinitely without ending in industrial failure and economic disaster for the whole county. The only bright spot on the industrial horizon, and one that gives a gleam of hope, is the fact that this parliamentary term is nearing its close and the people will have an opportunity to name the present government's successors.

Brick is manufactured in Halton in large quantities and it is the best building brick in America. It is shipped all over Canada and the demand for it has been steady. While it has not been affected by reduction in the tariff, the general business stagnation and slump in building operations, occasioned by the vacillating fiscal policy of the present government, has lessened the demand and caused cancellation of orders resulting in lessened operations and unemployment.

Our knitted woollen industry has been seriously affected by the increase of the British preference. The imports of the socks and stockings have steadily increased since 1922 and the increase will steadily grow as the market becomes better known to the British exporter. The following is a table of the imports of knitted woollen goods:

Socks and Stockings imported in 1922, 286,167 doz. prs.
Socks and Stockings imported in 1923, 606,867 doz. prs.
Socks and Stockings imported in 1924, 640,880 doz. prs.

—an increase of considerably over 100 per cent in two years after the increase in preference was made.

Preference for trade within the empire is to be desired and such trade should be encouraged; but there is a limit beyond which it cannot go without doing serious and irreparable damage to our own industries. It was never contemplated that it should go to that extent. Our total imports of knitted and woollen goods, yarns and raw wool in 1923 were $45,734,000, and in 1924 they amounted to $47,318,000 in value. These can all be produced in Canada, and only a little fostering care is needed to bring it about. Forty-seven million dollars is a large sum, and the production of that large amount of goods annually would go a long way in keeping our people from emigrating to the United States in search of employment.

Our paper industry furnishes an example of a mistaken policy with regard to our raw material and to the encouragement of the industry in Canada. Our mills are in good financial condition and make a superior article, but they are compelled to meet a steady competition from the large mills in the United States. Our imports of paper were:

There has been a steady increase in the imports of this commodity, seven-eighths of it from the United States, which should be made at home giving employment to Canadians and retaining the money in Canada. Our own pulpwood cut is depleting our supply at a rapid rate. Our pulpwood is being shipped into the United States and sold to the Americans at a low price, and manufactured there, giving employment to their working men and building up markets for their farmers. The finished product is shipped back and sold to Canadian consumers at a high price, the gold going back to the States to swell their already immense hoard. An embargo on the exportation of pulpwood might result in reprisals from the United States, but we have suffered reprisals from the United States before, and it is high time that we met this situation by increasing our duties and making our tariff barriers equal to theirs. Unmanufactured leather is imported almost altogether from the United States, only a small quantity coming from the United Kingdom. Our annual imports in 1924 amounted to $4,170,628. This is quite a large amount for a population of nine millions. The large and wealthy tanneries of the United States manufacture this leather in large quantities at a lesser cost than that at which our smaller plants are able to turn out this commodity, and the competition is a serious factor to the industry in Canada. We have two long-established leather industries in the county of Halton, employing a large number of hands and operating extensive and valuable plants. They are both important factors in the growth and prosperity of the towns where they are located, and anything that injures them is of serious consequence to their community. One of these plants has closed down, and quite a large number of hands are out of employment, with the consequent depression of local business that is bound to ensue when a big weekly payment of wages is suddenly stopped.

Our steel industry, producing screws, bolts, nuts, washers, and so forth, has been hard hit by the recent abolition of the duty on farm implements and the raw material used in their manufacture. Wages were reduced and the working staff cut down to the lowest possible limit to keep the factories going at all. Our economic condition is fairly well put by Mr. J. R. Shaw of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, who in the course of an address before the National Conference in Ottawa on September 3 and 4, 1924, which will be found in the report issued under the direction of the Minister of Labour, said:

> What is the chief cause of unemployment? It is by reason of the fact that our factories are by no means fully employed. Over one thousand of them have been shut down during the past two years, and a great number of those remaining are only running part time.

A similar condition exists in the county of Halton.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that you have arrived at the conclusion that I am a protectionist. I believe in the principle of protection as applied to our economic structure by means of an adequate scale of tariff duties which will ensure the home market to Canadian institutions. I would apply it to all classes and all sections of Canada, giving due consideration to the needs of the people. I would not have it so high as to shut out competition from other countries, but just high enough to ensure the home market to our producers and protect them from the cheap labour and depreciated currencies of European countries. A young country like Canada, with a sparse population and great natural resources, needs to practice every art possible to attract to herself the men and the money necessary to develop those resources and make our natural wealth available for our people. Those who have the first claim on this wealth and on our home market are the people who pay the taxes which keep the country solvent. Protection has become almost universal to-day. All countries have set up tariff barriers against their neighbours, even England being all but convinced that free trade is no longer a panacea for her troubles, and recent events leave little doubt that she will eventually turn to protection. In a world of protection where would a young country like Canada be under free trade? A lone country unprotected by a tariff, we would be a prey for every marauder, the dumping ground for the surplus and refuse products of every land. We might get cheaper goods, but they would be of inferior quality and payment would be demanded in gold. We could not demand that payment should be taken in kind because we should have given away our bargaining power —our market would be already free. There would be no need of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) going to Italy, France or Belgium to make trade agreements if we adopted free trade, for he would be laughed out of those countries. They would tell him, "You have nothing to give; we have your markets already, and that is all we want." No, Mr. Speaker, free trade may be very plausible in theory, but it is utterly impossible in practice. The same may be said of the Prime Minister's policy of freer trade, or tariff for revenue, which is merely an indirect way of talking free trade. Such a policy would need to be universal, and even then it would be of doubtful utility to Canada unless humanity lived as one nation.

The present trend of the whole world is towards protection. Even England has her Safeguarding of Industries Act, passed since the war, which protects a long list of articles made in that country. Mr. Baldwin went so far as to appeal to the people of Great Britain on the question of protection, showing that the policy is gaining ground there to a marked degree. His defeat on that occasion was not so much due to his policy as to the suddenness with which he sprung it upon the electorate. The slow-moving English people could not be turned from a life-long habit in a six weeks' campaign.

Seventy-five countries have raised their tariffs since the war, showing that there is some real necessity behind this general movement toward protection. Is it because they are compelled to do so to meet the demand for increased revenue to pay war indebtedness? If so, why did they not adopt the policy of the Prime Minister, of freer trade or tariff for revenue, or the policy of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and put a tax on land or make a capital levy to pay the war debt? Why did they not increase their excess profits tax, income tax, sales tax and stamp taxes, to meet increased expenditure and lower their tariff? Why?—because the people did not have the money to pay these taxes and were not in a position to compete with the outside world with their industries crushed and ruined by the war. The government could not collect a land tax from the landowners who were penniless. There was no capital on which to levy. There was no business to create income; none to pay sales taxes and stamp taxes. Consequently the governments turned to the other expedient and raised the tariff in order to stimulate home production so as to create wealth by labour in their own countries. They raised the tariff to build up their home industries, to protect their farmers in their own market, to give employment to their labourers and develop and conserve their natural resources so they might be available for revenue to meet the national needs.

The United States adopted this policy and have an almost prohibitive tariff—the highest in their history—and whether as a consequence or not, they are enjoying prosperity and great business activities while Canada, having adopted the opposite course of a lowered tariff, is suffering depression, business stagnation and loss of her people by emigration. Canada has had three reductions of her tariff in as many years, and substantial ones too in 1922, 1923 and 1924, and each one has been followed by a larger stream of emigrants to the United States until a conservative estimate is given that half a million of our artisans and labourers have crossed the border in search of employment. It is claimed that many of these have returned and are returning. I have met a few of them myself, but they are only returning to settle up their affairs here, and then move with their families across the border. Not only has the United States raised her tariff to a prohibitive extent, but she has lessened her importations and increased her exportations since 1921. She has done that to such an extent that she has cornered almost sixty per cent of the world's supply of gold. It is locked up in her treasury, and only time and experience will prove whether it is to her advantage or not. Economists say it will be her ruin, but speaking as an individual, I doubt it.

Under this extremely high protection the United States has been able to reduce her taxation in many ways, and has paid off huge sums from her war debt. President Coolidge in his address to congress stated that since 1919 the United States has paid off something over five billion dollars, amounting to one-fifth of the total national debt of the United States, and that since 1921 they had cut their taxation in two. That is a great achievement for that people under a high protective policy. Canada has followed the opposite course of lowered tariff, and our annual budget has not been balanced, our debt is increasing, taxation is mounting, business depression is rampant, our people are emigrating, unemployment is large and immigrants cannot be got even at a price. A country with Canada's richness and variety of resources, inhabited by a sturdy people in the north temperate zone, is bound to become a great manufacturing nation. It is also equally evident that we have the potentialities for becoming a great agricultural country, and the two make a complete combination for natural greatness. We have the raw material for almost any kind of industry to be turned into the finished products which will give employment to an immense army of artisans, who, in turn, will furnish a market for our agricultural products. All we need is the determination to press forward in the path we have followed during the last forty years, stimulate the development of these natural resources we have in such profusion, turn the raw material into the finished product, foster and encourage our basic industry of agriculture, protect the home market for both industry and agriculture, and trade with those countries that are willing to trade with us, especially those within the Empire.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, it was a pleasure to me to follow very attentively the speeches delivered by the mover (Sir Eugene Fiset) and the seconder (Mr. Hanna) of the Address. It has always been my duty since I have been in this House to listen very attentively to the well prepared and well delivered speeches of the proposer and the seconder of the Address, and to both the hon. gentlemen to whom the task fell on this occasion I beg to offer my congratulations. I think each of these members is an acquisition to the House. One, the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset), has given us the benefit of his experience in the administration of the affairs of the country, and my hon. friend from West Hastings (Mr. Hanna) has given us the benefit of his experience in business.

We had a few by-elections in the year 1924, and I am glad to say that the results have shown that our policy has been thought a wise one and good for the country. The people all through Canada, and especially the electors of the county of West Hastings, in the old province of Ontario, have approved of the policy of the present government of reducing the tariff at the last session.

Mr. Speaker, our friends to your immediate left in 1921 adopted a new name for their party. They added to an already long name the word "National." That was added to the words Liberal-Conservative, no doubt because they thought the word "National" would harmonize with the words "National Policy," and would carry them to victory at the polls that year. But the result of the election was that only fifty members of that old historic party came back to this House. Not very long ago, I understand, our friends who are devoted to a protective tariff could not bear even the good name of Liberal, and they tried to bury that too. At the particular meeting at which this matter was discussed, if I am well informed, the name of Sir John Macdonald was mentioned, in this way; it was said that with the good old label of Liberal-Conservative Sir John Macdonald had carried his party to victory on many an occasion. The name of Sir Charles Tupper was also mentioned, and the name of Sir John Thompson. The latest reports we have are that the name National is now buried, also the word Liberal, and only the word Conservative, which sounds like Toryism, remains and is the best word for our high-protectionist friends. But, Mr. Speaker, if we are to judge by the results of the last few by-elections, I do not think any name can help that party very much in the future, for some time at least.

We have a large debt to meet in this country. The war imposed heavy obligations upon us. Our soldiers, and the widows and orphans of those who fell in the war have to be looked after; the interest on our debt has to be paid. And I ask myself, and I ask this House: Are we going to be able to meet all our obligations? For my part I can see only one or two means of salvation for us, and those are economy, the further development of our natural resources, and better transportation facilities. During the war we made lots of money, through production and labour and so forth, and the people of this country contracted the habit of spending freely what they were earning, and gave very little thought to the obligations we had to meet in the future. If we are to meet these great obligations, we shall have to be very careful.

We have assets which, if care is taken, will pay double and triple the amount of our debt. What are those assets? They are our farms, our fisheries, our mines and our forests. I had occasion during the last session to call the attention of the House to the necessity of the preservation of our forests. I pointed out then that we had to be very careful to co-operate with the provinces in order to protect our forests. We have been successful in that respect to a certain extent. As far as our fisheries are concerned, unfortunately we were blocked by our American friends from our natural market on the other side, and we were not so successful in the past year. As to mining, we have to congratulate ourselves upon the fact that we have taken out of the earth in the last year or two more gold than ever before. In order to bring about the expansion of our commerce, and assist in meeting our obligations, our government negotiated with certain other countries and dominions, with the result that our trade has been augmented to a certain extent. I must say, however, that our neighbours to the south have not dealt with us fairly. The United States to-day holds ninety per cent or more of the gold of the entire world. But, not satisfied with that, they are now trying to control the trade of the world and to penalize the commerce of other nations. Canada is one country against whose products they have placed an embargo. If an example of their action in this respect is needed it can be found in the Fordney bill. There is no doubt but that we have ample reason to complain of the unfriendly conduct of our neighbour the United States. In order to convince the House that I am amply warranted in this statement I shall read to you the statement of a writer in the Boston Post which has been embodied in an article published by a newspaper in my own town and headed This Embargo Business The article says:

That's the heading a writer in the Boston Post gives an article on the potato embargo. This writer deals with the question in a very frank manner and makes bold to state that the American nation is a persistent user of the embargo tactics.

The reason, that fine Malaga grapes were unobtainable in the American market the past holiday season was that the government had put an embargo on Malagas from Spain. Plant bulbs from France, England and Holland have likewise been excluded by the same process. "Some years ago," reminds the writer, "the onion growers of Bermuda were totally ruined for a season by an embargo excluding Bermudian onions from the United States. The last time Canada had an abundant potato crop the American government imposed an embargo on their importation."

"Now," concludes the Boston Post article, "with our record how can we consistently protest when our favorite tactics are turned against us."

Without a doubt this is a very fairminded editorial, published in one of the foremost papers of the republic to the south of us. Can we take it as being indicative of general feeling? Why should we worry if it is or is not? Britain has done what she thinks right and in doing so has incidentally helped a small portion of Canada, namely, The Maritimes. Too long has Canada been afraid of arousing the wrath and indignation of the U. S. Too long have we acted as stepping stones for the use of the money monarchs of the U. S. while stepping across the gap, to politely take from us our very necessities of life.

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing is a very strong article but I think it states the situation correctly. In my opinion the Americans are pursuing a very shortsighted policy, because the indications are that in the not distant future they will be looking to Canada, to a greater extent than they now do to supply their needs. In support of this view permit me to read the following extract from a French Canadian journal:

Coolidge and Canada

However, the hour of Canada will come. Quite recently, the President of the United States, Mr. Coolidge, foresaw it in a speech which created quite a stir in the country. The time is rapidly nearing, he said, when the American Republic will be forced to import enormous quantities of farm products. Previous to the war, he added, it was on the eve, as in the case of England, of being self sustaining. However, during the great European conflict, the Government gave an artificial and temporary stimulus to agriculture, and thus put back for a few years, the coming of the new state of things. Yet soon the American farmer will not produce enough wheat or food for the nation, and when this happens it will have to turn to agricultural countries so as to obtain the food which it will require.

This may be briefly translated as follows:

President Coolidge has expressed the opinion that sooner or later the consumers of this country will have to go to other agricultural countries in order to obtain food to meet the necessities of the nation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer briefly to the rights of the Maritime provinces in connection with transportation and trade with other parts of Canada. We have in Canada such an immense mileage that it is a matter of great difficulty for one section of the country to compete with another when it is handicapped by a long freight haul. In the Maritime provinces we produce lumber and raise potatoes in great quantities, but by reason of the long railway haul our lumbermen and potato growers are not in a position to compete with shippers located much nearer the market, as for example the lumbermen of Ontario when they send their lumber into the middle or southern states. It is equally difficult for our potato shippers to meet the competition of growers in Ontario and Quebec whose products have only to be hauled a comparatively short distance. That affects us in this way: Not very long ago I observed that our friends out on the Canadian prairies were importing potatoes from across the line, paying duty on them, and ignoring entirely dealers in the Maritime provinces. I suppose the reason for that was that they could buy their potatoes more cheaply in the United States than they could from us. If such is the case our transportation system is not aiding us to the extent that it should. The freights are too high to allow us to compete with our fellow Canadians in other parts of Canada, or even with Americans who seem to have no difficulty in sending their products into this country. In order to illustrate the unfortunate position we are in, let me point out to you that it requires from thirteen to eighteen barrels of potatoes to purchase one barrel of flour. Is not this a very heavy handicap for the Maritime provinces to labour under? Is it any wonder that the St. John Telegraph, and the Times and Star, published in the city of St. John, N.B. are sending a representative throughout Canada in order to explain to the people of Ontario and Quebec, and especially our friends in the west, the serious handicap under which we suffer, and the urgent necessity for lower transportation rates? We must be relieved of some of these disabilities if we are to do our share in building up Canada, and there must be the most complete co-operation between all sections of the country and the equality as far as possible if we are to make this country what it should be. I must congratulate the newspapers in question on the enterprise they have displayed in taking such a striking way of making our grievances known, and I must acknowledge also the sympathy with which the representations made on our behalf have been received in other parts of Canada. I do hope that as a result of the present movement we shall be, in the near future, more happily situated, and that a better understanding may be arrived at between the east and the west. I am hopeful that the policy which has been enunciated by the government will have the desired effect not only in an equalization of railway rates but in an equalization in the price of food products throughout the Dominion.

I wish to say a few words in reply to my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Anderson). The hon. gentleman spoke of the cost of transportation; immigration; and protection. He has spoken as a protectionist. He also spoke of the equalization of rates, and so forth. He is perfectly right in his own view, but the country to-day will not consider for a moment that high protection is the policy we need. He has referred to the United States. Well, give us a population of 110,000,000 and we will have a home market, but with a population of 9,000,000 and over-production in our manufacturing centres, over-production in the prairie provinces, and over-production in lumber all through Canada, what are we going to do? We have to find a market. When, by a high tariff, you prevent the people of the United States coming to Canada, what can you expect in return from that country? The reason why to-day we have so much difficulty in meeting our obligations, in my opinion, is that the tariff is too high. We are unable to deal with many European nations on account of their money having no value. We are at a loss for immigration. But when you say to this House, as my hon. friend from Halton has said, that we want a higher tariff, what are we going to do with our products? That is a question which my hon. friend is unable to answer.

I have before me a few words, published in the Free Press in Winnipeg, and I should like to put on the record what that newspaper has said referring to the Maritime provinces. It is about time that we representatives of the Maritime provinces should place our grievances before the House:

> The Maritime provinces have been hit particularly hard in the last few years. Not only has business suffered, but there has been a very heavy exodus to the United States. The number of people who have gone from all parts of these provinces has been a matter of the greatest concern. The cause of it was the general depression, together with the Fordney tariff, which practically cut off the United States market for products of the Maritime provinces. The great slump from the war traffic passing through Halifax and St. John—the enormous volume of supplies and the constant stream of troops—to the reduced traffic of post-war years, has also been very discouraging to the ambitions of those provinces. It is equally discouraging to see the western provinces growing while they are more or less at a standstill.
> It is very necessary that something should be done to improve conditions. What are the natural advantages, and along what lines can development be stimulated? Can anything more be reasonably done to encourage traffic through the Maritime ports? The government has not only spent money liberally on those ports, but it has also secured a reduction in marine insurance on shipping and has given an increased preference on British goods imported into Canada through Canadian ports. The National Railways have also abolished the differential against those ports so that the rate on import and export traffic is the same as at Portland.
> The results of the efforts of the commission which is being appointed will be awaited with interest in other parts of the country. We would have no national spirit, and Confederation would have no object or meaning, if we were indifferent to the difficulties of any part of the country. The difficulties of the Maritime provinces are serious, but, with the energy and resourcefulness of their people and such co-operation as the Dominion can lend, it is to be hoped that those difficulties will be surmounted and that a new day of prosperity and development along their own lines will soon come.

Years ago the province of Quebec was privileged by the addition of a large territory to its limits. Labrador and Ungava were added to that province. Ontario was accorded the same privilege and a large tract of land was added to its area, Manitoba received a large increase of land. The western provinces are large and have enough land for centuries to come. We in the east, who also form a part of confederation, were limited to a few hundred or a few thousand square miles of land, and it is up to us now, when the old provinces and the new provinces of the west are receiving privileges from this government, that we should ask for cheaper transportation, so that we can transport our goods. We have to come to this House and ask for these privileges. In conclusion I have here a few words which I found in a magazine published in the United States uttered by one of our Canadian historians, and it suits my purpose to place them on Hansard. He says, speaking about Canadians: "Let us talk success not failure. Let us picture our victories rather than our defeats. We have many commercial and industrial lights. We should not hide them beneath a shade, but should place them upon a pedestal so that their brilliance may no longer remain unseen, because of light shining from afar."

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): It is usual to say a few words in regard to the Speech from the Throne. If there is one commendation that might be given to it, it is its brevity, but anything that it lacked in length was surely compensated for by the speech given in this House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other evening. In the speeches that were delivered to us by the Prime Minister and the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) we got two entirely different pictures of Canada and her condition. On the one hand we had Canada bisected. We saw her great bony framework, her great arteries and sinews, and all the inside mechanism of this great country, and it failed to evoke any great enthusiasm or disturb our minds. Yet on the other hand we had a picture presented to us of Canada in lurid colours, showing the abounding prosperity and our happy position compared with any other country in the world. The question that came to me while the speeches were being uttered was this: Which of these speeches rings true in the heart of the individual in his own experience? It is the experience of the individual which counts, and he is only able to grasp the picture when it rings true with that which he finds true in everyday life. So far as I am concerned I am glad to believe that Canada is a great and mighty country. We do not believe that everything here is ideal, but it is far better for us not to think too seriously of the ills of the body politic. The great constitution of Canada to-day is sound, and for that reason, although we may have various ills and pains here and there that depress us, as a whole the body politic is sound. There is a good constitution; and with real leadership, and the right kind of thinking I believe we can come out successful from the depression in which we have been placed during the past few years.

While the Prime Minister was in the west he delivered certain speeches that revealed to us what had been done in past parliaments, and especially to the drastic cut that had been made in taxation. But what surprised me more than anything else—especially in his speech in Regina—was this fact: The average person seems to lack memory. The Prime Minister made the statement that possibly he had made the cut too drastic in taxation, that he had hewed just a little close to the line, and when he said to the intelligent people of that city that he had lowered the taxation of the Canadian people $27,000,000 in one year the people applauded, and yet not a word was said against it, not a question was asked. I am bound to say he could not have made such a statement in a little rural public school house without some question being asked, because when the Prime Minister speaks of a reduction of $20,000,000 in the sales tax, and $7,000,000, in the tariff, if one has any memory he will know that in this House during the two sessions previous to that the sales tax was increased, not $20,000,000 but between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000. Therefore, even at the present time, though there has been a reduction in taxation of $27,000,000, we are still $30,000,000 to the good from the point of view of public revenue. I am not saying a word against the sales tax. We must raise money in this country one way or another. Taxation is something like a pain, no matter where you have it in the body, you would rather have it somewhere else. The average Canadian is really not thinking seriously in regard to his taxation and how the money is being raised, otherwise, Canadians would not have allowed such a statement to be made without some comment.

Since coming to Ottawa I have heard a great deal in regard to the wonderful crop in the west, and more in regard to the wonderful prices. The Prime Minister in his speech the other night spoke quite truly when he said that the price the farmers had received for their products for the first time since the war nearly equalled the price that they had to pay for other things, but yet the year was very unsatisfactory to the great majority of the farmers of Saskatchewan. When it is considered that by the most generous estimate the crop of last year was 125,000,000 bushels less than the average of the last two years, you can easily understand how it affected certain people. It must also be remembered that out of every year's crop we require twenty-five to thirty million bushels of wheat for seed, feed and milling purposes. Premier Dunning, in his letter to the Montreal Gazette, speaking of conditions in Saskatchewan, stated that very few people were fortunate enough to harvest a bumper crop. It is true that nearly as much money has gone into Saskatchewan this year, on account of the higher prices, as went into that province during bumper years, but that is poor consolation to those people who did not harvest a crop. We know that failure in Saskatchewan was due not to poor farming methods or poor farmers, but to weather conditions, and no government, no legislation, can remedy this kind of thing. The difficulty to-day is that in the drouth-stricken area this high price for grain is a drawback because many of the farmers have to buy seed.

As regards branch lines and branch line construction, last year when the government was enunciating its policy of a three-year programme, one of the arguments advanced in favour of that policy was the fact that it would enable the government to proceed rapidly with branch line work and especially to allow the work to be done by the farmers at a time when they were not busy. As soon as I heard that a railway was to be built in my particular area which was drouth-stricken at that time, I got in touch with the farmers and endeavoured to present to the authorities the fact that we had over 300 men and 300 teams who could work on this construction work. This announcement was sent before the contract was given. The contract was given and the contractors came into the district, but the sign was out "No farmers need apply." They brought in labour from other districts or from other contracts which they had just finished, and the result was that labour which would have been a Godsend to those farmers in the drouth-stricken area was denied them and any benefit that might have accrued to us went to those foreign to our district, none of our people reaping the benefit. I am speaking on this point only for this reason, to show that the argument advanced had no real foundation, because when it was put to the test the work and the equipment were furnished by other people.

As regards the needs of Swift Current, the constituency which I have the honour to represent, during the last two or three years, Swift Current has splendidly come out of the hole. The people of that district have had most wonderful crops and are benefitting thereby. The northern part of my constituency was drouth-stricken and as a result there was very much suffering. However, I would plead with the government for a more just distribution of public funds to the needs of the provinces in the west. I am not belittling the needs of the Maritime provinces, of which we have just heard, or even of Quebec or Ontario; but it is a well-known fact that if you were to look over the estimates which are brought forward in regard to the public works of this country you would find that one little wharf possibly up somewhere in Nova Scotia that served the needs of a hundred people, received just as much consideration and expenditure as three-quarters of a million in Saskatchewan. That does not seem to me to be fair. Of course our friends will say: You have the branch lines involving an expenditure of millions of dollars. But if we take the Prime Minister's speech in regard to balancing the budget, money spent on capital expenditure for the railways is not a part of our capital expenditure, it is simply a loan and therefore does not count. We should remember that the government, although it may not have many representatives from the three prairie provinces, should not be a class organization because of that. It should legislate for the whole of Canada, and the three prairie provinces to that extent come under its jurisdiction. In the city of Swift Current we have a site for a government building, and I believe the matter of providing such a building is under favourable consideration at the present time. But we have four government offices in Swift Current, one here, one up another street, one two streets down and another three streets up the corner, and it is very difficult for us to get to them. It would be more efficient to have the whole administration under one roof, and I believe the rent that we are paying for those four buildings to-day would more than pay five per cent interest on any expenditure on a public building that might be erected for the city of Swift Current and that would be more efficient and more accessible.

As regards government control of ocean freight rates, the efforts of the government to control these rates and thus limit the power of the North American Steamship combine should receive a great deal of support from this quarter of the House. It is a well-known fact that the export of cattle from Canada to the Old Country has been seriously curtailed as a result of the prohibitive prices that have been maintained during the past two or three years. The question that we are anxious about is: How do the government intend to carry out their programme? The Speech from the Throne gives us no light on the matter, and the only announcement we have received is from the public press which tells us that the government intend to subsidize a certain steamship line or more than one with ten, twelve or more vessels. And as a result of the lowering of the rates they intend to subsidize them to the extent of millions of dollars. I do not know whether this is true, but if it is true, then so far as I am concerned I am opposed to the subsidizing of any steamship lines I am speaking for myself. One only needs to look over the estimates of last year and previous years to realize the amount of money that has been expended in the subsidizing of steamship service lines for the purpose of keeping them open. I can easily understand how the government can lower the freight rates by subsidizing a steamship company. But in the truest sense of the term, does that mean lowering the rates? It is simply asking the whole of the Canadian people to bear a part of the burden, and those steamship companies that are fortunate enough to receive subsidies will not only have a substantial reward for lowering the rates but they will have a profit as well.

I do not know whether the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) was correct in what he said about the Petersen company and the president's address to the shareholders. If what the right hon. gentleman referred to was the negotiations with this government, then I think the time is opportune for this government to cancel the arrangements, because you can readily see that the president of that company is not interested in the reduction of freight rates; he is not interested in smashing the combine of the North American steamship companies, but in receiving a subsidy that will give him a profit and line the pockets of his numerous shareholders.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member presume to lay down the government's policy in regard to this whole question?

Mr. LEWIS: I am merely commenting on the speech of the leader of the opposition in his reference to the president of the Petersen line.

Mr. LOW: A bad basis.

Mr. LEWIS: Be that as it may, that is what I am referring to. I do not believe in subsidizing any lines. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) has told us time and time again that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships are not suitable for this kind of traffic, nor would it be wise to convert them. I am not speaking against the judgment of the hon. member because he knows more about ships than I do. But before any drastic step is taken I do believe that, seeing that the merchant marine has cost the people of this country $70,000,000 which now represents a heavy burden of taxation, the government should secure expert advice on the matter; for I believe that a government-owned steamship service operated under competent management would be far more advantageous to the Canadian people and in the long run would stand some chance of smashing the combine.

A great deal has been said recently about our wonderful resources; we hear every statesman speaking about our mines and minerals, and our forests and fisheries; and we hear a great deal too about the land. I was rather surprised the other evening to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) speak in the way he did concerning our forests, especially in view of the propaganda that is being disseminated throughout the country and the discussions that have taken place in this House regarding the preservation of our timber resources. It is my purpose to speak rather on the preservation than on the exploitation of our forests. It may be quite true that our natural resources are in some instances inexhaustible, but this cannot truly be said of the forests, for every report that we receive warns us that these forests are being rapidly depleted. I would much rather see them preserved and cultivated for future generations. It seems to me that the whole tendency of those in authority, when they speak about our natural resources, is to regret the fact that we in this generation cannot utilize them as rapidly as possible to our own advantage. They forget that posterity and eternity are a long way ahead, that there are hundreds of thousands of years before us, and that our children and our children's children have some right to this splendid, noble heritage that has come to the Canadian people. I am glad to know, from the reading of a report in regard to Quebec, that that province is doing a great deal in the matter of forest preservation within its own limits. I believe that a programme of intensive forestation should be carried out throughout the whole Dominion. It was only last year that the Minister of the Interior reported to us the fact that over $15,000,000 worth of lumber had been destroyed by fire alone, involving great wastage and a considerable loss to the country, owing to a large extent to the carelessness of the contractor, as well as of the railways, and possibly of campers who cut the slash and the waste and leave the forest to become a prey to fire, which destroys not only the timber but also the young trees that should become the timber supply of the future.

I do not know how much truth there is in the statement, but we have been told that our forests will last only a few more years,—a few in comparison to the time it takes these splendid trees to grow; it may be ten years or fifty years from now. But look at the tragic consequences that would come to the nation if it were devoid of its trees. We heard the Prime Minister boast the other evening that our timber forests were the second largest in the world. Some day we shall wake up to the fact that they are not the second largest in the world and that we have no longer the forestry resources of the British Empire. As a result of fire and waste and the blighting that is caused by insect and other enemies we shall largely be a nation devoid of trees.

Another statement that was circulated amongst us in the west was that as a result of the depletion of our forests the water level of Canada is being seriously threatened. I do not know just how much truth there is in that, but surely the condition is serious. I would urge the government not to wait altogether on the findings of royal commissions, nor to depend upon propaganda, but to take time by the forelock and look seriously into the situation and do all it possibly can in the way of reforestation. The Minister of the Interior told us something was being done in connection with the reforestation of those lands that are suitable for the growing of timber, but not one-fiftieth part of the land to-day is re-planted in comparison with the depletion that is taking place every year. It is obvious that we need a more intensive policy of reforestation of suitable lands, and stricter regulations governing contractors who go into the forests. This will be an additional expenditure but the cost will not be half so much to the Canadian people as the loss that will ensue from the destruction that is continually taking place; and the tragic consequences that follow in the wake of a nation devoid of its forests.

There is one statement in the Speech from the Throne to which I shall now refer, the statement that: In due course steps will be taken to futher colonization and settlement in other fertile regions such as those of the Peace river. One of the greatest problems confronting us at the present time is due to our haphazard policy of settling the country indiscriminately, with the result that we have a very scattered development to-day. We have two great transportation systems, we have a network of roads, we have great urban centres, but we have not a settled country. The statement was made two years ago that at least thirty million acres of land in close proximity to our two great railways are unsettled. It seems to me that it would be good business on the part of the government to settle these vacant areas first and thus bring the people more closely together. It could be done with very little extra expense. I understand the Peace river region is very fertile and could support millions of people; and it may be necessary to complete the railway to the junction and give the settlers already there an opportunity of getting their grain to market; but on the whole I believe it would be the best policy for the Dominion to fill up the vacant spaces along our railways rather than open up new country remote from transportation facilities.

Equalization of freight rates is naturally a very difficult problem. It is a burning subject in the west, and from what I have heard in the House this afternoon it is attracting just as much attention in the east. It is obvious that the competition between our various distributing points is very unfair to-day; but equality of rates on a mileage basis has not been the practice here or in the United States. However, since this matter is still subjudice before the Supreme court, I do not think it is wise to discuss it, for one should not try to anticipate the judgment of that tribunal. But I think the government is to be congratulated on suspending the order of the railway commission pending decision by the Supreme court. With that decision before us we shall be in a position to debate the question.

Immigration and emigration were given a great deal of attention in the speeches delivered by the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister, and they filled Hansard with columns of statistics. From the contradictory figures the right hon. gentlemen presented it was apparent that each was relying on statistics prepared by different departments. I do not think any stronger argument could be presented in favour of all statistics being gathered and printed by one bureau than the fact that the statistics relied on by the Prime Minister and by the leader of the opposition differed to such a marked extent; they failed to coincide. It would save a great expense if this statistical work were dealt with by one department, and the information compiled would be more reliable and more accessible.

Our problem to-day seems to be to get a suitable class of immigrants. Every statesman tells us about the necessity of augmenting our population by attracting the right type of people; our newspapers deal with the subject editorially; and we are speaking about it privately all the time. Our business men tell us that if we increase our population it will automatically solve many of our difficulties. I know that the question immediately raises opposition from those who do not believe that the time is ripe to bring in more settlers, but that the first duty of the government is to remedy conditions and so improve the lot of those already here, which in turn will be an incentive for immigrants to make their homes with us. Well, I believe it is a very healthy sign when those in authority begin to tell us the truth in regard to Canadian conditions. Time was when our immigration literature contained the most extraordinary stories and pictured the advantages of settlement in Canada in the most lurid colours. Naturally, when the immigrant saw the actual conditions he got the greatest surprise and disappointment of his life. To-day we are endeavouring to tell the truth about Canada, to let the intending immigrant know what to expect, and I believe that that will be found to be the best policy in the long run. The intending immigrant should study world conditions, particularly in comparison with the country where he intends to settle. As far as I have been able to judge, an impartial verdict upon world conditions to-day would easily give Canada the first choice for the homemaker. If I could go back twenty-two years and were again picking out a country in which to settle, in spite of the difficulties and hardships I endured, I would again choose Canada as my home.

It is well for us to remember that Canada is the last great west to be populated, and therefore we should not be in too great a hurry in settling it. We do not want a class of people that would be detrimental to our position and to our standard of life. Comparisons, of course, are odious, and when comparisons are made of so many immigrants going to the United States and so many coming here, it is well to bear in mind that these comparisons are of very little value unless we understand the conditions surrounding them. There is not a doubt in my mind that Canada is suffering from a too-scattered development. We have railways branching out to almost every part of this great dominion; we have cities that are a tribute to the faith and energy of our people; we have all the modern conveniences, transportation, telegraphs and telephones; but, as I said a moment ago, our homestead lands were opened up indiscriminately. If you want confirmation of this you have only to look at the map of Canada. In three prairie provinces we have a little under two million people, and our public expenditure would look after more than double that number. In a word, we are so scattered over this great area that our expenses of administration are as great as if we had a very much larger population compactly settled; in other words, we could easily absorb a million more people without enlarging our machinery of government, or increasing the expense of our public administration. Of course, it would be necessary to build new homes. That would be inevitable if you are going to increase population,—and, I am going to add, if you are going to decrease taxation in our country. For myself, and I have given deliberate study to this question, I do not see how any intelligent argument can be raised against more people of the right kind coming to our country at the present time. It is people that we require, and the more the better. The benefits that would accrue to us, I think, are legion. We know that we have the finest agricultural lands in the world; our resources are second to none; our governments, our councils and our schools and our educational system are, I think, a credit to a new people. Our railways, with one or two exceptions, are reaching out to all our people. How, then, is it possible to remedy our conditions unless we fill up these vacant spaces? These modern improvements all cost money, and I believe that the population of Canada to-day is totally inadequate to pay the taxation that is demanded by this country at the present time. A greater immigration would assist trade all along the line.

Those who are opposed to immigration will say this: If this is all you have to offer to the intending settler—that is to help us bear the burden of taxation—I do not wonder the people do not come. But that is not all that we have to offer the people who come to this country. The people whom we are inviting to come to this country are already paying enormous taxation on the lands in which they now dwell. In spite of our business depression, in spite of over four years in the war, when we compare our taxation with that of the rest of the civilized world, and the modern conveniences that we have to offer, I think the comparison is very favourable to ourselves. For that reason I do not think any nation in the world has so much to offer as Canada to the people who come to us. We have farm lands at very reasonable prices; we have schools and churches; we have modern conveniences; and I see no reason why people, if they have capital and experience cannot in a very short time make comfortable homes for themselves and have a fairly happy existence in this country. Of course, conditions are nowhere ideal under God's sun to-day, and we cannot expect them to be so here. But I believe that we are on the right track; I believe that with the experience of our Canadian people at the present time, with their energy and perseverance, we shall come out into the open and into the sunshine.

I do not think that immigration should be restricted to agriculturists alone, that is, if they are willing to come to this country and farm, because it must be remembered that a great many of the world's sweepstakes that have been offered for agriculture recently have been won by men who are on the farm to-day but have had no previous agricultural experience. So for that reason there is hope. I can readily see there must be many people in this world to-day who are longing for a home and for land of their own, for a chance to expand, and who would gladly come to this country. Naturally, as a Britisher, I would like to see an influx of British settlers to this country. They are familiar with our standards and our traditions, and the Britisher makes a very good colonizer, and a splendid citizen. For that reason I think this great country of ours should be open to that class of people.

Then, turning to the United States, conditions there have not been what people have been endeavouring to make out. One of the questions I would like to have asked the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) when he was speaking this afternoon of the great prosperity of the United States, with its taxation and its high protection, is this: What about the great farming community in the United States; has protection there assisted the farmer at all? We know that the farmers in the United States, as a result of the high prices of land and of the heavy freight rates, are in a very poor condition financially to-day, and I believe the United States is a good recruiting ground for immigrants to this country. Besides that we have more than one million and a half of good French Canadian stock now living in the United States who ought to be brought back here to develop the lands of northern Quebec, and possibly the lands of northern Ontario. A way should be found whereby these men can come back to the land and the province of their birth. We have also about the same number of people of British origin living in the United States to-day, and with the upward trend of living conditions I see no reason why these people should not come back to their old home. The races in northern Europe, because of their experience in agriculture, and being used to a climate similar to ours, adapt themselves most readily to our climate and become very good citizens.

In closing let me say this: Tell the intending immigrant of the hardships and privations he will have to undergo in this country; tell him something about our winter, if you will; reveal all these conditions to him. Then tell him also of the thousands of his own race who have come to this country, and suffered the hardships and privations, and have still endured. Then show him the thousands of homes and the thousands of well-equipped farms, the thousands and thousands of well-bred children, strong, virile and intelligent, entering into an inheritance in the social and educational spheres that is not equalled in any other part of the world. Tell him of all these conditions, and then let the invitation go out, and if they have the spirit of the Great West in their veins, if they have the perseverance and stability of the men who have made this Canadian nation, invite them to come and share our burdens, yea and enter into an inheritance of which no real Canadian is ashamed.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I almost apologize for getting up at this time directly after one of my colleagues, but a speaker on the government side is not ready, and I wish to take up a short time of of the House.

The discussion on the Speech from the Throne has this time, as usual, particularly among the leaders of our parties, turned again on the great question of class privilege. This is a question that will have to be settled in the near future, and the government will do well to take into consideration the unrest brought on by it through the different parts of the country. In fact, Sir, I think this session of parliament is fraught with issues that are of the utmost importance to the unity and stabilization of confederation itself.

There is no forward policy outlined which the government seems prepared to follow. The diversified interests of this country call for a uniform policy, a policy of equality that will harmonize the aspirations of the different classes of this Dominion. The people outside the industrial area—the manufacturing centres of Quebec and Ontario, are calling for their rights as free citizens of a free country. Now, a country must be a commonwealth; by that I mean its privileges, its advantages, its freedom of opportunity must be open to all on an equal basis. No country, however large, no matter how unbounded its natural resources may be, can develop on lines that are lasting or worth while if one part or one class of it is held in bondage to another class or to the people of another area. Our democracy here will prove a farce unless all the people share in its advantages.

The fact is that in Canada our policy, our class privilege, adopted as far back as 1878, has been a disintegrating policy, giving class advantage on the one hand and impoverishment on the other. A policy of concentration of wealth and power in the one case which results in poverty and dependence in the other. Our great employers of labour and those who direct the financial and industrial policies of the Dominion, are hypnotized by the fallacious idea of class privilege; and there is no indication even yet fore-shadowed in the Speech from the Throne, that our government is free from the mesmerism of this personal selfishness. Because of the policy of self-aggrandizement on the part of employers, backed up so long by succeeding governments, the cost of living has reached a level which puts the cost of production entirely out of line with the world's prices abroad. It has curtailed the market at home by destroying the purchasing power of the agriculturist who has had to curtail his production for the same reason. The power of the agriculturist in this country to consume home manufactured goods is limited only by his power of production. If the commodities the agriculturists need to use could be bought at the prices prevailing in the markets of the world to-day, if the workers on our railways and shipping lines could buy what they need at those prices, there would to-day be a greater utilization of labour in this country, while the power of the farmer to produce would be immensely increased and consequently his capacity to consume proportionately enhanced.

The manufacturer of this Dominion, pampered by privilege, is exhibiting indolence in seeking a market for his goods abroad, but is ever calling for increased protection in the home market which has diminished as class privilege has been applied. Britain to-day is paying her way by her exports, a thing no protective country in the world which was directly concerned in the war is doing. She is setting a moral example to the world which all protectionist countries would do well to heed. Morally and economically speaking she is to-day leading the world by reason of the stability of her economic policy with which neither Liberal nor Conservative governments dare to meddle: and while the United States may have the gold of the world in her coffers she is learning that money is not wealth, and though it is the symbol by which we reckon reality, the true wealth of a nation lies in its power to produce and its freedom of exchange. Money is but a shadow, trade is the substance. In a country where trade is free and production unhampered, as in Britain, even the loss and destruction caused by a great war is soon overcome. Its exchange becomes normal, hope and courage prevail among all classes, and the nation faces the future with confidence. There is no continuous whine on the part of the manufacturers in Britain such as is put up in this House every session from year to year. And if we contrast the condition in Britain to-day with the condition in Canada what do we find? Morally we must admit that the economic policy of this land is yet subject to party expediency: and we need only peruse the Speech from the Throne and some utterances of our Prime Minister—notably in Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton—to know that our government is yet in close relationship with, or even dominated by the directors of industry and finance rather than by a sense of economic justice for the workers of this Dominion. The government is backed up in this by the official opposition, and while there may be party controversy, the contest does not hinge on economic equality for all classes alike, but as to which will dare by servility to make a bid for the favour of those who may for the time being, through the concentration of wealth and industry, control the policies of trade and finance of this Dominion and the lives of the people as well.

Here I want to say that to protect an industry in any country is in the end bound to act detrimentally to the interest of the protected industry itself as well as to that of the consuming population. To the protected interest the cost of living goes up with the amount of protection that interest enjoys, and the consuming public is handicapped in its productive work by the same process. This feature in our economic life affects every phase of government. Protection or, as I like to call it, legalized robbery, has driven our country into a condition of debt and entanglement, from which it will take the co-operation of all classes to extricate it. Our climate is good, our soil is unexcelled. Therefore the reasonable thing to do is to remove every handicap from the one industry that asks no protection, the one class that desires no favours, so that it will be free to produce. The problem for this nation to-day, as it has been for some time, the one thing for the wage earner and the agriculturist to do is to set free the government of this country from the domination of the capitalistic and manufacturing groups and revise the industrial policy of the state.

The right hon. leader of the opposition has lately been stressing the point of bringing the old national policy up to date. But the old National Policy of 1878 has been tried and found wanting. The handwriting is on the wall, and for him and his policy it might well be written to-day:

Meighen, Meighen, tekel Upharsin.

What the hon. gentleman means by bringing the old national policy up-to-date, I do not know, except it be to raise the tariff to a point which will entirely prohibit the importation of foreign goods. Now that is what the United States intended doing by the Fordney-McComber tariff, and which has proved a fallacy unprecedented, so far as importation is concerned. To-day Britain is finding it quite as easy to export to the United States millions of yards of piece-goods as she did before the tariff was raised. With the amount of tariff protection the manufacturers of any country enjoy the prices will go up equal to the level of that protection. I want here to read an extract from the Recorder and Times of Brockville, a paper published daily by the Recorder Printing Company. Hon. George P. Graham, M.P., it is said, is president of that company. The Recorder and Times has seen fit to place this article in its editorial columns and describes it as a United States indictment against protection. The paragraph which I would like to bring before the House reads as follows:

Philadelphia holds the protective principle in reverence and proclaims herself "the workshop of the world," but under the highest tariff rates the United States has ever known there is a higher percentage of unemployment in protectionist Philadelphia than there is in free trade London. Not a day passes but the daily papers record suicides of people out of employment or people unbalanced by business cares. Nearly two billion dollars' worth of recently-built modern ships (built in the United States) rust at their anchorage in the rivers and harbors of the United States, in the days of the highest tariff the country has ever had. The greater portion of the finest peach crop that Georgia has ever owned has been dumped into the river or allowed to rot on the trees because American housewives cannot afford to preserve peaches with the price of sugar what it is under the highest tariff that has ever existed. Under this high tariff there are more idle manufacturers scattered throughout all the forty-eight states than have ever before been known. In New York there is such a lot of money that under certain conditions it may be obtained at as low a rate of interest as two per cent. Notwithstanding this, because of forced withdrawals of savings from the small banks in many sections of the country over two thousands of these banks have been obliged to close their doors. A quarter of a million families, representing a million and a quarter individuals, have been forced from their farms, while an equal number remain on their farms, entirely through the leniency of their friends.

Mr. BALDWIN: Can the hon. gentleman tell me what the date of that article is?

Mr. EVANS: September 27, 1924. Here is an indictment against protection, describing conditions in the very country whose policy we are exhorted by the opposition members of this House to emulate. Its ships are idle because of its trade barriers. Crime is increasing because of its economic fallacy—it would seem to be a verified fact that has often been put forward, that class privilege and crime are very closely related. The prices of all commodities are high because of the centralized control which is always a feature of protection or legalized communal robbery. A contented virile population on the land is a bulwark of morality and prosperity in any country. This is particularly true of this Dominion. But we are asked to emulate a country that has driven one and a quarter million from their farm homes by a policy which robs the agriculturist of his earnings.

Mr. STEVENS: Some home for the protectionist.

Mr. EVANS: I must say that the mind of the protectionist advocate has always been a mystery to me. There is no accounting for it in any other way than that his intellect is clouded by the prospect of immediate gain by a policy which as it benefits one class, robs other legitimate industries, agriculture in particular, of its earning. Last session we accepted the budget at the hands of the government as an earnest determination on its part to evolve a policy of free or at least freer trade. In the Speech from the Throne our attention is now drawn to the high cost of production. But the one thing which is at the root of the whole evil is to remain as it is for the present. No, even the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) is not to mention the "death knell of protection" this year, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) states in his speeches throughout the country that the government has gone far enough; the government is upholding the hand of the protected interests, while ominous sounds of separation are heard from both the east and the middle west of this Dominion.

I wish to take a few minutes to show something of the extent of protection the manufacturer enjoys at the expense particularly of the agriculturist, under the present system of protection which my friends to my right intend to have increased at the first opportunity. Now a cut was made in the tariff last session, but no cut in the tariff schedule as it stands can be effective in lowering the cost of living in the cities or the cost of production on the farms while the tariff act is administered as it is. While the dumping act is applied by the government to discriminate against private citizens and co-operative companies, the tariff schedule may be eliminated altogether, and the manufacturer would still have all the price-fixing power that he cares to enjoy. On the farms of Canada the agriculturist for some years past has sought to lower the cost of production by co-operative effort, but here the government steps in and says, "Thou shalt not." The politician—and I say this deliberately—is and always has been the chief link in the whole chain of privilege, and the seething discontent of the Maritimes and the middle west to-day lies at the door of the government. Nor is this dumping act all in which the politician becomes the vendor of privilege. A trade discount is taken into account in computing the cost for customs purposes, amounting in the case of big deals to as high as twenty per cent. In the case of co-operative companies and individuals this is not allowed, so again the politician makes another sale of the rights of one citizen as compared with another.

In spite of the much-vaunted cut in the tariff last year, the cost of living to-day in the Dominion is quite as high or higher than it was before the paltry change was made. Goods are just as dear for the workers, the cost of production on the farms is just as high. Equality is surely one of the main attributes of government, it is an inherent quality of citizenship. Yet our citizens are classified by the government at the instigation of the manufacturing and distributing combines as to their right to import on invoice prices. As far as I can find out no such classification is mentioned in the act and the power of the board is very loosely applied. Worst of all, what makes even our parliament a nonentity and government seemingly a mercenary scramble, refunds of these sums have been made just as the importer has had the temerity to protest or has threatened to make public the doings of the board or the secret administration of the whole act. Fair market value is interpreted, not according to the act, but according to whether the importer is a consumer, dealer, jobber or manufacturer. Sections 41 and 43 of the act are simply a nonentity as regards its administration. So is section 53 relating to the same thing. They have no definite meaning, but they are interpreted simply according to the will of the board which is guided by the mandatory instructions of those concerned. No statutory regulations seem to govern their actions. This is why I say that government in this country is simply reduced to a mercenary scramble. Our whole system of collecting revenue under the tariff is, in the way it is applied, a system of banditry as regards some of our citizens. Because of the domination of Ontario and Quebec and the means those provinces take to maintain this domination, tariff matters have become sectional in their application. Not only does the tariff act prevent competition from foreign countries against the industrial areas of Quebec and Ontario, but discriminatory freight rates as well give them protection against other parts of the Dominion. Such are the means taken with the connivance of the government to keep up the cost of living, which is at the bottom of all our troubles. Wages, freight rates, cost of distribution and manufacture, as well as the production of all things, hinge on the cost of living. Railway managers say that freights cannot come down until wages are lower. Railway workers say that wages are only consistent with the cost of living and that they must be left at their present level to meet the high cost. All the time our farmers are leaving the land. But the government to-day is seemingly more careful to replace us by immigration than to retain experienced farmers. Given our freedom on the land to-day, in five years time we could fill up the waste places of this Dominion with contented home makers who would set the Dominion humming with industry.

The Prime Minister stated that the leader of the opposition must know that his panacea for the ills of the nation is futile in face of the results of the by-elections of this year. But what of that? The government to-day is maintaining the same old ruinous policy that the opposition maintained from 1911 to 1922, the only deviation made being the microscopic cut in the tariff at the last session of parliament. After all the severe castigation the government received at the hands of the leader of the opposition that hon. gentleman must know that the condition on the farms of Canada to-day and the closing of the 2,000 factories, which, he says, he can vouch for, is the result of his own policy. The Libby-Owens incident was brought very forcibly to the attention of this House last year. It is a tragedy in industry to-day, and I am mentioning this one case only because I know something of it. The Libby-Owens factory is closed because of the quality of its goods. In Saskatoon at the present time we are building a sanatorium for the treatment of tuberculosis and a great deal of glass is being used in the three large sun rooms that run the whole length of the building. Up there one day, talking not long ago to the foreman, and noticing that all these glass cases came from Great Britain, I said to him: "Why did you not buy this material in Canada? Why did you not buy the Libby-Owens products?" "Oh," he said, "we could not use the stuff. It is too brittle." That is only one case where our manufacturers are lying down on the quality of the goods to-day and depending upon protection to carry them through.

But to return, there is no difference between the two parties; they are both championing the great communism of pelf. The policies of the two are equal. I see the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). They are quite comfortable in the seats of the Liberals at this time, and I say that there is no difference between the two parties. Under present conditions agriculture is bound to languish and die, and no system of immigration will suffice to give us an increase in population under such circumstances. Under normal conditions before the war it was estimated that one out of every seven persons brought into this country and settled on the land stayed and made good. This estimate was made by two of the most observant men in western Canada, Sir James Aikens and Mr. J. B. Musselman. Under this system of class privilege, however, not more than one in twelve at present can be expected to make good. I do not want to be misunderstood in this matter: I am not opposed to immigration; I hope I shall live to see the day when the Dominion will have twenty millions of people. But we must do first things first, and the first thing to do is to set the agriculturist free, as free as God ever intended him to be.

The futility of a tariff-fed industry is amply exemplified to-day in the case of the British Empire Steel Corporation. I have no hesitation in naming that company. From the days of the inauguration of the Dominion Iron & Steel Company, that concern has been a source of expense and trouble to the taxpayers of the country. In bounties it has received at the hands of the taxpayer $8,115,399.75, while in remission of duties it has received nearly three quarters of a million. It received in 1921-22 as compensation for loss of contract $4,500,000. In other words, it has benefited to the extent of $13,276,672. This concern during the time of its operation has received for services, from the departments of this government, Railways and Canals, Marine and Fisheries, and Militia, no less a sum than $77,138,459. The price of rails charged to this government was $32 per ton, with $7 a ton bounty added, making a total of $39 per ton, while the same company could cut prices against the whole world to $24, delivered. This country at the time of the building of the Transcontinental railway bought its rails at $15 per ton more than it would have paid if it had brought them in from outside, and the taxpayer to-day has to meet the difference. Then we wonder why there is a deficit every year on our railways. Conditions prevail to-day at this company's works which are a disgrace to Canada and a disgrace to the name it bears. Twice since this parliament has been elected the militia has been sent in there to preserve order.

Mr. CARROLL: What were the occasions?

Mr. EVANS: The hon. gentleman knows them. In view of our experience with this company, I wonder whether the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) would describe this industry as "essential" or as "exotic." Its methods and its dealings with its employees are not Canadian, they are not British; they are foreign.

The agriculturist and the workers of this country have a real grievance. The tariff schedule as it stands to-day is not the greatest evil we have to contend with, but the way in which that act is administered is a disgrace to this country and it is something that we cannot long put up with. Just to show how it is administered I would read a paragraph from the report of one of our great co-operative companies:

To show you how the department values work out, we would explain that we made entry of a carload of wagons on June 20, 1916, at Winnipeg, vide entry No. 11583, on a value of $1,165, whereas our purchase price was $1,057, and in addition to paying duty on a basis of $1,165 value, we had to pay dumping duty of $104. The total duty paid was $483.50, which represents 46 per cent ad valorem on the purchase price, whereas the regular tariff rate, including war tax, is 32½ per cent.

This company, on some of its goods imported that year, paid as high as 78 per cent in duty, and to-day the finger of scorn is pointed at the agriculturist when he fails to make ends meet on the farm. I ask the House, is there any reason in that sort of thing, when we have to find a market for our products against all the cheap labour of the entire world, Europe and Asia alike? Is it any wonder that the farmer cannot get along under these conditions?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Were the wagons referred to by the hon. member purchased at the regular price in the country of origin, or were they bought at a lower rate than the purchase price in that country?

Mr. EVANS: They were purchased in the regular way in the country of origin, but after the valuation had been raised $108 and a duty exacted on that amount, this farmers' company had to pay a dumping duty of $104, which represented 46 per cent ad valorem on the purchase price.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why a dumping duty?

Mr. EVANS: I will answer the hon. gentleman's question, and my authority is a statement made by the Minister of Customs on the floor of the House last session in answer to a question by the member for Macleod (Mr. Coote).

Fair market value is not interpreted according to the Act, but according to whether the importer is a consumer, dealer, jobber, or manufacturer. Under this legislation no consumer, no co-operative company can get the standing of dealers or distributors of agricultural implements or any other commodity; they may import. This is tyranny. And yet the agriculturists of this country are expected to operate under it. Is it right?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not quite understand my hon. friend. Does he say that no co-operative or private concern can import an article direct from the manufacturer in the United States?

Mr. EVANS: You have it right, sir.

Mr. STEVENS: Who is to blame for that? Surely he is not blaming the Canadian industrialist for that. The blame must rest upon the manufacturer of agricultural implements on the other side.

Mr. EVANS: No, not at all. Why do you put that construction upon it? It is so because the manufacturer in this country maintains that he only has a right to sell goods in this country. That is the idea of protection. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) made the statement in the House last session, in answer to the member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). It is true enough.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is referring to the application of the dumping clause as passed two years ago, under which the matter is in the hands of the Minister of Customs. He supported and we opposed it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Not at all; it was passed fifteen years ago.

Mr. STEVENS: No, it was amended two years ago.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EVANS: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong, Mr. Speaker. The amendment to the act passed in 1922 related only to natural products. The right hon. leader of the opposition at that time gave the government the worst castigation that I have ever heard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not bad enough.

Mr. EVANS: I admit, Sir, it was not bad enough. But this is what I want to tell the House to-day, when I make the point that there is no difference between the two parties: both the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) voted with the government.

Mr. STEVENS: On what?

Mr. EVANS: On that amendment. There is no mistake; I took a note of it at the time. I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I hope I have been able to bring before you the conditions under which agriculture is labouring to-day. Agriculture must have these conditions removed before the present population, or any augmented population, can operate successfully.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, February 12, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Grote Stirling, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Yale, introduced by Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and C. H. Dickie, Esquire.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—PRINTER'S LIABILITY

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. NEILL: I introduced this bill last year but it did not go beyond the second reading. Its purpose is that all documents or circulars printed for public circulation shall contain the name and address of the publisher. It follows the English act, which has been in force for something like one hundred years, and also various Dominion statutes, notably the Dominion Elections Act. On the second reading I will explain more fully the intention of the measure.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

REPORT ON, AND ACTION CONCERNING NORTH ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before the special order for the resumption of the debate on the Address—

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, when six o'clock was called yesterday—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The right hon. leader of the opposition has the floor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am just interposing, if I may be allowed on the orders of the day, to ask if the government purposes having printed the W. T. R. Preston report. I am told there are no copies printed as yet.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): By a coincidence I was just making inquiry at the moment for the draft of the motion to authorize the printing of the report. I will make the motion to-night.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Sir Eugene Fiset for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, when six o'clock was called yesterday I had dwelt somewhat on the concentration of wealth and industry and the control of the different policies of this Dominion in certain areas. Still, in that connection I want to say a word on the question of Senate reform. The Speech from the Throne would indicate that very little can be done regarding that matter at this session of parliament. This may come as a disappointment to some of us who heard the speeches of the Prime Minister in western Canada. Of course it could hardly be expected that this House could, or would, pass a bill limiting the power of the Senate and expect the upper chamber to accept the same in toto. Furthermore, there are so many in public life to-day that look upon the Senate as a haven of rest from the uncertainties of party warfare as to make it possible that even here a measure to reform the Senate might have to follow a very tortuous course indeed. After all, an appeal to the provinces is the most constitutional way to proceed about the reforming of the Senate, and, perhaps, it also relieves the government from responsibility in the matter to some extent. Then the odium of changing the British North America Act would rest upon the provincial governments. But since the matter of Senate reform has not been discussed before the provincial electorate I cannot yet see how the existing provincial legislatures can, without at least a mandate from the people, deal competently with this question. The only benefit, therefore, that I can see to be derived from such a pronouncement is that the government will deal with Senate reform at some indefinite time in the future after there has been opportunity of asking the electorate to give them a mandate for carrying out the policy. As far as I am able to gather from a reading of a history of this country prior to confederation the one idea of the purpose of the Senate in the minds of the statesmen of the Maritimes, previous to those provinces entering confederation, was that a second chamber would prevent the exercise of any undue domination by the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec over the smaller provinces. I stated yesterday that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have dominated the rest of the Dominion ever since confederation. They have concentrated the wealth and the industry of the whole country within their own boundaries, and this domination they have so far maintained. Now looking over some of the speeches on Senate reform in years gone by, as reported in Hansard, I came across some utterances of that great Canadian statesman Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the following is taken from a speech which he made in the House in 1906:

For my part I believe this abolition of the Senate—

Which was then under discussion.

—would be a mistake, and I could not be induced to reconcile myself to such an idea. A second chamber seems to me absolutely necessary for two reasons. It is supposed to be a check on hasty legislation. But one consideration, which to my mind, is absolutely conclusive and paramount is that, under our present system of government, composed of federal parts, a second chamber is an absolutely necessary safeguard against a possible invasion of their—

The smaller provinces.

—rights by the larger provinces. But if we are to have reform I would not be averse to adopting the system of our neighbours and having each province represented by an equal number of members whether that province be large or small.

Another reference was made in a speech made in the session of 1907-8. From that speech, as reported at page 1569 of Hansard, I take the following:

In the United States Senate, the state of New York has two members and the state of Rhode-Island has also two members, so that while in the House of Representatives each state speaks according to the numerical strength of its population, 36 against 2; in the Senate each state has an equal voice.

The only reform of the Senate that can ever prove acceptable to the provinces which go to make up the Dominion is to reconstruct that body, so that all the provinces shall be represented on the floor of the Senate by an equal number of representatives. There are nine provinces in this Dominion, and if each province was represented let us say, by five senators, that would give us a senate of 45 members. I think, Sir, that would be sufficiently large, without being too cumbersome. To curtail the power of the Senate, as at present constituted, by an alteration in the act stipulating that in the event of a bill passing this House twice it should become law even against the will of that body, would in my opinion be of very little benefit to this country, except in very isolated cases. Let me give an example. The fight is on in this country at present between public ownership and private ownership of public utilities. The Senate has twice during the life of this parliament thrown out bills for the construction of very much needed branch lines in western Canada. This has been done in the interests of private ownership. Simply curtailing the power of the Senate as afore-mentioned would still give the privately owned concern an advantage of at least one year to choose their territory and to construct their lines practically on the grade of the publicly owned company's survey. Two notable cases of this kind are seen in Saskatchewan to-day in the construction of the Lanigan and the Tuffnell branches.

Let me ask, is equality of representation in the Senate desirable? Domination of one province by another inevitably leads to sectionalism, and after fifty-seven years of a union which this country has experienced, a union that has not developed unity, confederation is heard cracking in different parts at the present time. There are ominous sounds even of separation to be heard. Ontario and Quebec, the old federation, have assumed an ownership of this Dominion that has at last become unbearable to the smaller provinces. For instance, to build a transcontinental railway they gave away to the first one of these railway companies 25,000,000 acres of land, belonging to Saskatchewan and Alberta, that never belonged to this Dominion. Every province was to come into confederation on an equal basis. The new Dominion of 1867 held in trust the Northwest Territories until such time as the population there would warrant the forming of provinces. The older provinces assumed ownership, which they still hold so far as the natural resources are concerned. They even created hardship on the settlers in that part of the country by tax exemption of these lands, and the settlers themselves have had to meet this burden and pay the taxes themselves on that land to establish schools, construct roads and build bridges. Some 40,000,000 acres altogether of our lands have been alienated from their rightful owner to construct transcontinental railways in this Dominion. Now, placing the value of that land at $25 an acre, it would amount to the huge sum of $1,000,000,000 which will have to be taken into account when the question of natural resources comes up for settlement. Possession of power to dominate has made it difficult for these two provinces, Ontario and Quebec, to take an ocean-to-ocean view of Canada. They have habituated themselves into thinking of Canada in terms of two provinces only. Sectionalism can only be met and combated by sectionalism, which accounts for the feeling of disunity prevailing throughout the Dominion to-day.

The government can make a record for itself now by championing Senate reform on a constitutional basis so that real union will be established. In the absence of any constitutional machinery to compel compromise, the inevitable result is the domination of the smaller by the larger provinces. A Senate of the type which Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have offered would be able to compel compromise and prevent domination. Can anyone conceive of what use excessive Senate representation is to Ontario and Quebec if not for the purpose of controlling, or having control of both the House of Commons and the Senate and the domination of other provinces? I say that no one need strain his imagination envisioning a truculent Prince Edward Island dominating Ontario and Quebec by means of its equal representation in the Senate; Rhode Island does not dominate New York, and New York cannot dominate Rhode Island.

I would also advocate that the new Senate be an elected body. Then the smaller provinces will be represented in that chamber, not by men chosen by Ontario and Quebec as at present, but by men of their own choice. The constitution of the country is the expression of the will of its own people. Elected representatives of the people have an inherent right and authority to speak for themselves; appointed members of legislative bodies have not. Even that historic body the House of Lords, whose forbears, the barons in arms, forced their king to sign the great charter, has been on occasions forced to bow to the will of the people. It is high time in this Dominion, in this democratic age, that we take steps to ensure a return of this power to the people of Canada and so amend the constitution that it will not be alienated.

Until such a reform is brought about, sectionalism will become more and more acute. While the domination of Ontario and Quebec in the past has been made perfectly secure by party domination in the provinces, this question bids fair now to cut even across party lines, and I shall not be at all surprised to see solid provincial blocs occupying seats in this House until such a reform is brought about. I believe the reasonable thing to do is to call a conference at which each province will be represented by an equal number. Let us hope that such a conference will evolve an agreement that our constitution may be amended in such a way, and to the end, that the people of Canada may be united for all time in a real federal union.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, like other members who have preceded me, I offer my very sincere congratulations to the mover and the seconder of this Address. The hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Hanna), fresh from his laurels in a hard-won battle, has added further to his laurels by reason of his speech in this House. To the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) perhaps I may be permitted to address a more personal note. He comes from that province which has been my home and the home of my family for many generations, a province to which I and my family are attached root and branch in the same way as the French Canadians are there to this day, a province in which we English-speaking Canadians have learned to respect and to admire our French Canadian brothers. More than that, we have come to realize that this country is all the richer and greater by reason of having that great nation as one of our parts.

It may be properly said of almost any country, and particularly of a new country like Canada, that a country's wealth and progress are measured by the extent of and increase in its population. As a matter of fact, that saying is not very difficult to analyze, when one realizes that production can take place only by means of population, and it follows from that, that the greater the population, the greater will be the production and, consequently, the greater the production, the greater the wealth of the country.

Mr. IRVINE: Does that apply to China?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, that applies to Chinamen too, if my hon. friend wants an answer immediately. Production, however, to take place at all, certainly to be continuous, must be profitable. It must be profitable, at least to the extent that the producer is able to gain a livelihood by means of his production. From that it follows that if production is profitable, more will seek an occupation in which such profit exists. On the other hand, where that profit is not apparent or where that profit does not exist, there will be a diminution and finally an entire cessation in production and population as a consequence will decline. It may be very properly assumed from that that profitable production will increase population, and increased population will increase production, and increased production will produce greater wealth. But we must bear in mind that profitable production is very distinctly limited by certain factors, one of them being the effect of taxation. If taxation, no matter how applied, is taken off the profit on an article, then the profit is less. If it is added to the cost of an article, that cost may amount to so much as to make the article itself unprofitable. Another factor which limits production is the possibility of marketing the thing produced, that is to say, turning it into money or exchanging it for another suitable article which the producer might require. I freely admit that these principles are extremely elementary, in fact so elementary that I hesitate to assert them in this House; but notwithstanding that, I think hon. members will agree with me that on the successful and proper application of these principles really depends the success of any nation.

You have only to apply these principles, for example, to our natural resources, which are the real basic wealth of this country. Without those natural resources neither this nor any other country can prosper. But of what use are our natural resources unless they are developed, unless they are applied to useful purposes? While they remain in the ground they are of no value whatever. Even when those natural resources are made into products, those products still cannot be established as regards their value unless there is the ability to market them to people who desire to acquire them. The same thing applies to any industry, no matter whether that industry be foodstuffs, labour, manufactured goods, or anything else.

As I started out to say a moment ago production is limited by certain factors, one of them being taxation. We have heard it stated throughout the country that our taxation has been limiting production; that it has been driving capital from the country; more than that, that it has been preventing people from coming here, and that it has had various other results too numerous to mention. As a matter of fact, some of those results deserve a great deal of consideration; but while to reduce taxation is an extremely easy thing to say, it is a very difficult thing to accomplish. Those who say that and who say reduce taxation at all costs, cannot be as well acquainted with the finances of this country, the needs of its finances and the needs of the distribution of its revenue as they should be. It is not to be wondered at that the people of this country do not know more about the necessity of our taxes and of the distribution of the revenues. When we realize that before the war we had only two sources of taxation, namely, customs and excise, we can come to the conclusion that the ordinary man in the street knew little or nothing about taxes. He had, perhaps, a hazy idea that certain taxes were imposed and that some taxes were necessary to run the country, but where they came from he had no idea. As we proceeded and even as we went on with the war the general public did not realize that new taxes were being imposed. They were at that time interested in many other affairs: great expenditures of money were going abroad, and even at that time they did not realize that taxation existed in the form in which it does to-day. But after the war, when we had arrived at more normal times, the public realized to the full and in the most potent way imaginable that there were taxes and heavy taxes at that.

They realized that nothing could be done and that no business could be prosecuted without first of all solving the problem of taxation. And at last it came to be borne in upon the public, a thing which should have been realized and appreciated long before by poor and rich alike, that a tax, no matter how imposed or how collected, is finally borne by the consumer in some form or another. In other words, the man buying from the corner grocery store or from the nearby butcher pays the tax directly or indirectly on what he purchases in exactly the same way as he pays it who buys from the rich city merchant or from the high class jeweller: everyone bears the tax or taxes in proportion to the amount consumed by him in his supplies for his daily needs. There is no getting away from this; in the last analysis, that is where the tax must be borne, no matter how it may be imposed. That being the case, the public became vitally interested in our questions of taxation as well as in our problems of revenue, and they became interested also in the question as to how our expenditures were made. Concerning these matters of interest the public were in a state of confusion. Indeed, the public at the present moment do not sufficiently realize and certainly do not sufficiently appreciate our necessity for revenue nor the need of our expenditures, and I do not think that this confusion and this lack of knowledge can be particularly wondered at; because, after all, although our public accounts are published in a perfectly fair and intelligible manner, easily accessible to members of parliament, and quite open and correct to the expert accountant who cares to look into them, and although they are kept most carefully and faithfully by efficient officials of the department, they are nevertheless published nowadays in such a way that the ordinary man in the street is unable at a glance to understand them. The average taxpayer has neither the time nor the ability, nor has he the opportunity to delve into these accounts as fully as he should in order to get some grasp of public affairs and to realize what revenue is necessary and what expenditure indispensable. It seems to me that we should publish at the end of every fiscal year a simple statement of our accounts so that the public may obtain the facts and fully realize and appreciate exactly what our taxes are needed for, and how our revenue has been spent. This is done in connection with the British exchequer, which publishes a small leaflet explaining the various revenues from taxes, excise, services, and so forth, showing, not in too great detail but sufficiently to enable the average taxpayer to understand a month or so after the end of the fiscal year, precisely how the taxes are paid and exactly how the expenditures have been made. Unless we take the public into our confidence to that extent and advise them fully as regards our receipts and disbursements, I fail to understand how we can expect them to have an intelligent grasp of the affairs of the country.

I want to pass now to the Speech from the Throne, and before I do so I shall introduce a personal note into the remarks I am about to make. I do not think that any hon. member on the other side of the House can charge me with any lack of candour, nor do I think that any hon. gentleman on this side can accuse me of speaking at any time except in tones of sincerity, although, perhaps in tones of too great independence. But if that independence has been invoked, let me say that it has been asserted simply because of my belief in Liberalism. Liberals all the world over have been free; they have not been bound by any hard and fast or immutable rules, but rather have always been allowed to exercise their judgment as their consciences might dictate. And I can say that I speak with such candour when I declare that having examined the Speech from the Throne I am able to express the opinion that it shows very great vision, far greater vision indeed than has characterized many speeches which I have seen published in many a long day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend opposite laughs. Well, I will examine the Speech in detail and discuss it with him as I proceed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The door is open.

Mr. MARLER: I repeat, the Speech from the Throne shows great vision; it shows a great advancement over many that have been read in this House before. However, let us examine the document.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend will be saying, "hear, hear" many times before I get through. This is the paragraph to which I have reference at the moment:

> It is to be borne continually in mind that the existing burden of taxation is due mainly to uncontrollable expenditure in the nature of payments and obligations arising out of the war, and to the encumbered position of the National Railways.

Mr. HOCKEN: Great vision.

Mr. MARLER: Let me assure the hon. gentleman that what is there said is absolutely true to the last word, and I will prove it figure by figure and dollar for dollar to the satisfaction of the House before I am through.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Whoever challenged it?

Mr. MARLER: I will take up with the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) various figures with a view to finding out what is controllable and what is uncontrollable, and also what this government is liable for as against what can be charged to the responsibility of the hon. gentleman's government. I should like, if I may have the permission of the House, to place on Hansard in full a statement, which I shall read briefly, so that hon. gentlemen may have the facts before them. This is a very simple statement, but I have prepared it with the object in view of taking it up item by item and discussing exactly what our expenses have been, so that we may decide for ourselves the accuracy or otherwise of what is therein set forth. Receipts for the fiscal year ending 31 March, 1924, were as follows:

Receipts for the fiscal year ending 31 March, 1924:
A. From ordinary sources not war—consisting entirely of customs and excise—and a comparatively small sum from interest on investments—and excluding revenue from services in departments.. ..	165,345,546
B. From war taxes—such as income, business, profits, sales, cheques, receipts, transportation, trust and loan companies, banks and interest on advances to Imperial and foreign governments..	204,862,739
		370,208,285
Total—almost entirely from taxes..		370,208,285
This revenue excluding railway expenditure was expended as follows:
1. Interest on the non-war debt; subsidies to provinces, judges and pre-war pensions; salaries of Governor General and Lieutenant Governors and superannuation of civil employess..	44,068,155
2. Cost of services in the Departments less revenue from such services..	86,217,737
3. Interest on war debt and cost but not administration of European war pensions.	140,344,941

4. War services—comprising administration of European war pensions; soldiers' civil re-establishment; Soldiers' Settlement Board—less casual revenue from these services —and administration and collection of income and business profits taxes..	13,873,288
5. War—demobilization..	446,083
6. Canadian Merchant Marine	1,500,000
7. Highways under Canada Highways Act 1919..	4,066,210

I am leaving out for the moment railway expenditure, which I will deal with separately later on. That makes a total expenditure of $310,000,000.

Now, Sir, it is an elementary fact that increase in taxation must follow increase in expenditure; there is no other way of getting around it. If we spend more we have to tax the people more. Consequently I want to examine with you, Mr. Speaker, the reasons for the increase in the various items of taxation which has taken place, and the only year to compare that increase with is the last pre-war year, namely, 1914. In 1914 our taxation amounted to $128,000,000, in 1924, $370,000,000, or an increase of $242,000,000. This increase was caused by an increase of our expenditure from $106,000,000 in 1914 to $310,000,000 in 1924, exclusive in both years of railway expenditure, or an increase of $204,000,000. Our increase in expenditure was due to these causes:

	1914	1924	Increase 1924

In 1914 of course there was no war; in 1924 our war and war services cost $162,000,000. The expenditure on our merchant marine and the Canada Highways Act I have already enumerated. The interest on our non-war debt came to $29,000,000 and our subsidies to the provinces amounted to $12,000,000. In other words, the difference of $203,000,000 is made up by over $178,000,000 representing war and war services and interest on the public debt. Let me make this perfectly clear and perfectly distinct to the House, because it is important not only to us here but also to the country to know that $178,000,000 of that increase of $203,000,000 is on account of war and war services and interest on the public debt having an increase for all other services of $25,000,000. Not a very large increase between 1914 and 1924. But further than that, this paragraph that I have just read from the Speech from the Throne speaks about controllable and uncontrollable expenditures. Here again what the Speech says is perfectly correct in every way. The expenditures I have mentioned Mr. Speaker, amounted to $310,000,000, of which $192,000,000 was not controllable, and another $13,000,000 was only in part controllable, owing to war services; so we can say that $206,000,000 out of the $310,000,000 was totally uncontrollable expenditure which could not be reduced. Those are the exact figures taken from the public accounts, and I think hon. members can accept them as being correct.

But I want to make another comparison, Mr. Speaker, which is of very great importance, and that is of the controllable expenditure between the year 1914 and the year 1924, because after all there is where the test lies. The test lies not in what is uncontrollable expenditure. That uncontrollable expenditure will go on notwithstanding anything the government may do. The controllable expenditure, on the other hand, is expenditure which, although a measure only, the government has some control over. Let me repeat, the controllable expenditure between 1914, the last pre-war year, and the controllable expenditure of 1924 is the comparison I am about to make, and I think these figures will somewhat surprise hon. members. They are taken from the public accounts. The controllable expenditure of 1914 amounted to $78,397,000, and in 1924 it was $103,000,000; an increase of $25,000,000.

Now, Sir, I do not say that our expenditure in 1924 was as low as it should have been. I believe at that time that we had got into very extravagant ways. But that is not the point at all. The point is that the public became used to certain services in 1914, the war intervened, the value of the dollar depreciated very much indeed, and the real comparison of the public wants to-day is between the cost of the services they had before the war and the cost of the same services to-day. The figure which I have given of $25,000,000 is the increased cost of those services.

But I want to go a step further, with all due regard to my friends opposite. In that controllable expenditure are certain items for which this government was in no way responsible, and I am treating the fact with the utmost candour and the utmost sincerity, because I believe the public should be put in possession of the facts irrespective of everything else. In that $25,000,000 there were items such as expenditure on our merchant marine, the Canada Highways Act and the Victoria shipowners, amounting to over $6,000,000, which leaves the difference between the controllable expenditure in 1914 and in 1924, for which this government is responsible, at the sum of $19,000,000. Now, if you realize the reduced value of the dollar, if you compute quickly in your mind the fact that the controllable expenditure for the selfsame service was $78,000,000 in 1914, you cannot say that an increase of $19,000,000 is out of all proportion for the year 1924.

Much has been said and much has been written on the question of departmental expenditure, the cost of the departments has been criticized to a very great extent in the public press and elsewhere, and it has been said that we have retained in the departments many officials whose services might well be dispensed with, that the cost has been built up to an extraordinary extent, and as a consequence the country was being deprived of revenue and paying taxation which should not have been imposed upon it. Well, the net cost of the departments—because it is only right to take off revenue derived from the services of some of them—in 1914 was $65,000,000, while in 1924 it was $86,000,000, or an increase of approximately $20,000,000, which does not seem to be excessive. I do not say that an attempt should not be made to bring the cost down, but owing to the vast increase in what has to be collected, when we realize that the revenue from taxes in 1914 amounted to $128,000,000, as against $370,000,000 in 1924, when we realize that the disbursements in 1914 were $185,000,000, and in 1924 $334,000,000, we cannot say that the cost of government to-day is a great deal more than it should be or that the cost can be severely cut down.

There is another question that I desire to take up before leaving these figures, a question that I have looked into with some care, and one in which I think not only hon. members but the public generally have some concern. Indeed, my right hon. friend who leads the opposition (Mr. Meighen) brought this matter up in his address a few days ago. He was quoting, as he will remember, Speeches from the Throne of other years. He quoted from the Speech of 1923, and he used these terms:

> Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, why none of these are mentioned this year?

He was speaking about revenue and expenditure.

> For the simple reason that the condition in every instance is distinctly the opposite: instead of a decline in the public expenditure and an increase in the public revenue there has been to date a decline of $50,000,000 odd in the public revenue and an increase of $2,300,000 in public expenditure.

Surely my right hon. friend is not going to take the figures with respect to the middle of the year and come to the conclusion that they are a criterion of what the expenditure will be for the whole year. Moreover, why should he glory in the suggestion that there has been a reduction in revenue? The only reason there has been a reduction in revenue, is simply because this government has made an attempt, and an honest attempt, to reduce taxes. But further than that, if he will examine the figures with respect to the last year that his government was in power he will find that there was a reduction of $54,000,000 in the revenue in that year. So I do not think his criticism in that regard is well founded. In order to make a fair comparison I submit that it would be proper to take two years of the administration of this government and two years of the administration of the previous government, that is to say, the fiscal years ending March 31, 1921 and March 31, 1922, which were under the control of the previous government, and the fiscal years ending March 31, 1923 and March 31, 1924, which were under the control of this government. A comparison of those figures, would, it seems to me, be eminently fair in every way. I have made that comparison, and I would like also to have this table put upon Hansard:

Not controllable expenditure	396,036,227	385,443,814
War services partly controllable..	66,228,857	31,261,033
Services in departments in part controllable..	182,008,085	168,792,462
Merchant marine..	24,273,856	7,479,856
Canada highways..	3,934,009	9,920,606
Capital, canals, buildings, harbours, docks..	23,650,266	18,958,515
Miscellaneous capital charges	408,709	2,297,655
Total all heads, except railways..	696,539,999	624,153,941
Total expenditure not controllable..	396,036,227	385,443,814
Total expenditure in part controllable..	300,503,772	238,710,127
Total expenditure as detailed above..	696,539,999	624,153,941

For the years 1921 and 1922, therefore, the total expenditure, in part controllable, was $300,503,000, and in 1923 and 1924, under the same heads, it was $238,000,000, or a decrease in the two years of $62,000,000. In addition to that, if certain items such as those I have spoken of are taken off—the merchant marine and other expenditures of that description—the decrease, instead of being $62,000,000, will amount to about $80,000,000.

Now, I want to return to the question that I started out first of all to speak about, and to which the Speech from the Throne also makes reference in very clear and distinct language. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that these figures are so terribly unpalatable, but they have to be given in order to make this point quite clear. The Speech from the Throne says:

> It is apparent that even the most rigid economy in public expenditures will not suffice to solve this pressing problem and the problem of taxation incidental thereto.

That is another general statement, and it is correct. An examination of the public accounts for the year, item by item, will show that it is practically impossible to cut off expenditure under any of those items. Take our war taxes, which in 1924 amounted to $370,000,000: these taxes were in payment of our war debt and in payment also of our pensions and of administration as regards war services. It is true we had a surplus in that respect of $50,000,000. While on the question of war taxes may I suggest to the government that if at all possible these taxes in respect to war services be segregated from all others. The people have borne these taxes, have endured their stagnating influence for many years without a murmur, and they have done that because they have felt that these were war taxes and for war purposes. I do not say it is possible to do it, but if it could be done it would be highly desirable to segregate them for that particular purpose. The war debt could then be gradually eliminated and the taxes correspondingly reduced.

Taking our ordinary taxes, of which I have spoken previously, these represented expenditures connected with the cost of the departments, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, highways, and other items—for the present I leave out railway expenditure. The large increase in that class of taxation is without a doubt represented by the interest on the non-war debt. In 1914 the interest on the non-war debt amounted in round figures to $13,000,000; in 1924 it amounted to $29,000,000, an increase of $16,000,000.

I do not want to go back particularly to the past for the purpose of dealing with our past expenditures, but we are all well aware of what happened at the beginning of this century. We were all imbued with the idea that the twentieth century was to be "Canada's century." You heard that from the Atlantic to the Pacific; everybody had it, rich and poor, young and old. As a consequence we involved ourselves in vast expenditures. We increased our manufacturing plants. We trebled our railways. We urged our farmers in the west to hurry up, to take up more land, to extend their activities, and this of course, involved the requirement of greater credits. But the public have been inclined to say: "Oh, it is the politicians who have done all this. It is the politicians who have been responsible for all this expenditure, the politicians who have asked us to enter upon this extravagance." Well, Sir, all I can say in that regard is this: Remember what happened in connection with the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental. Examine, if you will, the resolutions of boards of trade in all parts of this country, which begged and prayed the government of that day to proceed with the construction of the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Examine what railway men like Wainwright and Hays said. Examine the petition to the government signed by Wainwright, Hays and the late Senator Cox, who said that with all possible speed the new railway should be built from the Atlantic to the Pacific. More than that, you can examine the various proceedings of the Grand Trunk shareholders in England who, without a dissenting voice and with prolonged cheers, declared that the Grand Trunk Pacific project was not only necessary for Canada but necessary for the saving of the Grand Trunk itself. These were their words at the shareholders' meetings. That being the case, it seems foolish for the public not to realize that they have been just as much responsible as the government of that day and the governments that followed for the expenditures which did take place in this connection.

In discussing this particular paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, and the truth in substance of that statement, we must remember that this vast expenditure in the days gone by has had a very pronounced effect upon the taxation of the present. Our expenditure in those days was out of all reason; it was a mad, drunken orgy of expenditure, and we are paying for it now in taxation which we cannot escape. We entered upon all these enterprises with our eyes wide open and there is no reason why we should now go into mourning and say we did not realize what was going on.

Take, for example, the figures as regards capital expenditure, and I may say the comparisons I am about to give are of very considerable interest. In the five years from 1896 to 1900 we expended in railway subsidies and in building canals, harbours and docks some $34,000,000. In the period from 1901 to 1905 we increased that capital expenditure to $54,000,000. In the five years from 1906 to 1910 that expenditure increased from $54,000,000 to $134,000,000. From 1911 to 1915, entirely exclusive of war outlays, our capital expenditure increased to $197,000,000; and from 1916 to 1920 it rose to $251,000,000.

As I say we cannot get away from paying the interest on these various obligations which we have incurred. I do not think we can very seriously cut down departmental expenditure, as one can see from a careful analysis of that expenditure. There have been increases in the expenditure of the great departments, for example, of Customs and Excise, Post Office and Finance. There have been great increases in the revenue collected, and great increases in the services. In other departments, such as Agriculture, Interior, and Health, again there have been increases, but those increases, Mr. Speaker, are due, in so far as anyone can see to the demands from the public for the rendering of certain services, and expenditure cannot be cut down in these departments unless the public itself is willing to do without the services which it had before the year 1914. We can make up our minds to that situation very clearly and very distinctly. If we want those services we have to pay for them. That expenditure must be met by taxation, and that taxation must come out of the pockets of the people.

There is one item which I hesitate I admit to speak about in this House but which it seems to me should be spoken about no matter how unpopular it may be. A very good plan, very earnest gesture on our part would be to cut down our own indemnities.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: I do not hear any great applause to that suggestion.

Mr. CALDWELL: We will help you.

Mr. PRITCHARD: May I put a question to the hon. gentleman whose speech I am enjoying very much?

Mr. MARLER: Certainly.

Mr. PRITCHARD: He mentions this plan of retrenchment. I would ask is not the increase in uncontrollable expenditure largely due to the increase of salaries?

Mr. MARLER: It has been increased to some extent by salaries, to the cost of living bonus and the betterment of salaries, but the public services have grown to a very large extent. These services were asked for by the public and the public is now paying for them. However, I am quite serious in this respect: A very effective measure would be to cut down our own indemnities. If we want to cut down taxes why should we not give that gesture to the public and say we are willing to cut down our indemnity. Why should we go to our constituencies and say "You cannot have this and cannot have that," and yet keep for ourselves the increase that was made in our indemnities. There is no reason why we should not do as I suggest, no reason why we should not give an example to the rest of the country by doing it.

Miss MACPHAIL: By what amount would you suggest the indemnity should be reduced?

Mr. GERVAIS: According to the number of children.

Miss MACPHAIL: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: In answer to my hon. friend from Southeast Grey I would reduce the indemnity to the amount it was before the war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in brief let me repeat what I said a few moments ago as to reducing taxation by cutting down expenditure: While we may be able to cut down that expenditure in part, while we may be able to cut down capital expenditure in part, while we may be able to do without some of these services which I think we should do without, while we may be able to cut down our own indemnities—all that is a drop in the bucket as regards the reduction in taxation. And again the Speech from the Throne is correct when it says:

> It is apparent that even the most rigid economy in public expenditures will not suffice to solve this pressing problem and the problem of taxation incidental thereto.

So we come down to the point, also stated in the Speech from the Throne that this expenditure and this taxation the country is undergoing to-day is due to one main cause and that cause is the encumbered position of our National Railways. Had we not our railway expenditure, had we not to put forward every year large sums of money on our railways, had we not to build those railways up as they have had to be built up under both governments—I am not complaining about what the other government did—and had we not to put aside this huge sum of money every year—I want to make this point clear and distinct to every member of the House—we would have a surplus that we could apply as regards reduction in taxation. We could see our way clear to a reduction of taxation and in time a very considerable reduction in taxation if the railway problem was not on our hands.

That being the case let us discuss for a moment the Canadian National Railways, and then I will pass on to another subject. The Canadian National Railways, as every member knows, is an amalgamation of four separate groups—the old Canadian Government railways, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk. These railways during their separate existence incurred very many obligations. These obligations were incurred by the railways, they were not directly assumed by us, but other obligations were directly guaranteed. Other obligations were contracted from time to time in the names of the railways guaranteed by the Dominion, or contracted by the Dominion itself for railway purposes. The point I want to make is this: It does not seem to make any difference whether we actually assumed these particular debts which the railways had at the time, whether these particular debts were incurred by the Canadian National Railway in its present corporate capacity or indirectly by the government. All these debts of the railways have, as a matter of fact, become the obligation of this country. I am not discussing the question of accounts at all, I am simply discussing a practical business matter. Here we have these railways. We own them. When we took them over, as I have said, they had a considerable funded debt secured on the lines and ranking prior to many of the obligations which we ourselves had guaranteed. Those securities, issued against the various parts of the line—and I will again ask permission to put the schedule explaining them into Hansard—amount to $328,000,000. After that there were securities guaranteed by ourselves to the extent of $470,000,000. That is to say the total securities which we would have to pay before we could recoup ourselves for any cash we put into these lines amount to $798,000,000. In addition to that we advanced to these various bodies, either separately or to the system as a whole, another $773,000,000 and we expended on the Canadian government group $494,000,000. To strike a balance, although I do not think it is correctly insertable, Canadian Northern 5 per cent income stock, which only bears interest in the event of its earning, to the amount of $24,000,000 appears in the schedule referred to. But leaving that amount in there is involved in these railways the huge sum of $2,000,000,000.

This is our liability and expenditure on capital account as of 31 December, 1923:

Securities issued against various parts of the roads which would require to be paid in order to preserve the system intact—of which $93,574,377 are guaranteed by certain of the Provinces..	328,588,298
Securities guaranteed by the Dominion.. ..	470,372,100
Total securities which would require to be paid before the Dominion would be able to save the cash it has advanced with respect to Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk Pacific and Grand Trunk groups..	798,960,398
Cash has been advanced to the roads comprised in these three groups including $16,601,064 to the whole system.. ..	773,422,946
Expenditure on the Canadian Government group..	494,888,251
Total cash advances..	1,268,311,297
To balance cost include Canadian Northern 5 per cent income stock which is subject to interest when earned.. ..	24,137,846
The addition of these figures represents the cost of the system and the money involved—which is..	2,091,409,541

Now these amounts were advanced in various proportions. The Canadian Government Railways, as I have just said, consumed $494,000,000, the Canadian Northern over $800,000,000 and the Grand Trunk Pacific $284,000,000, and so on. This is the exact expenditure.

Canadian Government Railways..	$494,888,351
Canadian Northern..	807,238,232
Grand Trunk Pacific..	284,202,876
Grand Trunk..	465,979,018
Canadian National (whole system)..	39,101,064
Total..	$2,091,409,541

I want to impress upon hon. members of this House just exactly what that railway situation is, and also that in order to work out a reduction in taxation, the railway situation must be solved at all hazards. That is the crux of the whole situation. I do not think the railways are making the progress they should make under present conditions, and that progress is not being made, not because the management is not doing its utmost, not because the government is not doing its utmost to help that management, but simply because it is impossible for the railways under present conditions to increase their traffic earnings. It is quite true that an improvement has been made. In 1920 there was a deficit of fixed charges of $26,000,000 and at the end of 1923 that had been turned into a surplus of $13,000,000. That would look in the first instance as though there had been an improvement of $39,000,000; but that was the operating improvement, and a very acceptable operating improvement it was, but you have to take off that operating improvement the fixed charges, to say nothing of the money which is owed to us. Take the fixed charges off and also take into consideration that during those four or five years which I have had under review we expended, in order to make that increase, something like $314,000,000, losing the interest on that amount. There is $100,000,000 in interest still unpaid, and the net gain in the years in question, you will find after working it out in the most careful way, has not been greater than $16,500,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon. gentleman not think that a rearrangement of the service between the two great systems might not materially cut down the cost of operation?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, without a doubt. I will come to that in a moment. I daresay that this large expenditure which is being incurred by the railways every year may not have to go on. Perhaps we have got to a point when the trains will stay on the tracks now; but in any event that expenditure may have to be continued. But let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this country have got to the limit of their endurance with regard to taxation, and they will not, I can assure you, Sir, stand for very much more expenditure for spectacular locomotives, or spectacular advertising or radios or matters of that description. All these pleasing little things will have to be cut out, because the people of this country have reached the limit of their endurance.

I will now take up the question asked me by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth)—railway competition. I had made a note in regard to that question. As we all know in this country we have the two great railway systems, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. Now we want healthy and fair competition between these two railways, and it is in our interest to have such a healthy and fair competition, but it is not in our interest to have stupid competition, it is not in our interest to have duplication, nor is it in our interest to have a spectacular movement on the part of any of these great railway companies. It is not in our interest to have so many trains run on one line and an equal number of trains run on the other line in the same territory. There is no sense in it and no object to be gained in so far as the Canadian National Railway is to be concerned. Nor is there any object to be gained so far as the Canadian Pacific is concerned. Unless these two railways come to some agreement themselves, it seems to me it is high time that parliament should step in and make them come to some sensible agreement, in order that the foolish duplication should not be continued.

Now let us ask ourselves how this railway problem can be solved. I again turn to the Speech from the Throne which says:

> Their ultimate solution lies largely in increased production and the development of new and wider markets.

There is no question about that at all. It is the only way we can solve our railway problem. We can do what we will, we can spend as much money as we will, and we can avoid as much duplication as we will, but we will never solve the railway problem until we build up the country by more production and more profitable production. That is the only way we can solve our railway problem. Then we come back, Mr. Speaker, to the same old question and we face the vicious circle—exactly the same question. It is a question of more people, more hard work, more wise economy and less expenditure, which does not mean no expenditure at all. That is the position in which we find ourselves. That is the position in which we are after we analyze the situation in every possible way. After we go through every channel possible in regard to our expenditure in taxation, we come down again as I say to the question of more people, more profitable production and more hard work. I say that the people of this country are to-day looking to us to find out in what way we can relieve them of their problem. We stand challenged to-day by the people of this country to find in what manner we can relieve them of the many pressing burdens, which burdens are not overwhelming, although they are serious and have to be taken into consideration. But the problem of procuring more people, the problem of keeping our young manhood in Canada and the problem of more profitable production, all of which are associated, and all of which are inter-dependent, might perhaps seem to some to be almost impossible to overcome. Those who hold that view, who say that these matters are overwhelming, and that they are insuperable, simply lack courage in their country; they do not realize that we have a sound and a safe foundation on which to build. They do not realize that we have our natural resources and our other industries which by perseverance we have built up. They do not realize that we in this country are in a position to give diversified employment to everybody who may come here. The solution is to apply to those natural resources and to those industries policies which will conserve one and develop the other, and increase thereby profitable production, thereby attracting more people.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MARLER: The Speech from the Throne makes precisely that statement in words which I will give the House.

Mr. VIEN: The hon. gentleman did not read that paragraph.

Mr. MARLER: After the witticisms of my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) I will continue. These questions of profitable production and of securing more people for this country I admit are not without their difficulties, but the only way in which we can overcome them is by realizing those difficulties and doing our best to overcome them. We will never overcome them so long as we think in terms of Ontario and Quebec, or in terms of the east and the west. We have to think of them in terms of Canada and Canada only. That is the only way by which we will be able to overcome our difficulties in this country. These difficulties are known to you; perhaps they need not be repeated, but in order to continue the trend of my argument I am going to take the liberty of repeating some of them to the House, because they follow out very largely what I have been saying.

The first of these difficulties is our geographical situation. Canada is not a compact country. It is not a country with a moderately dense population; it is a country stretching across the continent with an extremely scattered population, settled, perhaps, in a way in which it should never have been settled, but nevertheless, settled as it has been. In the United States, settlement was made gradually towards the west. In this country our settlement was far flung to all corners. This country, instead of being a compact country, one which could be easily governed, is, as a matter of fact, divided into four distinct parts, each of which is separated from the other by natural obstacles more or less difficult. We have the Maritimes separated from the industrial central provinces of Ontario and Quebec by a long stretch of sparsely settled country; we have the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario separated from the prairie section by a long stretch of wilderness, and we have the Pacific province of British Columbia, separated from the prairie section by the Rocky mountains. The division of this country in that particular way is not the only difficulty. In each of those particular divisions there has grown up different viewpoints, different industries, very often different from those in other parts of the country, and different economic views of life. Another difficulty is that we have along our whole southern border the richest, one of the most populous nations of the world, constantly influencing us in many ways we do not perceive and do not understand, constantly acting as a magnet for our population, rendering our position in this country perhaps the most difficult of any country in the world.

All those influences give rise to various factors. Our widely scattered population and great distances give rise to questions of transportation; our different industries in the different parts of Canada give rise to questions of tariffs and our proximity to the United States gives rise to questions of labour, taxation and competition. With those various differences in the geographical situation and in the industrial life of this country, I cannot see how anybody can say that a fixed and decided policy can be formulated which will apply to the whole of Canada. A policy for example fashioned in the terms of the Maritimes might not suit the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; a policy fashioned in the terms of Ontario and Quebec might not suit the prairie section, and it is conceivable that a policy fashioned in the terms of the prairie sections might not suit other parts of Canada. What, therefore, should we attempt to do? We should fashion policies which would encourage as much as possible the basic industries in every part of the Dominion. But in doing that, someone will say to us: Yes, you encourage an industry there and you discourage an industry elsewhere. In other words there is a conflict of interest, a conflict of economic forces. That may happen, it cannot be denied, with our far-flung population in the various parts of this country. But where a certain policy framed to encourage an industry in one particular section of the country prejudicially affects an industry in another section, the industry unfavourably affected should be given some compensating factor in order that it may get on in the best way possible without feeling the burden unduly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the speaker encourage some sort of zoning policy by which each section would be allowed to choose its own particular policy, protection or free trade?

Mr. MARLER: I should certainly not encourage such a policy at all, for this reason. If we are ever going ahead in this country, we must go together as Canada and Canada alone. I will come to that later. If one section of this country wants help, the rest of the country must come along and help that particular section. To divide the country up into zones and peoples is the most unheard of thing that any man can conceive.

Perhaps all in this House are not prepared to concede that special consideration should be given to the various sections of Canada. I do not say and I do not think it is correct to put it in a way that special privileges are afforded to a special section of the country. I think special consideration must be given to each of those four great sections if the various industries in those particular sections are to be built up, accorded every facility of being built up and therefore profitable production coming about. I know—and I say so quite clearly, distinctly and advisedly—that in my city of Montreal and province of Quebec there are people who say that a policy which may be good for Montreal or the province of Quebec is good for the rest of Canada. I do not at all share the opinion of those people. Never will I stand up and gather together one body of the people in the east to controvert and to be opposed to a section of the west. The success of this country is bound up in the whole working together of its component parts, each assisting the other to the fullest extent of its ability, and the country as a whole bearing certain burdens which are necessary to promote basic wealth or basic industries in any particular part of this Dominion. Others come forward and say, that the policies which were in vogue in the year 1900 should be good in the year 1925. Some say that the policies of statesmen in the year 1900 should be applied to this present date. I do not think so, and I do not see how such can be brought about. Those who say so do not realize the changed conditions that have come over this country. They do not realize that Canada in 1925 is an entirely different Canada from what it was in 1900. They do not appreciate the fact that we have to take conditions, not as we found them in 1900, but as we find them at this very day, and we must work out those conditions as we now find them. Who in the world can say that Canada of 1925 is the same as it was in 1900? The year 1900 was about the time that we started on our mad career of expenditure that I spoke about earlier in my remarks. In the two decades after 1900 we spent more than $600,000,000; we doubled our manufacturing establishments and more than doubled our output. We trebled our railway facilities until we had more railways per capita than any other country in the world. The war came along and a certain check was put to that; but during the war vast sums of money were spent again, and we took up the manufacturing of various commodities that we had not thought of before. After the war we still continued with our spending and, as a result of that, our debt increased to over two billion dollars. Our taxes increased from $50,000,000 to over $400,000,000 but during all this time did our population double or treble as it was expected to do? Not at all. It increased barely 65 per cent. Therefore we find ourselves in the year 1925, as compared with the year 1900, with three times the equipment in railways, double the manufacturing establishments, eight times the taxation and ten times our national debt. Can anyone say that conditions in 1925 are comparable with conditions in 1900?

There is another matter of equal significance, and it is this. In the year 1900 west of the Great Lakes there lived about 500,000 people whereas in 1925 there is a population there of 2,500,000. In 1910 there was west of the lakes 11 per cent of the whole population, whereas in 1925 there is 22 per cent of the population. These figures perhaps may mean nothing; to some they are probably only figures. But the basic industries of those 2,500,000 people are very different from those that operate in the east. We must recognize that fact, for there is no use shutting our eyes to it. That is why I say that every section of this country has its own peculiar difficulties; every section of the country has its industries which we must do our utmost to promote, and it is only by means of all working together in a spirit of tolerance that we can ever get along and make of this Canada the country which we expect it to be some day. It would be impossible, with all the ingenuity at one's command and in spite of one's greatest inventive genius, to devise a policy which would be fair and equitable to the whole country unless there were some spirit of tolerance evident in its provisions. In Canada we have to exert every energy of which we are capable and develop all the resources at our disposal if we are ever to advance the country as a whole, as it should be advanced. And the kind of policy we need is a national policy, framed with due regard to all sections of the community, in so far as we can possibly make it so, a policy which will be Canadian and which any member of this House might stand up and truly describe as a national policy. We need a policy which we can call Canadian and not one which must be spoken of as Progressive or Liberal or anything of that kind, a policy which will commend itself to all the citizens of one great country. That is the only kind of policy under which this country will ever make progress.

I want to illustrate some of my remarks in this regard. I spoke a moment ago about compensating factors and about the necessity of considering certain sections of the country in order that the basic industries of those parts might be developed. Let me refer particularly at the moment to the Maritime provinces; and I want hon. gentlemen if they will bear with me to consider that great section of Canada. There we have a splendid land, a great people, great natural resources in the way of coal, magnificent harbours, and the greatest fisheries in the world, besides many other assets too numerous to mention. And from those provinces, as we know, there are in this House an able minister of the crown and able members of parliament. With all these assets, one would imagine that that part of the country would have progressed. But it has not progressed; it has not held its own in natural increase during the past twenty years. Its industrial establishments have steadily gone down and the people are leaving the Maritimes for the United States. Now, what can we do to help the Maritime provinces? What can the rest of Canada do to help that great section of the country? There is no use shutting our eyes to the fact that there exist in that part of the country conditions that call for some remedy. Can we not use the coal of the Maritime provinces in Quebec and in a part of Ontario to a greater extent than we do? Some say that it would cost a trifle more. So it would; but would not that be a great help to the Maritime provinces? Could we not use its ports more than we do, and decide that as regards the Maritimes the British preferential tariff shall apply only in the case of goods coming through Canadian ports? Could we not use the ports of Halifax and St. John more than the port of Portland, certainly as regards traffic originating in Canada? Why could we not avail ourselves of these facilities and so build up that part of the country and, consequently, the whole Dominion, by means of a Canadian policy? There is no reason in the world, it seems to me, why this should not be the case. And why should not transportation rates be reduced in the Maritimes in order that their products might be brought up to the central provinces? And if the railways could not make a sufficient profit then the country should give them compensation.

The Speech from the Throne, as I have said, shows great vision; it shows that this government has had in mind the merits of the situation. It declares, as regards this particular question of transportation,—and I am sure it will be applied in a fair way:

> It is the opinion of my advisers that the attention of parliament at the present session should be directed more particularly to the desirability of effecting a freer movement of commodities through an equalization of railway freight rates as between provinces and localities.

I say that this question of transportation is one of the greatest problems we have before us to-day, and I may offer another illustration. Let us take the prairie section. There the question of markets also comes before us; there is the question of bringing cattle to market; there is the question of marketing wheat; and there is the question of transporting coal to the provincial market if possible. Someone will argue in that regard that the freight rates now in vogue are the lowest in the world. But that to me is entirely beside the point; it is not a question as to whether our freight rates from the west to the east or from the Maritime provinces to the west are comparable with those in the United States, even if they are lower or otherwise. That is not the question to be considered. In the United States there is a large intermediate market; here, the foreign market is all important. The question to my mind, and the only question worth considering as regards freight rates, is the necessity of giving to the west such a rate as will enable it to place its products in the markets of the world in competition with similar products from other lands. So far as I can see, that is the only thing worth striving after. Equalization of rates is a term which in the Speech from the Throne may perhaps be correctly used; but I do not think it is a term that can be properly applied as regards freight rates, because if equalization means a certain rate per mile, that cannot work out inasmuch as the topography of the country, the density of population and a hundred other questions must be considered. What we should bear in mind in the matter of freight rates is, as I say, not the question whether those rates compare with the rates in the United States or in any other country: we need rates that will enable the people to build up the basic industries and promote profitable production so that more people will be induced to enter the country without the necessity for an immigration policy at all.

Incidentally, while we are discussing this question of freight rates, two other questions will occur to us in that regard. The first question is, who is to make these rates; the second it, who is to bear the cost. Opinions may differ on the first question. Some will say that parliament should make the rates. If so, I find it extremely difficult to agree with that opinion. I venture to say that with the sole exception of my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) none of us in this House has a general understanding of the complicated structure of freight rates. My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) may know all about freight rates on farm products, my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) may know all about freight rates on furniture, some other of my hon. friends may know all about freight rates on other commodities, but who in this House is capable of taking into consideration comparisons between a ton mile, a freight mile and a passenger mile, what any particular traffic will bear, and half a hundred other questions that arise in this complex matter. We are incapable in this House or in a committee of making up a general structure of freight rates. But there is a body competent to make such a structure—the Board of Railway Commissioners. That body has made a study of freight rates and is competent to deal with the question. Let my point not be misunderstood in that regard, Mr. Speaker. I say the railway commission is the proper body to formulate the general basis of a rate structure; but no one will assert that we in this House should not say, for the purpose of assisting any basic industry in any part of the country, that a specific rate is not advisable in order to bring the product of that particular industry to market.

As to the second question, who is to bear the cost of lower freight rates that we might decide on, this is an important factor also, and hon. gentlemen would be very well advised to take it into their most earnest consideration. Let them bear in mind that we have two great railway systems, the National and the Canadian Pacific, each attempting to the fullest extent of its ability to give good service, but each struggling to live on account of insufficient traffic. To say to the National, reduce freight rates below the cost of living rates fixed by the railway commission, will simply mean that the deficits on that line will be greater, and its officers and employees will be faced with still greater discouragement. If a similar reduction is made in respect of freight rates of the Canadian Pacific, that line also will probably have a deficit, which will affect not only our national financial standing, but our financial standing internationally.

Anyone studying the subject will admit that on account of our geographic situation we must have such transportation rates as will enable the products of the various sections of this country to compete in the markets of the world. It is that geographical situation which we have to overcome, and I believe that any reduction below the general structure of freight rates as made by the railway commission should be borne by the country as a whole, for this reason. It is in the interests of the country generally to promote profitable production in the west and in the Maritimes, because the rest of the Dominion will benefit at the same time.

Now, I have spoken of compensating factors which may require to be given to various sections of the country. I have also spoken of the utter impossibility of formulating a blanket policy which will suit the whole Dominion. I admit freely that there are conflicting interests, and that these will continue until they are wiped out by more population. I do not intend to avoid discussing what perhaps is an unpleasant topic to some, therefore I do not intend to conceal my ideas on certain subjects. I have spoken to some extent and made an attempt to outline a policy as regards the prairie provinces and the Maritimes, but I have made no observations with respect to the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I am not anxious to refer to these sections, but I am confident that if I do not deal with them I shall be told I should have given my views with regard to them.

Mr. EULER: Before my hon. friend leaves the question of freight rates, I understood him to say that perhaps the chief factor in our heavy taxation is the deficits of the National railway. Reduced freight rates east and west, as suggested by him, would necessarily increase those deficits, and I should like to ask him whether this would not aggravate the situation which he has already described as almost unbearable.

Mr. MARLER: The point is well taken. I attempted in the earlier part of my remarks to emphasize that we had locked up in the Canadian National lines a vast sum of money, that the system was not making the progress that it should make by the means at our command, and that the only way in which progress could be made was by having more production and therefore greater freight traffic. I also attempted to make the point that to have greater production we had to have more profitable production in order to attract people to settle in various parts of the Dominion. My claim is that it does not matter how much money we spend in immigration, it does not matter how much advertising we do to attract immigrants, unless people in every section of the country are prosperous it is not a bit of good to bring more people into those sections. I admit that reduced freight rates will cost the country money, I admit that deficits in the meantime will likely increase, but I claim that when we have an increased population making profitable production those deficits will gradually decrease until they are ultimately wiped out entirely.

Mr. EULER: Taxation in the meantime may increase?

Mr. MARLER: It may increase.

Mr. LEWIS: You are not looping the loop?

Mr. MARLER: If we do not loop the loop some way we will loop ourselves another way pretty quickly.

Mr. LEWIS: I have followed the hon. gentleman's remarks fairly well, but if freight rates to and from the Maritime provinces and the prairie provinces are lowered, it simply means that our taxation is going to be increased. The hon. gentleman stated that the consumer ultimately pays taxation. If this increased burden is cast upon the people of the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec, it means increased protection, and higher prices, and you are simply in a vicious circle; you cannot get out of it.

Mr. MARLER: Of course it will cost more to lower railway rates. I said quite distinctly that the cost would be borne by the country as a whole, not necessarily—

Mr. LEWIS: By the consumer.

Mr. MARLER: By the consumer, yes—by the country as a whole not by one particular section or another particular section. Let my hon. friend not misunderstand me: I do not claim for a moment that this is an economic principle that can be defended; I do not think it can be defended in any way. But let me be quite frank in that respect: what is the alternative? What is to be done? How are we in this country to make production profitable? How are we to increase our population, first of all, so that these deficits may decrease? I do not claim that a suggestion of this description is a proper economic suggestion that one would make under any other circumstances.

We are well aware that a great part of the industry of the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario is bound up in manufacturing. All the urban population and many of those who comprise the rural population have interests which are bound up with the manufacturing industries. I want to put the claims of the people of these provinces, as I hear them and as I understand them, frankly and freely before hon. members of this House. I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of fiscal systems; I am only going to put forward what may be regarded as a reasonable claim. These people say that in order to enable them to develop their various industries, a certain tariff should be maintained so that goods manufactured under more favourable climatic and other conditions than those applicable to goods manufactured in Canada shall not be dumped in here to undersell our Canadian made products. Now, I do not intend to debate the merits or demerits of the tariff systems which have been in vogue in this country. I know that those in certain sections of the country claim that the tariff system is no good, while on the other hand those in other sections say that its maintenance is imperative. But it seems to me that those living in the different parts of the country should know what is best for them; they are the best judges. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) distinctly says, "No, this system will not do; we will have none of it." He went on to say, "When the population goes out into the west, see what is ahead of you." Now, I do not take these remarks of the hon. member for Brandon seriously. I think he is too good a Scotchman and has too much sense not to view these matters in a fair light.

5. p.m.

Mr. FORKE: Let me correct my hon. friend's statement. I said that when the population was in the majority in the west they would probably treat the people in the east as the east now treat the people in the west.

Mr. MARLER: Let us be frank about this thing. We want to try to get at some reasonable and common policy. What is the use of our bandying words across the floor of this House? What is the use of talking about this eastern and this western idea? Let us try to arrive at some common basis on which we can proceed. That is why I am talking here to-day and for no other reason. I would not be bothered talking on this subject at all if I were not desirous of making a reasonable attempt to offer you from the city of Montreal a fair, honest and decent gesture.

Mr. FORKE: Does the hon. member ever find me talking in any other strain?

Mr. MARLER: I was going on to say that I did not for a moment take seriously what my hon. friend said in that respect. I do not for a moment take seriously what the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) is reported to have said. I do not think that hon. gentlemen in that quarter of the House have any less sense or any less intelligence than we have in the east; perhaps in some cases they have more. I believe they are just as good Canadians as we are in the east and that they have just as good ideas. I want to see the whole country go ahead. I believe our present differences are due to lack of understanding, to lack of clarity; to the fact that the conditions have not been put before the people of the west as clearly and as fairly as they should have been. That is why I am speaking this afternoon, as representing a part of the city of Montreal, directly to hon. members from the west.

We may as well recognize that there is that conflict of interests. But if it can be plainly shown that a reasonable development tariff is necessary in the country, would it not be fair, if a transportation structure is borne by the remainder of the country, for certain parts to have in the meantime, until our population is built up, until our markets are increased, a reasonable tariff to develop these particular industries?

Mr. GOOD: Would my hon. friend explain to the House how the manufacturers of Quebec and Ontario can get any benefit out of the tariff if they are going to compensate the west for the burden which that tariff imposes on the west?

Mr. MARLER: I am not going to discuss theories with my hon. friend at all. I am sick of theories on this thing. I want to get down to plain business facts.

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. GOOD: I think the question is a fair one.

Mr. MARLER: Well, I do not understand it.

Mr. GOOD: May I repeat my question?

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend may repeat it as much as he likes.

Mr. GOOD: Would my hon. friend from Montreal explain how Ontario and Quebec, if they are advantaged at the present time through the tariff, are going to derive any permanent benefit from the tariff if they must pay compensation to the west?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, I will explain that, certainly. Ontario and Quebec want to see the west populated and prosperous; that is why.

Mr. SPENCER: Wipe out the tariff, then.

Mr. MARLER: Wipe out the tariff? My hon. friend is again getting into theories. We have had enough theories from my hon. friend during the last three years in this House; we do not know where we are as regards his theories.

Mr. IRVINE: I notice that.

Mr. MARLER: Let us get down to facts.

An hon. MEMBER: Build the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. MARLER: Yes, if the Hudson Bay railway is shown to be a good thing I shall be the first to favour it. Certainly I will, but I want to be shown by proper proof that the Hudson Bay railway would be all that it should be. I will support the Hudson Bay railway or anything else for the good of the west if it is shown to be right, but I am not going to support the theories which some of my hon. friends opposite advance.

Mr. BIRD: May I ask a question? Is the hon. member not aware that he is preaching a very advanced doctrine of state socialism?

Mr. MARLER: No, I do not understand anything about state socialism; I understand ordinary business common sense, that is all. I have been a business man for many years and I want to see business go ahead in this country, and go ahead just as much in the prairie section as in the other parts of this Dominion. That is all I am trying to get at, and if I am wrong I will acknowledge it quite freely before this House.

I was going on to say when these theories came up for discussion that we might well consider what the objections are in connection with this much debated subject of tariffs. To those who are opposed to a reasonable tariff for this country I will say that if any of the objections they urge are well founded I shall be the first to favour the wiping out of the objectionable features. What are these objections? The commonest one is that the tariff promotes inefficiency. I do not know whether it does or does not. The second objection is that the manufacturer is taking improper advantage of the tariff. I say again that I do not know whether he is or is not. Another objection is that insufficient revenue is procured from the country on account of the tariff framed as it is and on account of the manner in which it is collected. That may be the case. Another objection, and the last, is that it fosters industries in Canada which enjoy no reasonable measure of success. Now all these objections are objections which, to my way of thinking, and I say it quite frankly, should be investigated. I say further: If any of these objections are well founded I will be the first to stand up in this House and say, "Wipe that objection away."

An hon. MEMBER: Wipe the objection away?

Mr. MARLER: Nothing could be fairer than that. I do not think I could be conscientiously asked to support a tariff that has these objectionable features in it; I do not intend to support a tariff that has any such features in it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should have thought you would allow the objections.

Mr. MARLER: Did my friend say "Wipe them out?"

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Allow the objections.

Mr. MARLER: I cannot hear my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend said that if the objection was good he would wipe it out. I do not think he meant to say that.

Mr MARLER: I am afraid my hon. friend from West York is becoming a theorist also. Sooner or later he will have to seat himself beside my hon. friend the member from Brant (Mr. Good). When that takes place we shall be most delighted to have the joint theories of these two gentlemen. No, I am getting away from theories and trying to get down to facts. In discussing this subject what I want to know, and what hon. gentlemen want to know, is this: Does our present tariff prevent what it should prevent, and does it effect what it should effect? No one can say that it does, and no one can say that it does not. It was in 1907 and since then there have been hundreds and hundreds of changes in the tariff. Now I claim, and I think I correctly claim, that there should be a complete revision of that tariff based on present day conditions and in keeping with what the conditions may be. I go further and say this: That the only way by which that can be brought about is to have a properly constituted tariff board to investigate every item and to find out whether any item is right or wrong. I say that to make our tariff on a hit or miss principle will get us nowhere. We may be imposing burdens we should not impose; there may be disqualifications in the tariff which should not be there and which certainly should be wiped out. But how are we going to find out unless the matter is submitted to a proper tariff board? I do not mean a tariff board that shall make the tariff. That is nonsense; the government will have to take the responsibility itself of making the tariff. I do not intend this to be a board such as functions in the United States, with public hearings or anything of that kind; but we want a board of experts in this country to look into tariff matters continually, to say what is right and what is wrong, and to keep the government fully advised. The Prime Minister mentioned this very fully in his speech on May 15 last, and I am using very largely the very words of the leader of the government.

I have nearly finished every hon. member will be glad to hear, unless there are some more theories to be answered. During the past year, and notably during the past few weeks, we have heard all kinds of reports as regards Canada. We have heard reports as to our expenditures, reports as regards the exodus of our population, and many other reports of the worst kind. I think there is a great deal in certain of these reports and that they will bear careful investigation. My hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) in his very able speech brought up some the other day. All these cases deserve consideration. There is no good burying our heads in the sand and saying everything is beautiful in this country. We have to investigate facts as we find them, and unless we do investigate we will never go ahead. We have heard from within that "Confederation is at stake," and from without that "Our path is laid to the cave of a dragon with stars on its forehead and stripes on its side, only waiting a favourable opportunity to consume us." All these things we have heard about our country but the peculiar fact is that notwithstanding all these criticisms which have taken place, all these matters which have happened, very few remedies have been brought forward in order to effect a solution. The criticisms have been ample, but the solutions few and far between. I do not wonder at that particular situation. The people of this country are generally working at fever heat. They have no time to particularly investigate national affairs. They know these affairs in a general sort of way. Still, I doubt very much if they know that our national railways have cost $2,000,000,000; I doubt very much if they know that our canals have cost $130,000,000; I doubt very much if they know that we have invested in manufacturing industries in this country over $3,000,000,000. What they do ask is that this vast structure erected, and perhaps unwisely erected, should be made to pay and that taxation should be reduced. They ask us in the meantime to forget our party differences, to some extent at least, and to get down to a reasonable and proper basis and go ahead. After we go ahead and after taxation is reduced we may come down to our party tactics again. But in the meantime—

Mr. SPENCER: Why go back to party?

Mr. MARLER: Again I am not a hazy theorist. I think these things are practical, but I say that in the meantime we should sink any differences we have and try and evolve some policy which will be good and beneficial to the whole of Canada. I say quite frankly, as I said earlier in these observations, that to make a blanket policy for this country is impossible. I say again, as I have said before that compensating factors will have to be given in various sections of the country and the objection taken by my hon. friend the member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) was perfectly correct in every way. These compensating factors—the helping of the Maritimes, the helping of the central provinces in a certain way, the helping of the prairie sections in a certain way—will, I know, cost money. I ask: What are we to do, where are we to land, where are we to get off, unless we promote profitable production, unless we get more people into the country. We spend money in immigration every year—the Minister of Immigration and Colonization carries out as good a policy as anyone can carry out—but no policy of immigration, no amount of money spent in immigration, no advertising or propaganda of any kind, will have any lasting or enduring effect unless the people of this country at the present time are prosperous and are engaged in profitable production, and this is the first thing that must be brought about.

Now, what are the alternatives? The alternatives are these: For the people of Canada to make a bold and courageous stand, cost monetarily what it will, for the purpose of building up our population and establishing profitable production. When the population arrives, when that production and further production takes place, any necessity of compensating factors will then cease, and the cost will seem trifling. But if we do not do that, if we do not take our courage in our hands and say that we will help here and we will help there and go ahead in the meantime, what will be the result? We will lose population. More than that we will not be able to keep this great structure we have erected with less people, and then we may find ourselves unknowingly but certainly treading the path towards that cave and that dragon which I spoke of a few moments ago. Why Sir, it is impossible for me to think that we Canadians lack courage in this country. It is impossible for me to think that we have forgotten what our forefathers have done in Canada. It is impossible for me, coming as I do from the province of Quebec, to forget what our French Canadians have done in old Quebec, how they built up that province out of the wilderness, and how the Anglo-Saxon race built up the province of Ontario, the prairie provinces and the province of British Columbia over the Rocky mountains. It is impossible for me to forget these things. It is impossible for me, even in the shortest space of time the human imagination is able to conceive, to believe that we have not in Canada the courage to take this situation in hand; and to bring forward, as I say cost what it will, reasonable and proper policies to encourage profitable production throughout this land, using that policy to provide production and more people. The only way we can get more people, I repeat, is by that production. Give us more people and we will hear nothing about Canada's troubles, we will hear nothing about freight rates or any of these other matters, and the country will blossom like the rose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What about a tax on bachelors?

Mr. MARLER: I could not catch my hon. friend's question. Why does he not stand up and ask a question like any ordinary member of this House would do, instead of growling out something from his seat?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should like to know whether the hon. member, in order to overcome the difficulty he has referred to fifteen or twenty times, would suggest a tax on bachelors.

Mr. MARLER: Is my hon. friend a bachelor? If he is I would put a large tax on them. I would put such a high tax on bachelors that he would be completely wiped out in a few minutes' time.

As I was saying when my hon. friend for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) interrupted me at a most inopportune moment, as he usually does—he always interrupts at the most inopportune moments—it is impossible for me to believe that we have not the courage in this country to bring the country forward as we should. It is impossible for me to believe that we cannot, by means of fair and equitable policies, bring this country forward. There is an old saying which I remember reading in some memoirs a few years ago. Hon. gentlemen will remember what Cromwell did. He brought together a body of troops that were never beaten in the field, and his words were:

The secret of success is attack, pursue and rally.

And what we require to do in this country is to attack the problems now before us. What we require to do is to pursue the problems until we overcome them. Let all who are Canadians stand together. Let those who are in favour of fair and decent policies, Mr. Speaker, unsheathe the sword against those who are sectional and unfair. If we do that then I feel confident that this country will pull through and be a united and prosperous people.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I desire to compliment the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) upon his courage in coming forward in this House this afternoon and making the professions and suggestions he has made, and intimating his readiness to co-operate with others in this House to solve the great problems before the country to-day. I agree with many of the statements he has made, that we are overtaxed, that we have great burdens, and that we have got to try and settle them. We are here to settle these questions and this is the time to do it. For a short time I will refer to some of the things the hon. member has brought up; I may have to deal with some of his other statements later on. But when he brought up the railway question and spoke of the rumours and cries of despair which we have heard in this country, I thought he was about to state the case of his fellow citizens of Montreal who have no confidence in the country because of certain things in connection with transportation. I thought that the special thing that he had in mind was the national railway which is owned by the people of Canada. I am ready to deal with that question as between the national railway owned in this country by the people, and the other road which holds the good esteem—and is entitled to the good esteem—of the people of Montreal, the Canadian Pacific railway. To introduce what I have to say, I intend to tell the House of a little conference I attended four or five weeks ago when I happened to be in Ottawa. A conference had been called by the Minister of Railways to discuss the proposal in connection with the Peace River railway. I attended that conference, as I had a right to do as a member of this House, and I had letters from some of my friends in the west who asked me to look into the matter. The conference lasted for about two hours, and a great many statements were made. The Canadian Pacific Railway was represented by Mr. Beatty, the Canadian National by Sir Henry Thornton, and the best men of the respective executives of these railways were present. Also the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), the Premier of British Columbia, the Premier of Alberta, and others attended the conference, and they all asked questions; but the most significant statement at that conference was made by the Premier of British Columbia, Hon. Mr. Oliver. He said it would be a crime for this country, in its present state to allow two systems of railway to be built into the Peace river country when one would be sufficient. Other gentlemen followed him more or less on the same line, but they did not come quite to the point. Nor did Mr. Beatty, nor Sir Henry Thornton, deal with the crucial point. Many of the representatives spoke, and the Minister of Railways turned to me and said, "We would like to hear from you, Mr. Maclean." I said that I agreed with the statement of the Premier of British Columbia that it would be a crime to build two competing lines into one district of the country, and I thought there should be co-operation or joint action between the two. I had no sooner said that then every man got up and restated his case, and they all said they were absolutely in favour of co-operation in regard to the project. That was the significant thing in that meeting.

Taking the speech of the hon. gentleman this afternoon dealing with the railway question, I think he has that point in view, but he does not quite care to express it. Let me tell him that we have a Canadian National railway in this country, and it has cost us a great deal of money. It is the greatest publicly owned railway in the world to-day, and the people of Canada absolutely own it. It may have cost two billion dollars, or whatever the hon. gentleman says, but the people of Canada own the Canadian National Railway system. We have another great road, the Canadian Pacific railway. That road is owned by the investing public; and the control of it is not in the city of Montreal, but in the stock market of New York, the stock market of London. That being the case, if the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) believes in co-operation and consolidation, inasmuch as the Canadian National is the greater system and has seventy per cent of the strategy of the railway situation in Canada, the co-operation must start by the Canadian Pacific being prepared to co-operate with the Canadian National—the smaller with the greater. In that act of co-operation it must be prepared also, not to sell its lines to the Canadian National—for we could not afford to purchase the Canadian Pacific—but to lease its system to the Canadian National Railways, probably with joint operation under a board taken from the two roads. My hon. friend is in favour of co-operation and of reducing the cost of railways in this country. The cost is too high, it must be reduced. We are trying to do too much; we cannot afford to run half a dozen competing services across the continent. There is no need for two competing lines every day in the year between Toronto and Montreal, or between Toronto and Ottawa, or in other sections. Enormous economies can be effected in connection with the railways and railway transportation in this Dominion. I am simply throwing out the suggestion and saying that I agree largely with what my hon. friend says that he is prepared to accept, but it must be with the Canadian Pacific accepting some kind of arrangement with the National system. The people of Canada will never consent to turning over the Canadian National railway system to the Canadian Pacific which is not controlled by Canadians. If that is the view of my hon. friend, I should like to talk it over with him and I should like to hear whether he is prepared to recommend that the Canadian Pacific come in with the Canadian National and try to solve the problem.

In speaking of what the hon. gentleman said, I give him credit for his fairness. He said a great deal; but many things he did not say. I accept his appearance here to-day not so much as that of one who is prepared to make every sacrifice, but one who comes here to say that the greatest mistake in the economic condition of Canada is that we have public ownership of the National railway system. That is what Montreal is saying to-day. The Montreal press is saying that the shadow of death is over the country; that there is a "whisper of death" in Canada. Let them say that; but the National Railways are an established fact, the people of Canada own them and the National Railways are here to stay. The Canadian Pacific is in existence and it may continue to make a great success. But the Canadian Pacific has no right to attack the National Railways, it was never chartered for that purpose. I want to tell Mr. Beatty and those men who are talking about "whispers of death," that the Canadian Pacific was built for a specific purpose as set out in the charter of that road. It is very simple; it is almost suggestive of the Shorter Catechism with which the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) is probably familiar, and which says: "What is the chief object of man?"; and the answer is: "To glorify God and enjoy him forever." What is the chief object of the Canadian Pacific railway? It is set out in the act, and it is simply to connect the province of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada in the east. In other words, the chief duty of the Canadian Pacific railway is to build a road from British Columbia to connect with the Canadian railway systems to the east, and in the act there is nothing that says that the chief duty of the Canadian Pacific is to conspire against the National railway system which is owned by the people of Canada. The Canadian Pacific would like to put the Canadian National out of business or to take it over. Montreal, where the "whisper of death" comes from, would like to take it over; but the Canadian people are not going to give up the National system of railways; they never will hear of such a thing. If the Canadian Pacific is willing to co-operate in some way and will come in with some joint arrangement, recognizing the right of the people to own and manage their own railway—and there is nothing more before us now than to do that—they may come in and they will receive a fair hearing. But when the people and press of Montreal say that the shadow of death is over our country because we have National Railways, that at least recognizes the fact that we have them. How we came to get them, I am not going to detail. I know all about the blunders of the past and about the individuals and firms who wished to get railways and to make money out of them; I know of the visions of various statesmen in connection with railways. That is all past; we must deal now with the fact, and the fact is that the people of Canada own a national system of railways and telegraphs which they intend to hold and develop, and they are prepared to take the Canadian Pacific into some joint arrangement if it will come into it.

Anybody who hears and reads about what is going on must realize that there is this objection to public ownership of railways, as if public ownership were a crime. The fact that we have these roads is thrown at us as a reason why we shall never succeed in this country. The truth of the matter is that the hope of the country lies in the fact that we have the National Railways and that they are dealing with our transportation problems in a great and broad way. If Montreal changes its attitude and says that its main business is to deal with the rest of the country in regard to solving the question of transportation, all well and good.

But an attack is being made now on public ownership in another corner of this country. The people of Ontario have seen fit to spend a good deal of money in creating a provincial system of hydro-electric development and they have made a great success of it. Because Ontario has done this thing, all the enemies of public ownership, not only in Montreal and other parts of Canada, but even in the United States, and especially in Washington where the Smithsonian Institute has made an investigation into our adventure in hydro-electric in Ontario, say that we have failed. The greatest success in public ownership in the world to-day is the hydro-electric system of Ontario. Electric energy is distributed in all parts of the province; it is in every town, every village and it is going into every farmer's house in Ontario. It is the cheapest supply of electrical energy in the world to-day, and it is owned by the people of Ontario. But these people in Montreal are constantly harping about this and they say that Ontario has made a great mistake; that Adam Beck has in some way humbugged the people. I happen to know many of the public men of this country. I knew Sir John A. Macdonald, I knew Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I have sat in this House for a long time; and of all the public men that I have met in the affairs of this country, two outstanding men in connection with Ontario's affairs are Sir William Meredith and Sir James Whitney. These two men, early in their career, saw this question coming up, and Sir James Whitney, who happened to be Premier of Ontario, had the courage to meet Adam Beck and to say to him: "Adam Beck, all right, I will give you a chance. You must be square with me and carry out this undertaking." The authority was given him, as well as the money, and he made a great success of the enterprise. And to-day the glory of Ontario and the source of its development is this great supply of hydro-electrical energy for power, for light, and for the domestic convenience of every citizen of the province. It has proved a marvellous success despite the fact that it is cursed and damned in all parts of Canada, and especially in the United States, and for the same reason that the National Railways have been anathematised. In an English story I was reading the other day, I came across a character who was designated the Beaver because of the fact that, like that animal, he was always "damning." Now, there are a lot of "beavers" in this country; they are all the time damning, and they are damning particularly public ownership, morning, noon and night. But in spite of all that they may say against it public ownership will vindicate itself.

I want to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to another great instance of the success of public ownership which is the surprise of the world to-day. It is not quite in Canada in connection with the National Railways nor is it to be found in Ontario in connection with the hydro-electric development that has taken place in that province. No; the greatest example of public ownership in the world to-day is the national reserve bank system of the United States which is absolutely under public control. Congress has forced all national banks in that country into membership in the national reserve system, and they are all successful in that co-operation. They are all glad to be in it although they were all "beavers" at the time of its origination. They are glad, I say, to be in it and they are proud of its success. And what is behind that system that makes it the hope of the world to-day and a possible solution for the difficulties of the nations? It is the interest which the government of the United States has taken in it; that government has backed it up with immense accumulation of capital and its supply of gold. The national currency which it issues is given to the banks throughout the United States for the purpose of developing their commerce and industry and enterprises of various kinds. And they have not lost a dollar thereby. This, I say, is the greatest example of public ownership the world has known; and moreover, it is entirely successful. We may have to have the same thing in this country, and Montreal is getting alarmed. Indeed, warning has already gone out to beware of this menace of national banking. I should think that Winston Churchill, now Chancellor of the Exchequer in Great Britain, if he were desirous of getting out of his troubles, might very well avail himself of the present opportunity to create a great national reserve bank system with headquarters in Canada. It would be a great source of assistance to him, it would involve no danger to Canada, and it would help us in a large measure to solve the problem of reparations.

I was surprised that my hon. friend (Mr. Marler) did not say that his great grievance was public ownership of national railways. But it seems to me a waste of time for anybody to condemn public ownership. All highways in the country are under the control of the public; the public controls education and the administration of justice, in that it has to maintain these services; and it has many other public services and utilities under its ownership. Yet, if one were to heed the statements of gentlemen in Montreal, it is a great mistake that all these things should be under public control. For my own part, I regard it as a matter for congratulation that the principle of public ownership is spreading, and in view of that fact it seems to me that Montreal must be prepared to change its attitude.

My hon. friend dealt with the tariff and things of that kind. There is a good deal to be said for some kind of co-operation, and as there is a diversity of interests throughout the country we must consider these things. And we shall, in time. But I think that first of all Montreal must change its attitude in regard to public ownership. The people there do not believe in the development of the St. Lawrence waterway either; they think that the seaport of Canada must remain at the mouth of the St. Lawrence. But some of us in the west think that the St. Lawrence development will go on, and that even Toronto and Buffalo, Detroit and Cleveland and Duluth, will be seaports. Montreal, however, will not listen to that; it has already denounced the proposition in regard to the development of the waterways, apparently because it is afraid of national ownership or international development in that respect. In regard to some of the things which the hon. member said about the tariff and all that, I agree that there should be some consideration of the questions he has brought up, and undoubtedly the five sections into which he divides the country must meet and talk these things over and make concessions one to another. Probably something will be accomplished that way, but it will take some time. What the remedy is I will not suggest to-night; I cannot do that. We have industries which we must protect; and in that connection one is reminded that in free trade England the pronounced tendency to-day is the anxiety to safeguard home industries. That is the very question which is before us in Canada at the present time. They are talking that way in England and the idea may grow with them. Under these conditions we cannot afford to destroy our industries; we must retain them, and I believe that the people of the west will yet be reasonable in that matter.

This is all I have to say to-night on this point. We are going to have a debate on the fiscal policy of the country a little later and I intend on that occasion to state my views. But my main object to-night is to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to a certain incident that has happened within the last few days and touching which I am preparing myself for a discussion in which I must take a part, probably on Monday: I refer to the question of the constitution of Canada. The greatest attack that has been made on Canada has been made within the last few days in the judgment which has been delivered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in connection with the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act passed in this House seventeen years ago. The constitution of Canada is being shot to pieces by the decisions of the Judicial Committee in Great Britain. Now as a Canadian I am here to protest against that decision and against the fact that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England can shoot holes in our constitution. They have a right to interpret the British North America Act, and probably they are fair in their interpretation, but I would direct the attention of the House to their decision. I am not going to read the whole of it, but I want to have it placed on Hansard so that it will form a basis for the discussion that will take place on Monday next, when I am told my motion to give Canada the right to make and amend her constitution will be reached. The judgment is reported as delivered by Viscount Haldane, with whom were associated Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson, Lord Wrenbury, and Lord Salvesen. It begins in this way:

It is always with reluctance that their Lordships come to a conclusion adverse to the constitutional validity of any Canadian statute that has been before the public for years as having been validly enacted, but the duty incumbent on the judicial committee, now as always, is simply to interpret the British North America Act and decide whether the statute in question has been within the competence of the Dominion parliament under the terms of section 91 of that act.

The judgment continues:

The particular exercise of legislative power with which their Lordships are concerned is contained in a well-known act, passed by the Dominion parliament in 1907, and known as the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

This is the concluding paragraph.

As the result of consideration, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that they ought humbly to advise the sovereign that the appeal should be allowed, and that judgment should be entered for the appellants for the declaration and injunction claimed.

That is, seventeen years after this act was passed the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declares it ultra vires. Well, if the people of Canada after seventeen years' experience are to have a law set aside like that—and for fifty-seven years somebody has been shooting holes in the British North America Act—they do not know where they are ... and it is time to bring this sort of thing to an end. My object to-night in putting this judgment on Hansard is to let the people know that the Dominion has no more to do with its constitution than the man in the street that this parliament can be told any day of the week that it has acted ultra vires. We cannot get along under a constitution of that kind. I am a 100-per cent Canadian when that issue comes up. My position is that we are no longer in tutelage, we are the equal of the Mother Country, and being her equal we have the right to make our own constitution; and with that right we have also the absolute right to set up our own supreme court for the interpretation of that constitution. And we are going to have our own constitution. England is ready to give us the privilege. I am not blaming England; I am blaming Canada, I am blaming this parliament that for fifty-seven years has allowed this state of affairs to continue. I am going to appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)—they may not answer me to-night, but they will have to answer me when the question comes up on Monday—to state that Canada should have the absolute right to make her own constitution and to have it interpreted in her own courts. As I have said, England is prepared to give us that right. More recently created dominions have been given the right to amend their constitutions and to do certain things in connection therewith, under restrictions. South Africa in a measure has that power, but most of all Australia has it. I have a book on the subject—I will probably use it on Monday—from which it appears that Australia can make her own constitution and change it whenever she likes. South Africa is moving in the same direction. We shall be granted the same power if we have courage to ask for it.

We are a confederation. The greatest confederation known to the world to-day is the United States, and the outstanding feature in their constitution is the right of the people, under due restrictions to prevent precipitate action, to amend it. Congress can amend the constitution, and any state can initiate a movement for the same purpose, and in that way they have built up the greatest supreme court in the world. I say that with all respect to the courts of England. They have made wonderful progress in constitutional law. We have got to do the same thing. We are not going to have to submit our constitution to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for interpretation. They know very little about us, they do not care very much for us, they are concerned chiefly with England; and while I have great respect for the judges who gave the judgment which I have quoted from, I think they are probably obscured by the mists of Glasgow and the coy trivialities of Edinburgh. We can deal with these questions much better in our own country; in fact, the only place to deal with them is in Canada. Do you know that the people of England have a remarkable constitution? Wait until I tell you what the powers of the British parliament are. I quote a few lines from Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice:

The legislative authority of parliament extends over the United Kingdom, and all its colonies and foreign possessions; and there are no other limits to its power of making laws for the whole empire than those which are incident to all sovereign authority—the willingness of the people to obey, or their power to resist.

The British constitution is the greatest in the world to-day. The British parliament can repeal the Magna Charta, can alter the succession to the crown, can disestablish the Church of England, can do anything it likes, and that by a single act of parliament. We cannot do anything like that, but we ought to have the freedom here in Canada to make our own constitution or to change it as we like. England is prepared to give us that power, but so far our parliament has not had the courage to ask for it. We have let the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council make our constitution.

Now, I want this judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council put on the record for to-day so that the people of Canada may see it. One of the ministers told me it was the intention to have it published, but that does not quite give the public access to it. I want the newspapers to publish it; I want the people to be able to get their copies of Hansard to-morrow and see this judgment therein. So far as the judgment itself goes, I cannot say it is wrong, and I concede the uprightness and the ability of the judges of the judicial committee. But I want the people of Canada to settle these things, not the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The great value of being able to interpret our constitution right here at home is this: If there is anything wrong or anything unfair it can be corrected here—it cannot be corrected in an English court.

Somebody may say, "But what about the appeal to the foot of the Throne? Well, whom does this appeal to the foot of the Throne chiefly concern? It concerns minors and natives. It is the Indian of Canada who takes credit out of the fact that he has the right to appeal to the foot of the Throne. Do you think the people of Canada have got to appeal to the foot of the Throne to have the rights that they ought to have constitutionally? Why, we are treated as colonials—that is what we are called, and we deal with the Colonial Office. How much longer shall we have to do that? True, they have gone so far in England as to say that hereafter they will deal with us through the Foreign Office. Perhaps that is a step up, but I do not even agree with that. The constitution of Canada should be made in this country and should be interpreted by the courts of this country. Moreover, it must be enforced in Canada, and if it is wrong it must be corrected by the Parliament of Canada.

Having said that and having got it on the record, I shall be prepared on Monday next, when my proposal in this connection comes up in the House, to discuss it at greater length and to give my reasons why I think this anomaly must cease. I hope there will never be another decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council concerning the interpretation of the constitution of Canada. I believe the interpretation will be here and the correction of it will be here. I believe that when the question is fully discussed a cure will come. In fact, I am confident that an announcement will come from England any day that Canada has only to ask the right to make and to mend her own constitution and it will be readily granted to her.

Motion (Sir Eugene Fiset) agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, seconded by Mr. Macdonald (Pictou), it was ordered that the Address be engrossed and transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this House as are of the honourable the Privy Council.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (for the Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House will on Friday next resolve itself into a committee to consider the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (for the Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House will on Friday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

REPORT ON, AND ACTION CONCERNING NORTH ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP COMBINE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That 800 copies in English and 200 copies in French, of the report of W. T. R. Preston in respect to the North Atlantic steamship combine, laid on the table of the House on the ninth instant, be printed forthwith for distribution to senators and members; and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to ask if at the same time the government would table the contract with the firm that has been referred to in the press?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a bill to be brought down, and when the bill is brought down I assume the request of my hon. friend will be met. I would like first to have an opportunity of conferring with the minister in regard to the matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The only reason I point that out is that we will understand the report very much better when we see how effect is given to it.

GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That 425 copies in the English language and 75 copies in the French language of the report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission, laid on the table of the House on Monday, the ninth of February, 1925, be printed forthwith for distribution to senators and members; and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In view of the conclusion of the debate on the Address, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What will be the business to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will follow the order paper. Possibly my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) would be prepared to go on with his resolution.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I have already made an arrangement with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to go ahead on Monday. I am certainly ready to go on to-morrow, but I do not think the notice of motion is on the order paper for to-morrow. I would like to ask Mr. Speaker about that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We may reach it by that time.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am ready to go on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before we get away from that question, has my hon. friend tabled the estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The estimates will be tabled to-morrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 6.07 p.m.

Privy Council Appeal No. 99 of 1924

The Toronto Electric Commissioners, Appellants

v

Colin G. Snider and others, Respondents and

The Attorney-General of Canada and The Attorney-General of Ontario, Interveners from

The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, delivered the 20th January, 1925.

Present at the Hearing:

Viscount Haldane, Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson, Lord Wrenbury, Lord Salvesen.

[Delivered by Viscount Haldane.]

It is always with reluctance that their lordships come to a conclusion adverse to the constitutional validity of any Canadian statute that has been before the public for years as having been validly enacted, but the duty incumbent on the Judicial Committee, now as always, is simply to interpret the British North America Act and to decide whether the statute in question has been within the competence of the Dominion parliament under the terms of section 91 of that act. In this case the Judicial Committee have come to the conclusion that it was not. To that conclusion they find themselves compelled, alike by the structure of section 91 and by the interpretation of its terms that has now been established by a series of authorities. They have had the advantage not only of hearing full arguments on the question, but of having before them judgments in the courts of Ontario, from which this appeal to the Sovereign in Council came directly. Some of these judgments are against the view which they themselves take, others are in favour of it, but all of them are of a high degree of thoroughness and ability.

The particular exercise of legislative power with which their lordships are concerned is contained in a well-known act, passed by the Dominion parliament in 1907, and known as The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. As it now stands it has been amended by subsequent acts, but nothing turns, for the purposes of the question now raised, on any of the amendments that have been introduced.

The primary object of the act was to enable industrial disputes between any employer in Canada and any one or more of his employees, as to "matters or things affecting or relating to work done or to be done by him or them, or as to the privileges, rights and duties of employers or employees (not involving any such violation thereof as constitutes an indictable offence)," relating to wages or remuneration, or hours of employment; sex, age or qualifications of employees, and the mode, terms and conditions of employment; the employment of children or any person, or classes of persons; claims as to whether preference of employment should be given to members of labour or other organizations; materials supplied or damage done to work; customs or usages, either general or in particular districts; and the interpretation of agreements. Either of the parties to any such dispute was empowered by the act to apply to the Minister of Labour for the Dominion for the appointment of a board of conciliation and investigation, to which board the dispute might be referred. The act enabled the Governor in Council to appoint a registrar of such boards, with the duty of dealing with all applications for reference, bringing them to the notice of the minister, and conducting the correspondence necessary for the constitution of the boards. The minister was empowered to establish a board when he though fit, and no question was to be raised in any court interfering with his decision. Each board was to consist of three members, to be appointed by the minister, one on the recommendation of the employer, one on that of the employees, and the third, who was to be chairman, on the recommendation of the members so chosen. If any of them failed in this duty the minister was to make the appointment. The department of the Minister of Labour was to provide the staffs required. The application for a board was to be accompanied by a statutory declaration showing that, failing adjustment, a lockout or strike would probably occur.

The board so constituted was to make inquiry and to endeavour to effect a settlement. If the parties came to a settlement the board was to embody it in a memorandum of recommendation which, if the parties had agreed to it in writing, was to have the effect of an award on a reference to arbitration or one made under the order of a court of record. In such a case the recommendation could be constituted a rule of court and enforced accordingly. If no such settlement was arrived at, then the board was to make a full report and a recommendation for settlement to the minister, who was to make it public.

The boards set up were given powers to summon and to enforce the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths and to call for business books and other documents, and also to order into custody or subject to fine, in case of disobedience or contempt. The board was also empowered to enter any premises where anything was taking place which was the subject of the reference and to inspect. This power was also enforceable by penalty. The parties were to be represented before the board, but no counsel or solicitors were to appear excepting by consent and subject to the sanction of the board itself. The proceedings were normally to take place in public.

By section 56 of the act, in the event of a reference to a board, it was made unlawful for the employer to lockout or for the employees to strike on account of any dispute prior to or pending the reference, and any breach of this provision was made punishable by fine. By section 57, employers and employed were both bound to give at least thirty days' notice of an intended change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours. In the event of a dispute arising over the intended change, until the dispute had been finally dealt with by a board and a report had been made, neither employers nor employed were to alter the conditions, or lockout or strike, or suspend employment or work, and the relationship of employer and employee was to continue uninterrupted. If, in the opinion of the board, either party were to use this or any other provision of the act for the purpose of unjustly maintaining a given condition of affairs through delay, and the board were so to report to the minister, such party was to be guilty of an offence and liable to penalties.

By section 63 (a), where a strike or lockout had occurred or was threatened, the minister was empowered, although neither of the parties to the dispute had applied for one, to set up a board. He might also, under the next section, without any application, institute an inquiry.

Whatever else may be the effect of this enactment, it is clear that it is one which could have been passed, so far as any province was concerned, by the provincial legislature under the powers conferred by section 92 of the British North America Act. For its provisions were concerned directly with the civil rights of both employers and employed in the province. It set up a Board of Inquiry which could summon them before it, administer to them oaths, call for their papers and enter their premises. It did no more than what a provincial legislature could have done under head 15 of section 92, when it imposed punishment by way of penalty in order to enforce the new restrictions on civil rights. It interfered further with civil rights when, by section 56, it suspended liberty to lockout or strike during a reference to a board. It does not appear that there is anything in the Dominion act which could not have been enacted by the legislature of Ontario, excepting one provision. The field for the operation of the act was made the whole of Canada.

In 1914 the legislature of the province of Ontario passed a Trade Disputes Act which substantially covered the whole of these matters, so far as Ontario was concerned, excepting in certain minor particulars. One of these was the interference in the Dominion act with the right to lockout or strike during an inquiry. This was not reproduced in the Ontario act. Another difference was the necessary one that the operation of the Ontario act was confined to that province, instead of extending to other parts of Canada. It was, of course, open to the legislatures of the other provinces to enact similar provisions, and some of them appear to have done so.

Subject to variations such as these there is, in the Ontario act, little alteration in substance of the provisions of the Dominion statute. The Lieutenant-Governor of the Provincial Council, instead of the Minister of Labour, appoints the registrar. There are to be set up two different kinds of statutory council, one of conciliation, the four members of which are to be nominated by the parties, the other a council of arbitration, consisting of three members, two of whom are to be appointed by the lieutenant-governor of the province on the recommendation of the parties, and the third, the chairman, to be nominated by the lieutenant-governor on failure of the parties to agree and name. The mayor of any city or town in the province, on being notified that a strike or lockout is impending, may inform the registrar of the fact, and a council of arbitration may then be empowered to inquire and to mediate. Unless there is an agreement by one or both of the parties, in which case the award of the council may be enforced as on an arbitration, there is no power given to suspend the right to strike or lockout.

It is clear that this enactment was one which was competent to the legislature of a province under section 92. In the present case the substance of it was possibly competent, not merely under the head of property and civil rights in the province, but also under that of municipal institutions in the province. For the appellants are incorporated, by the province, a public utility commission within the definition in chapter 204 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1914, relating to the constitution and operation of works for supplying public utilities by municipal corporations and companies, and are employers within the meaning of the Ontario Trade Disputes Act already referred to. Their function is to manage the municipal electric light, heat, and power works of the city of Toronto.

The primary respondents in this appeal are the members of a board of conciliation appointed by the Dominion Minister of Labour under the act first referred to. There was a dispute in 1923 between the appellants and a number of the men whom they employed, which dispute was referred to the first respondents, who proceeded to exercise the powers given by the Dominion act. The appellants then commenced an action in the Supreme Court of Ontario for an injunction to restrain these proceedings, on the allegation that the Dominion act was ultra vires. The Attorneys-General of Canada and of Ontario were notified and made parties as intervenants.

There was a motion for an interim injunction, which was heard by Orde J., who, after argument, granted an injunction till the trial. The action was tried by Mowat J., who intimated his dissent from the view of the British North America Act, taken by Orde J., who was co-ordinate in authority with him, according to which view the Dominion act was ultra vires. He, therefore, as he had power by the Provincial Judicature Act to do, directed the action to be heard by a divisional court, and it was ultimately heard by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario (Mulock C. J., Magee, Hodgins, Ferguson and Smith J. J. A.). The result was that by the majority (Hodgins J. A. dissenting) the action of the appellants was dismissed.

The broad grounds of the judgment of the majority, which will be referred to later on, was that the Dominion act was not a law relating to matters as to which section 92 conferred exclusive jurisdiction, but was a law within the competence of the Dominion parliament, inasmuch as it was directed to the regulation of trade and commerce, throughout Canada, and to the protection of the national peace, order and good government, by reason of (a) confining, within limits, a dispute which might spread over all the provinces; (b) informing the general public in Canada of the nature of the dispute; and (c) bringing public opinion to bear on it. The power of the Dominion parliament to legislate in relation to criminal law, under head 27 of section 91, was also considered to apply.

Before referring to these grounds of judgment their lordships, without repeating at length what has been laid down by them in earlier cases, desire to refer briefly to the construction which, in their opinion, has been authoritatively put on sections 91 and 92 by the more recent decisions of the Judicial Committee. The Dominion parliament has, under the initial words of section 91, a general power to make laws for Canada. But these laws are not to relate to the classes of subjects assigned to the provinces by section 92, unless their enactment falls under heads specifically assigned to the Dominion parliament by the enumeration in section 91. When there is a question as to which legislative authority has the power to pass an act, the first question must therefore be whether the subject falls within section 92. Even if it does, the further question must be answered, whether it falls also under an enumerated head in section 91. If so, the Dominion has the paramount power of legislating in relation to it. If the subject falls within neither of the sets of enumerated heads, then the Dominion may have power to legislate under the general words at the beginning of section 91.

Applying this principle, does the subject of the legislation in controversy fall fully within section 92? For the reasons already given their lordships think that it clearly does. If so, is the exclusive power prima facie conferred on the province trenched on by any of the over-riding powers set out specifically in section 91? It was, among other things, contended in the argument that the Dominion act now challenged was authorized under head 27, "the criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters." It was further suggested in the argument that the power so conferred is aided by the power conferred on the Parliament of Canada to establish additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

But their lordships are unable to accede to these contentions. They think that they cannot now be maintained successfully, in view of a series of decisions in which this board has laid down the interpretation of section 91 (27) in the British North America Act on the point. In the most recent of these cases, that of the Reciprocal Insurers ([1924] A.C. 328, at p. 342), Mr. Justice Duff stated definitely the true interpretation, in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee. Summing up the effect of the series of previous decisions relating to the point, he said:

"In accordance with the principle inherent in these decisions their lordships think it is no longer open to dispute that the Parliament of Canada cannot, by purporting to create penal sanctions under section 91, head 27, appropriate to itself exclusively a field of jurisdiction in which, apart from such a procedure, it could exert no legal authority, and that if, when examined as a whole, legislation in form criminal is found, in aspects and for purposes exclusively within the provincial sphere, to deal with matters committed to the provinces, it cannot be upheld as valid."

In the earlier Board of Commerce case ([1922] A.C. 191) the principle to be applied was laid down in the same way. It was pointed out that the Dominion had exclusive legislative power to create new crimes "where the subject matter is one which, by its very nature, belongs to the domain of criminal jurisprudence." But "it is quite another thing, first to attempt to interfere with a class of subject committed exclusively to the provincial legislature, and then to justify this by enacting ancillary provisions, designated as new phases of Dominion criminal law, which require a title to so interfere as the basis of their application."

Their lordships are of opinion that, on authority as well as on principle, they are to-day precluded from accepting the arguments that the Dominion act in controversy can be justified as being an exercise of the Dominion power under section 91 in relation to criminal law. What the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, which the Dominion parliament passed in 1907, aimed at accomplishing was to enable the Dominion government to appoint anywhere in Canada a board of conciliation and investigation to which the dispute between an employer and his employees might be referred. The board was to have power to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel the production of documents. It could under the act enter premises, interrogate the persons there, and inspect the work. It rendered it unlawful for an employer to lockout or for a workman to strike, on account of the dispute, prior to or during the reference, and imposed an obligation on employees and employers to give thirty days' notice of any intended change affecting wages or hours. Until the reference was concluded neither were to alter the conditions with respect to these. It is obvious that these provisions dealt with civil rights, and it was not within the power of the Dominion parliament to make this otherwise by imposing merely ancillary penalties. The penalties for breach of the restrictions did not render the statute the less an interference with civil rights in its pith and substance. The act is not one which aims at making striking generally a new crime. Moreover, the employer retains under the general common law a right to lockout, only slightly interfered with by the penalty. In this connection their lordships are therefore of opinion that the validity of the act cannot be sustained.

The point was also put in a somewhat different form. It was said that the criminal law of Canada was in its foundation the criminal law of England as at 17th September, 1792; that, according to the criminal law of England as at that date, a strike was indictable as a conspiracy; that, consequently strikes were within the ambit of the criminal law; and that, as a law either declaring strikes illegal as at common law, or making them illegal would be a proper enactment of the criminal law, so, though this is rather a non sequiter, it was only a branch of that law to enact provisions which should have the effect of preventing strikes coming into existence.

It is not necessary to investigate or determine whether a strike is per se a crime according to the law of England in 1792. A great deal has been said on the subject and contrary opinions expressed. Let it be assumed that it was. It certainly was so only on the ground of conspiracy. But there is no conspiracy involved in a lockout; and the statute under discussion deals with lockouts pari ratione as with strikes. It would be impossible, even if it were desirable, to separate the provisions as to strikes from those as to lockouts so as to make the one fall under the criminal law while the other remained outside it; and, therefore, in their lordships' opinion this argument also fails.

Nor does the invocation of the specific power in section 91 to regulate trade and commerce assist the Dominion contention. In Citizens Insurance Company v Parsons (7 A.C., at p. 112) it was laid down that the collocation of this head (No. 2. of section 91), with classes of subjects enumerated of national and general concern, indicates that what was in the mind of the Imperial legislature when this power was conferred in 1867 was regulation relating to general trade and commerce. Any other construction would, it was pointed out, have rendered unnecessary the specific mention of certain other heads dealing with banking, bills of exchange and promissory notes, as to which it had been significantly deemed necessary to insert a specific mention. The contracts of a particular trade or business could not, therefore, be dealt with by Dominion legislation so as to conflict with the powers assigned to the provinces over property and civil rights relating to the regulation of trade and commerce. The Dominion power has a really definite effect when applied in aid of what the Dominion government are specifically enabled to do independently of the general regulation of trade and commerce, for instance, in the creation of Dominion companies with power to trade throughout the whole of Canada. This was shown in the decision in John Deere Plow Company v Wharton ([1915] A.C., at p. 340). The same thing is true of the exercise of an emergency power required as on the occasion of war, in the interest of Canada as a whole, a power which may operate outside the specific enumerations in both sections 91 and 92. And it was observed in the Alberta case, in reference to attempted Dominion legislation about insurance, that it must now be taken that the authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not extend to the regulation, for instance, by a licensing system, of a particular trade in which Canadians would otherwise be free to engage in the provinces (see [1916] 1 A.C., at p. 596). It is, in their lordships' opinion, now clear that, excepting so far as the power can be invoked in aid of capacity conferred independently under other words in section 91, the power to regulate trade and commerce cannot be relied on as enabling the Dominion parliament to regulate civil rights in the provinces.

A more difficult question arises with reference to the initial words of section 91, which enable the parliament of Canada to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in matters falling outside the provincial powers specifically conferred by section 92. For Russell v The Queen (7 A.C., 829) was a decision in which the Judicial Committee said that it was within the competency of the Dominion parliament to establish a uniform system for prohibiting the liquor traffic throughout Canada excepting under restrictive conditions. It has been observed subsequently by this committee that it is now clear that it was on the ground that the subject matter lay outside provincial powers, and not on the ground that it was authorized as legislation for the regulation of trade and commerce, that the Canada Temperance Act was sustained (see the Alberta case [1916] 1 A.C., at p. 595). But even on this footing it is not easy to reconcile the decision in Russell v The Queen with the subsequent decision in Hodge v The Queen (9 A.C., 117) that the Ontario Liquor License Act, with the powers of regulation which it entrusted to local authorities in the province, was intra vires of the Ontario legislature. Still more difficult is it to reconcile Russell v The Queen with the decision given later by the Judicial Committe that the Dominion licensing statute, known as the McCarthy Act, which sought to establish a local licensing system for the liquor traffic throughout the Dominion, was ultra vires of the Dominion parliament. As to this last decision it is not without significance that the strong board which delivered it abstained from giving any reasons for their conclusion. They did not in terms dissent from the reasons given in Russell v The Queen. They may have thought that the case was binding on them as deciding that the particular Canada Temperance Act of 1886 had been conclusively held valid, on the ground of fact that at the period of the passing of the act the circumstances of the time required it in an emergency affecting Canada as a whole. The McCarthy Act, already referred to, which was decided to have been ultra vires of the Dominion parliament, was dealt with in the end of 1885. Ten years subsequently another powerful board decided the case of Attorney-General for Ontario v Attorney-General for the Dominion and the Distillers' and Brewers' Association ([1896] A.C., 348). Lord Herschell and Lord Davey, who had been the leading counsel in the McCarthy case, sat on that board, along with Lord Halsbury, who had presided at it. In delivering the judgment, Lord Watson used in the latter case significant language:—

"The judgment of this board in Russell v Regina has relieved their lordships from the difficult duty of considering whether the Canada Temperance Act of 1886 relates to the peace, order and good government of Canada in such a sense as to bring its provisions within the competency of the Canadian parliament."

That decision, he said, must be accepted as an authority to the extent to which it goes, namely, that

"The restrictive provisions of the Act of 1886, when they have been duly brought into operation in any provincial area within the Dominion, must receive effect as valid enactments relating to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

The board held that, on that occasion, they could, not inconsistently with Russell v The Queen, declare a statute of the Ontario legislature establishing provincial liquor prohibitions, to be within the competence of a provincial legislature, provided that the locality had not already adopted the provisions of the Dominion act of 1886.

It appears to their lordships that it is not now open to them to treat Russell v The Queen as having established the general principle that the mere fact that Dominion legislation is for the general advantage of Canada or is such that it will meet a mere want which is felt throughout the Dominion, renders it competent if it cannot be brought within the heads enumerated specifically in section 91. Unless this is so, if the subject matter falls within any of the enumerated heads in section 92, such legislation belongs exclusively to provincial competency. No doubt there may be cases arising out of some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada, as a whole, such as the cases arising out of a war, where legislation is required of an order that passes beyond the heads of exclusive provincial competency. Such cases may be dealt with under the words at the commencement of section 91, conferring general powers in relation to peace, order and good government, simply because such cases are not otherwise provided for. But instances of this, as was pointed out in the judgment in the Fort Frances Pulp case ([1923] A.C., 695), are highly exceptional. Their lordships think that the decision in Russell v The Queen can only be supported to-day, not on the footing of having laid down an interpretation, such as has sometimes been invoked of the general words at the beginning of section 91, but on the assumption of the board, apparently made at the time of deciding the case of Russell v The Queen, that the evil of intemperance at that time amounted in Canada to one so great and so general that at least for the period it was a menace to the national life of Canada so serious and pressing that the national parliament, was called on to intervene to protect the nation from disaster. An epidemic of pestilence might conceivably have been regarded as analogous. It is plain from the decision in the Board of Commerce case that the evil of profiteering could not have been so invoked, for provincial powers, if exercised, were adequate to it. Their lordships find it difficult to explain the decision in Russell v The Queen as more than a decision of this order upon facts, considered to have been established at its date rather than upon general law.

The judgments in the courts below express differing views. Orde J. granted an interim injunction, restraining the first respondents from interfering with the business of the appellants and from entering on their premises, or examining their works or employees, and from exercising their compulsory powers as a board of conciliation and investigation under the Dominion Act, and from interfering with the property and civil or municipal rights of the appellants. He held that the Dominion legislation interfered with provincial rights under section 92 in a fashion which could not be supported under any of the enumerated heads in section 91, and therefore could not be sustained by invoking the general words with which that section commences. The decision in the Fort Frances Pulp case (ubi supra) afforded no analogy on which such a contention as this last could be based.

Mowat J., dissenting from this reasoning, referred the trial of the action to a divisional court. He thought that the legislation in question was a matter of national importance, dealing with a subject which affected the body politic of the Dominion, as in Russell v The Queen (ubi supra).

In the Appellate Division, Mulock, C. J., Smith, J. A., and Magee, J. A., concurred in the judgment delivered by Ferguson, J. A. That learned judge held that the act in question was not, "in its pith and substance," an act relating to merely provincial matters falling within section 92, but related to industrial disputes which might develop into disputes affecting, not only the immediate parties, but the national welfare, peace, order and safety. He cited the analogy of the Australian Constitution Act, which, by section 51, placed such disputes within the competence of the Australian parliament when they extended beyond the limits of any single state. He was of opinion that, even if the Dominion legislation actually interfered with provincial powers, it might be supported if necessary as dealing with the interests of the peace, order and good government of Canada, but he thought that it was not necessary to go further in point of principle than to treat Russell v The Queen (ubi supra) as showing that, where an abnormal condition in a great emergency demanded it, the parliament of Canada might legislate for such a case without even trenching on the powers allocated to the provinces under section 92. He also thought that the act was not one to control or regulate contractual or civil rights, but that its object was to authorize inquiry into conditions or disputes, and that the prevention of crimes, the protection of public safety, peace and order, and the protection of trade and commerce, were of its pith and substance and paramount purpose. The act could also be supported as Dominion legislation under the over-riding enumerated heads of section 91, as being legislation in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce, and also to the criminal law.

Hodgins, J. A. dissented. In his view, industrial strife was nothing more than the result of an undesirable use of the civil right to cease work in the operation of various businesses. The argument in support of the act was practically an endeavour to invent a new field, which was only a department or development of one of those exclusively possessed by provincial legislatures. Nor was the matter made better by the contention that the act, when examined in the light of the evidence adduced, dealt with a subject which transcended provincial limits and was of Dominion importance. It was, no doubt, true that owing to the highly organized methods of modern labour, strikes might spread and extend to other businesses. This might happen, and the state of things might conceivably reach a height in which it became comparable to war, famine or rebellion, and justify Dominion action. But on the only facts proved, in the learned judge's view, this act could not be supported as dealing with a case of (1) emergency, or (2) general Canadian interest and importance, or (3) with a power conferred under any of the enumerated heads in section 91. No great national emergency was shown to have existed when the statute was enacted in 1907, or to have occurred since, and the statute was not framed so as to come into operation only when such emergency arose. The statute was further not framed so as to confer the drastic powers that would be necessary in such a case, but was based on the normal working of industrial relations which often required time and patience and some restraint, if dislocation was to be avoided. It was essentially a relative measure. The special and exceptional conditions of emergency required by the judgments in the Board of Commerce and Fort Frances Pulp cases (ubi supra) did not appear to him to have existed in point of fact. So far as anticipations of changes in the future were concerned, Hodgins, J. A. thought that the question was whether regulation of civil rights or invasion of property rights in the fashion provided by the act, in order to bring about a uniform and desirable method of dealing with industrial disputes, admirable as its purpose might be, could be valid in view of the exercise of the powers given to the provinces. That the provinces had such powers, as complete as those in this act given to the Dominion, he entertained no doubt. Several provinces had on their statute books legislation of much the same kind. Even granting the national importance of the question, the whole success of this method of dealing with it depended on the capacity to seize on local disputes and their conditions, and to manage the exercise of civil rights in relation to them. The circumstance that the dispute might spread to other provinces was not enough in itself to justify Dominion interference, if such interference affected property and civil rights. The province in the present case was simply the scene of municipal action. As the result of his consideration of the principles laid down for the interpretation of the British North America Act, the learned judge was of opinion that the act could not stand.

Their lordships have examined the evidence produced at the trial. They concur in the view taken of it by Hodgins, J. A. They are of opinion that it does not prove any emergency putting the national life of Canada in unanticipated peril such as the board which decided Russell v The Queen may be considered to have had before their minds.

As the result of consideration, their lordships have come to the conclusion that they ought humbly to advise the sovereign that the appeal should be allowed, and that judgment should be entered for the appellants for the declaration and injunction claimed. There should be no costs, either of this appeal or in the courts below and any costs paid under the judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court ought to be repaid.

The House met at three o'clock.

BEREAVEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. SPEAKER: Before I proceed with the Orders of the Day, I desire to offer my sincere thanks to the House of Commons for its kind expression of condolence on the occasion of my recent bereavement.

REPORT

Fifty-seventh Annual Report of the Fisheries branch of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.—Hon. Mr. Cardin.

DIVORCE

EQUALITY OF GROUNDS FOR RELIEF AS BETWEEN THE SEXES

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, respecting Divorce.

He said: The sole object of this bill is to give the wife a right to secure a divorce from her husband upon the same grounds upon which a husband may secure a divorce from his wife. As hon. members may know, in the four western provinces, whereas a husband can secure a divorce from his wife on the ground of adultery only, yet a wife, under the existing law, must not only prove adultery, but in addition, either desertion for a period of two years, or cruelty. The purpose of this bill is to remedy this inequality.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSIONS OF MOUNTED POLICE VETERANS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): Owing to the fact that statements have been appearing in the press in regard to the pensions of the old veterans of the mounted police, which statements have not been confirmed in any way, I desire to ask the Minister of Justice if steps are really being taken to overcome the very serious handicap under which these old veterans are suffering.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): In reply to my hon. friend I say, yes.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEEDINGS TAKEN BY INADVERTENCE EXPUNGED—DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS CONTINUES

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I regret being under the necessity of calling the attention of the House to an occurrence in this Chamber last evening at six o'clock. A special order, being a motion by the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset), was under debate. The speaker was the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). The whips had arranged that the debate be continued by one of the hon. members to my left, I believe the hon. member for Lennox and Addington (Mr. Sexsmith). At six o'clock, during the speech of the hon. member for South York, the Deputy Speaker who was in the chair declared it six o'clock, but did not pursue the matter further. Having so declared it the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who, at my request was leading this side of the House, rose and left the chamber. The hon. member for South York continued with a very few words, two or three sentences and closed his address. The Deputy Speaker thereupon asked him if he was through, and on receiving a reply in the affirmative, put the motion. I parenthetically add that the words of the Deputy Speaker declaring it six o'clock do not appear in the Hansard record. This is the more strange because I am in a position to state that the Hansard reporters heard the words. I do not understand why they are not in the records. However, that difficulty does not arise, because the Deputy Speaker has very frankly stated that he did just as I have said, and as many hon. members heard. This ended the debate on the Address irregularly. When the matter came to my attention and the facts were fully disclosed to me, I of course realized that no default whatever had occurred from our side of the House. I am not ascribing fault to any side of the House; certainly there was none here on the part of any officer or any member. I called the matter to the attention of the Deputy Speaker, and, having done so, suggested to him that he lay the facts before the Prime Minister and express to him my view that it was the duty of the Prime Minister under the circumstances to move that the order be restored. I am glad to say that the reply of the Prime Minister, which the Deputy Speaker brought to me, was in the affirmative —that he would feel it his duty so to act. I do not go further at the moment, save to say that I have no doubt the Deputy Speaker should not, under the circumstances, have put the motion. That seems very manifest indeed. I do desire to comment on the fairness with which he received the subject since and his disposition to have the error corrected. I simply make this statement of the facts preparatory to the motion which I believe the Prime Minister intends to make.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reference to the remarks of my hon. friend, I might give the House the impression I had at the time of adjournment last evening. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) was speaking at six o'clock. As I recall, it was, as stated, just six o'clock as his address was obviously being concluded; when he concluded, the Deputy Speaker, being in the chair at the time, looked around to see if any hon. member intended to follow. No one in the house rising, and no exception being taken, the Deputy Speaker then asked the House if he should put the motion, and it was put with due deliberation. Personally I had not heard any mention by the Deputy Speaker of its being six o'clock. I do not question for one moment the word of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) that the Deputy Speaker may have used the words "six o'clock". The Deputy Speaker himself, undoubtedly knows whether he did or not. But I did not hear any mention of six o'clock, although I may say to the House that it certainly was six o'clock before my hon. friend for South York (Mr. Maclean) concluded. When he concluded, the Speaker, as I have said, put the motion. He put it very deliberately, and he paused. There were present in the House hon. members representing all groups, and no one present took any exception. As I sized up the situation at the moment, it was that all hon. members who desired to speak had already spoken. I had understood earlier in the day that there were to be no further speeches from this side of the House and that the number of speeches that might be made from the other side would probably be determined by whether or not there were additional speeches from this side. I concluded that the debate was ended and of course took no further notice other than to observe the procedure which seemed to me perfectly regular on the part of the Speaker, bearing in mind that very frequently the House, when it is concluding a piece of business, does run a few minutes past the hour indicated by the clock and further bearing in mind that the Chair in the matter of the time makes formal reference to the hour, as regards which, as I say, I had not as yet heard any formal declaration made.

The government, have no desire in any way to restrict the debate, much less to deprive any hon. member of an opportunity of participating therein. It seems to me that the matter is one entirely for your own determination, Mr. Speaker, as to what the rules of the House may permit. I do not recall having made any agreement to make a motion. That subject, as far as I can recollect, was not discussed; but if that is the correct method of proceeding, I would be quite prepared to proceed in that way. I would, however, point out, that I should not care to take any action that would have the effect of rescinding the proceedings or that in any way might alter or adversely affect the conclusion of the debate. It is for Your Honour to rule as to the action that should be taken. I would hope that it might be possible to consider the proceedings of yesterday after six o'clock as being in the nature of an inadvertence and to let us proceed with the debate on the Address on that assumption, but that Mr. Speaker is a matter upon which the government is entirely in the hands of Your Honour.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed any further on this subject I rise to a point of order. Rule 19 states:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the House, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

It must be quite obvious to anyone that nothing can be done except by way of motion. This was fully understood by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) when he mentioned a minute ago that he expected the Prime Minister to make a motion. I submit, on my point of order, that even the Prime Minister cannot make a motion at the present time to rescind the vote that was taken yesterday. All that could be done by any member of this House including the Prime Minister would be to give a notice of motion with two days' notice according to rule No. 40. Under rule No. 40 notice of motion can be given to the effect that after two days the House will consider the question of rescinding this vote. The vote cannot be altered; it cannot be qualified; it has to remain just as it is now or it can be rescinded.

Rule 19 states quite plainly:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the House, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

Therefore, there can be no comment on a vote. There can be no explanation given on the motion, but the vote can only be rescinded purely and simply. Should the vote be rescinded purely and simply after due notice has been given, what would be the consequence? As I see it, the consequence would be that the motion of the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) would be defeated. The Votes and Proceedings read as follows:

> And the question being put on the said motion, it was agreed to.

If you rescind this, in my opinion it will mean that the question being put to the said motion, it was disagreed to. Can this be done? Can this motion be entertained? That would be a matter for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, but at the present time my point of order is that no motion can be entertained unless due notice has been given and then, after due notice has been given, these different points which I have just mentioned can be raised at the proper moment.

Mr. G. N. GORDON (West Peterborough, Deputy Speaker): Mr. Speaker, in your absence owing to bereavement in your family, I was delegated to take Your Honour's place in the chair, and it might, perhaps, be well if I said a few words as to the incident mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and very fairly stated by him and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). There were left with the government whip the names of Messrs. Evans, Marler and Maclean (York) as the speakers of yesterday afternoon, and those speakers were the ones that I expected to address the House, as they did, yesterday afternoon. At six o'clock, or nearly six o'clock, I followed the habit of Your Honour and former Speakers, where an hon. member is addressing the House, to remind him that it was six o'clock, and I said to the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean): Six o'clock. He immediately sat down and I asked him if he had finished his address because, if he had not finished his address, I intended to declare that it was six o'clock and also to declare my intention of leaving the chair so that he might resume at eight o'clock. He said that he had finished his address at that time. As the Prime Minister said, I thereupon looked over the House to see if any other hon. member indicated his intention of going on, and finding none I called to the Clerk for the motion and I read it to the House. The misunderstanding and confusion have arisen owing to the fact that when I was reminding the hon. member for South York that he had reached the six o'clock period, some members assumed that that was a declaration from the Chair that it was six o'clock and the debate had not been terminated. Among those who left the chamber at that time was the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who was leading his party on that occasion. The reason for Hansard not hearing what was said was because I intended to address the words more particularly to the hon. member for South York and, while doubtless many members heard me, maybe the reporter did not. There has been some confusion; I have since learned that it was assumed by the acting opposition whip that one of the members of the Progressive group intended to speak yesterday, and it was assumed that opposition members would have an opportunity after eight o'clock of continuing the debate. In order to put myself quite clearly before Your Honour and this House, I have the list which was submitted and handed to me by the government whip and which contains the names of those who were to address the House, the names being submitted to him by the other whips. The same list was used by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and there is no doubt that this is the same list, only three names being on it. Under those circumstances, I submitted the Address of acceptance and thanks moved by the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset). It happened that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre left the chamber about the time that he heard me suggest to the hon. member for South York that it was six o'clock, assuming, I think, that I was about to leave the chair and the debate would continue at eight o'clock. I saw the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) in his place yesterday when I was reading the motion to the House, or shortly after, and I assumed that he was leading the opposition and knew what the situation was.

As I afterwards learned, he had come in in the meantime, just as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) was leaving, and it is more than probable that he was also under a misapprehension as to what had taken place. The leader of the opposition represented the facts to me and I immediately communicated with the Prime Minister, explaining the incident as it had developed. Thereupon the Prime Minister intimated that he was willing to restore the matter to its former status so far as it was within his power to do so, speaking on behalf of himself and the government. The statements of the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, set forth the facts exactly as they occurred. In making this statement, Mr. Speaker, my purpose is simply to acquaint Your Honour with the situation precisely as it developed, in order that you, Sir, may be in a position properly to understand and pass upon the questions involved.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): What the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Gordon) has said is practically my own recollection of the matter; after I had concluded my speech I took my seat, and that is all recorded in Hansard. But I did also hear that the understanding was that other speakers would follow me; as a matter of fact, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) informed me that he understood the debate was to continue. Now, probably no harm has been done, the occurrence being the outcome of a misunderstanding, the consequences of which it is for His Honour the Speaker to dispose of.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): I think it is quite clear that the situation which has arisen has arisen entirely as a result of inadvertence, and there seems to be a disposition on the part of every hon. member who has mentioned the subject to right the wrong if a wrong has been done in the matter. It is obvious that, under the rules the Deputy Speaker, who last evening occupied the chair at six o'clock, would have no right at all to put the question when he did. Rule 3, which is the one that applies to the House sitting beyond six o'clock, is very explicit on the point:

> If at the hour of six o'clock p.m., except on Wednesday, the business of the House be not concluded, Mr. Speaker leaves the chair until eight o'clock.

The meaning of that rule is, in my opinion, that at six o'clock it is the bounden duty of the Speaker to leave the chair unless the business is concluded; he would have no power to put the question except by unanimous consent of the House. I have heard it stated by Speakers in this House that unanimous consent is not to be presumed or assumed; it must be asked. And, so far as I am aware, no request was made yesterday that unanimous consent be given to the question being put after six o'clock. That is admitted. My point, therefore, is that the hour of six o'clock having arrived, as is admitted on all hands, the duty of the Deputy Speaker under the rules was to leave the chair. I can quite understand that he would not leave the chair if in doing so he would interrupt the remarks of any hon. member who was about to conclude at the time. The inadvertence and the error into which the House fell last evening was simply this, that instead of following the rule governing the procedure in this connection, the Deputy Speaker proceeded—without asking the consent of the House—to put the question. There is no doubt about the fact that nobody expected the question to be put yesterday afternoon. I am informed that the whips had notice that other speakers intended to take part in the debate, though I believe the names had not been communicated to the Deputy Speaker. But neither had there been any intimation to the Deputy Speaker, as I understand that there was any intention that the debate should close yesterday afternoon. So far as the Deputy Speaker knew, the list before him included the names of those who would speak yesterday afternoon, and he had no intimation that there would not be other speakers in the course of the evening. Now, this question can be righted, as we have righted so many of our technical errors in this House in the past: all that is needed is the unanimous consent of the House. In every quarter of the House it is agreed that the present incident is the result purely of inadvertence and not of intention, and the mistake can and should be rectified by consent of the House.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Owing to an engagement, I had to leave the House yesterday about ten minutes to six, so that I am not acquainted with what took place at that time, although I have no doubt that the explanation which has been made by the Deputy Speaker is perfectly correct. A careful reading of Hansard does not disclose that there was anything irregular in the proceedings. With reference to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie), who has just spoken, I would offer this observation. In all the time I have sat in this House, invariably the calling of six o'clock was purely a technical affair; it never meant six o'clock by the clock: it always was six o'clock when the Speaker from the chair so declared. That is what I have always understood. So far as the debate is concerned, I must say that I was astonished to see, on taking up the newspaper this morning that the leaders of the House had agreed, upon being consulted, that by means of a motion or in some other way the debate should be re-opened. When it was learned that the debate had closed, I think there must have been a sigh of relief wherever the fact was made known.

Mr. McMASTER: That is all very well for those who have already spoken.

Mr. FORKE: Well, so far as that goes, I think that probably before this session is over my hon. friend will have had his share of speaking in the House. And as regards those hon. gentlemen who have not spoken, I am sure that there is no subject which can be referred to in this debate that hon. members will not have had ample opportunity, before prorogation comes, to cover in other debates. I have listened to debates in this House on the budget which were largely a repetition of speeches that had been made on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I have no desire to appear contrary, but I do believe that it would be in the interests of the country if the debate were allowed to stand closed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I appreciate the spirit in which this debate has been carried on, and the pertinence of all remarks anent the question raised. I cannot fail to express my surprise that the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) should have so utterly failed to grasp the principle at stake as to seek to cover the discussion over with a lot of irrelevant talk about how long the debate should continue. The question is this: Is advantage to be taken of an inadvertence on the part of the Chair—because it is there that the inadvertence occurred—to shut off the speeches of hon. members? If the debate is to be discontinued, I have a higher opinion of the House than to think that this will be done because some hon. members who have spoken do not want to listen to those who have not. I should have preferred the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to concur with the Deputy Speaker in the understanding that he was to move the rescission of the motion which has been agreed to. The Prime Minister has stated that he is ready to do so if the Speaker holds this to be proper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was no understanding that I should make such a motion; at least I was not a party to that understanding.

Mr. MEIGHEN: However, he has stated that he is quite ready to do so if the Speaker holds that it is within the rules of the House. I am quite satisfied with that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was no understanding that I would make a motion. At any rate I was not consulted in regard to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was the information brought me by the Deputy Speaker.

Mr. GORDON: The Prime Minister stated that he would be glad to assist in any way to put the matter right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not what you said at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You said to me that a motion would be made to restore the order, because that was my suggestion to the Deputy Speaker. I am stating the facts.

However, the point is not worthy of further discussion for the reason that the Prime Minister has stated his willingness to do whatever is within his power to get rid of this awkward situation. I suggest that inasmuch as the Deputy Speaker's declaration was undoubtedly that six o'clock had arrived, the Deputy Speaker thereafter had no right to initiate any further proceedings on the part of the House, and that therefore any such proceedings are null and void. Hon. members had a right to assume once those words had escaped his lips that nothing further would be done; and having assumed that they left the House. There is no doubt that whatever was done after six o'clock was done without authority, and I am sure that all hon. members who want the rules of parliament to be lived up to, who want the fight to be carried on in a fair way between the parties, would never dream of objecting to a ruling on the part of the Chair that what followed after the declaration of the Deputy Speaker was null and void, and at best an inadvertence, and that we proceed just as we were when that declaration was made.

Mr. VIEN: Will the right hon. gentleman explain why the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who was leading his party then, did not object to all the motions which were carried thereafter?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for West York was not in the House at all. He arrived after the motion was being put to engross the Address. The only one at the time entitled to speak for the opposition was the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who had been left by myself in charge. He remained until the declaration by the Chair. The hon. member for West York arrived after that. Not being acquainted with the situation or having any instructions from me, he would have no authority to speak for the opposition.

Mr. VIEN: Surely there were some members of the opposition present to raise the question then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member did not listen to me. Any member cannot speak for the whole opposition; he can speak only for himself, unless he is deputed to lead his party. The one deputed by me was the member for Vancouver Centre. On the declaration of the Chair he left the chamber, so there was nobody in authority to speak for the opposition. And nobody would be called upon to speak for we had the right to assume that after that declaration no more business would be transacted. We did assume it; our members left. I am sure that of all men the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) would never suggest that anything valid should be held to have been done after that. There is no difficulty in the way of remedying the error; no precedent is going to be established that will embarrass anyone, for such a situation after the declaration of the Chair would never arise again. This suggestion meets the ends of justice, and I sincerely hope no hon. member of the House would object to its being carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think, Mr. Speaker, that if we continue the debate on this point we shall occupy as much time as if we had resumed the debate on the Address. It has been made apparent that the Deputy Speaker had mentioned that it was six o'clock, and that no one in the House had any intention of proceeding other than in accordance with the rules. The rule is that at six o'clock the Speaker leaves the chair. In view therefore of what took place last night after six o'clock the House having proceeded inadvertently, I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will find it possible not to take cognizance of what was then done and allow the debate on the Address to continue in the regular way.

Mr. SPEAKER: This puts me in a very awkward position. When I looked at the Votes and Proceedings this morning I saw that the House adjourned at six o'clock last night; but the Deputy Speaker with characteristic frankness has declared this afternoon that the House was really adjourned after six o'clock. If I were dealing with this matter from the point of view of the letter of the rules of the House, I would be placed in a very awkward position, as I stated a moment ago, because the House could not but rescind the proceedings which took place yesterday after six o'clock, and this is a very grave course to take. If hon. members will refer to Bourinot—my guide in this matter—at page 328 of the fourth edition, they will find the following:

Renewal of a Question During a Session

When a motion has been stated by the Speaker to the House, and proposed as a question for its determination, it is then in the possession of the House, to be decided or otherwise disposed of according to the established forms of proceeding. It may then be resolved in the affirmative or passed in the negative; or superseded by an amendment, or withdrawn with the unanimous consent of the House. It is, however, an ancient rule of parliament. . . .

And this is what I wish to emphasize——that "no question or motion can regularly be offered if it is substantially the same with one on which the judgment of the House has already been expressed during the current session." The old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the House."

It is on this that rule 19, cited by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis), has been based.

On the other hand I cannot forget that the rules of our parliament are based on common sense and on the broad principle of freedom of speech. Now, it is admitted by the Deputy Speaker, and by both sides of the House that a technical error was made; that after six o'clock the House continued sitting; and that someone was to continue the debate this afternoon on the main motion as moved by the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) seconded by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Hanna). If I should follow the letter of the rule, a motion would have to be made under rule 19 to rescind the decision of the House agreed to yesterday. However, I have it deep in my memory that, during the thirty years that I have sat in this House with my good friend the member for South York (Mr. Maclean), time and again when a technical error was brought to the notice of the Speaker, by unanimous consent, that error was expunged from the proceedings of the House. And if a motion should be made this afternoon to expunge from the Votes and Proceedings, and therefore from the scroll, the proceedings which by inadvertence, took place yesterday after six o'clock, I would accept the motion, provided of course it received unanimous consent. For the objection by the hon. member for Joliette is well taken; by rule 40 notice has to be given for any such motion. But by rule 41 notice can be waived by unanimous consent.

I therefore, rule that under these circumstances, a motion to expunge from the proceedings the error which was made inadvertently yesterday after six o'clock is in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) will join with me in this motion by seconding it, I shall have much pleasure in moving:

That this House agrees that all the proceedings which took place after six o'clock on Thursday, the 12th instant, having been the result of inadvertence are declared void and ordered to be expunged from the Journals of the House.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will that impose on me the making of another speech?

Mr. FORKE: I would just like to say, Mr. Speaker, that in view of your explanation I will support the motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Thursday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Sir Eugene Fiset for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted that I have the floor. I will simply say this: My main object in speaking yesterday was to prepare in substance, a brief for the motion I have on the order paper under Notices of Motion. I have got that brief; it is on Hansard today, and I will conclude my speech of yesterday by saying that I endorse all I said then and will endorse it on another occasion.

Mr. T. E. SIMPSON (West Algoma): Mr. Speaker, now that the motion has been properly restored to the order paper we can proceed with the discussion of the Speech from the Throne.

The Speech from the Throne is usually looked forward to with a great deal of interest, not only by the members of this House but by the country generally, because it is expected that it will forecast the principal items of legislation that the government purpose bringing before parliament for consideration during the session. I regret that in the Speech of this year no reference has been made to legislation that would tend to relieve the overburdened taxpayer or that would have a tendency to encourage the investment of capital in this country and thus provide employment for the many who are now out of work.

It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to deal briefly with the general conditions in the iron and steel industry of this country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his address a few days ago was pleased to cite the iron and steel industry as an index of business prosperity and general conditions prevailing in the country. I would first like to refer, however, to one or two statements contained in the Speech from the Throne.

There is a reference to the improved conditions and to the favourable balance of trade. Now, a favourable balance of trade is desirable, particularly if it has been obtained by the sale or export of the finished product of the farm, the forest, the mine or the sea; but not always so if it has been obtained by the sale of our raw materials to be manufactured in another country and subsequently returned to us in the form of finished products. You will find by a study of the trade returns for the calendar year 1924 that the exports of that year exceeded the exports of the calendar year 1923 by some $43,113,624, and that increase consisted entirely of raw material—or unfinished products—exported. A favourable balance of trade obtained in that way is not always a safe barometer of business conditions.

Reference is made in the Speech to the cost of living as the most important matter engaging the attention of the ministers at the present time. Well, it was the most important, next to winning the general election, that engaged the attention of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) in 1921. They were particularly concerned about the overburdened taxpayer at that time, and they referred to the leader of the government and the members of the government of that day as those who, in carrying on the affairs of the country during the period of the war, had become so accustomed to thinking in millions that it was difficult for them to get down to the consideration of matters on an ordinary basis, and that the only hope for the poor suffering man with a family was a change of government. Well, we had the change of government. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power now for over three years, but still there is no relief. Let me quote from figures published in the supplement to the Labour Gazette of January, 1925. I find there the figures of a family budget, covering staple foods, fuel, lighting and rent, and being retail prices prevailing in sixty cities throughout the Dominion. We find that in April, 1922, a few months after this government came into office, and before they had an opportunity of affecting the prices one way or the other, the index price given for the weekly family budget was $20.66, whereas in December, 1924, the index price was $20.90, showing the cost of living still going higher, and the government still looking for the remedy.

We also find in the Speech from the Throne this statement:

> The cost of production of raw materials and the necessaries of life has been lessened by the reductions in the tariff and the sales tax effected at the last session.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the chief reductions that I have been able to find are reductions in the national revenue, reductions in the output of our manufacturing establishments, and a reduction in the pay cheque of the average citizen. But let us compare this statement in the Speech with the figures provided by the Bureau of Statistics covering the wholesale prices of 238 commodities. The index price given for May, 1924, just at the time the budget was adopted, was 150·6, while for January, 1925, we find the index price is 165·2, an increase of almost 15 points, so that statement in the Speech from the Throne is effectually answered by the government's own figures and requires no further comment on my part.

The Prime Minister in his address a few days ago quoted a mass of statistics in an endeavour to convince the House and the country that business conditions in Canada were more favourable than those in the United States. He stated:

> I submit that if my right hon. friend (the leader of the opposition) takes the trouble to compare the statistics in this country with the statistics which I have just quoted from authentic sources in the United States he will find that, having regard to the tremendous influences which conditions in the country to the south have upon conditions in Canada, our showing is considerably the better.

If that is so, why is it that the government have found it necessary to spend no less a sum than $9,000,000 in the past three years in order to induce 322,000 immigrants to come to this country, while during the same period the United States had to rigorously enforce their quota law in order to keep out those who were clamouring for admittance at their door? Why was it necessary for upwards of 600,000 Canadians during the same period to cross the border to the United States, if it was not for the purpose of finding there employment which was denied them at home? Sir Wilfrid Laurier once stated that it was not necessary for him to quote statistics showing the amount of deposits in the savings banks or a favourable balance of trade in order to convince the people of the prosperity of the country. All you have to do, he said, is to feel in your pocket, Mr. Speaker, you cannot camouflage the issue by a mass of statistics. Everybody knows that Canada today is not enjoying the prosperity that a country blessed with our natural resources should be enjoying. And what is the trouble? In my opinion the chief trouble is that we are exporting altogether too much of our natural resources in the raw or unfinished state, and we are importing altogether too much of the products that we could successfully produce at home. Why should it be necessary for a country like Canada, to import, as we did in 1924, over $25,000,000 worth of fruit, almost $5,000,000 worth of vegetables, large quantities of butter, meats, eggs and cheese, all of which with the possible exception of a few articles of fresh fruit, could have been produced equally as well at home and with material profit to the farmer?

Let me turn now to the iron and steel industry. The Prime Minister in his address the other day stated that the condition of this basic industry could be taken as a fair index of the prosperity of the country. He said:

> I pointed out that in gauging the industrial situation, economists have always had particular regard to the basic industries, and that the iron and steel industry is usually regarded as the most significant. The figures that I gave the House indicated, I think, conclusively how very considerable had been the falling off in the production of the basic industries of the United States during the period I mention and in particular the falling off in the production of iron and steel.

Now let me quote from the monthly report on the production of iron and steel in Canada for December, 1924, as furnished by the Bureau of Statistics. That report shows that the total production of pig iron in Canada in 1924 was 593,024 gross tons, a decrease of 33 per cent from the 880,018 tons of 1923. In the United States the production of pig iron in 1924 was about 31,000,000 tons, or about 22 per cent less than in 1923. You will observe that the falling off in the production of pig iron was considerably greater in this country than in the United States. At the same time we imported upwards of $140,000,000 of steel and steel products into this country, a great portion of which could have been successfully manufactured here. During the very same period our own steel industries were closed down from five to eight months in the year.

I am going to quote from an interview given by the vice-president of the British Empire Steel Corporation, an institution that received a very severe castigation at the hands of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) who, I regret, is not in his seat at the moment. Just before quoting from that interview I want to say in connection with the figures given by the hon. member for Saskatoon, particularly those with reference to the bounty that had been paid to the iron and steel industry, that while I do not dispute his figures as to the amount of bounty paid, I think they leave a very unfair impression if other figures are not placed alongside of them. I propose to give other figures showing the amount that this country has received in customs duties and in taxes from some of these industries that received the bounty. The only figures I have available are those applying to 1916, 1917 and 1918, a three-year period, and they apply to four of the steel companies operating at that time, the Algoma Steel Corporation, the Steel Company of Canada, the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, and the Nova Scotia Steel Company, the latter two being now included in the British Empire Steel Corporation. They paid into the public treasury of this country in customs duties and war taxes in that three year period no less a sum than $7,793,000, half as much as the total amount that was paid to the steel industries by the way of bounty, and they have been operating for the last twenty years; so that it is only natural to assume that they returned by way of customs duties and taxes to the Dominion treasury very much more than they have received by way of bounty. That is not all. During the three-year period they paid out in freights no less a sum than $25,890,000. They paid in wages during that three year period $71,775,000, employing on an average 20,000 men, and I think hon. members will agree at once that industries that are contributing in such large measure as that to help in the upkeep of our railways in this country and in the employment of labour should not be subjected to the castigation that my hon. friend gave the British Empire Steel Corporation the other day.

I was going on to read an interview of the vice-president of the British Empire Steel Company, Mr. J. E. McLurg, to show the condition in which these steel industries are at the present time. This was an interview given on June 27, at Sydney. He said:

> Two batteries of coke ovens will be operating until July 15, after which one battery only will be operated. Blast furnaces No. 1 and No. 8 will operate on basic iron until July 15, when No. 1 furnace will be blown out and No. 8 will be operated on foundry pig iron from July 15 to July 21. All open-hearth furnaces will operate to capacity until July 15, when they will cease operations. The blooming mill, billet mill, rod, bar, wire and nail mills will operate until July 19, when all orders on hand and tonnage for stock will be completed. Ample stocks are being carried and adequate arrangements have been made to fill and ship any and all orders received while the plant is shut down.
> The above programme means that after July 19 the entire plant will be closed down with the exception of one battery of coke ovens and No. 8 blast furnace for three months at least.

And as a matter of fact it was closed down for considerably longer. I see one of the members representing that constituency, the government whip (Mr. Kyte) is in his seat, and I am sure he will verify what I have said. But the most unfortunate part of this interview is the following:

> This protracted shut down makes necessary the reduction of idle expense to the absolute minimum and for this reason only, we are forced to dispense with the services of a considerable number of valued salaried employees to whom notices are being sent, advising them that their services will be no longer required after July 31.

The conditions prevailing down in that section have been such that it was found necessary to send a very large and influential delegation—

Mr. MURDOCK: May I ask a question? Does the hon. member suggest that the laying off a large number of salaried officials of the British Empire Steel Corporation was a result of the fact that they did not have as large orders as usual, or a result of the fact that the company had been overmanned in its official capacity for many years?

Mr. SIMPSON: In reply to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, I may say it is quite evident they did not require the high-salaried officials when they were closing their plant. They did not have the orders and they did not have the business.

Mr. MURDOCK: It was for one reason or the other, my hon. friend will admit. I have the personal word of Mr. McLurg as to what the reason was, and I would like to give it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MURDOCK: I would like to know what my hon. friend's opinion is.

Mr. SIMPSON: I have given the facts as I received them. I do not live there. I am giving the interview of the vice-president of the company. I was going to say that a very important delegation came up from that locality to lay the situation before members of the government, and I have no doubt the Minister of Labour was there to receive the delegation. I believe several members supporting the government were in the delegation, and I only hope that before this debate concludes these hon. members will rise and tell the House and the country what they stated to the government at that time. The vice-president of the same company had occasion to be in Ottawa at the national conference on unemployment held in September, at which my hon. friend the Minister of Labour presided, and according to the report this is what he had to say with respect to conditions in Sydney at that time:

> Our plants are closed down; our blast furnaces are idle; our open hearth furnaces are cold since fifth day of August, and instead of employing 3,200 men in our steel plant in Sydney we have to-day between six and seven hundred men employed.

What I have said with respect to conditions at Sydney can be said with respect to conditions at Sault Ste. Marie, where the Algoma Steel Corporation operate. The greater portion of their plant was closed down in June last year and they have not resumed operations. When they are operating to full capacity they employ 3,500 men. During the past eight months they have been employing in the neighbourhood of 800 men and the period of this shut down is the longest that they have experienced in the last twenty years. There are, Mr. Speaker, twenty blast furnaces in the Dominion of Canada, and at the present time only three of these blast furnaces are blown in, or in operation; and up until a few weeks ago, there were only two. The one in Sydney was blown in a few weeks ago, if my information is correct.

Now what is the cause of this depression? It is largely due to the fiscal policy of the government.

Mr. MURDOCK: The same comparative condition is in effect in the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MANION: That is why all our people are running over there for work.

Mr. MURDOCK: Not on your life.

Mr. SIMPSON: I gave the figures a short time ago showing the production of steel in the United States last year as compared with the year before, and I also gave the figures showing the production in Canada as compared with the year before. The reduction in the production in Canada was 33 per cent, whereas in the United States it was 22 per cent. Before I finish my remarks I shall give some more figures that will be interesting to the minister.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member will hear some, too.

Mr. SIMPSON: The trouble is that so many articles of iron and steel are on the free list, or subject to a drawback of duty, and that several more articles were added to the list by the tariff changes made by the government in the budget of last session. These are exposing our industries to unfair competition from the more highly specialized industries of the United States and to the industries of Europe where labour conditions are very different from what they are in Canada. Let me quote some figures to the minister to show him what effect the last tariff changes had on the production of pig iron and steel ingot and castings in this country. I will have to quote a number of figures in order to get the matter properly placed on Hansard, because I have to give the figures month by month during the last year in order to show the proper camparison.

Production of Pig Iron in Canada, 1923 and 1924, by Months

Month	1923 Long tons	1924 Long tons
January	41,000	64,000
February	44,000	60,000
March	65,000	77,000
April	84,000	84,000
May	102,000	85,000
June	99,000	57,000

The budget changes were beginning to have their effects:

Month	1923	1924
July	82,000	45,000
August	93,000	23,000
September	75,000	23,000
October	74,000	29,000
November	62,000	23,000
December	60,000	23,000

The production of steel ingots and castings in long tons was as follows. The minister will have an opportunity of reading these in the monthly report of the Production of Iron and Steel in Canada for December, 1924, published by the Department of Trade and Commerce:

Production of Steel Ingots and Castings, in Canada, 1923 and 1924, by Months

Month	1923 Long tons	1924 Long tons
January	48,000	41,000
February	46,000	71,000
March	89,000	95,000
April	93,000	104,000
May	104,000	108,000
June	96,000	69,000
July	74,000	52,000

You see the effect of the tariff changes coming right along.

Month	1923	1924
August	105,000	23,000
September	66,000	18,000
October	67,000	20,000
November	55,000	23,000
December	41,000	26,000

That should be conclusive evidence of what effect the tariff changes of last session have had on the production of iron and steel in this country. The Prime Minister was very strong in quoting from the Iron Age in the statistics that he presented to the House the other day. I desire to place on Hansard one quotation from the Iron Age, from the issue of 29th January, 1925:

> Why does the iron and steel industry in Canada languish? This is a question of importance and the Toronto representative of the Iron Age was requested to make an investigation and report, especially as to whether the frequent reductions in tariff rates had had any effect on the prosperity of the industries in the Dominion.
> Mr. Sanderson's investigations and report show that the tariff, or rather lack of it, has had a very important effect, not only in reducing production but in causing many workmen to leave Canada for the United States, where employment conditions have been more satisfactory. Canadian iron and steel industry is experiencing severe competition from many directions. The action of the government in connection with its budget for 1925 is awaited with interest.

The answer, I presume, they will get from the government in that connection is that the government is pausing just now before giving any further consideration to tariff reductions.

Let me turn to another phase of this question, and that is the development of iron ore. That is one way in which some encouragement and assistance might be given to the steel industry of this country, not so much affecting the British Empire Steel Corporation as the other steel industries of Canada. Such a great basic industry as the iron and steel industry of this country should not be dependent upon foreign countries for its raw material. We have in Canada vast deposits of iron ore, millions and millions of tons. These have been actually proven up and are known to exist. They have been proven to exist by diamond drilling through the enterprise and ingenuity of private capital. It is a well known fact that these bodies of ore are of low grade and that they require certain treatments before they are merchantable or fit for blast furnace use. Here again private capital has entered in and after the expenditure of large sums of money it has been discovered that these ores can be successfully treated, impurities removed, the iron content increased, and an ore produced that will produce as good steel as is being manufactured to-day. A few years ago the Ontario government, then the Drury government, appointed a committee of practical men to study and investigate the whole situation and to make a report to the government as to what, in their opinion, should be done. This committee made an exhaustive study of the whole situation both in Canada and the United States, and I am going to read just a few sentences from their report:

> That whereas there is a gap between the cost at which Canadian iron ore can be mined under present conditions and the price that Canadian smelters can afford to pay and market their product, and this condition will continue to exist unless assurance is given that aid will be available to an extent that will warrant the erection of the necessary beneficiation plants, and that such aid will be received and when earned during the years these mines are developing tonnage in sufficient quantities to carry their overhead and operate economically. They recommend that the provincial and Dominion governments aid to the extent of one cent per unit of iron, on each long ton of merchantable iron ore, natural or beneficiated, produced and actually marketed from Ontario deposits, and that such bounty be available to producers of merchantable iron ore for a period of ten years.

They state further:

> We are of the unanimous opinion that one-half of the bonus recommended should be provided by the Dominion government.

And they cite the following reasons:

> (2) The colonization of northern Ontario is largely dependent upon the mining industry, and that portion bordering the non-productive sections of our National Railways is dependent largely upon our iron resources.
> (3) Largely increased traffic may be obtained for the National Railways from domestic productions of iron ore, and perhaps it would not be unreasonable to suggest that the profit to be made by our publicly-owned railway would, in the gross, equal, and in time exceed the proposed Dominion share of the bounty.

This is the recommendation of a committee of experts. Following their report, the present government of Ontario at their last session passed the necessary legislation to provide their portion of the bounty. This government was asked to take similar action but has not yet done so. I would strongly urge upon the ministry the necessity of dealing with this important matter during the present session. Surely if we have money to spend in subsidizing a large steamship line to operate in competition with the merchant marine we should be able at least to consider this proposal for the development of our own resources.

One other matter which I desire to touch upon is the question of our pulpwood resources. I expect that an opportunity will be given later in the session to go into this matter fully and therefore I shall be brief on this occasion. Last year there was exported from this country some 1,330,250 cords of pulpwood for which we received $13,536,038, a little over $10 per cord. If that quantity of pulpwood had been manufactured into newsprint before it was exported we should have received, at the rate of $70 per ton for that product, approximately $65,000,000, or over $50,000,000 in excess of what we received for the raw wood.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What proportion of that $13,000,000 did the actual producer receive?

Mr. SIMPSON: A considerable portion of that money was taken up in freights, transportation charges and so on, and the actual producer would not receive, I suppose, more than $3.50 to $5.50 a cord, net.

Mr. BELAND: Do I understand the hon. member to say that the farmer who produces the wood received last year only some $3 per cord for his pulpwood? My information is far different.

Mr. SIMPSON: I cannot answer the question very definitely. The price is usually so much per cord at the mill. If the farmer or settler cutting the wood lived any considerable distance from the mill, the freight rate might be so high as to reduce his actual price to as low as $3 or $4 a cord.

Mr. BELAND: One would have thought that the total which the hon. gentleman has quoted was exclusive of freight.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member, I think, has given the export figures, including freight in Canada.

Mr. BELAND: Would it include freight in Canada? I should not have thought so. At all events, I know that people in my district who are selling pulpwood received last year $9 a cord and even as high as $12.

Mr. SIMPSON: That is quite true, but that was the price at the mill; the price quoted at the mill was from $10 to $12.

Mr. BELAND: No, at the station.

Mr. SIMPSON: That is not my understanding.

Mr. BELAND: That is the fact in my district.

Mr. SIMPSON: Now, two remedies have been suggested, one an embargo on the export of pulpwood, and the other an export tax. An objection which is worthy of careful consideration has been raised to the embargo, namely, that it would restrict the market of the settler for the wood he has to sell. It is contended that if the settler had not an opportunity of selling his wood to the American purchaser he would be forced to take any price which the local pulp and paper manufacturers might care to offer him. That of course is something that would have to be carefully guarded against, but in my opinion the provincial legislatures should have ample authority to cope with such a situation. The pulp and paper manufacturers have timber limits leased from the provinces and I do not see why some provision could not be made with these manufacturers to pay the settler a fair market price for his product. But just so soon as there is talk of an embargo there comes a noise from the newspaper publishers and the pulp and paper manufacturers of the United States, and we are told that if we went ahead and imposed an embargo it might have a tendency to disrupt the friendly relations that have so long existed between the two countries. Well, Uncle Sam did not stop to ask any questions of Canada before enacting the Fordney tariff; he did not consult us before raising the tariff on wheat to 42 cents a bushel and the duty on hay from $2 to $4 a ton. He did not consult us, and we are not here to consult the interests of the newspaper publishers or the pulp and paper manufacturers of the United States. We are here to look after the interests of Canada, and I hope that this matter will receive the serious consideration of the government.

I have endeavoured to show that this country is not enjoying the prosperity which it should; that the cost of living is not declining; that unemployment is acute; that we are exporting too much of our natural resources in the raw unmanufactured state while continuing to import vast quantities of manufactured products that could profitably be manufactured here. What is the remedy; I know that all will not agree with me in this. My Progressive friends will say: The remedy is free trade. The government will say: The remedy is free trade but we want to pause occasionally as we go along towards it. But I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that what this country needs is an increase in the customs tariff equal to that of the United States. Give the people of this country an even break, whether they be working on the land or whether they be working in the factories, and then you will soon see the dawn of prosperity returning to Canada.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I propose to deal briefly with some of the questions suggested by the Speech from the Throne. Before doing so, however, I desire to congratulate the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) upon the speech which he delivered yesterday. The hon. gentleman always deals with a subject comprehensively, exhaustively and fairly. We may not always agree with his conclusions or his deductions, but his speeches always indicate great labour, thorough analysis of the situation, and conclusions based upon that analysis. I agree very largely with what he said in reference to the development of our trade and what is necessary to bring about prosperity in this country, and after listening to him I am persuaded that he must entirely approve of the resolution standing on the order paper in the name of my leader, the leader of the opposition. I know there are other members on the government side who must feel much the same as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. He has invited those of like minds to unsheathe the sword and to stand together in defence of those policies which will make for the upbuilding of Canada, and I have every reason to expect that both he and they by their voices and by their votes will support the leader of the opposition when his resolution comes before the House.

I congratulate the mover (Sir Eugene Fiset) and the seconder (Mr. Hanna) upon their efforts in dealing with the Address. True, the Speech from the Throne does not present anything striking or new except a proposal to subsidize a certain shipping line engaged in north Atlantic transportation. Yet these gentlemen have built up a superstructure of praise and congratulation that must be very flattering to the government.

The debate has already disclosed the fact that the leader of the Labour party in this House (Mr. Woodsworth) has pointed out to the government its complete failure to carry out its programme announced previous to the last election. The leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) has also pointed out that his party expects the government to redeem the promise made on the eve of the general election for a general downward revision of the tariff.

The Speech from the Throne speaks about improved conditions in Canada, and in support of that is cited our large volume of export trade. We all admit that it is creditable, that it is desirable, and that we should do everything in our power to increase the volume of that trade. An examination of our history shows that about the time of confederation our exports were largely of natural products. After the adoption of the protective tariff in 1878 there was a development of manufacturing industries and a steady increase in the export of their output, until to-day I believe our manufactured products are the second largest item in our export trade. The exports of our natural resources consist largely of the products of the farm and the forest. Two thoughts occur to me in this connection. The market for our agricultural products is necessarily a fluctuating one, subject to world conditions, changing from time to time, and therefore uncertain and precarious. The export of our forest products must be approached from another standpoint. We are constantly using up the available supply, and the time may not be far distant when the exhaustion of these vast resources will be in sight. Therefore if we continue recklessly to export our raw materials, nothing but disaster can come to us. It is clear, I submit, to those who have made a study of the question, that the safest course for us to adopt as a nation is to develop our natural resources to the point where they are as nearly completely manufactured as is possible before we export them. That was advocated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

The Speech from the Throne does not make any reference to our national debt—perhaps because the record would not be creditable to the government. Since they attained office, although they condemned, the magnitude of the national debt while in opposition, we find that in the last three years they have increased it by approximately $178,000,000; that is, $128,000,000 of direct liability and about $50,000,000 of indirect liability. The House will see at once why there is no reference in the Speech from the Throne to the public debt.

Nor is there any reference, Sir, to the tax conference which, at the last session, was announced with such gusto by the government as likely to produce permanent and beneficial results to the country. That conference took place—this government is strong on conferences and commissions. It is an easy way to avoid responsibility, temporarily at least, and to delay the solution of a difficult question. We had this taxation conference: it came, it met, it dissolved, and there is no record of any tangible, any visible or any helpful result. That, perhaps, is the reason why no mention of this conference appears in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the unemployment conference?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Another celebrated conference was that on unemployment. The Prime Minister states that conditions in Canada are not as bad as those in the United States. I wonder if the records show that numbers of deputations waited on the government at Washington asking for relief from unemployment, and if those deputations were sent away empty-handed, were referred to the states for assistance in that direction and told that the central government had nothing for them, that it was not their business to look after the unemployed. Surely if anything of that kind occurred in the United States the Prime Minister would have mentioned it in support of his argument that the conditions in the United States are much worse than they are in Canada.

The income tax in Canada has been found so severe and so burdensome that it has practically driven capital out of Canada and caused it to seek investment and employment elsewhere. On a previous occasion I referred to this matter. Surely the taxation conference could have found some relief for the Canadian people who are suffering from the triple burden of federal, provincial and municipal taxation, where there is a great deal of overlapping, particularly in relation to income tax. Let me urge upon the government a reduction of the income tax to bring it more in line with that of the United States, thus preventing the removal of Canadian capital to that country, where it now finds investment under more favourable terms.

The Speech from the Throne recommends increased production. In this connection we must consider the dealings of this government with the tariff, because the tariff is intimately related to production in Canada. What do we find? When the government came into office it was pledged to a general downward revision of the tariff, a pledge on the strength of which, no doubt many votes were obtained in some parts of Canada. At the first session after the government attained office an effort was made in this direction—small, it is true, but heralded as a step in the right direction and in fulfilment of this pledge in the party platform. It is true that the reduction was offset by an additional measure of taxation, by an increase in the sales tax. But in the second session we had the statement from the then Finance Minister that we must have stability in connection with the tariff; that there must be no more reductions for some time. Then at the third session we had a substantial reduction in the tariff, so substantial, indeed, that it has affected many industries in Canada, has closed many factories, caused grievous unemployment and brought about the emigration of many thousands of our people. This session we have no reductions forecast in the Speech from the Throne, as we had last session. We have it from the Prime Minister that there is to be at least a pause in connection with tariff activities. This discloses, Mr. Speaker, a condition of political paralysis on the part of the government so far as tariff matters are concerned; they are so confused that they cannot move in any direction. Worse still, the result has been to produce paralysis on the part of the industries of this country.

The question of increased production in connection with our natural resources may be made the subject of a reference. I wish to deal very briefly with the question of pulpwood, because those of us who live on the banks of the St. Lawrence river have an almost daily illustration of the folly of allowing our raw pulpwood to be exported to and manufactured in the United States. We see the steamers passing by laden with pulpwood; we see great mounds of it piled up on the American shore of the St. Lawrence river. We submit that this wood should be manufactured as far as possible in Canada. The government took to itself the power to place an embargo on the export of raw pulpwood and a commission was appointed to investigate. That commission has reported, but there is no indication in the Speech from the Throne that the government contemplates any action in the matter. What is the reason for this inactivity? How long are the Canadian people going to stand this sort of thing? Why does the government not come down with a policy either one way or the other on this important question? It is said that action on our part would meet with retaliation on the part of the United States. But surely this is a Canadian question. This is a Canadian natural resource, a Canadian asset, and the Canadian people have the right to deal with their own resources as appears to be best in their own interests. It would not be an unfriendly act on the part of Canada to impose an export duty or to place an embargo on the export of pulpwood from this country. A careful reading of the tariff of the United States—indeed, a casual reading of it—clearly shows that it is framed in the interests of the people of the United States and regardless of the interests of the people of Canada. It is high time that the government acted in this matter and that instead of Canada getting the benefit merely of the price of the million or million and a quarter cords of pulpwood we export every year, we should get three times the price if the material is manufactured into pulpwood, and six times the price if manufactured into paper and then exported. A policy of this kind in connection with pulpwood and with our other raw materials would bring about the establishment of new mills, of new factories in Canada; new towns would rise up around those mills, new markets would be created for our Canadian products; labour would be provided for the Canadian people and the flow of emigration from Canada to the United States would be stopped. This policy is so apparent as being necessary to the interests of the Canadian people that one wonders that it has not long since been adopted.

I have said that this Speech is remarkable for what it does not contain. It contains no reference to the tariff. It does contain some vague and indefinite references to economy, but intimates that economy will not solve our taxation problems. An examination of the public accounts and the expenditure for public works must, I think, convince members of this House that the government in this direction at least are not effecting any great measure of economy. In the condition in which we find ourselves, with a mounting public debt, with falling revenues, with our budgets failing to balance, surely we can curtail any and every unnecessary public work and allow them to stand until conditions improve. We will await with interest the bringing down of the estimate in connection with this line of the government's activities and see whether, or not there is any evidence of economy visible there.

There is, however, Mr. Speaker, one field in which I have found evidence of economy, and that is in connection with the pensions of returned soldiers and their dependents. I have had many complaints; in some cases pensions have been discontinued altogether; in other cases they have been reduced, and a great deal of hardship has resulted. I urge upon this government through the responsible Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment that all these reductions and cutting off, of pensions be investigated. I know that the Canadian people desire to discharge their duty to those to whom they owe so much, and to properly care for their dependents, and I sincerely hope that something will be done to restore these pensions that are being cut off, with such hardship to so many people.

Mr. BELAND: I dislike to interrupt my hon. friend, but I may say in this connection that the government is responsible for the cancelling of no pensions in Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The government may not be directly responsible.

Mr. BELAND: Nor indirectly.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It may be done by the Board of Pension Commissioners, but they are responsibible to the government—

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):—and the Canadian people will hold the government responsible for their dealings with the returned soldiers and their dependents. It will not do for the minister or the government to say the responsibility rests upon the Board of Pension Commissioners or some other board or organization. All these boards are creatures of the government and of parliament, and are responsible to parliament for their actions.

Mr. BELAND: I may tell my hon. friend with all due respect that the pension bill for the year is larger than last year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That may be so, but it does not alter the fact that in some cases pensions have been discontinued and in other cases reduced, and that hardship has resulted, and that is the point I desire to press in this connection.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer, and that is the development of hydro-electric power upon the St. Lawrence. This is a great natural resource which must receive attention at an early date at the hands of the government, and let me urge upon the government that immediate action be taken in this connection. This, of course, at once suggests the larger scheme for the deepening of the St. Lawrence, but as to this let me suggest that it can well wait until our finances are in a better shape. The Hydro-Electric Power Commission of the province of Ontario has submitted to this government a plan, and estimates in detail, providing for the development at Morrisburg of a very large volume of hydro-electric power. The commission has made surveys and observations of the St. Lawrence river extending over a period of years, and has expended, I think, at least a quarter of a million dollars in that connection. The plan has been approved by the province of Ontario and has been submitted to this government for its approval. It does not in any way affect or interfere with the larger scheme for the deepening of the St. Lawrence, but on the contrary facilitates and makes in the meantime ample provision for navigation. The supply of hydro-electric power in the western part of Ontario has been very largely over-taken, and there is need for this development in the eastern part of the province to supplement the supply. The work can be undertaken at once without any large cost to the Dominion of Canada, and what I am urging is that the government give its approval to the plan submitted by the Hydro-Electric Commission of the province of Ontario and allow this work to proceed. It may be pointed out, properly enough, that this is a complicated matter, that it involves a conflict of jurisdiction between the province and the Dominion, between the province of Ontario and the state of New York, and between the Dominion of Canada and the government of the United States of America; but all these things have been taken into consideration, and I do not think there can be anything wrong with this plan or anything that will prevent the immediate development of this large volume of power.

5 p.m.

Let me urge that as the larger part of this power belongs to Ontario and to Canada, the control of it be retained in the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, and that it be not handed over to any joint international commission, or any other body that has international jurisdiction Let us preserve in Canada our full share of this supply of power and let us see that it is not exported under any lease, agreement or other arrangement either temporary or permanent. That is the only way to secure in Canada a development to which we are entitled in connection with this great natural resource. This is not a matter for eastern Ontario alone; it is not a matter for Ontario alone; it touches our national life at many points. It will stimulate agriculture, it will develop industry, it will bring traffic to our railways, it will increase our population, and with a wise and careful development of this power I foresee along the St. Lawrence the most extensive and intensive industrial development in the world. I commend this matter to the most serious consideration of my friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), whom I see in his seat. He knows the conditions, he knows the need, and I sincerely hope that he will find a way to give an early approval to the plan that has been submitted by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario.

Mention is made in the Speech of railway rates. It is of course a very important question and a complicated one, but one Mr. Speaker, which I think should have been dealt with by this parliament at its first, or at latest its second session. The Crowsnest pass agreement was before this House. It was manifest I think to all that it had outlived its usefulness, that it had brought discrimination both in the east and in the west and the government should, I submit, have faced its responsibilities instead of running away from them; it should have revoked or cancelled that agreement, and should have referred the whole question of the revision of rates to the railway commission, the only body in Canada with the expert knowledge and equipment necessary for determining a matter of that kind. But as usual the government dallied with it. It dealt with it in a measure, it nursed it along, and we have had several rates in the meantime. We have had confusion, and we have had appeals and litigation and a great deal of expense, and now the whole matter has to be faced and dealt with as it should have been faced and dealt with two or three sessions ago.

I do not propose to deal with the question of the North Atlantic Conference, and the efforts that are outlined in connection with freight rates on the ocean, as another opportunity will be presented for dealing with that question. Speaking of an export duty the recent report of the grain commission intimates that an export duty might well be imposed upon wheat going to the United States, in view of the very high duty that is imposed against us. A great deal may be said in favour of this, and on behalf of the eastern farmer, I can see that the by-products of this wheat, if milled in Canada, would be available for the feeding of his cattle.

I wish to summarize some of the matters upon which I have touched, and in order to condense my contention as much as possible, I make the following submissions:

First, that there should be a downward revision in the scale of the income tax, to make it approximately the same as that of the United States.

Second, that there should be an upward revision of the tariff wherever necessary to protect the Canadian farmer in respect of the large volume of American produce that is coming into Canada, which we can produce here, and which has been referred to by the previous speakers, and also for the purpose of protecting such industries in Canada as suffer from unfair competition from the products of countries having depreciated currency and cheap labour.

Third, an export duty or embargo on pulpwood and other natural resources.

Fourth, approval of the plan of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario for development of electrical power on the St. Lawrence.

Fifth, curtailment of all unnecessary expenditures.

These I submit, Mr. Speaker, for the earnest consideration of the House and for prompt action at the hands of the government. I cannot help, in conclusion, comparing the pale anaemic Speech from the Throne with the resolution which is proposed by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). The Speech from the Throne seems calculated to outline as little as possible for the relief of the Canadian people. It seems to be intended for a short session, with possibly an election in June, when there may be a new issue of political promises as there was in the last election. The resolution of the right hon. leader of the opposition which will be discussed in due time sets out a programme, not for a session, not for to-day, not for an election, but for a generation, a plan that will, if properly applied to varying and changing conditions, bring about the development of our natural resources, will build up our population and will make of the Canadian people a virile, strong and vigorous nation.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): In the early part of the afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we had a discussion as to whether the Speech from the Throne should be further debated in this House. I have been sitting in the chamber for the last hour and a half since that discussion occurred, and I think if we required any proof that this discussion should not be shut off, the two speeches that have preceded mine are proof enough. I thoroughly enjoyed listening to the constructive suggestions which were made to the government by both of those speakers. One remark of my hon. friend for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) struck me as particularly true, though it was not a suggestion. He said the Speech from the Throne was "anaemic," and I found myself thinking it was pernicious anaemia that was the trouble. I think many of his suggestions were well worthy of the consideration of the government. I was particularly interested in the speech of the hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Simpson) who preceded me, a gentleman who, unhappily for the House, has been for the last couple of years, due to illness, unable to raise his voice in the debates of this House, but a man who has the respect of everybody in this House and the respect of everybody in Sault Ste. Marie, whence he comes. His voice once more raised in this House dealing with the problems of Canada will be an acquisition to the House. I was particularly interested in his remarks about the development of iron, and I may point out to my good friends to my left that the report from which he quoted dealing with the iron development of Canada, or the bounty system, was a report gotten out by a commission appointed by the late Drury government, the Progressive government of Ontario. I do not know whether my hon. friend mentioned that fact. That commission reported in favour of helping to develop the iron resources of this country by a bounty system. I believe the proposition is a very good one. I believe that their proposal to this Dominion government, that they combine with them and bring in a bounty system which would help to develop the hundreds of millions of tons of iron ore which exist in nearly all sections from the Atlantic to the Pacific, would be a worthy project for this parliament to undertake in order to help develop some of these resources of which some of us speak perhaps too much, but for the development of which we do so little.

I intend to confine my remarks pretty much to the Address and some of the subjects contained in the Address. I do not propose to discuss the tariff question, except to make a few remarks in reply to some statements which have been made, because I believe that my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) gave us such a very fine address upon the tariff, supported by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson), that we require from this section practically no elaboration of the theme at this time, though on the motion of my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen), which is on the order paper, and on the budget itself, no doubt we shall be able to offer whatever suggestions we may wish to make. I intend to limit myself fairly well to discussing the Address, and in doing so, may I pick out what the government itself has declared to be the most important problem of Canada at the present time? I will quote the words in the third paragraph of the Speech from the Throne:

> The problem of the cost of living is the most important that my ministers have in mind at the present time.

Therefore, if I take that as my text, I am sure that the government cannot quarrel with me, and if in speaking to that, I do what is usually done in speaking to texts, if I tell them a few wholesome truths, I am sure that they will not be able to quarrel with that either. The cost of living has become to the Prime Minister almost an obsession. I remember for the past seven or eight years, when he was either moving amendments to the Addresses of the government which preceded him or putting into the mouth of His Excellency the Speech from the Throne, he invariably brought up the question of the cost of living. That to him, as I said on another occasion, has been a little like what the head of Charles I was to Mr. Dick. It has got in his road and prevented him from seeing any of the other problems of the country. I remember reading what Mark Twain said of the weather. He said that everybody complained about it but nobody did anything about it. The trouble is that the government keeps on talking about the cost of living, but does nothing about it. A difference of two or three or four points is the most the Prime Minister has claimed as the reduction in the cost of living. During the four years he has been in power a reduction of two or three or four points out of 150 will not make any appreciable difference, and they have probably been lost since he has made his speech.

The Prime Minister says that the most important problem the government has under consideration is the cost of living. I do not agree with him at all. I think the real problem in Canada to-day for the vast majority of our people is the problem of getting a living at all. Would you mind telling me, Mr. Speaker, if out of the 180,000 or thereabouts who left the Dominion of Canada to go to the most highly protected country in the world to earn a living, did one leave this country because of the cost of living? Not one. Every one of those without exception left this country because in Canada he could not earn a living at all. It is not cheapness the people are always looking for; they are anxious to be able to buy goods at all. They are anxious to be able to get work and wages so that they can buy for themselves, a living of some kind or another. This they have not been able to do in this country.

The second question of importance, particularly for the business man, is the problem of the appalling taxation under which business in this country is suffering. Therefore the Prime Minister himself, as is usual in the slipshod methods of the present government, made a wrong diagnosis of the cause altogether, and as is so well known in the profession which I practise when I am not in parliament, if you make a wrong diagnosis, your treatment is necessarily wrong. You cannot treat a patient correctly unless first your know the cause of his illness.

Mr. ARTHURS: What happens to the patient?

Mr. MANION: What happens to the patient is just what is happening to the country at the present time. He goes into dissolution. What is really needed in Canada is a policy to permit the people to earn a living here instead of expatriating themselves to the United States to earn a living, and to permit particularly those who cannot afford to expatriate themselves to the United States, to exist in this country. What we want is work for the worker and less taxation for the business man. In addition to that, we want enough work so that we can bring into this country a steady stream of immigrants who will, by increasing our population, decrease our debt and help to develop the natural resources of Canada. Instead of that we have a policy which has brought about conditions which I intend to describe, ever keeping in mind the danger of being called a pessimist which seems to be the popular way among politicians of describing anybody who looks the facts in the face. Conditions in Canada to-day are so depressing that they are frightening all people who live in the country, all people who have a hope for the country to become the great, powerful, peace-loving nation that its destiny says it should become. It makes them fear for the future of Canada. It makes them ask themselves if we have got into a morass from which it is impossible to extricate ourselves. I am forced to think of something which illustrates this point very well. Any member of this House—and you, Mr. Speaker, are one of them—who has been in Europe, has, while in London, no doubt, visited that splendid cathedral of St. Paul's. As you enter the cathedral, on one side there is a tablet in honour of the architect, Sir Christopher Wren, and on that tablet the following words are engraved:

If you wish to see his monument, look around you.

In the same way, if you wish to see the monuments of this government, look around you. Its wreckage lies on every side. We have idle plants, idle people and idle talk by the Prime Minister that Canada is prosperous at the present time. We have wrecked businesses, closed factories, closed plants of all kinds, depressed people, unrest, discontent, dissatisfaction and finally, to cap it all, we have discussions going on which have not gone on in Canada to any extent for a long time past, discussions regarding whether we should have secession in our country, that is, breaking up our confederation, or whether we should have annexation to the United States. In other words, we have in Canada to-day a veritable slough of despond. I suppose my smiling friend over there, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) will say that I am exaggerating, but I am not exaggerating and I intend to prove my statements. As regards unemployment, I do not need to give proofs, though I intend to give very briefly two or three. Anybody who knows the country at all, knows that unemployment is more rampant in Canada to-day than it has been in twenty-five or fifty years.

Mr. MURDOCK: Nonsense.

Mr. MANION: Of course, my hon. friend always has some reply of that sort to make, but idle men on the street will tell him that I am speaking the truth. I will quote from one of the articles from which my right hon. friend quoted the other day and which I had also run across. This is an article from the Montreal Star of February 6, reporting a Trades and Labour Council meeting in Montreal, and I intend to quote just two or three passages from it. The report of their committee shows that out of 48,000 odd men covered by their unions, 9,500 are out of employment and 22,000 are working on short time, these two figures together being over 65 per cent of the membership of the union who, are either out of work altogether or working short time. Further down the report states:

The extent of unemployment was greater than in the same period last year and a very serious condition of affairs existed among the working classes of the city.

A little further down, it states:

More calls from distressed people for personal aid had been received than during the last winter or the winter preceding.

In the report it shows the official figure given by the Minister of Labour as to unemployment in Canada as 44,000, and the report states:

The figure given for Canada is ridiculously low and the actual condition must be at least twice that amount.

That is the reply of the Trades and Labour Council to the nonsensical statement of my hon. friend. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) suggests that the Salvation Army in Toronto, his own city, could give him some information also which would hardly agree with his statistics. I hold in my hand a circular which was sent out to many members, probably to all members by the British Empire Steel Corporation in connection with unemployment in the steel industry in Canada. They give figures to show that there are 48,000 less employed in the iron and steel industry in Canada to-day than there were in 1920. The Halifax Herald is quoted. I do not know what the politics of the Herald are, but the fact is that this newspaper is quoted:

What do these figures tell us? That the work is being done in the United States. It is there that men find employment. It is there that wages are being earned—while Canadian mills are closed down.

I give another quotation:

The special correspondent of the Iron Age—

This is another Toronto paper.

—who investigated conditions in all the Canadian iron and steel works makes it quite plain that they are much the same in Ontario as they are in Nova Scotia—

My hon. friend from West Algoma (Mr. Simpson) agreed this afternoon with that.

—and that the reason is not one that applies to one locality more than another, but is general. It is simply tariff reductions.

A little lower down there appears the following:

Mr. Sanderson's investigations and report show that the tariff, or rather lack of it, has had a very important effect not only in reducing production but in causing many workmen to leave Canada for the United States, where employment conditions have been more satisfactory. Canadian iron and steel industry is experiencing severe competition from many directions. The action of the government in connection with its budget for 1925 is awaited with interest.

I hope that the budget will show something substantial, but I do not base my hopes strongly on anything I have heard. Let me tell the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) that in the Toronto Globe, a newspaper which can hardly be described as a supporter of this party, there appeared on October 9 a group picture on the front page, which I possess among my papers, of some fifty mayors of the cities and towns of Ontario—not of Canada but of Ontario—who it was stated were visiting at that time the Conservative Premier of Ontario, Mr. Howard Ferguson, asking him for relief for unemployment conditions in the various places which they represent. And I can speak for my own city, which perhaps has not been harder hit than any other, and which it may be has been more fortunate in this regard than some. To-day I can hardly walk down the streets of Fort William without being stopped both by business men and by workers who want to know what in heaven's name is the matter with this country of ours. They all ask the same question—what has happened to this Dominion? I can assure my hon. friends that I have told them to the best of my ability.

As regards the exodus from Canada, there is no doubt that it is declining, and some of the Liberal newspapers as well as the Prime Minister have boasted of this fact; they have made much of the decline in the exodus of the Canadian people. Well, there is no doubt that the exodus is lessening, but the reason is obvious: there are fewer people to draw from. The exodus, Mr. Speaker, is declining for the same reason that the flow of a man's life blood decreases in proportion as he gets nearer to dissolution. The Prime Minister the other day in his speech made the statement that the figures of the Labour department of the United States were incorrect, that is to say, that the actual figures in regard to the exodus from Canada to the United States were not as high as they were represented. And no doubt the Minister of Labour will agree with that. But I know sections of this country,—such for example as the district around Fort Frances—which lies on the international border, where I am informed that daily towards dusk there are streams of men slipping across the line into the United States, of whom, of course, no records are kept. And I know also that in my home town in the practice of my profession I am flooded with requests from young Canadians, Scotsmen, Irishmen, Englishmen, who have been living for some time in this country, for certificates of health which they require as a pre-requisite to entry into the United States, since it is necessary that they produce such a certificate before being admitted in to that country at the present time. The very cream of our British stock is leaving the country and going across to the United States. If hon. gentlemen need further proof I will quote once more the Toronto Globe. Here is an article which appeared in that newspaper on December 15, less than two months ago, being a special despatch to the Globe from Windsor, Ontario:

Windsor, December 14—Upward of 1,250 persons from the British Isles have made application at Windsor for permission to enter the United States, Marshall M. Vance, United States consul at the border, said Saturday. Under the present quota law, the consul explained, enough applications are on file to fill the quota needs for the next 42 years.

I notice that the Minister of Labour makes no comment. However, I think I have given sufficient proof from various newspapers as to the exodus that is taking place. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not claim to love my country any better than other Canadians do, but I do think that to every patriotic man in Canada it must be a sad sight to see the very life blood of the nation flowing out as it is. It must be a matter of great concern to every serious citizen to see the young men and women of this country emigrating to the United States, probably never to return. Whoever has studied French history knows that in those cruel days of two or three hundred years ago, the days of religious persecution in that country, France lost tens and hundreds of thousands of Huguenots, the finest artisans in France, who were driven into England, Germany and Holland for conscience sake. England, Germany and Holland profited to an enormous extent, while France's loss was inestimable, in the exodus from their native land of these Frenchmen. Unfortunately the same condition exists in Canada to-day, but the fact is that the present situation is due not to the tyranny of any autocratic king but to the stupid policies of a vote-hunting government who desire to maintain themselves in power. Today the factories of England, Belgium, France and the United States as well as of Czecho-Slovakia and other countries, are retaining their artisans, producing goods that find their way into Canada, while the young men who work in our Canadian factories are among those who are making their exit to the United States.

The Prime Minister has declared it unpatriotic for us to discuss these facts. But, Sir, what is there unpatriotic in one's saying publicly what everybody says privately? I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be accused to-morrow of being a pessimist merely because I have ventured to look the facts in the face. But I take it that this charge will come from those who place party above country, who are Liberals first and Canadians second, or rather perhaps, I should say, who are politicians before being patriots.

But let me ask hon. gentlemen a question. If a man who has worked during a substantial period of his life and has gradually accumulated a competence and built for himself a home which he loves, should upon returning some evening find that house in flames, with all his savings in the course of destruction,—what would one say of such a man if he stood by and, with cheers and laughter, declared that conditions for him were never better than at that particular moment? Would such a man be considered an optimist? I would call him an imbecile. Well, Mr. Speaker, without intending any offence at all, I must say that it seems to me that those who stand up in this country and declare that conditions were never at any time better than they are to-day are suffering from the same mental condition.

Let me say that I am no pessimist so far as Canada's future is concerned; I am not pessimistic regarding the great destiny of this country. I am, however, doubtful whether under present conditions, and under such a policy as is being pursued to-day, Canada will realize, as soon as we should hope, the destiny which we all anticipate for her. I am afraid that if present conditions are continued indefinitely the great destiny of the Canadian people will be retarded ten or twenty, indeed perhaps fifty years. I am alarmed at the prospect, Mr. Speaker. But some of the greatest men in the country share this misgiving; men like Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, the president of the Bank of Montreal, Sir Herbert Holt, Mr. Beatty, and representatives of the Trade and Labour Council are all uneasy. These gentlemen have expressed views pretty much the same as I have voiced to-day, although perhaps in milder language; but they have all reached absolutely the same conclusion. The only period in our history in which I can find a parallel to the present state of affairs was that period around 1878, when conditions were indeed severe. Anyone will discover, if he takes the trouble to read the speeches of members of parliament as recorded in Hansard of that time, how tense the feeling of the nation was then, when the Prime Minister on leaving the House of Commons was accosted on the streets by people who cried for either bread or work. To-day too the people are crying for bread or work; the workmen are crying for bread or work and the Prime Minister gives them statistics, statistics in regard to Canada's external trade. I am sure that these statistics will serve to relieve the pangs of hunger of these workmen and help to pay their rent.

My right hon. friend appears to be of the opinion that external trade is more important for a country than internal trade. Internal trade is the really important trade for a country; in other words, the ability of the people to buy and sell among themselves. You can look back over the history of the world and find many instances of countries where the people were dying by the tens of thousands and even by the million from absolute famine while their foodstuffs and other products were being exported to a large extent.

Mr. ROBB: Before my hon. friend leaves the question of population, perhaps he can give me this information, as he comes from just on the edge of the prairies. If I understood him aright, he was referring to the exodus of our people to the States. Will he explain how it is that the three prairie provinces are basing their demands for the subsidy we pay them of 25 cents a head on a population of 169,000 more than in 1922?

Mr. MANION: Of course, I have not the mind of the prairie provinces in my keeping. The only answer I can give the minister is this: I heard the representatives from the three prairie provinces in this House asking the government for the return of their natural resources, and I presume they have got so tired waiting that now they are making a substantial demand in order to secure good fair treatment.

Mr. ROBB: No, this is based on the statistics of population. As my hon. friend knows, we pay the provinces so much per head of population. To-day they are basing their claim on a population of 169,000 more than they had in 1922.

Mr. MANION: Of course, I do not know anything about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume they took the figures given by the Dominion statistics office, which lately published statistics of our population. They would be justified in doing so. But the Chief Statistician will tell the minister that in arriving at those statistics he took the rate of progress in the ten years previous and projected the curve into the three years. So the minister will see of what use those figures are.

Mr. ROBB: I would not admit that at all.

Mr. MANION: I do not care anything about the figures the prairie provinces sent down in making their demand on my hon. friend; but I do know, as everybody else knows, that the exodus from this country is painfully large, that our people are going out by tens of thousands to the United States.

I was going to give some further proofs of conditions in this country, and I was going to point out that for the first time in very many years we have had what happened many years ago—talk of annexation and of secession. We have people asking if confederation is a failure. I have seen it stated in some Toronto paper that there is no talk of annexation in this country. I think that statement must have been made in a Pickwickian sense, because I have heard openly on Pullman cars and on the streets talk of annexation, I have had sane business men ask me if it was not necessary, in order to get out of this morass of difficulties, to join up with the United States. Just within the last week an outstanding gentleman in this city, one whose name is familiar to everyone in this House, one who is not an annexationist, told me that if a vote were taken in one of the largest sections of the country, comprising about a third of the population, annexation would carry overwhelmingly. What a terrible condition of affairs to exist in such a country as this!

Mr. GRAHAM: Do you think he was well informed?

Mr. MANION: I think he is just as well informed as my hon. friend the Minister of Railways. I know him as well as I know my hon. friend, and I am not making any reflection on the Minister of Railways, indeed I have the greatest respect for him. But the gentleman to whom I am referring is just as well known throughout the Dominion as my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not the point. He may be as well known as the toll gate used to be. What I am trying to get at is this. Are you serious in telling this House that you believe that one-third of the people of the Dominion, take any third you like, are in favour of annexation?

Mr. MANION: I did not give that as my own statement; I gave it as the statement of an outstanding gentleman in this country, a gentleman whose name is familiar to everyone in the House. He said to me that if a vote for annexation were taken in this section of the country, which comprises one-third of the people of Canada, it would carry overwhelmingly.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend and myself are agreed; he does not believe that statement any more than I do. At least I imagine he does not.

Mr. MANION: I am not so sure if at the present time a vote were taken in the section of which he speaks it might not carry, due to the terrible conditions brought about by the foolish policies of this government.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am surprised.

Mr. MANION: When I was interrupted rather generally, I was explaining what a crime it was to have even the suggestion of annexation whispered in this country, with its magnificent resources, its wide spaces, and its sparse population. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if anybody here is drawing the conclusion that I am advocating annexation.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am drawing that conclusion.

Mr. MANION: I do not care what conclusion my hon. friend draws; he is likely to draw any conclusion. I was asking if any private members were drawing such a conclusion. I say here, so there may be no misunderstanding, that I was quoting what someone had said to me, and I was pointing out the crime of even a suggestion of this kind. So far as I am concerned I am a Canadian first, last and all the time.

And we do not need to go outside this House to hear talk of secession. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), I think it was, said the other night that the feeling for secession in the prairie provinces had grown to a terrible extent in the last few years.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MANION: That is the effect of his speech—I heard him—that the feeling for secession was very marked in the prairie provinces at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: That is better.

Mr. MANION: But apart from that, we do not need to go outside the House at the present moment in this respect. My good friend the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) in a speech, heralded from one end of the Dominion to the other, said that if the western provinces could not get their demands satisfied he did not see any reason why confederation should be maintained.

Mr. HOEY: My hon. friend is wrong again, and perhaps he will allow me to state what I then said, which was this: That if confederation could not be maintained on a basis of justice, I could not see why it should be maintained at all.

Mr. MANION: I am not quarrelling with the words. At least, my hon. friend was in a condition to discuss the reasons why we might have secession, why confederation should break up. Have those conditions existed in this country before where people on the street, business men and members of parliament have been standing up and discussing secession? Never in my memory.

Mr. GRAHAM: Have you read the history of the annexation manifesto?

Mr. MANION: But that was away back in the times I speak of when conditions were very much as they are to-day, about fifty years ago. The hon. member for Springfield has been in this country only fifteen years. Might I suggest that he leave the talk of breaking up confederation to some of our native sons? Because when he remembers that he has been but fifteen years in the Dominion, and in that period, according to a speech he delivered in this House two sessions ago—what he then said has been applied to him, and he has not denied its application—according to that speech, within the fifteen years he has raised himself from a $7 a week labourer to a college-bred man and a member of parliament at $4,000 a year. I think that record is very creditable to him, but I also think it is very creditable to the opportunities which this country offers to those who come here. And I may add that to me his stand appears to be somewhat similar to that of a man whom you invite to partake of a good, substantial meal and who criticises the fare.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if the Conservative party in 1911 did not establish the precedent when they talked annexation?

Mr. MANION: The Conservative party of 1911 never talked annexation. They did point out what many people are pointing out in this country to-day, namely, that if foolish trade policies are carried out they might lead to annexation.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MURDOCK: They waved the flag to fool the people.

Mr. ROBB: May I interrupt my hon. friend? Was not my hon. friend a supporter of that policy?

Mr. MANION: I have answered that question a number of times. I do not like to repeat to my hon. friend what I said last year when another hon. gentleman asked me that question. I pointed out to him that I got wiser with age.

Mr. MURDOCK: And three months' experience in the cabinet.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps I did get wiser with three months' experience in the cabinet, but my hon. friend has not appeared to get wiser with three years'.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He is here yet, anyway.

Mr. MANION: Well, we are very glad of that. I am sure my hon. friend over there has sat there about as long as he can. Now, if I may be permitted to go on with my speech, the other hon. gentlemen having made theirs, I would like to do so. I had hoped to get through by six o'clock, but I am beginning to see now that I shall have to go on after the recess; that, however, is not my fault. My hon. friend and leader (Mr. Meighen) asks why hon. gentlemen opposite do not make speeches. I understand that they have made a resolution not to make speeches; perhaps I may succeed in stimulating them to come back a bit.

I have noticed—if I may be permitted to resume my remarks—that the severest critics of our country have always been newcomers, men who perhaps have gone through some hardships, but whose difficulties have been very small indeed compared with those of our native-born Canadians, particularly the pioneers of the earlier days. As to this talk of annexation, I hope I can reassure my hon. friend the Minister of Railways that I have not become an annexationist.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not suggest that my hon. friend was. I would not do that with him—if he will allow me: I was pointing out that when my hon. friend quotes from somebody's remarks as an evidence of the spirit in the country he ought at least, if he does not believe them, to tell us so.

Mr. MANION: I have done that. I hope I have dissipated the worries of my hon. friend on that point.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not like to see the hon. member go wrong.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend has been going wrong so long that he does not like to see others go wrong. Well, Mr. Speaker, such talk of annexation, such talk of secession is unpalatable to those native-born Canadians of all races and creeds who wish to see this become a great country, who wish to see Canada develop into a great nation, who wish to see their sons, even if at some personal sacrifice, remain good, whole-souled Canadians and not become Americans. It is true that we have some difficulties to surmount, but to the courageous man or the courageous nation great difficulties should lead to great achievement, not to despair. I was quoting these statements regarding annexation and secession and so on simply to prove that the conditions in this country are terrible at the present time—the conditions of depression in business; the conditions of unemployment; the conditions of unrest and dissatisfaction and discontent among the masses of the people of this country.

I wish in the few moments that remain with me before six to give what I consider to be the two chief causes for the dissatisfaction, the discontent, the unrest and the unemployment which prevail in Canada at the present time.

In the first place—and I place it first because I believe it is the most important—I consider the cause of the conditions which exist to be the unstable tariff policy of this government, because that unstable tariff policy has led to instability in business to reluctance on the part of investors to invest their money, and to fear on the part of all Canadians for the future of their country. Now I am going to quote another prominent citizen of this country, a manufacturer, who told me the other day that within the past year he had sold all his interests in his big manufacturing plant in Canada, because, he said, "I do not wish to take any chance of being driven out of business by the unstable tariff policy of the present government." I do not need to go outside of the Liberal party to get quotations which show the need of stability, In 1923 Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance—and, I believe, still Minister of Finance—stated that if we were to have progress and prosperity among our business men we must have stability in our tariff policy. Then he went on to say that if we were to have stability the tariff cuts must be considered as finished; that we must not go any further; that the tariff was low enough at that time. Then the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) comes forward in the following year, with the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding sick in bed, and makes some further cuts. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who is not in his seat, said on that occasion that that was the "death knell of protection." Then the Prime Minister in Toronto the other day said that there was going to be "a pause." He did not say how long the pause would be; in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) the other day he said it was only a pause. In these circumstances, in view of the talk of the death knell of protection; in view of the "pause" that is now suggested, and in view of the statement of Mr. Fielding to which I have referred, is it any wonder that nobody can tell what the tariff policy of this government is? Is it any wonder that as a consequence manufacturing plants in my city and in other cities throughout the country have been closed? Is it any wonder we have unemployment among the artisan classes of Canada? And, Sir, the whole condition as I have described it can be laid at the door of this government because of its unstable tariff policy.

I am going to touch for a moment on one or two tariff questions which came up in the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister the other day. He made a statement in the House which he has made in various parts of this country and with which I do not agree, namely, that the tariff is a tax; and he usually ends up his reference in that connection with the words. "Now, remember that the tariff is a tax."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: He says "hear, hear", so he reiterates his statement of the other day. He throws out to the people the inference that if you raise your tariff at any time you thereby raise your taxes. That is what he implies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Well, I do not agree with that. It is one of those half truths which my right hon. friend criticises when other people are responsible for the statement of them. There are times when the tariff is a tax. The tariff is a tax upon the people when the people purchase goods which are imported and against which customs duties are imposed, and it is also an indirect tax—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Just a minute. It is also an indirect tax when the manufacturer takes advantage of the tariff to raise the prices of his goods. Does that suit my hon. friends? That is what I think they had in mind just now. I usually go so fast that they cannot get in between the words of my sentences, but apparently I did not succeed this time. Well, I do not agree that that condition exists, except in perhaps a small proportion of cases. There are very many cases where the tariff has no effect in the raising of the prices of goods. Where the people buy the home products and the prices of those products are not raised by reason of the tariff. Will the Prime Minister claim then that the tariff is a tax?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The tariff is always a tax.

Mr. MANION: No, it is not always a tax, and my right hon. friend is either wilfully attempting to delude the people or he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are different types of taxes. There are taxes in the nature of sales taxes; there are taxes in the nature of customs dues. Customs dues are determined by the tariff, and they are certainly taxes.

Mr. MANION: Customs dues are a tax when the manufacturer takes advantage of the tariff to raise his prices; I will admit that. But there are very many cases where the prices are not raised at all on account of the tariff, where all the tariff has done is to hold the Canadian market for the Canadian people. That applies to many lines of goods in this country—very many; and there the tariff is no tax at all.

An hon. MEMBER: Name them.

Mr. MANION: I have here an article by Mr. F. W. Stewart, of the city of Montreal, a man who is well known to many members of this House, one of the best known citizens of that city. He represents in this country the Cluett Peabody collar and shirt people, and is therefore in a position to judge of the conditions as affecting men's furnishings, much better perhaps, than members of this House. Mr. Stewart is a personal friend of mine, and he has pointed this condition out to me on many occasions. He has written an article for the Listening Post. Nobody will accuse the Listening Post of being a friend of ours—recently, at any rate. There was a time when the Listening Post did seem friendly to us.

Mr. ROBB: Is not Mr. Stewart—I am not referring now to the Listening Post—president of the Conservative Association of Montreal?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I think he is president of one of the Conservative associations of Montreal. But does my hon. friend not think that there are a few truthful Conservatives?

Mr. ROBB: That is not the point. My hon. friend was trying to tack it on to the Listening Post.

Mr. MANION: I think Mr. Stewart is president of one of the Liberal-Conservative associations of Montreal. However, here are the facts. I remember reading a letter in a local newspaper from someone in this city who had been accused of doing this, that and the other, and who replied, "Supposing that is all true; supposing I am brother of the devil himself; what has that to do with the facts?" It is the same with regard to Mr. Stewart. His position in the Conservative association has nothing to do with the facts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would not the hon. gentleman apply that same line of reasoning as to whether a man is a native born Canadian or an immigrant who has come to this country?

Mr. MANION: Yes, but I submit that the native born Canadian who has lived here all his life should surely be the first to speak of breaking up confederation, if there is to be any talk of that kind.

Mr. MURDOCK: There are some in this House, not native born Canadians, who have lived here under the conditions that existed in this country longer than my hon. friend has lived in Canada.

Mr. MANION: They may have lived here longer than I have; I cannot help my age, but I will not admit they have lived here under the conditions that we have at present because there never have been conditions in this country such as we have at present.

Mr. McBRIDE: Is it not so that some are Canadians because they cannot help it while others are Canadians because it is the land of their adoption?

Mr. MURDOCK: And loved it.

Mr. MANION: I was going on to quote Mr. Stewart, if my hon. friends will permit me. Mr. Stewart enumerates the items of clothing which a man wears in this country and compares the prices here and in the United States. He gives the price of hats, suits, overcoats, woollen underwear, cotton underwear, collars of various kinds, shirts and ties, in fact practically the entire outfit in wearing apparel that a man requires in this country, and gives the prices for these goods of equal quality and of equal workmanship in Canada and the United States. The cost of the outfit in Canada is $95.30, as compared with $124 in the United States, a difference in favour of Canada of $28.70, in spite of the fact that there is a duty of something like 37½ per cent against practically all of these goods coming into Canada.

Mr. BROWN: Is it not, however, the British competition in these lines that our friends complain of? The comparison should be between British goods and Canadian goods.

Mr. MANION: That is true in regard to woollen goods, but not of the goods generally. It is not true with regard to cotton goods for instance.

Mr. BROWN: Why not? Is not Britain a manufacturer of cotton goods?

Mr. MANION: Yes, but so is the United States. Not only that, but cotton goods in Canada, Mr. Stewart claims, and he has shown me at different times the actual items, despite the duty, are cheaper in this country. The point I make is that the tariff itself does not necessarily raise the price of goods, and any man who is fair-minded and looks at the question from the proper standpoint knows that is the absolute truth.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MANION: I regret very much that, on account of the various members on the other side of the House insisting on making speeches this afternoon while I was making my remarks, I am forced to continue after eight o'clock this evening, and I sincerely hope what I have said will stimulate my good friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) to come forward and make a statement. I see he is ready now to come forward and give us a lot of facts of which he speaks.

Mr. MURDOCK: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: When the House rose at six o'clock I was discussing the statement of the Prime Minister that a tariff is a tax. With his statement to that effect, which he has made in this House and in various parts of the country and reiterated here this afternoon during my speech, I disagree; but I agree with him to this extent, that a tariff is a tax providing anyone buys the imported goods and pays the duty on them; or it is an indirect tax when the manufacturer in the country protected increases the price to the people of the goods he sells. I admit that his statement is a half truth to that extent, but I do not admit that the tariff is a tax generally. I wish to elaborate a little further, more than I intended to do this afternoon, and more than I would have done had I been able to finish at six o'clock, but since my statement was so generally disputed by the Prime Minister himself and various others on his side of the House, and by members to my left, I intend to prove my point to the satisfaction at least of those who have an open mind on the subject.

In the first place I remembered—and I looked up my facts to make sure of them—that in Great Britain where they have free trade they collected more by customs duties than they collected in the United States under protection; and I find myself wondering what an extraordinary thing it is if the tariff is, as the Prime Minister says, a tax, that a country the most highly protected in the world, with the highest tariff in the world, collects less than a country which is supposedly a free trade country like Great Britain, with less than half the population. I have checked my figures, so that my statement will not be disputed. I looked up the Statesman's Year Book and I intend to lay the facts before the House. I refer to page 35 of the Statesman's Year Book of 1924. In Great Britain they collected by customs—not excise but customs; I am not talking of the excise duty at all—in the financial year 1922-23 £122,000,000. Multiply that by five and you have something over six hundred million dollars. Then I turn to page 451 of the same book and I find the customs revenue for the United States, which country I think to-day is the most highly protected country in the world; and I will give you their customs revenue for the same year, 1923. It is for the year 1923, whatever time they end the fiscal year in that country, and I find their customs revenue was $562,000,000, perhaps around $40,000,000 less collected by the customs revenue of the United States than by the customs revenue of England, where they have free trade as opposed to the United States, where they have protection, with two and a half times the population. Under those circumstances I would suggest to the Prime Minister that if the tariff is a tax the best way to handle it to increase our collections is to wipe it out altogether. He might better accept the suggestion of my hon. friends to my left who believe in free trade in the country, wipe out the tariff and collect the customs by a free trade tariff as they do in Great Britain.

Mr. BIRD: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the British customs tax is a protective tax?

Mr. MANION: No, it is a free trade tax. It is a free trade tariff. I remember well in the 1921 election my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) making some criticisms about what he called a free trade tariff, and one of the leaders of the Farmer's party,—I think I could state which one it was—stood up and laughed at the idea of a free trade tariff. He said there was no such thing. But there is one to the extent of $600,000,000 a year in Great Britain, and I will explain to my hon. friend, who I know is looking for information, though I hope he does not agree with the hon. gentleman for Brandon (Mr. Forke) that reason does not appeal to the members from the prairie provinces when it comes to the tariff. I will explain how that vast collection of $600,000,000 is made up—at least $500,000,000 of it. That $500,000,000 is collected on a tariff on three substances, tea, sugar and tobacco. They provide a revenue in England of £103,000,000 according to the same book and on the same page.

Mr. EVANS: Are they produced in Great Britain?

Mr. MANION: What that has to do with the question I do not know. No, they are not produced in Great Britain. That is why it is a free trade tariff. Britain has a free trade tariff, but they collect by customs tariff on sugar, tobacco and tea, practical necessaries of life, from the ordinary working man; and I think my hon. friend, who called us a lot of evil names the other night when he was discussing free trade, will agree that the ordinary working man probably consumes and has to consume as much sugar as the millionaire; so that the duty in England, instead of being divided so as to place more duty on the rich man than on the poor man, bears equally on the poor and the rich.

Mr. EVANS: Will you tell us how much the customs tariff in Great Britain favours the manufacturer?

Mr. MANION: I am not saying that it favours the manufacturer. England is a free trade country and the fact that they do not favour the manufacturer is one of the reasons that to-day the manufacturers of England are finding it difficult to carry on their business because protectionist Germany, the United States and France are dumping their stuff into England. That is the reason the manufacturers are being put out of business. I do not understand why my hon. friend is putting these questions, because I am not questioning the statement that England is a free trade country, but I am saying that England under a free trade tariff is collecting more than the United States is collecting under a protectionist tariff, and I repeat that England is collecting £103,000,000 or over $500,000,000, say $515,000,000 if you like, on these practical necessaries of life. Let me tell my hon. friends where the advantage comes with a protective tariff, by saying that in countries with a protective tariff such as exists in the United States and in Canada, much higher tariff duties can be put upon luxuries such as high-priced automobiles, high-priced boots and shoes, imported wines, cigars and so forth than is the case in England. The English could do the same, but they do not. Therefore, in England, it is the workingman who is to a large extent paying these duties on sugar, tea and tobacco because he uses not only as much sugar as the millionaire, but probably as much tea as the millionaire, and if he does not use as expensive tobacco, he probably uses as much tobacco as the millionaire. I do not think it can be refuted that the workingman is harder hit under free trade in Great Britain on taxes than in Canada or in the United States under protection, and to a larger extent he is out of work than workmen in any other country in the world. I doubt if to-day there is in the world any other country that is in the difficult position that Great Britain is in under free trade. I have finished with that unless my hon. friends wish me to eleborate it further.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member does not dispute the fact that these protective tariffs are taxes.

Mr. MANION: I admit that the tariff is sometimes a tax, but the Prime Minister makes it a general statement, threatening the people that if you raise the tariff in this country, you increase the taxes. I submit that you do not necessarily do anything of the kind. I am going to try to prove that further and I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me when I have done.

The tin-plate industry in the United States was something which I looked into some years ago. I referred to it in this House about five years ago and I looked up Hansard to refresh my memory as to the facts which are these: In 1890 there was in the United States no tin-plate industry to amount to anything and they imported 680,000,000 pounds of tin-plate, mostly from Wales. They put a duty on tin-plate being imported into the United States from Wales, and in 1913, 23 years later, they were importing, instead of 680,000,000 pounds, just 28,000,000 pounds, or a very small proportion of what they had been importing 23 years previously. In manufactured plate they were in 1890 producing only 2,000,000 pounds in the United States. In 1913, 23 years later, after they imposed their tariff, they were producing 2,000,000,000 pounds, one thousand times the amount, and prices had gone down. In addition to prices going down, they had supplied thousands of workers in the United States with work in that industry and they had actually driven the tin-plate industry of Wales nearly altogether out of business and forced many of the tin-plate workers of Wales to come to the United States to reside.

I am not satisfied to stop at that; I am going to give my hon. friends some more proofs. In 1867, steel rails in the United States cost $150 a ton. There was a duty on them, but they were importing too many, they felt, and they raised the duty in 1867, because, if members will remember, the United States became highly protectionist, as it has remained ever since, about 1861. In 1872, five years after they raised the duty, steel rails, instead of costing them $150 a ton, cost $112. Where in that case was the tax that the Prime Minister states the tariff is? In 1876, four years after that, steel rails cost only $39 a ton, or about one-quarter of what they cost in 1867. In 1885, still under the same tariff, they were costing $27 a ton, at which price they practically remained until prior to the war. Of course, the price of steel rails has gone up since then because the war has disarranged prices, but prior to the war the cost of steel rails remained at about $27 a ton. From 1867, with a low tariff, to 1885, with a high tariff, the price of steel rails decreased from $150 to $27 a ton.

Mr. BROWN: Could the hon. member give the corresponding prices in other countries from which those rails might have been imported during that time?

Mr. MANION: I am sorry I cannot do that.

Mr. BROWN: Would that not be necessary in order to prove the hon. member's point?

Mr. MANION: It would be, perhaps, if I had been comparing prices in different countries. What I am proving is that a tariff is not necessarily a tax; that under a tariff you can lower prices down to one-quarter and even down to one-sixth in that period of time. Further, the greatest producer of steel rails in the world before the war was the United States and also the greatest producer of iron and steel. Not only is that true, but it is also true that Germany, the most highly protected country in Europe, had surpassed Great Britain in the production of iron and steel while Great Britain was producing under free trade. Germany had undersold Great Britain in prices and oversold her in amount in ten of the most important countries in Europe, so that Germany must have been producing her goods at a cheaper price or she could not have ousted Great Britain from ten enormous markets of the world. I could quote Mr. Keynes and various other authorities. I could easily prove my facts, but I do not wish to go into that at the present time. Not only is what I have stated the case; but Sir Gilbert Molesworth, a British economist, stated in a book which he wrote, that between 1861 and 1883, a period of twenty-two years, under protection in the United States, cotton and woollen prices decreased 25 per cent. He gives a list of 214 articles showing the same result under protection with the home market. In other words, under a tariff protection you keep your home market for your producers and prices go down by competition amongst the manufacturers. What is much more important is that you have work and wages for your people instead of driving them to highly protected countries. Large volume production, with plenty of work and wages, is much more important than cheap importation. Of what value are cheap goods if the people of our country have not any money with which to buy them, as is the condition to-day? Cheap importation, I will not deny, will make things cheap. If you wipe away the tariff altogether, many things will be cheap. I am not claiming that what I have said is universally true, that prices do not go up. Some prices do go up; but what is the use of cheap goods if the people are out of work because of killing industry and they cannot buy cheap goods. As I have said before in this House, the cheapest countries in the world are invariably the poorest countries in the world. India and China are the cheapest countries in the world to live in. You can hire a labourer in India or China for probably five, six or eight cents a day. According to the labour wage, which is a good criterion of a cheap or a dear country, they are the cheapest and the poorest countries in the world with regard to the people. It is not cheapness we want; we want work and wages for our people to keep them at home in this country. How can you possibly get work and wages for your people and keep your industrial plants going if you allow importations from the cheapest countries in the world which have a low wage rate, because hon. members will remember that, in reply to a question put by me and also, I think, by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) said that for all classes of labour wage rates in Europe were from one-half to one-fifth the wage rates in Canada. Therefore, with low wages, with low exchange, so that European money does not begin to be worth the amount of money ours is worth, and with lower standards of living than our people will put up with, how can you expect our workers to compete? They cannot compete under those circumstances and at the same time maintain their standard of living. Only under a system of protection is it possible to safeguard our labourers against the low labour costs, the low standards of living, and the low exchange of Europe, and of Asia too, when the countries in that part of the world have begun to produce on a large scale. And in that regard, it is evident that those countries are forging ahead rapidly, particularly Japan. Suppose some particularly brilliant genius arose, let us say, in China and began to exploit the three hundred or four hundred millions of people there, drawing upon them for labour and hiring them at a few cents a day: what chance would the working man in Canada have of surviving under such circumstances? Would my hon. friends still advocate free trade in Canada in that event?

Mr. LEWIS: What about the high cost of labour in the United States? Do we need protection from that ?

Mr. MANION: Yes, because of the fact that the factories in the United States produce on so large a scale. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) gave a very apt illustration when he pointed out that in the case of a large population it is possible to manufacture more cheaply than we are able to do in this country, so that the goods produced can be dumped into Canada to the disadvantage of the local product. The hon. member gave an illustration with reference to Sparks street which I need not repeat. The fact, however, is that because in the United States they are able to manufacture on a large scale, and because they frequently have a surplus of goods which they do not know what to do with, they are able to interfere materially with our market here; rather than carry their goods to the following year they dump them here. You may get cheap goods for a little while until the home industry which produces that particular commodity is put out business, but once the Canadian business is destroyed you may depend upon it that the exporters in the United States will put up their price and the consumer here will be worse off than before.

Some hon. gentlemen to my left have described the tariff policy of the party led by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) as being as high as Haman's gallows. This is absurd; our policy is nothing of the kind. The policy which this party advocates is a tariff sufficiently high to give our manufacturers and producers in various departments of industry a fair opportunity to compete with those of other countries. That is our policy, and nothing more than that. Let me go further. Speaking for myself—and I have no doubt that I express in this regard the views of my right hon. leader as well as of other hon. gentlemen on this side—I will say that the policy I advocate is qualified to this extent, that so soon as it is shown that any industry in this ountry is taking an unfair advantage of the tariff I am prepared to advise the taking off of the tariff on the products of that particular industry, no matter what it might be. And that is the advantage of a tariff commission such as is suggested by my hon. friend whose resolution regarding tariff is on the order paper.

A fact which has impressed me rather favourably this session is the marked extent to which hon. gentlemen to my left have avoided the advocacy of free trade. That I take it is due to the favourable condition in regard to wheat, which has increased in value to $2 a bushel. Personally, I hope that the price of wheat will stay up; I sincerely trust that it will remain at least $1.50 or $1.75, or even $2. I am anxious to see my friends in western Canada make a profit on their production, because living as I do at Fort William, which is tributary to the west, I naturally want to see that section of the Dominion prosperous. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced, as I am sure every hon. gentleman must be, that unless every part of the country prospers, the Dominion of Canada as a whole cannot hope to advance. I repeat, therefore, the hope that the price of wheat will stay up; once it is established on a reasonably permanent basis of from $1.50 to $2, say, so that the farmers of western Canada may make a fair profit, I am sure that we shall have no more tariff agitation than we experienced in the west before the war. Why, in 1917 there was only one man from the west who talked about the tariff —I refer to Dr. Michael Clark of Red Deer. His was the lone voice in the wilderness and he had practically no support in the House except possibly from my hon. friend for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who occasionally came to his assistance. Generally speaking, Dr. Michael Clark was the only absolute free trader in the House; and my belief is that if we have a proper price for wheat from now on we shall hear less and less about the tariff question, which I believe will cease to agitate the minds of the people in the prairie provinces, who will come to see, what is an absolute fact, that the tariff has done them very little injury. As a matter of fact, has the tariff had any effect either in raising the price from $1 to $2 or in lowering it from $2 to $1? It has had no such effect; and, as I say, if the farmers of the west are assured a reasonable return for their wheat they will be inclined to take a correspondingly reasonable view of conditions in the east and be prepared to accept a fair tariff which will operate to the advantage of the whole country, benefitting not only the manufacturer in eastern Canada but as well the farmers who live in the vicinity of the manufacturing plants.

Mr. HUGHES: Suppose the policy my hon. friend advocates is nationally sound, and suppose we take it for granted that the manufacturers of Canada do not want to take advantage of the customs duties and raise their prices accordingly, would my hon. friend recommend that the excise duty be raised to about the same figure as the customs duty on similar articles?

Mr. MANION: I am not sure that I quite understand the question, but if you put a customs duty on goods coming in and put an excise duty on the same goods produced in the country, you simply have free trade. That is not protection.

Mr. HUGHES: You are protecting the home market.

Mr. MANION: No, not if you impose an excise tax. Now, I think I have submitted to any open-minded man in this House, or woman either, sufficient proof that the tariff is not necessarily a tax, as has been so generally expounded by the Prime Minister in his western tour and in this House.

When I began to discuss the tariff I was giving reasons for the present deplorable conditions that prevail in this country,—depressed business, unemployment, discontent, and discussions regarding secession, annexation and all that sort of thing. These are conditions such as have not existed in this country for many years. So far as I can remember, looking back over Canadian history, a similar state of affairs has not been seen in Canada since 1878. Between 1873 and 1878, such conditions did exist, but we have not had any recurrence of them from that time on. I submitted in explanation of the present situation two main reasons: first, the unstable tariff policy of this government which, as I believe, I have reasonably proved has been the means of strangling the business of the country and keeping the working men idle; and secondly, the unnecessary expenditures of this government, entailing an unnecessarily high taxation which is weighing as a heavy burden on the business men and as well, to a certain extent, on the labouring classes. My hon. friend opposite (Mr. Marler) yesterday made an excellent speech in which he sought to prove that the government was in no way to blame at all for the high taxation, inasmuch as, according to him, most of it was uncontrollable. He made a very fine defence of the government and tried to discharge it of all responsibility in this connection. And I think I am but drawing reasonable inference from his remarks. Now, after making the sweeping statement that the government has been expending money unnecessarily, I should certainly be open to criticism if I did not substantiate this generalization with a few particulars. I shall therefore cite six instances in proof of the statement that expenditures have been made which could have been avoided. Those few illustrations will, I think, suffice to show that I can back up what I have said. First of all there was an increase in the Auditor General's salary from $6,000 to $15,000 a year. For many years we had an Auditor General who was quite satisfactory and who was content to perform the duties of his office at a salary of $6,000 a year. This government, however, appointed an estimable gentleman, against whom let me assure the House I have absolutely nothing to say, a gentleman from Montreal, at $15,000, an increase of $9,000. This I say is an unnecessary increase, for as Mr. Fraser, his predecessor, was willing to perform the duties of the office at $6,000, I submit that it would not have been difficult to get a good man at $8,000 a year to fill the post. Then there was the trip to Wembley of the whips of the Liberal party and the Progressive party, covered by a vote of $20,000 passed last session. I do not believe that ever in the history of our country has a more disgraceful expenditure of public money been made. I do not know any reason why a member of this House should get a trip to the Wembley exhibition at the cost of the taxpayers. I have said that on the stump, and I feel it is only fair that I should say it here.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): Did not the chief whip of the party to our right speak in favour of the vote at the time?

Mr. MANION: I am not sure that he did not support it; but he did not take the trip. I may tell my hon. friend further that every member of this section of the House, perhaps with his exception, voted against it; every member of my hon. friend's party, with the exception of six or seven, supported it, and all the members of the government so far as I remember.

Mr. MURDOCK: Do you hold the same view in regard to the trip which your hon. friend from St. John City (Mr. MacLaren) and one of your own party in the upper house with others made to South Africa?

Mr. MANION: That trip was not paid for by Canada; it was paid for by South Africa.

Mr. MURDOCK: Exactly.

Mr. MANION: I am discussing Canada, not South Africa. I can quite understand that my hon. friend and any other member of the government would wish to import South African affairs into this discussion to get away from the problems at home.

Mr. MacLAREN: As I have been referred to by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), I should like it cleared up whether it is correct that he stated that the Canadian government paid my expenses to South Africa.

Mr. MURDOCK: No, far from it. I never thought of such a thing. I have been told that the government of South Africa spent several hundred thousand dollars in entertaining you and other gentlemen from various parts of the Empire, and I wanted to know if the same principle would be held by my hon. friend from Fort William to apply to the South African expenditure.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend will have to go and ask the people of South Africa. I have nothing to do with their expenditure. I am discussing Canadian affairs. We have quite enough to do to handle the problems of our country without meddling with the affairs of other parts of the Empire.

Mr. BIRD: Did I understand the hon. member to say that the Progressive party took a share in the responsibility of sending the whips to the Old Country?

Mr. MANION: They certainly voted for it, with a few exceptions.

Mr. BIRD: The members of the Progressive party stand exactly on the same ground as the party of the hon. gentleman with respect to that expenditure.

Mr. MANION: How many of the Progressive party voted against that expenditure?

An hon. MEMBER: A good many.

Mr. MANION: How many? Six or seven if my recollection serves me correctly.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MANION: Say ten.

An hon. MEMBER: Two-thirds.

Mr. MANION: At least two-thirds voted against that expenditure? Well, I was in the House when the vote was taken, and I had the pleasure of voting against it. I am open to correction, and I most assuredly would not attempt to put my Progressive friends in a false light, for I am attacking the government, not the Progressive party, but my recollection is that all the members of the Progressive party voted for the expenditure with the exception of seven or eight. Let me test my recollection in this way: One of those who voted against the trip was the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) if I remember correctly.

Mr. McBRIDE: If my memory serves me right, I was about the only one in this party that voted for it.

Mr. MANION: Well, my hon. friends show some symptoms of improvement in being ashamed of the expenditure, anyhow, which is more than I can say for anybody on the other side of the House. Then there was the purchase of the Union Club in London. Canada was, I think, quite satisfactorily carrying on—I have been over there a few times—with our quarters down on Victoria street, where Lord Strathcona and our other high commissioners held out for many years, and yet at this time of financial stress, when the country is labouring under these terrible burdens of taxation, the government, through the high commissioner Mr. Larkin, purchases the Union Club in Trafalgar Square at a cost of over a million dollars—an absolutely unnecessary expenditure of the people's money. Then there were these very fine advertisements which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) has been spreading around from end to end of the Dominion. They are advertisements for the Liberal party—I have not noticed anything in them for the benefit of the Progressive party—and the people of Canada have been paying for them. I think the Liberal party ought at least to pay the expense of their campaign literature. Then the government have appointed from time to time various commissions, I do not know how many, at a cost of over a million dollars. I admit that a few of these commissions may have been justified, but at least half of the expense could have been saved if the government had taken its courage in both hands and decided for itself. Then there was the expenditure on public works—little piers here, little docks there, a little dredging down around Belle river—various expenditures of that kind. I do not blame the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Healy) for getting the money spent in his constituency, but I certainly think the government should put its foot down upon such expenditures. I go further, I declare that if our party comes back to power at the next election, as I am thoroughly convinced it will—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: You are an optimist!

Mr. MANION: They were calling me a pessimist this afternoon! If our party comes back to power at the next election, as I fully believe it will, one of the things it will have to take in hand will be the cutting down of these unnecessary expenditures on public works until Canada begins to get back on her feet again.

Mr. VIEN: Is not my hon. friend hurting the hon. member for Vancouver Centre?

Mr. STEVENS: Not a bit.

Mr. MANION: I will allow the hon. member for Vancouver Centre to take care of himself—he did so pretty well the other day when he was interrupted. I am speaking for myself. I do not think the government appreciate the fact that the country will absolutely drift on the rocks of despair if they continue their present course.

What do we get from the government in its Speech from the Throne as a cure for these conditions? We get a group of pious political platitudes and useless generalities. Let me give some instances. In addition to the statement which the Prime Minister put into the mouth of His Excellency, and which I quoted this afternoon, that the cost of living is the important problem for Canada, we find also this passage:

[Mr. Manion.]

It is apparent that even the most rigid economy in public expenditures will not suffice to solve this pressing problem.

I do not know how they can pass that very dogmatic opinion upon the question, for they have never yet tried to economize. That is the first misstatement. We are told in the Speech that the only solution lies largely in increased production and the development of wider markets. Then His Excellency talks of uncontrollable expenditure which is pressing upon the people of Canada, but the government does not get within a hundred yards of the controllable expenditure,—does not make any promise to cut down controllable expenditure in the matters I have suggested. Next, immigration is dealt with, and we are left to infer that this has reference to the Peace river territory. But what is the use of bringing in immigrants when you are driving out Canadians faster than you can fill their places with newcomers? The equalization of freight rates is then discussed and ocean transportation, and we are informed that money is to be spent upon the St. Lawrence river and the Pacific and Atlantic coast ports. We are also told that a treaty will be introduced into the House to prevent the continuance of the opium and narcotic drug traffic in this country. And that made me reflect that if the Prime Minister expects to remain as leader of this country much longer he will have to relax, not tighten up, the legislation against the importation of opium and narcotic drugs, because we will need some tons of these materials if we are to put the people of this country in the proper somnolent condition to go on believing the pipe dreams that he has been handing out to them for a long time. Finally, the pièce de résistance, if I may be pardoned for speaking in the language of my hon. friends from the province of Quebec—

Mr. FOURNIER: That is fine.

Mr. MANION: I am always pleased to speak in the language of my very good friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier). Now, the Prime Minister says—and this is the pièce de résistance:

You will be asked to sanction the calling of a conference between the federal and provincial governments to consider the advisability of amending the British North America Act with respect to the constitution and powers of the Senate and in other important particulars.

Well, when I remember the fire and brimstone and the sulphuric speeches of the Prime Minister in the prairie provinces, in which he gave the impression that he was going to come down here and tear the Senate from limb to limb, I cannot help thinking he must have been impressed when he was going through that part of the country with some of the tales he had read in his youth of the wild and woolly western people, and he must have come to the conclusion that their diet out there was raw meat and moonshine whiskey. But when he comes back to the east he is probably posted by some of his friends in the matter and told that there are sections of the eastern country where at least the abolition of the Senate is not quite so popular as it is in some other sections; so he comes forward with this milk and water proposal with regard to a conference to deal with the question.

May I just interject here that since we of the House of Commons have taken the holier-than-thou attitude and propose that a conference be called to deal with Senate reform, perhaps at the same time the Senate might suggest that a conference be called to deal with House of Commons reform. While I do not by any means suggest that we cannot usefully reform the Senate, I think by that method at least both the Senate and the House would be mutually improved, to the ultimate benefit of the whole country.

But, where is there in the Speech from the Throne any practical solution offered for the conditions which exist in Canada to-day? Where is there a suggestion made for the relief of business depression, for the supplying of work to the unemployed? Where is there a suggestion to arrest the exodus of the tens of thousands of people who are going from Canada to the United States, or to lessen the taxation which presses so heavily upon the people of this country? Where is there any suggestion even of an idea that retrenchment is required in the expenditure of Canada? Where is there a suggestion of any doctrine to bring back stability to the industry of this country? To every one of these queries, Mr. Speaker, echo answers, where? The government, so far as I can see, has no policy which will bring about any of these things. The only purpose of this government is to keep in power, and they have raised that purpose to the level of a principle.

I am going to close by suggesting three methods of assisting to relieve the conditions which exist in Canada at this time. The first is—and I am not offering it in any spirit of criticism of the government—that we should have in this country to-day a greater spirit of national unity, a greater desire to build up a real national feeling as a result of which the people will be satisfied not only to live in Canada during the sunshine of prosperity, but to remain in Canada during the storm and stress of adversity. It should be a spirit whereby each section of the country, west as much as east and east as much as west, will be more willing than they have been in the past to make some sacrifices for the good of the whole. It should mean the inspiring of the youth of Canada with a real patriotism, not that false patriotism which the Prime Minister spoke of the other day in which he proposed to hide the facts instead of facing them. I do not think there ever was a time when a spirit of unity was more needed in this country, when it was more desirable that we should wipe out all antagonisms of race and creed, all antagonisms as between east and west, and cultivate a spirit which will inspire that patriotism I speak of in the hearts of the sons of us of the House of Commons and of the people of this country generally, making them desire to remain in Canada, even at the cost of some material sacrifice, rather than expatriate themselves and become Americans, probably never to return to the land of their birth. That is the first—national unity. The need for that, I say, I do not lay against the government; I do not wish to charge them with any objection to that policy.

The second thing that we require to relieve the burden of our country is national economy and retrenchment, a real desire on the part of whatever government is in power to reduce its expenditure, to wipe out some of our terrible taxation and to try to copy the systems of the United States, Great Britain and other countries which are cutting down their national debt. And as I say, one of the most necessary things is to wipe out, if they can, some of the appalling taxes which are depressing the people as a whole, and doing an injury to our country the immensity of which the present government shows no signs of appreciating.

And, third, we require a stable national policy of protection for all classes of the people, a policy which will bring about stability of business, will provide Canadian markets for the Canadian people, will give work to those who are unemployed and not force them to go to the United States. In closing may I say, Sir, that these three suggestions may well constitute an appropriate slogan for any party in this country if it desires to bring about Canada's success and prosperity—national unity, national economy, and the national policy.

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne is supposed to embody the conception of the government as to the needs of the country for the coming year. The most important problem which faces the people of Canada to-day is the cost of living, a subject which is referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and referred to in a rather hopeless way. The government states that the most rigid economy that it can exercise will not suffice to solve the problem. The relief which that will afford to the people generally, who are deeply concerned about this question, is not very great, and relief in the matter of taxation is a very necessary thing in Canada at this time. I have never known a time when so much objection was voiced to the extent of the taxation imposed upon the people. Like the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Manion) I have met many people on the street who have protested strongly against the taxation to which they are subjected. People have even telephoned me at my house and protested in the same way. Not only is the burden of taxation objected to by the rank and file of the people, but men who are in high positions are giving a great deal of thought to the matter and are expressing opinions along the same line. The views of these men of attainment who occupy commanding positions, should be deserving of attention.

Mention was made during the progress of the debate that the presidents of various banks had expressed their confidence in the future of Canada; that they were hopeful of the future. But at the same time they issued a strong warning as to the direction in which Canada was headed on account of high taxation. A great deal of attention was devoted to the subject by the president of the Bank of Commerce, Sir John Aird, in his annual address. After going into it thoroughly, he said:

> Undoubtedly we shall suffer by the handicap of the higher level of income in this country as compared with the United States since the reductions recently made in that country.

Sir Herbert Holt President of the Royal Bank also had a good deal to say with regard to taxation and tariff stability. He said with regard to the income tax:

> Let me emphasize here that it is not the wealthy who are the greatest sufferers from high surtaxes, but the rank and file of the people, who find it difficult to secure employment when industry is stagnating, and those who should be investing their money in new enterprises find no incentive to do so. Such a situation can only end in capital leaving Canada to find employment in the United States and elsewhere.

Mr. J. W. Hamilton, general manager of the Union Bank, said in his address:

> Taxation in this country has reached the point of oppression. It has become more than a problem; it is a menace.

Mr. W. R. Allan, president of the same bank, said:

> Taxation in Canada requires anxious thought. Federal and municipal taxes with in some cases provincial additions have become so onerous as to stifle business and discourage effort.

Mr. Speaker, similar warnings were given in many speeches in this House last session, but in spite of that the government pursued a course which aggravated the situation. The result is that not only has the revenue declined very seriously, but the public debt has gone up, and the remedy now proposed by the government is increased production and the development of new and wider markets.

First, as to the necessity of increased production, I am in absolute agreement. It is only by increased production, by mass production, that the costs of manufacturing can be reduced.

As to wider markets, that also is very desirable. The government, however, should not forget that we have the old and reliable market, the home market right here. It is not being supplied by Canadian people, and it should have more attention. We have been abandoning policies which retained in large measure the Canadian market for the Canadian people, and substituting therefor a policy which has given a great deal of our market over to the workmen of other countries. Our Department of Immigration states that the regulations are being enforced very rigidly. No immigrant can come into this country except under agreement to take up domestic service or to work in agriculture. No shop workman, no tradesman is allowed in; he is kept out absolutely, and yet when the product of the labour of that tradesman who is refused admittance comes and knocks at the door of Canada for admittance, what does the government do? It welcomes it by lowering its tariff, and it welcomes it by its neglect to provide this country with a reasonable protection against the depreciated currency and the lower standard of living of these other countries.

The Speech refers to a reduction made in the cost of production of raw materials and the necessaries of life by two measures passed last session. One of these is the reduction in the sales tax, but inasmuch as the government in 1923 increased the sales tax by 100 per cent, and subsequently reduced it from six to five per cent, I suppose they are entitled to all the glory they can extract out of the achievement.

The other factor that is mentioned as having reduced the cost of production is the reduction that was made in the tariff last session. This I suppose refers principally to the changes in the tariff on agricultural implements. I propose to consider that from three angles: first, from the standpoint of the consumer, second from the standpoint of the manufacturer of implements, and third from the standpoint of the manufacturer of the materials that go into the implements.

There has been some controversy over the result of the reductions in the tariff. The right hon. leader of the opposition has maintained that the government has not reduced prices on agricultural implements; the Prime Minister claims that the prices 9 p.m. have been reduced, and quotes figures comparing the last two years only. I support the leader of the opposition in his contention that this government has not reduced the price of agricultural implements. I will go further than that and make this assertion, that on many of the different implements in use on the farm to-day the prices are higher than when this government assumed office. My authority for that statement is found in the retail price lists of implements that have been issued from time to time from December, 1921 to December last by the International Harvester Company, copies of which I have here. The prices I am going to quote are the retail prices to the consumer f.o.b. Hamilton, London and Ottawa. The prices are given in every case as for two October payments These prices include the sales tax in every case where sales tax was applicable. The sales tax on these goods in December, 1921, when this government assumed office was three per cent; that was raised in the session of 1923 to six per cent, and cancelled entirely in April, 1924. There were five distinct price lists issued and used since December, 1921, down to the present day, namely one issued December 1, 1921, and the others on February 1, 1923, November 1, 1923, April 11, 1924, at the time of the announcement of the budget last year, and the last one on December 1, 1924. I have prepared a table showing the prices charged at the various dates on eight different machines, confining myself principally to the list used by the Prime Minister on Monday of this week. I have compared the prices on wagons also, and in fairness must say that the price of wagons is somewhat lower than in 1921, ranging from one to eight dollars less, depending upon the type of wagon. For the sake of brevity and clearness I shall only quote the prices in December, 1921, and those ruling to-day, and I would ask that the whole table be inserted in the record.

A seven-foot binder with no attachments, in 1921 cost $235; the price to the farmer to-day is $237. A sales tax of 3 per cent existed in 1921, and does not exist now.

A five-foot heavy mower in 1921 cost $96 50; to-day it is the same price.

A ten-foot rake with thirty-two teeth, in 1921 cost $52; to-day $54.

A single disc drill with thirteen discs, two and three horse, in 1921 cost $147; to-day $157.

A six-foot, twelve-teeth, three horse cultivator, in 1921 cost $79; to-day, $82.

A sixteen-teeth, spring tooth harrow, with teeth one and a quarter inches wide, in 1921 cost $16,50; to-day $18.

A walking plough, No. 121, in 1921 cost $23.50; to-day $23.50.

A disc harrow, out-throw twelve discs, in 1921 cost $58; to-day $62.

These figures, Mr. Speaker, should throw some light on the controversy. The price lists I have here contain a diversified list of machinery, and cover many different types, but I have taken one machine and carried the price through on that same machine in making my comparison. It may be found in these price lists that the prices are in some cases lower than in 1921, but I submit that the prices of the great majority of the machines used by the farmer to-day are higher than they were in 1921.

Now let us consider the question from the standpoint of the manufacturer of implements. The prices I have just quoted were the prices the farmer paid, and included a three per cent sales tax which was collected in 1921. This sales tax was paid by the maker of the implement into the exchequer of Canada.

When this reduction was made; the price the manufacturer really received for the binder referred to was, in 1921, $227.95, while he now receives for the same machine $237, which gives him to-day a price actually $9.05 higher than he charged in 1921.

For the mower he receives $2.90 more than in 1921: for the rake he receives $3.56 more than in 1921; for the disc drill he receives $14.41 more than in 1921; for the cultivator he receives $5.37 more than in 1921; for the spring tooth harrow he receives $2 more than in 1921; for the plough he receives 70 cents more than in 1921; for the disc harrow he receives $5.74 more than in 1921.

These advances in price figured out, make the price received by the manufacturer to-day about 5 per cent higher than the prices charged the farmer in 1921. In the meantime, the government by its 1924 budget reduced the duties on raw material to the manufacturer of implements.

Pig iron was put on the free list; previously, being subject to 99 per cent drawback of duty. Rolled iron and steel bars were put on the free list, being a reduction of duty of 21 cents per 100 pounds. All other materials entering into the machinery, a list of which comprising some 140 different articles was placed on Hansard by the Acting Minister of Finance on May 23, 1924, were also reduced. This long list was formerly subject to varying duties on all but averaged about 20 per cent. The duty was reduced to 6 per cent thereby making a saving to the agricultural implement manufacturer of about 14 per cent.

No wonder the manufacturer of implements, as he reviews his position of three and a half years ago and contemplates the enhanced price of his product and the cheaper price of raw materials, can say with a smile that the tariff changes of 1924, "didn't hurt us at all."

Now let us go one step farther back in the process of manufacturing and consider the effect on the business of the makers of the raw material for the manufacture of agricultural implements.

I find by the Trade and Commerce report issued in November, 1924, that items in the miscellaneous list of materials reduced to 6 per cent duty have been coming into Canada from the United States since April last at the rate of about $1,000,000 per year—manufacturing business lost to the workmen and manufacturers of this country.

Pig iron used in this business has been coming in at the rate of 32,000 tons per year; this is also business lost to the workmen and manufacturers of this country. Iron and steel bars, on two items only, No. 445 and No. 446 of the tariff—which was all I could identify in the report—are coming in at the rate of 13,000 tons per year, the manufacture of which is also lost to this country.

Nor is that the true measure of the harm that has been done to the iron and steel industry of Canada, as many manufacturers, unable to get enough business to keep going and anxious to keep working organizations together, are taking a portion of such business at a loss.

The Prime Minister in his address referred to the iron and steel business of Canada and sought to give the impression that Canada had not suffered in 1924 as had the United States.

Everyone knows that in 1924 the United States was in the throes of a presidential election. The experience of that country is that presidential election year is rarely a good business year, and owing to the peculiar circumstances existent during last election, there was an unusual amount of uncertainty in the minds of the people and, as a consequence, business was halting. Business had been good until April of that year. In fact, the pig iron output—which is regarded as a very good barometer of business—was in April of 1924, within a comparatively small amount of the highest monthly record of the last five years. This pig iron output gradually declined during the progress of the election campaign, but; when the election—with its reassuring results—was over the business activity revived at once. The iron and steel trade recovered quickly and is now producing at 80 to 90 per cent and in some cases 100 per cent of its capacity.

The Prime Minister also quotes the Iron Age, a trade journal published in New York, as an authority. I accept his authority. the Iron Age is generally regarded as a fair and accurate mirror of conditions in the iron and steel industry.

He made some quotations from an issue of January 1925. I would like to make reference to, and quote from, an article which appeared in the columns of the Iron Age in the last issue of last month, with particular reference to Canada.

The Iron Age commissioned one of its correspondents to make special inquiries as to the results of the tariff of 1924 as it affected Canadian iron and steel industries. The report was published in the issue of January 29, 1925. It is headed; "Tariff reductions have disastrous effects"; "Canadian industries depressed and production greatly reduced".

The iron and steel industry is one of the most important factors in Canada's national life. According to the latest returns available there were in 1922, 1,046 firms engaged in the manufacture of iron and steel products in this country.

In 1922, 75,434 wage-earners were employed in the steel industry of this country; the amount of capital employed was $526,109,953.

Following the close of the Great War, the iron and steel industry of Canada has been waging an uphill fight to keep its head above water. In addition to the general depression in the markets of the world, the Canadian industry had to contend with steadily decreasing tariff protection, with the result that the number of plants engaged in this industry have been steadily decreasing for the past three or four years. Reliable reports indicate that 30 plants engaged in the iron and steel industry failed in the year 1921; 77 in 1922 and 83 in 1923. While figures for 1924 are not available at the moment, it is estimated that the number of firms to cease operation during the past twelve months will equal if not exceed those which closed down during the previous year.

The monthly reports of the Dominion government indicate that in 1923 the iron and steel industry experienced a partial recovery from the depression of the two previous years, but that a marked decline took place at the beginning of 1924, followed by an upward trend during the first quarter, when a further decline took place, following the announcement of the Robb budget with its drastic tariff reductions on April 11.

Data on the comparative number of workers engaged in the iron and steel industry indicate that only 48 per cent of the normal working force is employed at the present time. Presenting the antithesis of this, there exists in this particular branch of Canadian industry unemployment to the extent of 52 per cent of workers who could be given employment under normal conditions. The returns show iron and steel plants to be working only 74.4 per cent of normal or full time, with the 48 per cent of working force referred to above. This in effect means that workers now employed are, on an average, losing 25.6 per cent of their working time and the corresponding earnings, due to short time operations, which in itself adds appreciably to the extent of actual existing unemployment. A majority of firms engaged in this industry are operating on reduced schedules, in many cases at a loss, merely as an alternative to closing down and adding further to the volume of unemployment.

Data as to the additional number of workers who could be engaged, if conditions should warrant an immediate return to normal operations, indicate that on a very conservative estimate 51,000 additional workers could be given employment. As a consequence of the unemployment situation brought about by depression in industry chiefly resulting from the lack of adequate tariff protection, it is estimated that upward of 400,000 workers emigrated to the United States during the past four years to seek employment in the protected industries of that country. While the loss of Canadian workmen through emigration during the years 1921, 1922 and 1923 was a serious blow to this country's population, the number of workmen who left this country in 1924, following the depression caused by the Robb tariff changes, was considerably greater than for any corresponding period during the past four years, being estimated at between 13,000 and 14,000 per month.

While it is recognized that the depression in the iron and steel industry is not entirely attributable to lack of tariff protection, it is certain that conditions now existing definitely reflect the adverse influence of tariff reductions made effective early last year, and point clearly to the conclusion that proper and adequate protection would contribute largely to a revival of business and a renewal of productive activity. Complete information as to the number of plants closed down as a result of tariff reductions would require considerable time and investigation to secure. It is reported, however, that nine plants have closed down as a direct result of the tariff reductions and in other cases these reductions contributed largely to discontinuance of operations. The gas tractor industry might be cited as an illustration of inadequate tariff protection. Considerable investment was made in former years in plant and equipment for the manufacture of gas tractors. The tariff on these was removed during the war period and was never restored in spite of promises that this would be done. Foreign competition on a free basis forced the closing down of Canadian plants, or their diversion to other lines, and the great volume of the Canadian tractor business has gone to the United States.

There is a further report as to the reduction of production and a statement as to the reduction in the tariff in 1924, followed by these remarks:

Not only has the volume of business in the agricultural implement manufacturing industry been definitely curtailed as a result of these tariff reductions, but prospects for improvement have been seriously affected by reason of the widespread uncertainty and lack of confidence which the possibility of further reductions has engendered in the minds of financial men, individual investors and manufacturers generally regarding the stability of factors which control industrial operations.

The report is a long one and takes up many other phases of the situation. It refers to the effect of putting pig iron on the free list. I have referred to that in my earlier remarks. It gives a table of production of pig iron in Canada during 1923 and 1924, showing that during the eight months which succeeded the bringing down of the budget of 1924, the decline in the production of pig iron in Canada was 52 per cent. The production for last year was the lowest on record since 1908 with the single exception of 1923. The report states further:

Within the past few months, European interests have been making strong bids to secure a footing in this market. Especially is this the case with regard to Belgian concerns, whose production costs are considerably below those of Canadian mills and are able to undersell the latter in their own market.

Then follows a table, showing the production of steel ingots and castings in Canada during 1924, the results being practically the same as those in connection with the production of pig iron. The report concludes by stating:

In a speech delivered in Toronto on January 12, Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, stated that, for the time at least, the Liberal government is through with tariff reductions, and there will be no more tinkering with the existing schedule of customs charges until there has been an opportunity to see how the present arrangement works out. Despite the foregoing statement Canadian steel interests are not ready to announce future plans, but are waiting to see what steps will be taken by the government with regard to tariff changes when the budget for 1925 is brought down.

That is from the authority quoted by the Prime Minister and accepted by him. I have another statement in regard to the export business in iron and steel in the United States during 1923-1924, which shows that in 1923 Canada consumed 39 per cent of the total export business of that country and in 1924 she consumed 31 per cent, the next highest being Japan with 16 per cent. It also adds that Canada, which was the largest individual foreign market for United States iron and steel in the 1923 period, "maintained its commanding position in the 1924 period." The report I have just read contains statements as to the lack of continuity in employment in this industry in many concerns, giving names, and I communicated with one concern which, in June 1924, wrote me that their production had been affected to the extent of 65 per cent by the tariff changes of last year. I have this wire in reply to my inquiry:

Hamilton.

Replying wire there has been no improvement our business situation since advising you last June. Cannot ourselves look for any decided improvement under present tariff conditions. Same restricted business operation continues as result budget changes explained in our letter June 24, 1924. Mill operations from July 1st to January 31st only 23 per cent of the possible. Mill closed down since February 1st. Outlook immediate future not good. Unemployment situation most serious.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the situation in which the iron and steel industry of Canada finds itself to-day, and it is anything but a healthy condition. The customs duty is specific, so much per ton, no matter what the price may be. On rolled products, the duty which used to be about nine to twelve dollars per ton was placed at seven dollars per ton in 1907. It has remained the same when the commodity was selling at one dollar per hundred pounds as when the price was three times that amount. Gradually the duty has been lowered by means of drawbacks until the description which I have just read from the Iron Age of the condition of the industry is a very accurate one.

I said last year, in speaking on the budget, that I believed that as regards the implement industry, only the manufacturers themselves could make an accurate forecast as to how these changes would work out, because they only knew all the intricate details of their business. I also said that in my judgment the iron and steel industry was called upon to make the greatest sacrifice. I also said that the whole situation in relation to the industry should be subject to an exhaustive survey and intelligent treatment if the industry was to be retained in Canada I showed that, as regards the iron and steel used in the implement industry, Canadian manufacturers were deprived of all tariff protection while they were subjected to customs levies on their fuel, to customs levies and sales tax on their machinery and supplies of all kinds. Events that have occurred since last session have been a confirmation of my statements. Truly, as the Iron Age states, Canada "is in a commanding position," a position of prominence, of eminence—yes, eminently foolish in my judgment when, with all her natural resources of millions of tons of coal and millions of tons of iron ore, she welcomes from the nation which produces 55 per cent of all the iron and steel produced in the whole world, one-third of the export business in iron and steel which that country does. If the government last year had even left the tariff as it was, and in its opulence, due to the surplus then claimed, had reduced the sales tax still further; or if it had made provision for competition with the United States in the reduction of its income tax levy, then Canada, and particularly the iron and steel business, would be in a better position to-day. I am not now referring to the detrimental influence which this has had on the National Railways or on general business. According to the press, many requests have been made of the government recently for increases in the tariff. Not long ago the coal and steel interests of Nova Scotia were reported as having interviewed the government; and they were supported, I understand, by most of the members from that province. These hon. gentlemen supported the government last year in helping to destroy an industry, and in a few short months they come back asking that their mistake be corrected. The boot and shoe workers have also demanded recognition of their claims for consideration. Nor is the demand all from the industries. During the life of this parliament the onion growers of Essex, the tobacco growers of Kent, the sheep breeders of western Ontario, the Niagara Peninsula Fruit Growers' Association, the United Farmers of Quebec, only a few days ago, and no doubt others, are all on record as to their desire to keep Canadian markets for the Canadian people. In spite of all this expressed public opinion there are some in the government who say that they are determined to persevere until the famous 1919 declaration becomes a reality. The Prime Minister declares that for the time at least nothing more will be done; but this is not reassuring to business. There is no stability, and business men are afraid to invest. I should like to know why the government does not proceed to carry out its entire programme. There were other fields to be entered: the principal articles of food, lumber, oils, gasoline and cement were all to go on the free list; they have not been interfered with and the government has been in office four years. The substantial reductions that were to have been made in wearing apparel and footwear have not yet become evident. I might suggest also automobiles and furniture; but of course if the government were to tamper with automobiles they might lose the support of the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Clifford) or possibly the support of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Healy), while if they touched furniture they might suffer the loss of the support of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm). Only this week the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) has pledged the support of his followers, to the last man, to the government if they will carry out the 1919 platform. The hon. gentleman might, however, keep his eye on the member for South Waterloo (Mr. Elliott). If the government has any faith in its platform it should give it effect; if it has lost faith in its doctrine it should retrace its steps and try some other plan.

Reference is made in the Speech from the Throne as to the constitution and powers of the Senate. Like many a new member, I had hopes of a few reforms in the Senate, myself. When I read in the press the declarations of the Prime Minister in many speeches, during the recess, I had hopes that he had a panacea for all the ills brought about by the Senate, and I expected from the tone of the speeches it would be handled as some express it, in two-fisted, he-man fashion. But when I found the programme had taken the form of a mild request to parliament to sanction the calling of a conference on the subject, my hopes vanished. Why ask the sanction of parliament for the calling of a conference? If the Prime Minister was deeply in earnest on this subject, why did he not call a conference during the recess and bring the results to this House in the form of a government measure? Action could then have been taken at this session.

Without the consent of parliament, the government has called other conferences. There was a conference on the natural resources question which was to be settled, instanter. There was a conference on taxation, which would be productive of a lessening of the burdens of the people. There was a conference on unemployment, which resulted in the advice to everybody to employ more workmen, but nothing further. If this proposed conference on Senate matters is not productive of more tangible results than those I have mentioned, the members of the Senate may rest at ease in Zion for some time to come.

In closing, I wish to say that a careless House of Commons which lets legislation go through without due consideration, or a politically careful House of Commons which lets legislation go through rather than offend some of the electorate, will have to assume responsibility in direct proportion as the powers of the Senate are curtailed. Is the House of Commons ready to accept the responsibility and discharge that responsibility in the interests of good government?

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): Kindly permit me, Mr. Speaker, to express my regret that the genial leader of the Progressive party has seen fit to take a retrograde step in his decision to oppose an ancient custom of the British race, that of free and unrestricted speech. I want to remind the hon. gentleman on this occasion that opportunities to discuss matters that arise in the Speech from the Throne are not always available. I would call his attention to the fact that last session many matters of interest would have failed to receive adequate discussion in this House had it not been for the insistence of another leader of the Progressive party that sufficient consideration should be afforded—I refer to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). We must at this time take issue with those who seek to restrict discussion of the Speech from the Throne; otherwise we disclaim our responsibility as individuals in this parliament to study, to advocate or to support statements when they have been made. And once that phase of routine passes, then, as we saw this afternoon, it is very difficult to revive it. Consequently as an individual member of the House I am willing to take whatever criticism comes to me concerning the detention of the House while I undertake to express my views touching the Speech.

We must after some study in the House concur in the opinion that there are two parties and but two parties here. There is a party that sings prosperity and there is a party that doubts it. There is a party that has a policy and there is a party that has none. There is a party that had a policy but has not now, and there is the other party that has a policy of stability. There is the party also which, no matter what policy it may adopt, will be certainly followed by the other party even if it comes to a question of agreement by silence. Therefore, when there is dissatisfaction with statements that have been made in the House, no member has a right to sit silent. The Speech from the Throne has been defended wholly by the Prime Minister, consequently our differences of opinion will be largely with him. His speech was filled with tables, graphs and indices. In my school days I always regarded with amazement the student who could go to the blackboard and prove: Cosign 1 equals cosign 2 plus X over Y minus Y over Z. Such a problem we have had exhibited to us by the Prime Minister, but the mystification will not deceive the country.

He states emphatically that our people are returning from the United States. Why? Because, he says, Canada is more prosperous than the United States. I have interviewed some of our men who have returned, and I find the principal reason for their doing so is that most of them had not legally transferred themselves. As the House is aware, at the present time this transfer necessitates the completion of several papers at a considerable expense. Many of our workers, unfortunately, have not had the requisite funds, and have crossed illegally, and after some length of time they have been forced to return. That period may run to six months and over, because very often they are given the privilege of securing the necessary papers from Canada. Another class of worker who has returned is the physically unfit. Many of the factories across the line are ready enough to retain our physically fit men, but they object to the physically unfit.

It is impossible to maintain the position that there is no exodus at the present time from the Dominion to the United States. I have a clipping from the Kingston Standard in reference to this migration, in the course of which it is stated:

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

It is learned from an authentic though unofficial source that the exodus of Canadians from this Dominion to the United States in search of continuous employment has by no means ceased. In this city three or four Canadians apply every day for passports and other documents necessary for them to cross the boundary line, while in Toronto the records of the United States consul are reported as showing that 25 Canadians leave that city daily to take up permanent residence in the country to the south. In addition to the general exodus amongst bona fide Canadians, it is understood that Britishers, that is, English, Scotch and Irish, who do not come under the category of Canadians, are just as anxious as the real Johnny Canucks to leave the country of their adoption. The quota for Britishers is complete, but this does not deter many of them from applying for passports to cross the boundary, and it is interesting to note that there is at present a waiting list of such applicants which is sufficient to fill the quota from Kingston until November, 1925, while in Toronto the waiting list is so big that the quota is easily filled for the next ten years to come.

Mr. MURDOCK: What is the date please?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): This month—February. Another sign of prosperity relied on by the Prime Minister was the opinion expressed by bank managers at the annual meetings of their shareholders. The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) stated that the Prime Minister quoted what suited him from such statements, and I agree with the hon. member. The House will pardon me if I repeat what the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg quoted. Sir Vincent Meredith of the Bank of Montreal said:

The figures of foreign trade are encouraging. We have been able to reach this large amount chiefly because of the enormous western grain crop in 1923. The other outstanding item in respect of exports is forest products.

These two things are taken up in the trade reports.

But the general manager of this same bank reports as follows:

Business is quiet. A stronger definition might be used without exaggeration.

Then we have the rather interesting words of Sir Herbert Holt, president of the Royal Bank. I will quote only these few lines:

At our last three annual meetings while expressing faith in the utimate future of Canada, I have on each occasion to chronicle a year of slow business.

These bank managers do not at all agree with the Prime Minister. He sees another sign of prosperity in the blowing of factory whistles—a sufficient proof to him that industry is very satisfactory. Well, one of our largest industries in Kingston blows its whistle every day, but out of an ordinary payroll of between five and six hundred men only fifty are employed. And that is the state of affairs at a time when engines are being manufactured in the United States for our Canadian railways, paid for by Canadian money, and giving employment to workmen in that country.

The whole speech of the Prime Minister can be answered by a single word,—why. If this country is prosperous, why do people leave? If this country is more prosperous than the United States, why are our people crowding the American Consul's offices to be transferred across the boundary? If the policy of the government has produced results so satisfactory in the opinion of the Prime Minister, why does the government pause in its course; why not go full steam ahead until all the desires of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) are fully satisfied by the death of protection? No, Mr. Speaker, these are not the signs of prosperity. The Prime Minister, I am afraid, has surrounded himself with his graph master and his index master, instead of going out among the people and observing conditions as they really exist. If he will come with me through the main streets of any of our towns and cities he will see there unoccupied stores, for the first time in many years, and if he goes into the occupied stores he will find the clerks standing idle; if he goes down to the parts occupied by the working people he will find for the first time in many years signs "to let" on empty houses all along the streets; if he comes to our city markets he will find there abundance of agricultural products, but few buyers and low prices; if he goes to the grocery shop he will find the grocer complaining of lack of money —a complaint that is general throughout the city. These are more reliable signs of the condition of the country than second-hand evidence.

The Speech from the Throne refers to immigration. If the government would cease its declaration of policies and be practical, it would absolve itself from many errors and complaints from different classes of the people; it would withdraw from any aggressive policy of immigration at the present time. And in that I am voicing the opinion of our municipal authorities and our labour men. I quite agree that we need more population, but it will not be gained until we have employment or places to put people who come to this country. Great errors have been made by the government, indirectly by their agents or by the railway agents. Let me refer here to the experience of three splendid men who came to the city of Kingston and interviewed the mayor. They complained that they had been misled by lectures and by shows in the Old Country. The experience of these men is set forth in the following paragraph:

> The Dominion immigration problem as it affects local conditions was brought home very forcibly this morning when three young English-men interviewed the mayor, registering a complaint against the inference which they were allowed to draw regarding industrial conditions in Canada by Canadian government and steamship agents in the Old Country before taking their passage to Canada.
> The trio were all married men, splendid types of intelligent mechanics, one of whom held a commission in the Imperial army during the war. Each one of them is in possession of references proving them to be experienced workmen of a high grade, and one of them was for twenty years a supervisor with the same firm in England.
> These men told a story to the mayor, corroborating one another as they went along, which points very distinctly to the fact that there is something wrong with the present immigration system.
> They stated that they had been greatly influenced by lectures which they had attended in England, in which the industrial and agricultural opportunities which exist in Canada were painted in very glowing colors. Questioned by the mayor they were unanimous in the statement that the need for agricultural workers in Canada had not been emphasized in any degree whatsoever, and that industrial conditions were painted in the same colors as agricultural conditions.

This will show that the policy of bringing immigrants here indiscriminately for the sake of numbers is a very wrong policy, and the government, whether directly or indirectly, is subject to criticism in that respect.

With regard to the government's settlement policy as referred to in the Speech from the Throne, I should like to deal with one feature of that subject which has already been touched upon by one of the speakers, namely, the intention to bring settlers to this country and place them in the Peace river district. I think we have already seen the great mistake of having men go away up into the Peace river country and then make complaints. It would be very unwise, it seems to me, on the part of the government to place even one settler in the Peace river country when there are other sections suitable for settlement. There is a great opportunity to resettle areas in Nova Scotia. Here are vacant farms; here are pleasant conditions by which our British citizens can be surrounded. There is also an opportunity in New Brunswick and in Quebec, and there is a very great opportunity in Ontario. I would refer the government to what I look upon as one of the most promising areas in this Dominion. Astride the Grand Trunk Pacific, in northern Ontario, on and just north of the great divide separating the drainage into James bay from that into the St. Lawrence, is situated a great area of arable land 40,000 square miles, more or less, in dimensions. It projects about 140 miles into Quebec and the same distance into Ontario. The greater part of this area lies south of the 50th parallel of latitude, which on the prairie passes just north of the city of Winnipeg. The physical properties and derivation of the clay in this area are exactly those of the Winnipeg clay belt. Both are the result of glacial lake deposits. Both represent the existence of a huge lake which was formed by the damming up of the northward flowing rivers as the ice cap retreated northward from its great southern encroachment. Where thick beds of this lake deposit have been sectional by post glacial action of rivers, it is found to consist of comparatively thin bedded sand and clay which when cultivated will form the richest of loams.

Here is an area far preferable at the present time to that of the Peace river district, although I will not disparage the Peace river district, because I know the quality of the land there; it is one of the finest areas in the Dominion. But here is an area almost as good, with all sorts of possibilities, with proximity to transportation and with very many other advantages to the settler. In addition to that the settler would be close to the great gold belt, and he would have a diversified employment. He would have the privilege of cutting the light timber which is found there, for the purpose of making a living in between seasons. I would strongly urge upon the government the desirability of considering these areas which I have mentioned rather than the Peace river district for the purposes of settlement of this kind. If the intention of the government is to create a railroad connection to serve that elevator which is to be built at Prince Rupert, then I think they are placing a great burden upon the country, increasing the taxation and the capital expenditure, which we in time will have to pay, without very much result.

In regard to ocean rates. I look upon the reference to the matter in the Speech as a red herring, nothing else, to draw the attention of the people from the unemployment and from the other conditions of depression which prevail. Or it may be a camouflage, to pretend to carry out this promised war on the combines. If that is the case I fail to see why they should undertake to bonus when they have in their midst the greatest combine eater in America in the person of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). Why, for years he has been gnashing his teeth against the combines; he has had three years of opportunity, but nothing has been done. If the proposal is really a measure of protection, and as our friends to the left intend to support the government, then that will be another policy of protection which they must stand back of. If that is what it amounts to, where are those champion bell ringers, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), and will they permit this system of protection to be instituted? We had an example of the position in which the government finds itself in the expedition, referred to by another speaker, which, accompanied by the chief whip of the government, came up from Nova Scotia and asked for protection. As the chief whip journeyed to Ottawa I would like to have known his inmost thoughts when he remembered the declaration of his two colleagues that they were ringing the death knell of protection. Here he was, coming up from Nova Scotia to plead the very cause of protection. I would like to have had his thoughts as he recalled the many days and nights that he worked here, pressing his party from both sides of the House to kill protection, to murder it at any cost; and now the ghost rises up to torment him in this latest protection proposal of the government. If this proposal is real, why not place in the Speech from the Throne the promise of a bonus to the National Railways and to the Canadian Pacific to carry coal from the east and the west to the central part of Canada for the benefit of the workingmen and the miners of the east and the west? A bonus for that purpose is just as much justified as a bonus to ocean steamers. If the government is really sincere, why not bonus a Canadian steamship company? One cannot say very much further on this matter. We can only wait for the promise to be carried out; but if there is to be a bonus to a steamship company, then I am willing to support members from Nova Scotia and members from Alberta in asking for a bonus for the railways to develop the mining industry in eastern and western Canada and to help bring Canadian coal to central Canada.

Passing from a mere criticism of the Speech from the Throne, I would like to refer for a few minutes to some special requirements pressing upon us at the present time. Reference has been made to improvements in the harbours on the St. Lawrence route. I want to join with the member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) in pressing upon the government the opinion he expressed this afternoon, that more important to the province of Ontario is the development of power on the St. Lawrence. Some years ago when the hydro-electric system was introduced in Ontario, we believed that we had an abundance of power in this country. We never believed that we would reach a time of shortage, and yet so splendid has been the development of that system and so popular and widespread the use of electricity in the province that we are now face to face with a power shortage, and if the government does not give immediate support to the offer of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission, it will bring about a very unsatisfactory state of affairs in this province. The development of this power will not cost the citizens of Canada one cent; the province of Ontario is willing to pay the cost of the whole development. All the province wants is that the federal government shall give the commission permission to go forward with that development. Electricity is not now used simply in the development of industry. It has become just as important to the farmers and to the citizens in general; its benefits are not confined to any one class. We in the east have stood aside, and have supported the development in the central part of Canada, believing that our time would soon come when the development of power should take place upon the St. Lawrence, and we do not wish now to see that project connected with any other problem. The deepening of the St. Lawrence is important and will come in its own time, but there is a pressing necessity at the present time for the development of power on the St. Lawrence, and we feel that we can ask for the sympathetic support of the east and west in this matter, especially as the development will not cost Canada in general one cent, for Ontario is willing to bear the whole extent. There is no reference to this matter in the Speech from the Throne, although if this question is not faced by the government it will bring a calamity upon the province; it will affect the country generally, because if we cannot get electrical power in the province of Ontario we must turn to the importation of coal and increase the millions of dollars we already send over to the United States for that purpose, unless we give a bonus to the railways to bring coal from western and eastern Canada. A calamity will face us if this development is not gone on with, and we feel that we can appeal for the sympathetic support of both east and west in urging upon the government the granting of immediate permission for this power development on the St. Lawrence.

There is also before us the question of the completion of the Welland canal. We are quite aware that its completion will be some years off yet, but the government should now place itself on record as to the policy they will adopt in regard to navigation beyond the Welland canal. We in Kingston believe that the harbour of Kingston has been naturally selected as the terminus of the deep waterway to the Welland canal. Work was begun there some years ago, and we are now looking to this government to say that the policy which was instituted some years ago will be continued by them when the proper time comes.

There is another matter of very great importance to this country which has not been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and that is the effect of present conditions on shipbuilding. Some time before the war and during the war the shipbuilding industry in this country developed greatly, especially at such points as Port Arthur, Collingwood, Midland, Toronto and Kingston on the Great Lakes, at Montreal, Quebec and Halifax in the eastern provinces, and at Victoria, Vancouver and Prince Rupert in British Columbia. Now the people who have invested their money in this great industry in Canada find themselves in this peculiar position. Perhaps I had better read the clauses of the resolution which has been submitted to the government by the Associated Boards of Trade in aid of the shipbuilding industry:

> Whereas under the provisions of the United States Merchant Marine Act, Chapter 250, of the year 1920, known as the Jones Law, all ships built or owned outside of the United States are prohibited from entering the coast-wise trade of the United States, and under the customs tariff of the United States, a United States vessel which has repairs made or purchases equipment in any foreign port is subject to an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent on the cost of repairs or equipment, to be paid at the first United States port of call;

That is a very important clause, and is another example of how thoroughly the United States protects her industries. The resolution goes on:

> And whereas under the Canadian Customs Act of July 20th, 1908, there is no duty payable on repairs or equipment purchased in any foreign port, except a duty of 25 per cent in the case of vessels engaging in the coast-wise trade within a year after repairs have been made or equipment purchased in the foreign port.

No other industry suffers such an apparent disadvantage as is placed upon the shipbuilding industry by these two clauses, one from a United States law, and the other from a law of Canada. The shipbuilders of Canada are pleading with the government to come to their support and give them a law somewhat similar or equal to that which has been given to shipbuilders of the United States, and they have asked:

> Therefore be it resolved that the Dominion government be urged to take such action in respect of repairs made or equipment purchased in a foreign port for any Canadian registered vessel as will accord thereto the same treatment as the country of such foreign port extends to repairs made or equipment purchased in Canada.

I am going to make a suggestion as to the ways and means by which the condition in this country can be changed. I have another suggestion, which I think should have a place in the Speech from the Throne and should have been dealt with by this government; that is as to the development of our ores. I suggest that the government could very well cut two or three millions dollars out of their present immigration expenditure and employ that money on the development of those ores in the Dominion of Canada. We are rich in ores and yet the only use made of them is to carry them to the United States. The development of our ores would mean a great deal to the industrial world of Canada, because some of the largest industries of the United States are purely developed from the smelting and converting into products of Canadian ores in that country. I would thoroughly and heartily support any assistance by way of bonus that this government could give to the development of our iron ore industry. It would build up an immense asset, and would result I am sure, in an immense increase in our population.

I should like to make another suggestion which if adopted by the government would enable them to make use of men who are walking our streets. As hon. members travel over our Canadian railways they will hardly ever pass a central place at which they will not see a number of idle and disabled cars and engines. The government could very well undertake the repair of these cars and engines at the present time. Hundreds of them are lying idle. My suggestion would give employment to our people, and would also lessen the capital expenditure which will have to be made later on for equipment and so forth, on the railways. If anyone travels along these railways he will see hundreds of these cars lying idle at different places, and these cars simply require repairs to make them useful. This would obviate expense in the future.

In conclusion I point out that what we need more than anything else is a policy. We cannot hope for any change as long as our present government look at the conditions as they do. I am sure that, even though the members to our left support the government, they feel the need of just such a policy, and I would like to read the words of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), speaking in the west, in which he demands a new policy. These are his words with regard to the Prime Minister:

> What about Premier King? I heard him speak in Winnipeg recently and it was the address of an elocutionist. There was not an interesting sentence or a stimulating thought. What is the Liberal policy? I have been trying for three years to find out and am more mystified than ever.
> [Mr. A. E. Ross.]

And I am sure after he has heard the present Speech from the Throne his mystification will very much increase. We need a policy, Mr. Speaker, which will look conditions squarely in the face and will undertake to better those conditions. If I am wrong in saying that there is unemployment and dissatisfaction in the country which can be corrected, then I should like to hear discussion on those lines in the House and not merely a policy of silence. If the government have no policy, if the leader of the Progressive party has no policy as he said in the debate, then surely it would not hurt him to come under our banner where there is a policy, not of to-day or to-morrow, but a stable policy under which we will guarantee a return to satisfactory conditions in this country. We ask consideration and discussion of such a policy, but we do not want a policy of silence, or apparent agreement with conditions, as expressed by the Prime Minister. If we are wrong in what we point out now as the real condition in this country, then it should be up to the government to further discuss this question.

Mr. ALEXANDRE J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish with your permission, to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BELAND (Translation): It is yet early; my hon. friend has his notes in readiness; with his glib tongue, I fancy he would find it an easy matter to go on with the debate this evening.

Mr. DOUCET (Translation): For several reasons, I should have preferred abstaining from addressing the House this evening: In the first place, it is rather late, and after sitting for three consecutive hours, some relaxation is welcome. However, I shall go on speaking in English.

In attempting to speak upon the debate, Mr. Speaker, I will adopt the old English axiom, that brevity is the soal of wit; not that I pretend to be witty, but I assure hon. members I shall endeavour to be brief.

When I moved the adjournment of the debate, it was not due to superstition, because this is Friday and the thirteenth of the month; but because I did not wish to tire the House at this late hour of the evening, after we have been in session since three o'clock.

I wish to say a few words upon the Speech from the Throne as delivered in this House. In my view the first section of it which states that the year 1924 was a period of substantial progress is altogether at variance with conditions as they exist from the Atlantic to the Pacific. No one knows that better than the members of the government who have been travelling from the Pacific to the Atlantic during the recess. Progress we have not in this country, and I make no apology for stating here this evening that unless the policy of the government is amended so as to give some benefits to the various industries destined to develop and manufacture our raw materials, we shall not have substantial progress in Canada.

Again referring to the Speech from the Throne, I find that the government intends economizing on public works. This is somewhat in keeping with a statement made in Vancouver last October by the Prime Minister himself, but only as regards the east, because I have in my hand a copy of the Vancouver Sun of the 22nd October last, according to which the Prime Minister himself said:

> Recalling the difficulties of government, Premier King said he would have to tell his friends in the east that they could not yet count on their needed public buildings, wharves nor branch lines as the money was needed in the west.

We, in the east, interpret that, in these words, "that the east must wait". The east is anxious to give fair treatment to every section of this Dominion; the east is anxious to see that fairplay is given to every part of this Dominion, but the east, after having submitted to the tariff reductions of last session which have paralyzed its industries, is not in a mood to submit to a curtailment of public expenditures for the benefit of one section of the country alone. We are told in the speech delivered by the Prime Minister in this House the other day and reported on page 38 of Hansard, that farm implements have been reduced in price in 1924. Citing six different farm implements, he states that they have been reduced from $953.50 to $905.50, a total reduction of $48. That does not cover the excess in price due to the increase of the excise tax which the present government placed in the statutes of 1923. Yet they try to pacify the farming population of this country by stating that their tinkering with the tariff in 1924 has caused a decrease in the price of farm implements. My hon. friends to my left must realize by this time, as we representing the farming population of the Maritime provinces realize, that there has been no decrease in the cost of farm implements; that while there have been various and substantial cuts in the tariff on farm implements since 1907, I submit, as has been submitted by the hon. member for London (Mr. White) that to-day we are paying more for farm implements and will continue to pay more. Why? Because our farm implement industries are not getting the protection they need against goods from without. From the speech of the Prime Minister, as reported on page 39 of Hansard, we find that the cost of living has decreased, or that it is not as high as it is in the neighbouring republic to the south of us. It does not matter very much to me whether the cost of living is reduced or not if our workmen, our mechanics, our railwaymen and all men who work for a daily wage are not getting the money with which to buy the necessaries of life. In making the comparison, the Prime Minister states that, taking a number of articles, the cost in the United States is $10.46 as against $8.70 in Canada. In taking those figures, I am led to ascertain in what respect the cost of living is less in Canada than in the United States. I find the following:

Commodities	Quantity	United States	Canada
Beef, four different cuts.	1 pound	44 cents	32 cents
Milk..	1 quart	13½ cents	11½ cents
Butter..	1 pound	49 cents	39 cents
Cheese..	1 pound	34.4 cents	28.4 cents
Eggs..	1 dozen	39.4 cents	31.8 cents
Potatoes..	1 bushel	$1.98	$1.28

Mr. BALDWIN: Is my hon. friend aware that it takes five quarts of American measure to make four quarts of Canadian measure?

Mr. DOUCET: I quite realize that, and I believe at the same time it takes sixteen ounces of American measure to make sixteen ounces of Canadian measure. While I have cited six different items, the quart measure appears only once and the other items reveal a much greater spread in price. How can we expect our Canadian farmers to be prosperous when there is such a variation in the prices of their products as between the two countries?

I wish to compliment very sincerely the hon. member for Restigouche and Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) who, speaking on the Address the other day, spoke very feelingly of what is known throughout Canada to-day as Maritime rights and the grievances of which that part of the country is complaining. He stated that the St. John Telegraph and the St. John Times and Star had sent delegations to the western provinces for the purpose of trying to induce the people of those provinces to develop an inter-provincial trade with the Maritime provinces. True; and the unfortunate part of it is that this government, while spending through its Department of Trade and Commerce thousands of dollars from the provincial treasury in advertising its political principles, did not see fit to make any effort to develop an inter-provincial trade between the western and the Maritime provinces, but left it to private enterprise to undertake this task. Unfortunately, I cannot agree with my hon. friend on the question of protection. He says that if we had a population of 110,000,000 such as they have in the United States we should be able to stand protection; he wants a lower tariff so that the farmers may be in a better position to carry on. Now, I will submit a few figures for the consideration of the House. In the year 1923 our importations from the United States of fresh fruits amounted to $5,000,000, while fresh vegetables totalled $2,500,000; grain, $8,230,000; seeds, $1,660,000; tobacco in its unmanufactured state, $5,600,000. And the total of such imports as are represented in the category of farm produce was $65,559,000. This was all to the disadvantage of each and every Canadian farmer who is trying to carry on within the bounds of this Dominion. This being the case, how can we hope to secure any advantage, how can we derive any benefit or render the Canadian farmer more prosperous, by taking away even the little vestige of protection that still exists? The argument of my hon. friend should be taken the other way; what we do want in this country is higher protection on farm produce so that this $65,559,000 worth of farm produce would not be permitted to cross the imaginary border to supplant, on the Canadian market, the produce of our farmers who have tilled the Canadian soil.

I have listened patiently from time to time to my hon. friends on my left advocating free trade in every commodity, and I have an extract from their own platform of 1921, which demands that all foodstuffs be placed on the free list. Let us consider a few more figures in this connection. The estimated value of the production of the farms for the crop year 1922-23 was $1,172,855,000, of which $822,918,000 worth was consumed in Canada; or 70.16 per cent of the total production was consumed in Canadian territory. Let me amplify this statement. Taking wheat out of production and consumption, of the balance, 90.78 per cent, was consumed in this country. In view of this fact it will be seen how important it is to us to conserve the home market for the Canadian farmer. Apart from the growing and the shipment of wheat, those farmers who are occupied in mixed farming require a certain protection. The question may be asked why the farming population of Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces should have any grievance. Well, they have a grievance because their farm produce is not bringing the revenue which it did two or three years ago. I have taken the trouble to prepare a comparative statement in regard to the Maritime and Quebec markets, for which I have the figures for the years 1921-22-23 and 24. In 1921 the wholesale price for hay delivered on the Maritime market was $32 per ton, whereas in 1924 it was $17. Fresh pork was worth 18 cents per pound in 1921 as against 12 cents in 1924; beef was 10 against 8; mutton 17 and 12; chicken 40 and 30; butter solids 42 and 36; eggs by the case 50 and 38; and cheese 24 and 18. At the same time, what the farmer has to buy has increased, so that the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar to-day is much less than it was in 1922. With these conditions existing, and in view of the increased burden of taxation, how can we expect the farmer to do anything but complain of the situation? And what is the reason for all this? It is all due to the nibbling at the tariff and the juggling that has been going on. Tariff conditions in the country are unstable and our manufacturing industries of the Maritime provinces and even of central Canada are not in a position to provide employment for our own Canadian born and bred, who are leaving the country by the thousands. The Prime Minister questions the accuracy of my right hon. leader's statements in regard to immigration, and he gives us the impression that the people are returning to the country in train-loads. Now, I do not care how you manipulate statistics, but the best proof one can have of the depopulation of Canada is one's own experience in his travels. Going through the rural sections of this country from Montreal to the Atlantic, you will find in numerous sections country houses by the dozen, yes, indeed by the hundred, boarded up, the farmers and their families having left for the United States where they hope to better their fortune. We have statements made by those who appeared before the government no later than November last, all supporters of the administration from the Maritime provinces, led by the Premier of Nova Scotia, who is also a stalwart and faithful follower of the government. They said that for the lack of protection on bituminous round coal and on slack coal mined in Nova Scotia, and by allowing the entry of anthracite dust from the United States free of duty, coupled with the lack of preferential freight rates for the transportation of the coal of Nova Scotia to central Canada, their industries in the Maritimes were languishing and their population of between 125,000 and 150,000 people was seriously affected. This is not Tory propaganda, this is not Tory camouflage; it is gathered from the statements made by the delegation which interviewed the government. The members of the government themselves know that what I am saying is correct, because in spite of the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) have challenged the government time and again throughout this debate to refute a single argument, not one member of the administration has yet taken time to reply. It is true, Sir, that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) ventured the assertion that the offices of the British Empire Steel Company at Sydney were over-manned with officials. But with ten blast furnaces idle since June and with only three or four hundred men working out of a total force of thirty-five hundred it stands to reason that no financial or any other genius is needed to tell us that the company do not require the same number of officials.

No, Mr. Speaker, conditions have been brought about because the government has been trying to please a certain portion of this House to the detriment of the rest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DOUCET: Well, I am sorry for my hon. friends to my immediate left that they are to-day realizing that the juggling, the nibbling and the cutting of tariff duties is not going to benefit anyone. What we want is a consistent policy of protection. The National Policy was introduced in 1878 and consistently maintained by every administration up to a recent date. It was even maintained after 1896 by the very men who on every platform talked freer trade, by the very men who in that general election advocated a low tariff policy. It is a matter of history now that before the first budget speech was delivered the Liberal party resorted to the policy that had been in force since 1878, with a few minor alterations, I admit. With a population of slightly over three million in 1871 we have under protection prospered to the extent which the figures I now wish to place on Hansard amply demonstrate. Our field crops in 1901 were valued at $194,953,420; in 1923, at $891,755,200. Our live stock in 1901 was valued at $268,651,026; in 1923, at $613,260,000. Our dairy products have increased in value four times, from $29,731,000 in 1901 to practically $105,000,000 in 1922. Our fisheries, which in 1871 produced less than $8,000,000, in 1922 produced $41,800,210. Our minerals, developed through a system of protection that is to-day denied the mining industry, were worth $10,221,255 in 1881 as against $214,102,000 in 1923. In 1871 our manufactures employed about 188,000 men, as against 517,141 in 1921, and while in 1871 the salaries and wages paid amounted to $40,851,000, by 1921 they had increased to $581,402,385. The products of these factories were worth $221,617,000 in 1871, whilst in 1921 they had reached the enormous value of $2,747,926,675. All that progress, Sir, was made under a protective policy.

Now, I do not maintain that protection is a panacea that will cure all ills; but I certainly say that unless we have such a fiscal policy as will give our industries a chance to work full time, manufacturing our raw products and giving employment to our working men, we are not going to prosper. Unless every class of our population gets employment six days a week and a full dinner pail, this country cannot be said to be flourishing. I am reminded that in 1921 the right hon. Prime Minister—then leader of the opposition—and his present colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp), addressing a meeting in the Grand Opera House in the town of Sussex, county of Kings, N.B., stated that with the return of their party to power we would get the benefit of a golden era of prosperity and our working men would have a full dinner pail. There was a by-election in the city of Moncton last November and some one was uncharitable enough to place an advertisement on a billboard, worded after this fashion:

> Lost, a full dinner pail between the city of Moncton and Ottawa.

And a reward was offered if it should be sent to a certain person in Ottawa.

Now, in order to benefit the Maritime provinces there must be some reduction in transportation rates. If the Maritime provinces are prosperous; if they can develop their industries; if their people are contented—and the same thing applies to the prairie provinces—the whole Dominion will benefit thereby. But we are told that if we do reduce transportation rates on the Canadian National railways the result will be an increase in the deficit. Not necessarily. Let the government and the Canadian National Railway Board practise some economy. I do not mean that they should practise economy by laying off the men with overalls, by curtailing their hours of employment or by giving them two weeks' holidays without salaries at Christmas time. But we have numbers of highly salaried officials on the Canadian National railways who could easily be dispensed with and others whose remuneration could certainly be reduced without any loss to the country or to the railways. I say advisedly that the administration of the Atlantic section of the Canadian National railways, between Halifax, Sydney and Rivière du Loup on the Intercolonial and between Moncton and Monk on the Transcontinental, is costing more to-day than it did prior to December, 1922, when the Atlantic section extended to Montreal on the Intercolonial and on to Winnipeg on the Transcontinental. That is where we can practise some economy.

Then it might be well to suggest that the management of the Canadian National railways should forget about this radio craze. In Moncton we were treated last year to the erection of a radio transmitting station that cost, I am told, $125,000, while those who ship their produce over the railway in that district are struggling in vain to get a reduction in rates in order that they may place their products on the central markets of the Dominion. Then, again, why not eliminate a few of the private cars? That is another craze. Everybody has to have a private car over that railway. The president of the board himself made a flying trip to the Maritime provinces in November. I understand that he left Montreal with six private cars attached to his train, and when he reached the hub of the Maritimes he had eight. No one seems to know how many he had by the time he got to Sydney. When we realize that apart from his salary of $50,000 a year his expenses for 1924 amounted to something like $75,000, we can appreciate the fact that transportation rates could be easily reduced if the necessary economies were practised in connection with the higher paid officials and the administrative heads of the railway.

But if we ask for a reduction of transportation rates, what do we get? In a brief submitted by the secretary of the Nova Scotia Poultry Association before the Board of Railway Commissioners at their last sitting in the city of Halifax, he pointed out that while it cost three cents per dozen to import eggs in refrigerator cars from Chicago to Halifax, it cost two cents per dozen to ship them from Truro to Halifax, a distance of 64 miles, and four cents per dozen from Loch Broom station to Stellarton or New Glasgow, a distance of 11 miles. I could quote also a statement presented to the same board by the North Atlantic Fisheries Company which shows a discrimination against the fishing industry of the Maritime provinces in respect to carriage by express. The fish merchant shipping 100 pounds of fresh fish by express from Halifax to Winnipeg, a distance of 1,993 miles has to pay $10.06 per 100 pounds, or 10 cents a pound, in round figures, whereas the shipper of fish on the Pacific coast can ship 100 pounds of fresh fish from Prince Rupert to Winnipeg, a distance of 1,758 miles, for $3.59. The service is the same in each case—express—and the cost is $3.59 in favour of the British Columbia or Pacific fisherman and $10.06 against the Atlantic fisherman.

The hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset), in moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, said that we should select our immigration, and in that I quite agree with him. It should be the bounden duty of this government, before introducing any legislation in connection with immigration or adopting any further immigration policies, to study the conditions with a view to seeing that our own native born Canadians should be enabled to stay in this country and not have to leave in hundreds of thousands. Why, Sir, it is appalling when you realize from the public accounts that practically five millions of dollars have been taken out of the public treasury within the past three years to bring something like 350,000 immigrants into this country from European shores, whilst in every town and hamlet of this Dominion you will find vacant houses and houses boarded up by our own native born Canadians who have gone across the line. I care not what statistics may say; I know as one who has travelled considerably in the last eight months, and some of my honourable friends know it, of villages in a neighbouring county where I have counted as many as fifteen houses in succession boarded up. I made it my business to inquire and found that they had been boarded up within the last two years. Yet we are spending millions of dollars to bring men to take their places on Canadian soil. To my mind one of our own Canadian born citizens, one who knows our soil and is used to our climate and our customs, is worth more than half a dozen of these importations from European countries who take years and sometimes decades to accustom themselves to conditions in this country.

I think I have said sufficient on the question of transportation to demonstrate to this government that what is necessary for our farming population both east and west is equalization of conditions, not favouritism to any one section of the country, but the same standard of conditions throughout every part of this Dominion. Give us a chance to keep our own population in this country, to develop our industries and the production of our natural products, and enjoy a measure of prosperity not comparable with the prosperity spoken of in the Speech from the Throne.

In connection with steel and coal, I wish to give a few figures, because to my mind they are very striking, and as one from the Maritime provinces I think it is my duty to do so. I am sorry that we could not during this debate enthuse one of the representatives from the province of Nova Scotia to speak on this subject and place the facts as they should be placed before this House and the country. In view of the policy that has been consistently maintained by the present government of ignoring conditions as they are in the provinces by the sea, of ignoring the hundreds of thousands of tons of bituminous coal and anthracite dust and screenings that are being imported into this country and come into direct competition with the products of the mines of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, I think it behooves one of the representatives from the provinces by the sea to get up and state to the House the conditions as they actually exist.

The government was advised last year that the wiping away of the $2.50 per ton duty on pig-iron and $7.00 per ton on rolled iron and steel would cripple the steel industry of this Dominion. What do we find? We find that whilst practically 115,000 men were employed in the steel industry in 1920, less than 75,000 men were employed in 1924; that while $150,000,000 was paid in wages to the men employed in the steel industry in 1920, only $90,000,000 was paid in 1924; that while in 1913 the total production of coal in the province of Nova Scotia was over 8,000,000 tons, that amount had fallen to something like 5,500,000 tons in the year 1924. And yet with a production that had fallen off by practically 3,000,000 tons, they are unable to find a market for their products.

While on the subject of coal, let me say that we have in the province of New Brunswick considerable coal deposits. In the county which I have the honour to represent in this House there is a coal mine, and although they have endeavoured to get our Canadian National Railway System to purchase their coal, which is within easy reach of the divisional station of Moncton and of Newcastle, I learned from the general manager less than a week ago that he had not been able to place the product of that mine for use on the Canadian National railways.

I bring this matter to the attention of the government because I believe that this coal deposit in the province of New Brunswick should be developed and encouraged, inasmuch as it is a much shorter haul for the coal from the Beersville coal mine than it is from any other section of the province.

11 p.m.

Having placed these facts before the House, in conclusion I wish to say that with conditions as they are to-day in the eastern provinces of this Dominion, what is required is the equalization of conditions. Let the transportation rates be such as to permit of our natural products, the products of the farm, the fisheries, the forests and the mines, reaching their logical market in the central provinces. Let the government consider the advisability of increasing the protective duty on bituminous coal so that our own coal in the Maritime provinces and Alberta may find its way to the central provinces, and that less of our good Canadian money be sent across the line to give employment to American workmen in the bituminous coal mines over there.

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BELAND: I think it is a great disappointment to the House generally that this debate has not come to an end this evening, but in view of the intimation that a few more speakers intend to address the House I think we should now adjourn the debate, it being understood with the leader of the opposition that the debate might come to an end on Monday.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Beland the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Monday, February 16, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

REPORT ON AND ACTION CONCERNING NORTH ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP COMBINE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have two motions that were moved and passed the other evening, but which have been sinced expunged from the Votes and Proceedings. I beg to move:

That 800 copies in English and 200 copies in French, of the report of W. T. R. Preston in respect to the North Atlantic steamship combine, laid on the table of the House on the ninth instant, be printed forthwith for distribution to Senators and Members; and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. STEVENS: Does this report, as tabled, contain all of the report of Mr. Preston, or is there a supplementary report or recommendations not included in the one that was tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My impression is that this is the report in full. I will ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) when he comes in, and if I am incorrect, I will inform the hon. member.

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That 425 copies in the English language and 75 copies in the French language of the report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission, laid on the table of the House on Monday, the ninth of February, 1925, be printed forthwith for distribution to Senators and Members; and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, the 18th of February instant, and every subsequent Wednesday until the end of the session, the House shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Report of the Work of the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment for the year ended December 31, 1924.—Hon. Mr. Beland.

Report of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada for the year ended March 31, 1924.—Hon. Mr. Beland.

Auditor General's Report for the year ended March 31, 1924.—Hon. Mr. Robb.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

He said: The purport of this bill is to repeal sections 10 and 11 of the Dominion Elections Act. Section 10 deals with companies and associations which are prohibited from contribution to funds for election purposes. Section 11 deals with persons non-resident who are prohibited from taking part in election campaigns.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Friday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Sir Eugène Fiset for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the session.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House, I must first congratulate the mover of the Address on his speech and also on his being restored to health. The declared policy of the government since it took office has been one of economy and retrenchment, but the policy that has been carried out has fallen far short of that. In each year since the present government took office, the national debt has increased. Members on this side of the House have often been told that they should offer some concrete suggestions that would put an end to some of these deficits that we are being confronted with from time to time. We have in power to-day a government that is preaching economy, but not practising it. In the first place we have a large number of civil servants, and at every session of parliament we are told that the number is being reduced. The number is being reduced in this way, that the underpaid civil servants are being let go and heads of departments and others who are drawing the larger salaries, are in nearly every case being retained. In some cases departments are being depleted, perhaps two stenographers doing the work, but the heads being still kept on.

Last session a Superannuation Act was passed in regard to the civil service, and some changes could be made to it during this session—for instance, that a civil servant who has been restored to health should lose his superannuation. This, I think, would be a very appropriate session in which to introduce legislation of that character. We also have government officials from time to time travelling around the country doing work for the government, going short distances, such as from here to Toronto, and, instead of sitting in first class passenger cars, being accommodated with chairs in parlour cars. This may not seem very much, but when you add all these small items together the grand total represents a large sum of money which could be saved to the country. Certainly, in my opinion, these civil servants should be required to travel in ordinary first class cars just as other people do.

Another item of unnecessary expenditure which the government should look into, and which comes nearer home, is the money spent in the use of motor cars that go driving around for ministerial purposes at the expense of the public treasury. This is an ideal opportunity for some economy. It is true that there are ministers of the crown who run their own cars, supplying their own gasoline, but no doubt this particular item could afford some means of retrenchment. As I say, these various items may not appear to amount to much but in the aggregate they certainly account for a large sum. I might mention one other matter in connection with which I think there has been bad management. The headquarters of the Public Works department in this city were formerly on Queen street. The government bought a property on York street and remodelled it, and that new building houses the employees of the department a half mile away from the centre of things. This entails a great deal of inconvenience especially when any of the employees are needed in a hurry. This is one respect in which the government showed poor judgment. If they had wanted to do something to relieve unemployment conditions, instead of buying the new property which is so remote from the centre of activities, they could have made use of the property which they already had on Wellington street. That building could have been remodelled. Economy would have been effected and also employment given to those in the city who need work. The Canadian people are not looking for doles; they are anxious to secure employment; and it does seem to me that the government should take advantage of every opportunity that presents itself to provide such employment.

Now the government are handing out to the people statistics in regard to the cost of living; these figures they have placed on Hansard. I am sure the Canadian housewife will be glad to receive the information which is contained in these statistics; it will no doubt enable her to manage her affairs more economically, especially when these statistics have been supplied by experienced housekeepers. But, Mr. Speaker, this is not the sort of thing that the people are looking for from any government, irrespective of the party in power; the people want a government which will take advantage, as I have suggested, of available opportunities for providing employment. Once let the people secure work and they will look after the cost of living themselves. The Canadian to-day is bringing up his family, in nearly every case, ultimately to supply the country to the south of us with labour. We heard a good deal in this House last year about stability; that word was used considerably. I think that it is in the interests of this country to raise its tariff on a par with that of the United States. It seems to me that if anybody in Canada desires cucumbers, strawberries and things of that kind out of season, he ought to be prepared to pay a proper duty on them.

Something has been said about immigration, which to my mind is a wide subject. No one is more pleased than I am to see immigrants coming into this country, but the important proviso, I think, should be, that every immigrant contemplating coming to Canada should be given clearly to understand that this is no land of milk and honey but a place in which he must take off his coat and settle down to work if he expects to be successful. The government in its endeavours to bring immigrants into Canada should see to it that those who come in will remain on the land a reasonable time. People come into this country and after about a month's stay on the land they flock to the cities to swell the ranks of the unemployed. I would go so far as to suggest that before any man left his native land to come to Canada he ought to be told that unless he remained two years, say, on the land in this country he would be deported. I know that the agents in the countries from which the immigrants come are only too ready to help themselves. Not long ago I saw in a newspaper a skit which is not without its significance: A good Canadian housewife had sprinkled crumbs on the doorstep to feed the sparrows and a sparrow came along with a dollar bill. By this time in the countries overseas I suppose people will have gained the impression that it is just as easy as this for anyone to pick up money here.

I do not intend to take up the time of the House further. I have spoken very briefly, because I believe that we ought to get down to practical business. Every small leak which is stopped is so much gained, and in the long run all the small economies which are practised will represent an appreciable saving. The shorter our speeches are, therefore, the sooner we shall be able to get down to business and the more time we shall save.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The debate on the motion now before the House has covered a pretty wide range of subjects. This, no doubt, is due to the fact that the Address contains so little matter on which the attention of the members can be concentrated. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speeches that have been delivered so far, particularly that of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I have also listened to arguments advanced and have perused a good many of the statistics which have been placed on Hansard by the Prime Minister with the object of convincing the people of Canada that conditions here are not so very bad and, in fact, are much better than they are in the country to the south of us. Statistics, however, will not satisfy the man on the street who is out of work and is without the means of providing for his family; he requires more than statistics and things of that kind to convince him that conditions here are satisfactory.

It is not a pleasant thing to have to refer to these conditions. When we survey this vast domain which is ours we can come to no other conclusion than that Providence has been very kind to us. We have inherited a great estate; we are charged with the responsibility of the administration of that estate; and so far as Providence is concerned the last few years have been, on the whole, bountiful ones indeed. In the province of Ontario, notwithstanding that last year the spring was late and backward and things did not look very favourable for some time, nature, on the whole, asserted its capacity for recovery, with the result that we had a very bountiful harvest. The same was true also of many other provinces. I notice that the Speech from the Throne did not contain any reference to something that was a feature in the Speech from the Throne when the government came into office. On that occasion —1922—the second paragraph contained the following:

> Our Dominion has not escaped the world-wide economic disturbance and industrial depression but has suffered less from it than other countries. Keen observers of the business barometer feel that the worst is about over and that at an early date we may look for a substantial revival of activity.

That was the condition which prevailed at that time. To-day I observe that the second paragraph of the Speech from the Throne is as follows:

> The problem of the cost of living is the most important that my ministers have in mind at the present time, and every effort is being made to improve conditions with respect thereto. It is apparent that even the most rigid economy in public expenditures will not suffice to solve this pressing problem.

Mr. Speaker, I think under those circumstances it would be advisable for the government to at least make some attempt at economy. If a business man felt that he was going behind, he would take immediate steps by economy and reorganization to place his business on a sound basis. But what is our condition? During the last three years our debt has increased by $178,000,000, the direct increase representing $128,000,000, and the indirect $50,000,000. This is surely a very unsatisfactory condition of affairs, and should cause alarm on the part of the Government and the people, and surely it demands drastic action and economy on the part of the government.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

But the worst feature to my mind is the fact that during these years we have lost 600,000 of the best of our people, young people, who have been forced to leave their native land. They have gone to a foreign country to secure that employment which is denied to them at home. This is an appalling state of affairs and calls for plain speaking on the part of the representatives of the people in this House. If I say some things this afternoon that may not be pleasant to hon. gentlemen opposite, I can assure them that I shall do so from no personal feelings against them, but purely from a sense of the duty which I owe my constituents and my country. I shall endeavour to discharge that duty regardless of the consequence.

In August last the Prime Minister and several of his colleagues visited the county of Oxford. Such visits the people always appreciate very much, whether they agree with the government or not, and I am sure that the Prime Minister and those who accompanied him could not help but feel that the people of Oxford appreciated the importance of the visit. During this debate the Prime Minister referred to some statements which were made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) who on the same day happened to be addressing a similar meeting in the city of Stratford. This meeting was arranged some time in advance of the meeting in the county of Oxford. I thought at the time that in two adjacent counties it might have been possible to have had an interval of at least a day or two between the visits of these two distinguished gentlemen. I attended the meeting addressed by my leader, and to my amazement the Prime Minister last week in this House endeavoured to convey to members of this House an entirely different impression of what was stated by the right hon. leader of the opposition in the city of Stratford. He stated quite distinctly that he had a list of manufacturing industries in this country which had closed their doors since the present government took office. He did not place the number at two thousand, as the Prime Minister stated, but at one thousand, and this figure appeared in every paper which had a reporter at the meeting. But the leader of the opposition did not take exception to the doubling of his figures, because, he said: Although I had stated that one thousand Canadian factories had closed their doors since the government came into power, yet I am prepared to accept your figure of two thousand. And he produced Dun's report to show that two thousand was nearer correct.

On that occasion the Prime Minister also referred to what was being done by his government to reduce the cost of living, and he offered some excuse for the controversy which had arisen between himself and Mr. Bradshaw, the general manager of the Massey-Harris Company, with regard to the Prime Minister's statement respecting improved conditions in the agricultural implement industry as a result of the tariff reductions of last session. He claimed that he intended to say that the improvement was due to the policy of the government, not to the reductions in the tariff. But according to the report of his speech in the Woodstock Sentinel-Review—the only daily paper in the county of Oxford which had a reporter present and which gave practically a verbatim report of the speech—the Prime Minister, after offering his explanation of the controversy between himself and Mr. Bradshaw, said:

> The point we are concerned with is that the present government took the sales tax off the implements of production, and the previous government had put it on.

"And the previous government had put it on." Surely the Prime Minister knew better than that. Was it fair to the people of Oxford to leave the impression on their minds that his government had removed a sales tax of 6 per cent on agricultural implements which the previous government had imposed? What are the facts? When his government came into office there was a 3 per cent sales tax on agricultural implements. They increased it the first session to 4½ per cent, and next session to 6 per cent. So as a matter of fact he reduced the tax on agricultural implements by just as much as he had increased it. In fact it was found that a sales tax of 6 per cent was altogether too high The people did not complain very much of a 3 per cent tax, but they complained and complained bitterly, when it was doubled.

He went on to quote statistics—and he did the same thing in this House; it is on Hansard—to prove that the cost of agricultural implements had been reduced as a result of the reductions in the tariff of a year ago. I thought the Prime Minister had made a mistake, and when he said that, I asked him if the reduction included the decrease in the sales tax. He endeavoured to create the impression that the sales tax had nothing to do with it; that it was the tariff reductions that had brought about the result he mentioned. You will find that in Hansard of a week ago to-day; that is the impression the Prime Minister conveyed to this House. I pointed out that the result had been brought about by a decrease in the tax that had been imposed very largely by his own government, and he had to admit—that the removal of the sales tax was included in the reduction to which he referred.

If you will look at Hansard of Friday last you will notice that the member for London (Mr. White) gave statistics with regard to the price of agricultural implements when this government came into office in December, 1921 and in December 1924; and in every instance the prices of the implements mentioned by the Prime Minister are higher to-day than they were when the present government took office, with one exception. That is the result of the tinkering with the tariff which has been going on; that is the result of the announcements made by the government that they were going to do something along this line. It seems hardly necessary, but I am going to repeat what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said, following the assertion of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) that he hoped last year's budget had sounded the death knell of protection.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend allow me before he leaves that: Do I understand that he advocates a duty on agricultural implements?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am referring to statements made by the Prime Minister and by others. The impression has been conveyed to the people of this country that as a result of the reductions in the tariff made by the present government the cost of agricultural implements has been reduced. I have pointed out that the reduction has not been as much, even in the last year, as was the amount involved in the removal of the sales tax and that the prices are higher than on 1st January, 1922. The boasted reductions by the Massey-Harris people and the International Harvester people did not amount to as much as the reduction in the sales tax—a tax one-half of which was put on by the present government.

Now, what are conditions at present? In the principal town in the south riding of Oxford, we have machine companies manufacturing tools, screws, bolts, and parts of machinery and implements. Articles of this kind are to-day being supplied the manufacturers of agricultural implements by manufacturing industries in the United States, and many of our workmen who formerly obtained employment in our own factories have had to go south of the line to get employment in a foreign country, in many cases working with firms who are supplying this country with materials which formerly were manufactured here. This is the policy that is being advocated by the present government—not that of protecting our industries, not that of affording employment in Canada for our own people, but that of having our people employed in a foreign country in order that goods may be sent here to compete with the labour of those who remain at home.

In the constituency of North York a few months ago the Prime Minister intimated that there was to be a "pause" in the activities of the government in ringing the death knell of protection, as was intimated in this House, but that a halt had been called for present, for the purpose, of enabling him to try to find the direction in which they were drifting. They have halted their policy. But the Minister of Agriculture, to whom I was going to refer when the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) interrupted me, stated in this House on the seventh of May last:

> We are beginning to do slowly what we had endeavoured to do rapidly on three historic occasions, and failed—in 1878 and in 1891, unrestricted reciprocity, and in 1911 reciprocity in natural products.

They are now to do slowly—by degrees—what they had before attempted to do, rapidly and they are endeavouring to blind the people as to what their objective is. Is it any wonder that the people are asking themselves where we are drifting? We are a people to-day without any definite national objective in trade, in defence or in outlook. We are simply, drifting, wondering how long this state of affairs is going to continue. The government are admittedly trying to blind the people, trying to fool the people as to their objective. The Minister of Agriculture is frank at times and I am prepared to accept his explanation as to what their objective is. It is evidently designed with a view to pleasing many of those who are seated on this side of the House to my left, because I believe that the definition given of my hon. friends to my left, the Progressives, by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) was correct, namely, that they were simply the "pale shadow of the government." We have evidence of that in the debate which has taken place in this House. On Thursday night, to our amazement, we found that some time after six o'clock the debate on the Address had terminated, the motion had been put and carried and the whole thing was apparently over. On having the irregular proceedings corrected we were reprimanded by the leader of the party to my left (Mr. Forke), who stated that a sigh of relief, or words to that effect, would go up over the country when it was realized that this debate had terminated. Since that time you have not heard a word from a supporter of the government or from my friends to my left. They are dumb as oysters, and they seem to be hoping and praying that the Address will be adopted without the people knowing what is going on in this country.

When the budget was brought down in 1923 by the Minister of Finance, Right Hon. Mr. Fielding—whose absence from this House we all deplore, a man who stands high in the estimation of the people, a man whom to know was to love—he stated:

> The congress of the United States in the exercise of its undoubted right, has established what is commonly called the Fordney-McCumber tariff, which is largely a high tariff, and which we realize operates to the disadvantage of Canada. Any desire that we may have towards modification of our own tariff is naturally held in check by the high tariff of the United States.

This was Mr. Fielding's statement in the House in 1923. On the same occasion the Prime Minister said, a few days later, referring to the need of stability and confidence on the part of the people:

> That is all we are aiming at. We do not intend to sacrifice in any particular the needs of any class of our citizens or the needs of industry.

And a little further on:

> So long as on the part of the United States, the tariff wall remains what it is against us, and in Europe the unsettled condition continues to be what it is, and so long, may I add, as Canada remains the only country that has reduced its tariff since the Great War, while other countries continue to put up their tariffs, for that period—

Mark the words:

> —for that period of time at least we shall give to those who are interested in investing their capital and establishing industries in this country, and who are seeking to restore business to a higher level of development, assurance that there will not be unstability where stability ought to prevail.

What a reassuring message to the investor, to the people of this country—for that period of time at least we shall give you that assurance, but after that, look out! That was the policy enunciated in 1923 by the Minister of Finance and by the Prime Minister, and observe what happened in the following year. Reduction in the tariff. Industries such as we have in Oxford which have been supplying many of the parts used by the manufacturers of agricultural implements of this country are falling off and many of these parts are now being manufactured in the United States. We have lost many of our workmen, is it any wonder our people are losing courage and wondering what the end is to be? I would like to point out that when the Prime Minister was in the county of Oxford this condition of affairs was very much in evidence then as it is now. Scores of our workmen had left this country and gone to the United States, to Detroit and others of the border cities, and were working there. Along with the Prime Minister on that occasion we had the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) and in his address I find that he is reported to have made use of the following language, of course he knew what the conditions were:

> The question might be asked, why are there so many unemployed in Canada?

Then he went on to explain why it was that so many were out of employment. Then the report goes on:

> "Let the unemployed realize that we expect them to get out and hustle as the rest of the citizens have to do," said the Hon. Mr. Murdock to the accompaniment of loud handclapping.

And again:

> "I am holding to-day the proudest position of my life, and I want to come back to give you an address on why I am a Liberal."

I have not noticed, Mr. Speaker, any disposition on the part of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sinclair) to have the Minister of Labour come up to his constituency and deliver that address on why he is a Liberal. The Minister of Labour sits in this House and hears the criticism of his department, and he does not attempt to defend it, but he likes to get up whenever someone else is speaking and interject a speech in an irregular way. He has violated the rules of the House on numerous occasions in that way, and that is about as far as the Minister of Labour gets towards any explanation which might reasonably be expected from him in regard to this and other matters. I should be very much interested to hear the Minister of Labour or anybody else tell us why he should be a Liberal under present conditions.

Mr. MURDOCK: Would my hon. friend—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I hope my hon. friend will not take advantage of the opportunity to deliver that address just now. After I get through he will have abundant opportunity to do so.

There were a good many other things referred to by the Prime Minister, which I shall not take up at present. I have mentioned the question I put to the Prime Minister, and probably I had better give the exact language used. I asked him:

> Do the reductions which the Prime Minister has placed upon Hansard include reduction in the sales tax or are they attributable entirely to the reductions in the tariff?

Mr. Mackenzie King: In a word, they are due to the reductions in taxation which this government made last session.

Mr. Sutherland: And put on the session before.

Mr. Mackenzie King: My hon. friend is wrong there.

Mr. Sutherland: Very largely put on the session before.

Mr. Mackenzie King: No. I may say that the reduction in the sales tax had an effect, and certainly the reduction in the duties had an effect.

I am not going to deal with this matter any further. The financial policy for this country can be discussed later when the budget comes down, but I thought it advisable to make this reference in view of the remarks made by the Prime Minister when addressing the House a week ago.

Some of you may recall that at the 1924 session the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who, I am sorry, is not in his seat at present, delivered an address in this House on the budget along lines that you would scarcely expect from a Minister of Justice. You might have expected such an address from someone who was apologizing for the policy the government was pursuing. The Minister of Justice in that address tried to show that the policy of the Liberal party was not a protective policy, and he endeavoured to prove his point by quoting from a speech made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the effect that protection was not the policy of the Liberal party. After having done that, the Minister of Justice whom one would naturally expect to hold the scales of justice even, was very unfair, I think, in referring to one of his former compatriots from the province of Quebec. He did not mention his name, but it was quite evident to whom he was referring. The Minister of Justice said that this gentleman, Hon. J. I. Tarte had been practically read out of the government and the Liberal party because he had differed with his leader in 1902 on the tariff. He said:

> My right hon. leader of that time was absent attending a conference, I think it was the Imperial Conference in London, and a member of his cabinet—a very able man in every way, but who had on tariff matters the same views as the present right hon. leader of the opposition—during Sir Wilfrid Laurier's absence had preached the principles of high protection in the province of Quebec, and I think in the rest of the country. The first thing that was done by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on his return was to ask for the resignation of that member of his cabinet.

Surely this would indicate to the world that according to the Minister of Justice the policy of the Liberal party is a policy towards free trade and not a policy of protection. What other inference can be drawn from such language? I thought at the time that it was remarkable he did not go a little further and state what the views of the hon. gentleman referred to were, and what he himself had to say about it, so I asked the question:

> Before my hon. friend leaves that subject, would he mind placing on record the statement made by the minister, who he says was read out of his party, regarding an understanding the Liberal party had with the manufacturers prior to the election of 1896. Make the story complete while you are at it.

I thought it was only fair to the memory of this man, who is now dead, that his statement on the matter should be placed fairly on Hansard and so I asked that question. The reply of the minister was as follows:

> I do not know anything about it. My hon. friend seems to have a fountain of knowledge regarding matters that I am not familiar with at all. This is the first I ever heard of such a thing and I cannot give him the information asked for.

This was the statement made by the Minister of Justice in this House last session, on the 15th of May last. Previous to that he had just stated:

> If you will take the trouble, as I did, to go to the library and read the electioneering pamphlets issued by the Conservative party in all the elections which followed 1896 you will see what hon. gentlemen opposite thought of the tariff of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

The Minister of Justice admits that he went to the library and went through all the literature issued by the Conservative party for goodness knows how many years back, and he is going to see that this is published, particularly in the province of Quebec; and yet he had never heard anything about the matter to which I referred. Well, I am going to read from Hansard the official record of this House, to show what actually took place, and give you the statement that was made by the member of the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier referred to by the Minister of Justice. I think it is only fair to the memory of the late Hon. Mr. Tarte the minister referred to that this matter should be placed fairly before the people. My attention was drawn to it by reason of the fact that Hon. Mr. Tarte on that occasion replied to the speech of the member for South Oxford of that time, Sir Richard Cartwright, who, I may say, represented that constituency for some sixteen or seventeen years. Sir Richard Cartwright had delivered a lengthy address on the budget and was followed by Hon. J. I. Tarte, a member of the same party. Mr. Tarte made reference to the many empty benches on the government side when he spoke. Why were those Liberals not in their places to hear this ex-minister give an explanation regarding his resignation from the government and also as to what he believed should be the fiscal policy of Canada. I will only quote part of Mr. Tarte's address which was a very able one, indeed, and one well worthy of being studied by even the Minister of Justice. I cannot understand how the minister, while he was in the library hunting for Tory literature, missed this noteworthy deliverance on the part of Mr. Tarte. On April 20, 1903, Mr. Tarte is reported by Hansard to have spoken as follows:

> There is one thing that surprises me. This Liberal side of the House is rather empty to-night. I would like to see it full. But what surprises me is that there are so many members of parliament on this side who have told me that they share my views, who have written me and told me repeatedly that they share my views, and who have not been able to impress their views on the government. I say it openly, I say it from the bottom of my heart, that I fully expected that the Liberal party, with which I have been connected during the last ten years, would carry out the policy it was understood in 1896 they would carry out. I am weighing my words. I know what arrangement, what understanding took place between some public men. I know what took place. I do not divulge any secrets. I know what we did in the election of 1896 in Montreal. I see within the radius of my eye public men, who, at our request, came to the city of Montreal, went to the manufacturers, with the knowledge of the leaders of the party, and told them not only would the tariff not be disturbed, but it would be changed in the right direction when the proper time came. There was no secret about that. I shall not give names. There are men who hear me—I am sorry there are not more on those benches—who know that I am perfectly right. I am out of office because I could not stay in office under the present circumstances. I have had only but pleasant relations with most of my colleagues and have for the most of them the greatest respect. But I could not possibly stay in office when I knew that the policy we are following now is not the right policy—when I knew what understanding took place formerly. The tariff has worked as well as it could because we have been passing through years of prosperity. But after all we have not developed so marvellously. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, and my hon. friends from the Maritime provinces should take a lesson from the past. Before Confederation they were most of them free traders.

A little further on Hon. Mr. Tarte says:

> I am in a peculiar position. As I have said, my relations with most of my colleagues have been of a most agreeable character. I have confidence in the integrity, in the honour of most of them. I have worked harmoniously with the great bulk of the Liberal party. I have done what I could for them in days when they were not as strong as they are to-day. I remember very well the days when the Liberal party was scattered to the winds after the Mercier episode in Quebec. My friends, the Liberals in that province were not as strong then as they are now. They found allies in the Conservative party, and let me say to some of them that they have never been loyal to those allies. Let me reproach them on the floor of this parliament for their lack of loyalty and sincerity towards some of us. They know that I am speaking by the book. I for one have been stabbed in the back on more than one occasion, but I forgot all that. A public man must forget and forgive, when he has the true interest of his country at heart. I remained in the government knowing that behind me there were men who were stabbing me in the back. My former colleagues know it just as well as I know it myself. I remained in office for loyalty sake to my leader and to those of my colleagues with whom I was working for the best interest of the country. On the question of the tariff, I could not compromise any longer. It may be said that I am not a good party man, and I stand ready to accept that reproach. If I am asked to give up opinions in which I firmly believe in order to remain in office I cannot do it. There are things on which a public man cannot compromise; on which he cannot give up his views. The question of the tariff; the question of transportation, on which I have spoken in the House so often, are two questions on which I hold strong views that I could not possibly give up. I felt that I was no longer in sympathy with several of my colleagues and I went out of office. I have no ill-will towards them.

Surely, in fairness to this man who for many years occupied a prominent position in the public life of Canada, the Minister of Justice might well have put his views on record without endeavouring to condemn his attitude, and to make it appear as though Mr. Tarte had changed his views on the matter of protection.

4 p. m.

During the past few days we have had an intimation from the government of possible action in regard to what is known as the Preston report dealing with shipping rates on the north Atlantic. That question was also referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and I may as well read from the Speech itself the paragraph in question:

With regard to ocean freight rates, action is being taken to overcome the restraints on export trade due to the exactions of the powerful steamship combine known as the North Atlantic Steamship Conference. Your approval will be asked of a measure aimed at affording the government of Canada a control of ocean rates.

The same matter was referred to by the Prime Minister in his speech here a week ago. Apparently he wished to convey the impression that legislation to carry out something further than what has so far been announced in the Address would be brought down. One reference was to the following effect:

We hope so far as our effort in this regard is concerned, that the Canadian government will not have to battle alone, but that it may look to the governments of all other self-governing Dominions and to the government of the Mother Country herself to co-operate with us in fighting this great combination that exists on the Atlantic, to the detriment not only of Canadian trade, but to the trade of Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and all parts of the British Empire.

Then further on he stated:

As I have said, parliament will be presented shortly with the report dealing with this whole question of Atlantic trade, and the House will also be informed in due course more exactly and in particular of the steps the government is about to take in an effort to cope with the exactions of this powerful combine. The government's action in this regard is only part of a constructive programme which has for its objective the development and increasing of the wealth of this country.

Further on:

And we believe that the legislation which we are going to introduce during the present session if it receives the support of this parliament, will materially assist us to further the diversified industries of this country.

There is evidently in the mind of the Prime Minister a doubt whether his proposition, whatever it is, will receive the approval of this House. I am not going to attempt to discuss the report which was tabled several days ago and which to-day was ordered to be printed. I am not in a position to know what the report contains; but I feel called upon to make some reference to it and to the commissioner who was delegated to make this report, by reason of the fact that a year ago in this House I took exception as strongly as I could to the appointment of the man known as W. T. R. Preston as a commissioner to make this or any other report on behalf of this parliament. Following this up, not receiving a satisfactory answer from—or even the attention of—the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) who had charge of the estimates under consideration, I moved that the amount contained in the estimates for this purpose should be struck out. In view of this action taken by me a year ago, I feel called upon to-day to say something further with regard to this commissioner and his unsavory record. If there is a combine in connection with ocean rates and it can be broken up, I am willing to lend my assistance to the utmost to bring about a solution of the difficulty. But I question very much whether this is not another effort on the part of the government to divert the attention of the people of this country from other matters relating to the government, and I do not believe the government expect by the method proposed to bring about the results which have been referred to by the Prime Minister when he says that he hopes that the other Dominions and the Old Land will join with us in putting an end to this combine.

Whom have they appointed to report on this question? A man who has been known in this country for twenty-five or thirty years as one of the barnacles on the ship of state, nothing more or less. When I entered public life in Canada, my attention was drawn very clearly and emphatically to the operations of this man, not only in western Ontario, but throughout that whole province. I endeavoured to point this out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he was asking the House to pass the vote referred to in his estimates, and he even intimated that he did not pay any attention to what I was placing before parliament. He was determined that this man was to be employed to do this work. We are now asked by the Prime Minister to lend our support to him in the effort to put an end to the unsatisfactory state of affairs referred to. Would it not have been much more simple for the government and the Prime Minister to call upon that much vaunted king of combine busters, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) to do this work? At a cost of only $82.40 he has obliterated, so he claims, all the trusts, mergers and combines which he claimed formerly flourished in this Dominion. He would have you believe they have been driven into the ocean and now the government's desire is to drive them off the high seas. If so why not send the Minister of Labour after them? I am sure even the Minister of Labour has a better reputation than the man to whom they have delegated this duty even if he does nothing.

Mr. W. T. R. Preston—are my hon. friends opposite not ashamed to hear the name? I notice the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) looking up at the ceiling. I am sure he is reviewing in his mind the operations of this man in 1897, 1898 and 1899 in Ontario. When he was exposed, all he had to do was to come to Ottawa and hold a pistol at the head of the government of that day and demand his reward for the iniquities he had been committing. How successful was he? He was so successful that he was immediately sent over to the Old Land at a salary of $3,000 a year and expenses to superintend all immigration coming from Europe to this country. He was not there very long before he was heard from again. The North Atlantic Trading Company was organized and its operations caused considerable comment and suspicion in this country as well as in the Old Land. I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), when he is searching through the records of the Library for Conservative literature, will take the trouble to look up Preston's record. If he does he will find numerous references in the reports of debates in the House of Commons with regard to W. T. R. Preston and the infamies with which he was associated. This is the man who is referred to in the Speech from the Throne and whose report is announced from day to day in the Press as being available for members of this House to peruse. I noticed a few days ago by the press that he is sending cablegrams to Canada stating that he will soon be back and will attend to the critics who have been commenting on his report which is not yet available to hon. members.

In 1899 we had in office in Ontario what was known as the Ross government. A by-election was being held in the constituency of West Elgin for the Ontario legislature in that year, and a small army almost entirely composed of government officials, timber agents, members of the Library, members of the Department of Education and many professional election crooks, were sent into the constituency. As an example of the methods pursued, let me read a copy of a letter that was written by D. F. McDonald a government forest ranger in Nipissing, who was there, to the Deputy Minister of Crown Lands, Mr. Aubrey White, Deputy Minister, during that election. I will read only part of it. The letter has reference to the political complexion of the riding, the different families, how many of them are likely to vote Conservative and how many are going to vote Liberal, and is dated Rodney, January 6, 1899. Here he refers to the "doubtful fish" as he calls them. He goes on:

> And the doubtful fish are the Swishers, Scheiters, Schneckenbergers, Schills, Schmidts, Krauses, Kruppes, Keillers, Leibners and the Ousterhaughs. When you get that German brood intermarried with the McPhees, McFaddens, McPhails and McAulays, they make a queer brood of Scottish-Canadians from a doubtful ancestry. They had a hot time at the nominations yesterday in Dutton. I was not there. They are going to have a big time here in Rodney to-night. They have 500 torches ready for the flames to meet G. W. Ross at the station this evening. The brass band will be there. The McRays, the McGugans, the McIvors, McRorys and McRitchies will be there. The Garchies, Dugalds, Duncans and Donalds, with Alberts, Conrads, Carlos, Gottliebs and Jacobs will be jumbled up in a British mixture. Sauerkraut and porridge, Limburger cheese and salt herring. Bologna sausage and haggis, lager and hot Scotch, lamb-scouse and brose, and the riding is any man's to-day. I am going to St. Thomas in the morning to meet Preston. We will win if we can. Keep our fellows fighting mad until Thursday night.
> Hoping you are all well,
> I am, as ever, yours,
> D. F. McDonald.

Note, he was going to St. Thomas to meet Preston, the man who was in charge of the campaign. I shall mention some of the names of those who were operating in that election and who were well known at one time:

> W. T. R. Preston: Special government manager for the by-elections—parliamentary librarian at Toronto at a salary of $1,800—now inspector of Dominion immigration agencies in Europe at a salary of $3,000 and expenses.
> Alex Smith: Reform provincial organizer—entrusted with moneys by the Reform Association (Limited) without being required to give a detailed account thereof (as he swore in the Waterloo trial.)
> James Vance: Assistant grit organizer, who rendered signal service to the Hardy-Ross government in North Waterloo and other ridings.
> D. F. McDonald: Government forest ranger in Nipissing.

J. W. Thompson: An employee of Mr. Ross' Department of Education.

Capt. Sullivan: "Prince of Plungers"—Reported in South Ontario.

Tom Lewis of London: Shares honours with Sullivan; reported in North Waterloo.

J. G. Pritchett: Ex-Alderman of London—an "educated" deputy returning officer, who prefers the name of M. B. Johnston, a reputable St. Thomas citizen to his own, laboring for honest government in North Waterloo, till the Conservatives to use Mr. McNish's complaint, "pursued him with a persistence worthy of a better cause."

E. D. Croden of London: another "educated" deputy returing officer, who knew better than to permit Mr. Macdiarmid's scrutineers to see the ballots at No. 7, St. Thomas.

Duncan Bole—of Sault Ste. Marie—a graduated ballot artist: government immigration agent, fishery and fur inspector:

Martin J. Cahill—of St. Catharines—another ballot artist who preferred to be known in West Elgin as Albert E. Montgomery.

These are a few of them. There were a number of others who were arrested on election day. On the night before the election Mr. Preston spoke in the McNish club rooms and Duncombe opera house, as follows:

They speak of the men who are here as if they were gamblers and blacklegs. Not a man of them but has come here openly and at his own expense and only out of love of the cause of good government. When this election is over—

Mark the words:

—our opponents will not be able to put a finger upon any act of wrongdoing. There will not be a stain left on West Elgin.

The stain was not upon West Elgin but upon Preston and his cohorts, I might observe here that he addressed a Sunday school class in St. Thomas, the Sunday before his election, and requested the class to sing his favourite hymn. "There is sunshine in my soul." On election day the Conservatives got out a circular to this effect:

Three pluggers already in gaol. Many others operating in the city. Beware. Go out and poll your vote before a plugger votes on your name. Four unknown persons acting as deputy returning officers in the city. Every fraudulent scheme is being resorted to in order to defeat Mr. Macdiarmid. Let honest men unite to condemn such nefarious deeds.

On election night it was found that Mr. McNish the Liberal candidate had been elected over Mr. Macdiarmid the Conservative candidate by a small majority and while they were celebrating the supposed victory in the committee rooms the following telegram was received by Mr. McNish from Toronto, January 12, 1899:

Heartiest congratulations. Sorry to the bottom of my heart I cannot be with you to-night. To be supported by such a noble army of workers should make you the proudest man in Ontario. Shake hands with the boys for me, and hug the members of the much-abused threshing machine for Auld Lang Syne.

PRESTON.

Sir Allen Aylesworth, now a member of the Senate of Canada, formerly Minister of Justice, and at that time counsel for the Liberal party in election protests, was in St. Thomas investigating the charges which had been made in connection with the protest that had been lodged against Mr. McNish's election. Last session the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not heed me when I drew his attention to this matter and Preston's connection with it: he considered such things trivial. However, in view of the fact that the organizer, the man who had charge of the work in West Elgin, sent a message of congratulation to the candidate who was elected, acknowledging and approving, in his telegram to McNish, the men who were carrying on, I will read the confession which was made by McNish the Liberal candidate and signed by him and witnessed by A. B. Aylesworth, counsel for McNish, so that you can understand the nature of the work that was admittedly carried on. The confession is as follows:

Messrs. CROTHERS & PRICE, barristers, etc.,
St. Thomas, Ont.

Dear Sirs,—

We beg to advise you that Mr. McNish has discussed at length with his solicitors the charges contained in the petition which has been filed against his return as member of the legislative assembly of Ontario for West Elgin, and that they have to a considerable extent investigated the charges contained therein and other matters wnich have come to their knowledge in connection with the election. And the subscribers hereto make the following statements and admissions respecting the same.

1. That a large number of persons were specially sent into the constituency by men working on behalf of the Liberal party for the express purpose of taking part on Mr. McNish's behalf in the election held January 12th, 1899, and we believe that fraudulent and corrupt means were used by some of such persons to secure his election.

2. That several of the said persons illegally and without authority acted as deputy returning officers at the said election, and in at least three cases so acted in the names of reputable local men, having, under assumed names, been introduced to the returning officer by local agents of Mr. McNish.

3. That in many of the polling sub-divisions of the riding there were grave irregularities connected with the return of the ballot boxes and their contents, the voting and the counting of the ballots thereat.

4. That there were large numbers of persons brought into the riding for the express purpose of personating legitimate voters, and assisted by some of Mr. McNish's local supporters such persons did personate qualified votes in voting for Mr. McNish.

5. That the declared number of votes for Mr. McNish largely exceeded the number of bona fide votes cast for him.

6. That a large number of votes cast for Mr. Macdiarmid were in some nefarious and corrupt manner manipulated, whereby the result of the election was rendered doubtful and that in this connection the voting at Shedden and Middlemarch and in several divisions in St. Thomas, where said strangers so acted as deputy returning officers, merits special mention.

7. That there are good reasons to believe that there are many specific and well authenticated cases where agents of Mr. McNish concealed at their homes some of those strangers, who there paid large sums of money to electors to induce them to vote for him.

8. That Mr. McNish will forthwith deliver to the Speaker of the legislative assembly his resignation as a member thereof for the said electoral district.

DONALD MCNISH.

Witness: A. B. Aylesworth.

This is Sir Allen Aylesworth, at present a member of the Senate and who subsequently to this affair was Minister of Justice. If there is any hon. member in this House or any person in the country who doubts the accuracy of this document or of any statement that I have made with regard to this question, I can guarantee that the matter can be cleared up in the upper house, where the then counsel for Mr. McNish will have an opportunity of stating his views on the whole question and either affirming or denying the accuracy of this confession.

This admission naturally caused a great deal of comment in the province. Although the government had been in office for many years and had at the outset a fairly good reputation, many of the most outstanding Liberals in the province openly condemned their party leaders and the Prestonian methods adopted to hold office. I am referring to one in particular, the late Hon. S. H. Plake, whose statement as follows was reported in the press and was never denied so far as I know:

If I were in office Preston's head as well as all others who took part in these disgraceful acts would fall just as quickly as I could write down their names on paper.

Hon. S. H. Blake was never considered to be an impulsive man; he was of a judicial mind, learned in the law, of high personal character and a distinguished member of one of the oldest and best known Liberal families in the Dominion. I also had an encounter with this machine in its operations in South Oxford. I was elected as representative of that constituency in the Ontario legislature in 1902 by nearly 200 majority; and if I do say it myself, I do not think a cleaner or fairer election was ever conducted anywhere. The fact that the government only had a majority of one after the election was possibly responsible for their attempt to open the constituency. South Oxford having at all times in the past been a Liberal constituency, I presume the government thought if they could void my election they would have little trouble in electing one of their own supporters. With the machine in charge they made the attempt. During the election trial I had as my counsel Hon. S. H. Blake, and I am about to read part of a letter which I received from him some years afterwards during the election of 1905. In that year I wrote him asking if he would deliver an address in South Oxford. He wrote back that it would be a pleasure for him to do so by reason of the fact that it was just fifty years years since his uncle, Dr. Connor, ran in that constituency; but he regretted that it was out of his power to do so. I may say that although I received this letter twenty years ago, it has never been published, but I feel in view of the serious condition of the country to-day it is advisable that I should place on record another expression of opinion from this great Canadian. I shall not read the whole letter because it contains personal references which I am a little too modest to place on Hansard. In part, he wrote as follows:

Possibly no breath that issued from the machine was so rank and poisonous as that which then escaped. As a lawyer it struck me as an attempt to strike a fatal blow to that which is of vital moment to every citizen—the administration of justice. Day after day Mr. J. B. Jackson, K.C., presented members of his brigade paid to swear you out of your seat, and day after day the news of the effort by these means to thwart justice was published from one end of our country to the other. It was proved out of Mr. Jackson's own mouth that he offered $650 to one man to procure the evidence to unseat you. It was proved that he went down to Toronto to take advice as to carrying out this portion of the plot. It was proved that after such advice he paid a portion of the money and made himself liable for the balance. For these amounts he drew upon the Toronto branch of the machine. The trial began on October 14, and, although it was adjourned and not finished until December 3, no voice of remonstrance was heard, but the government with all these flagrant misdeeds in every public newspaper stood ready to accept of the results hoped to be won by the poisoning of the springs of justice. Nothing ever drove home to me so forcibly the vileness of the methods approved and adopted by the government to keep them in power as the revelations from day to day presented on this trial. As I understand the matter, the great issue before the bar of public opinion to-day is—Shall the province sanction these and the like methods of carrying on a government or shall it stamp its abhorrence of such unrighteousness by the punishment which must be a great element in clearing the atmosphere of the vileness which so thickly pervades it

And so on. There you have the opinion of the Hon. S. H. Blake of this gang of outlaws who were carrying on in the province of Ontario in the manner indicated by the confession signed by Donald McNish and his solicitor, Mr. Aylesworth, a witness. It is one of this gang whose report has been tabled in this House, and to which the attention of the people not only of Canada but of Great Britain and the other dominions is being directed, towards remedying an alleged combine of ocean rates on the high seas. Are those the kind of commissioners the government have to rely upon to-day?

Let me give the House one other quotation on the same subject. I have here an editorial from the Toronto Globe of November, 9, 1903. After referring to the situation in Ontario, it proceeds:

> The present distress has not come by accident or chance, or as the result of a change of government policy, and not at all because of any growth of power or prestige in the opposition. It has come through the cooling enthusiasm and the slackening effort of not a few Liberals. And the secret of it all is in the discredited election methods sometimes resorted to and the activity of political parasites who make party service a means of private gain. Because of electoral corruption here and the prominence of party heelers there, Ontario Liberalism has lost something of its old-time self-respect, and its note of confident and public-spirited enthusiasm has lost something of strength and resonance.

Then, further on:

> There is but one thing open to the Liberals of Ontario, and that thing is their first and most pressing duty. The barnacles on the ship must be treated with an iron hand. The interests of the Liberal party are superior to those of any individual, and the interests of the province are supreme over all. Half measures will not avail. Neither the Liberal party nor the province owes to any man any position or reward not earned by honest and efficient public service.

What do hon. members think of that statement from the Toronto Globe, the official newspaper of the Liberal party, respecting this gang of outlaws who had been operating in Ontario?

Mr. ARTHURS: Who was their chief?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Their chief was the man I have referred to as indicated by his telegram to McNish. I think I have said sufficient to convince the House that I was justified in pointing out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce a year ago the character of the man whom he was entrusting with this work, and I assured him at that time that it would be an easy matter to secure a reliable investigator if an investigation was required by the Department of Trade and Commerce. The minister simply ignored all protests. The right hon. leader of the opposition pointed out in detail some of the objections to the appointment of Preston, matters to which I have referred to-day and asked for something different. Preston was switched out of the country immediately after the West Elgin by-election which was held on January 12, 1899, and was appointed under an Order in Council by the Dominion Government on the recommendation of Sir Richard Cartwright, Minister of Trade and Commerce, as Superintendent of Immigration overseas. Observe the collusion between the Liberal Party in Ontario and at Ottawa. Preston operated in the West Elgin election held on January the 12th; he wired his congratulations to the members of the machine from Toronto on election night. The Order in Council at Ottawa was passed and dated the following day, January 13, 1899. His successor later on was also accommodated by being sent over to the Old Country as a trade commissioner. Both these gentlemen were afterwards sent to Japan and China by the government. This was the reward they received for their operations. In a debate which took place in the House in reference to the matter, the leader of the opposition of that day, Sir Robert Borden, referred to the defence put up by Sir Richard Cartwright, who claimed that the only trouble with these people was that they were not discreet; that they should have been more careful; that they should have looked under the bed, behind the doors and up the chimney, to see that they were not being hoaxed, that they were not being overheard in fact, that they were not being found out. Sir Robert Borden stated that it would have been better for the Minister of Trade and Commerce had he retired to his native parish and had never been heard of rather than that he should advocate such a policy, that a more damnable doctrine had never been more unblushingly avowed. These things took place in the parliament of this country in 1903, and to-day, in this year 1925, many long years afterwards, we are to be asked to endorse the recommendations of a man of this character, to pay some attention to a report which has been featured in the press and in this House but of which I know nothing whatever as it is not yet available.

This same Mr. W. T. R. Preston was employed by the present government on another commission three years ago. After the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) would have us believe he had driven the trusts, mergers and combines out of the land, he was anxious to get after them on the inland lakes, A commission was accordingly appointed to investigate the shipping rates that were being charged on the lakes, of which Preston was a member, and subsequently legislation was passed by this government for the alleged purpose of controlling these rates. This legislation cost the farmers of western Canada $2,600,000 in 1923 and we had the spectacle of members of the government begging and beseeching American shippers to disregard the legislation referred to and to come to this country under promise that the law would not be enforced against them. This man Preston was the secretary of this commission also. All that has come of his efforts in connection with the regulations on control of freight rates on the Great Lakes has been an increase in rates, the imposition of an enormous burden upon the settlers in western Canada, nothing more. And now in the Speech from the Throne this session we are asked to give our assistance to the Prime Minister and Mr. Preston, and the Minister of Labour—I presume he will be there, because you could not make a good job of it without him. We are asked to ratify a contract which it is claimed will result in driving all trusts, mergers and combines off the high seas. What a burlesque!

Preston arrived in England in 1899. Immediately an organization was formed known as the North Atlantic Trading Company, of which many of you have heard. "North Atlantic" seems to fit in pretty well with Mr. Preston's operations—he knows the north Atlantic so well; he knows Europe so well. This concern was in operation for several years without the sanction of parliament, and hundreds of thousands of dollars of the money of the people of Canada were paid to them. Finally the Auditor General's reports showed where the money was going and inquiries were instituted, people naturally wondered who constituted the North Atlantic Trading Company, to whom this money was being paid from the vote for immigration. An investigation was subsequently held and certain persons who were supposed to be able to give information on the subject were summoned to appear before the Public Accounts committee of this House. An effort was made to find out who were interested in the company, without success, because Mr. Preston and Mr. Smart, who was at one time Deputy Minister of the Interior and who was associated with Mr. Preston, both refused to divulge the names of the persons to whom the money had been paid. It was alleged to be a confidential matter between them and the members of the company, and it would not be advisable, they said, to give the information. A motion was moved in the House of Commons to have them appear before the bar of the House and be compelled to give the names, but the motion was voted down by the government majority and the information was not obtained. However, we have had considerable information furnished by others who were in the civil service at that time. Some of you may have heard of Mr. Alf Jury, who was at one time a candidate in the city of Toronto and was afterwards sent overseas as an immigration agent under Preston. Mr. Jury, swore on the stand that it was his firm belief that Mr. Preston was from the very beginning financially interested in the contract. He pointed to the fact that Mr. Preston went about Europe in the interests of the company, personally engaging agents of the company in Scandinavia and in other countries. I have his statement here from which I quote:

> Mr. Jury wrote to Mr. Preston in 1905: "I have not got any gold mine in the shape of a "Canadian bureau" or a "North Atlantic Trading Company" etc. draw from. And Mr. Jury further writes to Mr Preston: "I should like to buy you at my price and sell you at your own. I would not trade with you then for either of your gold mines."

This was Mr. Jury's opinion of the man who was engaged in this work. He intimates clearly his belief that Mr. Preston was one of the parties who was receiving money from this company.

Lord Strathcona also took exception to the operations of the company. Writing Sir Wilfrid Laurier in May, 1906, he said the contractors:

> —would obtain the advantage without any great expense or effort to themselves of the movement which was bound shortly to take place as the result of our continuous educational work with the various agencies on the continent.

I should have pointed out before coming to this phase of the subject that the remuneration paid to the North Atlantic Trading Company was one pound for every immigrant from continental Europe over the age of twelve years who was going on the land or entering upon domestic service. In the discussion which took place in the House it was made clear, as Mr. Sifton said, that one pound was being paid for every Doukhobor, one pound for every Galician, and so on. Mr. Frank Oliver, then member for Edmonton, took very vigorous exception to what was going on at that time in connection with immigration to western Canada, and I cannot do better than read some extracts from Hansard in that connection. He pointed out with regard to the Galicians:

> It would be a very simple matter to overcome any particular settlement in the Northwest by foreign population. Every settlement in that country stands in danger from that influx of population. If it is not checked the whole of the northwest territories stand in danger.

Further on, at page 8524 of Hansard, he says:

> It is said that those people settle where other people will not, but in my part of the country they settle where other people have settled and where other people would settle in large numbers were it not for these Galicians. In fact, where these Galicians have settled some of the others have moved away.

An hon. member asked, "Why?" and Mr. Oliver replied:

> Because they are undesirable neighbours.

Again he stated, in 1901:

> In regard to the Doukhobors I wish to say, speaking of course without having such an intimate knowledge of them, but speaking on the general principle that any people that are too good to conform to the laws of this country are too good to live in this country, and we do not want them at any price—

That was pretty plain speaking from a supporter of the government of that day with regard to what was being done in settling these people in the northwest. Further on he said:

There is another question that the people of the west feel more strongly on than this immigration question, and there is nothing that they more earnestly resent than the idea of settling up the country with people who will be a drag on our civilization and progress. We did not go out to that country simply to produce wheat. We went to build up a nation, a civilization, a social system that we could enjoy and be proud of and transmit to our children. And we resent the idea of having the millstone of the Slav hung around our necks.

Again in 1902 he said:

Our social system, our political system, our religious system are those which we have inherited, and under which we are trying to improve ourselves. Then if it is worth while to organize all these systems for the purpose of improving ourselves in this country, it is surely worth while to take means that our efforts shall not be to a certain extent rendered useless by the introduction of an element into our population which will have a contrary effect. If you will fill these prairies with people of different ideas, different aspirations and different views from our own, you are simply placing yourselves under a yoke. You are swerving your country from that destiny for which your fathers intended it, and which you fondly hoped you were achieving. I say that every undesirable settler who enters the northwest, who is, we will say, inferior to ourselves in his knowledge of the government, in his ideas of liberty, is a detriment to this country. I am given to understand that a new system is being adopted in regard to immigration from the British Isles. I am not familiar with the details of that system, but I will say that there is no possibility of adopting any system which could be less effective than that which has prevailed during the past years. I am satisfied that any system that is adopted will be an improvement.

This, Mr. Speaker, was from a supporter of the government of that day, criticising what the government were doing in settling these colonies of foreigners in western Canada. This North Atlantic Trading Company were not receiving a pound for each Britisher they brought out from the British Isles; they were not receiving one pound per head for every immigrant from France; they were not receiving one pound per head for every immigrant from Italy, but they were receiving for those from other European countries one pound per head. "One pound for a Doukhobor and one pound for a Galician" was evidently the slogan. As a result of Mr. Oliver's criticism a cablegram signed by the Deputy Minister of the Interior was sent, not to the North Atlantic Trading Company, but to Mr. Preston, in these words:

A bonus will not be paid any longer for Galicians.

Why should that be sent to Mr. Preston if he was not the head of the concern? Ask yourselves that question. Why did the Deputy Minister of the Interior here in Ottawa wire to Mr. Preston that no further bonus would be paid on account of Galicians? This company had been obtaining a bonus for these people who were coming here, as Lord Strathcona pointed out even without any effort on the part of the government or of this company. There was no check on them. $360,000 of the money of the people of this country was paid out to this company in that way. Mr. Frank Oliver was appointed Minister of the Interior shortly afterwards, and he cancelled the contract of the North Atlantic Trading Company, although it had still eight years to run, and Mr. W. T. R. Preston was transferred to Japan. But he still remained in the employ of the government. These are some of the things that should cause people to pause and reflect when considering Mr. Preston's activities. A motion came before the House questioning the squandering of money upon this North Atlantic Trading Company, and while the matter was under discussion Mr. Oliver informed the House that he had cancelled the contract. The motion was moved by the member for North Toronto, Sir George Foster. I have said enough to show the connection between the North Atlantic Trading Company and Mr. Preston. Some of the officials in the department, from the evidence they gave, were firmly convinced that Mr. Preston was the head and body and soul of the North Atlantic Trading Company.

There was also another firm operating bringing Jews to this country, headed by a man named Leopold. He had an office next to Mr. Preston in the government building in London.

Before Mr. Preston was sent to Japan he was very anxious to do something for his native province of Ontario and incidently for the North Atlantic Trading Company, in the matter of immigration, and particularly for the government which had given him such great opportunities to render service to his native province. Here is a letter that was placed on Hansard several years ago by the then hon. member for Frontenac, Dr. Edwards. It was written on government paper from 17 Victoria street, London, on October 18, 1901, from the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, and is headed W. T. R. Preston, Emigration Department. It is addressed to a provincial government official here in Ontario, who was engaged in that work on behalf of the Ontario government, and says:

I have your letter of a late date on emigration to Ontario. You incidentally say in the letter that you are opposed to indiscriminate emigration. Well, in that respect you agree with everybody else. I do not know anyone who suggests, or who would propose, that there should be indiscriminate emigration to that province. Whatever is done must be done carefully, and any who are sent out must be well selected emigrants. But don't run away with the idea that only well-to-do people, or those with money, are going to emigrate. If you are going to keep up the populations in the old parts of the province you must be satisfied with sober, energetic and industrious emigrants. I know all you people are terribly afraid of the foreign element—

I notice that he is emphasizing the need of getting "the foreign element" in, not the British immigrant.

Upon that point I don't agree with you and have no hesitation in saying that a good class of foreigners scattered about the old parts of Ontario will do very much more towards preserving a proper agricultural population than those from England for instance. Politically speaking I believe the introduction of a hundred families or so into some of those close ridings with the connections which could be had and maintained here would easily preserve for us many doubtful seats in that province.

Sgd. W. T. R. PRESTON.

I shall not read the rest of the communication. Only a year ago I put the whole of it on Hansard for the benefit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This Mr. Preston entertained the idea of placing one hundred or so of these families in close constituencies. What a list of workers he could have selected from the people who were sent out to Canada by the North Atlantic Trading Company! I say that any man who would pen such a document to government officials in this or any other country is not a fit man to be in the public service of Canada and to be drawing money from the public treasury.

An hon. MEMBER: Who was that communication signed by?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It was signed by W. T. R. Preston. It is his signature which is attached to the document which I quoted.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is he still a government official?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: He is still in the pay of this country but at the time this letter was written he was Superintendent of Immigration overseas. There was a general election in this country in 1911 and the Laurier government was defeated at the polls. One of the first acts of the incoming government was to perform the operation that Mr. S. H. Blake would have liked to perform many years before. Mr. Preston was decapitated politically and his head along with the heads of several other persons of like calibre went into the basket. Nothing further, or at any rate not very much, was heard of him until the war-time elections in 1917 when he again bobbed up as the representative overseas of the Liberal party in Canada in connection with taking the soldiers' vote. He was placed in charge of that work for the Liberal party, because the opposition were given the appointment of one-half of the election officials, and with such a representative as Mr. Preston it may be taken for granted that he did his work for them well. I hold in my hand a circular which was distributed amongst the soldiers. This was sent to me by a man who was serving at the front at the time. The circular in question is signed by "W. T. R. Preston (On behalf of the Liberal candidates"). The circular is headed:

To the Canadian overseas forces.

Vote for Sir Wilfrid Laurier and conscription.

There are a number of appeals in the circular and one of them is:

Do not be deceived by misrepresentations.

Opposite to this appeal the soldier who sent me the circular wrote "I won't." An arrangement was made to have cablegrams sent from the Liberal candidates in Canada to the soldiers from their respective constituencies through Mr. Preston. I have here a copy of one such cablegram which was also sent to me by a soldier from my constituency serving at the front. It is addressed to the depot at Shoreham and was addressed as follows:

Your vote solicited. Supporting military bill.

These are the methods that were pursued by this man who had charge of the voting overseas on behalf of the Liberal party. Was it surprising therefore that he drew up a lot of false charges which were presented to the House a few years ago by the present Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) who spoke for several hours in their support. However, the charges received but little consideration even by Liberal members, and they have hardly been mentioned from that day to this. Has the present government taken any steps to investigate any of these charges which were preferred by Mr. Preston? Not one. Nor dare they do so. They had no confidence in the charges, they had no confidence in the man who preferred them; and yet we are asked to place faith in this man, acting as the agent for this country, when he alleges there is a combine among the steamship companies on the north Atlantic. I do not know whether there is any truth in the allegation that these companies have been acting as the Preston report apparently indicates, because I have not seen the report itself; it is not yet printed. Why was this report not printed and placed in the hands of hon. members before this discussion was introduced by the Prime Minister? The subject dealt with is the most important feature contained in the address. Is that the reason why the government is so insistent and so anxious that this debate be closed? Is that one of the reasons why hon. gentlemen on my left allow such insinuations to be scattered broadcast by the man of whom I have spoken? Yet, notwithstanding the importance of this subject the leader of the Progressive party says there will be a sigh of relief among the people when the debate is ended. I am sure there will be a sigh of relief from the Canadian people when they learn that no more characters of the Preston type are appointed to office in this country.

5 p.m.

There are many other features in connection with this matter that I might refer to. I believe, if the Hansards containing complaints and debates with respect to W. T. R. Preston were placed one on top of the other they would make a pile ten feet high. In view of the voluminous character of the charges and debates you will readily understand it is hardly possible to do more than touch upon these matters in a general way.

Something was said by the Prime Minister and those who are associated with him about a general election. I believe that a government that has so absolutely failed to take means to meet the conditions which exist in this country ought to go to the people and not attempt to longer carry on. When the government admits, as it does admit in the Speech from the Throne, that it is unable to do anything, that we must stand still, wait and see what is going to happen—

An hon. MEMBER: No, they said there must be a pause.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What the Prime Minister said was virtually this: "We have paused for the present but look out; you will see what will happen in the future if we get an opportunity." Sir, the leader of the government in the presence of the leader of the Liberal party of the province of Ontario, on several occasions lately made it plain that there is room in the Liberal party for all those whatever that may be, who are opposed to Conservatism, or the Conservative party. His declaration to all intents and purposes was this: "It does not matter whether they are red or whether they are yellow, they are welcome if they will come into the Liberal party with us." This is what the government desires and it is just as well therefore to talk plainly and let the people of this country know what is happening. It is well known that the present government is in power by reason of the support of a conglomeration of all the discordant elements that we had in Canada at the last election. It was not by reason of any particular policy which they advocated, because they had many policies. People did not pay any more attention to them than did the government of the day to the matter to which the Minister of Justice referred a year ago in connection with Mr. Tarte. They went out before the people of this province and other provinces at that time and they told them: "Notwithstanding the fact that we are advocating a reduction in the tariff, practically free trade, you do not need to fear. Why, we would not think of doing anything of that kind." I have Sir Wilfrid Laurier's own statement, delivered at a meeting in Toronto long afterwards in 1906, where he pointed out that they had made few reductions in the tariff and that the manufacturers of Toronto could sleep soundly because they had faith in the government on the tariff. This government comes into power, and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), the minister from Prince Edward Island without portfolio (Mr. Sinclair) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) state: "We are endeavouring to do, by slow degrees, what we attempted to do quickly on two or three historic occasions," and they ask the people of this country to have faith, to have courage; they ask the unemployed to get out and hustle, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) told them at Woodstock, as the government had to do. These are the methods that the government are taking to establish confidence when confidence is so necessary in order to overcome our difficulties. Our difficulties are great indeed, but with such tremendous resources as we possess, if we tackle them as a united force, with a common purpose, there is no reason why they cannot be quickly overcome. But we must quit this threatening attitude if people of means are going to put their money into industries in this country. They are not going to do so if it is to be jeopardized and placed at the mercy of a country to the south of us with the highest tariff in the world. Our farmers, our manufacturers, are handicapped; everyone in this country is handicapped, and we need a sane and stable policy to meet conditions as they exist. Personally, I would favour free trade if we could have free trade throughout the world. I believe that Canada could stand on her own feet under such circumstances, but we must face conditions as they are. We are living alongside of a neighbour which takes every advantage to make it difficult for us to trade with them. The people of that country are quite within their rights in doing this; but if you give them to understand that our policy is one for our own people—Canada for the Canadians—that when they adopt a policy of that kind, that we shall similarly retaliate, you will find that conditions will improve very materially in Canada.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear any merry quips or light persiflage from my hon. friends on the other side while the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) was describing the activities of W. T. R. Preston. I take it that the members of the government and of the party on the opposite side are thoroughly ashamed of themselves in having in their employ a man of his type. If they are not, they ought to be, and if he comes under the control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low), I would suggest that that minister give his attention to the villainous record of W. T. R. Preston and get rid of him just as quickly as possible. I have known this gentleman for many years and he has always been of the same kind. He is not fit to be in the employ of any public body, and the hon. member for South Oxford this afternoon has proved that to a demonstration. But the fact is that from the time Mr. Preston was dismissed from the employ of the government of this country—because of the change that took place—he haunted his friends of the Liberal party everywhere, and as soon as this government came into power,—within a week or two after the change of gov ernment,—W. T. R. Preston was again on the payroll. What hold he has upon the members of the government I do not know, but I cannot conceive of any man with a record such as he has being able to put a pistol at the head of any minister unless he held some minister in fear of exposure. I believe the Liberal party is afraid of what W. T. R. Preston could say about it, and that is why he is on the payroll of the Dominion government to-day. I do not understand how one who had been through the West Elgin election, the North Atlantic Trading Company and all the rest of those manipulations, could have the face even to ask for an appointment by his political friends. But I fancy that the hon. member for South Oxford has said enough, and it will not be necessary for me to discuss any further the activities of this gentleman.

With the exception of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans), the whole party to my left appears to be perfectly satisfied with the present policy of the government to stop any further reductions in the tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. HOCKEN: No protest has been made and apparently no protest is going to be made.

An hon. MEMBER: What did the leader say?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did not say much.

Mr. HOCKEN: Their leader made no protest of any account, and he seems to have put something in the nature of a gag into the mouths of those who are following him. They have not said anything. During former sessions, almost every member of that party was on his feet, yelling for free trade and lower duties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have seen some of the consequences.

Mr. HOCKEN: But now the Prime Minister can say: "We are going to stop now; we have gone so far and we are not going to make any further reductions," and no objection comes from my left. Let me give to the House the idea that the hon. member for Saskatoon has about these reductions. It may be that the other members of the Progressive party think they are quite satisfactory. He says:

> But the one thing which is at the root of the whole evil is to remain as it is for the present.

He protests against that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: The hon. member for Bow River is satisfied too. He does not want any further reductions.

> No, even the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) is not to mention the "death knell of protection" this year, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) states in his speeches that the government has gone far enough; the government is upholding the hand of the protected interests while ominous sounds of separation are heard from both the east and the middle west of this Dominion.

He speaks of it in this way:

> In spite of the much vaunted cut in the tariff last year—

We have to concede to the hon. member for Saskatoon the virtue of sincerity. He at least has made his position clear to this House, to the country and to his constituents. He is not going to renege upon his free-trade views, no matter how much the rest of the party with which he is connected desires to do so, and I think he is to be given credit for that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who made the deal?

Mr. HOCKEN: Whoever made the deal, it certainly was not the hon. member for Saskatoon, but amongst the Progressives there are better dealers than that hon. member. There are some members who have a greater resiliency; they can bend a little more than he can; indeed, we have seen them in this House bend from one side to the other. Whoever made the deal or arranged this matter, I do not know. Of course, they would not tell me, although if they had told me I would not give them away. But certainly it appears as though someone made a deal on behalf of this party with the government of the day. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) went west he made an appeal to them to come in: "You know, we are just like brothers and we think the same on this question. Come on in and let us all be one happy family". I do not know but that, if there had not been a "ginger" group or something of that kind, the marriage would not have taken place. And even had that been the case it would not have made very much difference in the votes that are cast in the House.

The Prime Minister tells us that the year 1924 has been a period of substantial progress. My, my! I wonder where he got that idea? He could not have got it from the manufacturers or from the farmers. People are not prosperous in the west, are they? No, there is no prosperity in the west; there is none among the manufacturers; and there is none among business men or merchants. Then where is this "substantial prosperity" of which the Prime Minister speaks? We find it in some statistics; that is the only place wherein we can find any prosperity in this Dominion. I am quite satisfied that the statement in the Speech from the Throne announcing this prosperity will be a surprise not only to business men but to the public generally. So far as I can judge, it rests upon one fact; we are told that the exports exceeded the imports and the inference is that we are prosperous. Well, I have heard that kind of talk ever since 1878 but I have never, nor has any other man found any prosperity in mere statistics; nobody can tell from statistics of this kind whether he is doing well or ill. The prosperity of a man is something that is not to be demonstrated by way of figures from the statistical department of the government. People know whether there is any money in their pockets or any food in their stomachs, and the prosperity that does not manifest itself in these ways does not exist. It will not satisfy the public, therefore, merely to tell them that they are prosperous.

If times were good it would not be necessary for the Prime Minister to talk so much about the balance of trade; and as to the balance of trade the fine figures which he presents and which he thinks prove his case merely show, in my judgment, a depletion of the natural resources of the country for the benefit of the workmen on the other side of the line. The favourable balance of trade is made up by exporting our raw materials to be turned into the finished product in the United States. If you take away these raw materials from the exports, then the Prime Minister will find the balance on the wrong side, undoubtedly.

My opinion, whatever the opinion of others may be, is that it is not good for a country to export its natural resources in the unfinished state, but rather to manufacture them and send out the finished article. This is more important in view of the fact that there are certain finished products which we can sell to the full limit of our capacity to produce them. For example, if we manufactured our pulpwood into paper, instead of shipping it out as cordwood or pulp, we could sell every ton that could be produced in all the mills of the country, and there would be as many more mills operating at full capacity. Is it worth while to have half a dozen more mills in this country? My hon. friends talk about exotic industries. Is the paper industry in this Dominion exotic? Should it not be built up and strengthened? Is it not indigenous to the country? Then why continue a policy that is injurious to that industry instead of adopting a policy that will increase the output of our natural resources? The Prime Minister says that we shall make the country prosperous by developing the natural resources; and then he maintains a policy that prevents us from doing that by sending the natural resources out of Canada in the raw state. The export of these resources in the unfinished state has this disastrous effect, namely, that we follow it up by sending out the manhood and womanhood of the country. We export our pulpwood and then export the paper-making mechanics who go to the United States and turn that pulpwood into paper. I do not know how any country can stand that kind of exportation which is one that we cannot boast of; rather, it is to be deplored. You could make the balance of trade enormously greater if you could put a money value on our population; if you could say that we exported to build up the United States so many men at so many thousand dollars each. If you did that you could increase the balance of trade by millions. But, of course, it is difficult to determine how much a man is worth to a country. The value of some men is very great while the value of others is less considerable. And unfortunately the men who are of greatest value sometimes get the least encouragement. If a man is poor he is a failure, and if he is rich he is a menace, and we ought to kill him. But some of the men who create the big industries are a thousand times more valuable than those who want to take everything from them which they have acquired during a lifetime of earnest and successful effort and application of a genius for organization. If this country was prosperous in 1924 I want to know why it is that so many people had to go across the line to get work. According to our statistics 148,000 immigrants came into the country while 181,973 persons went out. In other words, more people went out than came in, and the type of man who went out was the very best we have or can have in this country because he was native born. In my opinion the native born Canadian is of greater value than any other citizen, because he knows the country.

Mr. McMASTER. Oh, oh.

Mr. HOCKEN: Why the hilarity of my hon. friend? Now this is what we find, Mr. Speaker. The Registrar General of Ontario reports that he is signing 150 birth certificates every day for the admittance of Ontario-born people into the United States. About 100 are signed in duplicate, being required for those who intend to remain there. He reports also that more than half of these are married men. This means that if only half are married men the total daily exodus from Ontario is nearly three hundred. This is not guess work; the figures are given from the certificates signed by the Registrar General of Ontario. Now, this province has roughly one-third of the population of the Dominion; therefore if similar conditions prevail in the other provinces, we are sending out of this country at least 500 native born Canadians every day. How long can we stand this drain? Is it not the duty of government to be apprised of the seriousness of the situation and to take adequate measures to stop this exodus? I do not know of anything that is worse than this daily loss of our native born population.

And it is followed up, Mr. Speaker, by the closing of our factories in almost every part of the Dominion. If you want to find out the state of trade in this city, ask the merchants on Sparks street if times are good; go to any of our manufacturers and ask them if they are getting business. One of the largest of our mercantile firms in Toronto, the third in size, which had been in existence for seventy-five years, and which was able to ride the storm of 1878 and the storm of 1891, was not able to get over 1924; the firm of W. A. Murray & Co. has disappeared. A similar disaster happened in Hamilton, where one of the oldest firms—a sort of co-operative firm, too, a firm in which most of the older employees held considerable quantities of stock—was driven out of business; the Sanford Company that had the Oak Hall stores throughout Canada, suspended business last year. Is that proof of prosperity? Can the "favourable balance of trade" satisfy these people whose capital has disappeared? Can it satisfy the thousands of employees of these firms who have now to look for work elsewhere? It is perfectly futile to quote statistics to them. If you want any further evidence of depression, read the advertisements in the papers of forced sales—"must go out of business"—in practically every city of the Dominion. Why, Sir, it has become a matter of first-page news value for the newspapers if a factory is working full time. I noticed the other day one of our city newspapers gave its largest heading to an account of a factory in Hamilton that is actually working full time. Astonishing! With wheat at $2 a bushel, too. I do not know whether any factory in Toronto is working full time, but if so, there are mighty few of them. But of course that does not matter; Toronto gets along some way or other. But we have reached a sad estate of affairs when the general condition of industry is half-time or failure altogether and when it is a matter of first-page news that a factory is working full time.

And of course that reacts on employment. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave the House some statistics to prove that unemployment is not as bad as it was. Well, let him go over to the corner of Wellington and Bank streets and he will see two or three hundred men standing around envying those who are at work at the dirty job of tearing down those buildings and loading the debris into wagons. Those poor fellows have nothing better to do than to stand around the better part of the day envying their working brothers; and some of those onlookers are skilled mechanics. You have this condition of affairs almost within earshot; but you can get it much more obtrusively in some other places. I have a statement from Montreal, given on the authority of the Emergency Unemployment Relief Committee of that city, and I am sure that my hon. friends opposite will not desire to digest more than this short paragraph:

> Reports from forty local trade unions show that of a membership of 48,605, 9,324 are unemployed, 22,463 are working part time only, and 4,348 have left the city.

And my right hon. friend offers statistics to those people! The Montreal Star is a little more humane and considerate—it gives them a meal; while others are opening soup kitchens which will provide the unemployed with something more satisfying than a table of statistics. To my mind the Prime Minister who, after surveying the unemployment in this country, offers the poor fellows nothing but statistics, is not showing that appreciation of the seriousness of the situation which we have a right to expect from a man in his position. The condition is worse than it was last year, for if he is able to show by some index number—which is not a very satisfying diet for hungry men—that there are a few less unemployed now than last year, it must be taken into account that during the spring, summer and fall season of 1923 work was plentiful over practically all this part of the Dominion, and those who were working during that time were able to save enough to tide them over the winter of 1923-24; but last summer unemployment was extensive all over Ontario—I think all over the provinces to the east as well—and those who ordinarily would have worked through that period and saved enough to carry them through the winter had to start this winter with their financial resources entirely exhausted. Indeed they were in a much worse position, calling for much larger expenditures upon relief than we have had to meet at any time in the past. I can take you back, if you like, to 1878, but our population was small then, and while our unemployment may have been proportionately as great, it was not nearly as serious a thing to deal with as the problem we have to-day. Yet the government has nothing to give the unemployed when they come down here asking for relief; they are told we cannot do anything—"Go back to your province or to your municipality."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The British North America Act.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, the British North America Act covers a multitude of sins, but it cannot cover the failure of the government to consider humanely the needs of the working people of this country. The Prime Minister should, I think, have shown at least some desire to contribute, proportionately, if you like—proportionately is right—with the provinces and with the municipalities in the relief of unemployment. It is all right for him to say, "As soon as possible we will start some work," but in the meantime these people are starving and the municipalities have to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars to give them bread, to give them charity. If they have to be fed this government is as much responsible as the municipalities or the provinces. I am with the Prime Minister when he refuses to pay doles. I hope the day will never come in this country when doles will have to be paid. But there come emergencies when men are hungry, when children are unclad and there is distress in the home, and that is the condition to-day. There is no principle of government that should not be set aside to meet that kind of emergency. But the government did not do that; the deputation that came the other day were sent away empty handed, without a word of comfort or of hope for the future.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Except the British North America Act.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, the British North America Act does not satisfy the cravings of the stomach.

I am going to quote the Globe, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether the Globe has the weight with the government of the day that it used to have, but it has been a great newspaper and is a good newspaper yet. This paper carried on Saturday the story of a man who had been trying to help another fellow to get work. He says this:

> Having the price of a paper, we didn't have to go to the office to scramble for a peep at the advertisement page. Instead, seeing two ads that sounded likely, I hailed a passing taxi and told the driver to get us to the first address in double-quick time. I wish you could have seen that place when we got there. A rugby scrimmage would have had nothing on the pushing, fighting mob that was trying to beat its way into the factory. The second place had been just as popular, too, for we got there just in time to see a notice posted to the effect that the position had been filled.

A "pushing, fighting mob" for one job! And he says further:

> But there are three more months of winter to be got through. Is there nothing before him but that soul-grinding hunt for work which doesn't exist, and that miserable begging of the social agencies for the bare necessaries of life?

And that man is offered the British North America Act! The Montreal Star is feeding these poor people and is to be highly commended for doing so. In Winnipeg they are feeding 2,000 people a day, according to my information, and in the House of Industry at Toronto they are spending $20,000 a month to feed people and to give relief. One little mission in the downtown section fed three hundred men the other day. There were a hundred others waiting for a meal who could not get into the place, and some kind-hearted citizen took them to a restaurant and fed them. Montreal, Winnipeg, Toronto—the same story; distress of the worst kind. And this government is doing nothing. I submit that the policy of the government is responsible for this condition of affairs.

Not only is the House of Industry in my city full, as are the missions where the men lie all night to get out of the cold, but the police stations are filled with people who have no other place to go to seek shelter—the down-and-outers. What is the use of talking to these people about lowering the cost of living? What is the use of talking about the cost of living to people who have not any money, who have not the price of a bowl of soup? Besides, nothing that this government has done has reduced the cost of living; it is just as high as it ever was and it will not go down—it cannot go down—until some reduction in taxation takes place. I wonder if my hon. friends to my left are aware of the taxes that are paid? I have just made a little list of the different heads under which they come. The taxes paid in every industry make the cost of the products of those industries higher than they otherwise would be. If a man is running a factory of any kind he must at least break even, or quit. Of course he can carry on for a while, as thousands of our industries have been doing for the last year and a half. Upon their reserves; but we have got to the point where the reserves are pretty well exhausted, they are not going to last very much longer. A man in business now has to pay to the federal government, the income tax, the sales tax, the stamp tax, the receipt tax; to the municipal government, income tax, business tax, real property tax, and local improvement tax; and to the provincial government, the workmen's compensation tax. By the time he pays these nine taxes and has added them to the cost of what he has to produce, you can easily see why prices are higher than they otherwise would be. While we are paying taxes at this rate our neighbours across the line are paying about half as much; and then we expect that the Canadian industry can compete with the American industry, apart altogether from mass production and the other advantages in the size of the market that they have over there. If it is the policy of this government, and if my hon. friends to my left think it would be a good thing, to wipe Canadian industry off the map, then they should continue this policy, but if they realize that no country can be great, no country can be prosperous in the best sense of the word that has not industry as well as agriculture, then they will do something to stop the flow of manhood to the other side and to stop this impossible competition that our manufacturers have to meet.

Mr. FANSHER: Put on more taxes, I suppose.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, if they put on just one or two more taxes there will be an end of all industry in this country. If my hon. friend knows of any additional tax I would like to hear of it, because I would like to know in what other way we can be taxed. With the 5 per cent sales tax and all the other taxes, it is pretty hard to live.

Among the industries that are ruined by the present policy is the woollen industry. I read in the Pembroke Standard the story of the shutting down of the Pembroke Woollen Mills. It says:

> The story must not be mixed with politics—
> I do not see how you can keep it out.
> —for the tragedy is not being told with that intent. The proprietors of the Pembroke Woollen Mills are Liberals, and the late owner was a gentleman who had done his share for party success, so it is not a partisan cry but the bald fact with regard to the textile industry in Canada; it is not being strangled to death, but bludgeoned to death.

That does not come from some wicked Tory or from some pampered manufacturer. It comes from the Pembroke Standard, which I presume is a Liberal paper, from the care it exercises to square itself with the party before it commences to speak.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend does not know the community.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say it is not?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have said what I have said.

Mr. HOCKEN: It may be like the Brockville Recorder-Times or the Stratford Beacon-Herald, which are both neutral papers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member for Bruce could likely afford some information. The editor came from his county.

Mr. HOCKEN: The Jefferson Glass Works, in our own city, which employed 475 men, and had a payroll of $10,000 a week, has had to close down by reason of the unfair competition it has to meet. The Canadian Products of Windsor, a plant put in at close to $7,000,000, employing 2,000 people and spending $72,000 a week in wages, has had to close down, and the product that was formerly turned out by their factory is now being made at Battle Creek, Michigan. Of course, nobody is to blame, my hon, friends opposite say.

Mr. BALDWIN: Does the hon. member know that a quarter of a million dollars is now being put into a glass factory right within sight of this House? Does he also know that the Financial Times of Friday last, the 13th, said that the Dominion Textile Company is working ninety per cent full time and is very prosperous? Now that sterling is almost at par it makes it very much better.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is just what I said, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BALDWIN: Oh, no.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have said that it is a matter of first-class news importance that any factory should be working full time. My hon. friend says the Dominion Textile Company is not working full time, and although it is not working full time, he gets up to make a point of the prosperity of this institution that has not got enough business to give its employees full-time work.

Mr. BALDWIN: Is not ninety per cent a large average?

Mr. HOCKEN: It is a pretty good average, but my hon. friend will find, if he goes into the textile business, that that is one of the very few factories that are working full time. Let him go to the knitting mills of this country and find out if they are working full time.

Mr. BALDWIN: Let me give my hon. friend the words of a large manufacturer just one week ago. He told me that the woollen business was first-class, and his business is not sixty miles from where we are.

Mr. HOCKEN: I invite my hon. friend to reply to my remarks. He will have ample opportunity unless he, like my hon. friends to my left, has a handkerchief stuck in his mouth to prevent him speaking any more. He will have a chance later on to speak in this debate.

There is one other subject that causes me some concern. I attended a luncheon during September of last year, where I heard Sir Henry Thornton make a speech, and I was greatly impressed with one remark that he made. He said; "I think the government of Canada should find the biggest and most capable man there is in this country and put him in charge of immigration." Nothing, he said, "is required in this country so much as immigration." Well, what have we got? We have no Minister of Immigration in charge of this important work, according to Sir Henry Thornton, and I am sure the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) will agree that Sir Henry Thornton is one of the greatest authorities we have in this country on colonization, transportation and so on; yet we have no man at all as head of the Immigration department, looking after the immigration interests of this country. My hon. friend (Mr. Robb) who is the titular head of that department is also Acting Minister of Finance. I would like the House to consider whether a man who has to perform the arduous duties of Minister of Finance, without having the twenty years of experience that the titular minister of that department possesses, has not got enough to do looking after that department alone? Has he any time to attend to immigration? I wonder if my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance ever goes into the Immigration department? I would not expect him to, Mr. Speaker. Well then, the work is left entirely in the hands of officials without any directing head, and without any government policy so far as I can discover. And when you get into the department what do you find? Why, they let a man go who had experience, who had capacity, who showed himself efficient in the performance of his duties. He was shifted out into the Canadian National Railways Colonization Department, and a man brought in in his place who had been a trade commissioner in South Africa, a man absolutely without experience in immigration.

Mr. ROBB: I infer that my hon. friend is trying to create the impression that Dr. Black, the former Deputy Minister of Immigration, was crowded out. Let me say now that Dr. Black voluntarily resigned as Deputy Minister of Immigration, and acting for the government I asked him if he would accept an increase of salary and stay on. He said, "No, I am offered more than the government will allow you to pay, Mr. Robb." And I have Dr. Black's letter expressing regret that he had left the government service.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am very glad to hear that from the Minister of Immigration, and I give him full credit. I express my appreciation of that treatment of a man of Mr. Black's capacity. But, surely, after he had gone there were men in the department who had had experience, who had had knowledge of all that had gone forward, and who would have been more acceptable to follow him. I do not know anything personally about the present Deputy Minister of Immigration, I have never met him; but surely experience is required in the deputy head of any department of the government, and why a man should be brought from South Africa to act as deputy minister over an important department of that kind it is difficult for me to understand.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend has referred to the fact that there was no minister in charge of immigration, and to the present Deputy Minister of Immigration. I think it is a great thing in favour of this government that we have a man of sufficient ability to look after two departments under the leadership of the Prime Minister. What is the fault with Mr. Egan, the present Deputy Minister of Immigration? Will my hon. friend come out in the open and tell us his reason?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am giving the only reason I have.

Mr. MARTELL: Very likely.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. gentleman accept my word?

Mr. MARTELL: Certainly; I respect the hon. member.

Mr. HOCKEN: I say it is a mistake to take a man without experience and put him in the most responsible position in a department of that kind. I do not think you can get away from it. It is a position that requires experience.

Mr. ROBB: There might seem to be some colour to the impression my hon. friend would give, to one who does not know the conditions as I know them. The reason why a man was brought from the Department of Trade and Commerce and made Deputy Minister of the Department of Immigration was that I discovered there was so much jealously in the department among the higher heads that some of them were not speaking to each other.

Mr. MARTELL: We get lots of that.

Mr. HOCKEN: We are not getting immigration. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance evidently had not sufficient courage to exercise his own judgment and say: Here is the man for the job.

Mr. ROBB: That is exactly what I did do.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not see it that way. I agree with Sir Henry Thornton that there is nothing so important in this country at the present time as a well-devised and energetically pursued immigration policy. If we could get fifty per cent more of the right type of people into Canada than we have at the present time it would solve every problem that is facing our country to-day.

Mr. KYTE: Would it not open more soup kitchens?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not think so. If we had fifty per cent more population our National railways would not be rolling up deficits but would be yielding a surplus, and that surplus could be applied to the reduction of freight rates.

Mr. MARTELL: Keep clear of the National railways.

Mr. HOCKEN: If we had fifty per cent more population there would be that much larger number in Canada, spread over the country, to help to bear the burden of taxation and in consequence that burden could be lessened.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would have to get jobs for them.

Mr. HOCKEN: My right hon. leader says we would have to get jobs for them, but I take the view that every family suitably settled in the country represents that much more work. There might be difficulty in the newcomers getting adjusted, but almost every immigrant who comes to a new country experiences more or less difficulty. The adjustment would take place and the immigrants would settle down in a short time and become excellent citizens.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose, I was making some remarks on the question of immigration. and the thread of my argument having been broken, I shall tie a knot in it by pointing out that while I am strongly in favour of an aggressive and energetic immigration policy, I think the first thing the government ought to address itself to is to retain the population which we have in this country at the present time and to endeavour so to provide that there will be work for our people who are now leaving the country at the rate that they are. May I repeat that the best population we can have is that which is native-born, practically indigenous to the soil, accustomed to our conditions, and I should like the government to reconsider its policy with regard to the preservation of the industries which we have here and, if possible, the development of others.

I wish to say a word about the remarks which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) addressed to the House. I regret very much to hear from him that there is a feeling in favour of secession in western Canada. I hope it is not as serious as he leads the House to believe. When I review the record of the west during the war, I am loth to believe that there is any serious desire upon the part of the people inhabiting that portion of the Dominion to separate from the rest of Canada and particularly to separate from the Mother Country. When I asked him whether he intended the House seriously to believe in the prospect of secession, he said: It is very much more serious than the general public appreciates." That is a very sad state of affairs, because notwithstanding all that my hon. friends from the western provinces may say, the fact is that the eastern provinces of Canada, what are called the central provinces, have made enormous sacrifices in the past and are making them to-day to give to the agriculturists of western Canada every possible facility to carry on their work properly.

I am old enough to remember the time when there was no population in the west, before the Canadian Pacific railway was built, and to remember too the strain that was put upon the financial resources of this country to build that railway. If the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans), who complains of lands having been given as a subsidy for the building of that road, had been living in this country at that time, he would, perhaps, be better able to appreciate the reason that existed for that method of financing the railway at that time. I join with him in believing that under anything like normal or ordinary circumstances, it is a mistake to give the domain of the country for works of that kind; but as I look back to the time when the Canadian Pacific railway was built I realize that that was the only way in which we could have got the railway which has done so much to develop western Canada.

I found in the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle one source of satisfaction. He wants to know: Is there any reason why we cannot get together, unite our forces, bring our best brains to bear on these problems and apply the remedy so quickly that the talk of secession will disappear? If there is any way by which the representatives of the various provinces of Canada can get around a table and agree upon a policy which will be acceptable and loyally worked out by all parts of this Dominion, that is the most desirable thing we could do. You cannot get far in any country unless you have the people united, and our country is so widespread that it becomes exceedingly difficult to bring about that state of unity that is so desirable and necessary in building up a great nation. Providence has endowed us more richly perhaps than any other country in the world. It rests with the people of Canada, then, to take advantage of the opportunities put in their way to create here a great free and prosperous state. That we must be united as to policy is one of the essential requirements of the situation. I do not suppose that any part of the three divisions of the country can secure a national policy such as would be most desirable to that particular division. There must be a compromise and we must look at the Dominion as a whole and not as three separate sections of one country. I feel satisfied that if that could be brought about all the talk about friction and secession and that kind of thing would cease.

I have a proposition to submit which I had originally intended to put in the form of a resolution, but when I looked at the order paper and saw there about thirty motions standing in the names of hon. gentlemen to my left as well as about twenty more from other sources it occurred to me that if I did add my name to the list my resolution might not be reached after all. And all that I could do with such a resolution would be in any case simply to bring the matter to the attention of the government. I venture, therefore, to take this opportunity to present my views on the particular proposal I have in mind. As I have observed, there is nothing so desirable in this country as national unity. I do not think that this can be attained over night, but some effort should be made and some policies adopted which would work to that end, anyway. What I have to submit, then, is this, that this parliament should annually make a grant of money sufficient to enable one hundred children from each of the various sections of Canada to travel from one end of the Dominion to the other. These children might be selected on the winning of a scholarship in the rural schools of the provinces, that scholarship to consist perhaps in a two months trip throughout the country. I would select one hundred children from the Maritime provinces, one hundred from the province of Quebec, one hundred from Ontario and one hundred from the western provinces, and take them from coast to coast. I venture to suggest that this would be a liberal education, and the children would go back to their provinces better Canadians. They would understand that they were not natives of their own particular province merely, but that they were growing up to be citizens of what ought to be in the near future one of the great nations of the world. It would inspire them to do their best in whatever walk of life they might be and would make them better acquainted with the people in every part of the Dominion. What could be of more educative value to a group of children from Saskatchewan, say, who were born and brought up there up to the time that they had earned such a scholarship? Those children would see the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and would learn something of the manner of life and the methods of livelihood of the people in the places they visited; and they could go to the Atlantic coast, staying such length of time as was found possible, under proper direction of teachers or instructors, or men who had been specially selected for their ability to make the greatest use of such an opportunity. Such an undertaking would not begin to show results in a year but I venture to say that in ten or fifteen years' time, after seven or eight hundred children had travelled up and down the country every year, the admirably useful effects would be apparent to every observer in the country. It will be argued that this parliament has nothing to do with education, and I admit that at bottom this is a matter of education. At the same time, it seems to me to be something more than education in the ordinary sense of the word, and I submit the proposal to hon. members for their consideration. If the government really desire to do something to bring about greater unity of sentiment throughout Canada I think they should carefully examine this suggestion. The cost, no doubt, would be considerable, but in my judgment it would be justified by results.

Mr. EULER: Would you not obtain more immediate and practical results if you sent delegations of grown-up, intelligent men?

Miss MACPHAIL: And women.

Mr. EULER: And women, too.

Mr. GRAHAM: They will follow.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not know how the hon. member (Mr. Euler) would make the selection. It is to be presumed that to some extent at least men in business have an opportunity of travelling from one province to another.

Mr. EULER: Many have not.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would it not be cheaper and more practical if the members of parliament themselves would travel on their passes and see their own country first?

Mr. HOCKEN: I presume that was one of the purposes of the passes, and I may inform the minister (Mr. Graham) that I have personally made use of mine, as I know he has done also. The minister has opportunities now of travelling under comfortable conditions.

Mr. GRAHAM: Beautiful.

Mr. HOCKEN: If he would give us private cars we would all travel too. I agree that the members of parliament should, and to a considerable extent they do, make use of their passes to enlarge their knowledge of the country. However, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen have said, I still think that the plan I have suggested is the best that could be submitted. We have to begin a thing of this kind with the rising generation, who are susceptible and who will learn things in their youth which they are not likely to forget. They would be anxious to go back, having once visited places of interest, and it would inspire them with a patriotic feeling towards the rest of the country. I am sure that the experience of such a trip would prove of great value not only to them but to their fellow students. I leave the suggestion with the members of the government for consideration.

There is one other matter which I intended putting on the order paper in the form of a resolution, but I thought it would be better to bring it before the government on the present occasion. Two years ago I addressed the House on the question of encouraging the magazine industry of this country. No one can tell to what extent the exodus from Canada is brought about by the reading of United States literature. In my judgment it is due very largely to such reading. Our young men and young women have no other magazines to read, with the result that the United States is presented to them in every magazine they read as the land of promise, this is pounded into them issue after issue, and eventually, if they move at all, instead of moving to another part of Canada they go across the border. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) will know from his experience in journalism that the only way you can get a man to absorb an idea is to iterate it over and over again. That is exactly what is done by these United States magazines. That that country is a good place to live in, is a place where success is to be achieved, is repeated over and over again to our young men and young women, and while, as I say, it is impossible to determine its exact effect, I do not think any reasonable man would deny that it must have a very great influence upon the minds of our young people. There is the other fact, that we allow a great deal of magazine literature to come in here that should never be published at all. As a matter of fact, the United States is considering measures for the purification of its magazine and periodical literature. Well, at least we should not admit that kind of stuff. Then there is the other fact, that many of these magazines are 60 per cent advertising matter. If that advertising came in separately it would pay a duty of 15 cents a pound; mixed with stories and articles on various subjects it enters free. This works an injury to every Canadian manufacturer who is advertising, and it works an injury to the publishing business of this country. I submit that in view of all the evils which I have pointed out—the bad effect upon our young people, the unfairness to the magazine publishing industry and the manufacturing industry of this country, the government ought to do something. When I spoke on this question before the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who unhappily is not able to be with us now, expressed approval of the proposal I then made, and I thought that was a pretty sure guarantee of something being done along the lines I had suggested. But nothing has been done. So I venture again to bring the matter to the attention of the government, and again to suggest that it would be good, sound public policy for the preservation of Canadian ideals in our young people to do the decent thing by an industry that has no protection, that is even met with taxes on its raw material, and that cannot survive unless it gets a chance to live through appropriate action by the government. I have witnessed scores of magazines started in Canada, but they have all failed. The very best brains of Canada were employed upon them. Some of the men who were involved in those failures are now in the United States engaged in the magazine industry. The editor of the Ladies Home Journal, the highest class magazine they have over there, was trained on MacLean's magazine in Toronto. We have the editorial ability, we have the writing ability, we have the artistic ability, but we cannot possibly compete with the flood of pernicious magazine literature that is sent in here from the United States. I should not say pernicious literature, because much of it is very good and would always come in. I do not care how high priced a book or magazine may be, if it has value in it people will buy it. And those people could afford to pay any reasonable tax that might be put on American magazines in order to make possible the continuance of the industry in this country. I therefore leave these two matters, both of which have an important bearing on the question of national unity, to the favourable consideration of the government.

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (East Elgin): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon the subject of the Speech from the Throne, I should like to endorse the final suggestion of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. It must be apparent to every true Canadian that the flood of magazine literature from the country to our south is not in the best interests of Canada. We have only to look at the number of magazines and the quality of some of them on our news stands to realize that their perusal month after month is not likely to develop the best class of young Canadian manhood and womanhood. I am not a newspaper man, and therefore do not propose to offer a remedy, but I do say that something ought to be done to encourage Canadian authors and publishers. In addition to the evils that may be traced to the reading of many American magazines, there is also an economic menace from the volume of advertising in such magazines attracting Canadian business that should be legitimately supplied by our own manufacturers.

The debates on the Speech from the Throne have for the first time in my recollection been carried on largely by one party in the House. Is it not worth while to ask ourselves if the people will not be curious to know just why the debate has become so one-sided? In this connection it may not be out of place to inquire the purpose of this debate. We must remember that very few of our electors have any opportunity to visit here, and the only way in which they can ascertain whether we have any grasp of the national situation today, and what remedies we have to offer for anything that needs treatment, is by the printed word that goes out from this place. Many have spoken of the debate as a waste of time. This opinion is, I think, mistaken. Properly conducted, it is not a waste of time. It is true some speeches might very well be shortened, the ideas enunciated might be very well crowded into fewer words, but after all I believe the view of the electorate is that the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne serves a useful purpose. The Speech placed in the mouth of His Excellency usually deals with national affairs and outlines what legislation will be introduced in an endeavour to improve the condition of the body politic. It is just like any other motion that comes before the House and is debated: the opposition exercise the undoubted privilege and right of criticising and bringing before the public what they think the true situation is and what, in their judgment, is the proper course to pursue. As the result of this the public form an intelligent opinion of what their representatives have in the way of a grasp of the situation and what the different parties have in the way of solution for any existing evils. If we rob parliament of this we have done a great deal to rob the public of their share in the work of this House. We are their elected representatives and I feel sure that we are not doing our whole duty if we do not come here with some intelligent idea of what conditions are, of what conditions are that are wrong, and of what the solution should be.

That there is a desire at this particular time to shorten the debate, to limit discussion, there is no doubt. The silence of nearly all those on the government side is eloquent testimony to their desire, at least. What is still more strange is the corresponding silence of the party to my left. They have not always observed this anxiety for economy of time. This seems to be the first time they have completely bowed to the will of the government in this respect. I have been asked time after time by some who are interested and who voted to send the third party to parliament, just what my opinion was of the independence of that group. I have replied. I thought in all fairness, that with some notable exceptions many of those elected to that group were trying, as far as possible, to take an independent attitude on public questions. But I cannot see, Mr. Speaker, how I can give that same answer after this. It is strange to me, and I think the public will regard it as equally strange, that when the government evince a desire to shorten this discussion or to have practically no debate at all on the Speech, the Progressive party are so suddenly obedient to their will. As I have said, there must be a reason, and we will inquire for the reason.

A great deal has been said during the past year about pessimism in connection with public affairs. We of this party have been accused of being pessimists. I wish to say right here, and I believe I am speaking for every member of our party, that we have no reason for being pessimistic in regard to the future of Canada. But we do have a right to be pessimistic, to be doubtful of the means adopted by the present government working toward that end. And accordingly we have the right to suggest what we think is the proper course. If there has been such a thing exhibited as pessimism within the past year I want to say that the present government have given most glaring examples. As an illustration of pessimism I do not know of anything so striking as this empty, spineless document I hold in my hand, the Speech put into the mouth of His Excellency. I propose to prove that. Most of us remember what the Speech of last year was. You will recall that it started very much as this one does.

[Mr. Stansell.]

It asserted first that Canada was attaining prosperity and making great progress. It referred also to the cost of living and the efforts the government was putting forth to reduce it. It also announced with a flourish of trumpets that as a result of governmental policies, for the first time since 1912 or 1913 they were going to balance the budget. Not only that, but they would announce a surplus and a substantial reduction of debt; and, further, that the time had come when in the attempt to lower the cost of living a reduction in taxation should be given. Why, let me ask you, have they not continued the good work? Why are all such references absent from the present Speech? This fact is an eloquent if silent testimony to the failure of some of the policies put into effect during the past year. Does anyone mean to tell me that if the government were confidently looking forward to a substantial surplus this year; if the policy of reduced taxation was so sound that there would be a balancing of the budget and a still further reduction of duty—if this were the case, would the fact not have been mentioned in the Speech? I think it would, but we know very well that such has not been the case. Instead of that what do we have? The Speech starts out just as it did before. The anxiety to relieve the cost of living is just the same as it had been and has been ever since the time before the present Prime Minister took office. This has been a live subject. The government attempted to deal with it last year by a reduction of the tariff; now we are told they are going to try an entirely different tack. No longer must we contemplate the cost of living and its remedy in reduced taxation.

In effect, by not continuing the discussion of the Speech, they tell us to turn our eyes from the present condition of affairs and not even consider the remedies that were applied last year and the failure of those remedies. They ask us to turn our eyes eastward toward the broad Atlantic and see the rising sun of Petersen, Preston and Company. That is now the important thing. But why not continue the policies of last year? The answer must be found in the fact that there was no surplus last year, with corresponding reduction of debt—and I have it on the authority of a supporter of the government in a speech made in this House that not only was there no surplus last year, not only was there no reduction of debt, but there was actually a deficit of $42,000,000. That must be the real truth of the situation; otherwise, had these policies been sound, had the budget statement of last year been correct, why have they not continued the good work, so nobly begun?

We have had several speeches dealing with different aspects of the tariff and with the reductions made last session. An estimate was made at that time that the changes would result in a lessening of our revenue by about $24,000,000. If the estimates being made to-day are correct, they resulted in a falling off of at least twice that much in the revenues of this country.

Now, let us see for a moment: what is the real purpose of the tariff? Briefly, a tariff serves three purposes. One of those purposes is a source of revenue, and those who have occupied the treasury benches know that it is a substantial source of revenue. The second purpose is that it incidentally affords protection to those industries which are common to Canada. The third is that it provides a basis for bargaining in our trade relations with other countries. These three purposes are very useful ones and they should be continually borne in mind. It is true that the changes made last year were not very large. So far as they applied to agricultural implements they may not have affected the industry so very materially, because to offset what was done in the way of tariff reduction, free raw materials were given. In this particular instance the harm was most apparent. Many of the firms manufacturing the raw material formerly supplied to the makers of agricultural implements have either been put out of business or their operations have been seriously curtailed. Some I know of are operating at the present time out of capital at a loss, and operating only three days a week; so that indirectly the result of last year's tariff tinkering was unemployment, emigration, a deficit, a loss to the country of much needed revenue. To balance that, what have we in the way of material advantages? We had the figures given, and no one has disputed their accuracy, that to the farmer, the man most concerned, the man whom it was supposed to benefit, the prices of agricultural implements have not been reduced by one farthing by a reduction of the customs tariff —not even quite enough to make up for the loss of the sales tax. The net result to-day after three years work in the direction of reducing the cost of living, and in the direction of making cheaper the implements of production, is that the farmer, the one who was supposed to be benefited, is paying the same or more for his implements than when this government assumed power. The net result has been a loss of revenue, unemployment, emigration of our best class of labourers, and no one has got any benefit. In the face of this, is it any wonder that debate on this subject is not wanted? I am not at all surprised that the government do not care to have any debate on this subject, and that they are in a hurry to begin consideration of the control of ocean freight rates. I do not blame the government so much for their silence for this reason: it shows that with all their faults, they are just a little bit ashamed of their efforts and are troubled with remorse. What excuse, however, is there to offer for the action of the Progressive party, whose leader arises in his place and in effect says that now he has made his pronouncement everyone else must keep silent, there must be no more debate on this question by them. I must commend the leader of that party in a sense for his stand. He did perfectly right because the whole country knows that he and his party were a party to the mess that has been made.

We are told in the Speech from the Throne that the high cost of living is not going to be cured by further reductions in the tariff; it is going to be cured, and you will find the reference in the Speech, by consideration of transportation costs and immigration. The government, evidently proud of the success they have made in controlling transportation on the Great Lakes, have now ventured out into a larger field and are going to control, single-handed, ocean freights.

With regard to immigration, in the opinion of some people as well as the government the solution of Canada's difficulties lies in immigration. Let us inquire how far during the past three years immigration has operated to cure any of the ills from which we suffer. Of what use is millions spent on immigration while for every raw immigrant we bring into this country two native-born Canadians go out? Of what use is millions spent upon immigration if we cannot find jobs for the men we have? What have we as Canadians to offer to the intending immigrant? We have to say to them that we have a tremendous debt of about two and a half billion dollars; that in spite of our wonderful resources, in spite of all we say about Canada, we cannot make revenue and expenditure meet and are going further in debt every day. This is the bait we are to hold out to the intending immigrant to attract him here to help us pay our debts. Is it not an alluring prospect? That is the scheme that has been brought forward after three years by this government as a cure for the high cost of living—immigration. We do need immigration, but first of all, we need sound policies. First of all, we want to so economize that we shall be able to live within our revenue; we must show some signs of reducing our public debt; and when that is done all that will be necessary for Canada to do will be to keep out the undesirables, and the rest will be clamouring at the door for admittance. Imagine a government sending out agents and spending millions of dollars on immigration when the only thing we can say to the intending immigrant is: Come and help us pay our debts. You mght just as well go to the man who is burdened with debt and unable to balance the family budget and say: All you need is an increase in the family. The first thing we want to do is to develop a sound policy, to practise economy, and have a real business administration of the affairs of this country, and until that is done the money spent on immigration is so much money thrown away.

The other solution offered by the government is the control of ocean freight rates. This is to be done by subsidizing a small line of about ten ships to the tune of a million dollars a year. In my judgment the real reason for this new scheme is to distract attention from the real condition of affairs in this country, from the fact that we are not balancing our budget, that we are not paying our way, but are going deeper and deeper into debt. It is to take our minds from that disagreeable subject that we are asked to consider the control of ocean freights. Some years ago, about the time Sir Wilfrid Laurier assumed power, an arrangement was made with a company known as Petersen, Tate and Company, by which a subsidy was given to a fleet of ships that was to give a quicker service between this country and the old land, and reasonable rates for passengers and immigrants. It is well to remember that this Petersen, of the Petersen, Tate Company, is the same Petersen that the arrangement is to be made with now, but then they were only being paid about half a million dollars; things were cheaper in those days. What was the result of that arrangement? In the first place I want this House and the country to remember that Petersen, Tate and Company failed entirely to live up to their contract, and although they had deposited a considerable sum of money with the Canadian government by way of guarantee, after they had failed to live up to their contract a most generous Liberal government gave them back their deposit. That was the result of the first attempt to control freight rates with the assistance of the Petersen, Tate Company.

Now let us look at the other scheme. Who was the man largely responsible for arranging this deal? We have been told this afternoon that it was W. T. R. Preston. As you have already heard, a number of years ago in my county a man going under the name of W. T. R. Preston was given control of affairs for the Liberal party, and he attempted to control the elections in West Elgin by bogus ballot boxes and manipulation. Although West Elgin was traditionally Liberal and had always previously elected a Liberal, when the investigation following this particular election was over a Conservative was elected for that constituency and it has never chosen a Liberal since. You have heard much this afternoon from the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) about the activities of this gentleman who has undertaken this great work in the interest of the Dominion. Much more could be added but the facts have been so well placed before the House that I will not enlarge upon them. Many members who are older in public life than I am are thoroughly conversant with the activities of this particular friend of the present government. The result of his exertions in West Elgin was not only to earn a most disagreeable name for himself but to bring disaster to the Liberal party. Has anyone any idea that the efforts of this man in connection with ocean freights, in combination with the Petersen firm that failed once before, are going to be productive of any greater success than he was able to achieve in West Elgin? Is it any wonder that we of this party view with considerable misgiving the prospects of success under such circumstances? Upon the strength of the report issued by this man a scheme has undoubtedly been arranged in connection with which a million dollars of the taxpayers money is to be paid. This is all being done upon the recommendation of a man whose activities in connection with Canadian public life have been such as were described here to-day. If there is a combine in connection with ocean freight rates, if we are paying excessive transportation charges at the present time, we are just as anxious to reduce these rates as anyone can be; but we have to remember that Canada already owns a merchant marine very much larger than the flee we are about to subsidize, and it is operating at a loss of about $2,000,000 each year, which loss the taxpayers of this country have to make up. I would ask, if freight rates are too high why is the Canadian merchant marine operating at a loss? The Canadian taxpayer already has had to dip down in his pocket to the tune of $2,000,000 to make good the losses of a fleet of sixty or more ships which the government own. Now we have a suggestion that to our merchant marine be added another fleet of ten ships upon which the Canadian taxpayer must pay out another million dollars. It is said we are going to control ocean freight rates. Was ever any idea more fantastic than that? If the solution put forward a year ago for a cure of the high cost of living was such a failure—and that it was a failure is admitted by this empty document placed in our hands to-day—then what can be looked forward to in the way of success from an effort along this line to control ocean freight rates?

It is not sufficient to criticise. If we are not satisfied with existing conditions we are expected to point out something that would effect improvement. Let me indicate what, in my humble judgment, I believe would be the proper course for Canada to take to-day. In doing this I want to address myself particularly to hon. gentlemen to my left because, like myself, they are interested from the farmer's standpoint. My hon. friends have now been in public life for three years or a little more. No doubt their intentions are just as good as the intentions of any of us who have been elected to this House. I believe my hon. friends are perfectly sincere in what they are trying to do, but they have as yet offered no national solution, if I may use the term, for Canada's difficulties. I have waited patiently during the past three years for some suggestion to come from the west in the nature of a national solution, but in vain. What have we heard? We have heard when crops were poor that there should be a reduction of the tariff. When prices were low we were told the same remedy was required. When crops have been better and prices have been high we are still told what is required is a reduction in the tariff. Last year, as the result of their support of the government, and I believe on the part of very many against their better judgment we were given a sample of the reduction in the tariff with the results which I have outlined. The financial year which has closed was so unsatisfactory that the government avoided all reference to it in the Speech from the Throne. Indeed, no one appears to have derived any benefit from the government's policy. Surely our western friends can offer something better in the way of a solution of existing difficulties than merely to ask for a reduction in the customs tariff.

We might ask ourselves why a customs tariff is needed? I believe the answer is clear. No matter what our personal opinion may be, no matter what attractive arguments in favour of free trade can be presented, we are faced with the disagreeable fact that our immediate neighbour for over three thousand miles believes in a policy directly the opposite; and it is surely apparent 9 p.m. to any one who has any business instinct at all that it is absolutely impossible for us to work in the direction of free trade while our neighbour enforces high protection. A splendid illustration was given by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) the other night when he cited an illustration under which one side of Sparks street was given full liberty to trade, whereas the other side was strictly limited to its own immediate territory. That is the situation exactly. There is no possibility of an industry of any kind flourishing in Canada if it is entirely shut out of the American market, and forced to divide its own market with the country to the south. Such a thing is absolutely impossible and absolutely unjust; I give many of my western friends credit for good business judgment in recognizing that it is impossible to succeed in the face of such conditions, that it is impossible to adopt any such policy as they advocate when our neighbours are not in harmony with us. If trade with the United States is desirable there is no one thing that will so quickly bring about an improvement as putting up the barriers on our side to the extent they themselves have done. Let us do all we can to cultivate trade with nations that show a desire to trade with us, let us continue the Imperial preference, but surely in our own great interest it is far better to pursue a policy that will build up Canadian industries rather than the industries of the United States.

In my judgment there should be an immediate revision of the tariff, with the object of protecting Canadian industry from the unfair competition of our American neighbours. I should like very much to have some of our western friends who are satisfied with what has been done in the way of tariff reduction with respect to agricultural implements to spend a short time with the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). They could then see for themselves what conditions are in that enterprising city, and just how little cause they have to be satisfied with their handiwork in the matter of customs reduction. They might also go to the fruit growing district where men, who had faith in Canada and invested their money in the country, were forced to allow acres of strawberries to rot for lack of a market, because the Canadian people in many of our large cities had bought the fruit from the United States, in many cases not as good, for twenty-five and thirty cents per box. Surely it would be good business to provide adequate protection for these men who are bearing their fair share of taxation, who have faith in Canada and have invested their money in the country. That is only one illustration but it is an important one. These foreign fruits come on our market somewhat earlier and at a higher price, and those who are able to purchase them contribute very little, if anything, to the revenues of the country. By the time Canadian-grown fruit is ready, the market is pretty well satisfied, and I know of cases where four or five acres of strawberries rotted on the ground because they would not pay for the effort or labour of picking them. Surely it should be a Canadian policy to give, as far as possible, the benefit of our market to our own people. If there are those who are so wealthy that they can afford to buy this early fruit at a higher price, let them pay a reasonable amount into the revenues of the country. I would suggest that a duty of 20 per cent would not be out of the way for the protection of the small fruit growers of this country and that it would not work an injustice to anyone. Those who did not have sufficient money to buy the high priced fruit would be able to buy the Canadian fruit and those who wished to buy the high priced fruit would contribute something to the revenues of Canada.

Let us have a practical and immediate revision of the tariff with the object in view of preserving, for the Canadian people against the competition of the Americans, the Canadian market for Canadian industry, Canadian labour and Canadian production. This could be done by a board properly representative of all classes and could be made equally fair to all, no matter in what industry they were engaged. The main object should be the protection as far as possible by customs regulations of the Canadian market for the Canadian people as against the competition to the south. When that is done, the respect in which we are held by the Americans will substantially increase, and I believe that we could obtain better trade relations than we have hitherto obtained from them if we used the means in our hands as a weapon in this way.

We are told, of course, by one of the ministers that Canada is coming through. Perhaps he should have said: Coming through great tribulation in the matter of government. In the judgment of those Americans who see thousands of our citizens going over the line to find employment and homes in that country, Canada is certainly coming through. But if Canada is to get out of the woods and make the progress that she should, we must have, in addition to a sound trade policy, the most rigid economy, economy pressed to such an extent that it almost hurts. We have heard a great deal about economy in the last three years; but so far as I am able to judge, all the exhibition which the present government have given of their understanding of economy, is the combination of letters that spells the word. We have not had real, stringent economy. We should have economy to such an extent that we shall have a balanced budget. When we are able to meet our obligations and to show a reduction of the national debt, then and not until then we shall be able to appeal to the right class of immigration and we shall be on the sound road to substantial progress.

There is a rumour that the anxiety on the part of two parties in this House for a short debate is that there is a prospect of an early election, and they wish to hurry through the work of the House in order to appeal to the people at an early date. I do not know how true this may be; but if this be the case, there never was a time in the history of this country when the electors were more anxious for a reduction of taxation, for a sound administration at Ottawa, for unity, for economy and for progress than they are at the present time. If that is the desire, I am sure the people of this country will welcome the opportunity, and personally I would say: Do not tremble on the brink; come on in, the water is fine.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, I shall not, I hope, add very much to the length of the debate to-night, but there are a few observations that I think ought to be made upon a matter of the suggested importance of the Speech from the Throne. There is a tradition, perhaps not much more than a tradition, that a Speech from the Throne is supposed to reveal the policy of a government when a government possesses a policy that is capable of revelation. I have searched the Speech from the Throne, which is at least moderately brief this year in comparison with previous efforts, and I fail to discover anything more than an effort at patchwork. I think, in the judgment of the people of Canada to-day, what is insistently required is a real, comprehensive policy that will fit Canada from one end to the other, and that most confessedly we have not such in the few scrappy sentences which are uttered for the purpose rather, perhaps, of distracting than of focussing public attention.

I do not want to take up much time and I do not think the people of Canada require much time to be taken up in disposing of the obvious misstatements in this Speech from the Throne. I doubt if there is such a wonderful difference between the state of the Maritime provinces to-night and that of the rest of Canada that the language of the opening sentences of the Speech can possibly be true of the rest of Canada and yet be false with regard to the Maritime provinces. Certainly in those provinces the economic situation has most decidedly not improved since the last session of this parliament. It has as distinctly retrograded. Just as certainly the cost of living has increased in the Maritime provinces; it has not decreased since the last session of this parliament. Why use these futile words that can deceive no one? The basic industries of the Maritime provinces are in no better and in a decidedly and visibly worse condition to-day than they were a year ago or at any time since this government took office, and I am not going to blame this government entirely for that condition. What I shall blame them for is that they have not yet created and I doubt if they ever will create a comprehensive, all-Canadian policy that will enable us to grapple with the difficult conditions that exist throughout Canada at the present time. You certainly cannot do it by reciting that the economic situation has improved nor by telling the people who know better that the cost of living has decreased.

I go further in this Speech and I find a statement with reference to our old friend, the Crowsnest pass. I am not going to take time to-night to belabour the government for its variegated policy with regard to Crowsnest pass rates. I found myself only upon one sentence where they say that this matter will, in some measure, necessarily depend upon the decision of the Supreme court in the appeal. I would like all the silent members of the government—and that embraces every member of that body except the Prime Minister, so far as this debate is concerned—who have yet an opportunity of speaking, to point to a decision of the Supreme or any other court in Canada that brought the Crowsnest pass agreement into effect. Why go to the court to reverse the decision? The Crowsnest pass agreement was made by this legislative body of Canada, and if the government of the day were a virile government it would grapple with the question by legislation and not by the artful dodge of sending it from commission to court to deal with. I think I can safely suggest a policy to the government, but I am satisfied that there is so much division in their councils that they will never steal a policy or adopt one coming froim this or any other angle of the House. Wake up and give us a policy! I think it was last year that my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) introduced a bill for the protection of the government; I commented on it as a bill for the safety of children at sea, and the object of the bill was very patent to us all. This year they want to go to sea in a Britannia ruling the waves spirit, without a navy and for the purpose of fixing ocean rates; and the next thing they know they will be helplessly at sea again in the Supreme court with regard to constitutional questions. Let them give us a real policy. Do not let them bother with the ocean. Do not let them emulate King Canute sitting in his chair at the margin of the shore surrounded by his courtiers and ordering the waves to roll backward. That sort of thing is not worth while. Rather, let the government try to do something useful; let them give us a real policy that will be protective of Canada, a policy that will ensure the men who raise grain in the west that if they use Canadian channels of transportation instead of channels partly Canadian and partly American they will secure a rate as low as, or lower than, they can obtain by the hybrid route. Give us an all-Canadian route, and if you have $10,000,000 or other millions to squander on the Petersen system spend it on internal modes of communication, and route the grain by Canadian rail and Canadian water to Canadian ports instead of through foreign ports. That is something which my friends of the government can control, but that policy would be national and therefore it is not required at the present stand.

I have spoken in this House on many occasions, and I shall speak again and again, on behalf of the Maritime provinces and their rights. We do not come here as suppliants nor as would-be tyrants; we simply ask for a fair and square deal in those provinces and we do not propose to be shut out of confederation and such benefits as may reasonably come to us from the existence thereof. I do not think that we are interested in a subsidy to ocean steamships, but we are interested in making the conditions within Canada such, that every pound of freight that Canada has for export will use Canadian rails and both grade systems, as well as Canadian lake systems, employing Canadian boats and making use of Canadian ports. We believe that a policy could be devised by which those who enjoy the benefit of the British preference would have it withdrawn from them unless they utilized British shipping and Canadian ports. The government has had the power ever since coming into office, simply by means of an order in council, to bring that policy into effect; but all we have had has been a mere temporizing 10 per cent measure, with the results of which the ministry claim they are satisfied, so far as they go. Why are they afraid to take a further step? If the 10 per cent is successful why do they not go the whole distance? They need not be afraid of votes against them from this group.

Mr. ROBB: Were not the hon. gentleman and his party opposed to the building of an elevator at Halifax for the purpose of shipping grain through that port?

Mr. McMASTER: That is the wrong port.

Mr. BAXTER: My party and the people of Halifax were opposed to the spectacle of ministers of the crown and their supporters rushing into that constituency on the eve of an election and pretending to discover the necessity for elevator requirements to which they had been oblivious from the day that Nova Scotia gave them sixteen solid and silent supporters. They woke up when they saw they were in peril of having the sixteen reduced to fifteen. And Halifax promptly turned the trick and gave them one less as a hint to the others to rouse themselves and stand up for their rights. We did not oppose elevator capacity in the Maritime provinces, but what we said on the platform in Halifax, and what I say to-night, is that down to that time there had not been the slightest effort to use the limited elevator capacity that had existed in that city. Down to that moment the government had been trucking and trading with two or three of their political supporters about different sites, as to which one it would be most advantageous to negotiate for. That is the sort of thing we were faced with. Will the government grapple with this question as a whole? I do not want to discuss Halifax or St. John from the standpoint of mere partisanship, but I do want to speak of their rights as part of the whole of Canada. The government talks about transportation. It has another sentence in the Speech about a freer movement of commodities through an equalization of railway freight rates as between provinces and localities, and something about lower carrying charges upon shipments by water. What does it mean? Not a minister of the crown has explained it. Are they suddenly dumb, or are they waiting to see what it can be made to mean according to some peculiar side currents and drifts of opinion that may be moving in the House? I will tell them what I wanted to see in the Speech with regard to railway transportation: I wanted them to come out and declare that the day of falsehood had ended in this country. Does the government realize our position in the Maritime provinces? Does it realize that when we complained in this House of the shipment of automobiles through New London we were first put off with explanations, and that explanations were then sent to the newspapers from the head of the government railways to the effect that they were doing everything in their power to carry out the bargain with the people of Canada, that every pound of freight should be routed by Canadian rails through Canadian ports, and that the Canadian National railways were doing everything to implement the declaration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier? More than that, the St. John Telegraph sent two emissaries across Canada and they found shippers who declared that not only had they not routed their goods through American ports, but that they had never been asked by a representative of the Canadian National Railways to route them through Canadian ports. And yet we were deluded and deceived, for the people of Canada were told by the head of the National railways that every possible effort was being made to route traffic through Canadian ports, and that it was the shippers who had refused to do so. Those shippers who have come out in the open and made those statements are either right or wrong. If the government is doing anything else but sit on the fence, it will ascertain whether its servant or whether these shippers are making false statements. We had been led to believe by the very people in charge of the National railways that there was a deep-rooted hostility in the western part of Canada to the use of the ports of the eastern provinces, and now our investigators find that the trouble is somewhere else. Transportation policy! Why do hon. gentlemen opposite from Nova Scotia keep quiet throughout this debate when they have not a jot or tittle of assurance of improvement of the conditions to which I have referred, and which must be as well known to them as to me. Why is it that not a minister connected with transportation or any other service of the government railways explains the policy of the government and how they propose to implement it? Has the Speech from the Throne become a barren congeries of words with no meaning and no result?

When a gentleman sat opposite as Minister of Railways who had, I believe, the confidence and good feeling of every member of the House—and in saying that I mean no disparagement at all of his honourable successor—in I think the first remarks I addressed to this House on the railway question I suggested that what was necessary was the cutting down of the enormous waste because of virtual railway duplication, that nothing else could save us except an accord between the railways —co-operation instead of competition. Has any step been taken in regard to that as a national policy or to put it in operation? Are we doing anything else to-day except foolishly bucking one national railway against the other national railway? For that is exactly what is occurring to-day. Not an attempt is made to cut out duplication of services. I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not want to see anything like the Board of Railway Commissioners imposing their will upon the two railways; I do not want to see this government pass legislation to impose what it may think to be the will of the people upon the railways. All I ask is that the heads of the two railways shall be invited—as business men trying to solve a common question would invite each other—to sit in a conference and discuss the means by which a combination of the respective systems may be operated more profitably and with less expense. Not merely millions but tens of millions of dollars can be saved to this country by such a course. And that money, whether it is paid as freight rates to the Canadian Pacific or to the Canadian National, is coming just the same out of the pocket of the Canadian taxpayer. But what is the answer we get from the Canadian National Railways? A blast and blare of radio from the Moncton station; great speeches, wonderful noises and rumblings all over the continent; "Hello; good fellow" to every man in the service of the road; amusement for the passengers; but never a sign of co-operation, nothing but coming to this parliament for money and more money and more money still to make good deficits, and never a thought that by a few hours reasonable consultation with the other great system millions of dollars of unnecessary expense might be eliminated.

Mr. GRAHAM: Now my hon. friend has made this statement two or three times, will he allow me a word?

Mr. BAXTER: Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM: The very thing he says should be done has been done on more than one occasion.

Mr. BAXTER: Where and when ?

Mr. GRAHAM: At least twice during the past year I have personally called to the attention of the railway heads the discussions which took place in the House, I have discussed it with both presidents, and I have also called to their attention the discussion which took place in the committee; further, I have but recently written each of them asking if it is not possible for them to get together and endeavour to economize in the present state of affairs by cutting out duplication of trains without unduly discommoding the public.

Mr. BAXTER: I am glad to find, Mr. Speaker, that the seed I scattered did not all fall on barren ground—

Mr. GRAHAM: The seed came after the crop.

Mr. BAXTER: —because I enunciated that policy, if you may call it such, long before the hon. minister acted upon it. But I am not anxious for the credit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BAXTER: No, I am not anxious for the credit, laugh as much as hon. members like. They may treat the business of Canada as a jest if they will, but I will not. What I am looking for is results, and I have asked the hon. minister to-night where and when. I want him to point to me a single train service eliminated, a single bit of waste set aside. I want something more than letters written.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend unduly. A moment ago he did not want it settled by this parliament, nor did he want a bludgeon wielded by the railway commission; he wanted the heads of the two railways to be asked to get together in a friendly conference. If he wants us to go a step further, it will be beyond where he suggests we ought to go.

Mr. BAXTER: I am suggesting a step further, and there will be no bludgeoning in the step further. I would suggest that with all the suavity of manner and the real ability which my hon. friend possesses and with his long experience, if he were earnestly trying to do something in this matter he would sit in that conference with those men and get them started with a pretty definite object in view, and I do not think he would let go until he had accomplished it.

Mr. MARTELL: What did you do up to 1921? You took over the railways.

Mr. BAXTER: Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with Holy Writ is perhaps a little dim and I have never been able to quite determine whether it was the angel or the ass that spoke.

Mr. MARTELL: The ass has just spoken.

Mr. BAXTER: Now, Mr. Speaker, I find a sort of aversion in the Speech from the Throne to any discussion of the tariff question. In fact there seems to me to be rather a confession that the little tariff tinkering that was not going to hurt anybody very much but yet was hoped to benefit somebody a very great deal, has not been productive of any useful result, and now the government has discovered that the whole crux of the question lies in transportation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BAXTER: Hon. gentlemen to my left laugh because they like to be deluded in this way, and they have shown appreciation of their delusion by a great many votes in support of the government, which I have no doubt, will be implemented by many more in the future. I do not think, however, that we have anything really constructive unless we have some dealing with the tariff along broad lines. I do not pose as a high tariff man, nor do I come from a province that has any interest in what you might call a high tariff. In fact, there might be some preference in New Brunswick for a very low tariff. In Nova Scotia, as hon. members well know, the feeling in many sections would be very much the other way, and the maintenance of a tariff is vital to the development of some industries. You go into Quebec and you find the necessity for a tariff again. That is repeated in Ontario, and is immediately denied in the west. When you reach the Pacific coast you find a recurrence of the belief in the tariff. Is it impossible for this government to bring people together on the tariff question? Is it not worth while for sections of the country—take my own for instance—which may have no interest that calls for a high tariff, to be fair enough to say: There are other parts of the country besides ours where the tariff is a vital necessity. We will put up with a reasonable tariff, surrounded by proper safeguards, if we get the business of those other portions of Canada passing through our territory? In other words, give us our compensation by the solving of our transportation problem. Do that, and give to those parts of Canada, which require it, to the industries of Canada which require it, a real, vital protection and not a mere half-baked thing that is no good, a thing which perhaps may be said not to injure the consumer and certainly does not help the producer. Give us something with vitality in it. The west can afford to bear a reasonable amount of tariff burden if the government of the country is strong enough and has vision enough to solve the internal transportation problem of Canada, so that when they reach the seaboard the Canadian wheat grower and the Canadian manufacturer will be on the same footing as those who have the advantage of the use of American ports. But have we a suggestion of anything of this character in the Speech from the Throne? Have we a suggestion of anything positive, of anything concrete? Is there a policy at all? Can a man read that Speech and deduce from it any real basis upon which it is proposed to administer the affairs of the Dominion of Canada during the next twelve months? I cannot find it and I do not think anybody else can. What confirms me in that view is that except for the perfunctory—well, I will not say that; but except for the part in the debate which necessarily fell to the Prime Minister by virtue of his office, there has been practically no support of the Speech by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Prime Minister has been at least a party to the silence of his followers upon all the questions dealt with in it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On division.

Motion (Sir Eugene Fiset) agreed to, on division.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, seconded by Mr. Graham, it was ordered that the Address be engrossed and transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of the House as are of the Honourable the Privy Council.

SUPPLY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House will on Tuesday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does this come in on the order paper?

Mr. SPEAKER: As soon as the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is adopted, these motions are in order.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House will on Tuesday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

MAIN ESTIMATES FOR 1925-6

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the year ending March 31, 1926, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Acting Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of Supply.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1925-6

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1926, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Acting Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of Supply.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING
SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House I would move, seconded by Mr. Robb:

That rule 10 of the House of Commons relating to the appointment of the select standing committees of the House be amended by adding to the select standing committees of the House for the present session a select standing committee on Railways and Shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, to which will be referred the estimates of the Canadian National railways and the Canadian merchant marine for the present session for consideration and for report to the House; provided, however, that nothing in this resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of Supply; and that the said committee consist of Messieurs Cannon, Drummond, Drayton, Euler, Graham, Harris, Jelliff, Jones, Kyte, Mackinnon, Milne, Rinfret, Robichaud, Stewart (Humbolt) and Stork.

These are the same as last year, except that Mr. Cannon is put in the place of the late Mr. Gauvreau.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to Rule 40 this requires unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would have to give notice if I did not get the consent of the House, but I asked for that before I moved the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have unanimous consent?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GRAHAM: Stands as a notice of motion.

Motion stands.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

COLEVILLE, KERROBERT AND KINDERSLEY POSTMASTERS

Mr. CARMICHAEL:

1. What was the yearly emolument received by the postmasters at Coleville, Kerrobert and Kindersley in the province of Saskatchewan, for their services as postmaster during the latest year for which data is available?

2. Does post office box rent accrue to the postmaster or to the department?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1. For year 1923-24.

Coleville post office.. ..	$ 720 58
Kerrobert post office.. ..	5,472 90
Kindersley post office.. ..	3,822 55

2. In government-owned and rented post office buildings where the postmaster and staff are civil servants, all revenues from post office boxes accrue to the government.

In government-owned and rented buildings where the postmaster is paid from revenue, and where he, in turn, engages and pays his own staff, 50 per cent of the post office box revenue has always been assigned to the postmaster as one of the items which make up his salary.

At the three above-mentioned post offices the postmasters are paid out of revenue and they supply their own buildings and equipment, including post office boxes, and, in accordance with the rule that has always prevailed, the postmasters in question retain the revenue from these boxes.

GRAND RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. SENN:

1. What was the total cost of construction of the grand river bridge at York, Ontario?

2. What has been the cost of maintaining said bridge during each year since construction?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. $26,327.95.

2. 1892-93, $147.00, 1893-94, $340.00; 1894-95, $300.00; 1896-97, $62.12; 1897-98, $32.50; 1899-1900, $798.00; 1901-02, $993.97; 1902-03, $16.00; 1903-04, $198.34; 1904-5, $1,210.55; 1905-06, $3,114.35; 1907-08, $1,619.56; 1909-10, $1,823.32; 1910-11, $25.00; 1911-12, $124.85; 1912-13, $524.49; 1913-14, $875.00; 1914-15, $1,024.24; 1915-16, $623.29; 1916-17, $186.66; 1917-18, $370.52; 1918-19, $456.25; 1919-20, $634.67; 1920-21, $1,042.38; 1921-22, $5,083.12; 1922-23, $121.25; 1924-25, $28.00.

REJECTED IMMIGRANTS

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

1. How many immigrants have been refused admission to Canada during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1924?

2. From what countries did these people make application?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. 11,303.

PACIFIC CABLE BOARD EMPLOYEES

Mr. NEILL:

1. During the calender year 1924 how many telegraphists or clerks were appointed on the staff of the Pacific Cable Board?

2. How many of these at the time of their appointment were domiciled in:—(a) Great Britain; (b) Canada; (c) Australia; (d) New Zealand; (e) Other portions of the British Empire?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1. Twenty-three operators, seven clerks.

2. (a) Two operators, clerks, nil; (b) Two operators, two clerks; (c) Sixteen operators, two clerks; (d) Three operators, one clerk; (e) Operators, nil, two clerks, Fiji.

STEAMSHIP REGINA

Mr. DOUCET:

1. What was the time and date of the arrival of the Steamship Regina at Halifax, about the latter part of the month of November, 1924?

2. How was the mail transferred to Montreal?

3. By what train?

4. When did it reach Montreal?

5. Is it a fact that two carloads of mail matter were mislaid in transit?

[Mr. Robb.]

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1. Steamer Regina docked at Halifax at 8.45 a.m., on the 29th November, 1924.

2. By Canadian National railway trains.

3. Canadian National Railway fast freight train 475 to Monk, P.Q., and thence, on account of protest of the Post Office Department, by Canadian National Railway special train to Montreal.

4. At 4.30 a.m., December 2nd, 1924.

5. No, but the time taken for conveyance of the mails to Montreal was longer than usual due to the use of a freight train part of the way.

MATANE HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. DOUCET:

1. What amount was voted for habour improvements at Matane, Quebec, in 1923-24, 1924-25?

2. What firms received contracts for dredging and wharf building at this place and the amount of contract in each case

3. Was the tender system used?

4. What damage, if any, was caused by ice and sea to wharves and breakwaters at Matane in the fall of 1924 and winter of 1924-25?

5. Who is inspector of wharf building at this place? How was he appointed and when, and is he competent in the discharge of his duties?

6. Who is inspector of channel dredging at this place, how was he appointed and when, and is he competent in the discharge of his duties?

7. Is it the intention of the government to rebuild any wharf or breakwater damaged by ice, etc., at this place?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. 1923-24, $100,000; 1924-25, $75,000.

2. (a) Dredging: A contract was entered into with Horace Dussault and Company to dredge 290,000 c. yds. p.m. at 37 cents, amounting approximately to $107,300; when 32,135 c. yds. were removed the contract was closed and a contract awarded to The St. John Dry Dock & Shipbuilding Company Limited for the remainder of the work, viz.: 257,865 c. yds. p.m. at 37 cents amounting approximately to $95,410; (b) Wharf building: Messrs J. R. & J. E. Boulanger: Extension to eastern breakwater at unit prices, amounting approximately to $38,178; construction of wharf to connect present wharf and western breakwater at unit prices, amounting approximately to $30,972.80.

3. Yes.

4. The structures under construction by Messrs. Boulanger & Boulanger were damaged first on December 9th, 1924, and again on January 20th, 1925.

5. (a) Joseph R. Pelletier; (b) By Civil Service Commission, July 11, 1924; (c) Yes.

6. (a) Henri Joncas; (b) By Department of Public Works; (c) July 26, 1923; (d) Yes.

7. Matter being investigated.

YUKON GOLD COMMISSIONER

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. What amount as salary, and what amount as living allowance, is paid annually to the Gold Commissioner of Yukon Territory?
2. What amounts are so being paid to the Acting Gold Commissioner of Yukon Territory?
3. Was an increase made within the past three years in the amount paid annually to the Gold Commissioner of Yukon?
4. If so, by what amount annually was such payment so increased?
5. Was such increased payment made retroactive, and if so, how many years back did it extend?
6. At what date was such increase put into effect, and what total sum was at that date paid pursuant to such increase?
7. How many persons are at this date being paid as Gold Commissioner, and Acting Gold Commissioner of Yukon?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY (For Mr. Stewart):

1. The duties of Commissioner of the Yukon have been added to the Gold Commissioner who is paid annual salary of $5,000, with annual living allowance of $3,000. Before consolidation former commissioner had salary of $6,000, living allowance $6,000, and free house. Gold Commissioner had salary of $5,000, living allowance $1,500.
2. Answered by No. 7.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. Answered by No. 1.
5. Yes, to April 1, 1919.
6. February 7th, 1923, $5,750.
7. Gold Commisioner, G. P. Mackenzie summoned to Ottawa to assist in framing policy for administration in North West Territories along lines which will protect natives and conserve wild life. He is organizing and will command Arctic expeditions and will be paid the same salary $5,000 per annum and living allowance $3,000 per annum as he received as Gold Commissioner.

Mr. Percy B. Reid, Division Commissioner of Immigration has been borrowed from Department of Immigration and Colonization to act as Gold Commissioner at Dawson. His salary is $4,500 per annum and he is being paid in addition a living allowance of $8.50 per day.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

Mr. HODGINS:

Is it the intention of the government to take any steps towards reimbursing the depositors in the Home Bank, at this session of parliament?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will have a statement to give the House on the orders of the day to-morrow with reference to the Home Bank.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

TREATIES AND CONVENTIONS AFFECTING CANADA

Mr. HUDSON:

1. What treaties and conventions are in existence and operative affecting Canada: (a) between Great Britain and the United States; and (b) between Canada and the United States?
2. How many trade commissioners, trade agents or consular agents has the United States in Canada?
3. How many trade commissioners, trade agents and consular agents has Canada in the United States?
4. What was the value of the Canadian imports from and exports to the United States for each of the last five years.

GENEVA PROTOCOL—INTERNATIONAL DISPUTES

Mr. MORIN moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and that of Great Britain, concerning the Geneva protocol, for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes.

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, this correspondence is going on at the present time between the British government and the government of Canada with respect to the Geneva protocol, and I think it would be inadvisable to bring down any of it until the whole of it can be brought down. At a later stage of the session, before the subject is debated in the House, I will see that such correspondence is brought down as can be.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Dropped.

Motion dropped.

SINGAPORE MILITARY BASE

Mr. PREVOST moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and that of Great Britain or other self governing dominion in connection with a military base at Singapore.

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that had better stand.

Motion stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ROCKPORT-ALEXANDRIA BAY FERRY

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

For a copy of all correspondence, resolutions, petitions, regulations, reports and other documents on file, relating to the application of one Hutchinson for a license to operate a ferry between Rockport Ontario, and Alexandria Bay, New York.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. ARTHURS (for Mr. Sutherland):

For a return showing number of employees in the several departments in the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924, designated in accordance with the new classification schedules, and showing salary paid in each case.

ADVERTISEMENT—"CANADA IS COMING THROUGH"

Mr. ARTHURS:

For a return showing a list of all newspapers given publication of the advertisement "Canada is Coming Through" and the amount of money paid or to be paid to each.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. MORIN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada, and the government of Great Britain or the government of any of the self governing dominions concerning the calling of an Imperial conference at London in the early part of the year 1925.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 9.53 p.m.

Tuesday, February 17, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT REGULATIONS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): Subsection 2 of section 63 of the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919, provides that regulations made under the authority of that act shall be presented to parliament within fifteen days after the meeting thereof. In accordance with this provision I beg to lay on the table two regulations made under the act.

CONVENTION OF COMMERCE—CANADA-NETHERLANDS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): On behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and for the information of the House, I beg to lay on the table a copy of a convention of commerce between Canada and the Netherlands signed at Ottawa on the 11th day of July, 1924. In connection with this convention, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) that one thousand copies be printed forthwith, and that rule 74, in relation thereto, be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to present the report of the special committee appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees of the House, under rule 10. I move that the House concur in the said report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid I cannot concur in it now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It may stand as a notice of motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands, as notice of motion.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Canada Temperance Act to provide that if by the laws of the province intoxicating liquor can lawfully be sold only by or under the authority of the province or the government thereof, said prohibition shall nevertheless remain in force as to all intoxicating liquor not belonging to, nor imported, nor sold by or under the authority of, the province or the government thereof.

Mr. CALDWELL: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is merely a notice of motion; when the resolution comes up for discussion explanations will be in order.

Motion agreed to.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In view of the promise I made last evening, I should like to make a statement with respect to the depositors of the Home Bank:

On July 17, 1924, this House unanimously adopted the report of the committee on Banking and Commerce with respect to the losses sustained by the depositors of the Home Bank of Canada. The concluding paragraph of the said report is as follows:

Your committee consider that the facts brought out in the interim report submitted by Mr. Chief Justice McKeown, and the evidence therein referred to, establish that the depositors of the Home Bank have a moral claim in equity for compensation by the country on account of any loss they may suffer by reason of the failure of the Home Bank.

In the circumstances, the government has decided to introduce, this session, a measure recognizing, with respect to the depositors of the Home Bank, "the moral claim in equity for compensation", as referred to in this paragraph of the report. The proposed legislation will be brought down in due course.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to make an observation with reference to the first sentence of the Prime Minister's statement, and I make it without regard at all to what the attitude of the opposition may be towards the measure. The reference was to the "unanimous" adoption of a report. There were many reports adopted in this way hastily last session against my vigorous protest, and I stated at the time on more than one occasion that I did not consider such adoption as in any way binding the House to the terms of the report. That is the position I take still. In this connection I want to ask whether the amount which the government proposes to give is to be in the supplementary estimates, and also why it is not in the main estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bill which will be introduced will indicate the amount; there is no reason why the estimate should be given before the bill is presented.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the amount be in the supplementary estimates if the bill passes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will depend on the action the House takes with reference to the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But if the bill passes, will the amount be in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The House will be asked to vote whatever amount is required, and I presume the request will be made in the usual order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That does not answer the question. The question is whether it will be put in the supplementary estimates or not. Whether the government does it in the usual order or whether it does not, will the amount be provided in the supplementary estimates, assuming that the bill will pass?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid my right hon. friend will have to "wait and see".

CAPE BRETON MINES

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): In view of the report of the Winfield conciliation board, does the government propose to take immediate action in the appointment of a royal commission to make a full, fair and impartial inquiry into the whole situation in Cape Breton with a view to ascertaining the costs of production and the returns on capital actually invested?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): We are at present in correspondence with the Miners' District Board and the officials of the company as to their respective positions on the Winfield board's recommendations or opinions. Further action will be determined when we have ascertained their views.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Civil Government—Post Office—Salaries, including amount required to pay allowance to office appliance operators, grade 2 operating Hollerith card punching machines, in accordance with provisions of Order in Council P.C. 156/2521 dated December 24, 1923, $1,143,729. Contingencies, $195,000.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Postmaster General): Mr. Chairman, the committee will observe that the salary items in this estimate refer only to salaries paid at Ottawa in the inside service; they have no reference to anything in the outside service. There is but little substantial difference between the amount of the estimate this year and that of last year. It will be noticed that last year the House voted $1,109,518 for these services, while this year the committee is asked to vote $1,143,729, or an increase of a little over $34,000. That increase is made up of statutory increases to the extent of about $28,000, and the balance is represented by amounts required on account of salary revision by the Civil Service Commission and the reorganization effected in the department through the same body. The number of employees, it will be observed, has increased by 25. Twenty of these new positions are what are known as office appliance operators, and are due to the introduction of what is known as the Hollerith system for mechanical sortation and audit of money orders and postal notes. In this connection it will be noticed that last year the amount for contingencies was $145,000, this year it is $195,000, or a difference of about $50,000. Now this difference is accounted for wholly by the introduction of the system to which I have just referred. The $50,000 is made up of two items: One for the purchase of 23,000,000 cards used in connection with the system of mechanical sortation and audit, and the other for the rental paid for the machines which perform the work. It may be stated for the information of the committee that if this system had not been introduced the department would have had to provide for the salaries of about 100 additional employees to carry on the work as it was carried on under the old method. In times past it frequently happened that this work was in arrear, sometimes to the extent of two years, but under this new system the work is kept up to date; and whereas in former times, from 140 to 150 employees sorted and audited about 32,000 money order cards per day, under the new system 113 employees can handle over 50,000 orders a day and make out about 50,000 cards per day. This system has perfected the work in one branch of an important public service, and the officials who are in charge of it under the Financial Superintendent would be glad if members of the House would drop into the Union Bank building, where it is installed, and see the system in operation.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The estimates last year I see amounted to $1,109,518. What was actually spent?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed that on account of salaries there was expended for 1923—4 $1,034,603, and for contingencies $154,108.66.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How did the government manage to get the money when it was not voted?

Mr. MURPHY: We did not—it was carried over as a charge against the present year.

Mr. CHAPLIN: When machines are introduced in the course of ordinary business the usual effect is to reduce rather than to increase the number of employees. Will the minister explain the purpose of these machines? Perhaps some of us will have to go down and see them in order to understand them properly.

Mr. MURPHY: The effect of the introduction of these machines has been the same as would have taken place in a commercial establishment. The total number of employees has been reduced; while formerly there were 140 or 150, now there are about 113. As to the actual work itself, the cards which are punched by these machines, and which form the records, retained in the department, of the money orders and the postal notes, take the place of the flimsy sheets which were formerly issued and then filed in the department. It was ascertained that it was difficult to work with these flimsy sheets, and also that a great many inaccuracies occurred. The cards used in the machines are of stiff paper and are punched in such a way as to indicate all that was formerly contained on the flimsy sheets. They are filed and retained in the department permanently; the others are retained for reference for a certain length of time. The machines, I am told, are so perfect that if in the course of the operations an inaccuracy occurs it will be automatically indicated. They are of involved construction, but the result is simplicity itself. I have extended an invitation to members of the committee to see the machines in operation, and my hon. friend (Mr. Chaplin) as a practical business man would gain much more information by inspecting them in the department than I could possibly convey to him now.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Are there any in use in other countries?

Mr. MURPHY: They are used at Washington. Officials from here went down and observed them in operation and made a report on them before their installation was decided upon.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Are they what is known as the International business machine, or of a similar type?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not heard that term applied to them. They are known as the Hollerith system for mechanical sortation and audit.

Mr. CHAPLIN: These machines are rented, not bought outright?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, rented.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the rental for each machine?

Mr. MURPHY: There are different rentals for different classes of machines. Some rent at $8.50 a month, some at $30 a month, others, such as the key-punching machines and the tabulators, rent at $57.50 and $75 a month.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Where are they made?

Mr. MURPHY: In the United States.

Mr. MANION: Notwithstanding the fact that men have been laid off because of the introduction of these machines the total number of employees in the department has increased by twenty-five. While 821 employees are provided for in the inside service this year, there were only 796 last year. The minister said these machines would do away with some forty or fifty employees.

Mr. MURPHY: There were positions abolished during the year and there were other employees who went out at that time and were replaced by others on the staff. My statement was that if the old method had been pursued, owing to the increased volume of business there would have been an increase in the number of employees, but because of the introduction of this system the number has been kept down. When employees having a maximum salary go out they are usually replaced by others in the service at the time who come in at the minimum salary. The increase in the amount that we are asking for is but slight compared with the number of employees who have been added. That is one of the reasons. Those who were displaced by reason of the introduction of the machines were absorbed into other branches of the department. That was one of the conditions on which the system was introduced—that there should not be any large reduction in the amount of labour employed.

Mr. MANION: I was not thinking especially of the increase in the amount of money spent, but rather of the increase in the number of employees. Even if an employee who has attained his maximum is replaced by another at a lower salary, it takes only one man to replace him. What I want to know is why there are 25 more employees in the inside service than there were the previous year, in spite of the changes due to the machines.

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps I did not make that clear. It is due—not altogether—to the increase in business in this particular branch. There has been an increase of 25, I am informed, in the number of employees.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The conversation may be very edifying, but we in this part of the chamber have not the faintest idea of what is going on at the upper end of it.

Mr. HOCKEN: Are these machines purchased from an American concern direct, or through a Canadian agency?

Mr. MURPHY: They are rented through a Canadian agency, I am informed.

Mr. HOCKEN: Who represents the Canadian agency?

Mr. MURPHY: They are represented in Canada, I understand, by a gentleman named Foran—not the gentleman who is secretary of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. HOCKEN: That of course, would be very surprising.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am not quite clear whether these machines are simply for tabulating records or whether they are used in the handling of mail.

Mr. MURPHY: They are for use in auditing money orders and postal notes.

Mr. STEVENS: Did the Customs department not try these machines and discard them?

Mr. MURPHY: Not that I ever heard of.

Mr. STEVENS: I take it that one of the objects of the introduction of modern machinery of this kind is to lessen the cost—curtail the labour cost?

Mr. MURPHY: Partly.

Mr. STEVENS: It will be observed that in the number of office appliance operators there is an increase of twenty, and in the whole department an increase of twenty-five. I have been informed that the Customs department tested these machines over a period of years, in work similar to that for which the Post Office Department is using them, and found them unsuited to government work. If that is true, and in view of the increased cost and the increase in the number of employees, this seems to be a questionable innovation, particularly if there is no saving.

Mr. MURPHY: I have never said the Customs department tried these machines for any length of time, but even if they did and the machines were found unsuitable for the work in the Customs department, of course, it would not follow that they would be unsuitable in any other department. As a matter of fact, they suit this particular work admirably, and as I have pointed out if it were not for the introduction of these machines we would have to engage at least one hundred additional employees to cope with the greater volume of work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the revenue expected this year from the department, and how does it compare with last year?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not that statement on hand, but I will be glad to get it for my right hon. friend on another item, and we can discuss it then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister has a pretty good idea; nobody would have any better.

Mr. MURPHY: At the moment I am sorry I have not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no information I would want to become authority for, but I understand the revenue is less. Now, with a smaller revenue, we have a larger personnel, and all these Hollerith machines. How does the minister account for so much more money being required when the revenue received is so much less?

Mr. MURPHY: I have explained the reason for the additional amount required. As to the revenue, I have not a statement on hand, but I shall be very glad to get it and let my right hon. friend have it. As a matter of fact, the officials upon whom of course I have to rely for all this information, assure me that the expenditure would be very, very much greater were it not for the introduction of this system; that money has been saved by its introduction; speed has been attained in the doing of the work; and, of equal importance, greater accuracy has been obtained.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It looks pretty bad if only for these precious machines we would have one hundred and twenty-five more employees than last year.

Mr. MURPHY: Provided the volume of work kept up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is there such a volume of work? The post office is not increasing its functions that I know of, and it is not increasing its revenue. Why is the work increasing at head office?

Mr. MURPHY: The money order business has increased twenty-five per cent. It has been one of the most remarkable increases in connection with the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the head office here have much to do with the general money order business?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, in connection with auditing. After these money orders have been paid and certified, they are sent in here to the Financial branch of the department, and it is there that this audit work is done, and there that the arrears of work I have spoken of have accumulated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose money is going out to pay for foreign manufactures. Where is the money all going?

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend knows that a man may go into the post office in Ottawa, for instance, and get a money order payable on an office in Winnipeg. The Winnipeg office deals with the payee, and when the transaction is completed as between the Post Office Department and the member of the public entitled to receive payment, these orders, and a list certified by the official in charge in the paying office, are sent to Ottawa, where the audit takes place in the Financial branch of the department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I see there has been some change in the number of audit clerks employed. The number of senior audit clerks has been reduced from 16 to 15; one has been let out there. Then in audit clerks there is an increase from 2 to 5, an increase of three; so there has been a net increase in those two staffs of two. Then there is an increase in senior clerks of two, making the net increase four. There is also an increase in clerk-bookkeepers of one, making the net increase five; also an increase in account clerks of two, making the net increase seven. The only other increase that I notice is in the office of appliance operators, where the increase is from 61 to 81. There is one other decrease which would make the net increase in the inside staff of the Post Office Department twenty-five. That would hardly account for the large increase now asked for by the minister. Last year under this item we voted $1,109,518; this year we are asked to vote $1,143,729, an increase roughly of about $34,000. Do I understand that the whole of that $34,000 is required to pay the extra salaries of the twenty-five new assistants taken on in the department?

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps my hon. friend was not in when I explained that of the $34,000 increase, about $28,000 in round numbers, represented statutory increases over which, of course, the department has no control.

Mr. FORKE: When is it likely that statutory increases will cease?

Mr. HOCKEN: Never.

Mr. FORKE: Then will there always be more expenditure for all time to come on account of statutory increases? It seems to me that when there are employees coming in at the bottom there will be some going out at the top, and that the time should come when there would be no increase, that there would be a balance struck. But for a number of years, ever since I came into this House, the vote on account of statutory increases grows. Will that always go on?

Mr. MURPHY: There is a minimum and maximum salary for each class. An employee begins at the minimum and receives automatically an increase each year until he reaches the maximum for his class, when the statutory increases for him stop. These are matters fixed by the Civil Service Commission, under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. But each year as my hon. friend has mentioned, there are people coming in at the minimum salaries, and therefore statutory increases have to be provided for them.

Mr. FORKE: When one new employee comes in at the minimum salary, does it not happen that one goes out at the top who is drawing the maximum salary? Or, is the staff to increase for all time to come?

Mr. MURPHY: No, the staff increases only in proportion as the work increases, only as there are increased duties to be performed. There are changes, of course, in the different branches of the department, and in the net result there has been an increase this year, as I have already explained.

Mr. BROWN: That same net result seems to happen every year.

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would have no objection personally to these statutory increases. I think the officials are paid little enough, and in many cases they are paid too little. I understood the minister to say that of the increased vote asked for this year—$34,000 in round numbers—$28,000 was to be applied to statutory increases under the act. That would leave only $6,000 to be spent on the twenty-five new employees, or an average of $240 for each employee. Surely there must be some discrepancy there. I doubt if such a sum as $28,000 is necessary for the statutory increases. Would the minister explain that?

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps I had better give the details as furnished by the department. My statement as to $28,000 in round numbers being required for statutory increases is substantially correct. There were 379 statuory increases, amounting to $27,900 New positions 28 in number called for an amount aggregate of $25,260. There are: Two senior clerks at $1,320; one clerk bookkeeper at $1,020; three audit clerks $960; two account clerks $960; twenty office appliance operators, grade 2, $840. Then there is an increase due to salary revision by the Civil Service Commission, $3,180, and increases due to re-organization by the same body, $1,180. Adding all these increases together we have a total of $57,520. Now, set off against that, are the following decreases: Three positions not required owing to re-organization $5,080, the difference between salaries of employees who have been promoted or who have left the service and salaries of persons promoted or appointed to replace them at lower salaries, $18,229; or a total decrease of $23,309. Deducting the total decrease from the total increases there is a net increase of $34,211. That is how the amount is made up.

Mr. CLARK: Would the minister give a statement showing the volume of the money order business done over a period of three years and the cost to the department of doing that business for those years?

Mr. MURPHY: The total number of orders issued for the fiscal year 1921-2 was 10,031,198; for 1922-3, 11,098,222; for 1923-4, 12,561,490. The aggregate values of orders issued for each fiscal year were as follows: 1921-2, $139,914,186.39; 1922-3, $143,055,119.94; 1923-4, $159,855,114.97. The total receipts from the money order business were: 1921-2, $1,852,824.62; 1922-3, $1,180,957.45; 1923-4, $1,364,110.53.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those are the charges?

Mr. MURPHY: No, those are the receipts from the money order business. Does my right hon. friend mean by "charges" the expenditure for salaries and so on?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No I mean the commissions on the orders.

Mr. CLARK: There is a material decrease in the last fiscal year as compared with 1921-2.

Mr. MURPHY: There is an increase over 1922-3, but a decrease as compared with 1921-2.

Mr. CLARK: Just where did the increases in the volume of business come in?

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps my hon. friend misunderstood me on that point. I was not speaking of the amount, but the increase in the number of orders handled. The increase was, roughly, a little over two and a half millions.

Mr. HOCKEN: Would the minister tell us whether he has made a definite term contract for the use of these machines, and if so for how long?

Mr. MURPHY: My information is that there is not a definite term contract. The machines are rented for an indefinite time and as long as they suit. They may be rejected or exchanged whenever the department sees fit.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister explain why the profits of the department have decreased very materially whereas the volume of business appears to have increased?

Mr. MURPHY: The explanation, I am informed, is that there is just the same amount of work required in handling a money order for a small amount as for a large amount, and that the number of orders for small amounts has increased in number over those of larger amounts.

Mr. BOYS: How many machines have been installed and what is the total monthly or annual rental?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps before the minister answers he will permit a word of comment on his last explanation. The explanation was that the number of small orders had increased out of proportion to the number of orders for large sums—that the amount of work on a small order was just as much as on a large order. That is the reason why—although there was a larger business, a larger number of orders, and a larger total—the profits now are less than they were three years ago. Does not the minister see that it follows from his explanation that the small order business is done at a loss?.

Mr. MURPHY: In reply to my right hon. friend I would say we would lose a great deal more if the other system were in vogue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What other system?

Mr. MURPHY: As indicated by a question a short time ago the amount is determined by the commissions paid. There is the variance that was mentioned, there is no doubt about that. In reply to my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) who inquired as to the number of machines in use—

Mr. BOYS: And the monthly or annual rental paid.

Mr. MURPHY: —I may say there are 30 key punch machines at $8.50 a month; 13 sorting machines at $30 a month; 7 tabulators at $57.50 a month; and 1 tabulator at $75 a month. Then besides, in the postal note division, there are 12 key punch machines at $8.50 a month; 4 sorting machines at $30 a month; and 3 tabulators at $75 a month.

Mr. BOYS: What is the total amount for the two departments?

Mr. MURPHY: The total is $18,834.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not very much impressed with the minister's comment on my argument. I tried to show him that if he gave a right account to the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) of the reason for the loss of profits notwithstanding the increase in business— it must mean that he is losing money on his small orders. When I pointed out that, his answer was that if we had done it the other way we would have lost more. I do not know what the "other way" is, but I would advise him not to get into a worse way. Surely the country is not going to understand that on the small order business of the Dominion it is losing money.

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That must be the case, or the answer the minister gave to the hon. member for Burrard is wrong.

Mr. MURPHY: I think my answer was correct.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the hon. gentleman not speak as to a particular year? A certain year, let us say, thirty per cent of the business is small order business and seventy per cent large order business. That year the profits are so much. Now in a later year there is forty per cent of the smaller business and sixty per cent of the larger business, but there is far more business and the profits are less than they were previously. Now, to account for a less profit it must be that the small order business loses money. If it all makes money, then the more business there is the more money is made, in all classes. But there is less money made. Therefore it cannot all make money. Why is it we are doing a great class of our business at a loss?

Mr. MURPHY: There may be less money made, but that does not of necessity entail a loss. It is the difference in one year compared to another.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there is less money made because of an increase in a certain character of business, it must be because that certain character of business is a losing venture.

Mr. MURPHY: No. I will point out now something which I overlooked before, that there was a change in the rate of exchange which made a difference. A higher rate of exchange had to be paid to the United States than previously.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would it not reduce the expenditure if the business of sending money through the post office were encouraged and the public were offered the opportunity to keep deposits in the post office savings banks, cheque out the money and have the cheques marked good in the office where the money was deposited? The big department stores keep deposit accounts for their customers and money is chequed out in that way. There is no great bookkeeping required and the system is very simple. I think we have a system in connection with the postal notes and money orders which is altogether too elaborate. This method could be simplified by allowing the public to keep deposits at the post office, to issue cheques for any amounts they desire to withdraw, and to have the cheque marked good, as is done in the banks.

4 p.m.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend has touched upon a point that he and I have discussed more than once. A change has been made by allowing depositors to withdraw up to the sum of $25 without going through the formality of notice. The extension of that system has been under consideration, but it has to be borne in mind that what my hon. friend has in mind is rather a savings bank branch of the Post Office Department. Properly speaking it is not a part of the Post Office Department; it is in point of fact more properly a branch of the Department of Finance. Originally it was attached to the Post Office Department for the convenience of the public. The banking business is no part of the postal service. The post office savings bank, as I understand it, was designed to encourage people to deposit their savings and keep them there. A man may deposit money in the ordinary savings bank branch, but will proceed immediately to issue cheques. The two purposes are at their root different. But the suggestion of my hon. friend is well worth considering, and I will bring it to the attention of the superintendent.

Mr. CLARK: I desire to draw the minister's attention to the fact that in the statement he gave to the House a few minutes ago he said that in the total number of money orders issued there had been an increase of 25 per cent. Now in addition there has been an increase in the total amount of money orders of about twenty-three per cent, and yet there has been a decrease of approximately thirty per cent in commissions or profits earned by the department. That is something I cannot understand.

Mr. MURPHY: There is an increase as between last year and the year before. My idea is that the amount would be approximately as great were it not for the exchange which has to be paid on business with the United States.

Mr. SPENCER: Has the department considered purchasing the machines that have been mentioned?

Mr. MURPHY: No, the company owning them will not sell them.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The hon. minister says they will not sell the machines in this country. I say then that they should not be allowed to dictate the terms. When a company or anybody comes to this country and obtains a patent and is protected by that patent, if the government require the use of that machine, the government should compel them to deliver it to us.

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps I should have added in my explanation that an important part of the arrangement—and I have no doubt my hon. friend and the leading business men of the country know it—is that the company undertakes to keep the machine in working order, so that no time is lost. That is a very important point.

Mr. HOCKEN: Typewriter companies adopt the same method, but they sell the machines.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The companies do it for no other reason than that it is a matter of great importance to them in the way of profits.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And it savours of monopoly.

Mr. LEWIS: Could the minister tell us the total revenue derived from the sale of these postal notes to the public?

Mr. MURPHY: For the last year it was $1,364,110.53.

Mr. LEWIS: Is that less than what is paid to the postmasters for preparing the notes?

Mr. MURPHY: I did not grasp the question.

Mr. LEWIS: The postmaster receives a certain amount for issuing the notes, and I am asking if that amount is the total revenue.

Mr. MURPHY: No, that does not include the item mentioned by my hon. friend. That is just the total amount of commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have been thinking over the explanation the hon. minister gave for having voted last year $145,000 on contingencies and spending a lot more. His explanation was that there was still more to be voted. They anticipated the vote this year. Did they do it by Governor General's warrant?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Out of what account did the money which was spent come?

Mr. MURPHY: The amount was not raised, but was charged against the amount which is asked for this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have to have cash to pay cash. Where did the actual cash come from? There was no cash there. You might charge it against this year if this year's money was voted, but where did that money come from? It must have been a case of misappropriation if there was no money voted for it.

Mr. MURPHY: The only explanation I have is the one given me which I have transmitted to the hon. member. If there is any other I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some money has been voted against which these cheques were issued. There must have been. It is a pretty free and easy way just to vote the money out of "any old" account and say: "Oh well, it will be voted next year in parliament". By the way, I noticed this morning in one of those press announcements with which the government always precedes an official statement of disaster the fact that this year's estimate is going to be made a lot less than last year's, by the very ingenious device of increasing last year's. Is this to be an instance?

Mr. MURPHY: My right hon. friend must refer to some other department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose the same may apply to a few others as well. This explanation was very amusing and I hope it struck other hon. members the same way. I cannot help admiring the courage of a government that foreshadows a campaign of economy by the process of increasing the expenditures of the year previous. Now, if the government has not yet had this money voted and has spent it, and if there was no Governor General's warrant to authorize the expenditure, then it must have been against an account the moneys of which were voted for a totally different purpose.

Mr. MURPHY: The only explanation I have had is the one I have given. If there is any other I shall get it and shall be glad to submit it to the committee.

Mr. CHAPLIN: A moment ago the minister referred to a loss by the department by reason of a loss in exchange. How could the department suffer any loss in exchange?

Mr. MURPHY: It was not a loss in exchange. The difference in the amount inquired about is due to an increase in the exchange which had to be paid to the United States.

Mr. BOYS: But surely that difference would be collected from the customer at the time of the purchase of the money order. I am quite aware that at one time you could not send five dollars to the United States without paying difference in exchange but one would have thought that this difference between the currency of the two countries would be charged the customer and that the government would suffer no loss.

Mr. MURPHY: There is a certain fluctuation in the total amounts, and the question was asked as to the reason for the difference between one year and another. The explanation that was given me I have already submitted to the committee.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. LEWIS: What percentage of the revenue goes to the local post office, and how much does the department receive?

Mr. MURPHY: I presume the question refers to the money order business. In the revenue offices the percentages are, four cents to the postmaster issuing the order and one cent to the postmaster paying it.

Mr. LEWIS: I understand that. I want to know what percentage of the million and odd dollars goes to those who issue and pay the notes, and what percentage of this total goes to the department.

Mr. MURPHY: I might best answer that question by submitting the following statement:

Receipts
Commission from public..	$1,240,961 22
Profit in exchange with other countries..	87,278 98
Void money orders issued between January 1, 1922, and December 31, 1922..	35,870 33
	$1,364,110 53

Expenditure
Approximate cost of clerical force employed at money order duties in city offices.. ..	$ 205,000 00
Commission paid to postmasters at country offices..	449,950 53
Balance of commission paid other countries..	31,589 73
Printing and stationery for head office.. ..	40,150 49
Financial papers and journals..	15 00
Printing, stationery, date stamps, etc., outside service..	109,982 49
	$ 836,688 24

This shows an excess of receipts over expenditure of $527,422.29.

Mr. LEWIS: Does that $527,000 pay for the staff and machinery connected with the service?

Mr. MURPHY: No; we pay these operators out of the vote which is before the committee.

Mr. LEWIS: I want to know whether the revenue derived pays the total expenses connected with it.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, it does.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister has already explained the expenditure for two specific years which he compared, one of which carried a much larger number of postal orders than the other, and for the difference he gave two reasons: First, the receipts of one year's business were less than those of the other owing to a smaller number of orders having been issued; second, there was a loss of revenue owing to a difference in exchange. I do not yet understand that question of exchange, because I cannot see how this country could sustain any loss whatever by reason of a difference in exchange. I want that thoroughly explained.

Mr. MURPHY: The difference in exchange, of course, had to be charged to the public.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Oh, that answers the question. Then there was no loss to the government on account of exchange?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is all charged to the public who buy the money orders?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Then we are to understand that no portion of this loss of $500,000 is to be accounted for by any difference in exchange?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. CLARK: What does account for the loss, then?

Mr. MURPHY: There is a difference between the two totals but there is no loss.

Mr. CLARK: There is a distinct loss of some $500,000 and I understood the minister to say that no portion of that loss was to be accounted for by the question of exchange.

Mr. MURPHY: We do not call it a loss; I think my hon. friend has got hold of the wrong term.

Mr. CLARK: There is a difference in the total returns to the department.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, the total receipts in money order business.

Mr. CLARK: That is to say, in commissions earned by the department; and no portion of the loss is accounted for by exchange. Is that correct?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Where, then, does the exchange come in? It does not come in at all, and what I want to know is what accounts for the loss of $500,000 in commissions.

Mr. MURPHY: If the exchange were, say, two per cent, that amount would enter into the transaction and would go to make up the total.

Mr. CLARK: But the purchaser would pay it, not the country, so that the question of exchange does not enter at all.

Mr. MURPHY: The purchaser has to pay both, but in settling accounts between the countries we have to pay out the difference in exchange to the United States.

Mr. CLARK: But you have already received it. My point is that the department's commission or profit is represented by the last figures given by the minister. If the purchaser of money orders pays this exchange, how can the country's revenue be affected by even one cent?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Do not the figures given by the minister a moment ago demonstrate the fact that the country is ahead on exchange? In other words, according to the figures the customer is charged more money than the actual difference on the exchange; there is a profit on the exchange business besides.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend is correct according to the situation as it exists.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister give the House the reason for this decrease in revenue earned by the department from 1920-21 to 1923-24?

Mr. MURPHY: The only explanation is that the money is at par, and therefore now there is very little charged as against what was formerly charged.

Mr. LADNER: Surely the money being at par would not enter into the question of exchange at all.

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps I should have said —almost at par.

Mr. LADNER: Has not the department accurate, intelligible figures to give us some idea of the disposition of the $500,000? Other members may have been able to analyze the difficulty, but I certainly have not been able to.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will the minister give us again the total business for the two years under discussion?

Mr. MURPHY: The total receipts from the money order business in 1922-3 were $1,180,-957.45; in 1923-4, $1,364,110.53.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Evidently the explanation is that in 1921-2, when the difference in exchange was greater, the government made a bigger profit on exchange than they are doing to-day when it is almost at par.

Mr. MURPHY: The explanation given me is that this year, when exchange is nearly at par, we are not collecting so high a rate.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You are not collecting so much money.

Item agreed to.

AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT

Agriculture—Dairying, including grant of $3,000 to the National Dairy Council, $230,000.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the exact function of the National Dairy Council?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, it is an organization of dairymen extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It exists in addition to the provincial organizations. Its chief functions are: to keep track of the general dairy interests of Canada; to propose any new or any amended legislation that they think is required; and to see that the law is observed. Some members of this Council are now attending a series of conventions extending from Quebec right through to British Columbia. The work is of an educational character. Formerly the vote was in the miscellaneous items. It cannot be paid out of the main vote without indicating the character of the grant.

Mr. LEWIS: We should have some explanation of how this money is expended.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, as my hon. friend, I think, knows, we have recently introduced a system of grading of dairy products, principally carried on in the city of Montreal, but elsewhere as well wherever it is convenient to do so. This involves a certain amount of additional expense, but it has not necessitated any expansion of the grant, we having dropped some other work. Cow testing was discontinued last year, and handed over to the live stock branch. There is a considerable amount of educational and inspectional work going on all the time, but more particularly in connection with the grading of dairy products and infractions of the law. I am sorry to have to report that in certain centres there is a disposition to put on sale adulterated butter. It takes a good deal of care on the part of our officers and a considerable staff to check up this adulteration.

Mr. FORKE: What is the butter adulterated with?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oils—cocoanut oils, chiefly. We have only one report of an infraction of the law of that nature which got past the dairy graders. It is not always easy to detect the adulteration without an analysis. These are some of the activities of the dairy branch. The work of the combined creamery and cheese factory in the town of Finch, with which the hon. member (Mr. Kennedy, Glengarry) and others are familiar, is now completed. The work done there during the last twelve years has shown that a factory of fairly large proportions can be run much more economically and on a better basis than the small factory. I notice that the Ontario government is carrying out the same idea this year, that of encouraging the consolidation of small factories for the purpose of keeping down overhead and increasing the turn-over. This work having been completed we have sold the property at Finch and it has gone into private hands. We may later take up a similar demonstration for the province of Quebec.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): Do we understand that this adulteration takes place in the creameries or butter factories? Or is it done by the dealers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Very little of it is done in the creameries.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): Where is it done?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is done in the cities, where people make a business of buying butter and adulterating it.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): By dealers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think we have only one case reported of its being done in the factory.

Mr. CALDWELL: It is not done by individual farmers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, no. I am glad to say that the farmers' product is improving from year to year. It was very much needed for some of them.

Mr. LUCAS: Has the minister's department done anything in regard to setting up a uniform standard of grading of dairy products for the Dominion?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A uniform system of grading has been in force wherever grading is done provincially. It is only recently that grading has been done federally. The system of appointing butter graders is not yet quite uniform. In the three prairie provinces, where they started it first, we have adopted their grade certificates; that is to say, we have adopted their grades as federal grades in order to avoid overlapping. There is often some little mix-up in a system which is largely federal but which is provincial in some aspects; for example, sometimes by mistake these provincial certificates are issued, and follow the butter, instead of the federal certificates. The chances are that in time we will take over that grading in the three prairie provinces and make the system uniform. As to the scale of points and the score cards, these have been adopted by the federal authorities in conjunction with the provinces and are practically uniform.

Mr. BANCROFT: Is the grant to the National Dairy Council an annual grant?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Is it the intention of the department at any time in the near future to adopt a system of grading of dairy products for home consumption as well as for export?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As soon as there is any demand for it. We find that the public have about all the grading they care to stand now. You have to carry out these reforms more or less gradually. When it is remembered that we have adopted an entirely new system in the matter of the grading of cheese and butter for export, completely reversing the practice that had previously prevailed for thirty years, I think it will be agreed that we have done fairly well even in adopting a grading system for export alone. The home market has grown up as the result of a taste acquired by the public over a long series of years, and I do not think the people are demanding a system of grading of dairy products for home consumption. It would mean, of course, an increased number of inspectors and a greater cost. It will be a few years yet before the system of grading for export is fully accepted by the British importer, so we might wait a little while, before going further along the line my hon. friend suggests. I understand that some of it is already graded voluntarily. The same principle is adopted in regard to the inspection and grading of eggs; it is not a new principle. We have considered it inadvisable just at present to go beyond this voluntary grading.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): I am disappointed at the remarks of the minister in this connection. If I remember rightly, in the course of a conversation I had with him last year he said that so far as the grading of dairy products was concerned, Canada was twenty years behind the times—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that is right —not quite twenty, perhaps.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): —and if that is true his department should not hesitate to make up some of that time. His system of the grading of dairy products for export has been working out admirably. But the neglect to grade dairy products for home consumption means that second-grade and third-grade cheese and butter are left for our Canadian consumers, and as our own people are not getting a first-class article they are not consuming as much of our butter and cheese as they should. Moreover, some of our cheese factories and creameries are working up a local trade, and in the absence of any system of grading they are making a low-grade product, or are at least failing to come up to the standard of the number one grade. One of our inspectors in Ontario recently showed me some figures with respect to last year's operations which demonstrated clearly that the factories catering to home consumption are not coming up to the requirements, are producing a high percentage of second grade cheese and butter For that reason I would urge upon the minister the desirability of requiring cheese and butter for home consumption to be graded as in the case of cheese and butter for export.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has presented the case exactly as it is. It is a question, to some extent, of cost of operation, and also of the advisability of going ahead rapidly or otherwise. We have taken some pride in making progress. We started out late in the day in the matter of grading. If my hon. friend knew the number of kicks that have come into the department against the new regulations—not so much now against the dairying end of it, but at the beginning they were very numerous—he would be more fully seized of the importance of going slowly in the matter of these reforms.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Where are the kicks coming from?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am free to admit, from the least important factor. However, I will be very pleased to take my hon. friend's suggestion into consideration, and if we can introduce about another three or four more graders we will probably do it, but every time we inflate the civil government list, there is always someone wanting to know, "What does all this mean?" So we have some hesitation in making the necessary explanation as to why this expansion. As a matter of fact, we have been starved all along the line, and if I had the freedom of expression I would like to have, I would tell my hon. friend that I would like to be able to meet him to-morrow, because after all we have adopted the very same principle he suggests in the matter of grading eggs. There is not much demand for it yet from the public. The objection has been on the part of the middlemen,—the objection always is from them. They say we are interfering with their trade, that their trade is in danger to some extent. It is the old story that dates back to the early days of humanity—our trade is in danger. They do not like change.

Mr. THOMPSON: How many graders are employed by the government in grading cheese, and what are their duties?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Their duties are to grade and inspect the cheese. The principal graders are stationed at Montreal, because that is the converging point in the export trade. There are two or three other places in the province of Ontario where grading is done. I have the names and salaries of the graders here. We have some twenty graders scattered throughout the Dominion, in addition to the ones we accept from the prairie provinces.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How many points are there in Ontario where this grading is being done?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Belleville and Toronto; there is also one in London part of the time. A great deal of the produce of Ontario, however, naturally gravitates to Montreal and is graded there, especially from the eastern part of Ontario. It would be very convenient if we had more places where grading could be done, but the more places you have the greater the expense.

Mr. THOMPSON: Why is it that the government does not stand behind the grader's grading? I have in mind several cases where the graders have graded cheese as No. 1, and then it went over to the Old Country and was graded there as No. 2 or No. 3, and the buyer was billed back for it. And the government has so far refused to stand behind their own grader's grading; the buyer has had to bear the loss. I think this works out very unfairly to the buyer, and the government should certainly stand behind their own grader's grading.

Mr. BROWN: Do we understand that in the eastern provinces there is no such grading of cream in the butter factories as we have in the west? Is the grading simply done on the manufactured product?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Anything that comes under the question largely of production is left to the provinces to take care of. We are trying to find a line of demarcation between provincial and federal activities, and speaking generally those activities that have to do with production are left to the provinces, and matters respecting marketing and grading are left to the federal authorities. So the question of cream grading in the west has been a provincial matter, for some time. Hon. John Martin has introduced a bill in the Ontario legislature, however, for the compulsory grading of cream, for the first time in Ontario.

Mr. BROWN: That is just what I wanted to know, whether they had a system of grading.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Replying to my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Thompson): It takes more than one or two years to build up a grading system that would be recognized by the British or any other market. They have been accustomed to private brands alone in the past, and may be buying on consignment. While we have adopted a grading system here, they have not become sufficiently familiarized with it yet to buy entirely on the basis of grade, but as soon as they get sufficient confidence in it and find that the grade is as indicated on the box, they will gradually accept our certificates at their face value. I do not know what my hon. friend means by saying that we do not stand behind the graders.

Mr. THOMPSON: I say that cheese is sold here according to the government grader's grading. It will be graded No. 1 here, and sold as No. 1, and quite often the grade is changed when it gets to the Old Country to No. 2 or No. 3. The old country merchant refuses to pay for the cheese, and the government so far has refused to stand behind their own grader's grading.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I understand my hon. friend's point. It involves a pretty long story but I think I may take two or three minutes to try and explain the difficulty to him and other hon. members. Of later years the practice has been to ship cheese in a very green state. Just as soon as it has solidified enough on the shelf, and when it is still merely a bundle of curd, a great many factories are desirous of shipping it out. Obviously we cannot get a fair grading on cheese in that condition, and sometimes our graders absolutely refuse to grade it, because it is too green to get a grading that will do justice to the cheese and to the grader. In the Antipodes they do not have that difficulty because they have adopted the system of holding the cheese for a certain length of time before grading is permitted. In addition, after their cheese has been graded, there is a long voyage which permits further maturing before the cheese reaches the market. In the case of green cheese it is impossible to anticipate what bacteriological action will develop before it reaches its destination, and the graders have simply to do the best they can with that class of cheese. We expect to bring down legislation this session trimming up some of the shortcomings of our present Dairy Act, and the only thing I can suggest at the moment is that this question may possibly be dealt with by providing that the cheese must be, say, two weeks old before it can be removed from the shelves of the factory in which it is made. That would ensure a certain degree of development that would enable the grader to make a fair grading of what the cheese was likely to be at the end of its journey. The situation now is unsatisfactory, and the whole question is, how soon can we put that pressure on? I must make the statement now that a number of other improvements are necessary in the dairy industry in order to make our products more acceptable in the British markets. If my hon. friend thinks that to have cheese two weeks old before leaving the factory would be an improvement I agree that it would be a very substantial advance. We will probably make the change anyhow, but I do not think the period should be any longer than that. In order to know where they stand with regard to their returns from the farm people want to realize their profits. The urgency of their financial requirements necessitates their getting the returns from the sale of the cheese as quickly as possible.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will the minister be good enough to give us an outline of the improvements that will be necessary in order to place our dairy products on an equal footing with the products of other countries in the British market?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not usual to anticipate possible legislation; that is usually talked over in council before it is brought down. I think I may say, however, that one of them will deal with the boxes. The cheese boxes, for example, certainly need to be of a better design. We have had photographs taken by our own officials in Great Britain of boxes of cheese on their arrival in that country. We have also had photographs taken by disinterested friends, Canadians visiting England; and really the dilapidated condition of these boxes is enough to spoil the sale of the cheese, and would really have that effect were it not for the quality of the product itself. When these boxes of cheese arrive in such a topsy-turvy condition it is most objectionable to possible purchasers and always hurts the sale of the product. The same objection does not apply to butter boxes as to the present cheese boxes. I think the type of cheese box used in Canada will have to be remodelled; as a matter of fact the kind of wood employed in the manufacture, they tell us, is becoming exhausted in this country. So, in any event, we will be obliged to change the style of box. Every time the boxes of cheese are moved or handled they suffer deterioration. On arrival in Montreal when they are placed in the freight shed other breaks occur; in fact a break occurs every time the box is handled. With every process of handling the condition of the box becomes worse, notwithstanding the fact that it is wired; and the handling the boxes receive from the dockmen reduces them to a mass of wreckage by the time they reach the docks in Great Britain. I am not exaggerating in the least. As I say, I have seen photographs of cheese boxes as they arrived overseas and their condition was greatly to be deplored. I hope I shall have the support of hon. members—I know I shall be supported by my hon. friend from Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie)—in endeavouring to effect an improvement. The Australian and New Zealand box seems to me to be the ideal article; it is a six sided box, two cheese deep.

Then there is the question of the adulteration of butter with any kind of oils. In this connection I think something must be done besides merely prosecuting the offender. What does the prosecution amount to as a rule? The magistrate imposes a low fine; sometimes he lets his sympathies run away with his judgment. In addition to instituting a prosecution I think we should have power to prohibit any factory found, in proceedings before the courts, to be guilty of adulteration with various oils in the manufacture of butter, from exporting for a certain period of time. That course was adopted by the food board. I do not want to quote the food board as an ideal example, but that was one plan to which that body had recourse and it proved effective. I think we might also, in the case of butter, prevent the exportation where adulteration has been shown to have been practised.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why the difference between butter for export and butter intended for home consumption?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is a difference. No producer should be allowed to pursue a course which would have the effect of destroying our foreign market. So far as home consumption is concerned we are assuming that the Canadian consumers will soon detect the fact, in the event of there being adulteration, and will manifest their resentment. The guilty parties also will be condemned by our own producers. If the practice were persisted in I think we might almost go to the length of closing the factory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In other words, anything is good enough for the home consumer, but we must have a first-class article for export.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Everybody recognizes that the home market in Ontario, and some of the other old provinces is not very fastidious, otherwise we would not be so long in getting an improved product.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): The home market for both butter and cheese is an important one and should be cultivated. If the Department of Agriculture does not take the lead very soon in seeing that the grade of butter and cheese for home consumption is improved, we shall be using before very long New Zealand butter—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): —and Danish butter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just what will happen.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): I think that is a very important reason why we should lose no time in grading all butter and cheese consumed at home. I was somewhat alarmed by the statement of the minister of the recommendation he is going to make as to the time the cheese may be left on the shelves of the cheese factory. I think his object would be accomplished by refusing to grade cheese or butter under a certain age instead of requiring that the products be allowed to remain on the shelf for a fixed period of time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It would involve a lot of handling in Montreal.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): That might be true but I would point out that some factories have no cold storage facilities, and to require them to keep cheese or butter on their shelves under those circumstances would involve hardship and difficulty.

The minister spoke about the factory at Finch, and its disposal to a private concern. I should like to know a little more about the disposition of that factory, and the compensation which was paid to the factories on each side of the Finch dairy station?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may say that the patrons were first given the opportunity to buy this factory, and the conclusion was almost arrived at that they would do so. On second thought, however, the patrons concluded that it would be better for an outside company having a chain of creameries to acquire the factory if they would pay the desired price. It was thought it might be better for an outside body, a vigorous, thrifty institution that could do the very best for the patrons because of their financial abilities, to take over the property. It was sold for $25,000. We assume that that paid all the expenditure that was put into the factory, so that we got the educational value of the institution without any expense to the country. I am not familiar with the early history of the factory, but I understand that some twelve years ago there was compensation paid, and the expenditure covered two factories. We have not got the detailed information. We find, however, that the work of that consolidated factory, if I might call it so, expanded so rapidly that it enveloped two others more or less—one entirely and the other partially. One was owned by, I think, a Mr. Maclean. The amount of compensation in that case was arrived at by arbitration and was fixed at $3,000. The other amount, reached by a similar method, was $500. The principle of compensation was recognized at the beginning; I do not think we could go in and wipe out a man's investment without giving some compensation.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Did these men agree not to reopen their factories.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was the agreement.

Mr. THOMPSON: We have regulations on grading. Do they not cover the improvements which the minister has outlined. In the first place he is speaking of cheese which is too green. If I understand the regulations aright, it is the grader's duty to hold the cheese until they are properly cured and fit for market. If the boxes are not up to the standard the grader's duty at the present time and under the present regulations, is to put them in a lower grade.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What does the hon. member suggest? Would it be better to move them right up to Montreal, or wherever they are to be sent, and let them stay there in proper storage the required length of time?

Mr. THOMPSON: Is that not what you have just outlined in the present regulations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, they have that authority and they exercise it, but it involves a lot of extra handling, and that means extra expense. I think it would be better for the factories to do what they are doing, and hold it in the factory. But then we would have one constant complaint from the factories that we are holding it too long. I am prepared to take into consideration any suggestions as to which is the better way. I think the custom in the Antipodes is to keep it in the factories of production. It is kept there, and each factory can store it in its own accommodation. If we adopted that system it would not involve such a lot of expense in re-handling at Montreal. I admit that in some of the local factories the place for storage is not of the very best. Frequently they have no control of the temperature; consequently that would be an additional argument why you should ship it to Montreal or some other place, keep it at the proper temperature, and grade it when it matured. It is a question of expense. The best way is not always the practical way because of the additional cost involved.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Thompson) a moment ago as to the government standing behind the grading of cheese, the question asked was as to cheese which had been graded as No. 1. The minister in his answer referred to cheese that was green and unfit for shipment going to the hands of the grader. The grader certainly would not grade it as No. 1. The hon. member for East Hastings asked about cheese which had been graded as No. 1 by the grader here, and when it reached the Old Country was reduced to second or third grade. What about conditions of that kind where the loss falls on the shipper? That is the question the hon. member asks. The minister endeavoured to make it appear that the cheese was going there too green. If it was too green it would certainly be placed in the lower grade by the grader and not as No. 1.

5 p.m.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it might have the elements of No. 1, but you cannot estimate what bacteriological action may develop on the voyage across. We have the same trouble with anything that is perishable. Butter is subject to change and is very difficult to grade arbitrarily in such a way that it will "stay put". Eggs and cheese are in the same category. The sooner you get butter and eggs on the market the more likely they are to hold their grading. With regard to cheese the more it matures before being graded the more likely it is to retain that grade. Of course, we have to take the chances of the grading in mixed shipments and having the article hold its grade. I think we have been shipping out too early and taking too many chances on the grade being held. Those are the conditions under which we feel we have something to learn yet in the matter of grading cheese, and even after we have learned it all, as long as it is graded in the neighbourhood of two or three weeks old, there will always be a liability of some of it going wrong. When butter is three weeks old and unpasteurized we have to grade it. In case it is pasteurized we have to regrade it if it is six weeks old.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will eggs require regrading?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You have to have regrading to allow for deterioration.

Mr. THOMPSON: I think the explanations given do not apply to conditions in East Hastings. The cheese are held there until they are properly matured for grading. The cheese board have regulations to that effect, and no cheese is allowed to be offered for sale until they are matured. In that section I have known cases where cheese properly matured, as I have stated before, have been graded as No. 1, and regraded in the Old Country, and billed back to the buyer. The buyer has paid on the cheese according to the government grader's grade, and it so suffers a great injustice. If this government appoints graders throughout to grade these cheese, in my opinion they should stand behind the grade given. If not the grading is practically a farce.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think the hon. member understands the grading system at all; otherwise he would not talk in the way he has;—he will pardon me for my frankness. No government stands behind the grader's grade under the grading system of which he speaks. As far as humanly possible, it is graded according to the judgment of the grader. Who gave the buyer the authority to regrade our cheese? He is interested in grading it down. They can put it at what they like. We have to build up as near as possible a uniform grade according to our conceptions of what is proper, and the provinces aim at making that as near as possible what the consumer on the other side wants. Let me draw attention to the oldest system of grading that I know of in Canada; that is in respect to our grain. You can send a consignment of No. 1 or No. 2 northern to Great Britain, and it may be a little bit off the grade when it gets there, but there is no such thing as the government making good the discrepancy. That is not right. The idea is that, as near as humanly possible to make a grade by physical eye test, that is done, and if you keep it uniform and up to that, that is all the buyer on the other side expects. Every time, however,—and there is where the penalty comes in whether it be butter or wheat—every time a consignment goes over a little off in grade, that induces the buyer to bid less than he would otherwise because he knows he is getting an inferior article. The more we keep up to the standard the better and steadier will be the bid on the other side.

Mr. SPENCE: There seems to be a difference between the department and the shippers of cheese as to the interpretation of the law. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Thompson) says you cannot ship cheese to the Old Country unless it is matured. The minister says you can ship it when it is two weeks old. Why endanger the cheese shipping industry by allowing shippers to ship before it is properly matured? The hon. gentleman says that is the law.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no law insisting on that.

Mr. SPENCE: There is no law insisting on the people holding cheese until it is properly cured?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. SPENCE: Then the department is using very bad judgment, because you should not endanger the business of the country by allowing cheese not properly matured to go out.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We thought we were doing very well to get it started. We have inserted the thin end of the wedge, and got the principle of grading cheese fixed. We propose to tighten it up where it is weak. After thirty or forty years of grading western grain you will find, after the Grain Act comes down, there will be some amendments. If that be so in the case of a system that has been in vogue for over a quarter of a century, it is not to be wondered at if after two years we find it necessary to iron out some of the shortcomings in the present grading system. What we have at present is as stringent as the people will submit to at the outset. When the bill comes down I think we shall be able to satisfy the hon. member as to the length of time the cheese should remain either on the shelf or in storage before it is graded.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. SPENCE: So far as I know, there is always a good market for Canadian cheese in Great Britain and I think the minister ought to bring down a law this session to compel the producers to hold their cheese until it is properly matured. There is no particular objection to having another law, for God knows we have had hundreds of laws enacted in this House since I have been here.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was asked a question as to certain changes and I referred to them. It is not usual to anticipate legislation.

Mr. TOLMIE: When we are preparing for the development of our dairy industry, particularly from the standpoint of our access to the foreign market, it is well that all our standards should be raised at the earliest possible date so as to enable us to meet the keen competition of other countries. New Zealand by a strict grading system in butter, and in cheese particularly, shows signs of outstripping us in the British market, notwithstanding that we had a reputation of being the greatest cheese exporting country in the world two or three years ago. Since that time New Zealand has come into the market with a more uniformly reliable article and has been able to outstrip us in Great Britain. The minister at the earliest possible moment should take such steps as would enable us to compete with such countries as New Zealand, Australia, Denmark and other places supplying the British market to-day. We all know what excellent results have attended the grading of eggs, and if we adopted in the case of butter and cheese regulations similar to those that are in force in the grading of eggs I am sure our position would be greatly improved and we should be able to compete with other countries with greater success. We should pay particular attention to the home market and supply that market with such goods as would keep out competition from the outside. We have conditions that are favourable to the production not only of dairy products but of all varieties of farm produce, and with such advantages as we possess we should be able at least to keep out of the home market the foreign competition which otherwise would work to our great disadvantage. This can be done if we go about it in the right way.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Are our exports of butter shipped in boxes bearing the grade marks?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, and we rather encourage the idea of putting on a private mark or brand as well.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): All our butter shipments do not go to the British market as Canadian butter; some have private brands?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Some exporters like to retain the private brand, which they consider valuable on account of its association with the reputation they have built up. But they must have our brand in any case.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the nature of your brand?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have a number.

Mr. FORKE: I am extremely well pleased to hear the ex-minister (Mr. Tolmie) say that it is possible to keep out foreign products by the excellency of the home product.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Has the minister any information regarding the condition of the British butter market to-day? Are we being supplanted by Denmark, Australia and some of these other countries?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: So far as the British market is concerned, Canada is hardly known as a butter producing country. We exported all told last year 21,000,000 pounds of butter, a negligible percentage of which went to Great Britain. The odd times that we appear on the British market with butter suggest the "on again off again" idea, and we are never able to build up a line of customers who look forward with any expectancy to further shipments of Canadian butter. Someone has estimated that at the present time we supply Great Britain with 1½ pounds of every 100 pounds of butter she buys. Fortunately for us, especially for those portions of Canada that have not made a specialty of producing the higher quality of butter, it is not until our season of production is over that Australia and New Zealand come on the same market with us, so that we do not come into immediate competition with them. But there is a real danger nevertheless. I have told the dairymen of Ontario and Quebec more than once that unless they improved the quality of their butter, the first thing they knew, Australia and New Zealand dairymen would be opening warehouses in Toronto, Montreal and other large centres and offering their goods to the Canadians. I do not know that this would be an unmixed evil at all, but it would be a rather strong commentary on the quality of our home made butter if Australia could do such a thing successfully. I have already indicated that there is an improvement in sight, and so long as we are improving there is no use scolding too much. Ontario has taken the bit in her teeth and has taken the first required step towards better results by providing for a good raw product through the grading of cream. Certain educational work remains to be done in the improvement of dairying conditions and so on, but if we get our raw product in good condition we can then insist on the manufacturers turning out a good article. As regards the condition of the market in Great Britain, I have not looked up the exact details lately, but there is a feeling in the air that because dairying has stood up better than any other branch of agriculture since the war it is worth pursuing, and the natural tendency is for more people to engage in it. Even in dilapidated Russia there is an immense activity in increased butter production. I am not sounding any note of warning that there is going to be any glut of good dairy products, but there will be a glut of second-and third-rate goods which will be seeking a market. There will never be a glut of first-class dairy products, and that is one other incentive to us to speed up the improvement of our quality as quickly as possible. Certainly every country that can go in for dairying at all succesfully is going to engage more and more in this branch of agriculture. The prairie provinces were never thought to be good dairy countries, but they have increased their output of creamery butter this year some 10,000,000 pounds. I may observe here that our cheese showed marked improvement last year and I am safe in saying that it vies with the best Australian cheese; in fact, the best Canadian cheese is away better than the best Australian product. Unfortunately, however, because of small factories, and one thing and another, there is an absence of uniformity so that the quality is not on the whole what it ought to be. What the Britisher wants in addition to quality is uniformity; he detests having to make adjustments with his customer. Consequently this uniformity will be helped considerably when the consolidation bill is enacted in the Ontario House, this being one of our principal cheese exporting provinces. Making the factories larger will also help towards uniformity.

Mr. SPENCER: From what provinces were the 21,000,000 pounds of butter exported to Great Britain?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Most of it came from the middle western provinces. A great deal of what the western provinces shipped in the early part of the year went to the United States, about 5,000,000 pounds. A demand sprang up there, as well as in England, for unsalted butter, and the Moose Jaw creamery took a large contract from the States. Quebec and the middle western provinces have been the chief contributors to the export trade; very little has been sent from this province; and I do not think that at any time in recent years the home production has met the domestic demand in the Maritime provinces.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What quantity of butter was imported last year, and from what countries? And in what way will the proposed treaty with Australia affect the tariff on dairy products?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My recollection is that we imported about 3,000,000 pounds. Did my hon. friend mean from the United States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And from other countries as well.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Three million pounds is my recollection, but we will have the exact figures in a moment. I do not know what my hon. friend wants me to say as to the effect of the tariff. Of course the higher the tariff the less the importation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I was referring to the proposed treaty with Australia: How would it affect dairy products?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The preferential tariff is not in force yet; when it is it will be the same as New Zealand's, which for a number of years has been three cents a pound.

Mr. FORKE: I suppose the minister is aware that a large amount of cream is also shipped into the United States from Quebec?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. FORKE: In Missisquoi county all the cream cans I saw were billed to the United States.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In spite of the duty an enormous amount of cream, equal to about 16,000,000 pounds of butter, was exported to the United States last year.

Mr. BIRD: It seems to me that a dollar spent on putting the industry on a rational basis would be worth $10 spent upon tinkering with details, even if they are important details such as the grading of butter. In the three prairie provinces the dairying industry is gradually being placed on a co-operative basis. A quarter of a million dollars is a lot of money to spend on this industry if it is being frittered away on details. It should be applied to placing the industry on a parity with the industry in New Zealand, Denmark and other countries, where it is organized through and through, which gives them the advantage of the world's markets. I am wondering if the department is doing anything in an active way to encourage the placing of the industry in this country on a co-operative basis. I do not think it should be left to the efforts of the people themselves to put such an important national industry on a footing where it would be able to compete successfully in other countries. I should like to hear that the department is doing something to this end.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend has put his finger on the most important phase of the question that has been discussed so far. In the past co-operation has been left largely to the provinces. Some of the creameries have co-operated by consolidating themselves into a single organization. In Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, co-operation has been featured, principally in production. We are doing everything we can do from the federal standpoint to help the industry, but having nine provinces to deal with means that we have to be careful not to trespass on the provincial sphere of action. At present conventions are being held all over the Dominion, and our Mr. Wilson, who was asked by the Dairy Council to come over from Great Britain and impart the latest information on the requirements of the British market and to point out where we are falling down, has been addressing these conventions. He has been devoting his addresses to telling the people what other countries are doing. It may come as a surprise to hon. members to learn that in Russia the Soviet government have in operation over five thousand creameries under a system of co-operation, dealing directly with large import houses in Great Britain. We are also pointing out in a suggestive way that until we have a pool handling over half the dairy product of Canada and delivering it on the British market at regular intervals, we are going to be at a serious disadvantage. At present our shipments are haphazard. Some of our packing companies, however, send their products over regularly. We should have regular sailings for both butter and cheese, and this cannot be done without some kind of organization among the various provinces. It is imperative that it be done if we are to get the best results, and we are doing everything we can to encourage such action without actually intruding on the provincial field. If we had complete control here I would feel like taking the necessary steps in our own department to effect the required organization, but I do not think we could do it simply by mild co-operation with the provinces, with whom the question primarily rests. The Dairy branch has completed the preparation of statistics indicating what tonnage would be necessary to take care of the dairy products of Canada for the British market, how much space would be required and how frequent the sailing ought to be to meet the needs of the trade on the other side. These statistics are available for whoever wishes to take advantage of them. Experience proves that regular sailings are necessary, otherwise customers will be lost and trade will have to be built up over again. I would thank the hon. member (Mr. Bird) for any suggestion as to how we can arrange this without invading the field of the provinces. Undoubtedly the time has come when we should do that, and we will be delighted to do it when the conditions permit.

Mr. LADNER: Has the minister any information as to the quantity of butter which was imported last year from New Zealand?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. LADNER: Or from Australia?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I have just the totals.

Mr. LADNER: Is the duty on cheese affected by the proposed treaty with Australia?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We get practically no cheese from Australia, with the exception of fancy cheeses.

Mr. LADNER: Is there or is there not a provision in the treaty with regard to cheese?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My recollection is that it is not mentioned among the preferred articles. Butter is.

Mr. TOLMIE: In respect to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Forke) with regard to the protection of agricultural products, I am a firm believer in maintaining the high standard of these products which now prevails throughout this country. We are quite able to compete where things are equal, but we should not be compelled to compete where climatic conditions are not the same; to compete with the product of districts where the cattle can be kept out during practically the whole of the winter period while we have to feed for six months; to compete on an even basis with those countries where labour is much cheaper than it is here. Therefore I believe that we need a certain amount of protection even for our dairy and other agricultural products. I want to put myself clearly on record in that regard: I think we should have the same tariff on agricultural products coming into this country as is applied to agricultural products going into the United States. With regard to this dairy representative in London, does he secure information that had not been previously obtained through the dairy commissioner, and if so what is it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend the full information when that vote comes up. As to his reference to tariff on agricultural products, if he can give us any assurance that the housekeepers of Canada are prepared to pay a little bit more for their eggs and for their butter, then I shall be ready to give his suggestions at least sympathetic consideration.

Mr. TOLMIE: If the housekeepers of Canada had the experience with American eggs that I have had, they would be glad to be rid of them altogether. What progress has been made in the development of the fancy cheese industry in Canada, and about what is the value of the product now?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not the figures, but I believe the industry is being developed in a number of places in Quebec. I do not know whether you would call kraft cheese a fancy cheese, but its production is rapidly growing and it seems to appeal to the popular taste.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): What is it made of?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a mixture of Cheddar cheese with cream and, I think, some milk.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it renovated?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I do not think it is renovated. It cannot be very bad, because it tastes good.

Mr. TOLMIE: Does it contain cottonseed oil?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, the law forbids that. It is entirely cream and milk fat.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is the minister quite sure about that? Has an analysis been made by his analyst?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have had no complaints with regard to it that I know of.

Mr. TOLMIE: Are we making any Limburger or Roquefort or Camembert cheese in Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, some Roquefort is made in Quebec.

Mr. LADNER: The minister said a moment ago that the duty on butter from Australia was being made the same as that on butter from New Zealand. Under what trade arrangement does New Zealand have the benefit of a preference now?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend will have to ask somebody else, because it was under some arrangement made, I believe, before this government came into power. We are giving to Australia the same terms, which means 25 per cent off; the regular tariff of 4 cents is reduced to 3 cents in both cases.

Mr. LADNER: It is rather an important matter, and one, I would imagine, that the minister would be acquainted with, in a superficial way at all events. Surely he knows whether or not we have a treaty with New Zealand. I have never heard of one myself.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, yes.

Mr. LADNER: It must be some kind of preference arrangement by which New Zealand has that advantage.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can only conjecture what they went on. I know that this has gone on for the last three years, and I do not think my hon. friend's party is very much struck on preferential tariffs so I think it must have gone on for the ten or twelve years before that; it must have gone on quite a while.

Mr. BRETHEN: I believe it was done under Sir George Foster.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am delighted to learn that the treaty was arranged by Sir George Foster.

Mr. ARTHURS: What are the terms of the treaty?

Mr. STEVENS: Does the minister as a matter of fact know whether there is any treaty or not?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do know.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a treaty?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend will find himself mistaken.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not carry these treaties around with me, Mr. Chairman, but I know as a matter of fact there is a treaty.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to ask the minister if he has during the recess reconsidered his harsh and altogether unwarranted attitude towards the production of oleomargarine.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have often congratulated myself that we have knocked it out; and that is the only extent to which I have reconsidered it. I think the dairy industry is to be congratulated that it was knocked out. I have never considered the matter with the idea of being less harsh about it for I hold exactly the same views I did before, except that probably they are a little stronger. If we had not dealt with oleomargarine then, I do not think the time would ever have come, for once it had become properly established it would have been hard to get rid of it; that has been the experience of other countries.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): I want to revert to a remark the minister made some time ago in reply to a suggestion of mine. He said that one reason why the department was not considering the grading of dairy products for home consumption was that there was no demand for it. I would like to ask who is going to make the demand? Who does he expect, will make it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, my hon. friend.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): If the minister will accede to my demands he will proceed immediately to set about it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have a high opinion of my hon. friend's judgment in the matter.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): I know the minister is desirous of raising the standard of Canada's dairy products. Now our only hope in the foreign market is by having not only a high standard, but a uniformly high standard, and I think the only way to secure uniformity is by grading our dairy products, and by buying according to the grade. That is, to my mind, the most important factor in the whole business, and not the elimination of the small factory as the minister seems to think. During the summer of 1924 the factories throughout eastern Ontario produced 94 per cent of No. 1 cheese, and better, that is cheese grading No. 1 and Special. In that area there are a great number of very small factories. I personally know some of these factories that have produced as high as 99 per cent of No. 1 cheese, and better. I am not advocating anything in the way of assisting to maintain the small factories, for I rather think that is an unimportant consideration; I think they will eliminate themselves in time. To me the all important consideration is to have our dairy products uniformly graded, and I would most earnestly impress on the minister the necessity of grading these products for home consumption as well as for export, for the reasons I have already given.

I would also suggest to him, if he is bringing down legislation for the improvement of the standard of dairy products, that he consider the advisability of establishing a standard for ice cream. That is an important dairy product and an important article of diet, and its consumption in this country is increasing. I would recommend to the minister that he establish a certain standard of ice cream. That is important, because I think a great deal of the ice cream that is offered for sale to-day should have the word "cream" eliminated from its name. It is very patent that much of it is not ice cream at all.

On the question of fancy cheese, the hon. member for Victoria very properly asked the minister about the analysis of kraft cheese. Now with all due deference to the Minister of Agriculture, I would suggest to him that he look into the manufacture of kraft cheese, because I fear he will find there is a great deal in it besides butter fat and other dairy products. I do not wish to make any statement as to what he will find in it, but I would like his department to investigate it; I think that is important.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: With regard to the two questions my hon. friend has raised, as to the grading of all butter manufactured in Canada, it is estimated it would take three or four more graders to do that work. In addition to that, without having any estimate, but judging from the number of inspectors we have to employ to look after the grading of other dairy products, from fifteen to twenty inspectors would be required to see that the law was enforced. That would mean an addition of nearly twenty to my staff for that service. I think maybe that would be money well spent, but there is a tremendous popular feeling throughout the country to-day in favour of keeping the civil service either stationary or cutting it down. I do not know that we should arbitrarily comply with that sentiment, but as long as it is there, we cannot disregard it entirely. Since I have had the honour of being in this House, every time there has been an increase in my staff I have been adversely criticised. If there is any way of making omelettes without breaking eggs I would be glad to find it out; if there is any way of increasing our services of this kind without increasing our staff, I would be delighted to find it out. I think possibly we will have to reach my hon. friend's conclusion no matter what the public say regarding an increase of the civil service staff connected with agriculture, for as a matter of fact a progressive Department of Agriculture cannot stand still if it does its duty. But I am circumscribed to some extent by money limitations and by public sentiment in the matter of these new activities. Out in the western provinces you have no such circumscribing limitations. Agriculture is paramount there, and anything you do on behalf of it, if it does increase your staff, goes. But it is a little different down here.

With regard to ice cream, for some reason which I do not exactly know, that comes under my colleague the Minister of Health, and my memory is that he has worked out some standard, stipulating a certain percentage of butter fat in the ice cream. In reading some speeches recently made at the conventions I distinctly recall Mr. D'Arcy Scott indicating that this reform had been brought about; but that matter comes under the Department of Public Health.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. minister has not answered so far as I have heard, the question asked regarding the treaty with New Zealand which may or may not come in conflict with one now proposed with Australia. The hon. gentleman should have all these facts at his fingertips and should be able to answer that question at once. In what respect does the present treaty with New Zealand conflict with the Australian treaty in the matter of dairy products?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The idea is to give Australia the same preference that was accorded to New Zealand, I do not know how many years ago.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is the preference to New Zealand now?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is three cents a pound as against four cents in the general tariff. That is 25 per cent, I presume. When the new treaty becomes effective the same rates will be applicable to Australia. I do not happen to have the treaties here, and a discussion on them would more properly arise when the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are before the House, or when the treaty itself is being considered. The later treaty is not law yet; I know there has been a treaty with New Zealand for a number of years.

Mr. LADNER: A direct treaty between Canada and New Zealand?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, certainly.

Mr. LADNER: I doubt it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister pictures a very gloomy outlook for the future when he predicts that the day will come when city stores in this province will be selling butter from New Zealand or Australia. Does he think that the new arrangement with Australia which reduced the tariff on butter is going to bring that about? Is that the object the minister has in view? Is it his intention to bring foreign products into this country in order to reduce the cost of living? Is that what he is aiming at? If what the minister predicts is likely to happen, I cannot imagine why a reduction of the duty should be made in this particular case.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am only responsible for the treaty in an indirect sense but of course I take my share of responsibility. However, I want to point out to my hon. friend that if you desire to make a treaty with another country you must give as well as take. You must give something in return for the concessions you receive; you cannot have it all your own way. We have obtained substantial concessions for the entry of certain of our products into their market and we had to offset those concessions to some extent. In the province of Saskatchewan when we were just merely starting the dairy industry we were able to go into British Columbia with our butter and compete successfully with New Zealand. There is nothing to be afraid about; there is only a certain time of the year when the competition has to be met. If there is cause for fear there is one remedy to be applied, and that is to make better butter in Canada. It is not because there is a shortage in Canada that we get importations of New Zealand butter. There used to be a time during the winter season when there was an insufficient local production in Canada, and consequently there were importations of butter from New Zealand, not only into British Columbia but as far east as Montreal. I question very much whether any importations from New Zealand go that far east to-day. That is simply because winter dairying has increased so much that we have local production for the whole twelve months of the year. If there was danger of antipodean butter years ago it is much less to-day, as a result of winter dairying on the one hand and the improved quality of our product on the other. But that improved quality must continue or else there will be a danger of imports coming in. There has been a danger—not so acute to-day as it was a short time ago—of Australia unloading some of her products, but the danger has been minimized by the improvement in the quality of our own products. The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) wants to know if I am encouraging the dairy industry when I am lowering the duty on Australian butter. The duty on Australian butter will be the same as it has been for a number of years past on New Zealand butter without, as far as I am able to learn, any detrimental effects to Canada.

Mr. ARTHURS: Does the minister mean to say that treaties have been negotiated under which certain concessions have been extended to Australia and New Zealand without his knowledge?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister's explanation would almost create that impression.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not at all. I am not Minister of Trade and Commerce. I acquiesce in the treaty as a member of the government of Canada and hold myself responsible for it. But there is a difference between consenting to a treaty and originating it. The campaign against "oleo" originated with my department; that was an entirely different matter. The negotiation of a trade treaty comes directly under the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Of course I am jointly responsible for anything that is done in connection with it. It is not done without my knowledge or I would not be able to tell my hon. friend (Mr. Arthurs) that there is such a treaty with Australia, and that there has been one in force with New Zealand for many years.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will the minister give us the terms of the treaty with Australia so far as they relate to butter and other dairy products?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I made the statement about twelve or fifteen times; I do not think it is necessary to repeat it once again.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): I should like to ask the minister if the expenditure last year is greater or less than the expenditure for the year before?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is going to be pretty close.

Mr. LADNER: In British Columbia, and other important parts of Canada, a very strong protest is developing in connection with the egg business. The duty on eggs entering the United States is eight cents, and on eggs imported into Canada three cents. Are eggs covered by this treaty, and if so to what extent is this country affected?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is that the question?

Mr. LADNER: That is the question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Speaking from memory I do not think eggs are affected, but if my hon. friend waits until the live stock vote is being considered the question of eggs will be dealt with.

Mr. LADNER: Live stock?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You have got to put eggs somewhere, and as matters now stand they come under "live stock." In the meantime I will have my deputy look the matter up and see if eggs are included in the articles affected by the Australian treaty. After all is said and done, I think eggs might more properly come under live stock than under dairying.

Mr. STEVENS: Why not under the fruit industry?

Mr. THOMPSON: I see a grant of $3,000 to the National Dairy Council. I should like to know how many directors there are in that organization and how those directors are elected?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All the provinces are represented, my recollection is there are about fifteen directors.

Mr. THOMPSON: How are those directors elected. I know some gentlemen who have been directors for years and they do not even know themselves how they came to be elected.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have provincial associations and each association has the right to elect a certain number of directors numbering, I think in the case of smaller provinces, one. I also think the dealers in Montreal have representatives on the board; in fact all branches of the industry are represented.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would the minister supply us after recess with some information as to how these men are appointed? I know there is a feeling in many places that the dairy council does not represent the dairy industry at all. If the minister would bring down this information I think it would be of considerable interest. I should also like to have the details with regard to the imports and exports of the dairy products to which we have been referring this afternoon, and the countries from which these importations have been made. Probably the minister could also furnish us with some information as to our exports of cheese since the system of grading has been put into effect. I should like to know how these exports compare with the exports during the years prior to the adoption of the grading system.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The exports of cheese last year were over 120,000,000 pounds and it has increased in quality very substantially under the grading system. The improvement in the grade is about 6 per cent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How does it compare with the exports for eight or ten years previously?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A little more, a slight increase, about 2,000,000 pounds over last year.

Mr. THOMPSON: Would the minister give us the name of the secretary of the National Dairy Association, and tell us what salary he received.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The officers of that association are not under us. I think I indicated already that the Provincial Dairymen's Association appointed the directors to the central council, and they in turn appoint their own secretary and pay his salary. They set the salary. I do not know what it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is the secretary?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: D'Arcy Scott.

Mr. THOMPSON: Is this gentleman in the employ of the government, or has he been for the last three years?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think he is in the employ of the government now.

Mr. THOMPSON: Has he been for the last three years?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh yes, I think he was.

Mr. THOMPSON: During the 1921 campaign he was very active for the Liberal party in my riding. He was acting in the capacity of organizer, or posed as such, in my riding in the interests of the Liberal party. He enjoyed the prestige of being secretary of the National Dairy Council.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He never was in my employ. I think he was retained as counsel in the grain inquiry, but his services in that respect ceased some time ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is he on the payroll still?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is just another way of doing it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What is the grant of $3,000 to be devoted to? It says "for the National Dairy Council." If the council is appointed by the association for the various provinces why do they not provide for this? How is this to be divided up? Or is it for some specific purpose?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is for the general activities. We have had this vote in the estimates every year, the same as the horticultural vote. We recognize that it is a useful organization by giving a grant to help to defray their cost of operations, their educational activities and their travelling expenses. The Canadian Horticultural Council receives a large grant in the miscellaneous items. I think I explained when my hon. friend was out of the chamber that, instead of being included in the miscellaneous items as in other years, it is included in the vote with which it is associated. But we have to mention it or we cannot pay it.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is it not true the present secretary of the dairy council was formerly a member of the railway commission?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think so.

Mr. ARTHURS: And carried his dairy calves in private cars?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know anything about that.

Mr. THOMPSON: Would you give us some information of the benefits derived from this association?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will after recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I want to impress upon the minister the necessity for a better grading system in the export of butter than we have had in the past. I understood the minister to say this afternoon that we would get a better grading system as soon as we asked for it. Perhaps I misunderstood him, but the matter was pressed in the House very strongly last session and the minister took a sympathetic attitude towards it; he gave us to understand that the people in the eastern provinces were not, however, prepared to submit to further regulations. This is a question on which we in the prairie provinces at least feel that we have a serious grievance. We have in those three provinces a cream grading system which prevents rancid or over-ripe cream from entering into the manufacture of butter at all. That means that we do produce a better grade of butter than is produced generally speaking in the eastern provinces. I was glad to hear this afternoon that Ontario is contemplating the same system. The point is this, that in the Old Country the butter from the prairie provinces, although it takes better than the product from the eastern provinces, is at a disadvantage inasmuch as the whole supply from this country is known commercially as Canadian butter. Naturally our butter is lowered to the general standard of all the other Canadian butter. A customer in England may buy a pound of Canadian butter to-day and find it perfectly good, but he goes back to-morrow and buys another pound of Canadian butter which is a little stale, and the consequence is that all Canadian butter is condemned. The customer, therefore, buys the New Zealand product which has been standardized to such an extent that one always knows what one gets. We should try to bring our system up to the exact standard of the New Zealand system. This is imperative if we are to compete with the New Zealand producer in the Old Country; otherwise we shall lose that market altogether. An examination of the figures shows that in 1922 we sold Great Britain 17,000,000 pounds of butter which dropped in 1923 to 4,000,000 pounds; I was glad to see that the figures had gone up a little during the past year, our sale having risen to 15,000,000. But we are not holding our own in the British market, which after all is the only market we have. In the face of the contracting market our production is expanding steadily, and if we examine the figures for the prairies provinces we shall find an enormous increase of butter in that part of the Dominion. In 1923 we produced 39,000,000 pounds and that has increased to 47,607,000 pounds in 1924. Going back over the table for the last six or eight years, we find the production steadily increasing and the prospects are that it will continue to increase in the future. So that in the face of a contracting market we are producing far more than we can consume at home.

I was rather surprised to hear the minister say this afternoon that we may face a serious slump in the butter market, and he spoke about the possibility of New Zealand and Australian butter being sold in Canada. Perhaps some of that butter is sold here to-day, but not to any great extent; and we can prevent the sale of foreign butter by properly meeting the situation. I am not particularly alarmed about the possibility of New Zealand or Australian butter being sold in the home market in competition with our own. At any rate, if that happens the fault will be our own for not producing the right article. But what I am vitally concerned about is the question whether we shall hold our own in the British market, which is almost the only market we have to-day. Whereas we sold to Great Britain 15,000,000 pounds this year, we sold to the United States only 2,761,000 pounds, while to our third best customer, Germany, we sold 862,000 pounds. After all, therefore, Great Britain is the market we must look to; and to hold it we must bring our product strictly up to the New Zealand standard. The standard may be very arbitrary, and no doubt we shall have to submit to rigid regulations; but if we desire to hold our own we must be prepared to stand by these regulations.

My hon. friend (Mr. Tolmie) spoke this afternoon about the difficulties, indeed the impossibility, of competing with New Zealand. I am not prepared to admit that it is at all impossible for us to compete with New Zealand; I believe that we can compete with that country. I would refer the committee to the report on dairying in New Zealand and Australia, by Dr. Ruddick, the Cold Storage Commissioner, in dealing with this very question of competition with New Zealand. He pointed out that while there were certain factors that favoured New Zealand, such as climatic conditions and the fact that cattle could graze throughout the year, there were some other respects in which we had a distinct advantage over New Zealand. Among these factors he mentions the following.

(a) greater experience in breeding and handling dairy cattle;
(b) a more profitable use of the by-products of the dairy, such as skim-milk and whey;
(c) lower cost of manufacturing cheese and butter;
(d) nearness to market and lower cost of marketing;
(e) the existence of what is probably the best competitive primary dairy market in the world at Montreal;
(f) a well-established and economical export business;
(g) an established reputation for cheese; and
(h) excellent dairy schools and systems of field instruction.

In addition, we have certain other distinct advantages, more particularly in the prairie provinces. While the New Zealander is grazing his dairy cattle on land costing anywhere from $500 to $1,000 per acre, we have very cheap land, and in a great many districts we can graze our cattle on wild land on which we do not even pay taxes. I for one am not prepared to admit that under equal marketing conditions New Zealand has any advantages over us at all; indeed, I believe that we have advantages over New Zealand. It is only a few years ago that the government of that country was sending men to Canada to study our conditions and to find out how we were making butter; they even took men from here to teach them how we were producing butter. But they have improved on us, and while Canada has, Rip Van- Winkle like, been asleep for a great many years, New Zealand has steadily marched ahead. It seems to me we must wake up, we must take note of these conditions and proceed to meet them, or else be prepared to lose the British market.

The expansion of this industry is reflected in the prices. In 1922 the average price for creamery butter in Canada was 56 cents a pound; in 1923 it dropped to 35 cents; and in 1924—the figures are not available yet—I understand they will work out at about 31 to 32 cents a pound. The possibilities are that next year there will be a still further drop in price. In fact when I left Saskatchewan about ten days ago butter was selling in country stores at 20 cents a pound, something hitherto unheard of at this time of the year. I would again impress on the minister the necessity of doing something to enable us to get a standardized article on the British market, an article that will be a guarantee to the British consumer that whether he wants a poor grade or a good grade he can depend upon getting it day in and day out at a uniform quality. It is not so much a case of producing a better article as a standardized article, an article of such uniform quality that the consumer will know what he may expect to get. I should like to quote further from this report of Mr. Ruddick's in which he points out what we must do in order to hold the export market:

There must be keener appreciation of the supreme importance of quality.

Then he says:

The universal grading and more frequent deliveries of cream for butter making, and the proper maturing of cheese in suitable temperatures before shipment, should be put into effect as soon as possible.

I think this point of proper maturing was raised by one of the hon. members on my right this afternoon—the importance and necessity of the proper maturing of cheese before shipping. Again Mr. Ruddick states:

There must be the fullest co-operation between all the elements that make up the dairying industry in Canada. Private or selfish interest must not be allowed to stand in the way of any improvement that has for its object the general good of the industry. The making of butter and cheese should be recognized as an important manufacturing business, which it is, and should be treated accordingly.

In the Manitoba Free Press of January 27, 1925, Dr. Grisdale, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, is quoted as follows:

Canada had to depend upon her export market for success, the speaker explained, and to do it successfully she needed uniformity, quantity and quality. In defence of this order of importance he said that if a commodity were uniform, plentiful and cheap enough, it would sell on the British market, quality being a very valuable third. Grading helped all these things in more or less obvious manner.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we are going to hold this market at all the situation must be dealt with immediately, because production is increasing to such an extent that people in the west are beginning to be discouraged, and if there is a still further slump in butter prices I know just what will happen. We have been doing a good deal to stimulate the dairy interest, we have been trying from one end of the country to the other to encourage our people to go into mixed farming, particularly in the prairie provinces. Hon. members all over the House have been pointing out to us repeatedly the necessity of mixed farming in the west. I want to remind them now that we are in mixed farming on the prairies to-day to a greater extent than are the farmers in the eastern provinces. A study of the trade figures will show that we are producing per farm more dairy products to-day than any of the other provinces. And yet you are continually telling us to go into mixed farming as a cure-all for our troubles. We want your assistance if we are going to continue this mixed farming, because with the slump in the value of wheat and other grains we have had to fall back on the dairy industry; but with the prices dropping as they are to-day and our market contracting something must be done to maintain our position. The cream grading system in Ontario and the western provinces is helping to that extent, but if over-ripe or rancid cream is used in the manufacture of butter in the other provinces, it means that that butter manufactured from it will go with ours to the Old Country as Canadian butter, and will lower the general standard of the whole commodity. I should like to have some assurance from the minister that before this session is over he will do something to try and improve this grading system and put it on a uniform basis.

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before referring to the statements made by the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Campbell), I will answer a number of questions which were asked before we rose for dinner, answers to which we did not have ready at that time. The National Dairy Council was organized late in 1918 or early in 1919, and D'Arcy Scott has been its secretary since its inception. The board of directors consists of some forty members, representing almost every dairy, milk, ice cream and allied organization from one end of Canada to the other. The executive council consists of the president, Mr. Stonehouse, of Toronto; the vice-president, Mr. Joseph Calder, of Moose Jaw. The directors include Mr. W. W. Prevey of Edmonton, Mr. R. J. Underwood of Saskatoon, Mr. O. N. Andreason of Humboldt, Mr. G. N. Torell of Winnipeg, Mr. R. M. Player of Walkerton, Ontario, Mr. W. F. Kay, M.P., of Phillipsburg, Quebec, and Mr. A. H. Cutten, of Lower Truro, Nova Scotia.

I find the amount of butter imported last year was only about half of the figure I gave. From recollection I stated three million pounds, but I find that the actual figures are 1,296,709 pounds from New Zealand, 165,801 pounds from the United States, and—rather strange to say,—94,228 from the United Kingdom. Sometimes both eggs and butter, for various trade reasons, are returned from the United Kingdom, but it is very rarely that the market makes this profitable.

Kraft cheese has been analyzed very carefully and found to carry no adulteration, so I can allay the fears of my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. Kennedy). I know he likes that brand of cheese, but it is so good and so reasonable in price that naturally he came to the conclusion there must be something the matter with it. Well, I was under the same impression, but I find by our analysis that it is all right. We have no statistics with regard to the quantities of fancy grades of cheese that are made in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did the government start paying the $3,000?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: From the beginning I understand. The estimates were ready when we came into office and we simply continued the amount as it was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not appear in last year's estimates.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, under miscellaneous. Mr. Scott was the secretary when this government came into power and I understand that he was the secretary from its inception, so that there has been no change in that respect. Evidently the dairymen think Mr. Scott a good secretary, otherwise they would not retain his services so long. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) misunderstood me when he said I promised a better grading system when the people demanded it. I did not intend to say that, and I do not think I did say it. I told the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Kennedy) that we would extend the system of grading for export to the product for home consumption as soon as there was a reasonable demand for it. The market reports show that a considerable quantity of butter is voluntarily graded in Canada even now. We grade at Montreal anything that presents itself for grading, whether it is for consumption in the home market or for export, but the grading is not compulsory with respect to home consumption as it is in the other. A certain amount of latitude must be allowed in connection with internal commercial transactions; it may not be desirable to hamper them with a grading system. You can even buy seed grain or oats from your neighbour without any requirement as to grading. It is only when you are selling to some one at a distance, to whom you cannot talk, that it is desirable to proceed on that basis. According to the market reports in the Montreal Gazette No. 1 butter is quoted at so much, No. 1 cheese at so much, and so on, which shows that the grading is recognized as applied to the product for home consumption. If we made it compulsory it might be found very vexatious in the case of small transactions, which could not be carried out unless the grading requirement had been complied with. That is not the idea of a grading system.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I had particular reference to grading for export, not for home consumption.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not hear my hon. friend make any suggestion in the matter. I gathered he was somewhat doubtful about the quality of the butter in eastern Canada compared with that of western Canada, but he should be generous and not rub that in too much. I think they are all conscious of it down here, that they have been a little slow in getting their grading system perfected. But they are under way now; legislation is before the provincial legislature at Toronto and we look for better things. We adopted that at the beginning as a basis, without any knowledge of dairying at all. Probably we did not know any better; we did not know any other way. We simply took to it naturally as a duck takes to water.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the minister confirm the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) that the standard of Ontario butter is very much lower than that of the other provinces?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Of course; I thought every hon. gentleman knew that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: According to the statement of the Department of Agriculture with regard to pasteurized butter, graded, from all the provinces, Ontario is pretty near the top of the list, with a rating of 82.3 per cent. Saskatchewan, the province from which the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) comes, is rated at 65.4—quite a difference in favour of Ontario, notwithstanding the efforts of the minister and other hon. members to make it appear that the standard of butter in Ontario is very low. I grant you that much of the butter consumed in Ontario is low grade, because much of it is imported into the province. According to this statement the rating of the Maritime provinces is the highest; Manitoba comes next with 85 per cent, Ontario next with 83.2 per cent and Quebec next with 82.4 per cent.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has evidently not been watching carefully the lists of prize winners at the various fairs, including the Royal and the Canadian National exposition. He has not observed how many trophies and how much jewelry have been carried off by Ontario and the eastern provinces during the last three or four years as compared with the west. At least three-quarters of the prizes went to the prairie provinces.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is the committee to infer that this statement issued by the Department of Agriculture is not correct?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It must be right if it came from there, but I am drawing my hon. friend's attention to the other phase of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The department says that Ontario is almost at the top of the list.

Mr. GRAHAM: Our average is the best. They had some specials.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I did not wish to reflect upon the quality of Ontario butter. I am eating it here every day and find it excellent. But due to a lack of a cream grading system some of the butter, which may be excellent when it is eaten fresh, is stale or a little rancid by the time it reaches the Old Country, and this is not the case with the other butter. I think I quoted from an Old Country paper last year in which it was pointed out that the quality of the butter from the prairie provinces was very much higher than that from the eastern provinces, due to this very fact. Suppose 75 per cent or over 80 or 90 per cent even of the Ontario butter was a little above the standard of that of the prairie provinces, yet the fact that the remainder of it was a little below standard, due to these particular causes, would have a tendency to bring the whole grade of the butter down. I am not complaining so much of the quality of the butter as of a lack of standardization, because standardization is what we need in the Old Country. The minister made the remark that I failed to put forward any suggestion. The suggestion I made was that we bring our grading regulations up to the same standard as that of New Zealand. The minister admitted last year that the people of western Canada were prepared to accept that standard, but he said that the people of eastern Canada were not prepared for such drastic regulations. Drastic or not, it seems to me we must deal with that situation. It is not a matter for any geographical discriminations at all. We must get Canadian butter, regardless of where it is made, whether it is made in Quebec, Ontario or in the prairie provinces, on a standardized basis, so that any man buying that butter in London, whether he wants a cheap or a dear article will know that he can come back the next day, the next week and the next year and get that very same quality of butter. That is what we want.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have that, I think. The standard of our grades is not only the same all over Canada, but it is as near as we can get to the New Zealand standard, because we recognize we have to compete with them.

Mr. CARROLL: I have not heard any very sound reason given by the minister for the inclusion of this item of $3,000 for the National Dairy Council. The last reason I have heard given for it was that the late government had been used to putting this item in the estimates. I cannot say that that appealed to me as a very strong reason.

If the National Dairy Council are going to get this $3,000, there are other basic industries in this country who will be approaching this government for a grant, and with just an equal right. For example, we have the Miners' Union in Nova Scotia and in Alberta; we have the Fishermen's Union on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts; we have the steel workers' unions; and each one of them is just as much entitled to a grant of $3,000 a year for the purpose of placing their propaganda before this country as is the dairy council. These dairymen are a splendid class of men, and they are doing a great deal for their special industry, but I do not see why this government should pick out this particular industry of all the basic industries of this country, and hand them $3,000 a year. I think the minister should reconsider this vote of $3,000. The last time on which I knew the National Dairy Council to be very active in this country was when they were by their propaganda and organization opposing the wishes of about half the population of this country, and I suppose they were using part of this $3,000 on their propaganda. Personally I am against this vote of $3,000, first for the reason that if we are going to subsidize an industry of this kind we should subsidize industries all around and give every organization in this country that is doing equally well for the industries it represents a similar grant, and secondly for the reason that I do not think the National Dairy Council are using this $3,000 in the interests of dairying or of the dairymen.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) has cast some reflections on the late government because of an item in the estimates of $3,000. Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to call his attention to the fact that in the years 1918, 1919 and 1920 the votes for this particular item amounted to the sum of $155,000, and the vote this year amounts to $230,000. This Minister of Agriculture of ours is some little spender. Now let me point out to the House where some of the money goes. One item alone in the Auditor General's report for the year just closed, 1924, shows $82,000 going for salaries for officials and their expenses right here in Ottawa, outside of civil government. Compare that with a total vote during the years 1919 and 1920 of $155,000. Besides this expenditure of $80,000 odd for employees here in the central place, where the officials are right beside the minister, there are all sorts of other expenses, as you will find if you examine the Auditor General's report. There are banquets to delegates, all sorts of expenses for people coming in and going away from here running up to $5,000 in the case of some items. It seems to me if the member who has just spoken (Mr. Carroll) has such regard for an item of $3,000, he had better look into the expenditures a little closer and check up some of these other items.

Mr. CARROLL: I made a very good start.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I agree with my hon. friend in respect to the $3,000 item. I will vote for the exclusion of it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member for Lincoln thinks we are spending too much on inspection—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Not on inspection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —and the hon. member for Glengarry thinks we do not spend enough, so I assume we have struck the happy medium and are spending just about right.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am not making any reference to inspection. I am kicking about banquets and the other stuff.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Chairman, I am mighty glad I have found a recruit. I brought up items of this nature in the House last year and pointed out where it was possible to save much money by controlling our expenditure on banquets, entertainments and so forth. I hesitated about introducing this matter before six o'clock when the minister and in fact all the members of the House seemed to be in good humour. I see an item here in the Auditor General's report which I shall read to the House not only for the benefit of hon. members but of all those who read the newspapers and Hansard. This was a banquet given to some delegates who attended a convention here in the year 1924. It reads:

Chateau Laurier, banquet to delegates attending—Dairy Convention at Ottawa, 87 dinners, $174.00; Cigars, etc., $22.50.

This was only one of the smaller banquets, but it ran away with money that is being charged up to the taxpayers of this country annually. One does not need to blame this government alone for expenditures of this sort, for you can go back for years and find that previous governments have done likewise. I want as a representative of the people here to protest against this unwarranted and unjustifiable expenditure of public money.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Maybe when my hon. friend knows the circumstances associated with these so-called banquets he may be willing to support the expenditure. Quite frequently we call conferences representing various branches of agriculture to Ottawa to discuss various questions before we take action. When we do that we pay their expenses here. Having called them together, we have a right to pay at least part of their expenses. If they had looked after themselves at that particular meal, I do not know how much it would have cost them, perhaps two or three dollars a plate if it was at the Chateau, but as we had them all together and could call the feast ourselves, we could do it for about $1.50 a plate.

Mr. GRAHAM: Wholesale rates.

Mr. THOMPSON: Before six o'clock I asked what was the salary paid to the secretary of the National Dairy Council. Is the minister prepared to answer that question now?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Inasmuch as we do not pay the shot, I have not made any inquiry. I do not know what he is paid.

Mr. THOMPSON: I would judge from the report that they were paying him pretty well. If the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Leader) had read a little further down in the accounts he would have found an item of $5,013.45 for the travelling expenses of the delegates attending the dairy conference at Ottawa.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They did good work.

Mr. THOMPSON: Now for one I am absolutely opposed to the vote for this purpose. I think it is needless. We have the secretary of the National Dairy Council drawing a very large salary. He is a lawyer in the city of Ottawa who has been paid a very considerable amount, by this government during the past two years, and he is a very useful man at election time to the government; he has been out on the stump campaigning for them. I repeat that I am absolutely opposed to the voting of this $3,000, and I want to put myself on record to that effect.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I point out that this vote is $3,000 smaller as compared with last year. Last year there was the same amout as this year, plus an item of $3,000 in miscellaneous expenditure for the secretary of the National Dairy Council. The smaller amount to be voted this year takes care of the general activities of the department and also meets the contribution to the dairy council. Consequently the vote is less by $3,000 than it was last year, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: For how many years has the vote for this purpose been included in the estimates?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know it was there when we came into power, and my information is that it has appeared from the very inception of the organization. The reason I mentioned Mr. Scott was because some hon. member made some suggestion as to Mr.

Scott's alleged conduct in apparently wanting to associate himself with this government. I merely wish to say that Mr. Scott was there from the beginning of the organization, and that we had nothing to do with his appointment or the paying of his salary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I want to protest against the lack of activity on the part of the dairy council; I am afraid they are a useless body. I think it has been amply demonstrated to the minister that the dairy products of Ontario are rated very much lower than those of any other province. On the other hand the records of the department show quite the contrary, and if the minister does not take steps to correct the impression that has been left on the House he will assume quite a responsibility.

With regard to cheese I notice that the same statement issued by the department over which the minister presides shows that Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island—those are the only three concerned I presume, there is not very much cheese shipped from western Canada—are rated very high. Eighty-three per cent of the cheese from Ontario was graded as first. In the province of Quebec the grading was 68 per cent, and in Prince Edward Island 62 per cent. Then, as I pointed out before, in the matter of butter Ontario, out of all the provinces mentioned, is rated as third. The Maritimes come first with a rating of 89.4 per cent; Manitoba is second with 85 per cent; Ontario is ranked as third with 83.2 per cent and the other provinces are rated considerably lower than that. This statement showing, I believe, what is absolutely correct—because the officials of the department I know are competent and would not issue a statement if it was not correct—is significant. I know there has been an attempt made for a considerable time past to make it appear that dairy products from the province of Ontario are very inferior to those produced in many of the other provinces. As a matter of fact I know that a good deal of inferior butter finds its way into Ontario as a result of the low tariff existing in this country. The minister foresees the time when stores in Toronto and other cities will be selling imported butter from Australia and New Zealand, and yet he informs the House that he is a party to a trade arrangement with Australia under which the tariff on imports of dairy products from those countries will be still further reduced. It is a well known fact that much inferior butter has been imported into Canada. The minister to-day stated that inspectors are being sent throughout Canada, who find that considerable adulteration is taking place. I think it is up to the minister to inform us who the parties are who are adulterating dairy products, butter for instance, and where they are located. That is a most important thing for the people to know. If these parties are located in Ontario we would like to know it. If they are permitted to indulge in such practices I can only say the officials are not doing their duty. Nearly one-third of this vote is for the payment of officials—which does not include the salaries paid to the regular officials of the department under the head of civil government—and that is a considerable amount. When you find an item of $82,276 for officials in connection with this department surely it is not too much to ask that the act with respect to the adulteration of dairy products should be enforced and enforced to the very limit. If the minister wants to leave the impression on our minds that there is a considerable amount of adulteration going on, that cocoanut oil is being mixed with butter, and that the guilty parties are being found out, he ought to inform us how many cases of the kind have come under the notice of his officials and where the offenders are located.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think it would be quite fair to disclose the name of the creamery that has been charged with adulterating its butter. I understand from my deputy that the matter is under investigation now, and until we are absolutely sure as to the marking on the boxes, and that all the evidence points to that particular creamery, I would not like to publish the names for fear of doing an injustice to that concern. But I can tell my hon. friend that we are certainly getting after those who violate the law with respect to the adulteration of dairy products; there is no question about it. And we are instituting prosecutions. Sometimes it takes considerable time, there is a good deal of delay, there are adjournments and appeals, and other causes of delay. Nevertheless the government is instituting a prosecution, and we generally get results when the parties are guilty. With respect to the matter of grading, if it will make my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) feel a little better I would draw his attention to the manner in which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) has sized up the situation. He has said that there is no question but that the average in Ontario and the east, particularly the Maritime provinces, is higher than in the west. There is no question about that, but it is also true that the three prairie provinces carried off the great bulk of the prizes at the great dairy exhibitions throughout Canada. However, I will accept our own figures that the average of the grading in the east is higher than in the west.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What was the amount of exportations of butter to Great Britain last year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was 21,000,000 pounds.

Mr. CHAPLIN: According to the report I have, we shipped 4,000,000 pounds of butter. The minister before six o'clock told us it was 15,000,000 pounds, and now he says it was 21,000,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have the figure here, seven million dollars—

Mr. CHAPLIN: I asked for pounds.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can give the hon. gentleman both.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Before recess the minister said we shipped to Great Britain 15,000,000 pounds of butter. According to the trade returns of 1924, we shipped to Great Britain 4,371,000 pounds. I should like to know where the discrepancy comes in.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have the statement of the Bureau of Statistics. This shows that the amount of butter we shipped to the United Kingdom in 1924 was 15,236,000 pounds.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does the hon. member want more than one year?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am referring to the last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We shipped out of the country 21,676,038 pounds.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is the total export.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Trade of Canada for 1924 shows the total exports were 13,648,000 pounds. In the exports to the United Kingdom there was a decrease of 75 per cent in the quantity of butter exported from the amount exported the year before. In 1923 there were exported 17,527,407 pounds, and in 1924 there were exported 4,371,197 pounds. Surely there must be some explanation for this tremendous discrepancy.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Trade of Canada for 1924, published by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have before me the figures prepared by the Bureau of Statistics which show the shipments of butter to the United Kingdom for 1922 to be 17,000,000 pounds; for 1923 4,000,000 pounds and for 1924, 15,000,000 pounds. I may say this is for the calendar year and not for the fiscal year. That may be where the difference occurs.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know what there is involved in this.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is something involved in the fact that the fiscal year ending March 31 shows a falling off of about 75 per cent in our exports of butter to the United Kingdom.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The inference is that the butter being better we eat more of it at home.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister tried to convey the idea that there was a good deal of adulteration taking place in the manufacture of butter, and upon being asked how many cases of this kind have been detected, who the parties are and where they are located, it narrows down apparently to the case of one creamery, and he does not think it would be well to divulge the name. I think the minister is doing a great deal to discredit the standard of our dairy products, if he wishes to convey that idea. When asked to specify he does not think it would be advisable to mention the particular creamery that has been engaged in this work. I hope I have not misconstrued the minister's statement, or at least I hope it is narrowed down to one instance.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend overlooks the fact that I said there was just one case where it had been traced to a creamery—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Exactly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —where it had been exported and traced back to a creamery, and we are in course of investigating that further before we will be justified in coming to the conclusion that it is the guilty party.

9 p.m. From April 1, 1924, to January 22, 1925, 75 convictions were secured by inspectors in connection with which fines amounting to $4,686.10 were imposed. Of these convictions 43 were on account of excess water in butter; six were on account of short weight prints of butter; 25 on account of butter containing foreign fat and one on account of inferior curds having been placed in the centre of cheese. The principal prosecutions have been on account of putting too much moisture into the butter, and there has been a substantial number of prosecutions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the minister say there were twenty-five cases of foreign fat being mixed with the butter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, whatever I have read.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This is the most important feature of the whole matter, because it is well known that a great deal of this adulteration has been going on, and if there are twenty-five instances of foreign matter being mixed with butter in this country, it is not any wonder that our butter has a poor reputation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Only one case for export.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am speaking of the butter for home consumption. The people of this country are entitled to as good butter as the people of the Old Country.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No question about that, but you were talking of spoiling our market.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, exactly; we have a home market, which is a most valuable market, and we should encourage our people to use more dairy products than they are using, but if you are going to permit inferior butter to be brought in and mixed with our butter and put on the market, then you will destroy our reputation for butter among the people of the country.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What does the hon. member suggest we should do?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am amazed to find that with 25 cases of infractions the fines only amount to four thousand odd.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We do not impose the fines. The magistrate or judge imposes them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If the fines are not commensurate with the offence, I think it would be well for the minister to inform the House as to the names of the parties who have been mixing foreign matter with the butter, and tell us where they are located. It is too important a matter to be passed over lightly. This has been going on for a considerable time, and it is time a stop was put to it, and penalties imposed which would be sufficient to prevent it occurring again. The most effective way I believe at present of dealing with it is to let the country know who these parties are and where they are located; then you will be able to trace the matter and get the facts.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the act we are drafting we are proposing to increase the fines. We find that both the judges and magistrates in their judgment impose fines which are pretty close to the minimum. I hope that the proposal which will be found in the new bill that I forecast before dinner will meet with the hearty approval and support of my hon. friend.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Were these individuals breaking any law?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, rather.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Then why should one lawbreaker be immune from publicity and not another?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are usually newspaper men around who give the necessary publicity.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I understood from the minister a moment ago that these cases were not made public.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was no publicity in the creamery case because there was no conviction; the party was only under suspicion.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I see no reason why the minister should not make the whole thing public before the committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is not a private police court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has evidently given the creamery manufacturers a pretty clean bill of health.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the hon. member (Mr. Chaplin) will ask for a return the names will be given him.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In connection with this item there was in the estimates in 1923 a sum of $175,000 and the item has grown year by year. I protest that it is time for this government to practise somewhat the economy about which they are boasting. The officials of this department are consuming too much money and it is time to stop this sort of thing. Here is a good opportunity for economy. The importations of butter are increasing while the exportations are on the decline, and yet the expenses of this department are going up.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have already pointed out that we have taken on the additional work of the grading system which in itself costs $75,000 in round numbers; and if we are to carry out the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Kennedy, Glengarry) which is not without merit, that will mean another $75,000 for the compulsory grading of the product for home consumption. Now, it is obvious that if you get a new service you must incur a greater expenditure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has informed us that 25 fines were imposed for the mixing of foreign matter with butter. We were also led to believe that the creamery manufacturers in the country were not doing just as they should. The matter narrows itself down to this, that there is one creamery merely under suspicion without any conviction registered against it. It is possible that this creamery may have been a little careless, without having offended intentionally. But the fact is that in 25 instances foreign matter was mixed with butter, and in those cases there were convictions. Were these all individual cases, or were any of the 25 fines imposed on the same parties a second or third time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Those 25 represent so many different parties I understand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have for a number of years back, even before the present government came into power, taken a strong stand against the adulteration of butter, and that was one of the reasons I objected to the manufacture of oleomargarine; I did not approve of the manner in which the manufacturers of this commodity were permitted to bring material into this country without a tariff and mix it with other stuff and offer it to the public for sale. And until we take steps to see that the Dairy Standards Act is applied to all parties and to all dairy products put on the market we shall have a good deal of this inferior stuff offered the public, to the ruin of our reputation for wholesome produce I am ready to admit that you will find a great deal of this in the province of Ontario. Dairy produce is one of the things the value of which as a foodstuff the people of Canada have absolutely overlooked notwithstanding the high cost of living. If a great deal more dairy produce were used instead of so much of these inferior articles people would be healthier and they would be better satisfied, and until we see to it that no adulteration takes place we shall not have a desirable state of affairs. With the army of officials which we have at the present time there is no excuse for this condition continuing. If the minister, in the bill that is to be introduced, will see that a penalty is imposed which will be so drastic that no one will attempt anything of the kind, the effect I have no doubt will be salutary. But that does not preclude the possibility of this cheap article being imported into the country and placed on the market where no standard applies to such importations. There is no standard in the case of this stuff that is brought into the country, although there is a standard of grading in the case of the butter we export. You can import an inferior article which is subject to no system of grading and do anything you like with it, but when it comes to exporting local produce you are confronted with a system of standardization. The people at home are therefore suffering as a result of the regulations; we are doing everything possible to protect the health of the people abroad while we are doing nothing to protect those at home.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member, I take it then, is in favour of extending the grading system to all products, both imported and exported, alike?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not very enthusiastic for a grading system. I have expressed myself with regard to this matter many times in this House, and I repeat now that I believe in competition wherever it is possible. I do not believe in too much nursing legislation; I do not think that we ought to do for people what they know a great deal more about than we do. This has been brought out by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Thompson) in regard to the cheese graded by Montreal as No. 1 and sent to the Old Country where it was sold as a lower grade. The minister asks, who has the authority over there to set aside our grading?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not say that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I misunderstood the minister then. The statement made by the hon. member was that cheese had been shipped in this way and the minister took exception to the purchaser over there designating the article a lower grade than that which had been fixed by his officials.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a matter of judgment on both sides.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Well, there is one thing certain, and that is that the purchaser knows what he wants and will pay according to the quality of the article. When you coddle people too much and do not allow their judgment full play you destroy it, just as the native faculties of a man atrophy through disuse. I am not one of those who favour a good deal of the grading that is being done by the Department of Agriculture in another direction. Eggs for local consumption are graded in this country to-day, and eggs graded as No. 1 may be placed in a shop window where the sun can get at them through the glass and in twenty-four hours they are in such a state that they ought to be graded No. 3. People in that case have to exercise their own judgment, but the dealer might say that the eggs having been graded No. 1 he was not responsible for their condition. We have too many government officials in the country to-day. The minister is creating a whole army of unnecessary officials in connection with many branches of the Department of Agriculture and that this practice is having no good effect is borne out by the evidence which we have in the exports of produce of this kind—a falling off of 75 per cent in our butter exports last year compared with the year before. Is that a desirable state of affairs?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Our cheese shipments have increased.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I believe our cheese shipments have been higher in years gone by. The possibilities along this line are very great indeed. I know considerable dissatisfaction exists to-day because of the fact that cheese has to be shipped from the factory to some grading centre, where it is graded by people who do not come in contact with the manufacturer. If the grading was done at the factory, the manufacturer would know why his butter was not given first grade and would take immedate steps to remedy the defect. As it is to-day, he finds weeks afterwards, maybe months, that his product is graded as No. 2 or No. 3, he is at a loss to understand this lower grading, and very often blames the official, although it may not be his fault at all. The minister informed us this afternoon that grading for western Ontario was done at London.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Part of the time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In the oldest cheese-making district in the Dominion we find that grading takes place only part of the time. I believe the next grading station is at Belleville?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Toronto and Belleville.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Frequently it is weeks, yes I guess many weeks sometimes, before the manufacturer of the cheese knows just exactly how it is graded.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A triplicate copy of the certificate is sent immediately to the manufacturer and all other parties concerned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is the cheese graded immediately it is received or after it has been in the cold storage plant for some time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If we adopted my hon. friend's suggestion of grading cheese at its point of manufacture, we would have to employ three or four times as many graders at a corresponding expense, and the work would not be done as satisfactorily because it would lend itself to all kinds of switching of certificates once the grading goes out of the hands of the cold storage authorities.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Well, Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that with all our facilities for teaching people how to make cheese and butter those who are engaged in cheese-making should be taught in the dairy schools how to manufacture an article of the quality most in demand.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a provincial matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes it is; and now the government steps in and says, "No, we are not concerned about who makes the cheese, but we will see that it is graded, and if when the cheese reaches the Old Country it is found to be of a lower grade the dealer must lose the difference in price, and we are not prepared to stand behind our grade." Is that fair?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do you know any country where the system of grading is different?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am speaking of the practice here, and I am pointing out that it would be much more satisfactory and desirable to instruct our cheese manufacturers how to make a high-grade article. Let there be some competition along this line, and it will be unnecessary to have such an army of officials, whose activities are bound to have an irritating effect upon those engaged in the industry. If I were a manufacturer of cheese I would prefer the old practice under which the buyer attended our cheese markets and bought on grade, and if the cheese was a low grade the fact was pointed out to the man in the factory. To-day under the present system of grading the man in the factory may not know for some considerable time how his cheese has been graded, and naturally he is very much dissatisfied if he finds that it has been given a lower grade than that which he considered its quality entitled it to receive. I am afraid no improvement has taken place under present methods.

Mr. WARNER: I think a great deal of benefit should result from this discussion, but I should very much dislike to see the item cut down. From my knowledge of the dairy business I am convinced that Canada depends a great deal upon its development, and I am glad that the government is active in promoting the industry. But I also feel that some of the criticism to-night has been timely. I would not oppose the grading of our butter for home consumption, but I have not studied this question so much as I have the necessity of securing uniformity of grade for our export butter. Our home market is good, but we cannot get rich by selling to ourselves; we must export our surplus to bring money into the country. The prosperous condition of the dairy industry in my part of the country has helped people to carry on, and many of them are doing quite well in the business. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) has dealt in detail with the subject of grading. As I pointed out last session, our disadvantage in respect of export trade as compared, for instance, with New Zealand, is that we have a limited federal jurisdiction and cannot encroach on the provincial field. I realize there is difficulty in securing export control by federal legislation, but if we could secure such control I am confident it would be better for us. My own province of Alberta has been improving grades until it has established a good reputation for its butter on the Old Country market. With respect to the $3,000 grant to the National Dairy Council, I do not stand for subsidies and bonuses more than other members of the House.

Ordinarily we are not supposed to ask for bonuses, but I know so well what the National Dairy Council have been doing that I think this $3,000 is well placed when it is put in their hands to help promote the dairy business in Canada. There seems to be some question as to how the National Dairy Council is formed. I know that in our province there are different sections of the dairy association: the producers' section have a representative and the manufacturers have theirs, the work, however, being that of one organization. I do not care to stir up the oleomargarine question, which has been referred to several times to-night, because I think it is dead; at any rate I hope it is. The National Dairy Council did much to bring about the defeat of oleomargarine in Canada; in fact, they were perhaps one of the chief factors in the fight. When we think of the work that the National Dairy Council has been doing for agriculture and for dairying we should not make mountains out of mole hills in regard to this vote of $3,000. It has been a great source of satisfaction to me that the present government have been as favourable as they have to the development of the dairy business. They may have made mistakes, but people who do not make mistakes do not do much else. I have myself on several occasions suggested remedies for defects in the regulations or in the laws and I believe we can improve them. If we try to help the government in the improvement of laws and in the development of the dairy business we will get much further than if we simply find fault with everything they are doing. I am not trying to defend the government, because I think they are able to defend themselves; but we cannot afford to cripple the dairy business in order to get back at any political group or any political party that is in power. We should deal with this matter on its merits; we should not allow prejudice of any kind to interfere with the building up of the dairy business. I am sorry to hear that the export has fallen off; I am at a loss to know why. I am sorry also to hear that so much butter has been imported. Some few years ago a dairy concern that I was interested in was called upon to compete with the New Zealand butter on the Pacific coast. The New Zealand butter got established at that time among those who cared for a lightly salted butter and we had some trouble to get a butter that would compete with it, mostly on account of its carrying so little salt rather than being of better quality otherwise. It was not that there was not enough or as good butter in Canada, but the butter that came from New Zealand was different from ours. However, I think we have largely overcome that. Let us help the government to remedy the defects connected with the handling of our dairy products and their sale in the export market. Let us do the best we can and let us not depend on the government to pass a law in order to make us do good work and to produce clean, sweet butter and cheese. We should not expect the government to do it all; we can do a whole lot ourselves.

Mr. CAMPBELL: For the information of the hon. member (Mr. Sutherland) I would like to read a clipping from the London Grocer dealing with the question of butter. It is as follows:

The present season—

This refers to the season of 1923.

—has witnessed an unusually heavy import of Canadian butter. In a general way the butter from the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta proved superior to the article produced in the eastern provinces, and commanded a higher price. This goes to show the value of united effort as exemplified by co-operation between the creameries and the provincial governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and these provinces have very efficient systems of government grading.

I understood the minister to say that the regulations for the export grading of butter were the same in New Zealand as in Canada; am I right in that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, as near as possible.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Then I am inclined to think they cannot be very well carried out. Judging from information I have had from private sources, from people who have been in the Old Country and have bought New Zealand as well as Canadian butter, and also from articles in the Old Country papers, I am convinced that our butter is not grading up to the standard. I do not refer to quality so much as to standard; it is not equal to that of New Zealand. This is a matter that should be thoroughly looked into. I have talked to a great many people during the last two years who have been in the Old Country and I am assured by them all that they cannot depend on the standard quality of Canadian butter being maintained. Would the minister give us some particulars with regard to the two sets of regulations, New Zealand and Canadian? The last information I had was that they were very different.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Even though the standards may be identical, it does not follow that the butters are identical. New Zealand may score higher on the same standard than we do, and thus produce a most acceptable butter. It may be in the salting; it may be in the texture. They cater more to the Old Country market than we do. We depend almost entirely on the home market; we do not strive after the foreign market to the same extent that Australia and New Zealand do.

Mr. CAMPBELL: These essential qualities should, it seems to me, be provided for in the regulations—the salting, the flavour, and so on. Surely if the regulations are to be effective at all these things must be provided for. The question is a very important one. Nothing should be left undone to bring our butter up to the same standard as that of New Zealand.

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend does not see the distinction. We can put on paper what we like as a standard, but that does not make the butter; the quality depends upon the person who makes the butter. Australia and New Zealand seem to make butter that is more acceptable on the market to which we also send ours; they seem to comply with the standard requirements better than we do, and they get a better price. Here are the standards for grades of creamery butter in Canada. We have not the Australian standard, but it is largely the same. I may say Dr. Ruddick was over in New Zealand and Australia a little over a year ago, and he got the very last word on dairy production there. About twenty years ago he assisted in laying the foundations of the dairy industry in New Zealand himself, and his work has been carried on there by another Canadian who succeeded him. The standards are as follows:

STANDARDS FOR GRADES OF CREAMERY BUTTER

Scale of points for scoring butter

	Points
Flavour	45
Texture	15
Incorporation of moisture	10
Colour	10
Salting	10
Packing	10
Total	100

Then it goes on to define what flavour means:

Flavour means fine, sweet, mild and clean. Texture firm, close, smooth and waxy.

And so on. If my hon. friend was a better butter maker than I am, he would come nearer to that ideal. I am less competent, further away from that ideal than he is, but the standard is the same for us both. He merely succeeds in obtaining a higher score than I do. He may get 99 out of 100, and I may get 95, but we are both aiming at the same standard.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Should not the regulations be fixed so as to make it a different grade if a higher figure is reached? Suppose one scores higher than 45 in flavour for No. 1, should he not get some special grade? Surely there is some way of getting around that.

Mr. GOULD: I should like to ask the minister if in his opinion it was the good quality of our butter which caused the United States to put a duty of 8 cents a pound against it, and if so, why is it necessary to spend this huge sum to further increase the quality of our butter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the action taken by the United States was simply in conformity with the general policy of their government. The farm bloc there have a little different idea of protection from the farm bloc in this House. They wanted to protect butter, so they put a duty of 8 cents against it. I do not think it was because of the special quality of our butter, but just on the general principle of keeping it out. I have another definition here of what the different grades call for.

Special grade butter must be made from properly pasteurized cream, showing no reaction by Storch test, total score 94 and over. Minimum score for flavour 41.

First grade of butter, total score 92, and under 94; minimum score for flavour, 39.

It goes on with the rest of the grades in the same way. The specifications for the different grades are set out just as are the specifications for the first three grades of wheat, for instance, with which my hon. friends are familiar. The statute fixes what shall constitute the first three grades of wheat, and the four commercial grades are determined by the Standards Board. These grades are applied in just the same way.

Mr. GOULD: Is one individual capable of inspecting cheese, butter and eggs, or have you three sets of officials for grading these three products?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand the same graders will grade both butter and cheese, but not eggs. There is nothing to hinder them from grading eggs also, but it is not practical for the grader to take on too many duties.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is anything being done by the department to encourage our trade in butter with Germany? This year we shipped to Germany 862,000 pounds of butter; she is now our third best customer. I understand there are opportunities for a very large development of that trade there. I wonder if the department is doing anything to encourage it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a matter for the Department of Trade and Commerce. We are exporting so little butter compared with our total production that we have no difficulty in finding a market for it in Great Britain, but as a matter of fact I did not know that any of our butter was going to Germany. I do not know that it would hurt if more butter did go; I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to. Our butter will seek whatever market is the best.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It will not always seek it if there is not some effort behind it upon the part of the department. What I am concerned about is the rate at which our butter production is expanding. The minister knows the history of the butter industry in western Canada. I am concerned as to the outlet. When we look at the figures here, we find that the United Kingdom is increasing her consumption of butter every year. This year there is an increase of 6,000,000 pounds over that of last year in her consumption, and last year showed a very considerable increase over the preceding year; in fact, I believe that for ten years the consumption of butter in the United Kingdom has been steadily increasing, and yet we do not seem to be holding our own in that market. It seems to me there is something wrong, and if these regulations of ours are the same as those of New England it must be that they are not as strictly enforced. There appears to be something lacking. I have been assured by people from the Old Country that our butter cannot be depended upon to be always up to the same level like New Zealand butter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For fear a wrong impression has been left I want to repeat that a man who puts poor butter on the market may well be concerned as to the future price he will get, but the man with good goods need never fear that he will not get a good price for his product. There is always a bigger demand for high class dairy products than the supply.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Has butter which is imported into this country to be graded?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that is not compulsory, but it is inspected. I think my hon. friend is under the impression that poor butter is being imported and is used for diluting our better butter. We have no knowledge of that. The adulteration is invariably done with some of these oils, such as cocoanut oil.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The question I asked was as to whether it was necessary to have this butter which is imported graded.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is not compulsory to have this imported butter graded, but it is compulsory if you are going to export butter to have it graded, regardless of what the demand may be abroad. With regard to ice cream, which has become quite an important branch of the dairy business on account of the dairy products entering into it, the last report I have been able to get shows that for 1923 the value of the ice cream was $7,473,144, and that 89,809,600 pounds of milk went into its manufacture. If the minister is anxious to have an efficient and uniform system of grading let him turn his attention to the ice cream which is sold. A great deal of it is called ice cream, and I venture to say there is not a particle of cream in the mixture; that is well known.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I answered that point earlier in the evening by saying that ice cream is under the Department of Health. Speaking from memory I think there is provision as to the amount of butter fat which it must contain, but the matter does not come under my department.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It might, I presume, come under the Ontario Temperance Act. I can scarcely understand how the minister can contend that this should come under the Department of Health.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not make such a contention; the matter simply happens to be just there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think the minister, in view of the fact that 89,000,000 pounds of milk go into the manufacture of ice cream and that he is at the head of this particular branch of the department, ought to take steps to assume control of the matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have troubles enough without borrowing any more.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is no commodity to-day on the market which is such a deception on the public as ice cream, a great deal of water, powder and other ingredients being mixed together and frozen. The fact that it is frozen is perhaps one of the few safeguards about it. The large quantity of milk I have mentioned goes into its manufacture, but if some steps were taken to ensure the purity of ice cream the amount of milk might be doubled.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I agree with my hon. friend entirely. I may say, however, that I think some grading was done last year by the Department of Health. There is no question but that there is a lot of spurious stuff called ice cream.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister thinks the matter is under the Department of Health.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I said I thought it had been graded last year. I know it is under the Department of Health.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: All I can say is it is a most remarkable place to have it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I agree with you.

Mr. THOMPSON: I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Sutherland) as to the desirability of grading cheese in the factory. Representing, as I do, a dairy section I may say that we have had grading for a great number of years. The grading was done in the factory and gave entire satisfaction. Let me point out further that the dairymen took the matter up and sent a petition to the Minister of Agriculture asking for the grading to be done in the factory. The Eastern Dairymen's Association met in the city of Belleville and there was an attendance of some three or four hundred delegates. A vote on grading in the factory was taken, and there was a unanimous expression of opinion in its favour. The minister was represented there by Mr. Duncan Marshall, and he informed the dairymen that he would convey their views to the minister. A deputation was also appointed which went down to Ottawa and urged upon the minister that grading be done in the factory. The minister says it is impracticable to do this but in view of my extended experience I disagree with him. I know that a grader can grade three counties. The grading is practically done in the first two days of the week, and the grader has virtually the rest of the week to himself, so there is nothing to hinder him from driving around and inspecting the product of the factories. There would be an educational feature about doing it that way. The grader could explain where the defects in the cheese lay, and those defects could be more quickly remedied. At the present time the cheese are sent to Montreal, and the minister says a certificate comes right back. Well, it takes a few days for the cheese to arrive there and a week elapses, sometimes two weeks, before the certificates come back. I know this for a fact. I see a great many certificates and I know what I am talking about. In the meantime the maker has made perhaps a few thousand dollars worth of inferior cheese before the certificates have been returned. If the cheese were graded in the factory and defects were discovered an inspector could get there and recommend remedial measures at once. The minister asked the hon. member for South Oxford what other countries guarantee the grading. I want to say that no other country, to my knowledge, ships in just the same way that Canada does. It is true that grading is in force in New Zealand, but regrading is done and the purchaser does not have to bear the loss. The minister has referred to the conditions in New Zealand being superior to ours. With that I do not agree; I believe we have the best known system in the whole world to-day. The cheese are bought in Canada, and the farmer gets his money the very day of the sale. At any rate this is the system in central Ontario; I cannot speak with so much certainty as to the practice farther east. Cheese from New Zealand is consigned to firms in the Old Country and is dumped on the market. Quite often a lot of New Zealand cheese is dumped on the market at once, with detrimental results to Canadian cheese, and a reduction in price.

I reiterate my request that some explanation should be given with respect to the vote of $3,000 for the National Dairy Council. The minister has not yet given one word of explanation as to what is to be done with this money. Outside of this particular vote, thousands of dollars have been spent in entertainment and the payment of expenses, but no details have been vouchsafed as to what the council did last year.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Surely the minister can give the information asked for as to what this $3,000 is for. Who is going to receive the money, that is what we would like to know?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have already answered the question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As a rule the details of disbursements from the public treasury appear in the Auditor General's report. In this way it can be ascertained who received a particular sum of money. What the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Thompson) wants to know is, who is going to receive this $3,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The National Dairy Council.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What are they going to do with it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is intended to pay the cost of educational work in which the council are engaged throughout the Dominion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Last year we paid the travelling expenses of the delegates of this association, and several hundreds of dollars additional were incurred in entertaining them when they arrived here. I do not believe the minister gave us more than one-half of the names of the members of this association.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is right. I thought it would be tiresome. I have them all here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would the minister inform the House who appoints the members of the National Dairy Council, and how they are appointed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: By the various dairy bodies throughout Canada, about twenty. The associations are as follows:

The British Columbia Dairymen's Association, The Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association, The Alberta Dairymen's Association, The Saskatchewan Dairymen's Association, The Western Canada Ice Cream Manufacturers' Association, The Manitoba Dairymen's Association, The Eastern Ontario Dairymen's Association, The Ontario Milk and Cream Produce Association, The Canadian Creamery Association, The Canadian Ice Cream Manufacturers' Association The Milk Producers' Interests, The Condensed Milk Interests, The Canadian Milk Distributor's Association, The Quebec Dairymen's Association, The Montreal Milk Producers Association, The New Brunswick Dairymen United, The Dairymen's Association of Nova Scotia, The Prince Edward Island Dairymen's Association, The Holstein Friesian Association of Canada, The Canadian Ayreshire Breeding Association, The Canadian Jersey Cattle Club.

And then follows the executive which I read earlier in the evening.

Mr. TOLMIE: In view of the large grant which the Canadian National Dairy Council receives, does the minister approve of the action of its secretary in taking an active part in electioneering work while holding office?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was not aware that he did so. I suppose he has a right to exercise his franchise, even if he is a member of the association. We have nothing to do with appointing him or paying him. I do not control him in any way. Here are about twenty organizations without political predilections that I know of. They appoint Mr. Scott as their secretary. I do not know what we have to do with his political 10 p.m. activities, admitting that he does exercise these activities. I do not know that he does. He is responsible to these organizations who have appointed him and pay him, and if he has gone wrong they can call him to account.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is there any renovated butter being manufactured in Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not that I know of.

Mr. TOLMIE: What becomes of the rancid butter that is unfit to eat.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it is shipped to the Old Country and the United States.

Mr. TOLMIE: For renovating purposes?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is more a blending process, melting it down. In the United States I think it is renovated as well.

Mr. TOLMIE: And what is the average yield of the dairy cow in Canada.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About four thousand pounds.

Mr. TOLMIE: What improvement have they made in the last three or four years?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is very hard to tell. I think it is by a generous computation that we credit them with four thousand pounds. I had an estimate of the general increase and I think it was about 10 per cent. I question very much whether it is over four thousand yet. As a matter of fact a great deal of it must have been below four thousand to make the average an even four thousand. It is improving a little bit.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is cow testing still being carried on?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, under the Live Stock Act.

Mr. TOLMIE: In view of the great importance of increasing the average yield of the cows of the country, with a view to cheapening the cost of production of dairy products, what steps is the department taking at the present time to improve the quality of our cattle?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that is really provincial work. In some of the provinces they have been engaged at it for some years, —Saskatchewan, for instance. Where the other provinces will not take it up we deal with it. Apparently some of the provinces are not alive to the importance of it. My hon. friend has struck the weak spot in our dairy industry—the low product per cow. It is astonishing how many boarders are kept in our herds. The matter should be taken up by the provinces. Some of the provinces, to their credit, have taken it up, and others are gradually taking it up and where they do not take it up we handle it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would the minister be consistent, fix the standard of production for the cow and appoint inspectors to go round and see that the standard is lived up to? The minister has pointed out that these dairymen's associations appoint the members of the dairy council. The minister knows very well that the dairymen's associations are not really dairymen. They are the dealers who are engaged in purchasing and handling dairy products. As far as Ontario is concerned I think that is the case.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the hon. member is wrong.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In the dairymen's associations I think you will find the majority are engaged in that business, and they are anxious that this grading should take place, just as the packing house people are anxious that the department should undertake the grading of their hogs. This is well known. There is no more excuse for the government stepping in and grading the hogs that are sold on the market than there is for grading anything else. The packing houses should purchase the hogs according to the grade, just as they do beef animals, and it is just as reasonable to fix a standard for beef animals and compel them to be graded as it is to grade hogs. The packers could do this work, and they have no one to blame but themselves if the standard of pork in this country is not as high as it should be. They could pay the price the hog was worth, just the same as they could in the case of a beef animal, and yet the department are not grading these animals. They are not grading the butter which comes into this country, but they are grading the eggs that are laid, and there is no possibility of adulterating an egg. It is in a case which defies anyone to put any mixture into it. It is simply a matter of sizes and quality. It is one of the simplest questions that could possibly be dealt with, and I question if those who are purchasing eggs for use in their homes know a small egg when they see it. If the minister wanted to do something that would satisfy the full demands of the public, he would compel people to sell eggs according to their weight. But to appoint an army of graders and put them loose on the country and disturb conditions by the threatening attitude they are assuming to-day will do much to discredit the egg business in the country, and if it continues I question whether the government will not be forced to drop the system which they have adopted. They have people going round through the country at this time threatening that if the eggs are not sold according to grade the producers are going to be prosecuted immediately. They are not going to tolerate it any longer. What is the result to-day? No. 1 eggs of the highest standard are being sold as No. 2, because in this way they can avoid the penalty, and consequently eggs that should sell for a higher price are being sold at a lower price. The consumer has to go and purchase the grade of eggs, and as a result is paying more than he should for those eggs. It is an unnecessarily aggravating restriction that I believe is going to do much to create dissatisfaction in this country. And this army of officials who have been turned loose on the country are the biggest menace we have. The people of the country are intelligent, and we have schools to educate them to do things as they should be done. But when it comes to the National Dairy Council, I believe that a more useless body does not exist in the country, notwithstanding what others may say to the contrary. I believe I know what I am talking about when I make that statement. Now, it is only a short time ago since the minister altered the standard with regard to hog grading, raising the maximum weight by 10 pounds; and after the people had been compelled to accept a lower price during all that time it had been in effect the admission is made that it was all wrong. So that the people have had to suffer a loss at the hands of the department without being reimbursed. For the 10 pounds per hog they were forced to take a lower price. I put a question on the order paper last session to ascertain whether the department would reimburse them; for undoubtedly they have suffered at the hands of the department. The department admits that it was wrong so that the whole thing was merely an experiment, and now the minister is out with his egg-graders and is experimenting along this line. I am sure that this new experiment will work to the injury of both producer and consumer, because after eggs have passed through all these different processes of grading, entailing an additional expense, they will cost the consumer so much that he will be inclined to do with less of them. And if the producer is forced to sell his eggs as seconds to avoid anything of this kind he certainly will not receive as much as he formerly got for his produce.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would point out that we are discussing the dairy vote and I am afraid the hon. gentleman is off his eggs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I was making a comparison between the different systems which the minister is developing and which are all along the same line. There is a National Dairy Council, and that was the matter that was under discussion; and the minister apparently does not know where the money is going. In view of the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Thompson) that Mr. Scott, the secretary of the association, and the present organizer of the Liberal party, had both been in his constituency talking to the people there, and had both been getting their money out of the Department of Agriculture, voted by the people, I think the hon. member is justified in suspecting that some of the money will find its way into the pockets of some of those who have been stumping for the government. We have been deceived in this respect before and it is quite possible that the same thing can happen again. I remember one night questioning an item in the minister's estimates and it was allowed to go through without an explanation, the committee being misled. Afterwards the minister absolutely refused to go back to it; he thought it was very clever to have got the item through that way and he laughed about it. A similar item has not appeared in the estimates since.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know what the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I made it clear; I mentioned two names of men whom I had been discussing. One is now under discussion, the other having been discussed on that occasion.

Mr. GOULD: I was wondering if the minister would not concentrate on the Old Country market for butter. The British people are the greatest consumers of our exportable surplus of some 15,500,000 pounds. The minister might be living in Liverpool or in London and might secure to-day five pounds of Canadian butter bearing the Canadian brand with all the necessary qualifications. He would find this butter perfectly satisfactory, and going back to-morrow he would be unable to get more of it, simply because we could not export enough. The 15,000,000 pounds which we export to Great Britain will provide one-third of a pound per capita for the people of the Old Country, so that we are making a big noise about nothing. My contention is that we should concentrate on the British market which will prove of considerable importance to us as our exports increase. We are doing good business on the British market and I do not think we should make any special effort to invade other countries. When my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) was speaking of eggs he said that this article went through so many processes that the price was increased so that the purchaser was bound to use less and less of it. I would remind him of the fact that they will use still less owing to the tariff. When we seek to enter the German market or any other market for that matter where they compete successfully with us, the moment we produce an extra No. 1 quality the people of that particular country will treat us in the same way as the United States have treated us, by putting on a tariff against us. What benefit, therefore, shall we derive from developing that market? I argue for concentration on the British market; we get in free of duty, and our activities should be confined to that field.

Mr. THOMPSON: Is the Finch cheese and creamery factory run as a commercial proposition or for experimental purposes?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was started as a demonstration about twelve years ago to prove that a large factory with a large turnover could produce butter and cheese more cheaply than could a small factory. One would not think that this would require any demonstration but apparently it does, because 90 per cent of the factories are too small to afford the payment of good manufacturers. You do not, therefore, get the best results under such conditions. Having demonstrated that fact by statistics and results we feel that the work has been completed and have sold the building. We hope to take up similar work in Quebec later on.

Mr. LADNER: What were the results of the demonstration, in dollars and cents.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The patrons themselves would be better able to answer that question; the fact that we could not take care of the large numbers who wanted to take advantage of the facilities is sufficient proof of the success of the undertaking. The patrons of that dairy station were charged regular rates for manufacture. They received in premiums over and above the average price, as much as $18,000 in a year; and during the period of government operation they received over $100,000 in premiums just because the factory was equipped to make butter and cheese and sell milk or cream to the best market. A good deal of the product was sent either to Montreal or to the American market, according to where the greater advantage lay. The factory was able to show satisfactory results inasmuch as there was a large turnover. The supply of milk increased from 2,069,000 pounds in 1912, the first year of operation, to 11,500,000 pounds in 1924. This, I think, will show the popularity of the institution as well as demonstrate the fact that a large turnover makes for the reduction of overhead per pound. The revenue received from the Finch dairy station, together with the sale price, exceeds the total expenditure on the establishment. Thus the dairy branch has had the advantage of practical experience in operating a large factory at no cost to the government whatever, and the farmers in the locality have received over $100,000 more than they would have received had they continued to operate the two small factories which were combined to make the Finch dairy station. I think this work was started under one of my predecessors, the Hon. Martin Burrell, and I wish to compliment him on the outcome of the demonstration.

Mr. LADNER: Why did not the minister continue the good work if it was so profitable?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Because the demonstration has been completed. The present government of Ontario has taken the cue to some extent from the successful operation of that factory, and is bringing in legislation to consolidate the small factories and encourage the construction of larger factories. So I think our work was justified.

Mr. LADNER: Who bought that factory?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The business in the district is becoming almost entirely confined to the cream trade; therefore it is difficult to carry on work in connection with butter and cheese. The station had become so large and cumbersome, and the demonstration had been so successful that we could not make it more so. The patrons to-day are shipping their cream in large quantities to both the United States and the Montreal market, and the business to-day is a purely commercial proposition.

Mr. LADNER: Are the patrons deprived of the advantages which the government provided at the dairy station?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The patrons were in favour of selling the factory, and we gave them the first opportunity to buy it.

Mr. LADNER: Who bought it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Canadian Milk Products Company, at $25,000. We got back all our expenditure—made the experiment for nothing.

Mr. LADNER: What capital investment did the government make?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About $20,000. Additions were made to the station from time to time as the business grew.

Mr. LADNER: Was $20,000 the original capital?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it cost originally about $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Does this vote include any money expended upon the Finch dairy station?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Then the discussion is not in order.

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Chairman, my inquiry a short time ago with regard to the butter fat yield of cows in Canada was prompted by a question I asked a very prominent creamery man in a certain province during last summer. I was astounded to learn from him that the average yield of the cows supplying his creamery was only 90 pounds of butter fat during the year, indicating that he could hardly be carrying on dairying at a profit, and the absolute necessity of adopting such methods as would improve the quality of his cattle at the earliest possible date. Is the minister still continuing the policy of distributing pure bred dairy sires?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, we are.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is the minister doing anything in connection with advance registration work of pure bred dairy sires?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, we are working in co-operation with the provincial organizations. We had a conference at which we discussed the question of advance registration of breeding animals. I forget what stage it has reached, but I know the proposal was very popular among the breeders, and it was taken to be an absolute requisite that if a buyer was to get value for his money he must know the production of the animal and its strain. I understand that the different breed associations are now engaged in discussing the terms under which animals will be admitted to advance registration.

Mr. TOLMIE: You have not got the standard settled yet?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think not.

Mr. THOMPSON: What was the item last year in the estimates for the Finch dairy station, and is there an increased appropriation this year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No vote has ever appeared in the estimates for the Finch factory. It was simply a subheading under the general vote.

Mr. LADNER: I have before me the Auditor General's report in which there is an item for the Finch creamery of $15,096.06, with the details specified, then an item for refrigeration of cars, followed by the general item, making a total of $226,000. Compared with the estimates for this year the figures in the report are lower.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the hon. gentleman means that last year we had the cost of administering the Finch factory; this year we have not.

Mr. LADNER: Then the estimates should be that much lower this year, but they are not.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We hope for a little expansion in certain other activities. If we have the money we will probably start a similar institution somewhere in the province of Quebec, giving the same demonstration in that old province as we did in Ontario.

Mr. LADNER: I would suggest to the minister in all seriousness that there should be no further expansion of capital expenditure except where it is absolutely imperative. The country is burdened with taxation that is invidious in comparison with the taxation of other countries and is faced with railway deficits. Surely the minister and his colleagues understand the temper of the people. I should hardly think that in contemplation of an electoral campaign, which certain events seem to point to, the government would expect to receive popular approval of any expansion of capital expenditure. As a matter of fact the estimates do not disclose any serious effort on the part of the government to practise that rigid economy which the public and many hon. members believe should be practised in these very serious times, and I am surprised that the minister should speak of expansion of capital expenditure in such casual terms without offering any explanation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will speak when my hon. friend is through. We cannot both be standing up at the same time.

Mr. LADNER: We do not seem to be, either.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, and I do not intend that we shall be.

Mr. LADNER: The minister has plenty of chances to stand up. The trouble is that he does not speak to the point, but around it. I do not think we have had the information to which we are entitled. I have referred to the Auditor General's report and the decided increase involved in the estimates of this year. The minister says that is expansion, but what it covers the committee is at a loss to understand.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Now that my hon. friend has sat down I will stand up. Yes, it is quite explainable. If I understand my hon. friend aright, he thinks we should stand still and not expand.

Mr. LADNER: No:

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is that the idea, that we should not expand in any particular?

Mr. LADNER: I think expenditures should be cut down.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In dairying? I had not heard that note struck; on the contrary, I have had complaints from practical dairymen opposite me that we should extend our activities. I would like to meet all hands, but when two views are diametrically opposed I cannot meet both.

Mr. LADNER: I do not want the minister to misrepresent my statement.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has always been the intention of the department that when the Finch demonstration was over we would transfer those activities to another province and give them the same advantage. Possibly when we are through with Quebec we may, if necessary, go on to the Maritime provinces. This kind of thing is needed very badly, especially in the two older provinces where there are such a large number of small creameries and factories. As to the Finch factory, I have shown that we got back our $25,000 plus $100,000 to the patrons over and above what they would have got if we had not carried on this experiment. That looks to me like good business, and we might well continue the work.

Mr. LADNER: I wish to correct the minister when he throws out the inference that I suggested any standstill policy. The minister speaks of expansion, but he does not tell us what that expansion is to consist of.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have done that.

Mr. LADNER: I have not heard it yet, and I do not think other hon. members have. This discussion originated out of the minister's statement that a little margin was being provided for expansion, but we do not know what the expansion is to consist of.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I must be a very poor explainer. I said we hoped to establish a similar demonstration in the province of Quebec now that the work had been completed at Finch.

Mr. LADNER: Is provision made for that in these estimates?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. LADNER: What is the plan the minister has in mind?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: To repeat in another province the experiment we carried out in Finch.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. LADNER: Is the place selected?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. LADNER: What plans have been formulated?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We shall be able to proceed on the basis of our experience at Finch. We have not yet determined where the factory will be located. I suppose we will have to follow the precedent established in Ontario by starting where three or four factories already exist, and dispose of them in some way. There is no use in starting on that until we know whether we get the vote through.

Mr. LADNER: The province is selected, the nature of the factory is determined. What further plans has the government formulated?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The same as at Finch, except that we will build the factory all at once, not in pieces as we had to do before we knew what size would work to the best advantage.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has now given out information, after a long series of questions, that he might well have given at the outset.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have given it three or four times already.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has not given it three or four times, unless within the last five minutes, so far as the transfer of the creamery at Finch is concerned. I think I have followed the proceedings tonight pretty closely, and until the hon. member (Mr. Ladner) brought the matter up I was under the impression from the statement made by the minister a little while ago that this amount was being dropped out of the estimates. Now we are informed that it is the intention to open up the plant in another place. A few minutes ago I asked with regard to the cow testing and was informed that that came under the live stock branch. Last year some $24,500 was expended for this purpose, under the item we are now passing for dairying. The minister informs the committee now that this passes into another item of the estimates. Here is a reduction of nearly $25,000 for cow testing, and another, I do not know how much, in connection with the Finch creamery, which indicates that there has been an increase of between $30,000 and $40,000 in the estimates under this head for this year. The committee would like to know what this increase is for. The items are entirely different from what they were last year if $25,000 for cow testing is taken out and the amount for the Finch creamery is also taken out. Does the minister propose to make up this increase in government officials? Nearly one-third of the amount last year was for that purpose. If he will tell us what the increase is for he will save a lot of unnecessary discussion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend heard the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) and two or three others raise a point as to the advisability of making our grading system uniform. I explained that we had partly adopted the provincial system and that we hoped to make that uniform. Then we have the Bacteriological office, and the new station we contemplate establishing in the province of Quebec. That is what we have in view.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What will be the estimated cost of these three activities?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Seventy-five thousand dollars is about what it costs for the grading now. The factory similar to that at Finch will cost in the neighbourhood of $25,000 if the same kind of building is put up. Possibly by putting it up all at one time we will save enough to offset the increased cost of construction compared with that of twelve years ago. The cost of the Bacteriological office will be about $5,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister evidently is going to withdraw the last of the experimental farm stations from the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario in the past has been carrying on practically all of this work with the exception of the central farm here at Ottawa, which is for the whole Dominion, while the province of Quebec is simply dotted with experimental farm stations and demonstration farms, and now they are going to receive another one, for $25,000 of this item is to establish a school in the province of Quebec. I think it would only have been fair that the minister should have advised the committee of this when he introduced his estimates. He proposes to take this station out of the province of Ontario and put it over in the province of Quebec, where they have already lots of them, and which province is receiving ten times the amount, yes more than that, for experimental work that the province of Ontario has been receiving. The province of Ontario has been doing this work itself and paying for it out of its own provincial estimates, while the other provinces have been coming to the federal government and getting them to carry on this work for them. Now we learn that the province of Ontario is to be punished for something, and that somebody else is going to be rewarded for something, because I cannot see any other justification for it than that. The minister has not explained why this is being done.

With regard to cow testing, there was an item of $25,000 in the Auditor General's report last year which was paid out of this vote. The minister now quietly informs the committee that this is going to be placed under the Live Stock branch and will not come out of this item at all. Consequently there is $25,000 there. We are also given to understand that this item is to pay for a whole lot more graders than we have had in the past—government officials by the score, costing hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the minister says, "Oh, we have not got a chance to expand. Vote us more money, and we will appoint another army of officials, and that will make farming prosperous."

The minister admits to-night that the exports of butter from this country to the Old Land last year decreased by 75 per cent over the year before. Surely this is enough to condemn the system which is in evidence everywhere in this country at the present time. I would like to ask the minister what amount will be required for the payment of these additional graders to whom he has referred.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It just depends on whether we take the views of the hon. member for Glengarry and go ahead and grade all the butter, or whether we take the views of the hon. member for South Oxford and just chew the fat. It will cost about $15,000 altogether.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has a very clear idea as to what he intends to do when he comes before this House with his estimates. It all depends upon what the hon. member for so-and-so or somebody else thinks about it. He will take the views of this member and that, and strike a happy medium finally, but at the present time he is in the woods. He does not know where he is, or where he is going to land. This is a new way of bringing estimates before the House. I think the minister is almost unique in that respect, and if we are going to have all the estimates dealt with in this way, we are going to have a considerable lot of time taken up dealing with them. The minister is going to find out before he spends this money what are the views of so-and-so. Evidently he understands what are the views of the people of the province of Quebec with regard to the creamery which is now situated at Finch in Ontario. He thinks they are more entitled to it than the people of Ontario. Would the minister tell us whose views he is agreeing with when he does that? Is he agreeing with some hon. member of this House who has expressed the view that that should be done?

The minister knows perfectly well that the federal government are conducting practically all the experimental farm work in the province of Quebec; they have half a dozen experimental farms there, and a dozen demonstration farms maintained by the federal government, and I do not think there is a single one in the province of Ontario, with the exception of the one on the Transcontinental at Kapuskasing, and a small tobacco farm of forty acres at Harrow. That is the extent of the experimental work this government is doing in the province of Ontario. In spite of all the apparent discrimination against this province in the past, matters are now going to be worse because the station at Finch is to be transferred to the province of Quebec. The minister says that if he agrees with the hon. member for so-and-so he is going to spend some of this money for graders of some kind, and all the committee is supposed to do is vote this sum blindly, and let the minister do with it just as he pleases. That is practically the policy the minister is adopting on this the first item in his estimates. Why does not the minister frankly and straightforwardly inform the committee what he proposes to do with this money instead of our having to drag the information out of him as we have had to do to-night? At this late stage of the debate on this one item we are now informed what he intends to do with a part of it, but as to the other part he has not yet decided. All we are expected to do is to vote the money, and if he agrees with the hon. member from some place or other he will do so-and-so, and if not he will do something else. Surely that is no system upon which to base a request for this committee to pass an estimate. The minister should know what he proposes doing with this money if we vote it. It is not his money; it is not ours; it is the money of the people of this country; they will be taxed for it and have to pay it out of their pockets, and they are entitled to know what is going to be done with it.

Mr. TOLMIE: I would like to know what is the cost of transporting butter from Calgary by way of the Panama canal to Liverpool, and by way of Montreal to Liverpool; also the cost from New Zealand to Liverpool, and the cost from the Argentine Republic to Liverpool.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not the figures here. Some of the western butter goes by way of the Panama canal, and some by way of Montreal. It just depends on what kind of despatch they can get. Shippers by way of the Panama canal have had some difficulty owing to the butter contracting a fruity taste as a result of shipping it with oranges. I do not know whether that is going to deter the butter from going that way at all. A lot of shippers in Alberta I think prefer shipping by way of the Panama canal. That route attracts butter as far east as Regina sometimes. I do not think there is much difference in the rates. It depends on how long they can afford to wait. If the market is rising they do not like to ship by way of the Panama canal, and if they want to get to the market before it drops the butter will go by Montreal, because that route is quicker. We have not got the different freight rates here, but there is not very much difference.

Mr. LADNER: In the Auditor-General's report under the heading of Dairy, showing how the estimates of last year were spent, is an item "Extension of Markets." Is provision made for extension of markets this year, and if so how much?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may say, in connection with the extension of markets estimate in case it should be thought we are seeking for markets in Europe and scattering our activities to an unnecessary degree, the expenditure is largely devoted to securing market quotations and sending them round to the farmers and the various dairy organizations and creameries, so as to keep them posted in regard to the actual condition of the market. Then we will be able to know exactly what they are getting—whether they are getting the market price or not.

Mr. LADNER: The minister again misses the point; that was not my question. If I may submit, my question was not about scattering activities around. My question was whether provision is made in these estimates for the extension of markets as found in the expenditures of last year amounting to $28,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am having it looked up.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the minister assure the committee that the expenditure for cow testing is being taken out of this item?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LADNER: No, Mr. Chairman, we must have an answer.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think we have in the departmental accounts subdivisions to correspond with those which appear in the Auditor General's report, but the services are the same. Sometimes they change these heads and subheads from what they are in our own report. I find here "cargo inspection". That means at Montreal, or wherever the products are shipped from, and on the other side on arrival, just to look after the difficulties occasioned by storage in proximity to something that is objectionable; to see that the product is packed tightly and not shaken around in transit as it would be if not packed properly. Now let me give some details:

	Salaries
	1925-26	1924-25
Five cargo inspectors	$ 7,675	$ 7,675
One cargo inspector at Halifax.	2,047	2,047
Five cargo inspectors in the United Kingdom..	10,235	10,235

That deals with the report on the condition of the wares when they arrive there. That is how we got the information about the condition of the cheese boxes when they arrived in England. Sometimes the information comes from our cargo inspectors, and sometimes from visitors who happen to be around the docks at the time of the arrival:

	1925-26	1924-25
Incidentals..	$500	$ 500
Repairs to thermographs..	296	296
Travelling expenses to St. John and Portland..	800	1,000

Then it is carried forward $25,434:

Investigator for weighing of butter and cheese	$1,800	$1,785
Travelling expenses..	900	900
Dairy market reports..	1,800	1,740
Travelling expenses..	347	347
Telegrams..	600	600
Cables..	113	528

Quite frequently we get cables as well as telegrams in order to keep up the requirements for information in the interest of those who have goods to sell. Formerly our dairymen were largely in the dark, or else they were put to considerable expense individually to get this information. We get it at the cost of one message. Then it is sometimes distributed either by telephone or telegram. I think in some instances it is done by radio. I saw one message that Dr. Ruddick sent over the radio.

Mr. LADNER: That is not the information I was asking for. There is an item in the Auditor General's report for last year which is:

Salaries and expenses of officials. $28,009.19.

The items which the minister was reading are the items under an entirely different paragraph known as "general expenses," and in the Auditor General's report a detailed list of expenditures appears. Does not the department follow a somewhat similar principle in arranging their estimates so that comparisons can be made between this year and last year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These are the same services.

Mr. LADNER: What do they amount to?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Under the headings I have just read out, $59,090. The items are not necessarily identical with those in the Auditor General's report. I should not like to take the responsibility for the entries in that report because items are sometimes consolidated or the statement abbreviated for the sake of convenience and a general statement made covering the whole of the items I have just read.

Mr. LADNER: There is quite a difference between $59,000 and $28,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it is likely that one of those amounts covers a larger field of activity. Are there any refrigerator activities included in the item about which my hon. friend is asking? Exclusive of refrigerator activities the amount is $30,990. I was including the refrigerator car service, and the icing of butter cars. The creamery cold storage bonus is also included in this item, so that I was including more under that heading than should have been included. Concluding with the salary of one market report inspector and travelling expenses, telegrams and cables, the item stands at $30,990.

Mr. LADNER: If the item of $42,000 is deducted—

The CHAIRMAN: That is not in this vote, the minister says.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Chairman, I am making a comparison between the estimates of last year and those of this year, and I think it is perfectly in order to refer to these items. I say if the deduction is made of $42,000 and of $15,000 you have a total reduction of $57,000. So that this year's estimate should actually be $57,000 less than last year, or else there are expansions which, with the exception of the one we have already discovered, have not been disclosed. I would ask the minister if there are any other expansions beyond the one he has disclosed which is to be made in the province of Quebec.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My figuring is that we have just about enough money to take care of the expansions that I have already enumerated. The vote will merely see us through and there will be nothing over for that purpose this year.

Mr. LADNER: The question I asked was: Are there any other expansions?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, we have no more. I think my hon. friend's estimate of the amount is not quite correct. Our first estimate was $24,000.

Mr. LADNER: I beg to correct the minister on that. The actual expenditure out of last year's estimate acording to the Auditor General's report for cow testing was $41,915.14 —and if you add that—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that was the year before.

Mr. LADNER: Certainly, that is exactly the point—the year before. The estimates of the year before and this year are exactly identical, $230,000. The minister informs the committee that the cow-testing appropriation is not included this year, that it is to be added to some other item; so that really this item has increased this year from $230,000 to $271,000, and if you take the Finch creamery which formed part of the $230,000 of last year, and add this year, you have your estimates increased from $230,000 to $287,000. That is what it comes down to. My point is this: if $28,000 is disclosed in the expenditure for the new factory in Quebec, what does the other expenditure consist of, or is there some other expenditure?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I cannot follow the hon. gentleman's figuring, but I know we will use all this money before the end of the fiscal year in the activities I have mentioned, in connection with the Finch factory and other services. We did not do any cow testing last year under the dairy vote, so that my hon. friend's computation in regard to the $41,000 is quite wrong. There was nothing spent under this same vote of last year.

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister deny the authenticity of the Auditor General's report?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is two years ago.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, it was 1924.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know what the hon. member has before him. I know what I have here. There was no cow testing under this vote.

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. LADNER: What I want to know is whether, apart from this one expansion we have heard about, you will give us your word there is no other expansion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have mentioned the three expansions; the bac-
11 p.m. teriological office here, the establishment of a new dairy station, and the additional graders.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How much was paid out last year for bonuses to creameries.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You mean bonuses to cold storages. There is a small bonus of $100 for the purpose of putting in creamery cold storages. I think the maximum is $100. The amount paid in 1924-25 was $2,700, for the purpose of supplying ice cold storage for temporary purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Could you inform the committee how much was paid out the year before?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not got it just now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Where were the creameries located which received the bonuses last year? I do not mean the individuals but the number in each province which received the bonus.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was $2,700 provided. That would be $100 apiece for 27 creameries. They are distributed all over the country. If my hon. friend wants the exact location we will be able to get it for him. We have not got it now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It appears to me the minister is asking us to blindly vote a lot of this money without very much information. Now taking the last report available, the Auditor General's statement for the year ending March 31, 1924, I find $8,000 paid out in bonuses, and with the exception of $100 paid in Alberta, it was all paid in one province. This was the province of Quebec; and yet the minister is going to transfer the station from the province of Ontario and place it in the province of Quebec. Why does he not present to the committee a detailed statement as to what he intends to use this money for? Would it not be more satisfactory to inform the committee why he requires the money, instead of putting it under the head of dairying? We would know how much of it was going for the payment of officials, what they were supposed to be doing, and how much would be paid for bonuses and anything of that nature. As it is there is just a blank note of so many hundred thousand dollars under the head of dairying and that is a very misleading word when it covers such a wide range of expenditures. We have $5,000 for bringing the members of the National Dairy Council here to Ottawa, several hundred dollars for entertaining them and expenses of this kind, and the minister says, "Oh, but we must expand." The appointment of officials apparently is his idea of expansion. If the minister would undertake to present a detailed statement before the committee as to what amount was intended for each branch of the department under the head of dairying it would facilitate matters very much, and I would suggest that the committee rise and that the minister present us with a report of that nature when the matter comes before the House again.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The applicants for this bonus receive it when they comply with the conditions under which it is given. When the construction of a cold storage is made according to the specification the bonus of $100 is paid. A large number applied this year and some were held over because we were afraid our vote would be exhausted before the end of the year, but none of those who comply with the conditions are refused. Rather than run short of money eight or nine applications have been held over. They are the ones we naturally expect to give the bonus to next year. We expect there will be thirty-five in all, and that will clear up all the applications. No one is refused so long as he complies with the conditions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is quite clear the minister had an estimate and he was afraid his estimate would be exhausted. Why not let the committee know what the estimate is? After he strikes an estimate as to what is required for these different branches under the head of dairying, why not inform the committee what the estimate is? It is apparent from the minister's last statement that he was afraid last year his estimate would be exceeded. The committee was not informed as to what the amount of that estimate was. Why should a committee of this House not know what the minister proposes to do with the money?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the hon. gentleman has gone far enough in trying to make a case out of nothing. I have already indicated that $2,700 was spent last year on 27 of these cold storages and that we held over eight or nine applications. Either I have lost the faculty of explaining or my hon. friend has lost the faculty of understanding, because I have gone over the matter several times. The hon. gentleman seems to be magnifying things and is raising his voice simply to leave the impression that something is being withheld. There is no desire whatever to do anything of the kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It seems difficult to understand what the minister means. It is quite evident that he has had an estimate for this work and was afraid it would be exceeded. What was his estimate for last year? He has told us the amount that was paid out and he says that nine or ten applications were held over. And the year before $8,000 was paid out. What was his estimate the year before? Why not present a detailed statement giving all the facts so that we may know where we are? It is only fair that this information should be supplied.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not understand what the hon. member wants. We are discussing an estimate of $3,500 for 35 creameries at $100 each.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why could the minister not give that information before?

Mr. GRAHAM: He did half a dozen times.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why should we have to extort the information in this way?

Mr. GRAHAM: Since I came into the House seven minutes ago the minister has made the same explanation three times.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I venture to say this matter has not been before the committee more than five minutes. According to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) himself, it is only seven minutes ago since the matter was brought up.

Item agreed to.

Cold Storage Warehouses, $30,000.

Mr. WOODS: This is a small item for the cold storage facilities of this country. The organized farmers of Ontario at least are developing a co-operative market and a pooling system, and in order to carry out the enterprise successfully it is necessary to have adequate cold storage facilities. There are certain seasons of the year when there is over-production in butter and eggs and so forth, including fruit as well, and there are other seasons when there is a light production, not enough to satisfy the demand. At these times there is a scarcity, with the result that prices increase. In overcoming the difficulty cold storage facilities would prove of considerable advantage, and it would help to some extent to relieve the situation to which the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has referred, namely, the importation of eggs and butter of an inferior quality at certain periods of the year. If we had suitable cold storage facilities to take care of our products and enable us to put them on the market as the demand occurred it would help the situation remarkably, and would level up not only prices during the whole year round, but the quality of the produce as well; that is to say, there would be a uniform quality. I believe it would be wise for the minister to go into the cold storage question more fully. While we are anxious to cut down expenses so far as we possibly can, there are many other items which in my opinion might better stand a reduction, with more beneficial results. But certainly we should encourage the establishment of cold storage facilities in the country.

Mr. SPENCE: Is it proposed this year to encourage the establishment of more cold storages by a system of bonusing up to a certain percentage, as in the past? Further, is it intended to retain the Montreal cold storage?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Montreal cold storage is under the harbour board. With regard to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Woods), this is a small amount it is true, and during recent months applications have been more numerous than they were last year. But we hope to get along with this provision. The whole subsidy is not paid on any one plant in any year; it is distributed over four payments. We are now paying on the Sydney plant which was under construction four or five years ago in the town of Sydney. We are taking that over for the first time this year. There is also a small plant in Prince Edward Island and another in Quebec city, besides the one in Montreal. The two latter are co-operative activities; the one in Sydney is general. I should like to see a larger amount in the estimate, but I think we can get along with this vote by satisfying the needs of those places where assistance is most urgently required. So far as I know we have not turned down any applications, although in some places we considered the existing cold storages facilities adequate for local requirements, where the expenditure would not be justified. The applications have been increasing rapidly in the last few months, and unless we turn down some worthy ones I anticipate having to ask for more assistance another year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is nobody to-night going to point to this estimate as providing instruments of oppression of the masses? It is not very many years since this cold storage vote was denounced as only providing means for rich profiteers to withhold the food of the people from consumption. I do not hear any voices along that line now. Has there been any change of policy in connection with cold storage warehouses ?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. We tried to make a change but we could not get the bill through the upper chamber.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the change?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We were trying to confine cold storage to co-operative activities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister observed that cold storage warehouses are used as engines of oppression and profiteering?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They have been charged with that, but I have not taken a great deal of stock in the charge. The cold storage activities I had in mind were those of men who were co-operating and giving service to their own members.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surely the minister would not ask us to vote money to help him oppress the consuming masses!

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think my right hon. friend takes much stock in that charge himself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never did. I was not guilty; I am calling it to the attention of those who were. The minister has not noticed that cold storage warehouses were used for that purpose at all?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think there was a great deal of exaggeration, and a great deal of wrong was done to those services by the charge he has referred to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So do I.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not heard very often to-day, due to the fact that the people begin to understand the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the minister did not take part in that denunciation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And I hope his remarks now will silence those who did.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Thank you.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 49—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are we going to sit here all night?

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Wednesday, February 18, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the report of the special committee appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed the lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this House during the present session, presented on the 17th instant, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to, and committees appointed as follows:

DOMINION NOTE CIRCULATION

Mr. SPENCER:

1. During each of the years 1923 and 1924, what was the average amount of (a) Dominion notes, and (b) bank notes, in circulation?

2. Of the Dominion notes what was the average amount of each denomination in circulation?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. (a) The monthly average of Dominion notes in circulation in 1923 was $240,862,014.40, in 1924, $226,002,627.55.

(b) The monthly average of bank notes in circulation in 1923 was $170,420,792, in 1924, $166,136,764.

2. The average amount of each denomination of Dominion notes in circulation:

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

AMERICAN BRANCH FACTORIES IN CANADA

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Chamber of Commerce at Petrolia, Ontario, and the Department of Trade and Commerce, with regard to American branch factories in Canada.

SINGAPORE MILITARY BASE

On the motion of Mr. Prevost:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and that of Great Britain or other self governing dominion in connection with a military base at Singapore.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Since the return laid on the table of this House on May 6, 1924, there has been no correspondence on this subject that I am aware of. There may be confidential memoranda which have come from the British government, but these, I assume, the British government would not wish to have disclosed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF MAKING AMENDMENTS

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, in the following words:—

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the ( ) House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to give your consent to submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, in the manner following, or to the following effect:—

"An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

"Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of same as follows:

"1. This Act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1925.

"2. The parliament of the Dominion may amend the said British North America Act when it may see fit to do so, but it is not empowered to pass any amendment affecting the rights guaranteed in said act to minorities.

"3. The proposed law for the alteration of the said act must be passed by an absolute majority of each house of parliament."

All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the debate on the Address I took occasion to deal with a matter in which I think Canada has a vital interest, concerning, as it does, the constitution of this country and the rights of the people and parliament. My reason for directing the attention of the House to the subject was the judgment which had been delivered a few days previously by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, in connection with the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. The constitutionality of that act was questioned before that committee and the act was declared by the committee to be ultra vires of the powers of the Dominion parliament. That seemed to me an invasion of what I regard as the rights of Canada; or, if it was not an invasion of those rights, it was at least of such a character as to make us realize that the time has arrived when we in this parliament should go into the question of our constitution and the question of our rights and determine whether we should longer remain subject to the decision of a court in the creation of which we had no voice.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is a body of the highest legal standing. We all respect it; we have no objection to its findings; I believe its finding in this case was right in law. But to my mind such decisions are not in the interests of the development of this country in a constitutional way. I am confident that this parliament has only to ask that some kind of relief be afforded and the request will be granted, thus placing the interpretation of the constitution of Canada within our own country rather than outside of it.

Now, the only constitution we have for Canada is the document which I hold in my hand, the British North America Act. This copy is the official copy printed by parliament —I got it from the Senate—of "The British North America Acts, 1867-1907," and I contend that any change in or improvement of the constitution of Canada must be by way of amendment to these acts, and that the place to make those amendments is in this parliament. I go further and say that it is the duty of this parliament to cause that constitution to be amended so that the same rights may be conceded to us as have been granted by the Imperial parliament to Australia, in large measure to South Africa, and finally to Ireland. If you examine these constitutions which have been created since the passing of these British North America Acts you will find that they widen as they go down. I was surprised to find upon investigation that in the case of the Irish Free State, the last one created, the constitution is wider than any of the others and there is the least interference. A little later I will deal with that matter more specifically and perhaps throw a little light upon it.

I am not a lawyer; I am only a lay member of this House, but I have watched the proceedings of the House and the sentiment of the people throughout the country and I can see that there is a growing feeling in the minds of the people that the time has come when we ought to have what Australia has, what South Africa has, what the Free State of south Ireland has—the right to make our own constitution; to amend it and to have it interpreted in our own courts. We shall then be in a position in this parliament and in the provincial parliaments to adjust the law so as to suit the interpretation made by our own courts.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend has said that the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act case was correct. Supposing we had followed the decision of the Ontario court in that case, which was absolutely to the contrary effect, we would then not have had right law in this country.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): That may be so. I want to stop this conflict of jurisdiction; I want a real settlement for the constitution of this country. After fifty-seven years' experience with the British North America Act, I think it is time that the Canadian people had what the British parliament has, what South Africa has, and most of all what Australia has, the right to make our own constitution and amend it, and have it interpreted by our own courts, and to have the final decision with them.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: May I ask the hon. member if the constitution of Australia or South Africa is, like the British North America Act, the result of a contract between different provinces?

Mr. MACLEAN: (York): They are all cases of federations, except Ireland, and we know something about federations in this country; we have had experience with a federation. Our great neighbour to the south of us, the United States, is also a federation, and my contention is that the construction of such constitutions can be accomplished better in the country that is a federation than in the Mother Country. That being the case, I think I shall be able to show a little later on why we should be granted this relief.

I have approached the question in my amendment in the fairest possible way. I have observed the regular method of procedure. The amendment has respect in every word of it for His Majesty the King and for the Imperial parliament, and most of all it conserves and protects the rights of minorities guaranteed by our constitution. So I think it is a very reasonable amendment. What I propose is:

"An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

"Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of same as follows:

"1. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1925.

"2. The parliament of the Dominion may amend the said British North America Act when it may see fit to do so, but it is not empowered to pass any amendment affecting the rights guaranteed in said act to minorities.

"3. The proposed law for the alteration of the said act must be passed by an absolute majority of each house of parliament."

All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration.

Mr. FORKE: What does the hon. member mean by an absolute majority?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I will come to that in a moment. I have put that in a very simple way. I maintain that no one is so competent to deal with the federation as we Canadians are, and as the other countries are that are united in a system of federation. While I have every respect for the Old Country and for the judges of the Old Country, they have not quite the experience that we have of the system of federation for the government of a country. It is true they have had a good deal to do with federations since they have been established here and in the other dominions, but they have not got to deal with these questions that are vital to us and that are coming up every day. There is a dispute now between the federal and provincial powers in this country, as there is in Australia, and the same is the case in the United States. The result in the United States is that they have created one of the greatest courts in the world for the interpretation of federation law. Theirs is a federation; so is ours, so is Australia's so is South Africa's, and so will be others, for others are to come. As I said, the United States has had wide experience. We are getting wide experience, and the British parliament has not had that experience with federations so far that would qualify it to be the final interpreter of their constitutions. The British parliament is concerned with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It is concerned with one great island, England, Scotland and Wales, and with a small portion of the north of Ireland. That great island is governed by a parliament which has absolute power. There is no parliament in the world that has the absolute, full and free power that the parliament of Great Britain has. As I pointed out to this House the other day, they can by a single act change the succession to the crown, repeal Magna Charta, and disestablish the English Church; they can do all that by one single act of parliament. We have a different arrangement here. We are not as free as they are. We are more or less governed by this system of federation. We have a federation and we cannot get away from it, and so we must have a constitution applying to a federation. We must have it interpreted in Canada, and I believe that our Supreme court is fitted to become the final authority to decide cases in dispute as between the federal and provincial powers.

Just to show what the difference is between the two systems, and what has taken place, what concessions have been made to the other dominions, I am going to read from the latest deliverance that has been made on this matter. I have here The Constitution, Administration and Laws of the Empire by A. Berriedale Keith, D.C.L., of the Inner Temple, barrister-at-law, and of the Scottish bar, Regius Professor of Sanskrit and Comparative Philology at the university of Edinburgh, formerly of the Colonial Office, author of Responsible Government in the Dominions, and so forth. Professor Keith is the latest authority on this question, and his book, which I now have in my hand, is dated one year ago to-day less two days. This book was published in London just about one year ago to-day, and it is the latest deliverance on the subject. I am going to read a short extract which helps a lot to clear the situation. On page 22 of this book, in dealing with colonial legislatures, he says:

The existing restrictions on constitutional change differ greatly in various parts of the Empire. In Canada the provinces enjoy freedom in great measure, but only within the limited sphere of their own powers under the British North America Act; they cannot alter the division of powers between them and the Dominion, nor can they affect the office of Lieutenant-Governor as the executive link between them and the Dominion. The Dominion, on the other hand, has extremely limited powers, because the federation was a compact between the provinces, and it is held to be illegitimate for the federal parliament to change the terms of that compact, unless with general assent from the provinces. Imperial acts were therefore necessary in 1907 to alter the amounts of the provincial subsidies, in 1915 to readjust the representation of the provinces in the Senate, and in 1916 to extend the duration of parliament by a year. The desire of the Dominion to obtain wider constituent powers is natural but no agreement on the subject exists with the provinces, as Quebec fears that any change might lessen the security for the equal treatment of the French language in federal proceedings, and the position of the Roman Catholic Church.

Next he deals with Australia:

The Commonwealth of Australia has the widest constituent powers, to be exercised by absolute majorities in both houses of parliament, approved by a referendum of the electors—

There is where the leader of the Progressive party gets his answer. There must be an absolute majority of both the houses in Australia to effect the changes in the constitution.

Mr. MARTELL: Is not that provided for in the Australian constitution?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Yes, I know, but let me finish the quotation:

—but one house may secure at the discretion of the Governor General a referendum by passing a bill for a change twice, an interval of three months intervening. There arises, however, the question whether any change abandoning the federal character of the constitution is possible; the answer would seem to be in the negative. The States have full powers of constitutional change, but within the limits of the federal constitution; bills effecting important alterations or dealing with the governor's salary must be reserved unless approved in advance by the Imperial government. Efforts to effect by referendum great changes in the relation of the states and the Commonwealth have so far been defeated at the polls, and the question of a revision of the constitution which would probably involve Imperial legislation, is still unsolved.

Now I come to New Zealand, and I have got very little more to read:

New Zealand originally had somewhat limited powers of constitutional change, but it is probable that since the act of 1865 she has practically full authority in this regard, though any important constitutional change would probably be effected by a bill reserved for the signification of the royal assent. The same position applies to Newfoundland where the constitution rests on the prerogative. In the Union of South Africa changes affecting the numbers and distribution of seats in the lower house, the native franchise in the Cape province, and the equality of the Dutch and English languages can be brought about only by a two-thirds majority of both houses at a joint sitting, and the same rule applies to any proposal to vary this requirement. Moreover, any bill affecting the constitution or powers of the provincial councils, or the provisions regarding the lower house must be reserved. In Malta power of alteration, by two-thirds majorities of the total members of either house, is limited to matters not affecting the subjects of legislative power, religious toleration, the rules regarding official languages, and the civil list, and in the case of India under the provisional constitution power of change in any essentials is reserved to parliament.

India is altogether different from Canada I hope. Now I come to legislation in the crown colonies:

The legislatures in the crown colonies and protectorates have as a rule no constituent powers, but those of the colonies with representative legislatures have full legal powers of alteration. In the Irish Free State the power of alteration is limited only by the necessity of not violating the treaty of December 6, 1921, and by the requirement that after eight years from December 6, 1922, changes must be approved by referendum.

There is a short and succinct history of the way in which the constitutions are provided with their amendments in the various acts which have passed the British parliament. Canada, which was the first to be created, is limited ever so much more than the other later dominions, and yet we by reason of our fifty-seven years of experience, by reason of our contribution in the war—of men, of money and other things—are at least entitled to the same equality of privilege in the matter of amending our constitution as these other states enjoy. And that is not all. We entered upon this undertaking long before many of the other dominions. Long ago we achieved responsible government in this country, but it was obtained by a battle, and we have been recognized as an equal state by certain declarations that have been made in England. We have been given a position on the League of Nations, and we have been recognized in other directions. The Parliament of Canada has achieved another thing. Canada has achieved the right to negotiate a treaty and to sign it through a Canadian minister and we are making headway in various other ways. You can go through the correspondence which has taken place between the Mother Country and Canada, and you see a gradual widening out not so much in the direction of independence as in the recognition of the fact that the more freedom is given to Canada the stronger she will be in domestic affairs and the broader and stronger will be the union between the daughter state and the Mother Country. That is my contention. I am asking only that Canada be given what these other countries possess, and we can get it in a moment; all we have to do is ask for it. Some of my friends will say "Why should we ask for it?" Because the sentiment is growing, and England sees more and more that the way to be strong in the estimation of the dominions, including Canada, is to give them every freedom in the management of their own affairs. This right will be given to us if we ask for it. For the present condition of affairs I blame our own parliament and our own governments past and present. They are to be blamed because they have not asked for this right. I am just as certain as that I am standing here that we have only to ask in the way I have indicated and the right will be conceded. Was any objection made when Canada asserted the right to sign her own treaty? No, there was no objection there, it was rather welcomed and, as I have said, this parliament is to blame because we have not been given full power to make our own constitution.

Now I have come to my real argument and it is this: Is Canada a sovereign state? Are we a nation? If we have not the right to make our own constitution and to make our own courts the final interpreter of it, ought we not to have the right when a legal decision is needed to have it made here in Canada by a court which is the creation of this Dominion? Canada creates her own courts, and why should she not be given the jurisdiction to settle these constitutional questions? I think the time has arrived when she should have this right, and I think the people of this country are of the same opinion. Some persons have said to me, "Oh Mr. Maclean, when you spoke in the House the other day you talked of the judicial committee having shot holes in the constitution of Canada. Are you not shooting holes in the British constitution?" I say no. The whole history of British connection is one of the development of progressive government, of the increase of the liberties of the people concerned, and it must be admitted that in that way greater union is secured. Now, I am not the only offender in this matter. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has a very strong notice of motion on the order paper in regard to Canada's independence in the matter of fiscal and tariff policy. I know that I am going to have the support of the right hon. gentleman in this matter because I am only trying to do in regard to it what he is trying to do with respect to our fiscal policy He is following the late Sir John A. Macdonald. John A. achieved a good deal. He is responsible for the National Policy in this country; and if we achieved a national policy in regard to the tariff God knows it is time to achieve it in regard to the constitution of the country so as to render our courts supreme in matters of law.

I could go on and speak at length on this question but I do not intend to do so. This is a short sitting and I should like to see some definite pronouncement made from authoritative quarters. But, I hope the House will adopt this proposal. There may be an objection to it, and I am waiting to hear that objection. I am especially waiting to hear from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to whether they are prepared to ask for relief in this matter. I do not wish to sidestep the issue, and I am not prepared to say whether there ought to be a consultation between the provinces and the Dominion, although that is set out in Professor Keith's book; but the point is that if we unite on this matter we will get relief. All you have to do is to ask the British government to-day to adopt what I have in substance embodied in my resolution. It is a simple proposal and will not be denied. I believe that if we pass the resolution this session we will obtain relief before the end of the year and then Canada will be in a position to undertake what is her right to undertake, which is the natural outcome of our progress; to make her own constitution, and to interpret it in her own country via the Supreme court, which is composed of responsible Canadians.

I have not a word to say in regard to the constitution of the Privy Council. People say it is a good thing that we can go there, and I give the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council credit for having time after time saved the country in the interpretation of the constitution from mistakes of her own parliament and legislature, but we are not always to be in the position of minors. After 57 years of experience under the British North America Act the statement is made, "Oh you are minors, you are colonials." Have we not advanced beyond the state of being minors or mere colonials? Has that state of affairs not ceased? Or when is it to cease? Are we not of age? In the old days we relied on the fathers of the constitution. They are all gone. We must take care of ourselves and work out our own salvation and our own autonomy exactly on the lines I have suggested to-day; but the matter has to be dealt with and considered in some way. I hope that never again will we be in the position that the interpretation of the British North America Act must be made by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I think now is the time to end that state of affairs, and I say that with all respect to the judicial committee and to the Mother Country. It has given greater rights to the other dominions. They are prepared to give the same rights to the Canadian people, and especially to these Canadian people who have the record that we have as a free state and as a great ally of the Mother Country. They are prepared to give it to us if we ask for it. Objections of one kind and another can be raised, and they are worthy of consideration, but the broad question is now up before this House and the other chamber.

I am appealing most of all to the right hon. leader of the opposition in regard to these matters, and perhaps he will be able to let the members of another honourable House see that they should join the House in the proposal as I have set it out; and if he does so it will be easy to get ahead and make some improvement. I absolutely dissent from the statement that has been made in this House, in the country and in another place, that in some way Canada is still in a state of tutelage, and that we are minors and that we have the right to go to the foot of the throne as the Indian has the right. We are not Indians. We are full-blooded Canadians, and a hundred per cent Canadians, as I said the other day, and if this Canadian parliament in this year 1925 is not fit to make its own constitution, and if its courts are not fit to interpret that constitution, when will we be in such a position? Does the leader of the House, a Canadian, hold that view? Does the Minister of Justice hold that view? Are his colleagues of that view? Are hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and are our friends from the west of that view?

I should like to talk about some reports that have been mentioned in the press in regard to constitutional changes in this country, but I respect the question that I have submitted to the House too much to deal with these reports in any way. I may have occasion at the close of this debate to say a few words on the objections that may be urged against my proposition, and when I speak about objections being urged against it I wish to say to my fellow countrymen that I am a Canadian and I have tried to protect all rights as set out in the original act. I have not made a single suggestion to repeal in any way anything which is calculated to protect the rights of the minority under this act. I think I will have support in this matter, because a lot of other questions will come up. The constitution must be broadened. New alliances and new formations will take place, and I repeat that the only way to settle the constitution is to make this act the basis of it. You cannot go outside and create new acts, but it must all be embodied in this one act. You can expand it, and in expanding it you must protect the rights within that constitution. It must follow, as daylight follows darkness, and be based on this act. The whole question before us now is this act and how we can amend it so as to make self-government more complete in Canada, and therefore make this a better country in which to live, and to work out the destiny which is in store for us. There may be still a great federation for us in the future in connection with the British Empire. I am not going into that. That would be based on federal ideas. But as we are now a federated nation and have federal laws and are living under those laws, nobody is so competent to deal with this question as ourselves. That being so I leave the motion with the House.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Mr. CARROLL: Paragraph 2 of my hon. friend's motion proposes an amendment of the act and reads:

> 2. The parliament of the Dominion may amend the said British North America Act when it may see fit to do so, but it is not empowered to pass any amendment affecting the rights guaranteed in said act to minorities.

The hon. member has only made reference to some assumed or alleged guarantee to the province of Quebec. Has he in view any other guarantees to minorities in provinces outside Quebec?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I absolutely apply it to every guarantee in this act, and I believe that is the feeling of every member of this House. Whatever rights are guaranteed in this act ought to be carried out to the letter, and that is my contention. I have heard of some rights which Nova Scotia has. One of the rights of Nova Scotia—although I do not see how it can be carried out in law, as far as the constitution is concerned—is that there is an arrangement between the local politicians as to the alteration of appointments to the Senate. I do not know whether that is so or not, and I cannot say what parliament will do with it. But in so far as any rights of minorities are guaranteed in this act, my motion is absolutely for the preservation of those rights in any measure to take over the administration of the constitution, by both houses of parliament.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker, the prime motive power actuating the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) in bringing forward this resolution seems to be a decision lately given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in what is commonly known as the Industrial Disputes Act.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I placed this very resolution on the order paper in the last session before this decision was given.

Mr. MARTELL: The trend, however, of my hon. friend's remarks has been an endeavour to show that we should not in any wise appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in matters of law in the Dominion of Canada. It will be well for us for a few minutes to consider how confederation was brought about and what is the present charter of the Dominion of Canada. It is a matter of common history that negotiations took place from time to time between what was then commonly called Canada, that is, Ontario and Quebec, and the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, looking to the consummation of a federal union. As a result of the Quebec conference, I think in October, 1864, certain resolutions were passed, and in accordance with these resolutions there was passed by the Imperial parliament an enactment known as the British North America Act. The British North America Act of 1867, under which Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario were federally united, is the charter or constitution of the Dominion of Canada. It is in the nature of a contract between the various provinces. The minds of the fathers of confederation, as we say in the law of contracts, eventually got ad idem, that is to say, they came to a common meeting point. Confederation did not alter in any respect our relationship towards Great Britain or weaken in any way the headship of the crown. There is in the British North America Act nothing which in any way vacates the supreme legislative authority of the British parliament over and throughout the British Empire. To say that our position as one of the nations within the British Empire is on an equality with that of the British parliament as regards legislative authority is to assert an anachronism. The British parliament can change the imperial constitution; it can also change the constitution of any of the daughter nations within the empire, whereas Canada cannot alter her own constitution nor in any wise affect the constitution of Great Britain. No legislative body can make laws repugnant to imperial acts, which by express words or necessary intendment are extended to the British dominions beyond the seas.

My hon. friend, moreover, has said that we are a nation, a sovereign nation. Every person who knows the primary essentials of international law must know that no nation is a sovereign nation unless it has the right to send and receive ambassadors, a right which Canada has not at the present time. There are several acts which have been expressly applied to Canada, the chief of these being the British North America Act, which is our Canadian charter or constitution. The resolution of the hon. member for South York, which embraces within its four quarters a draft petition to His Most Gracious Majesty the King, praying that Canada be given the right to amend her own constitution, is in itself a violation of the contract made between Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario at the time of confederation. This contract became law by the ratification of the Imperial parliament, and the contract is the British North America Act. It will be remembered that at the Quebec conference, held for the purpose of bringing about a confederation of the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, resolutions were passed which became the basis of what is known as the British North America Act. Prior to confederation each of the provinces of Canada was as plenary in its power of government and legislation as is the Dominion of Canada to-day and also the various legislatures; that is to say, the various provinces which now constitute Canada, particularly the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, at the time of confederation possessed all the powers of civil government embraced in the powers and authority of both the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures combined at the present time. The British North America Act may be termed the contract between the provinces and the federal authority.

4 p.m.

To attempt in any wise to interfere with the British North America Act, which as I say, was an agreement between the various provinces of Canada, ratified and confirmed by the British parliament, without conference and agreement between the provinces constituting confederation and the federal authorities, would be a wrongful act. It would be a violation of the crassest kind of provincial rights, and without the concurrence of the various provinces constituting confederation, a petition based upon a resolution such as has been moved by my hon. friend would not be entertained by His Most Gracious Majesty in Council or by the Imperial parliament. Where there has been entered into between two parties a contract, the making of which has been the subject of a great deal of negotiation, it cannot be altered so as to give one of the parties rights and privileges without the concurrence ad idem of the other parties to the pact. In ordinary contracts between individual and individual, if a contract is reduced to writing, then one of the parties cannot of his own volition insert a new covenant without being guilty of a breach of contract. In a greater question where the rights of minorities, the rights of provincial legislatures are concerned, my hon. friend is endeavouring to have a unilateral change, so to speak, of the constitution or charter of Canada made between the parties at the time the confederation of Canada was brought about. At that time the various provinces which went into confederation surrendered rights to a central body, but they retained certain rights to themselves. The agreement or contract was the British North America Act, and surely no person would hold that one of the parties to that agreement has the right to alter it without the consent of all the parties interested. In an ordinary civil matter, to do so would be a breach of the agreement; then if this is so as between individual and individual, how much greater is the wrong when it affects the constitutional rights of sections of provinces of the Dominion of Canada?

The jurisdiction of the Canadian parliament to alter the Canadian constitution cannot be conceded and have the rights of the provinces protected. The will of the Canadian parliament in this matter is not omnipotent; the superior authority is the Imperial parliament. The question to be decided as regards any Canadian legislation, whether federal or provincial, is simply this: Is the act repugnant to the British North America Act? Does the act overstep the limits prescribed by the Imperial charter for federal or provincial legislation, as the case may be? A statute emanating from a legislature not having the power to pass it is not law. A legislative body cannot confer rights or impose liabilities where the legislature has no power to pass such a law. It is a nullitas nullitatum and cannot affect anybody. The British North America Act which has prescribed the bounds of the legislative authority of both federal and provincial legislatures imposes upon the judges of our courts the duty of seeing that those bounds are not over-ruled.

Now, Sir, I have dealt with the question of contract; let me come to the question of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That seems to be the chief theme of my hon. friend's discussion. It has been brought about by the declaration of the judicial committee that the Industrial Disputes Act of 1907 is ultra vires of the federal parliament. I am not going to criticise that act. Its object was commendable. But no matter how commendable the object, no matter what may be the desire of the people in any part of this country, it does not give to parliament the right to infringe upon the rights of other parties to the contract. I might review the reasons why the decision was given. It was the subject of a dispute in the city of Toronto between the Hydro Electric Commission and its employees. A board of conciliation was appointed by the Minister of Labour of the day. The Hydro Electric Commission said that this was not in the best interests of the parties to the dispute, and they refused to appoint their representative. Under the act it is provided that once a board is appointed all things remain in statu quo. The Hydro Electric Commission contended that by virtue of clause 13 of section 92 of the British North America Act the provincial legislature was the only legislative authority capable of passing such legislation. Application was made to Mr. Justice Orde in chambers, and after hearing argument His Lordship granted a restraining order pending the trial. Mr. Justice Mowat tried the case, and he upheld the validity of the act, Appeal from his judgment was taken to the appellate court of Ontario, which upheld the trial judge, Mr. Justice Hodgins dissenting. The matter was then taken to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and their Lordships decided that the act was an infringement upon clause 13 of section 92 of the British North America Act, and was therefore ultra vires of the federal parliament to enact.

In the course of his disquisition my hon. friend said that the Privy Council was right in its decision. That in itself, Mr. Speaker, is one of the strongest arguments why the right of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should be maintained. There is no clamour throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion for the abolition of such appeals. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is made up of some of the highest trained lawyers in the British Empire, men who have devoted themselves exclusively to the study and practice of law. The great barristers of England who are elevated to the bench are not men, as we often find in some of our courts, closely allied to corporations—business men rather than lawyers. The judges of England have been trained from their youth in the principles of Blackstone, of Coke and of Littleton. And it is an ideal state of affairs that we, whose forbears brought with them all the common law of England save that which was inapplicable to our status as a colony, should have these principles of common law made uniform in interpretation for the whole British Empire.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as at present constituted—and, Mr. Speaker, I take this from a speech made by one of the law lords in the House of Lords many years ago—took its origin in 1833, and it is the general concurrence of opinion that that tribunal has performed its very high and important functions,—a great if not the principal portion of which has been the exercise of appellate jurisdiction in cases brought from the various portions of the British Empire—to the satisfaction both of Great Britain and her dominions beyond the seas. I submit that from the date when that learned law lord made that statement down to the present time there is not a single person in the Dominion who, if he is fair, wants in any way to interfere with the right of appeal to the Privy Council. We are satisfied with it, and we should devote ourselves to domestic problems, leaving the law as it is in that regard.

It should be the primary condition of all legislation throughout the British Empire to have the law not repugnant to the law of England. We have ample precedents for interpretation. It is easy to find a decision when we go to the English courts, because there has been the long trend of ages wherein interpretations have been made by the greatest lawyers of England. I say, Sir, it should be the primary condition of all legislation throughout the British Empire to have the law not repugnant to the law of England, save in so far as changes by statute are necessary from time to time in order to meet conditions obtaining in particular sections of one of the constituent parts of the empire. It is accepted that the first settlers brought to Canada were bound by all the principles of the common law of England which were applicable to our situation at the beginning as a daughter nation of the British Empire, but they brought with them none of the English statute law save that which was made expressly applicable to their situation as a colony. If the principles of the English common law obtain in the greater portion of the British Empire, then is it not meet and proper that a final court of appeal be constituted so as to apply the general principles of the common and the statute law and thus have its decisions uniform? Moreover in the interpretation of a statute of great importance it would seem to be in the best interests of every portion of the empire to have a uniform interpretation of the phraseology or words of statutory enactments.

As citizens of the British Empire it is doubtful whether or not it would be in the best interests of the people to endeavour by any legislative enactments to take away, or to any great extent circumscribe, the right to an appeal to the Sovereign in Council, which is practically an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The sovereign is said to be the fountain of justice and is constitutionally empowered to receive petitions and appeals from all his dominions and possessions, both in the Old Land and in the new, upon such regulations and conditions as may be defined by the authority of the Crown in Council. The petitions for appeal are referred to the consideration of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, upon whose report the decision of the sovereign is presumed to be pronounced. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council could not, and is not permitted to, advise upon questions of general or political policy, for that is the special province of the cabinet council. Neither does it undertake to advise in criminal matters where no appeal to the Privy Council is allowed by law.

The statement that the appellate jurisdiction of the King in Council is retained for the benefit of the inhabitants of the British dominions beyond the seas, not for that of the Mother Country, cannot be gainsaid.

It secures to every British subject the right to demand redress of grievances from the throne.

When certain cases do not fall within the jurisdiction of ordinary courts of justice it provides a remedy.

It removes the influence of local prepossessions.

It is a great means of maintaining the uniformity of the law of England and those portions of the empire which derive their common law from Great Britain.

It enables suitors, if they so desire, to obtain a decision from a court which is the court of last resort so far as the British dominions are concerned, which said court is constituted of the highest judicial authority and legal capacity existing in the empire.

It is a controlling power over every judge in the empire, because he knows that his decisions are liable to be reviewed by it. Moreover, the great bulk of people in the Dominion of Canada have never exhibited a strong desire to part with the right of appeal from our courts to the king in council.

It has become the sole remaining power exercised through the crown over the British dominions.

We have ample power to establish, to abolish and to reconstitute courts of judicature and to provide for the administration of justice, but if a litigant's case is just, he should not fear its submission to a court such as is the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The chief reason for the advocation of doing away with the appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council seems to have arisen in connection with the case of the Toronto Electric Commissioner vs Colin G. Snider and others in which the Attorney General for Canada and the Attorney General of Ontario intervened. This was an appeal taken from the decision of the Appellate Division of the High Court of Justice for the province of Ontario which, in effect, was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Mowat and Mr. Justice Orde. Briefly, the whole case had to do with and turned upon the constitutionality of the Dominion Industrial Disputes Investigation Act of 1907, 6 and 7 Edward VII, chapter 20. Mr. Justice Orde, in his judgment on an application for injunction, gave a decision declaring the Industrial Disputes Act to be ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada, as it was an interference with property or civil rights within his province and as such was an infringement of Clause 13 of section 92 of the British North America Act, which section sets forth the exclusive legislative powers conferred upon provincial legislatures.

It is well known that section 91 of the British North America Act contains twenty-nine clauses wherein the matters which the federal parliament can exclusively legislate upon are set out. Section 92 contains sixteen clauses wherein the matters which can be exclusively legislated upon by provincial legislatures are set out. There is also a general clause under Section 91 of the British North America Act which is termed a non obstante clause, wherein authority is given to the federal parliament to legislate upon all matters not exclusively given to the provincial legislatures. It has been urged by some that this non obstante clause, or the general clause, the peace, order and good government clause; gives to the Parliament of Canada authority to pass legislation infringing upon provincial rights, even though the provincial authorities have under section 92 exclusive authority. But decisions of the Privy Council have in many cases held that this general clause can only confer jurisdiction upon the federal parliament where one of the twenty-nine clauses of section 91 is in direct conflict with one of the sixteen clauses of section 92 of the British North America Act. Otherwise the clauses of section 92 mean absolutely what they say, and in so far as any right to legislate upon any particular matter can be dealt with under section 92 it cannot be interfered with by the federal parliament.

Now, Sir, so much for that. That is exactly what occurred in connection with the matter of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Learned judges in Ontario held certain things; they were not unanimous, therefore it was well that it was possible to get away from any court which might have prepossessions in the matter and get the interpretation of a court quite removed from local influences, quite removed from any pressure that might otherwise be brought to bear upon it—though I do not wish to say that pressure can very well be brought upon our courts. The method of interpretation of the British North America Act has been said by the learned law lords to be as simple a method of interpretation as would be applied to an ordinary statute. The same thing may be said as regards the constitution of the Senate. I submit to the hon. member for South York that neither he nor any other person in the Dominion of Canada has the right to interfere with the constitution of the Canadian Senate unless the provinces are first consulted and their unanimous consent obtained to an amendment. The method of appointment of senators in Canada is fixed by the British North America Act and cannot be changed or interfered with in any way without the consent of all the constituents which went to make up our charter, the British North America Act.

The cursory review which I have made in regard to the appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council applies, as I have already said, to the Senate of Canada. The government of the day, in its far-reaching, excellent and comprehensive Speech from the Throne, admits as regards the Senate that an agreement with the provinces must be had before an amendment can be made. I am afraid that if the hon. member for South York had the opportunity of laying unholy hands upon it, the appeal to the Privy Council would be abolished. In fact, his resolution is simply a subterfuge to get away from this appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I am not, Sir, imputing to my hon. friend the mover of the resolution any sinister object—beyond that one little object I have just mentioned. But when I hear of any person asking for the abolition of the right of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, I feel that it is an attempt to break away from the British connection, for the tossing buoy betrays where the anchor is hidden.

May I say in conclusion: Let us not be prone to sing discordant misereres against the links in the chain which bind us to the empire, for be they of law or of sentiment, they are well forged by laws of liberty for all, and equality for all; and above all, by the law of sentiment which is sadly needed by lesser breeds without law. As British subjects we are citizens of no mean country, and from the rising of the sun until the going down thereof let us devote our energies to the upbuilding of our country, along great commercial lines, relying upon the fact that no coercive measure shall ever be applied against us by the Mother of Parliaments, and that Canada as the leading daughter in the galaxy of nations that will forever surround the British throne will always as a glorious Te Deum hymn:

Whilst the language
Whilst the arts
That mould a nation's soul
Still cling around our hearts,
And between let oceans roll,
Our joint communion with the sun
But still from either beach
The voice of blood shall reach
More audible than speech
"We are one!"

Mr. RENE MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with the mover of this resolution (Mr. Maclean, York), as to the necessity for Canada's obtaining the right to amend her constitution, but I differ from him as to the procedure which he suggests for that purpose. I have already claimed in this House that since confederation our status had been considerably altered, but it is not my intention on this occasion to retrace at any length the developments which have occurred.

Let me state, at first, that since confederation our constitution has only been amended, at our request, and to suit our purposes, and now we may safely assert that from a constitutional point of view the Imperial parliament would never think of altering our constitution except as we so demand, and that practically the Imperial parliament has lost that right. But satisfactory as this method may be in practice, it no longer conforms to our present standing.

The equality of our status with that of any part of the British Empire has already been proclaimed on many occasions, not only by Canadians, but by most of the prominent public men of Great Britain. Canada is now a member of the League of Nations and holds therein the same standing, the same rights, as fully sovereign nations. She has in the assembly of the league her own representatives enjoying all the rights of any of the other members. In the treaty of Versailles Canada appears as a unit, separate from that of Great Britain, though under the same king. She now negotiates alone her commercial treaties with foreign nations, and she signs these treaties by her own representatives, acting in the name of the King, but having received their full powers from him at the instance and under the direction of the Canadian cabinet. All these prerogatives are now fully acknowledged as belonging to us, but they are incompatible with the control which Great Britain can, theoretically, and in the eyes of foreign nations, exercise over us if she is the superior authority or the power which alone has the right to alter our constitution. Moreover, Australia, South Africa and Ireland, now enjoy the right to amend their constitution, and Canada cannot continue to occupy the inferior rank of the dominion which is not empowered to exercise the rights which belong to the other dominions.

For these reasons it is necessary that we should take steps to obtain the right of altering our constitution by an internal procedure entirely under our control.

But the constitution of Canada has a special feature; it is the result of a pact between the different provinces of Canada; it has this character, at least for the four original members of the confederation. For these four provinces it is a covenant or agreement, and it follows that no amendment or alteration of importance can be made to this covenant without the participation and consent of the parties to it. The other provinces which came in later entered this covenant of their own free will, and they should be entitled to the same privileges as the original members. It follows that no alteration of an important character can be made to the British North America Act, our constitution, unless it meets with the approval of the provinces which compose the confederation.

This conventional character of our constitution was also a feature of that of the Commonwealth of Australia, and if you refer to its constitution you will find that the right to alter the constitution has been surrounded by a number of protective measures, which preserve adequately the rights of each of the states which compose the commonwealth. The alteration of its constitution is made by a law, passed by an absolute majority in each of the two houses of parliament, and submitted to the electors qualified to vote for the election of members of the house of representatives, in each of the different states of the confederation, and this amendment comes into force if approved by the majority of the states and by the majority of all the electors who voted. It provides also, that in case of disagreement between the two houses of parliament, the Governor General may submit to the electors any proposed amendment passed twice after an interval of at least three months by any one of these houses.

In Australia, as in Canada, there are some fundamental rights which must be preserved with yet more care. We would hold here as sacred rights: The territorial limits of the provinces: The proportion of representation of each province: The rights which are attributed by the British North America Act to the provinces, particularly in matters of education: The privileges of minorities; and some others.

In Australia no alteration to the constitution which may in any way affect any of the rights which are considered fundamental can come into force as to each separate state unless it has received the approval of the majority of the electors in that state. So in Canada, our constitution should be so drafted that any alteration, which might affect some of these fundamental rights should necessarily receive the approval of the legislature of each province to which it may apply.

For these reasons, though I am in favour of the principle of the resolution, I cannot accept it as drafted, and I must register my vote against it. Moreover, I submit that any attempt to obtain the right to amend our constitution must be the subject of a conference between the provinces, and must meet with the approval of each of the component parts of Canada.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this resolution. I believe there is no demand for this legislation. Furthermore, I believe that if this legislature did have the power that is asked for here, it would sound the death knell in this country of the basis of confederation; it would sound the death knell of minorities; it would sound the death knell of provincial rights, and more especially of municipal rights, and we must remember that there has been a very large investment by municipalities from coast to coast throughout this country in public utilities. Now, there is no demand for this legislation; nobody is asking for it. I am an Irishman but I should be sorry to see this country with a constitution such as Ireland has to-day. They have the right over there to make and unmake their constitution. What does the resolution of my hon. friend ask for:

> The parliament of the Dominion may amend the said British North America Act when it may see fit to do so.

Under such provision as that would not this parliament have the right to deprive the provinces of the powers which they at present enjoy under section 92 of the British North America Act? Is it proposed that this Dominion should be able to brush aside with a wave of the hand, the constitutional rights of the provinces and municipalities throughout this country? Let me give an illustration of what I mean. The municipalities and provinces in many cases are doing more to solve practical problems than is this parliament. The other day the leader of this government stated that the Dominion had nothing to do with the question of unemployment under the British North America Act. At present the control of the banking institutions of the country, of immigration, of transportation, of the tariff, and of the right to enter into international agreements, is vested in this parliament, and it ought to relieve the provinces and the municipalities of the problem of caring for unemployment. I am very much surprised that the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), an advocate of public ownership as he is, in view of the fact that the city of Toronto from which he comes has made an investment of $125,000,000 in light, power, and transportation; in view of the fact that his constituency has been beneficially affected by these enterprises, should move such a resolution as this. Because, if the amendment to the British North America Act which he proposes had been in operation in Canada, there would have been no such developments in connection with light, power and transportation as have taken place in Ontario. The power to build, run and control these utilities would be usurped and interfered with by the Dominion and it would be possible for the Dominion by interference to wipe them out in the twinkling of an eye.

My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, York) wants to know whether Canada is a sovereign state, whether it is a nation, and whether we can make and unmake our own constitution. No, Canada is not a sovereign state, and it is a good thing that it is not. Notwithstanding the fact that we have the right to sign halibut treaties, and other treaties, we are not a sovereign state. We are a nation in name only. We are dependent—just as is Australia to which dominion my hon. friend ascribed the possession of so much power—on the fleet of the Mother Country. Here we are talking about an amendment to the British North America Act, and in time of trouble we are the first to look to the old Motherland across the seas for protection and for the maintenance of the maritime freedom which we enjoy. And notwithstanding this protection we are content to sponge on the hard earnings of the British taxpayer for our maritime freedom without doing anything to relieve him of the burden. In this respect we are unlike the Commonwealth of Australia. What is their attitude in this matter? They have a fleet of their own and contribute to maritime freedom. Let me quote from what the Prime Minister of Australia, Right Hon. S. M. Bruce, said as reported in volume 5, number 4, Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire, issued in October, 1924:

> At no time throughout her history had Australia been in a position to provide for her own national defence. To-day, as in the past, they were dependent upon the protection afforded to them by Great Britain. They had to recognize that fact. It was useless for anybody to maintain that if they were an independent nation, with no connection with the British Empire, they would be in a position to protect themselves. The certainty that they could not defend themselves would be a considerable incentive to any country to take action against them. They had the most wonderful unprotected white man's country in the world, with only five and a half to six millions of people inhabiting it. Looking round the world, however, they saw teeming millions in other countries, and knowing the rate at which their populations were increasing, they in Australia recognized the difficulties with which those countries were faced in finding an outlet for their people. "Few of us" said Mr. Bruce, "fail to recognize that Australia, undefended, would be a great temptation to any country." We all subscribe to the "White Australia" quality, which we say shall never, under any circumstances be abandoned. We intend to keep this country white and not allow its people to be faced with the problems that at present are practically insoluble in many other parts of the world. . . . It is true that, in the past, our right to assert this policy has never been seriously challenged, but it has enjoyed immunity from challenge because we are part of the British Empire, and have had the whole force of Britain behind us throughout our history.

I am afraid there is altogether too much talk in this country with respect to abolishing appeals to the Privy Council which is calculated to have the effect of weakening the ties which unite us to the Mother Country. I am afraid that legislation such as is proposed here would make it possible to encroach upon provincial rights, and in the case of the province of Ontario reduce to scrap many valuable public undertakings. In a word it would be possible to reduce the provincial legislature and the municipalities of a province to the mere status of a county council. The highest judicial court in the empire recently gave a judgment on the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act holding matters wholly provincial in their scope and activity and affecting property and civil rights, employer and employee, as matters for the provinces and not for the Dominion under trade and commerce. I do not wish to criticise the judgment of the Ontario court of appeal, I would not say anything derogatory with respect to it; but I must express the opinion that the judgment of the Privy Council removed one of the most deadly menaces to provincial rights in affirming that the provincial court of appeal was wrong in upholding, as it did, the Industrial Disputes Act. That law was held to be a bad piece of legislation by the Dominion by the highest court in the British Empire. On the other hand the judgment of the Ontario court of appeal would have absolutely destroyed provincial and municipal rights which we have enjoyed since the British North America Act first came into force. That judgment of the Ontario court of appeal has been upset by the highest court in the realm. This decision will stand for all time as a shining example of how the Privy Council protects the rights of minorities and provincial and municipal rights as well when threatened by the Dominion. We have had many statutes enacted by the Dominion tending to invade the provincial field. We have had the Combines Act which was more ornamental than useful. Since that act was enacted I am not aware that there has been a single prosecution instituted successfully under it.

Reverting to Australia, I may say that the commonwealth has appreciated its position much better than Canada has, and has established a fleet to protect its shores. According to the report of the Canadian Minister of National Defence Canada's expenditure on defence is only $1.46 per head of the population. Great Britain's expenditure for this purpose is $23.04; while Australia pays $3.30. If we are a nation, and this resolution passes, I suppose we should have the right to go to war, with the toy navy which we now have. The only thing this parliament appears to be ready to declare war on is on the rights of the provinces. That very clearly is what was done when the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was enacted.

In the Old Country the press has been discussing the resolution of my hon. friend, and among others the Manchester Guardian. Well, I do not think there is any newspaper in the British Empire which knows less of Canadian affairs than the Manchester Guardian. In the present instance it is sympathetic towards the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council which would weaken the ties which unite Canada to the Motherland, because the Privy Council to-day is one of the remaining links binding Canada to the Mother Country. I think we are doing altogether too much to weaken the ties and relations between Canada and the Motherland.

It is said we can make our own treaties. I hope the day is far distant when Canada will be making its own treaties, because I think the treaties which are made by the Mother Country for Canada stand out by themselves and are beneficial to Canada. It is said we should have a Canadian ambassador at Washington. I may say I am opposed to that.

That is another way of weakening the ties which bind Canada to the Mother Country, and is not in keeping with the spirit of the British North America Act which is one of the remaining links which bind together Canada and the Old Land. Some people want to abolish the offices of Governor General and Lieutenant Governor. I hope these offices will not be abolished, because they are two of the few remaining links which bind Canada to the Motherland.

Before any resolution of this character is passed by parliament I think the provinces should be consulted. The provinces are a part of confederation. Under the British North America Act, sections 91 and 92, they have been given a written constitution and they should be consulted before any change is made in the act. Before we make any such change we should have a vote of the people, and no one is asking for a vote that I know of, or any change in the act as it stands to-day. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, we are living in an age in which changes to our constitution will have the effect of weakening the ties which bind Canada to the Motherland. Many prohibitory laws are being passed. We seem to be living in an age when prohibitory legislation is a fad, too many prohibitory laws are being passed, and I think there is too much tinkering with the constitution. Nowadays people seem anxious to discipline their neighbours, but do not want to discipline themselves.

One of the reasons for the present resolution was the decision given in the Privy Council in the appeal of the Toronto Hydro-Electric Commissioners in a case involving a labour dispute, and it is held by some that the judgment declares the whole Industrial Disputes Investigation Act ultra vires of the Dominion parliament. I say that as far as that act dealt with Dominion matters, as long as it stayed within its own field and looked after the federal field and the rights of Dominion employees, it was all very well and proper. As long as the act was kept in its own federal sphere and applied it to the subject for which it was intended under section 91 of the British North America Act—that is works declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, which came under the jurisdiction of this parliament, such as Post Office employees, railway employees and federal employees—it was perfectly valid. So far as that act went I believe it did some good work, although it has not been a success in some other ways.

The bill was framed by the hon. presiding officer of this chamber (Mr. Lemieux) a gentleman who has been a long time in public life in this country, and who has all his life done a great deal to promote provincial good will and to advocate the principles of fair dealing between man and man throughout the country. The worthy author of this bill spent his life in the service of this country, and he never intended that that act should be utilized and used the way it has been, namely to stray out of the Dominion field and enter into the provincial and municipal fields and undertake to do work which it was not intended to do. The act was intended to function so far as it applied to federal matters under section 91 of the British North America Act, and so far as it applied also to any provincial works which were undertaken which were declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada. But when it left the federal field and invaded the provincial and municipal fields and dealt with municipal utilities—light, and power and many other things—and sought to constitute itself a court of appeal from the cities or towns, or a court of appeal in the province, then it crossed the border and entered a field where it did not belong.

I think the judgment given by Lord Haldane was sound where he deals with the matter of the protection of provincial and municipal rights in this country. I may say that the legislature of the province of Ontario is complaining, and I think they have good cause to complain, that this federal body is encroaching on their rights and dealing with matters which come under the provincial jurisdiction. I first refer to the St. Lawrence development, where eastern Ontario is affected. There was an application before the government to build up the Morrisburg dam. Under the British North America Act as it stands to-day the surplus waters subject to the rights of navigation belong to the province and the banks and rapids and bed of international streams. That is one constitutional question of which Ontario is asking for some solution.

Another question in which there is trouble under the British North America Act in the province I come from is the question of insurance. That has been before the Privy Council on several occasions, and the Prime Minister of Ontario said that Ottawa had gone out of its way to veto provincial legislation when there was no occasion for it. I think there was no reason for interference in regard to the question of light, power and insurance problems of the province. There is another serious conflict regarding insurance, although the province of Ontario recovered a judgment before the Privy Council twice protecting the legislation we passed. I may say that among other matters affecting the province are the succession duties and the revenues of the province, and the control of the water-powers of the province. If this amendment carries it would interfere with all these matters. I say there is no demand for the legislation. Nobody is asking for it, and I do not know what good it would do if we did have the legislation. What we want during the present session is that parliament should solve some practical problems concerning the people of this country at this time. One most important matter is unemployment and another is the light and power question of this Dominion. We have many other practical problems to deal with instead of taking up a question which the people are not bothering their heads about.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Any proposal affecting the constitution of Canada is by its nature of considerable importance, and the mere fact that such an experienced politician as my hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean) has fathered this resolution is a strong indication that the subject matter of this resolution attracts a substantial measure of public attention. I desire merely to point out some of the difficulties which are in the way of the proposal submitted by my hon. friend. If I do not agree with him in many of his statements, I do agree at least with the statement that he made that there is no difficulty whatever in this connection with the Mother Country. My hon. friend stated, and repeated, that we could have that right if we asked for it, and he is absolutely right. I think that the language of some of the resolutions which I have read in the newspapers as having been adopted by associations in this country is rather unfortunate, because it conveys the impression that the Mother Country is refusing something, and that we ought to claim the right to amend our own constitution. The question, as my hon. friend rightly said, is not and cannot be one between Great Britain and Canada. It is one and might be a difficulty between this parliament and the provinces if there is any conflict in that regard.

It is true that in Australia, South Africa, New Zealand and in the Irish Free State, those dominions can, subject to many restrictions, amend their constitution. Not so with Canada. The British North America Act says itself that the Parliament of Great Britain merely enacted, put into a statute, the wish of the people of the provinces of Canada. It is of our making, and it is after an understanding between the bodies representing the provinces of Canada at that time.

There were many obstacles in the way of achieving confederation. Everybody who knows something of the history of Canada knows what some at least of those obstacles were. The country was on the verge of civil strife. During the two years which preceded the Quebec resolutions, not less than four cabinets succeeded each other at the head of the affairs of Canada. The provinces got together; they tried to effect an understanding and they effected one. In the language of Sir John A. Macdonald, the very pact of confederation bears on its face all the marks of a compromise. The provinces relinquished some of the powers which were theirs and they retained for themselves other powers. The powers which they relinquished they relinquished subject to conditions which were put into confederation, some of those conditions being more or less important, others essential, and without such conditions confederation would not have taken place. They tried to combine federal strength with local freedom of action. Everything that was private, domestic, home rule, the provinces kept to themselves, and they saw to it that their powers in that regard should never be interfered with. It is to be noted that in the British North America Act, they have the right to amend those provisions which concern their own constitution, except as regards the office of the Lieutenant-Governor. Not so in the case of any of the provisions concerning the federal parliament; and there were reasons for that. If confederation was a pact, an agreement, is it possible for one of the parties to the agreement, or rather for the body which resulted from the agreement, to amend, to alter the conditions of that pact without consulting and without securing the consent of the parties to the original agreement?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What is the rule in the United States?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The United States never had the same position as had the provinces at the time of confederation. As regards the United States as well as Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, they all agreed at the time of the enactment of the statute creating their constitution that they would have the right to alter it. They possess that right because it was made one of the conditions of the statute constituting them a state. Not so with Canada, because there were special conditions and difficulties in the way. I ask my hon. friend this question. Confederation was achieved and the new parliament was opened in 1867. Does he believe that two years aftewards, in 1869, for instance, this parliament could have fairly and reasonably amended the British North America Act or have asked the Imperial parliament to amend it without the consent of the four original provinces? Could he fairly say that that could have been done two years after the opening of this parliament? If it could not be done at that time, could it be done twenty-five years afterwards, or even fifty years afterwards, without the consent of the contracting parties in the pact of confederation?

5 p.m.

I want to convey to the House one or two points and I desire every one of my colleagues not to lose sight of this. First, the British North America Act itself is not only the charter of the Dominion of Canada; it is just as much the charter of the provinces of Canada. We derive our powers from the British North America Act; so do the provinces. They have no constitution other than the British North America Act; all their powers they derive from that act. Would it then be fair for us to arrogate to ourselves the right to change the act which is just as much the constitution of the provinces as it is our own? Second, my hon. friend speaks of protection to minorities. That is not the only thing in the British North America Act in which the provinces are interested. They have all their powers which they have kept to themselves and which have been agreed by everybody to be their powers. Have we a right to amend the constitution without their consent, in the way, for instance, of taking away from them some of the powers which have been theirs since confederation.

Mr. CRERAR: This parliament would have that power in respect of all provinces excepting the four that originally entered confederation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not agree with my hon. friend in that regard. The other provinces came later into a joint confederation, but they have the same status, powers and rights as the original four provinces and they should be consulted just as much as any other province if any substantial change is asked as regards the British North America Act.

Third, within their sphere the provinces enjoy the powers of self-government just as much as the Dominion parliament does, and if so, surely the Dominion parliament cannot take upon itself the right to change a statute which gives to those provinces the powers which they enjoy.

Perhaps I could not do better than quote three of the leading propositions given by Professor Lefroy in The Canadian Constitution. They are propositions Nos. 2, 51 and 59, reading as follows:

2. Although the British North America Act was founded upon the Quebec resolutions, and so must be accepted as embodying a treaty of union between the provinces, yet when once enacted it constituted a wholly new point of departure, and established the dominion and provincial governments with definite powers and duties both alike derived from it as their source.

51. The object of the British North America Act was neither to weld the provinces into one nor to subordinate provincial governments to a central authority, but to create a federal government in which they should all be represented and entrusted with the exclusive administration of affairs in which they have a common interest, each province retaining its independence and autonomy.

59. The Dominion parliament cannot either expressly or impliedly take away from or give to the provincial legislatures the power which the Imperial act does or does not give them and the same is the case, mutatis mutandis, with the provincial legislatures.

If, Mr. Speaker, you agree with me, and if you agree with Professor Lefroy in the proposition which I have just stated, surely the conclusion is that we cannot ask for power to alter, without the consent of the provinces, the constitution which is their own constitution as well as it is ours. It also follows that if it is to be considered as a treaty, surely we cannot alter its provisions without at least seeking the consent of the other parties to that treaty.

Now, has it been considered as a treaty? I heard it suggested some time ago that this idea at confederation of a treaty is an antiquated idea. Maybe it is. But, Mr. Speaker, truth does not cease to be truth when it gets old; an old truth is always true. You cannot prevent facts from being facts whether you like them or not. I have here the Debates of the Parliament of Canada on Confederation. What did Sir John Macdonald think about it?

Mr. McMASTER: May I interpolate a question? When the several amendments which have been made to the British North America Act were obtained from the Imperial parliament were the provinces consulted? I seek information.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to proceed and I will answer him later. Here is what Sir John Macdonald said, page 15—

In answer to the member for Carleton—

That is, when the Quebec resolutions were laid on the table.

—the government desired to say that they presented the scheme as a whole, and they would exert all the influence they could bring to bear in the way of argument to induce the House to adopt the scheme without alteration, and for the simple reason that the scheme was not one framed by the government of Canada or by the government of Nova Scotia, but was in the nature of a treaty settled between the different colonies, each clause of which had been fully discussed, and which had been agreed to by a system of mutual compromise.

In the speech he made a few days afterwards, when moving the adoption of confederation,—page 31—he said:

I trust the scheme will be assented to as a whole. I am sure this House will not seek to alter it in its unimportant details; and, if altered in any important provisions, the result must be that the whole will be set aside, and we must begin de novo. If any important changes are made, everyone of the colonies will feel itself absolved from the implied obligation to deal with it as a treaty, each province will feel itself at liberty to amend it ad libitum so as to suit its own views and interests; in fact, the whole of our labours will have been for naught, and we will have to renew our negotiations with all the colonies for the purpose of establishing some new scheme.

Sir George Etienne Cartier, Hon. George Brown, and all the other Fathers of Confederation used similar language. May I be permitted to quote a few words from the speech made on that occasion by Hon. D'Arcy McGee, the centenary of whose birth will be celebrated in a few months? He said, at page 136:

We assembled under authority of that dispatch, and acted under the sanction it gave. Everything we did was done in form and with propriety, and the result of our proceedings is the document that has been submitted to the Imperial government as well as to this House, and which we speak of here as a treaty. And that there may be no doubt about our position in regard to that document we say, question it you may, reject it you may, or accept it you may, but alter it you may not. It is beyond your power, or our power, to alter it. There is not a sentence—aye, or even a word—you can alter without desiring to throw out the document. Alter it, and we know at once what you mean—you thereby declare yourselves anti-unionists. On this point I repeat after all my hon. friends who have already spoken, for one party to alter a treaty, is of course, to destroy it. Let us be frank with each other; you who do not like our work, nor do you like us who stand by it; clause by clause, line by line, and letter by letter. Oh! But this clause ought to run thus, and this other clause thus. Does any hon. member seriously think that any treaty in the world between five separate provinces ever gave full and entire satisfaction on every point to every party? Does any hon. member seriously expect to have a constitutional act framed to his order or my order, or any man's order? No, Sir, I am sure no legislator at least since Anacharsis Clootz was "Attorney-General of the Human Race" ever expected such ideal perfection.

There was some Irish wit in the last words of Mr. McGee. Since confederation what have our own statesmen thought about this matter? In 1906-7 Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, and his remarks will be found at page 2199 of the Hansard of that session:

In parliament here we can do as we please; we are in the majority; but are the members of this House prepared to say that if any province finds itself aggrieved by the terms of confederation, which have been accepted by all the provinces, they will ask the British parliament to alter the constitution in the way desired by that particular province? Such a course might be followed by very serious consequences. Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this House and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

Sir Robert Borden—then leader of the opposition—speaking in the same debate, used the following words:

I agree with what has been said by the right hon. gentleman regarding the undesirability of lightly amending the terms of our constitution and am inclined to agree with him on the necessity of some consultation with the provinces, although of course all the provinces are represented here. But inasmuch as this is a federal compact which we are asked to vary, it is only right that each province should be consulted and its decision given, in the right of its separate entity.

At that time there had been an interprovincial conference which considered the question of increasing the subsidies to the provinces, and after an agreement between those provinces an address was voted by both houses of this parliament for the purpose of amending the British North America Act to give to the provinces an increased subsidy. This address was submitted to the Imperial parliament. The Premier of British Columbia, the late Sir Richard McBride, went to London at the time—not that he was opposed to the amendment altering the provisions of the British North America Act and giving an increased subsidy to the provinces, but his objection was that British Columbia should have more than was given to her under the agreement and under the act which was submitted to the Imperial parliament at the request of the Dominion of Canada. I wish to quote from the remarks of the Secretary of State for the Colonies at the time, Mr. Winston Churchill, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, just to show that the interpretation given to the confederation pact by the public men of the Dominion was also the interpretation given to it by imperial public men. On submitting the bill for its first reading Mr. Churchill said:

On the other hand, he would be very sorry if it were thought that the action which His Majesty's government had decided to take meant that they had decided to establish as a precedent that whenever there was a difference on a constitutional question between the federal government and one of the provinces,

He was referring to the objection of British Columbia.

—the Imperial government would always be prepared to accept the federal point of view as against the provincial. In deference to the representations of British Columbia the words "final and unalterable" applying to the revised scale had been omitted from the bill.

His language was still more explicit on the second reading of the bill. He said: I quote from page 753 of the British Hansard of 1907:

> The hon. baronet, the member for the city of London, asked why the bill came here at all. The British North America Act is the fundamental act governing the constitution of the Dominion of Canada, and different prime ministers of Canada voluntarily entered into that union. Adherence to the union was something in the nature of a treaty, and when an alteration in the basis of the treaty is made, as it is by the revised schedule of subventions proposed, it was felt desirable by all the prime ministers in conference that such a matter should be ratified by the Imperial parliament in the most formal way.

That was the interpretation that was accepted by every interested person in Canada, and I submit to my hon. friend the mover of the resolution that it is even to-day the interpretation that is given by the public men of Canada in the provinces.

Two or three years ago one of my predecessors in the Department of Justice, Right Hon. Mr. Doherty, had contemplated some legislation along this line, and he communicated with the various provinces. The correspondence is of a confidential character, but I may say that Mr. Doherty and all the attorneys general who answered his letter were of the same opinion, that nothing of this kind could be done without the consent of the provinces. The present Attorney General of Ontario was not then in the provincial government, but I have his opinion in a letter he wrote me last year concerning proposed legislation of this parliament. This is what Mr. Nickle says:

> I do not need to remind you that the British North America Act was a product of representatives from all the provinces as such, and not as representatives to a Dominion parliament. The government of this province is of opinion that the Dominion parliament should not act in the matter of obtaining constitutional changes, without the sanction of the provinces to its proposals to the Imperial parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the Minister of Justice mind telling us what the subject of the communication was? To what change did the Attorney General of Ontario refer?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was in regard to a resolution which I moved for the purpose of making it clearer that the legislation of the Dominion of Canada should have extra-territorial effect; and he suggested the insertion of two or three words, which were inserted with our consent when the measure was before the Senate. In regard to the question of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) I may say that every time an important amendment was made it was first submitted to the provinces. I do not think there are many cases in which an amendment has been asked to the British North America Act without communicating with the provinces. If it was done it was only in cases where there could be no possible objection on the part of the provinces.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that if the British North America Act is a covenant, is of the nature of a treaty the provisions of which were essential for the acceptance of the whole scheme, have we the right to ask to be enabled to alter it without the consent of those who were parties to the agreement?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How are we to make progress?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will make a suggestion to my hon. friend, and it is the only possible one so far as I can see. If the British North America Act is the charter of the provinces as well as the charter of the Dominion, I ask again, how can we alter it without communicating with the provinces?

Mr. LADNER: If the minister will permit me, will that not apply in the case of each proposed amendment? Does the minister consider it advisable to lay down general clauses which will enable the provinces and the Dominion to amend the constitution, or would it not always be a question of amending the act only after consultation with the provinces?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I submit that this should be a matter for understanding between the Dominion and the provinces, and it is a matter upon which, I am sure, agreement might and should be reached. I heard an hon. member say the other day, speaking, I believe, of the suggested law concerning the eight-hour day, and evidently being impatient of the obstacle put in the way of that enactment in the difficulty of knowing the respective fields of jurisdiction on the part of the Dominion and the provinces—I heard him say, "Well, where there is a will there is a way." I was surprised at that statement. That was the spirit which inspired the invaders of Belgium in 1914, and the world was precipitated in a sea of blood. Surely the British North America Act cannot be made a scrap of paper, as that treaty was made at that time. There is a way, perhaps, yes; but the only way is the friendly way, is the legal way, is the constitutional way. It is to approach the various parties to the agreement with a view to arriving at an understanding as to the changes which may be necessary and which may be agreed upon by all the parties to the pact. As I have said, I do not think there could be any other way; I believe that any arbitrary action in the matter would simply defeat its own purpose and would strike at the root of our national unity. I think I cite history correctly when I say that every time there has been a dispute in Canada as regards provincial rights, those who were on the side of provincial rights were victorious in the end. I do not think there can be any attempt to change the mutual charter of both the Dominion and the provinces by the arbitrary action of this parliament. I do not think it is possible to do it. To those who want changes, and I am willing to admit that there might be the necessity for changes, I would say that the only way to get them is the constitutional way, to ask the consent of the various parties to confederation. Mr. Speaker, after sixty years of confederation I think we may safely say that notwithstanding the great obstacles which were in their way the Fathers of Confederation who gathered in 1865 did a great work; I think we may boldly say after sixty years that their work has been a very satisfactory one. It was not perfect; there is no perfection in human devices, but certainly they did the best they could.

As I have said, I would not like to leave the impression that my own view is that no changes should be made at any time, or that no changes are possible. I agree that we are living in 1925, and not in 1865. The problems of Canada must be settled in the light of the present situation.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): By the men of to-day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: By the men of to-day, yes. I am not one of those who are riveted to the past and who are prepared to deny to our children the liberty of the future, but those changes the necessity for which may be seen as a result of our experience of sixty years cannot be made unless you proceed in a legal and constitutional way; they cannot be made arbitrarily; they cannot be made only at the will and at the request of the Dominion parliament; but those who are just as much interested as the Dominion parliament in this matter must have their say, must be consulted, and must give their assent.

I have read a very interesting work by Sir Clifford Sifton on this very subject. Sir Clifford is a constitutional authority, and has given much thought to this matter. He believes in the fullest degree of autonomy for Canada, and his work and his lectures are very interesting and very weighty. He admits as does Mr. Kennedy of Toronto university, and all the constitutional writers, that the British North America Act is a pact and must be treated as such. Mr. Kennedy, who has written a very important book on the constitution of Canada, and who, like my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) would like Canada to have the power to amend its constitution, admits that the British North America Act is a covenant and a pact, and he sees the difficulty in the way. Sir Clifford Sifton too, in his work, admits that the British North America Act is a pact and must be treated as such, and what does he suggest? He suggests a conference of delegates elected by the popular vote of Canada. Parliament would divide Canada into a certain number of districts which would elect delegates to that conference by way of proportional representation, and those delegates would revise or frame a constitution for Canada, which would be submitted to the people for approval.

The other plan he suggests is that a parliamentary committee should be formed to which would be called all the men who are constitutional lawyers in Canada, and all those who are interested in this matter, to give their views. That committee would revise the constitution, but its findings would be subject to a vote of the people of Canada.

There is much to be said perhaps in favour of both these schemes, but they are defective in one main, principal point. Neither of these bodies suggested by Sir Clifford Sifton would represent all the parties to the pact of confederation. The body or conference or gathering which might be entrusted with the work of revising our constitution must be a body in which the provinces, as such, and not otherwise, shall be represented, as well as this Dominion parliament. That is the point upon which I differ with Sir Clifford Sifton.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): May I ask a question? The minister admits now that a new party to the constitution has been created other than the original provinces, and that party is the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is the child of the provinces: it is not their father.

It is stated in the Speech from the Throne, as has been mentioned this afternoon that a conference will be called of all the provinces of Canada with this Dominion parliament with regard to the constitution of the Senate. There is the body to which this resolution of my hon. friend might be fairly submitted. It is to such a conference, and to no other body, that my hon. friend should appeal for the purpose of amending the constitution of Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Why not do it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We will do it if my hon. friend will merely give us time. If the session closes in a very short time, as I hope, perhaps my hon. friend will have the conference before it is too late. But I make now an appeal to all the men in Canada who are interested, and all Canadians should be interested in their own constitution, to study our British North America Act, to consider the question in all its particulars, to bring their minds together and to discuss fairly, without prejudice of any kind, the advisability of suggesting any amendments to the British North America Act when this conference is gathered. I appeal to all those who will have to speak in any authoritative way on this question not to put difficulties in the way by untimely and immature statements in regard to this conference which will take place. It ought to be a momentous gathering. Everybody should go there with a free, open mind, and convinced that they should listen to all the arguments which will be put before them and try if possible to come to an agreement and meet the wishes of the majority of the people of Canada. I think this is the only way, the only legal and constitutional way. It is the only way which will keep and maintain our national unity, and surely Canadians are able to come to some compromise in 1925 as they were in 1865.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister permit a question? Is it the intention of the government to submit some scheme to the approaching conference looking to gaining for Canada the power to amend its constitution?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, I think the resolution of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) is one of the subjects which might fairly come before that conference. If I remember well the language of the Speech from the Throne, it is that a conference shall be called together for the purpose of considering amendments to the British North America Act with respect to the constitution of the Senate and other matters. Surely this would be one of the matters which the government would submit to such a conference. Under the circumstances and in view of the definition I have made of my own views, of my own position in the matter, I feel that I could not support the resolution of my hon. friend at the present stage. The hon. gentleman has served his purpose, he has brought the matter before the people of the country, and I do not think he should press the resolution to a vote.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, last year, in connection with a motion which I had introduced, I took the opportunity to discuss this question at some length. It is not my purpose to cover the same ground to-day. I should like to point out, however, that on that occasion I took the ground that we should avoid a great many of these legal and constitutional difficulties by simply asserting the right of Canada to amend her own constitution. There is not the slightest doubt that Canada started with a colonial status as the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) has pointed out, but there is the larger question whether we intend to retain that status in any degree very much longer. I would ask why it should be necessary that we should make an appeal to the Privy Council in regard to constitutional questions when appeal has for all practical purposes ceased with regard to what should be regarded as perhaps equally important—criminal cases.

We have heard a good deal of the rights of minorities as guaranteed in this act, and there has been special reference to the province of Quebec and the Maritime provinces. I should like to ask, what about the rights of minorities that are not specifically guaranteed in this act? In the last sixty years we have had the growth of new sections and new classes in this community. We have had within the last thirty or forty years the development of the great Canadian west; and some of us who are from the west, representing peoples of the west who were not living in the country at that time, representing constituencies in provinces which were not originally in confederation, feel that our development ought not to be forever tied because of certain legislation which was drawn up fifty or sixty years ago. We want to ask: What about the rights of minorities other than those that were specifically mentioned in the British North America Act?

There has been a great deal of stress laid upon the sacredness of contract.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear; very much.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, very much. We know it is very dangerous to suggest anything else in the presence of such a large number of the legal fraternity. However, I should like as a layman, to urge the right of the present generation to live, which is, I think, of infinitely greater importance.

Mr. McMASTER: Past generations gave them that right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Past generations undoubtedly, as the hon. member for Brome has said gave us the right to live. I would also submit that we go on living after past generations have ceased to exist. Perhaps that is a merciful dispensation on the part of Providence, as we would never go very far if we were confined by the limitations of past generations. I would urge that there should be at least periodic interpretations of the terms of any contract. Contracts may be interpreted in a very literal and very narrow way, or they may be interpreted in a broad and generous manner in accordance with the underlying principles. I would urge that we retain the general principles of our contracts, but that we should not be forever tied by an adherence to the letter of the law:

> The letter killeth but the spirit giveth life

Who then is best fitted to interpret, in the light of modern conditions, these laws of fifty or sixty years ago? Not, I submit, the men who live across the Atlantic, but the men who are living here in Canada and dealing with the everyday affairs of our Canadian people.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), in his speech, referred to some words that I used the other day in another connection, "Where there is a will there is a way". He seems to think that these words, which most of us learned in our school days and were then considered to be quite orthodox, carried some very sinister meaning; they remind him of the Germans. For the life of me I do not know just where the connection is, but I should like to say that he did not repeat other words which I used in connection therewith:

> Where there is a will there is a way, and where there is no will there is no way.

I was at that time emphasizing the fact that very often we allowed legal and technical difficulties to interfere with the carrying on of our work and the meeting of real difficulties, and I submit that the Minister of Justice throughout his speech gave no light as to how we are to solve the very real and pressing problems that confront us because of the difficulties inherent in this British North America Act.

The minister referred to the fact that there were obstacles in the way of achieving confederation. We quite acknowledge that, but I should like to urge that there are obstacles to-day in the way of maintaining confederation, and we should try, to our utmost, to remove those obstacles and lessen as far as we may the causes of friction.

I was very sorry the other day when a member of this House introduced the question as to whether or not an hon. gentleman who was not born in Canada had any right to consider some of the fundamental problems of the Dominion. I feel quite free to speak upon this incident because I happen to be Canadian born and of several generations of Canadians, and as such, a Canadian of the Canadians, I want to protest against any narrowness of that kind. Our grandfathers, or our great-grandfathers, came to this Canada of ours, but there are other men who are being induced to come here from other parts of the world and I submit that if we take them into our citizenship, we should accord them just the same right to speak on questions concerning the welfare of Canada as we native-born ourselves possess, and I would say—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend suggest that I ever said anything to the contrary.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, no. I am not suggesting anything of the kind. The Minister of Justice is not responsible for the statement in question; it emanated from the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion). I would urge that the only way we can maintain confederation is to insist absolutely upon justice for all, for the newcomer as well as for the old timer, for the westerner as well as for the easterner, for those parts of the country which entered confederation more recently as well as for those that entered it when the British North America Act was passed. I believe in federation, I believe in still wider federation—I believe we all hope for an ultimate world federation—but these things can be accomplished only as we maintain a very large measure of home rule—and we ought to have home rule here in Canada. In order to obviate the difficulties that seem to face the Minister of Justice and several other members with regard to this resolution I beg leave to move the following amendment seconded by Mr. Shaw:

> That the resolution be amended as follows: by adding the following words after the word "Dominion" in the first line of clause 2 thereof, to wit:
> Upon first obtaining the consent of all the provinces of Canada.

I think this will meet the objection raised by the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Morin). If that amendment were adopted we would not have any action whatever until all the provinces had consented thereto. Moreover, in accordance with the original motion, there is the further safeguard that there would be no power to pass any amendment affecting the rights guaranteed in the said act to minorities. Surely such a resolution, if it is not harmless—that is the only possible trouble with it—would absolutely safeguard the fundamental principles laid down in the British North America Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid that I could not accede to that amendment. The resolution amended in that way would be a great improvement on the resolution moved by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), but there is this objection: I think it might be possible to get the assent of the provinces to such a change being made in the British North America Act with the amendment suggested by my hon. friend: that this parliament be enabled to amend the constitution after having secured the assent of all the provinces to the amendment made by parliament, but I say even to get this amendment before the Imperial parliament you must have the consent of the provinces. That is my objection to the proposal, even as amended by my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). It becomes a much fairer proposal, but the provinces have a right to be consulted before this is asked from the British parliament; and I submit even with this amendment the Parliament of Canada has not the constitutional right to pass an address to the Imperial parliament to amend the Act of Confederation without first submitting the proposal to the provinces.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I had not intended to speak on this debate, but there are one or two things that have not been said which I think perhaps ought to be said. I agree very largely with what my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has said. I think he has made it perfectly clear what the real situation is, in so far as parliament is concerned, in so far as the provinces are concerned, and in so far as provincial rights are concerned, apart altogether from any question of minority rights. There is a good deal more reserved in the British North America Act than the mere question of minorities; and with what my hon. friend has said in that regard I absolutely agree. But I would like to get a little more clearly defined what all the trouble is. What are we talking about? What grievances do we want wiped out? How far do we advance ourselves to clarify the issue by adopting this or any other resolution? Let us go a little bit further. Where is the real trouble in connection with any act of autonomy in Canada? It is in Canada and in Canada solely. None of the different powers of government to-day is retained by the Mother Country. We have them all here, either provincial or Dominion. What function does the mother parliament to-day serve? She really only performs the function of recording the conclusions that Canadian authorities, provincial and Dominion, agree upon. Is there anything very much wrong with that? Is there really anything in that of great importance at a time when, as the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) says, we are chiefly concerned as to how people are going to live to-day? Is there anything in it of sufficient importance to warrant taking up very much time? How does this matter come up at any rate? There is no dispute certainly as between England and Canada, but a dispute having regard to the maintenance of provincial institutions in Ontario. That is what the dispute is about and nothing else. Does anyone here think it is worth while for a minute referring to the provinces the question of the settlement of that jurisdiction? It is settled. It always was settled. I have heard something said in the House to-day about the Privy Council. Well the Privy Council did not make that law. We all understood the law. I am speaking now as a matter of recollection, but I think it was in connection with the trouble at Edmonton concerning a municipal activity, when we were about to do the same thing as was done in Toronto, and our own Department of Justice advised the government that the step ought not to be taken, that it would raise at once an issue under which the Dominion would be putting its hand directly on a municipal institution, and when you put your hand upon a municipal institution you are affecting something which is entirely read out of the jurisdiction of parliament in so many words. In connection with a municipal institution which is carried on for the purpose of getting cheap utilities and cheap light and power, it is idle to say that it has to do with the matter of Trade and Commerce, when the very act dealing with the matter, the British North America Act, says that municipal institutions are absolutely and entirely reserved to the province. It is not new law at all. It is the law as given to the preceding government by its own legal department. Just so long as we kept out of the field where our own federal officers told us we could not go we had a very useful act. Just as soon as we put our hands where we were told we had no right to go, we are told, and properly told, in effect that our own legal advisers were correct.

The thing now for us to do is to talk this over with the provincial parliaments, not talking about getting through any general resolution which will take us really nowhere, because no general resolution—and everybody knows that is perfectly correct—will ever be consented to by the provinces. Why should they consent? Why should they consent to an abridgement of their rights by one single jot or tittle, until they know what they are dealing with? If we have concrete principles to submit to the provinces, there is some sense in submitting them; but we will never have any hope of getting through a general amendment to the British North America Act which will tell us that the sovereign power over these provinces is in this Dominion.

What is really the trouble? In Canada at present we are wasting a great deal of time just talking about constitutional questions, theoretical questions. Why are we doing so? Is there anything after all, about our connection with the Old Motherland that we are ashamed of or want to change? Whom are we trying to please? It is often said that these things do not hurt or do not matter. They do not at home. We know perfectly well that some of us like to take a certain amount of intellectual exercise, just showing how wise we are about this problem and that problem, no matter what it is or what claim is put forward on behalf of Canada, looking to enlarged powers as against the Mother Country, and we know that the great bulk of the Canadian people are only too well satisfied to let things rest just as they are; that they desire to maintain the British connection, and that they are proud of their connection with the British Empire. If they are not and if we are not doing this merely as a form of intellectual exercise, what is the real trouble? What real grievance have we as regards our position in the British Empire as it stands to-day? Are we not free enough? Why, as the minister himself says, any request that comes from Canada to the British House will be respected by the British House. She is not tying nor holding us. We are free to do what we want. What do we want to do? What really do my hon. friends desire to do? I wonder if the Minister of Justice, in connection with those other matters that are to be discussed, has also before him the question of the limitation of the right of a Canadian to appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That question has not been considered.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON. I am glad to hear him say so. He has, however, an omnibus clause under which many things might be proposed, but I am glad he says that this matter has not been considered. While at home we all know that these things mean really nothing, on the other hand the stranger outside the gate does not know that, and many a thing is being said in Canada that is being looked upon as perhaps the first sign of the disintegration of the British Empire.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

REPORT

Annual report of the Ottawa Improvement Commission for the year ended March 31, 1924.—Hon. Mr. Robb.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That Messrs. Anderson, Bancroft, Gordon, Putnam, Papineau, Rinfret, Vien, Wallace and Wilson be appointed to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant as far as the interests of the Commons are concerned and to act as members of a joint committee of both Houses on the restaurant; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

He said: The object of the bill is to make a few necessary changes in the act that went through on the last day of last session. I suggested these amendments at that time to the minister in charge of the bill, but he said he preferred to have the amendment this year rather than deal with it at the end of the session without consulting the officers of his department. He thought that if the amendments were pressed at that stage the whole bill would have to go over until this year.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—FREIGHT THROUGH PORTLAND

Mr. MacLAREN:

What amount of freight, originating in Canada, passed over the Canadian National Railway to Portland, Maine, for transportation overseas, during the years 1923 and 1924?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

Package freight	Tons
1923	105,623
1924	84,774
Cattle	Head
1923	9,820
1924	6,921
Grain	Bushels
1923	19,048,819
1924	7,480,183

TAX EXEMPT BONDS

Mr. WALLACE:

What is the total amount of Dominion of Canada bonds outstanding free from income tax?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: $982,386,900.

CATARACT POWER COMPANY

Mr. CHAPLIN:

1. Has the government a contract to supply water for power purposes with the Cataract Power Company?
2. If so (a) when was the contract made? (b) when does it terminate?
3. What is the price charged for water?
4. Is more water being used than the contract calls for?
5. What amount of water in excess of contract was used during the last previous year of the contract?
6. What amount of money was collected for such excess water?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.
2. (a) December 31, 1902; (b) December 31, 1965
3. $30,000 per annum to December 31, 1923. Subsequent price under adjustment.
4. Yes.
5. Determination of this not yet completed.
6. Nothing yet collected.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. CHURCH:

What immigration came into Canada during the years 1922, 1923, 1924; (a) from the United States; (b) from the British Isles; (c) from the continent of Europe?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

Calendar year	Immigration from
	U.S.	Brit. Isles	Europe
1922	23,733	31,005	12,552
1923	20,307	70,110	39,288
1924	16,328	57,612	47,029

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. KELLNER:

1. What has been the total cost of acquiring land, and of construction, at the Buffalo park at Wainwright, Alberta?

[Mr. MacLaren.]

2. What is the total cost to date of the Jasper park?
3. What is the total cost to date of the Buffalo park near Fort Smith?
4. What has been the cost of administration in each of the above parks?
5. What has been the revenue derived from each of the above parks?
6. What was the cost of the government buildings, fencing, etc., at Fort Smith?
7. What is the amount of the contract entered into, for the moving of buffalo from Wainwright to the north park?

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY OUTLET

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I would like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) if he has yet received the joint report of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways regarding a direct railway outlet from Peace river to the Pacific coast? If not, what progress has been made in the preparation of the report and how soon will it be completed and in his hands?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railway and Canals): The reference to the heads of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways was not to find an outlet to the Pacific coast through the Peace river district; it was, if possible, to have some understanding arrived at between the two railways as to a joint development or otherwise of that district. A conference was held a few weeks ago in the Railway department the result of which, after hearing the various discussions, was that the heads of the two railways were asked if they could not come to some decision and make a recommendation to the government as to what they thought should be done, without duplication of railway lines. Their suggestions have not yet been received, and I am not in a position to say just how far the negotiations have proceeded, but I wrote the heads of both railways some days ago asking them to expedite a decision on the reference that had been made to them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister say in this connection whether the heads of the railways are asked to advise as to the best method of outlet assuming that some method must now be found, or are they asked to advise as to whether any method should be found?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would rather think, from the discussions that took place, that they both had in their minds that some outlet should be found for the Peace river district, either immediately or in the near future; but the question referred to them was merely a conversation with the gentlemen who were present, and I believe they will give us their full views on the whole situation.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): But more or less on the idea of co-operation between the two companies?

Mr. GRAHAM: I might say, yes, I think.

ALLEGED FRUIT COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Has the government received, and if so will it file, a report by Lewis Duncan, a commissioner under the Combines Act, who investigated charges affecting certain companies alleged to be in a fruit combine in western Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) is not in the House at present, but I shall direct his attention to the question of my hon. friend, and have an answer given to him at a subsequent sitting.

ALTERNATIVE VOTE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I should like to know from the Prime Minister if he can tell the House when the government propose to re-introduce the alternative vote bill that had a first reading last session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I shall have to say to my hon. friend that I am not able to give him an answer at the moment, but if he will "wait and see," I have no doubt it will not be long before he will find out.

GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): I desire to ask if the government will lay upon the table of the House the evidence submitted to the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): I will direct the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to my hon. friend's question. Speaking for the Department of Finance, I should like to say—and I hope my hon. friend will agree with me—that as the commission was in session for over a year, if we were to print for distribution all the evidence taken, it would involve a very large expenditure, and I imagine that few people would read it.

Mr. GOULD: It was not my intention to ask for the printing of the evidence, but that the evidence be laid on the table so that it would be available to hon. members. Speaking for myself I would like to have an opportunity of looking over some of the evidence given.

Mr. ROBB: I will direct the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to my hon. friend's request.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF MAKING AMENDMENTS

The House resumed, from February 18, consideration of the proposed resolution of Mr. Maclean (York), and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Woodsworth.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, at the time the House rose yesterday I think we were all pretty well agreed at least upon one thing, and that is that it had been well demonstrated by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that no good purpose could be served by passing the resolution, but that on the other hand mischief might well result from it. I am disposed, however, to think that a good deal of good perhaps will come of the discussion which this resolution has forced upon the House.

The first thing that seems to be quite clearly established from what the hon. Minister of Justice has told us is that all our constitutional difficulties are of our own making. That is the first proposition which I think is absolutely and amply established.

The second proposition is that all such difficulties arise owing to the infringement of rights, either provincial or dominion. I take it that there can be no dispute whatever with that proposition.

There is a third proposition, which I hope will find just as immediate acceptance in the minds of all hon. gentlemen, and which I believe requires no demonstration; and that is that Canada to-day is content, and well content, to remain as Canada is, a part, and I hope a part of constantly increasing influence for good, but still a part, of the greatest political entity the world has yet seen, and I think will ever see—the British Empire. I hope again there is absolutely no room for doubt on that.

If we get these three propositions firmly in our minds, if they are really understood by our people, this will have been a very useful discussion.

Now, as to the first proposition. It seems to me that very little need be said in connection with that, namely that all our constitutional difficulties are difficulties of our own making. I do not think there was any member in the House who was not convinced and carried by the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice in that regard. It was clear, and he had a wealth of authority for every proposition that he advanced, indeed the fact is well known by everybody, or ought to be, that our constitution, complain about it as we may, is of our own making.

The second proposition I think is equally clear, and that is that the constitutional troubles which we have arise over questions which are founded upon infringement of provincial rights on the one hand or of Dominion rights on the other. Can there be any dispute about that? It is such an important thing, particularly at this present time that we should all thoroughly understand that our constitutional difficulties are difficulties each with the other—not only difficulties of our own making, but difficulties each with the other, and they never should be looked upon or made use of for one minute by anybody as a reason for creating discontent with Canada's status within the British Empire. Now is there any doubt about it? Every constitutional difficulty which we have is a difficulty which is founded either upon an infringement of provincial rights by the Dominion or upon an infringement of Dominion rights by the provinces. The whole history of decided cases shows that. What claim does Great Britain or the empire make to-day upon anything Canadian? What objection does either make to any Canadian activity? We all know there is absolutely none.

What are the two questions which have given rise to this issue to-day, which has taken, I think, a most mistaken form? The more immediate one is what has happened to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. But what did we learn there? We learned nothing new but something we had always known, and that is that municipal institutions belong to the provinces and not to the Dominion. Is there any hon. gentleman in this House who would like to take the responsibility of declaring negatively on that principle? Is there any issue about it, is there anything to confer about in so far as municipal institutions are concerned? So far at any rate no public man in Canada has been bold enough to make that claim. Municipal institutions are the creations and the work of the provincial legislatures, which are all-powerful in that respect, and the act carrying out the agreement between those legislatures and the Dominion says so. Again I ask the question, does any hon. gentleman want to debate the right of this parliament to interfere with local autonomy?—to interfere with the city of Toronto's waterworks, or the city of Toronto's electric light system, or the city of Toronto's police force, and the like? Nobody does, and if he did he would have no regard for his own reputation. It is inconceivable.

What is the other question? We learn that, under the agreement of confederation, property and civil rights are matters which are left to the provinces. Well, I wonder how many people think that the Dominion knows better than the provinces what ought to be done with property and civil rights. I wonder how many provinces would feel like handing over the control of their property and civil rights to the Dominion, or, conversely, how many people in the Dominion think the federal authority ought to try to wrest those rights from the provinces? The whole truth of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that Canada's difficulties are not constitutional, they are functional. It is not so much the structure, it is what we are doing with the structure, that is making trouble to-day in Canada—nothing else. Suppose we were to be asked to correct the troubles of Canada, how would we go about it? How would we characterize it? I think we would say, in the first place, lack of employment. I think we would say, in the second instance, the loss that comes from lessened employment, the diminished pay rolls and purchasing power. I think we would say, in the third instance, lack of population. I think we would say, in the fourth instance, the exodus to the United States. And I think we would say finally, burdensome taxation. Mr. Speaker, in the name of common sense what constitutional difficulties arise by reason of these troubles?—which I think will be generally admitted to be the chief troubles in the country. What constitutional difficulties confront us in connection with their consideration? None, absolutely none. All that is necessary to do is to put the question in order to elicit that response. That is not the trouble. We have got any amount of constitutional power to deal with all these questions, with all the questions which are due to our troubles to-day. No, it is not a question of law, it is not a constitutional question, it is a functional disease which afflicts this country very badly at the present time. In other words our constitution enables us to function, and if we are not functioning it is our own fault and not the fault of the constitution.

Now, suppose we go to the third point—I have no desire to speak at undue length—and that is that the general feeling in Canada to-day is one of perfect willingness to still continue to form an important—and as I said before an ever increasingly important—part of the British Empire. There ought to be no room for doubt as to that. I admit that we have a lot of dialecticians who go up and down the country cleverly arguing that black is white, and never content until they have proved it to their own satisfaction. I admit that, but I am also equally positive in affirming that the Canadian people want no such changes, they want to carry on business as they are carrying on business now, they want a fair chance of considering on their merits the real troubles, functional as they are, of this country, without constitutional and other difficulties being constantly drawn over the track. We know that the heart of Canada beats as strongly and as truly as it did in 1914. But there is the stranger that is without the gates, there is the man who does not know, there is the man who holds every ill-considered word, every effort to get something for nothing, as an evidence of the dismemberment of the British Empire. All you have got to do to see that is simply to read the papers. I have heard some gentlemen say—not in this House I gladly admit—that it ill became the Canadian people to form part of a warlike empire like the British Empire. Mr. Speaker, can you imagine greater nonsense? I wish some of the gentlemen who talk that way would take the trouble to go over to the good old Mother Country, bleeding herself white, as she is, in order to honestly and fairly discharge her obligations to society—to society, yes, and to her own people,—to discharge her obligations to her own people as well as her international obligations. I should like them to go over there and consider exactly the plight the grand old country is in. Why, if there is a country in the world that is interested in peace, that is interested in commerce, it is Great Britain. Every man knows it. What is the reason of her position to-day? What is the reason there are 1,200,000 unemployed men walking the streets of Britain supported by her ratepayers and a burden on her diminished commerce? Every thoughtful mind knows it. We know very well that we could have issues on fiscal policy, but over and above fiscal policy, there is the fact that of all the nations in the world the Mother Country is the great trading country, she trades in every quarter of the globe, and her markets as a result of the war are such that, workshop of the world as she has been called, she can scarcely function any longer with efficiency. I happened to be in England this year, and one thing that a man, no matter how suspicious his mind might be, could not find there was anybody who wanted war, or further expeditions, or further incursions, or further risks.

No, no. The whole truth is simply this: that by taking our share and our part, I hope some day we will be able to so run things in this country, so adjust our financial affairs that we shall be in a position to play a worthy part; but I think the best thing for Canada to-day, not only for herself but for a world sadly rent by war, is to stay just where she is within the boundaries of the one great vehicle through which peace to-day can be ensured, the British Empire.

Mr. CRERAR: Does the hon. gentleman seriously argue that if we were given the right to amend our own constitution, which Australia and South Africa have, it would in any way weaken the ties of the empire about which he is talking so loudly?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are talking frankly, and I am going to talk frankly to my hon. friend, and I tell him that he can find in the newspapers to-day, even in some newspapers in his own province, as we have heard from one gentleman sitting to my left, the affirmation that there was talk of secession, talk of sliding out of the empire.

An hon. MEMBER: Secession.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Make it any session you like; they are all evil sessions. I wonder if my hon. friend for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) thinks that would be a good thing.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is not the point. There is another joke.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the hon. member—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: One at a time. What was the joke?—secession from Canada or from the empire?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not refer to that. There was a joke about carrying this over to the next "session."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the hon. gentleman tell the House what the exact reference to secession was? Was it secession from the empire he was referring to?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would refer to both. I think both would be most mischievous. And I desire to tell my hon. friend another thing: there is no worse service than can be done not only to the world, not only to the British Empire or to Canada, than talk which of itself may be absolutely harmless, but which in the eyes of the outsider may be looked upon, and unfortunately has been looked upon, as evidence of a desire on the part of this country to sever at any rate some of the relations with the empire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the fault I find with my hon. friend's speech at the present time. I do not think there is any such thing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend I am afraid does not want to get the point. I agree that there is none. I have been saying that there is none, but I do say that anything and everything which goes in the slightest degree to throw any question upon what I believe to be the absolute fundamental truth is bad all round, bad for both of our mother countries, and this country in particular. If England needs peace, France certainly needs peace; and to-day if there is one thing which is a nightmare in France it is the thought of the return of the Germans, and if there is one thing that gives a fair chance, a fair hope, of a solution of the whole difficulty, it is the co-operation of France and Great Britain. And if we do everything we can to assure the outside world that we are with those great countries to the fullest extent, that we, as part and parcel of the British Empire desire to see that everything is done which would bring pacification so earnestly desired by both of those great countries, then we are playing the best part we can play. And in playing that part any suggestion that there is any desire to in any way weaken our ties with the Mother Country, with the empire, works harm to the general good, to Canada, to France, to Great Britain and the empire itself.

Let us recapitulate. Let us understand that none of these troubles are troubles which should be held against either the Mother Country on the one hand or the British Empire itself; that all our constitution difficulties, our difficulties of the moment, are difficulties of our own making; that all the troubles that give rise to these difficulties are the infringement of rights, either provincial or Dominion; and that Canada absolutely and fully is mistress within her own house.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I may be tilting at a few more windmills, but I hope not to take so long at it as my hon. friend who has just spoken. I should like to suggest to the House that we should seriously consider the dangers of a too rigid constitution. I am not disposed to deny what I think is most generally accepted, that our difficulties are of our own making; but it does not make them less difficulties, it does not make them less real; and I do sincerely hope we may avoid any possibility of friction and danger arising out of a too rigid constitution by taking the suggestion which was made yesterday by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and submitting this whole question to this conference which is to be called, in order that they may fully and frankly discuss it. I am satisfied that whatever may be the views of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) there is a feeling in Canada fairly widely prevalent that the situation at the present time is not satisfactory, that some modification ought to be made, and I am only going to throw out this suggestion. If, for instance, the reformation, the modification, or the abolition, of the Senate is under consideration in this country, and our constitution binds us so that one province can absolutely tie up the whole matter and prevent action for all time to come, we are face to face with a very serious practical difficulty and will have to meet it. The confederation pact or constitution may be a treaty. We shall have to observe our obligations. But it occurs to me that treaties need modification from time to time as conditions change. I have in my mind a little matter that some year or two ago gave considerable trouble to the government, namely the dispute arising between the Six Nations Indians in my own constituency and the Dominion as to the jurisdiction of Canada in that reserve. The Indians claimed that they were a separate nation, guaranteed all solemn rights by the Haldimand treaty. Although that might be so, a literal application of that contention would reduce us to such absurdities of practice that nobody in his senses would refuse to admit the need of modification. I do plead with the House with the member for St Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Morin) who spoke so well yesterday on this question, that we ought to face the situation from the present point of view, and perhaps there is no better way than that suggested by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I do trust, that the matter will not be overlooked and that the conference may not sit and ignore this really important feature.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): In speaking of the confederation pact, I think that we must approach it with great caution. I fully agree with the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that a pact which was entered into at a conference where all the component parts of what was then Canada were represented should not be lightly dealt with or amended, without a conference where the opinions of the representatives of all those provinces which now form part of the Dominion could be collected and fully considered. I do not believe that even the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) would guarantee that element of safety which all the provinces of Canada desire and need, namely that the constitution shall not be corrected or amended detrimentally to any of its component parts. The hon member for South York (Mr. Maclean) has suggested that this parliament should be empowered to amend our constitution. I do not believe that it was ever the intention of the Fathers of Confederation to give to this parliament power to change the basis of confederation, and it would be a radical amendment to give to this parliament such power. I do not believe, either, that this parliament, after obtaining powers from the various provinces, should be able to suggest an amendment to confederation. On the contrary, I would suggest that if any amendments are to be proposed, the best way is that suggested in the Speech from the Throne, by convening a conference from all sections of Canada and letting all those who will be convened there fully discuss the proposed amendments, consider the pros and cons, and come to a concrete and definite proposition.

It is very curious to read in the newspapers, as is suggested by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), that there is a state of unrest in Canada and that to remedy it we should amend the constitution.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say that.

Mr. VIEN: I understood him to say that he read in the newspapers talk of secession, talk of many causes of unrest, and that the proposal of the hon. member for South York was simply a step to put into effect some proposed remedies to the grievances which, he said, are complained of in the newspapers. I do not believe that there is such unrest in Canada at present in respect of our constitutional conditions. True, the Senate has been sometimes attacked; true, it might be useful to amend it. As a democrat, I should like to see the upper house fully representative of public opinion in Canada. I do not believe in a Senate where the members are appointed for life, and some of them have certainly outlived, much longer than could be fairly anticipated, the period of the services that they were called upon to render. I believe that the Senate should be elective—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. VIEN: I hear some aspirants who do not wish their chances to be impaired. But outside of those who have any aspirations, I believe every true democrat in Canada would like to see the upper house truly representative of public opinion in this country, and to obtain that end, we should make it elective. It is, perhaps, advisable that the period of tenure of office be not the same as that of members of the House of Commons. This is the case in many other countries, and we can take, with advantage, a lesson from the constitutions of some other countries. Consider, for instance, the constitution of France, where the Senate is elected for a period of nine years, renewable by thirds every three years. That will furnish the safety-valve, the degree of guarantee that at a given moment parliament will not be stampeded by a current of opinion. Apart from that, however, I do not believe that the laws of a democratic country should be passed by one of the Houses of Parliament which is not responsible to the people of Canada; but the best way to obtain that amendment is, as I say, that suggested in the Speech from the Throne, by convening a conference of all those who were a party to the pact of confederation and getting their opinions, so that the objections, if any, might be heard.

I, for one, would like to see some changes in our constitution. Some years ago, after the Treaty of Versailles, I heard in this House some hon. gentlemen then sitting on the treasury benches, for instance, Right Hon. Mr. Doherty and other members of the former administration, contending that Canada was a nation; that a dazzling light had been shed on this country showing her forth to the nations of the world a nation equal to all the others. These were fine words, and if they were not absolutely true, they expressed, I think, the ardent desire of all true Canadians who are proud to come out of the period of infancy, who want to become of age and to exercise all the powers that rest with a man and citizen. But these words, that Canada is a nation, do not mean, nor do I believe that any important section of public opinion in Canada holds them to mean, secession from the British Empire. So that when we hear the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) saying that there are important sections of the Canadian people who sincerely desire secession from the British Empire, I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sure the hon. member who is speaking is mistaken. The hon. member for West York made or suggested no such thing.

Mr. VIEN: What did he suggest?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not propose to repeat his speech, but I should say he made it clear on several occasions that he only deprecated language which suggested that such a feeling existed.

Mr. VIEN: That is what I am referring to. The hon. member for West York deprecated the fact that many newspapers and many public speakers showed a tendency towards secession from the empire.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did not say that.

Mr. VIEN: That is what I understood.

Mr. HOCKEN: You are mixed up.

Mr. VIEN: I understood him to say so. At any rate, I am glad if the hon. member believes as I do, that no important section of public opinion in Canada desires to see anything of this kind. We all do really desire to maintain the connection with the British Empire. But if we are a nation, if, to use the words of a former Minister of Justice, a dazzling light has been shed on this country showing her forth as a nation equal to all others among the nations of the world, then it seems to me that some amendments to our constitution should be brought about so that the facts may be made to agree with the assertions. What other nation under the sun is there, independent, equal to all others, which has to send in last resort its appeal to the tribunal of any other country? Which one, among all the other independent nations of the world, is obliged to pass through the machinery of some ambassador of a different country in order to be accredited to foreign powers? Which among the independent nations of the world is obliged to receive as its chief magistrate a man appointed at the suggestion of an authority which is not within the country itself? I say, therefore, that if we are really a nation, as I hope we shall become, and always within the British Commonwealth, I should like to see the Governor General of Canada appointed, not on the advice of the British ministry but on the advice of the Canadian ministers to His Majesty the King.

Mr. MARTELL: Is the hon. gentleman's argument not tantamount to the fact that we are not a nation? And does it not go further and assert that when we do become a nation, in the way he asks that we should achieve that status, this will amount to an absolute declaration of independence and of secession?

Mr. VIEN: Not at all.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MARTELL: There is no other way out of it.

Mr. VIEN: Not at all. I say, however, that we are not a nation equal in all respects to some of the independent nations of the world. Even the little principality of Monaco has a greater independence than the Dominion of Canada. In 1920 I was in Paris and met a very distinguished Can-

4 p.m. adian statesman. He wished to have an interview with the President of the French republic and for this purpose he went to the office of the Canadian High Commissioner in Paris. The High Commissioner could not arrange the interview, however. Why? Simply because the Canadian High Commissioner in Paris is not accredited to the President of the French republic. This gentleman had to go to the British embassy and there request the British ambassador to arrange the meeting with the President of the French republic. Yet any citizen of the small principality of Monaco can go to the minister of that country in Paris and without any other formality have a similar meeting arranged. I do not contend that it is a matter of capital importance, but I do think that it is a matter of national dignity; and it seems to me that our high commissioners abroad, in England, France and other countries, should have the same standing as the diplomatic ministers who represent Roumania, Greece, Belgium and other nations that are hardly of any greater importance to-day than Canada.

As regard appeals to the Privy Council, it may be in our interest to remain in the present situation in respect of appeals on constitutional matters as well as in respect of appeals of grace to His Majesty. The Privy Council advise His Majesty the King on certain questions, particularly in appeals of grace; and in matters of this kind it might be well for us to remain as we are. But I fail to see why we should uselessly multiply appeals in matters of civil rights and of local interest. Why should we multiply uselessly these appeals and ask a few gentlemen sitting in London, for whom I have the greatest respect, finally to dispose of questions of this character affecting civil rights, commercial rights and other affairs of that kind within the province of our own parliament and legislatures to pass upon?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are we to understand by an "appeal of grace"? It is a new term to me.

Mr. VIEN: I am sure it cannot be a new term to the right hon. gentleman. An appeal of grace is one, not of right, that is made to His Majesty the King and which His Majesty, as the fountain of right, can always grant to his subjects. It is one of the privileges of the crown of England to grant an appeal to the Privy Council when it chooses to do so, even when such appeal does not lie as of right. My right hon. friend must know that, I am sure. And besides, there is the appeal of grace in criminal matters, in which His Majesty can always exercise that prerogative of pardon which everyone recognizes as inherent in the British crown. So that as regards the exercise of the prerogatives of the crown, I would by no means try to curtail them. Of course my right hon. friend knows that this grace is exercised on the advice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, who advise His Majesty in respect of them. So far as that is concerned I would maintain the appeal. I would maintain it also in matters which have reference to our constitutional rights. The tribunal in London may be more independent and more apt to render justice when questions arise with regard to the respective rights of the Dominion or of the provinces. In respect to that, some have quoted the example of the highest tribunals of France and of the United States, and we have pointed out that in those countries even constitutional questions are determined by the highest court in the land. On these three points, therefore, I think we might well correct our constitution with a view to having the Canadian nation conform in this respect to the status, which, it has been urged, she attained following the treaty of Versailles and the various other treaties which were signed thereafter. I do not believe we can fairly boast of being a nation equal to all others until some such changes as these take place; until then we are not equal to the other nations of the world. As to the method of bringing about any such amendment, I fully agree with that set forth in the Speech from the Throne and explained yesterday by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) as the only method by which we should proceed in any attempt to give all sections of the Canadian people who entered into the confederation pact of 1867 the right to amend it. As in the case of a contract between private individuals, you cannot change the British North America Act without first convening a conference similar to that as the result of which the act originally came into being.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN: (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I have always had a high opinion of the intuitive qualities of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), and have regarded him as well able to interpret the sentiment of the people. But I am afraid that his retirement from the field of journalism has somewhat weakened his intuitions.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): But I continue to read the Orange Sentinel.

Mr. HOCKEN: Then, Mr. Speaker, we may look for some improvement on the part of my hon. friend. But on this matter that he has brought before the House I think he has entirely misunderstood or misinterpreted the sentiment of the people of this country. What is all the clamour about, anyway? Is my hon. friend not satisfied that Canada is free? Have we not as much liberty as any nation in the world? Are we suffering because of the present state of affairs? If my hon. friend wants the House to adopt this resolution he ought to be able to show that we are suffering under some disability. I submit that we are not.

Mr. VIEN: If my hon. friend will allow me, does he not know that the Canadian High Commissioner in London is complaining of the inferiority of his status in diplomatic circles there?

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, I do not think the farmers or working men in this country are suffering because of that. If my hon. friend thinks that this country is standing upon its dignity and demanding some kind of recognition for the high commissioner.

Mr. VIEN: If my hon. friend will allow me a correction, it is not so much a question of dignity as a question of practical usefulness.

Mr. HOCKEN: If the present high commissioner is unable to perform his duties properly or usefully as a representative of Canada without some additional recognition, the best thing we can do is to bring him home and appoint a substitute. We never had any such complaints from his predecessors.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend think that the substitute or the next appointee would do any better if he had the same status?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not satisfied that this country is suffering because of the status of the high commissioner in London.

Mr. VIEN: We are.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not see it.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It is a lame joke.

Mr. HOCKEN: So far as I have been able to discover, there are only three or four men in Canada—a very small group, at any rate —who want any change in our constitutional status. There is Mr. J. S. Ewart, who breaks out every little while; and Sir Clifford Sifton, who makes speeches at Rotary clubs, and so on; but apart from those two and my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), I do not know anybody who is in distress about our present constitutional position. Unless it can be shown that we are suffering in some respects I do not see why we should consider any change.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will the hon. gentleman address himself to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who recently discussed this question and said he was going to call a convention for certain purposes?

Mr. HOCKEN: The Minister of Justice points out, as I understand it, that in accordance with the suggestion in the Speech from the Throne a conference of the Dominion and the provinces is to be called to discuss the position of the Senate.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: And other matters.

Mr. HOCKEN: Now, is the idea underlying this a desire for the independence of Canada?

Mr. VIEN: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: Will my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, York) answer that?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I will answer it, yes,

Mr. HOCKEN: Now?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Right now—no, I am in favour of giving to Canada complete autonomy in her own affairs by her having a voice in the making and in the interpretation of her constitution, within the bounds of her connection with the British Empire. The more freedom you give Canada in that way the stronger she will be within the empire.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am unable to see that our freedom is in any way restricted under the present conditions. If my hon. friend does not want Canada to become an independent nation so that we can send our own ambassadors to Paris, as has been suggested, at enormous cost to this country—a cost which is at present met out of the imperial exchequer, affording a service which is just as good as that which could be given by any person we would send—if he does not want Canada to be independent, why bother about this proposed change? Up to the present time the British North America Act has answered very well in this country. I cannot recall any attack that has been made upon it as insufficient to meet the needs of Canada. We must remember that this was an act that the Imperial government passed in order to establish harmony in this Dominion. We had three different groups in Canada, all under different governments, and by this time we would have had four or perhaps five had the confederation not taken place. The British North America Act was passed to harmonize the groups that then existed and to start Canada on its way to nationhood within the empire. I submit that it has accomplished that purpose, and accomplished it better, perhaps, than any instrument that can be cited as a parallel in any part of the world. That being the case, why should we now begin an agitation to destroy the existing conditions and introduce something which in my judgment would be a greater cause of friction and inharmony in Canada than the British North America Act? If we want our constitution amended at any time we can have that done. We have had the act amended every time we have asked for it, and we can have it amended again in any particular at any time we ask for it. We are not tied down by some ironclad agreement that cannot be amended if the country as a whole desire to amend it. And if we had this new constitution it would not be right to amend it by the bare majority as my hon. friend suggests. That certainly would not lead to the continuance of harmony and good feeling throughout this country. I object on principle to the proposal of the resolution that these two houses of parliament can at any time amend our constitution by a majority. I think that would be a dangerous thing to do. We must remember that we have in the Maritime provinces, in the western provinces, and in Quebec and Ontario, views that are widely divergent, and if by reason of a preponderance of members from one particular section, say the west, the constitution could be amended to the disadvantage of the Maritime provinces, as the people of those provinces might consider, then we would have a state of friction in this country that would be dangerous and that might lead to something a great deal worse than anything that is possible under present conditions. In the United States they can amend their constitution only if two-thirds of the states by a two-thirds majority agree to it. The most substantial safeguards are provided there against amending their constitution. There should also be safeguards in this country, and the very best safeguard we can get is to make it requisite for this country to go to the imperial authorities under whom we live and move and have our being as a nation, and let them act as arbitrators in whatever it is desired to do in Canada in the way of changing our constitution. Give Canada the right to change its constitution by a majority of these two houses of parliament, as my hon. friend proposes, and limit that as you will, provide as does this resolution that parliament would have no power to affect the rights of minorities, put that limitation in to-day, and there is no certainty, there can be no certainty, that that would be the limitation of the future. Give Canada the right to amend its constitution partially, and Canada will soon demand the right to amend its constitution wholly.

Mr. McMASTER: Why not?

Mr. HOCKEN: I object to it to this extent. My hon. friend from South York put in that limitation, and why he put it in I think the House can easily appreciate, but I am pointing out that that limitation is of no value. It might be at the moment, but it could not possibly be permanently, so he might as well wipe out that limitation and let the resolution read that Canada would have the right to amend its constitution in any and every particular. Within the limits of the proposed resolution, this House with the Senate could change the representation in parliament. There is nothing in the resolution to prevent that. This House and the Senate might some day say: We will make the representation from the province of Quebec fifty or forty, and the other provinces in proportion. Where would that land the Maritime provinces? It would give them a substantial grievance. Their representation, and their influence in this House, would be reduced enormously, and they would be able to say with justice that the arrangement upon which they joined in the Canadian confederation had been violated. They would have a distinct grievance which they might take to the imperial authorities, and perhaps they would ask for separation from this Dominion of Canada. It would certainly be to them a greater grievance than any they have had in the past or are likely to have under existing conditions.

Mr. CRERAR: Are the Maritime provinces guaranteed under the British North America Act any right to a specified number of representatives in this House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the Senate.

Mr. CRERAR: I mean in this House.

Mr. HOCKEN: They are guaranteed this: The representation of Quebec is sixty-five, and the Maritime representation is in the same proportion to their population.

Mr. CRERAR: The same as all the other provinces.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): They could not be deprived of their representation.

Mr. HOCKEN: Under this proposal they could. I think you would be able to change the representation in this House, as part of our constitution, under the resolution of my hon. friend, and while the Maritime provinces have twenty-nine representatives under existing conditions, and Quebec sixty-five, if you made the unit for Quebec thirty-five the Maritime provinces would then get only fifteen representatives. Instead of being represented on the floor of this House by twenty-nine members who could speak for them, they would have only fifteen members.

Mr. CRERAR: And Ontario only forty-one.

Mr. HOCKEN: Ontario proportionately lower, just so. That would be a grievance you would hear about from the provinces down by the sea. At the present time they do not think they are getting all they expected to get when they entered confederation. I think we will have to be careful about giving them any more substantial grievance. We have had from the west some talk of secession. My hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Hoey) and my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) are both on record in different places that there is a strong sentiment in favour of secession there. Will the right to change our constitution remove that? If there is any such sentiment there, and I am inclined to believe it is very much less than reported, it is not due to the fact that Canada cannot change its constitution, it is due entirely to what my hon. friends think are economic grievances. So if that sentiment exists, it is not going to be removed by anything that can be done under the proposal of my hon. friend from South York. The only effect, as I see it, of his proposal is to give aid and comfort to the enemies of the British Empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOCKEN: Some of my hon. friends laugh at that. They may not agree with me, but I am of the conviction that the British Empire has enemies in this world.

Mr. MORIN: Is Australia less loyal to the British Empire than we are?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not know that they are.

Mr. MORIN: They have power to amend their constitution.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not saying that any part of the empire is less loyal than we are. I am saying that outside of the empire there are enemies of the empire, and a proposal of this kind would appear to them as being the first step towards the cutting off of this Dominion from the commonwealth of nations which gives the empire its strength. For us to do such a thing would in my judgment be most injurious to imperial interests throughout the whole world.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would the hon. gentleman abolish the preferential treatment given to England in our tariff?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not talking tariffs just now.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): As I see it, the hon. member is going to support that preferential treatment and smash the empire, according to his ideas.

Mr. HOCKEN: I will talk preferential tariff when the budget comes up.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Talk about the question you have raised.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am doing so.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Follow it up.

Mr. HOCKEN: I say to my hon. friend that his proposal would be injurious to the empire and to Canada as well. I believe that the highest and best destiny for Canada is to be a part of the British Empire, not only now, but when she has double or treble or ten times her present population. I believe that Canada can make greater contributions to civilization as a part of the empire than under any other status. All hon. members will admit that the British Empire has made—I was going to say the greatest—contributions to civilization of any nation, but perhaps I ought to be considerate of some of my hon. friends opposite who have another mother country, and say that her contributions have been enormous. She has given free institutions to the world. She has developed them, and they have been copied by practically every other country. I am of the opinion that here in Canada we will in time by the admixture of the English, Irish, Scottish, French, and other blood develop a race of men that will be just a little superior to the race of the Old Land, and that as a result of our growth, individually and as a nation, we will be able to aid in the development of a higher civilization to a greater degree than even the Mother Country has done. The Canadian breed has shown what it is capable of doing in the war, and the Canadian people in civil life have never given a greater demonstration of their endurance under difficult conditions than they are doing to-day. So that whether it is in war or in civil life Canadians have the right to hold up their heads as among the most enduring, the most intelligent and, I think perhaps, the most capable of the nations of the world. We cannot be regarded in the light of slaves, or serfs, or anything of that kind; Canadians demonstrated that in 1837.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: When the blood of the French and other nationalities becomes intermixed would my hon. friend be willing to have the French language taught in all the provinces of Canada?

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, if it were necessary I could make an extended speech on that subject. But it will be sufficient, perhaps, to inform my hon. friend, if he is ignorant of the fact, that French is taught in every province of Canada. In reply to his question I have nothing more to say than that. Returning to my subject let me say that I believe Canada has more to gain, and that the empire has more to gain, by Canada's continuance in that empire, rather than by a change in a contrary direction. Our continuance in it, year by year and with every decade that passes, will strengthen that empire, and I do not see any reason why we should turn now and take the first step in the direction of independence unless we are suffering from difficulties that cannot be remedied otherwise.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I rise to speak on the amendment—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon member for Marquette has the floor.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the question which we are discussing is one of the most important, that could be brought before us. We could discuss tariffs, we could discuss financial matters, we could discuss estimates and the ordinary bills that come before this House and still remain within the realm of matters that are purely domestic, matters which by common consent can be changed as soon as the will of the parliament is made apparent to that end. But the question that was raised by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) in the motion before us touches the very life of the nation, it goes to the very core of our national being, and for that reason it is a question of first importance.

I must confess that in listening to my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) and to my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) I felt that they must have been very much in the realm of dreamland during the last ten years.

An hon. MEMBER: Rip Van Winkle.

Mr. HOCKEN: Pretty serious dreams.

Mr. CRERAR: The fact is that Canada has moved forward tremendously in the last fifty years. Those of us who have read history know the circumstances in Canada that brought about the confederation of the then existing provinces. I quite agree with the argument advanced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) yesterday that the confederation pact was in the nature of a treaty. It was the result of different provinces getting together and agreeing upon a solution that would lead them out of their difficulties. But while that was one of the reasons behind the confederation understanding or agreement in 1867, there was also another aspiration behind it, and it was voiced, perhaps most strongly, by the great architect of confederation, Sir John A. Macdonald, for in large measure he was the architect of confederation, even if he could not claim credit for originating the idea. And what was that aspiration? At that time we had on the northern part of the North American continent several distinct governments—crown colonies if you like, crown colonies, I mean, in the sense that while they enjoyed in very considerable measure the right of governing themselves, they were, so far as their relations with each other were concerned, completely isolated. And one of the most important, one of the strongest ideas behind the whole conception of confederation was that these several provinces might be united in one whole and form a nucleus for a nation on the northern half of North America. That hope is set out frequently in the confederation debates: and the notion that Sir John Macdonald had, the notion that the other Fathers of Confederation had, that they were laying the foundation for the establishment of a nation, a free nation, in North America, has simply been carried forward from that time until this. And we have made great advances Mr. Speaker, as I hope I shall presently show, in the fifty-six years that have elapsed since confederation.

Now what are the advances that we have made? In the first place let me say that these advances have come mainly, though not altogether by any means, within the last ten years, since the outbreak of the Great War in 1914. First, we raised an army, an immense army. We sent that army overseas, and it fought under the direction and under the control of the Canadian parliament. It was known as the Canadian army. It was not thrown in as part of the British army, nor was it recognized as part of the British army throughout the whole war. The second thing of even greater import that occurred was the fact that Canada claimed the right—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend say that the Canadian army was not under the same directing force as the British army on the field of battle?

Mr. CRERAR: It was under the same directing force as the British army at first, and later, like the rest of the allied forces came under the one control.

Mr. McMASTER: Paid by the Canadian parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It certainly was part of the British army.

Mr. CRERAR: In the same sense that the Australian and French forces were part of the allied army.

Mr. McMASTER: And paid by us.

Mr. CRERAR: The second point I come to is that when the treaty of Peace was negotiated at Versailles, Canada's representatives sat at the conference and signed that Peace treaty on behalf of this Dominion. Is there anyone in his senses who would assert that that was in contemplation at the time confederation was achieved? There is nothing on the record, so far as I have been able to find out, that would support that view.

We have made further progress. In 1919, as a result of negotiations between Sir Robert Borden, who was then Prime Minister of Canada, and the British government—and it is well known the question was taken up at that time with the United States—Canada secured the right to send to the United States an ambassador who would handle all matters affecting Canada at the capital of our great neighbour to the south. I ask again, was that contemplated when the confederation pact was established in 1867? Another step forward has been taken since then, when my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, clothed with power from His Majesty, went to Washington and negotiated with the United States a treaty covering the halibut fisheries on the Pacific ocean,—a treaty that has since been ratified by both this parliament and the United States, and which binds only these two countries. That is another evidence of progress in the matter of nationhood. All the evidence, Mr. Speaker, goes to prove beyond any question of doubt that we have advanced beyond the state we were in in 1867, when the four provinces with organized governments in what is now part of the territory of this Dominion were brought together.

When I come to the resolution of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) I say at once that I agree wholly with the purpose he has in mind. I think this country has risen to the state and the dignity, not only in the estimation of the people of Canada, but in her relations with the outside world, where we should have the right under certain conditions which I shall presently mention, of fixing and determining our own constitution. I do not agree with the method my hon. friend suggests. I do not think for a moment that it would be wise—and in this I quite agree with the objections raised by my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken)—to leave the question of amending our constitution to an open vote in this House or in the other branch of this parliament.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would the hon. gentleman expect a skeleton motion to be in the form of a detailed constitution?

Mr. CRERAR: No, but my hon. friend points out very definitely the plan he proposes to follow in securing the object he has in mind, and I would much have preferred if my hon. friend's resolution had simply been in a form to assert the right of the Canadian people to amend and change their own constitution under certain safeguards and certain conditions.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice yesterday argued that confederation was in the nature of a treaty, and I agree with him in that assertion. That being the case, his suggestion that the matter be approached through the avenue of a conference with all the provinces is the first step that should be taken in dealing with it. It is quite clear that in any consideration of this matter we must be governed by the circumstances of our situation. I can quite appreciate the anxiety, or, shall I say, even the fear, that my hon. friends from the province of Quebec may entertain as to the position which that province would be in in respect of the peculiar rights it enjoys under the constitution today, were we placed in the situation in this country where the constitution could be amended by the ordinary means of majority rule. Consequently I wish to state very clearly upon that matter that, in my humble opinion, the safeguards that our French Canadian fellow-citizens enjoy to-day under the federation arrangement should absolutely and irrevocably be provided for and maintained. There is no fair-minded person in the whole Dominion of Canada, I am convinced, who would wish for a single moment to deny them that right. I am convinced that a way can be found whereby the rights enjoyed by our French Canadian citizens which they naturally hold very dearly, can be safeguarded and the fullest protection given to them in that regard. We frequently ask ourselves the question—and, Mr. Speaker, let me point out that not only do Canadians ask themselves the question, but other countries are also commencing to ask the question—is Canada a nation? And notwithstanding the eloquent speeches delivered by my hon. friend for West Toronto and my hon. friend for West York we cannot escape giving an answer to that question. I dissent wholly from the view expressed by my hon. friend for West York and the view expressed by the hon. member for West Toronto that any suggestion that Canada be given the power to amend her own constitution is evidence of disloyalty to the Motherland. Sir, I resent that argument.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It is the old argument.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but I resent it.

Mr. HOCKEN: So far as I am concerned, I did not say that.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What did you charge me with?

Mr. CRERAR: I certainly, Mr. Speaker, would be the last man in this House to impute to my hon. friend for West Toronto anything I should not impute, and I think he appreciates that fact. But in one of those eloquent periods in my hon. friend's speech, he argued that we should not support the motion of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), not because he disagreed with the method, but because he disagreed with the principle of it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And the consequences of it.

Mr. CRERAR: He said: This will be the first step in breaking Canada away from the Motherland. Further, he dwelt upon the imperial authorities where we have to go to safeguard all the liberties and privileges that we enjoy at present, the imperial authority, he said, under which we live and move and have our being. I do not for a moment agree with my hon. friend in that respect. It is not disloyal to discuss a question that is of vital moment to the development of this nation. I like to think of Canada as a nation; I like to visualise the idea that we are going to grow as a nation, as a Canadian nation. I want to hear "O Canada," sung in every school in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. And I say to the hon. member for West Toronto and those who agree with him, that when I say that, I am not disloyal to Britain or British institutions. After all, what are the ties that bind us to the Motherland? They are not the ties of statutory enactments. Those ties are the weakest kind of ties that can hold this empire together. Those in Canada or elsewhere who rely upon statutory enactments to hold this empire together are building on the sand. What is it that binds us to the Motherland?

Mr. McMASTER: Liberty.

Mr. HOCKEN: God Save the King!

Mr. CRERAR: God Save the King, yes, if you like. But more than that: there is a common language; there is the fact that we derive our parliamentary institutions, our whole system of jurisprudence, our literature, our art—everything that we have that makes life worth while, from the Motherland. I agree wholly with the remark made by the hon. member for West Toronto, that the greatest contribution Britain has made to the public life of the world is the spirit of free institutions she has given to the world. Those are the ties which hold Canada to the Motherland and that will hold the different parts of this far-flung British Empire together.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has recited the ties which, he says, hold Canada to the Motherland. Do not all of those ties also bind the United States to the Motherland?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which one does not?

Mr. McMASTER: Most of them do, and should.

Mr. CRERAR: As a matter of fact, I think that in the relationships of the United States and the Motherland, blood is thicker than water and has proved so and may prove so again. The fact that the United States draws its traditions of parliamentary government, of justice, of literature, from British institutions and ideals, is a link that binds the United States also in a degree that other nations are not so bound to the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. JACOBS: It was because Great Britain refused to recognize the wider form of constitution which the United States desired that the latter became an independent nation.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is refusing Canada anything?

Mr. JACOBS: It was just an interjection.

Mr. CRERAR: There is just one other point that I wish to make, as I do not desire to participate now at any length in the debate, as a matter of fact, I had scarcely expected to take part in it, but I could not sit in my seat and listen to the arguments of the hon. member for West Toronto without challenging them. What are we in Canada? We are all good Canadians who want to see this country prosper. We realize the economic and financial difficulties which the country is passing through. We realize the difficulties in government, in maintaining a national unity, that arise from our geographical conditions and also from the—shall I say? —mixed character of our population. We have the great province of Quebec, with its three million French-Canadians, as loyal and fine a class of citizens as we have in the Dominion. We have the citizens of Canada of Anglo-Saxon origin. We have, in addition to that, hundreds of thousands of citizens, people who have come to this country from alien lands to make their homes here, to grow up and develop as Canadians. What is the thing that will best draw all these elements together? Is it not some pride in a national spirit, some conception of a national entity? Can you develop that under any conditions of inferiority? I submit it is a condition of inferiority that the Canadian people of their own free will, cannot amend their own constitution without reference to another authority. What is the position of Canada in the outside world? Where is Canada's status internationally to-day? We send our representatives to the League of Nations, where they sit in and discuss questions on a basis of absolute equality with representatives of all other nations of the world who are present at that conference.

Mr. HOCKEN: What more does the hon. member want?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What Australia has to begin with.

Mr. CRERAR: We are in the position that we claim our right to sit in the League of Nations and we are regarded internationally as an inferior state. Consequently for the purpose of building up a united Canada. of creating a national spirit, of making this Dominion what we all wish to see it become, I am strongly and heartily in support of the principle of the motion advanced by the hon. member for South York, although I do not agree with the methods by which he proposes to achieve the object he has in view.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to give some little thought and study to this particular question and that is why I participate in this debate this afternoon. The question is an extremely complicated one, and any member of this House who has taken the trouble to study the constitution and development of Canada and of Great Britain must realize the difficulties encountered in an effort to pass a resolution of this kind which embodies the terms of an amendment which it is sought that the Imperial House should pass concerning our constitution. When confederation was brought about, three important resolutions were passed at the Quebec conference in 1865. They are of sufficient importance and so fundamental to our constitution that I propose to read them, particularly as they are short. They state, with reference to the North American provinces:

1. The system of government best adapted under existing circumstances to protect the diversified interests of the several provinces, and secure harmony and permanency in the working of the union, would be a general government charged with matters of common interest to the whole country, and local governments for each of the Canadas, and for the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, charged with the control of local matters in their respective sections.

2. In framing a constitution for the general government, the conference, with a view to the perpetuation of our connection with the Mother Country, and the promotion of the best interests of the people of these provinces, desire to follow the model of the British constitution so far as our circumstances permit.

3. The executive authority or government shall be vested in the sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and be administered according to the well-understood principles of the British constitution, by a sovereign personally, or by the representative of the sovereign duly authorized.

There is one feature of this debate which I do not think has been emphasized and it is vital to the consideration of the resolution before the House. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) touched on it lightly. Our constitution involves not only the British North America Act, which is the written or fixed or inflexible portion of our constitution, but the unwritten part of our constitution. In other words, our constitution comprises the written portion, which is the British North America Act and which is specific, and the unwritten portion, which we find in such institutions as the cabinet. In the government and constitution of this country, we have in practice precedents, conventions and understandings that you will not find anywhere in the British North America Act. Take, for example, the institution of the cabinet. You will not find that word written anywhere in our constitution. You will not find the word "cabinet" in the British constitution, yet it is the governing and controlling factor in the government of this country. Supposing, for example, that there was an adverse vote in the House, what would follow? There is no law to oblige the government to resign, but the precedents and understandings of our constitution make it necessary. But if the government in the face of such adverse vote was refused supply and still endeavoured to enforce by act of parliament the collection of taxes, the courts of the land would be available to enable our citizens to refuse to comply with such an attempt.

The cabinet is the central pivot of responsible government.. It dates back in Great Britain to the time of Charles I. Before then the cabinet had been responsible to the king but through the efforts of the Cabal of that day the responsibility was shifted, and the ministry was made answerable to parliament. Some may not know that in Canada cabinet responsibility to the legislative institutions of the country did not become a fact until 1842. Prior to that date the cabinet was responsible to the Governor General. So that in the course of the constitutional development of this country there have become embodied in the constitution fictions, conventions, precedents and understandings which have all had a practical part in the government of the country. Now the resolution which is before the House proposes to alter the written portion of the constitution, that portion which has been enacted by the Imperial parliament. And as one speaker after another has indicated, that enactment did not originate with the Imperial government, it was not something super-imposed upon this country, but was an understanding or agreement arrived at between the component parts of the British North American provinces which entered into confederation. This fact is clearly expressed in the preamble to the act:

Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

In that principle you have the unwritten portion of the British constitution, the flexible portion which proves so practical and useful in every dominion wherein it can be adapted to the peculiarities of race and people concerned. And the fourth paragraph reads:

And whereas it is expedient that provision be made for the eventual admission into the union of other parts of British North America—

You have, therefore, in this paragraph a very clear statement or understanding of the situation and we cannot as a Canadian parliament change our constitution and pass legislation of the kind proposed, even with the suggested amendment, which provides for the consent first of all the provinces. I submit that the complications are too numerous and the problem is too wide for us to undertake anything of the kind at this time. I am sure that hon. members must be fully sensitive to their duty and responsibility to precipitate an ill-considered debate on this subject at this juncture. The present discussion will be reviewed from one end of the empire to the other, and it would be distinctly unwise for us to jump to any hasty conclusion in dealing with this question. I think we would be rash in approving a resolution which is uncertain in its terms and indefinite in its meaning. I would ask the House to refer to the resolution for a moment. It provides:

The parliament of the Dominion upon first obtaining the consent of the provinces may amend the said British North America Act when it may see fit to do so, but it is not empowered to pass any amendment affecting the rights guaranteed in said act to minorities.

Does this mean that every specific amendment would have first of all to be approved by the provinces and then submitted to this parliament? Or does it mean that a general power of amendment would first have to be approved by the provinces before being submitted to parliament? Some hon. members nod their heads to the second proposition. But the question is, which is the true interpretation of this proposed bill which seeks to change the constitution under which we have been operating since 1867? Which is the true proposal? I submit that as soon as you undertake to place before the provinces of Canada a proposed amendment such as is set out in this resolution you will create endless confusion. I am convinced that interminable discussions would arise which would prove adverse to our interests. There would be speculative debates on theories of our international relationships and the relationships of this country with the Mother Country, to say nothing of a number of other problems which would follow in consequence. At this time when the nations of the world are suffering economic distress, when there are grave troubles in Europe and elsewhere, when Canada itself is faced with a great national debt, a huge railway problem, and economic difficulties of a severe nature, it would be exceedingly unwise to open a question of this kind, especially since it has not been shown in one single statement that there is any demand for the action which the resolution proposes, or anything to warrant such a change.

5 p.m.

When we broach the question of amending our constitution by changing it only in part, that is to say, the written portion of it, we are at once in the realm of international relationships; not only is our relationship with Great Britain involved but our international relationships are also brought to the forefront. There has been a gradual development of our position in that respect, and I would commend to the attention of the House a little book of Sir Robert Borden's entitled Canadian Constitutional Studies. From that book it will be seen that in 1917-18 Canada in fact obtained the recognition of the principle of nationhood and complete autonomy in the empire. I quote the following from page 111:

During 1917 and 1918, the Imperial War conference also proceeded with its deliberations. Its most important discussion in 1917 was concerned with the question of future constitutional relations and resulted in the following resolution:

"The Imperial War conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities.

"They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial commonwealth and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognize the right of the dominions and India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern, and for such necessary concerted action, founded on consultation, as the several governments may determine."

I propose to read a few of these sections because they are the words of a great authority on the subject and have a bearing on the resolution in question.

This resolution establishes the basis of future co-operation; it gives clear recognition to equality of nationhood between the dominions and the Mother Country; and it marks one of the most important, and possibly one of the final stages in the evolution of constitutional relations within the British commonwealth. In 1921 the same principle was re-asserted. Lord Milner, speaking on this important matter in 1920 before the representatives of the overseas dominions, emphasized the same view in these words:

"The only possibility of a continuance of the British Empire is on a basis of absolute out-and-out equal partnership between the United Kingdom and the dominions. I say that without any kind of reservation whatsoever. It is very easy to say that; but undoubtedly the working out of it in practice without bringing about the severance of relations between us and the dominions will be one of the most complicated tasks which statesmanship has ever had to face. I am not afraid of it, and yet I have to admit that the difficulties are such that our best efforts may end in failure. I hope not. At any rate, there is no other way out.

At a later stage the powers of the Dominion with respect to treaty making had developed, and I again quote the words of Sir Robert Borden, which summarize the situation very nicely:

A further development relates to the signature and ratification of the various treaties concluded at the conference. In view of the new position secured, and of the part played by the dominion representatives at the peace table, it was considered that the treaty should be signed by dominion plenipotentiaries, and should be submitted for approval to the dominion parliaments. Accordingly the Prime Minister of Canada proposed that the assent of the King as high contracting party to the various treaties should, in respect of the dominions, be expressed by the signature of dominion plenipotentiaries, and that the preamble and other formal parts of the treaties should be drafted accordingly.

The treaty making power of the Dominion is not a new one. Then we gained a new position in the League of Nations. Sir Robert Borden says:

The new status of the Dominion is manifested again in the constitution of the League of Nations. Having gained at the Peace conference the position of "powers with special interests" the dominions took the ground that they should be similarly accepted in the future international relationships contemplated by the league. The League of Nations Commission, while inclined to admit this position in principle, did not at the outset accept all its implications. . . . In its final form, as amended and incorporated in the treaty of Peace with Germany, the covenant fully recognizes the status of the dominions.

Now, I want to draw the attention of the House to another point which is interwoven with this question of amending our constitution. As soon as you enter upon the programme of changing the British North America Act, apart altogether from the relationship of one province with the other you have the great question of Canada's relationship to foreign countries and a number of other far-reaching problems which should also be considered. I suggest to hon. members that before giving their approval to the resolution that has been proposed or the principle which it involves they should consider this matter in the light of the conditions which confront the country and from the practical point of view.

What is to be gained by passing a resolution of this kind? There are no practical questions out of which this proposal has arisen. All that can result is discussion and controversy from one end of Canada to the other on the question of loyalty to Canada's relationship to the empire and things of that kind. Here we are assembled with extremely grave and important questions of a practical nature confronting us. I referred to them a moment ago—our taxation, our railways, our economic difficulties, the tariff, if you will, and so on. What is to be gained by this resolution, beyond some political effect in some parts of Canada, an effect which may carry with it the arousing of feelings of prejudice and the expression of likes or dislikes in different sections of the country?

I believe this resolution should be refused by the House. If the government are serious in announcing their intention to bring down legislation calling upon the provinces to consider the matter of the amendment of our constitution; if it is not merely a political intention, then when they bring down that legislation I hope they will be able to submit something of a substantial character in the way of a demand from some section of the country for such a change in our constitution as is proposed. For my part I cannot but believe that the problem is fraught with too grave difficulties. The history of the development of our constitution is such that the man of business should hesitate at this juncture, having regard to the conditions in the world generally. I heard Mr. Ewart give a most interesting discussion of conditions among the countries of Europe and an outline of how the nations of the world had been chopped up as a result of the war, how the elements of conflagration exist in many parts of Europe. With all these national and international questions of a practical nature awaiting solution, why should this House occupy its time in the discussion of such a resolution as my hon. friend proposes?

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, the question before the House in undoubtedly one of very great interest. Though I have given it some consideration and have some opinions upon it, I refrain from giving those opinions now for the simple reason that I have been assured, and I think rightly, that this parliament has no power to do what I or anybody else might think it well to do in regard to our constitution. We have been assured by the authorities on constitutional law—and I think this is the attitude they take so far as they have spoken in this House—that the British North America Act is a sacred compact and that it cannot be altered by this parliament alone; that if an alteration is to be made all the parties to the pact must first be consulted and their consent to the change obtained.

In the Speech from the Throne there is an announcement that a conference is to be held at which representatives of all the different parties to the compact known as the British North America Act are to meet. It has been suggested by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that the issue involved in this resolution would be a proper question for that conference to consider. In view, therefore, of these considerations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy):

> That the following words be inserted after the word "minorities" in the second paragraph of the resolution: "and that, before further action be taken on the proposed resolution, the same be referred to the conference proposed in the Speech from the Throne for consideration and recommendation."

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of this discussion I had no intention of taking part in it, but several matters have come up in the course of the remarks of hon. members, particularly as regards the province of Quebec, and it seems to me that one should have these matters well in mind before even suggesting that the resolution now before the House should be submitted to a conference as is proposed.

It seems to me that those who have discussed this resolution particularly some hon. members from this side of the House, have utterly failed to remember what were the circumstances of history and what were the facts which led up to the British North America Act of 1867. While perhaps many hon. members in this House may recall to mind those facts, I do not think it would be very much amiss if I, in the very few minutes I propose to take part in this discussion, should ask particularly those gentlemen from the province of Quebec to bear those facts in mind, because they are very salient indeed, and are very germane to this resolution we are discussing to-day, indeed, very germane to any question of conferences which might take place in the future apropos of any amendments to the British North America Act.

What are those historical facts leading up to the enactment of the British North America Act? Our first constitution in this country was the Quebec Act of 1774; I am speaking from memory as regards dates. That act took in, as I am very well aware, a great stretch of country running westward almost to the Missouri river. The limits of that country were changed by the treaty of Versailles in 1783, which made the westerly limits of what was then the province of Quebec the Great Lakes. After that we come down to the Constitutional Act of 1791, which divided the two provinces of Canada into Upper and Lower Canada. That act ran its course. Various matters came up in the administration of this country, ideas were engendered between the two races, and the culmination of this act of 1791 was the fight for responsible government in 1837. That was the result of the Constitutional Act of 1791.

Then we come down to the Act of Union in 1841, which brought the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada into one province, as the result of the Durham report. There again we found all kinds of difficulties brought up and ideas engendered between the races, ideas of religion, ideas of representation by population, and half a hundred other questions, until finally responsible government absolutely broke down. The suspicions engendered between the provinces and between the races under the Act of Union of 1841 were such as to render it utterly impossible for this country to proceed in any normal sense of the word with government at all. Out of all those difficulties that took place issued the Quebec resolutions. Those same difficulties took place in the Maritimes also. There also they decided they wanted a union, and the conference at Charlottetown took place, to which conference certain delegates went from Canada, and those delegates subsequently joined together at the Quebec conference, and it was from the Quebec conference that the Act of Confederation of 1867 was brought about.

Coming as I do from the province of Quebec I would like my hon. friends from that province to bear in mind these historical facts which brought about our Confederation Act. I would like them to bear in mind also the various difficulties and the various safeguards that were provided as regards our own province of Quebec. That is an extremely important matter for them to remember. I am of the province of Quebec. I live there with my French-Canadian compatriots in peace and harmony, and I say this; there is nothing so far as I can see in the British North America Act that can be changed to assist us in the very least in the province of Quebec in particular, to say nothing of the rest of Canada.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure this afternoon to the speech of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar). He stated among other matters that we should have the right to fix our own constitution. I assume he meant by that the fixing of our constitution for interior matters only; he could have meant nothing else at all. We cannot fix our constitution for exterior matters in any respect, but as regards exterior matters I will speak in a moment. I would ask in what way, and with what advantage, can we change the act at present in force? Where will any province be assisted? You can imagine how a province might be injured in many ways. You can well imagine in the event of a conference taking place, and in the event of various opinions coming forth at that conference, that matters might happen in such a way as to reopen very many of these selfsame questions that came up at the Quebec conference, and which were settled by compromise at the Quebec conference itself, and as a result of which the British North America Act came forth. I repeat, what advantage is to be gained by any province by trying to give ourselves here in this parliament the right to change the act which was the result of compromises of a most severe nature, compromises which were the result also of events which took place and which led up to that conference, events of a most serious and foretelling nature.

My hon. friend from Marquette in his very masterly way also said that it was vital for the development of this nation that we should have the power to amend our constitution. I fail to see how this nation can be developed in the slightest degree by amending from the interior our own constitution. As a matter of fact, this nation was built up under that very constitution. That constitution has been the very cornerstone of all the rights of the various provinces within the nation. Nothing can be added to the rights of the provinces by amending that constitution, but something may be taken away. What assistance, what increment can be given to the provinces? No one in this House will venture for one moment to suggest that anything can be given to a single province by undertaking, ourselves, from the interior, to amend our constitution; but on the other hand we can very easily imagine that some particular province will have some particular right taken away from it, providing the majority on the other side so desire. Where, therefore, is the gain in so far as the vital development of our nation is concerned by our having the right to amend our own constitution?

Mr. GOOD: Would my hon. friend contend that no province is at all interested in the reform of the Senate?

Mr. MARLER: No, I do not contend that at all. What I do contend is this, that perhaps the reform of the Senate is a very minor item compared with what might happen by throwing into the melting pot again the British North America Act. By deciding to submit to conferences and to the rule of the majority results might happen which would be far more serious to any province than having the Senate go forward in its present way.

Mr. GOOD: Can we not trust ourselves?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Can no constitution anywhere be thrown into the melting pot? Must all constitutions remain fixed for all time?

Mr. MARLER: Certainly they are not fixed for all time; there is no question about that at all, but I fail to see anything that has been brought up in the course of this debate, outside perhaps of what my hon. friend for Brant (Mr. Good) has said, and which may be a source of discussion, I freely admit—I fail to see one single point that any member has brought up that would show we were suffering any injury as a whole by reason of the British North America Act. On the other hand, I do say that a province may suffer grave injustice and grave injury at the hands of the majority in the event of the British North America Act being reopened.

Then my hon. friend from Marquette spoke about the pride of national spirit. Well, I cannot understand how the right to amend the British North America Act will in any way assist in strengthening the pride in national spirit.

Another question which has been brought up in the course of this debate is whether we are or are not a nation. We are a nation for interior purposes. We might as well make up our minds immediately that we are not a nation for exterior purposes. If we are a nation for exterior purposes we have to make up our minds to undertake the responsibilities which that status involves; and if we want to call ourselves a nation, both from an interior point of view and an exterior point of view, we have not only got to provide for defence from the interior viewpoint but undertake an active part in offence from the exterior viewpoint. Are we prepared to do that? I do not think we are at the present time.

Then there were the various points my hon. friend the member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) brought up in his remarks as to whether the high commissioner should be representative in this way or representative in that way, or whether we should be represented by an ambassador. Of what advantage would this be to us? Are we not better employed in minding our own business in this country, in building up this Dominion as it should be built up, and in making Canada as strong a nation interiorly as we can make it? Are we not assisting the British Empire infinitely better by, as I say, building up this country in an interior way instead of trying to dissipate our energies by interesting ourselves in various matters abroad? The time has not come, as far as I can gauge it for us to take an active and energetic interest in foreign affairs relating to the empire. Those foreign affairs at the present time, as a matter of fact, are in good hands; but for us to say that we desire to be consulted here, or we desire to be consulted there, and at the same time come forward and say "No we will not bear the responsibilities in certain ways" is simply a series of contradictions.

I want to repeat again what I said in the first place. As regards the events which led up to the British North America Act those events were historical, those events were drenched in blood, those events were matters of compromise of the most serious nature. I for one see nothing but difficulties ahead of us if we take it upon ourselves by conference, by act of parliament or otherwise, to attempt to change those various matters which were brought about, which took place, and which were settled by those very particular compromises. I can see no advantage to be gained but I can see disadvantages may come to certain provinces under certain conditions. I therefore conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that not only do I intend to vote against the resolution, but I also disapprove of submitting a resolution of this kind to a conference with the object in view of changing the British North America Act.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I know that the apostles of things as they are and the disciples of subordination do not all belong to one side of the chamber. I trust that the distribution is uneven; I am sorry to see that it exists.

Mr. JACOBS: They belong to one side of the chamber but they sit on different sides.

Mr. McMASTER: I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate in which, I may say, I had not thought I would have the privilege of taking part, but there have been some arguments advanced this afternoon to which I will endeavour to very briefly reply. I must congratulate the hon. member for St. George-St. Lawrence (Mr. Marler).

Mr. MARLER: You have reversed the order.

Mr. McMASTER: I was following the alphabetical order, but I apologize if I made a mistake.

Mr. MARLER: "St. Lawrence" is the more important saint.

Mr. McMASTER: I think a "St. Lawrence" did not belong to the British Empire but "St. George" did. Is it loyal to prefer St. Lawrence to St. George? I have listened with some attention to what the hon. gentleman has said and I congratulate him upon his historical knowledge. But the impression made upon my mind is this, that from 1774 to 1867 we required no less than four different constitutions. Those constitutions were made for Canada, and every one except the last proved unsatisfactory. It was only when the Canadian people got together, representatives of the Maritime provinces and of the old provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada which then formed a United Canada —when these men got together and drafted their own constitution and had that constitution ratified by the British parliament, it was only then and not till then that we got a fairly satisfactory constitution which has remained largely unchanged for some sixty years.

May I point out a matter which I think is of some considerable interest in connection with this question. When our delegates went over to Great Britain they had, I will not say the assistance, the co-operation of British law officers in preparing different drafts of the British North America Act; and if one will read these different drafts side by side one will see some very striking dissimilarities. The British law officers said that it was in the interest of Great Britain to join the colonies of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Canada, but that there should be a united "colony". That was the proposition in the draft of the British law officers. They used the word "colony" and they stressed the idea that the proposed union would be in the interest of the United Kingdom. The proposition in the draft of the delegates was that the provinces should not be united into one "colony". The idea of Sir John A. Macdonald was, and he belonged to the school of Tories which the hon. member for South York belongs to—

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Was Sir John up-to-date?

Mr. McMASTER: The gentleman who has led this important discussion belongs to the school of Toryism of that day. I think they called themselves Liberal-Conservatives. That is what Sir John Macdonald called himself, a Liberal-Conservative; and of the members of that party some are rather more liberal, others rather more conservative. The gentleman who has led this debate belongs to the more liberal wing of the Liberal-Conservative party. But the point that I want to make is that Sir John Macdonald suggested that we should be united not in one "colony" but in one "kingdom". That is the word he wished to adopt. The word "kingdom" denoted an idea not of subordination but of equality, and that is the only basis upon which I was going to say—I had almost used the expression which the right hon. leader of the opposition often uses "red blooded Canadians"—it is the only status that self-respecting Canadians will enjoy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member think the word "dominion" has any more suggestion of subordination than the word 'kingdom"?

Mr. McMASTER: I was speaking of the fact that the choice of the word "kingdom" has a very interesting historical association. I would not say that the word "dominion" had any greater tincture of subordination than the word "kingdom"; but as we have the "United Kingdom of Great Britain" the adoption of the word "kingdom" would have seemed to put the idea of subordination perhaps more completely out of peoples minds than did the word "dominion." But it was thought by the British authorities of that time that the word "kingdom" might possibly offend the republican sensibilities of our neighbours to the south; at least that was the statement given out at the time. And they looked around for another word. Sir Leonard Tilley was reading the Psalms of David one day, and he came to the psalm where it says:

And thy dominion shall stretch from sea to sea.

"Oh" he said, "that is the word for us." And that was picked out as the word for our country, from the Psalms of David, which will have the approval of the member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). I will endeavour to follow the argument of the previous speaker. His argument is against any change, and not only against any change, but against the possibility of any change, because he is afraid that difficulties may arise if a change is even suggested or discussed. He was asked I think by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) "Do you regard the British North America Act as something which must always exist in its present condition?" And his answer was no. I was a little surprised at that negative, but that is what he stated. He said "The British North America Act is not like the law of the Medes and Persians. It is possible to amend it."

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. MARLER: I said that it was not well to interfere with the British North America Act until the absolute necessity for it arose. That is what I intended to convey, and I do not think the absolute necessity exists at the present time.

Mr. McMASTER: That is not quite what the hon. gentleman said when he was making his speech, but it seems to me that is a more reasonable position to assume. But I may reply to that in this way. If the British North America Act is susceptible of amendment under certain circumstances, which some of us may think have arisen now, and which some of us think have not arisen yet, if it is potentially amendable—I think that is the way to put it—then who should amend it? Ourselves or someone else? That is the question. There may be possible arguments of convenience about having it amended by an outside legislature who would merely ratify the agreement to which we might come. There may be some possible advantage by way of the facility with which it might be done, but I do not think that it would be wise to adopt that method, in view of the depreciation of national status which such a course would imply.

Mr. MARLER: Would the hon. member define our national status?

Mr. McMASTER: I will take that up in a moment. I will endeavour to treat with our national status both external and internal just in a moment. If our British North America Act may have to be amended in future, then it seems to me we should be able to do it ourselves. I do not think that this parliament, the House of Commons, the Senate and the Governor General should have the right, without references to the provinces, to change our constitution. I do not agree to that. I think it should be amended in this fashion; that after the conference in which the provinces would take their part, an agreement should be arrived at—I trust it would be arrived at—whereby we might lay down the conditions under which and the machinery by which the constitution should be amended.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Who would call that conference?

Mr. McMASTER: I think it would be quite proper to have it called by the Prime Minister of this country. I think he would be the fit and proper person to call that conference. As a matter of fact he proposes to call a conference for one specific object, and other similar objects which phrase has been interpreted by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)—who no doubt is the legal interpreter of what the government has in its mind—to include such a subject as we have under discussion this afternoon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What protection would the minorities have? Would they not have to trust to the fairness of the majorities?

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, if the minorities in Canada cannot trust their Canadian fellow-citizens, whom can they trust? We should not have any craven fears of any injustice being done in this country in that regard. The more we take that view I think the better for the whole people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who would decide whom the minorities must trust? The minorities themselves or whom?

Mr. McMASTER: The minorities themselves—

Mr. MEIGHEN: How would a provincial conference accomplish that? There are minorities in the different provinces.

Mr. McMASTER: There are minorities even in the small provinces. There may be certain minorities in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There may be minorities in a province and vast majorities.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the House not realize that the people of Canada to-day are just as united as the people of sixty years ago? If reasonable provisions were made for the protection of minorities sixty years ago, is there any reasonable ground to believe that that protection will be removed by Canadians sixty years later?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who decides on the reasonableness of the assurance? Has the minority itself not the right? Can anybody take it from them?

Mr. McMASTER: I would presume that in such a conference all the provinces and all elements would be represented. All the minorities in the provinces would be represented. Let me give the House an instance, from my own little county in my own province. In the last by-election we had in that county for the Quebec legislature, it was felt by some that it would be only fitting and right, as the county was represented by an English speaking Protestant at Ottawa that a French Roman Catholic should represent the county at Quebec. The difference in population was not more than 60 English speaking Protestants to 40 French speaking Catholics. We had the leader of the party in power in the province of Quebec coming to the county of Brome, telling his own co-religionists and compatriots that the Protestants of Quebec had already too small a proportion of the membership in the Quebec legislature, and asking them not to change the old custom, but to see that the English speaking Protestant was elected, and he was elected. And that is the principle which has ruled us in the province of Quebec. It is the principle, I believe, which animates the people of Canada, and that is the spirit which we have to trust in all constitutional matters. Now the hon. member who has just resumed his seat said that in any conference the rights of a province, if any changes were made—and I do not contemplate that there would be any serious changes made—

Mr. MARLER: Then why take the right to make changes?

Mr. McMASTER: Just because I want the right to make changes if changes are necessary, because I believe in freedom and not in restriction, because after all I am a Liberal and not a Tory, because I believe that freedom is not only good in itself, but it is the thing that has contributed more than anything else to develop our national institutions and to advance our national progress. We want to be free. Why, when the populations of many of the countries of Europe were under despotisms, it was the pride of an Englishman to say that he was a free man, a free Englishman, and he was proud of the comparative freedom of his institutions as compared with those of other countries. When Australia, the United States, Great Britain and France have the right to amend their own constitutions, I do not, for the life of me, see why Canada should not have the same right.

Mr. MARLER: Later on in his admirable address, the hon. member will probably tell us of the obligations which freedom brings about.

Mr. IRVINE: Is the hon. member afraid of them?

Mr. McMASTER: I will tell of the obligations which freedom brings about and those obligations have never been declined by this country. When some ten years ago, it is going on now for eleven years, there came a great conflict in which we believed we were in the right and in which the peoples who were associated with us by blood on the other side of the world were also engaged, I do not believe we took refuge in any subordinate condition of our constitution to evade the necessities of the situation. My learned and hon. friend said this: "In a conference of the provinces of the Dominion, the provinces would inevitably lose rights and the Dominion would acquire rights."

Mr. MARLER: Nothing of the kind.

Mr. McMASTER: I listened to my hon. friend's remarks with great attentiveness, and my recollection of his argument is that he said it would be dangerous to have a constitutional conference because, in that constitutional conference, provinces might lose rights which they now enjoy. It is just as possible that at such conference provinces might gain rights which they do not now enjoy. If we had the right to amend the constitution, the sovereignty being divided now between the Dominion and the provinces, if it was thought best to give to the provinces certain rights which they do not now enjoy, it would be quite competent to give them. If it was thought best in the interest of the whole country to take certain powers now exercised by the provinces and give them to the Dominion, that could be done as well. There is no foundation for the assertion that a conference of the provinces with the Dominion would, of necessity, result in a depreciation of the powers of the provinces.

Mr. CARROLL: Supposing that there was a conference of the dominion and the provinces and they agreed that Canada should be allowed to amend its constitution by federal act, would my hon. friend then say that this House of Commons, the Senate and the Governor General should be allowed to amend the confederation of Canada and the provinces without reference to the provinces?

Mr. McMASTER: No, I would not. My idea would be that the provinces and ourselves should decide upon some method which required the concurrence, not only of a majority, but of a large majority of the provinces, and not only of a large majority of the provinces, but of a large majority of the people of the provinces I would have it very much along the same lines as that which gives to the American people the right to amend their constitution. I would not have it require the concurrence of all of the provinces, because that would mean that one province could set itself up against the rest and demand better terms.

Mr. VIEN: On that, my hon. friend will surely not contend that if one province refuses an amendment, a majority of the others can compel it to accept such an amendment.

A contract between contracting parties cannot be amended without the consent of all of the parties.

Mr. McMASTER: I know that and I propose to have a new contract between the Dominion and the provinces whereby, under certain conditions, changes could be made, not upon a bare majority, but upon a majority of say two-thirds, not only of the provinces themselves, but of the people of the provinces.

Mr. VIEN: That would never be accepted.

Mr. McMASTER: If that was never accepted, the matter would fall; but I do not believe, in a progressive country, one can say: We have a constitution and we are going to make any change so difficult that it can never be changed.

Mr. VIEN: We are a contracting party and nobody can compel us to change the contract except with the unanimous consent of the contracting parties.

Mr. McMASTER: I agree with that absolutely, but I would have a new contract. I was asked to speak about when Canada was a nation. According to the last speaker we are a nation for internal affairs, but not for external affairs, and it is argued that we should devote our time and attention to building up internal affairs and not bother about external affairs.

Mr. MARLER: Or assume the responsibility.

Mr. McMASTER: The answer I make is that, whether we like it or not, without any control at all upon British foreign policy, we have been exposed in the past to the hazard of war and, on the whole, whenever war has broken out, we have done our fair share. So far we have had a position of subordination that, whether we liked it or not, we have been drawn into war, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that that is so. I doubt if there is any way which human ingenuity can devise whereby we shall have a joint control of foreign policy, but that is a question which I do not wish to enter upon at the present time. It seems to me that this question at any moment may become a practical one, although it has been regarded by some as purely theoretical. The question of the constitution of the Senate in Canada is not purely theoretical. At any time we may find the majority view of this House, as expressed by this House, as expressed by the elected representatives of the people, flouted by men who do not represent the people who have been appointed for life, the majority of whom, perhaps, have been appointed for life by a party which represents views absolutely at variance with those held at this time by the people of Canada. Surely that is a practical question and there is ground for examining into the opportunity of changing such a situation. If we cannot examine into the wisdom of changing such a situation without an amendment to our constitution, it follows that we should have the right to amend our constitution.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two thoughts which I wish to express on this question as I shall have to vote against the resolution as it stands. There are some who have the idea that Britain is withholding from us something which we should have. She is not doing that; in fact, Britain is anxious, nay eager, that the overseas dominions to-day should assume and exercise the responsibilities of nationhood. There is no need yet for a change. Our dignity in the past has not suffered; in fact, I think we have in the world of commerce a prestige that we would not otherwise have had.

We should in the first place, I think, decide whether or not we want the responsibility of nationhood. The inconsistency of the whole agitation lies in this fact, that the Dominion is composed of what are or ought to be autonomous parts, and before any change can be made in the British North America Act a conference of the provinces will have to be called to decide what it is we need and desire. I shall have to vote against the resolution, because my province does not to-day stand on an equal basis with the rest of the Dominion; nor does the province of Alberta: we are treated as minors. The old provinces of Ontario and Quebec sixty years ago held these portions of the Dominion in trust until such time as their population would warrant their being formed into provinces; and that old confederation assumed the right of ownership. To-day, therefore, we are not on a footing with the rest of the provinces.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): That is an injustice.

Mr. EVANS: It is an injustice which will have to be removed before we can with any consistency ask for greater autonomy for Canada or for the full status of nationhood. The old confederation of Ontario and Quebec has dominated the rest of the Dominion since the union and has taken the means to make that domination continuous. We should have an equal right with any other province in the Dominion to full representation in the Senate. That we have not, and until such time as our standing is secured on an equal basis with the rest of the provinces in this Dominion, I, for one, shall feel bound to vote against a resolution of this kind.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Centre Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to make any observations on this subject, but so many speeches have been made with regard to it that I thought perhaps it would be proper to say a word or two.

I think everyone here must agree with the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when he says that the British North America Act was really a treaty in which every province took part and that no important or serious changes can be made in that act except with the consent of every province interested. It seems to me that the Dominion itself is getting so set up on its greatness and power that it has lost sight of the fact that it was the creation of the provinces, the child, so to speak, and that the provinces were the father and mother of confederation. On that fact rests an important point. Under the amendment suggested by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) it would be quite possible for this House and the Senate to amend the British North America Act in respect to any matter except, perhaps, the question of education. In other words, they could make changes in the Senate; they could change the number of representatives to be elected from the different provinces—in fact, the majority in the Senate and in the House of Commons for the time being could make any changes they wished to make. I suppose if it happened to be a Liberal majority they would take one point of view; if it was a farmer majority they might take another point of view, and if the Conservative party was in power they might take a totally different attitude. So it seems to me that the proposal as presented to the House is not fair or practicable so far as the provinces which formed the confederation are concerned. I cannot see anything in the suggestion beyond this: It seems perfectly evident that if the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) calls a conference of the Dominion and the provinces, he will not be able to get anywhere unless the consent of all the provinces is obtained. That is, of course, assuming that they are willing to accept the argument of the Minister of Justice that all the provinces must consent to any change that is to be made—a practice, I believe, which has prevailed ever since confederation. So that even if the provinces did get together and we had the power in this parliament to make the desired amendments, the only difference is that we would not have to send them over to England and say to the imperial authorities: "The Dominion and the provinces are desirous of having a change made in the act; this is what they want; will you kindly put it through?" That is about what it amounts to; because I have not heard anyone suggest that the British government has ever objected to any of the slight amendments that have been made to the act at our request. It seems to me, therefore, that there is practically nothing in the proposal.

Some reference has been made to the desirablity of having a Canadian ambassador at Washington. Well, I think that at this time we need the backing of the whole British Empire at Washington. For some time the city of Chicago has been taking large quantities of the waters of the Great Lakes. This is not a legal question at all; it is something like the case of two farmers living side by side—one of them cannot take more than his proper share of the water of a river running between the two farms. For years they have been taking this water, which belongs as much to Canada as it does to the United States, and they have been running it down into the Mississippi and utilizing it in the production of power. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is high time for this country to take the position as part of the British Empire that not one foot of water should go through Chicago from the Great Lakes down into the Mississippi. It is not, as I have said a legal matter; it is not a question of a treaty. But that water is our property, and the government of this country should get busy in the matter. Do not bother with an ambassador at Washington, but say to the British governmen: "Look here; get into this. We will help you by supporting the British navy instead of sponging upon you as we have done for a hundred and fifty years." If you get the British Empire as a whole behind you perhaps you will get something done. They might tell the United States: "We will not pay you anything more until you get that difficulty with this part of the British Empire settled." Great Britain is paying millions to the United States every year; it is the only country in the world that is paying its war debts, and we should get the whole British Empire together shaking its fists in a pleasant and agreeable way at Washington, and saying: We want that water back. It is costing us millions of dollars to deepen our canal system and our ports because of the water they are taking down there, and we sit calmly here and waste our time in this debate which might better have been conducted in a school with a prize for the one who makes the best speech. It gets us nowhere. The thing we want to remember is that we are a part of the British Empire, and we want to stick to the British Empire. We do not want to bother with a Canadian ambassador at Washington; we want the whole British Empire behind this country all the time. I cannot see what particular happiness or pleasure any man in this country gets over the signing of a treaty with the United States by our own plenipotentiary, when we allow the British people to pay practically the whole cost of the British navy. We are not commencing to pay our share of the cost of the defence of this country; at no cost to us we have been defended by the British navy for a hundred and fifty years.

What made the United States break away from England? It was simply because England started to put a small tax on the United States, which had been in existence as a British colony for a hundred years. A small tax was put on practically for the purpose of defending their coasts so that they could become a great and prosperous country, and the colony thereupon broke away from the Mother Country, and as soon as it became prosperous it started in to have a rebellion of its own. Are we going to allow the British people to pay the whole cost of the British navy until we become prosperous, and then say: We do not need the British navy; we are going to run our own country. Fortunately, we have not arrived at that stage yet. I think it is time we recognized our position as part of the British Empire. Great Britain having learned a lesson from the breaking away of the United States will not attempt to put a tax on us, but are we going to allow the British people to pay the whole cost of that navy which defends our coasts and allows us to become great and prosperous? It is time that we paid our share, instead of running a little artificial navy. Who wants to get on ships in this country? No one that I know of. People can make so much more money on land that they would rather stay on shore and make money. The British navy is for the defence of the whole empire, and as we do not want to go on ships and have a navy of our own, as we want to stay ashore, like the Americans, and make money, it is only fair that we should pay our share. That is what we should be considering, instead of whether we should have the power to change the British North America Act. When we want any change made we have simply to ask Great Britain to make the change, and she will do it.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, those who have in this debate, up to now, sided with the mover of this amendment, have to their credit the fact of having strived for the principle of self-government, but is this principle of autonomy referred to by the supporters of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), the only one which must be taken into consideration by this House? I think there is another principle which certainly demands our consideration, and it is, that the privileges which were granted to us by the British North America Act are part of a sacred pact not to be altered or amended by a majority in the House of Commons. The Fathers of Confederation, at the time, in order to obtain the full co-operation of our compatriots of the various provinces, offered the following guarantee, that under the control of both the Commons and Senate, certain vested rights would be maintained in favour of the various nationalities in the provinces. The British North America Act was enacted by the Fathers of Confederation, after a number of meetings and much discussion, and this Act created the general impression, in this country, that it was the safeguard of our traditions and vested rights, especially for the old provinces of Lower and Upper Canada. It is because they believed that this principle was embodied in the British North America Act, that the various provinces welcomed Confederation and, since 1867, joined it of their own free will. The present generations, like the one of 1867, wish to maintain for these nationalities in the various provinces of Confederation, the same pledges in regard to their vested rights and sound traditions.

The resolution which is submitted to us, while evidencing a desire not to wound the feelings of the provinces interested in this confederation pact, nevertheless introduces an element of a nature to diminish the safeguards which we possess, is a source of anxiety and apprehension to the various component groups. So far as I am concerned, the great confidence which I place in confederation, under the high protection of the British crown, the faith I repose in it as an upholder of the traditions and the vested rights of the French population co-operating with the English in this country for the good administration of the Dominion, this reliance I could not place in the legal status which the present motion tends to establish, because with such a legal status the various nationalities in the provinces would be at the mercy of the changeable and often ill-inspired views of the majorities holding power in parliament. This is why I am opposed to the motion to amend our constitution.

The Confederation Act of 1867, in the eyes of the provinces, is a sacred one which must always remain intact. It gives us rights to which we are attached, it strongly contributes to the maintenance of peace and harmony in this country, it is the shield of our customs and rights, and, it is because it remains unaltered that the provinces adhere to the pact. It would therefore be, in my opinion, a mistake for this House to assume the right to change or amend it at will.

Moreover, we have, in this country, existed as a confederation for almost sixty years. Since the year 1867, the provinces have been united, forming a confederation pact under the aegis of this British North America Act. Since then have we had occasion to complain? On any occasion when the Canadian people expressed a wish to amend their constitution, have they ever been denied that right, by the British Crown? Have we any reason to believe that in future the British crown might be guilty of injustice towards us. Whatever may be the very sincere considerations which have prompted the movers of this resolution, I cannot help considering as a slur on the Imperial authorities, the fact that some among us wish, after sixty years of existence, to claim the power to amend our constitution. It looks as if we wished to tell them that we had no further confidence in their authority, that we have special reasons to complain; as if, in the course of these sixty years, we had been requesting of the British crown amendments to our constitution which they had refused! Now, Sir, Canada is not in that position; it is fully satisfied with the charter obtained in 1867, which has contributed to the development of our country, safeguarded autonomy in all the provinces and largely helped to maintain this harmony so necessary to the welfare of the country; the Canadian people are happy to possess such a charter, because it is a pledge of peace and harmony; a safeguard of the traditions and vested rights which are theirs.

the amendment to the amendment which has been moved by my hon. friend the member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) I should like to point out that there seems to be three entirely distinct and separate questions which have come to the fore in this discussion and which, if I may be permitted to say so, are being more or less confused. The resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, York) as drafted, gives rise to them in a natural way. It is important we should see that the consideration of any one of the three questions does not necessarily involve a like point of view with respect to the others.

There is in the first place the question of the right to amend our own constitution, a question which one might describe at present as theoretical or academic, although it may come to have in the course of time some very practical bearings. There is secondly the question of the method by which this country should proceed to secure amendment of its constitution should it decide such a step to be desirable and necessary. There are two methods that have been suggested. One is contained in the resolution of my hon. friend to the effect that a resolution of both houses of parliament should be addressed to His Majesty the King praying the British parliament to amend the constitution in the manner set forth. As has been pointed out in setting forth the other method, that method ignores altogether the relationship of the provinces to the Dominion in the creation of the constitution itself. All of that particular phase of the question was so fully and conclusively argued by the Minister of Justice yesterday that this House, I believe, is practically unanimously of the view that if an amendment of the kind is to be sought, due regard should be had to the view that a compact was made at the time of confederation, and that an amendment of the importance that such an amendment certainly would have, ought only to be proposed after there had been a conference and agreement between the Dominion and the provinces.

The third question which has come up in discussion, and which seems to be entirely separate and distinct from each of the others, is, assuming the House or the country has come to the decision that the constitution should be amended in a manner which would permit of its amendment within the boundaries of our country, so to speak, without going beyond to apply to the British parliament, and assuming that we had agreed upon the method by which the British parliament should be approached in that regard, what then are to be the terms of the amendment itself? What are to be the conditions by which the people of Canada, when they come to amend their constitution, shall be prepared to abide in any amendment they may have under consideration. Perhaps I can illustrate this point by a reference to the resolution of my hon. friend. The third clause in the resolution says.

> "The proposed law for the alteration of the said act must be passed by an absolute majority of each house of parliament."

My hon. friend says that if the constitution is to be amended at any time it must be by a majority of this House and of the Senate. Some hon. members who have participated in the discussion have thought that instead of a bare majority, a two-thirds majority might be required. If not a two-thirds majority in all cases possibly a two-thirds majority in some cases, and a simple majority in others. All I wish to point out at the moment is that the question of terms or conditions is a question apart altogether from what I believe to be the question the hon. member for South York wished to have discussed, namely—whether the constitution of Canada might upon terms and conditions to be agreed upon, be amended within the confines of Canada itself, and without the necessity of any request to the British parliament to make the amendment. I would feel that my hon. friend's motion as it stands could not be accepted for the reason, if for no other, that it is, inadvisable for this House at this time to commit itself as to the terms or conditions on which any amendment should be made to the constitutions; very full opportunity at the right moment should be afforded for considering and discussing that important feature. Similarly I would feel that my hon. friend's motion should not pass this House, even in the amended form namely, providing that the consent of the provinces must be obtained, without in the first instance permitting the provinces to confer with the Dominion with respect to the address that should be presented to His Majesty.

May I add one word in regard to the amendment to the amendment which has been moved by my hon. friend for East Calgary because I think it, too, helps to illustrate the confusion, which has arisen in the discussion of this matter. My hon. friend suggests that the resolution should be amended by adding to sub-section 2 the words:

> And that before further action be taken on the proposed resolution the same be referred to the consideration of the conference proposed in the Speech from the Throne for consideration and recommendation.

I do not know whether my hon. friend for East Calgary has noticed that what he is proposing to do is to ask the two Houses of parliament to send a petition to His Majesty praying that the British House will amend the constitution in the way the member for South York has suggested with the words of my hon. friend for East Calgary included. The resolution of my hon friend from South York is: That a humble address be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty in the following words—and the words which my hon. friend from East Calgary has moved as an amendment are part of the words which under his amendment are to go into the address to be presented to His Majesty the King. I am sure my hon. friend the member for East Calgary never intended and does not wish anything of the kind; that, nevertheless, is the effect of his amendment. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I do not think my hon. friend's amendment will appeal to the House. I am equally sure it will not appeal to himself once he sees its effect.

The point at issue, it seems to me, narrows down to whether or not this country should have the right to amend its own constitution, without in that connection asking any assistance of the British parliament. In a discussion of this kind I think we ought to have regard for the impression which our words within these walls may create in the minds of those who may read them beyond the precincts of this parliament. The simple discussion of whether or not we should have the right to amend our constitution may be differently interpreted. Some persons reading this debate, or possibly reading the headlines of the debate as they will doubtless appear in the press in different parts of the world, would assume that this parliament, or rather that the people of Canada had not the right to amend their own constitution. Very much depends upon what we mean when we use the word "right" in that connection. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we have the right to amend our constitution; and I will not go further than the resolution of my hon. friend for South York (Mr. Maclean) to give the House evidence that at least, we think we have that right. By his resolution my hon. friend is proposing that we should amend the constitution, and he is taking what he believes to be the constitutional method of securing an amendment. We could not amend our own constitution in the manner in which my hon. friend suggests, if we had not that right; and yet this discussion might create the impression abroad that the people of Canada have not the right to amend their constitution. I do not profess to have very much knowledge of constitutional law, but I recall at the moment a distinction made by constitutional authorities which I think is pertinent to the present discussion; and that is the distinction made between what is referred to as the law of the constitution and the conventions of the constitution. So eminent an authority as Dicey on the law of the constitution, as I remember his writing, has intimated that even a lawyer pursuing the study of the law of the constitution into a consideration of the conventions of the constitution would come to see that he had but proceeded a little further on the one path.

So far as the letter of the law is concerned, the Canadian people, technically speaking, have not the right or power to amend the constitution without asking the British parliament to pass a law for that purpose and without the consent of the British parliament. If that were taken to imply that the British parliament itself might, whenever it wished to do so, amend our constitution without any reference to Canada, or that the British parliament, when it was requested so to do might with respect to an amendment refuse to carry out the wishes of the Canadian people, then we might say that we had not the right to amend our own constitution; that some other body, namely, the British parliament possessed that right. But where the facts are as we know them to be that this parliament approaching the British parliament in a constitutional and regular way, by an address of both Houses requesting any amendment to our constitution, will have the amendment carried out in accordance with its wishes, it cannot be said that we have not the right or the power to amend our constitution. We have both. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the conventions of the constitution are just as important and binding as the law in a matter of this kind, and that the convention governing the amendment of the Canadian constitution to-day is that whenever the people of Canada proceed in a constitutional way to ask the British parliament as their agent—because it is practically as their agent that they ask the British parliament to do this—to amend the constitution in a particular way, the British parliament will always proceed so to act in accordance with that request. That being the case, this country has the full constitutional right to amend its constitution.

The real question at issue narrows down therefore, to a very small compass, namely to whether we desire in Canada to amend our own constitution, confining the transaction strictly within the boundaries of the Dominion, or whether we would rather maintain the procedure which is essential at the present time in consequence of the historical facts and circumstances governing the matter, namely, of proceeding beyond the boundaries of the Dominion to the Mother Country to ask the British parliament to make the desired amendment in accordance with the expressed wish of our own constituted authorities. Now that is a question that seems to admit of discussion. There is much to be said on both sides. Personally I cannot but feel that for a number of reasons it would be preferable to save the British parliament, in connection with its business, growing as it is from day to day, the necessity, of troubling itself with respect to any matters which are distinctively a part of our own self government. I appreciate the feeling, I think it is a natural feeling, that many citizens of this country have, that the Dominion holding the position it does in all other particulars should not suffer under even a theoretical limitation in this particular matter. So far as I am concerned, I confess I do not see in it at the moment anything more than a theoretical limitation. There is no practical problem that has arisen up to the present time that I am aware of that in this regard has occasioned the necessity for any sudden action on the part of the Parliament of Canada. I think it is all important that this should be made perfectly clear, that it should be understood in the Old Country as well as here, that so far as the Old Country is concerned, we know that Britain is prepared to do in this matter whatever the people of Canada may wish to have done, and that if no change has come about thus far, or if the situation is what it is at the moment, it is, as has been said many times in the course of this debate, entirely of our own creation I think the further fact should be made clear, namely, that as a people we cannot be held to be making any sort of a complaint or entertaining a grievance with respect to the existing situation, but rather that this discussion is one practically, as has been said to-day, largely academic in character. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the question is one which very properly would come before a conference to be arranged by the government between the federal and provincial authorities, such a conference as in the Speech from the Throne it has been announced it is the intention of the government to call. I hope that with the assurance to my hon. friend, seeing that the matter has elicited the attention it has in this House in the last day or two, that the government will make it one of the subjects to be referred to such a conference, he will see the wisdom of not pressing his resolution to a vote, but will feel that he has already served the very admirable purpose which I am sure he had in view in making the motion, namely that of creating that interest in discussion and otherwise which is most essential to an adequate consideration of this important question.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The presence of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) accompanying this motion assures it a respectful hearing on the part of members of this House. The hon. gentleman has enjoyed for some years the distinction of being the oldest parliamentarian in this Dominion, and enjoys as well a position of high esteem among all members of the House of Commons.

I am afraid I cannot congratulate him on the degree of unanimity with which his resolution now before us has been received in favour by members of parliament. Whatever importance the motion may have, the discussion of it has had this shattering result; it has split the Labour party in two. Their views are now so multiplied that the rest of us cannot present an amendment at all. I have no hesitation in coming to a conclusion as to the merits of the motion and both amendments. I would not make any request of the hon. member for South York. So far as I am concerned the pressing of the resolution to a division is a matter entirely within his own pleasure. With some regret, so far as he is personally concerned, I have to say at the outset, that I will vote decisively against the motion, the amendment and the sub-amendment.

A part of the discussion, I think, has not been very relevant, and I say that with all deference to previous speakers. I do not think we have before us anything that touches, even remotely, the question of the wisdom of preserving an appeal to the Privy Council. My view on that question I may indicate later, but the subject has no relation to the motion before the House. The hon. member who moves this resolution referred to it some days ago and lodged a complaint that the law lords of the Privy Council had shot holes through the constitution of Canada. If they have, their action is wholly null because they were never vested with such power. It is their duty, if appeal is made, to decide what the meaning of the British North America Act is. That, in the case in dispute, the appeal on the Industrial Disputes Act, they did and they gave their reasons therefor. I think it is unfortunate that there should be anything in the nature of an attack because of that judgment. For myself, I would have deprecated the carrying of the case to the Privy Council, indeed, into litigation at all. I believe it has been the balance of opinion of the Justice department for many years that if the Lemieux Act, so-called, got into the courts, its fate was very doubtful, indeed, was probably sealed. I have no reason to think they have varied that view in the present instance, and I think the carrying of the Industrial Disputes Act case in the matter of the Hydro-Electric Commission employees was an impetuous adventure from which we have returned in discomfiture with nothing left but a feeling of remorse and a bill of expense.

But all this has nothing to do with the case before us. We have to vote "yes" or "no" to a resolution, an amendment and a sub-amendment, and in determining what we do, we must read each of the three, because our vote, if in the affirmative, means support of whatever one we vote for as it reads. It does not mean support of some more or less nebulous principle which we think the mover may have in the back of his head.

The resolution itself calls upon this House to petition the British parliament to give us power to amend the British North America Act by a majority vote. I have not heard any hon. member, save the mover, support the resolution in those naked terms. The speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is decisive in the negative. He raised only the one objection—no other is needed. He laboured it, perhaps, too long, but he presented it most forcibly and well. No one in this parliament of Canada could dream, for a moment, of asking the British House of Commons and House of Lords to tear up the securities to which we and others are parties on the mere demand of this House itself. Undoubtedly, the pact of confederation is a contract and there are rights involved therein not represented by the Parliament of Canada. We could not put ourselves in the position of asking that rights so secured should be disturbed on our motion alone. The speech of the Minister of Justice determines, I think, without power of dispute, that there should never be suggestion of amendment affecting other parties to the contract save after conference and consent of those other parties. As he delivered that speech, I could not help regretting that he had not made it before the famous challenge of the powers of the Senate which rang through this chamber last July. I could not help regretting that he had not made it in the hearing of the Prime Minister before he went through western Canada and delivered those blood-and-thunder speeches about curtailing the authority of the upper house. There was no suggestion then while he was on the stumps of western Canada about a conference of the provinces before this assault on the Senate was to be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was always contemplated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was always contemplated?—but never suggested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One is not able to tell what is contemplated by the actual words of the Prime Minister when on the stump. That threat, however, is now reduced to the suggestion of a conference which, I think we are all pretty ready to admit, means nothing more than a kiss good-bye to the whole terrible campaign. So much for the resolution.

The amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) is more cautious, It is to the effect that we shall petition for power to amend at our will within certain limits the British North America Act, but shall do so only after having obtained the consent of all of the provinces of Canada. Even then the amendment proposes that we have authority to change only within the limits of a rather contracted circle. We are not to ask even with the approval of all the provinces for unlimited power of amendment, we are to ask only for power to amend in so far as we can do so without interference with minority rights. This is the undoubted result of the language in which the amendment appears as suggested by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg. In the first place, I do not think it would be a matter of convenience that the whole of the provinces of Canada should in every case consent. If we are going to put those obstacles in front of our course, we are going to add to the difficulties if any did exist, that we have had in the past. We have amended the British North America Act many times upon address of this House without speaking to the provinces at all. Why? Because the amendments we asked for did not affect in any way minority rights, did not affect in the remotest way provincial rights, were amendments in which the provinces or minorities were not concerned at all. It would be cumbersome indeed in such cases to be compelled to pass first from province to province and obtain universal approval. Besides, I do not think we are going to gain anything in the world by asking for power to be vested in this House to amend, in relation to one sphere, a constitutional right while, in relation to another sphere, we must pursue the course we have pursued in years gone by. It seems to me that then would develop an anomalous situation and it is merely fanciful and illusory for us to dream that, after we have such result, our status would be in the least elevated or that we would be more of a nation than we are to-day.

The third amendment moved by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) has, I think, in effect, the interpretation given to it by the Prime Minister. If the hon. member for East Calgary agrees, I am satisfied that he will not himself ask that we shall vote upon this amendment. I know he did not intend such effect. If I have his purpose aright, he intended that we should express ourselves the opinion that this parliament should have the right to amend the British North America Act, but that we should not convey that opinion to the British House until the provinces of Canada agree. To that also I am emphatically opposed. I do not think this parliament should have the right of its own will and motion, under any conditions, without reference to the provinces, even though they might presently grant us that right, to amend in any way we choose the British North America Act. Though the provinces might agree that we should go to the British House and ask for the right to be vested in this parliament alone, I would not be a party to the assertion of such a right. There are, in this Dominion, minorities whom no provincial legislature distinctly represents. The voice of those minorities is heard even in the midst of this debate. Are we to assume that because certain legislatures, which do not speak for those minorities, tell us to take to ourselves the right to amend the British North America Act at will we ought, therefore, to do so? I do not think so at all. So that, in the form which the three propositions now before the House take, I could not vote for any of them.

There still remains, however, the question at large, should we seek by some channel or other to obtain these powers? It perhaps is not worth discussing in so far as deciding the vote of any one on what is before us is concerned, but it has been discussed and I do not want to evade it in any degree whatever.

I am afraid myself that if we launch very far into this question and seek to set up some other method than that already pursued we are only going to get further and further into the morass; and any substitute which we are able to invent will be far more cumbersome and even less dignified than that to which we have subscribed through all these years. We differ from Australia and South Africa. We are a federation of a variety of minorities and majorities. A suggestion has been made, I believe, by Sir Clifford Sifton,—and I cannot help but note the more brotherly language and Christian spirit in which his name is spoken of by hon. gentlemen opposite now than characterized similar references just a few years ago,—that there should be some divisions created throughout the Dominion and some proportional representation election; and that the delegates so elected should re-draft our constitution. Well, it seems to me that if such were done the very securities that now prevail would be insisted on again. There is no reason in the world to assume that any different securities could be substituted. And why is this the case? Simply because you cannot erect any structure of balances and referendums as simple and effective as the method which obtains to-day. Imagine an agreement to which any minority in this country could logically be asked to subscribe, an agreement under which there would be a reference to the provinces and then a reference to minorities, all entailing weeks and months, perhaps years of labour, all giving rise to disputations and controversies, section against section—that is to say, if the change proposed amounted to anything at all. Imagine a system such as that to which any of the various minorities of Canada would likely subscribe at any conference! No matter how you go about it, whether by a new system of divisions or by the legislatures as they exist in conjunction with this parliament, you will arrive ultimately at just the same difficulty which confronted the Fathers of Confederation and which they surmounted by the instrumentality of the British North America Act.

Is it all worth while? Are we going to be any better off after this is all done than we are now? The answer comes in the speeches we have heard this very day. One hon. gentleman, even the mover himself, rises and says: "All I ask for, and I ask it in the name of the dignity and nationhood of Canada, is that in matters which do not affect minorities we shall have the right to amend our constitution". And he declares that to the outside world our status will be enhanced; it will all appear a whole lot better to the world at large, who will look on us as higher in rank among the nations, more independent, more autonomous, less subordinate to the Motherland. I do not follow this reasoning at all. If we would still have in all important cases to go through the circuitous journey which we take now, why should we not do the same in every instance? If the outside world sees us take this course in all matters of consequence, I do not think that we are likely to be elevated to any position of superior dignity because we do not have to submit to the same necessity in matters which are merely minor. The hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) says that there are certain subjects which he never would commit for decision to the Parliament of Canada, no matter who else might consent to this being done. We rest, says he, on the security which is found in the British parliament so far as these particular matters are concerned. But, says the hon. member, as to other subjects, "for the sake of our position before the world, I beg of you to adopt some new means whereby we can change the act at will". For the life of me I do not see anything to be gained at all so long as there is something reserved.

But if there were nothing reserved, if all minorities would agree to something definite —and this to my mind is purely visionary— if all were unanimous that we abandon recourse to the British parliament altogether, and, through some system at home, vest in the various legislatures and the Parliament of Canada the right to amend the constitution, would we really be further ahead than we are now? The Prime Minister says, and I support him to the full, that we have to-day an absolute constitutional right to fix the terms of our constitution. Speaking for the people of Canada, satisfying the British parliament that we so speak—and there is no difficulty in doing this if the voice of objection is not heard—we have the right as a parliament to decide what goes into that act and what stays out. Such is our position to-day. Hon. gentlemen say: "Yes, but that only rests on the foundation of constitutional right; by law we still have to go around the route to the British parliament, and we do not want to rest on the insecure basis of mere constitutional right. We want our legal rights plainly defined before the world." Let us inquire into that contention. In my judgment our legal position would not be one whit the stronger in that case than it is now. True, it is by virtue of constitutional right that we can now dictate virtually any amendments to the act, provided we speak for all Canada and the voice of minorities raises no objection. But the sanction of constitutional right within this British Empire is just as firm, just as lasting and just as dependable as the voice of law itself. But I go farther. When we have gone through all this and got our substituted system, when we have obtained the legal right to amend in our several parliaments this British North America Act, the legal foundation is not one iota better than it was before. Why do I say that? Though the British North America Act may be amended, in such a way as to give the Parliament of Canada, after a long series of provincial approvals, the right to amend the act, after that is all done the legal power would still remain in the British parliament to change the act at will. And nothing could restrain them save a regard for constitutional authority. In other words, we would still be protected by constitutional right and constitutional right alone; the legal power in the British parliament would remain to amend the act or to repeal it. So that after all the sanction we would have would be the very sanction we now enjoy. The legal right exists to-day, for example, on the part of His Majesty to veto any act of the Parliament of Great Britain. Though the legal right exists, however, the constitutional right has died; it is antiquated and obsolete and virtually does not exist at all. And it would be just as true to say that the Parliament of Great Britain to-day is a mere instrument and tool of monarchy as it is to say that this parliament, speaking for the people of Canada, has not the right to amend our constitution. We have the right, and before the world we could be no better off or better protected if any scheme whatever of the nature now proposed were adopted.

I may be old fashioned in this matter and if I am I will take the consequences. But I am not very anxious to strip the British Empire of those emblems of unity which to-day dignify it before the face of the world. I do not want to do anything of the kind unless there is something to be gained, something material and practical beyond all that is lost. For my own part I think we have travelled far enough along this road. Rather, I believe that it has—on ourselves and on the world without—a wholesome effect to see these visible signs of our unity remain, to see our appeal to the Privy Council preserved, to see our power of amendment exercised through the old British parliament; to see in a word that the British Empire is the British Empire still.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get the House into a muddle over this question; I want to see that due respect is paid both to the House and to the question itself.

From what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said and from what the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) have said, it would appear that this country, this parliament, are in a helpless condition, are impotent and cannot deal with the very fair question that I have brought to the attention of the House and the country. If the British parliament has granted this power to the dominions that have been created since Canada was made a confederation by the British North America Act; if Australia, South Africa and the Irish Free State are able to amend their respective constitutions, within certain limitations and protections that have been provided, why should not the first of the dominions, this Canada of ours, have the privilege not only of amending her own constitution but also of interpreting it in her own courts rather than being obliged to have it interpreted by a court in the formation of which she did not have a single voice?

Lawyers can put up arguments on all kinds of cases, and we have a good many lawyers in this House. The Minister of Justice led the lawyers who spoke on this question, and the leader of the opposition followed the same line as the Prime Minister—they are all trying to get past the issue. They forget that we are living alongside the United States, a great country which has achieved something in the way of better conditions for the world. Some people may say they have not entirely succeeded; perhaps not. But they have done something. Out of a condition similar to ours they evolved a constitution which they themselves have power to amend. They have amended it, and have continued to amend it. Instead of being governed as they were in the first place by the thirteen original states, they are now governed by the senate and congress of the United States. In other words, the people of the United States can make, amend and interpret their own constitution. But leading members of this House, especially its legal lights, say that in that respect Canada is helpless; we cannot do it. As a Canadian I resent that doctrine, and I hope I shall live long enough to see a change made.

I did hope to hear something from my friends down to the left, the Progressives. They know they have grievances; I have heard them mention them within the last two or three days. For instance, they disagree with a decision given by the Privy Council in regard to certain matters affecting their interests. They know about the case where the Canadian Pacific Railway Company refuses to pay the taxes on or take the deeds of their land, a great deal of their property escaping taxation in that way. I would ask the leader of the Progressives if that is not so.

Mr. FORKE: That is so.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): He knows the case. There is an occasion for a real grievance in respect to a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. There are many cases of that kind and, the more this country grows the more will it be dissatisfied with the decisions made across the ocean when we have in our own country a Supreme court which is competent to deal with these matters and can better interpret our constitution than can the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. What is good enough for Australia and South Africa is surely good enough for Canada, which preceded them in establishment as a dominion and has grown up the greatest daughter of the British Empire.

Lawyers and newspaper men may argue: "Oh, the member for South York is trying to smash the British connection." I not only heard hints of that, but the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), in the most pedantic way, undertook to lecture me last night for indulging in intellectual gymnastics in this House. Well, now that we are talking about gymnastics I must come back at him. He himself has indulged in a species of gymnastics. I get that information from a document that came into my hands a few days ago, entitled Report re North Atlantic Steamship Combine, by W. T. R. Preston. I was reading that report, and at page 7 I found the following:

> In consequence of the continued discrimination against the products of Canadian flour mills by the North Atlantic steamship combine, the Canadian government was pressed, in 1913, by the milling interests to immediately investigate the operations of the North Atlantic steamship combine. The chairman of the railway board (now Sir Henry Drayton), was selected to undertake the inquiry, particularly with respect to Canadian overseas trade. Sir Henry proceeded to London with the object of securing such information as might be available in British government departmental records, and also in the hope of securing the assistance of the Imperial government in bringing about a more satisfactory condition in ocean transport.

And then the report goes on to say something of the—not intellectual gymnastics but physical gymnastics of the member for West York, who, under the guidance of W. T. R. Preston, went around London to smash the combine that existed in the north Atlantic steamship trade. I have heard a great many people talk about, "The flag that braved a thousand years, the battle and the breeze" meaning, mainly, the navy of Great Britain. But there is also a flag, the mercantile flag of Britain, which is older even than the navy, and which has braved the breezes of more than a thousand years. The statements that Mr. Preston puts in this document are the result of the visit and gymnastics of the member for West York at that time, and these gymnastics are still going on. That is the greatest attack that has been made on the British flag that I know of, and apparently it was made by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who undertook to tell me what I ought to do in the matter. I refuse to be told by him or by the ex-mayor of Toronto, now the member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), whether I am loyal or not. I do not have to go to these gentlemen for certificates of loyalty. I still represent in this House 120,000 people, who constitute the largest constitutency in Canada, and most of them are British born. The riding of South York is made up almost altogether of the township of York, which includes the main suburbs of Toronto, and I know these British-born men; I know what their views are. They are very British, and I had the fairness to tell some of them the other day that when they were fighting for their personal liberties in regard to certain legislation of the province of Ontario I had a great deal of sympathy with them.

My hon. friend the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) who also read me a lecture, has also told these people in the last day or two in his paper, and it is a good paper, that he has a lot of sympathy with them in their fight for their liberties in Toronto. These British-born people in the township of York, and the majority of the electors there are British-born, have not a word to say against me when I have the courage to say we ought to have what the English people have, the right to make our own constitution. I am as British as they are; I am as British as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) on this subject; but I am enough of a Canadian—a one hundred per cent Canadian—to say that the constitution of Canada must be made in this country, and must be interpreted in this country by a Canadian court. We have a right to make our own court and to express our confidence in it. Now am I a disloyal Canadian in saying that? Yet that is the impression some of my friends on this side of the House have sought to give of myself. Well, let them say so; they have a perfect right to say so, but as long as I am the member from my riding I have the right to say what I think on this question.

A lot of these electors in York township that I spoke of are market gardeners and fruit growers, and these market gardeners and fruit growers in the township of York believe in a national policy; they believe in a tariff to protect the home producers of this country, and they are not going to condemn me, because I am just as British as they are. I am British enough to think that what is good enough for the great Mother Country is good enough for Canada, especially when it is good enough for Australia and even for the new state of South Ireland. The State of South Ireland is not limited in a single direction in the amending of its constitution, except in one respect; it cannot wipe out the king's prerogative; the king is the head of the state. This new state has absolute autonomy in every direction excepting that one thing. Australia also has the same right, and they are vindicating it. Are they disloyal for that? Will the hon. member for North Toronto say that the people of Australia are disloyal. Will the hon. member for West York say the same thing? Yet he has been trying to say that in the most pedantic way; I never heard such a pedantic speech as he made this afternoon. He endeavoured to say I was disloyal in such an insinuating way. He is a clever lawyer; I give him credit for that. But it is absurd to say that we in this country of ours, and that your sons and my sons after we are gone, are not to have a say as Canadians in the framing of the constitution of Canada, and I say that with all respect to my fellow countrymen of Quebec and other portions of Canada which have guaranteed rights in our constitution.

I presented only a skeleton proposition to the House. I have had a good deal of experience in this House, and time after time I have seen a man who had some proposition to put before the House sidetracked by thirty lawyers, and thirty more echoes of them. Why every silly Tommy can get up here and say the same thing. We have heard these silly Tommies charge people with being disloyal. When a proposition of this kind comes up we have to sit in this House and listen to the best lawyers we have, in the person of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and in the leader of the opposition, a gentleman for whom I have the greatest respect—I think he is the ablest parliamentarian in this country—but he is not in accord, he does not mesh to-day with the hon. member for South York on this question. Again I say, this is only a skeleton proposition that I have put before the House, and I would like to know how you can get a hearing in this House unless you have a skeleton proposition, and have the courage to put something in writing which you believe in. Having this proposition before us, I have no doubt that the Parliament of Canada, made up of this House and the other House, and guided by the electors of Canada, and by the discussion that goes on in the country, and by the fairness of the Canadian people and the respect they have for minorities and for the pledges they have given in the past—I have no doubt that this parliament and the citizenry of Canada will be able to deal fairly and justly with a question of this kind. But we have had to sit here and listen to these lawyer statements—and you can get a lawyer to make any kind of a statement, and he will give you the very opposite opinion the next day, for a retainer. It may be a laughing matter: It it is to me a laughing matter to see such a collection of arguments coming up on a serious question like this. I have presented this question in the most serious way. I did not raise it because of any recent decision in England. I have taken pains to study the question; I have worked on it and I got advice on it a year ago, and then I framed up a skeleton proposition which I thought was a good proposition on which to get a discussion of this question, and that it is a live question is shown by this full House here to-night. If I were talking rot would there be any person in the House?

Mr. SHEARD: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): My hon. friend would be here. I never saw such a good judge of rot as he is. But in all seriousness I beg to say to my fellow members that this debate does not end this question. I am going to say the same thing to my constituents, to the electors of South York, when I go back into that part of South York which I have represented for thirty-three years and which may go into West York and I will be very glad to have my pedantic friend express his view. I do not know what the dictionary derivation of "pedantic" is, it probably comes from one of the old Greek roots; but the dictionary tells us that a "pedant" is one who assumes an air of superiority over others with whom he is associated. I hope that I have never been guilty of assuming an air of superiority over my fellow members; I have been a pretty fair friend even to some hon. members who have undertaken to flagellate me for what I have said here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will these hon. members undertake to stand up and say that I am disloyal? Will the hon. member for North Toronto arraign me before the electors of the old town of North Toronto, still in my constituency, on the charge of being disloyal? Will the hon. member for West York also do that? And yet that is practically the argument of my hon. friends—that I was disloyal, that I was preaching disloyalty, because I thought that my country, that your country and the country of your sons and daughters, ought to have the same status in regard to her constitution and the interpretation of it as the Mother Country, as Australia, as South Africa, and even the Free State of Ireland have.

Now that is the issue. You can do what you like with it. You can vote it down. The feeling of the House may be that this question should be allowed to drop to-night. I would not object to that, but if it is done the verdict of the people will be that this House had not the courage to deal with the issue that the member for South York presented on this occasion. I want to know whether the Progressives are prepared to deal with this question? Do they know anything about any injustice that was done to them by the Privy Council that I hinted at a little while ago? I think they know, and this House knows, and the Prime Minister and his party know that there is something wrong when they have intimated in the press that they are going to summon some kind of a conference of the provinces to consider this question. That is my justification to-night, the Prime Minister and his party say they are going to do something in the way of reform. They are going to do something in the way of reform to the upper house, and I agree with one of the hon. members from Quebec in what he said this afternoon. There is something wrong with the upper chamber. I am quite frank in speaking about these things, and I do not think I am guilty of any breach of privilege in alluding to the question. The people of Canada believe not only in the right to make their own constitution but in a senate elected or selected by the several provinces. The Senate has just as much need to be elected as the House of Commons has. It should not be appointed as it has been. It was all right to start with, but now the system is a wrong one and the wrong must be righted. The several provinces of Canada are entitled to elect their own senators just as they do in the United States. And we are located alongside that country and this parliament is confessing that we should not amend our own constitution and should not choose our own senators in the way they do. And speaking of the House of Lords in the Old Country the growing feeling in England is that the House of Lords as at present constituted must be changed. The principle of election, even of an upper chamber is growing in England itself, and it is growing all over this world. There is a time when a man's usefulness may be near its end, but it never ends so long as he holds an appointed seat in the Senate of this country. That is not a very pleasant thing to have to say, but I have enough courage to say it; and if the Prime Minister states "I am going to call a conference of the various provinces to deal with one question and that is the selection of the Senate in this country" I believe he makes the first step in the desired direction. The Prime Minister says he is going to make it. On the other hand the right hon. leader of the opposition declares that he has simply made the promise and that will be the end of it. Well, I am going to "wait and see." That is what the Prime Minister has laid down to-night. But how long have we got to wait and when shall we see? Talking about "seeing" I do not see the Minister of Justice here to-night. He gave a fine legal opinion last night, but he is not here to-night to uphold it. Where is he?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is at the West Hastings banquet.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I hope he will have a good time, but that is not discharging the duties of Minister of Justice for Canada when an important question like this comes up; and if he goes to many banquets we shall have to wait a long while to see. I could talk on this line a great deal longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, I am not going on, but I am going to say what I have said here in my own constituency, I am going to say the same thing elsewhere in the country. My good friend from West Toronto made reference to a newspaper with which I was once connected and to the views which it advocated. I have a faint suspicion that some day the Toronto World may revive and take the lead in the campaign which I have started in this House.

Mr. HOCKEN: When will it start?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): "Wait and see." I could say something more about newspapers if I cared to but I do not want to talk about that subject; the people are getting wise to it now. I am going to leave this question now with the consent of the mover of the resolution. I want to thank the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), the only lady member of this House, for seconding my motion. I have got more support from the women in this matter than I have from the men. We are going into an election here and in England, and there is this surprising feature about it: In the next election in Canada there will be more names of women on the voters list than there will be of men. In my own constituency right now there are lots of women voters and I go out and talk to them. And they talk too, they talk about the tariff and the constitution of this country, and they listen. A lot of women are going into the next election and much will depend on the question that I have raised here, whether Canada is a nation or not, whether this parliament is competent or incompetent, and on questions of that kind. This subject may be dropped to-night, but great headway has been made by Canada to-day toward the achievement of independence in her own sphere, while still remaining the strongest support of the Mother Country. We are able to administer our own constitution, able to make it, able to interpret it and able to live up to it and to make Canada the greatest country on the face of the globe to-day. I will withdraw the motion and leave the responsibility on parliament for its treatment of it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since the main motion has been withdrawn I feel that no good purpose will be served by retaining the amendment. The Conservative party seem to be so hopelessly shattered, and the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition so hopelessly united, that I think we cannot proceed any further in the matter.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. IRVINE: In view of the fact that the promise given to the House by the Prime Minister was virtually what I included in my amendment, with the consent of the House I ask leave to withdraw.

Amendment to the amendment withdrawn.

Mr. FORKE: May I say a word now?

Mr. SPEAKER: The resolution is in possession of the House and can only be withdrawn by leave of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Motion withdrawn.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend and make operative certain provisions of the Copyright Act, 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not pretend to know very much about the law nor about the Copyright Act as it stands, but I do know this, that very strong representation has been made against this measure, and it seems to me that before the second reading is passed, which virtually confirms the principle of the bill, the state of the law should be briefly expounded, the effect of the amendment briefly explained and the judgment of hon. members who have followed this law given for the benefit of us all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In view of the statement that has just been made as to the opinions of lawyers, I feel rather diffident about expressing an opinion now, but I quite agree with the words of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) that the copyright law is at present a very complicated matter. If I had to quote authority for that I would refer to the debates that took place in this House and in the Senate in 1921 and 1923 when a number of distinguished members took part in the discussion including some ministers and ex-ministers, and the statement was made that nobody in this House apparently understood this law. It is rather a difficult situation to be placed in to be asked now to explain this law, but I think a synopsis can be given in a very few words. In 1886, at Berne, a convention was arrived at relating to international copyrights in which the leading nations of the world took part and became adherents to that convention. Britain was one of the parties to the Berne convention and extended to Canada the operation of this international copyright law. Canada nevertheless had its own domestic copyright law, chapter 88 of 30 Victoria, 1875. In 1908 the Convention of Berne was revised. Britain continued to adhere thereto, but did not extend the dispositions thereof to Canada. It was not until 1921 that the present Copyright Act was passed, containing most of the dispositions of the Berne convention but containing contrary to the convention the licensing clauses. The object of this bill is to correct these objectionable features, which are objectionable to those for whose benefit the copyright law was first instituted. I refer to sections 12, 13 and 15. Moreover, all through the act definitions have been left out as well as means of remedy. There have been omitted also certain rights of authors, of printers and of people who may enjoy the benefit of the reproduction of works. After all the main point at issue is really the repeal of the licensing clauses. It would be presumption on my part to endeavour to explain the intricacies of this legislation at this time, although if the House will bear with me I will endeavour to do so.

[Mr. Meighen.]

If the House will permit, I think the best way of dealing with this legislation will be to submit it to a special committee. When this law came up in 1923 it was discussed fully, and I find the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) stated at that time:

> In the meantime my suggestion to the minister in this matter would be, seeing the bill is going to raise a good deal of controversy upon very difficult points, to refer the measure to a small select committee, representative of the different parties in the House, and ask the authors, the publishers and the printers to state their case.

Then the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) said:

> I would like to support the suggestion of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that a small select committee be at once appointed.

And then later on in the debate the suggestion was repeated. This time the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said:

> I was satisfied when the bill was up before, and I am just as firmly satisfied now that apart from the minister himself there is not a man in the committee at this present moment who understands this legislation.

Further on, he said:

> I have tried to get to the bottom of this matter; I have spent a lot of time on it and I confess I do not fully understand it now. My suggestion to the minister, when the bill was last up, was that he appoint a small committee, as was done in 1921, before whom the authors, publishers and printers can appear and state their claims. The committee will have to go to the bottom of the matter and report on this bill. I understood that my suggestion on that occasion agreed with the view of the minister. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) backed up the proposal very emphatically. He said that he did not understand it, that the committee did not either, and he refused to commit himself to legislation which he did not understand. I do not know anything quite as complicated or quite as involved as the copyright question.

He requested that a committee be appointed. For the same reasons I now ask that the consideration of this bill be left to a special committee.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my attention was not called to this bill until a moment ago, and I have just had an opportunity of glancing over it very hurriedly. I remember when the bill was before the House some two years ago. At that time I took some interest in it and some part in the discussion, and I think my hon friend (Mr. Chevrier) has correctly quoted me. The opinion which I then held, I still hold, that this bill deals with one of the most involved and intricate matters that can come up for consideration by this parliament. I am quite satisfied that the proper mode of procedure is by a special committee. Personally, I would have no objection whatever to the motion that this bill be referred to a special committee. I see that the very sections which, after a great deal of consideration and much discussion, we enacted two years ago, the present measure seeks now to repeal. I know that as soon as the fact becomes generally known throughout Canada that it is the intention to repeal those sections, many interests which are now dormant will take an interest in the matter, and one of them in particular. The effect of the amendment, as I am able to determine it from a mere glance at the provisions, is to change those provisions of our former act which compelled the manufacture of the literary work in the Dominion of Canada. The object of the main section of the former bill was to compel the manufacture or the printing of the literary work in this country under a system of license which was approved by the House at that time. The main object of the present bill is to take away that protection which we then afforded to the printing establishments and printers of this country and to allow authors to have their works printed in foreign countries and sent into Canada on particularly favourable terms. I do not wish to be one of those who are going to assent to the principle of this bill at present; but subject to that, I think the hon. member who has introduced the bill has taken the proper course in asking that it be referred to a special committee of this House.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, before this bill goes to a committee, I should like the House to understand its significance. As my hon. friend has stated, this bill was passed in 1921, but it was found that in one particular it infringed the provisions of the Berne convention, so the act was not brought into operation. But in 1923, as you will see if you examine a copy of the bill, certain amendments were made to bring it within the Berne convention. My hon. friend has told the House that the bill bears hardly upon the authors. I do not think he can maintain that position. At the present time a Canadian author who sells his work to a United States publisher must throw in his Canadian rights. Under this law he may throw in his Canadian rights, but unless the American publisher publishes the book in Canada, some other publisher may take it and print it; but if he does so, the author must be paid for that. Therefore, if his work is sold to the United States and published on this side by another publisher, the author gets not only his price from the American publisher, but the license fee from the Canadian publisher.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Who controls the price which he will receive for selling his rights under the license system?

Mr. HOCKEN: I understand there is in the Copyright branch an official who referees in matters of that kind and surely we can leave it to him.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Can my hon. friend say why the estimation of the monetary value of the product of the brain should be left to an officer of a department, whereas one can sell boots and shoes at any price one wants?

Mr. HOCKEN: That rather begs the question because, if the work is sold in the United States, if the licensing clauses are repealed, the author is done. He does not get anything more than what he gets from the publisher in the United States. If the licensing clauses remain, there is a chance, if his work is of any value, of its being published in Canada and his receiving that additional sum. Whether it is one official or another that decides what the amount is, there will be some amount, and whatever it is, great or small, the author is that much to the good. I do not think it can be maintained that any author has suffered, in the slightest degree, from the operation of this section.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If it is such a good disposition in favour of the printers and others, how many licenses have been asked for during the last two years? The authors certainly would not ask for licenses.

Mr. HOCKEN: I may point out to my hon. friend that this licensing section and this act have not been in operation for two years.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Since 1921.

Mr. HOCKEN: It was passed in 1921 but it was not brought into operation then.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Does my hon. friend know that not one license has been granted?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not. On the contrary I know that some licenses have been granted, certain works have been published and certain publishers have been able to make arrangements to publish those under the licensing sections. At a later stage, I might give my hon. friend the names of the books and stories and of the publishers.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Serials.

Mr. HOCKEN: Let me point out to the House that this act with its licensing sections, has been in force only one year. The thing is new to the Canadian publisher. You cannot really expect many or great results from the operation of an act of this kind in one year's time. Therefore I do not think it is fair to say that if there have not been many results, the thing is a failure, and I do not think it can be shown by any person that the author of any work in the Dominion of Canada has suffered in reputation, in pocket, in any way. On the contrary his works are now available for publication in Canada if his United States publisher refuses to come here and do that work. Of course, I have no objection to the bill going to a committee; but, like the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), I do not propose to accept the principle of the bill and I will give it such opposition as I can, because if the author suffers nothing, as can be maintained, there are other interests, the interests of workingmen who set the type, who do the binding, the press work, and there are the interests of the publishers of this country which are in a sad enough state, as we all know. Those must be considered as well as the interests of the author.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are nineteen amending sections in the bill and I understand the hon. gentleman to take exception to section 5, so that there are eighteen other sections to which he makes no reference. Does he imply that those eighteen sections do not interfere with his rights at all but apply solely to the authors themselves? If that is the case, why throw out the bill?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am referring to what I think is the most important and serious proposal the hon. member makes. I do not think that the House expects us to deal with the subject exhaustively to-night but I do wish hon. members to know, before the matter goes to the committee, that the bill was passed after serious consideration by a committee of this House, and that in its operation no Canadian author is injuriously affected whereas, on the other hand, many interests, including the works of working men in this country, are assisted in the process. If that can be shown then I submit that this House should hesitate before making the changes which my hon. friend proposes.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): With reference to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken), I would remind the House that this bill was passed in 1921 in a spirit of compromise and that it was put into force in 1923, again in a spirit of compromise. It was a very comprehensive measure as it was brought into the House by the Hon. Mr. Doherty in 1921, and it was sent to a special committee of which I happened to be a member myself. We were able to agree on practically every clause except the licensing sections, and we agreed at the time in committee that when the bill should come before the House exception would be taken to these sections. Exception was taken at the time; I voiced it myself, and other members spoke as well, pointing out that they were not in conformity with the Berne convention; and the Minister of Justice of that day agreed that if this allegation could be proved the clauses could be withdrawn later on. He suggested, however, as a matter of compromise—and I insist on that—that we should let the bill pass anyway and be incorporated in the statutes. That is why the bill as it passed in 1921 contained in section 50 the proviso that it would come into effect only on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council. Then there was a change in the government of the country and in 1923 I placed a resolution on the order paper proposing to withdraw the licensing clauses. The then Minister of Trade and Commerce brought down a bill to the very same effect and this obviated the necessity for my resolution. When that bill was discussed in the House exception was taken to it by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and other hon. gentlemen. Finally the government brought in an amendment to that bill, which was virtually an admission that the licensing clauses as they stood in the 1921 bill were not in accordance with the Berne convention.

Mr. HOCKEN: That has been remedied.

Mr. RINFRET: I am coming to that. I hold in my hand the official document from Berne to that effect. It was contended that if Canada wished to adhere to the convention the terms of the licensing clauses should not apply to other nations, although there was nothing to prevent this country from applying it to its own writers. The effect of the amendment brought down by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce was precisely in the terms I have stated, namely, that these clauses should apply to none but Canadian writers.

Mr. HOCKEN: And those of the United States.

Mr. RINFRET: Yes. At the time of the third reading of the bill I did make a statement to the effect that that amendment would certainly not suit the purpose of Canadian writers. We took the stand that as the Copyright Act as a whole was quite comprehensive, as it touched other interests, in the field of phonograph records, for instance, as well as in other directions, we were very anxious to have the bill go through as it was tentatively. For that reason we did not press the objection. I must repeat, however, that we never agreed to the special clauses that are now dealt with in the bill brought down by my hon. friend (Mr. Chevrier), and I take exception to the statement that has been made, that this matter was dealt with by parliament and was practically decided on. That is not the case at all. It was shelved and put aside and we agreed to come to it later on. We did not want to block the bill as a whole and that is why it was adopted in 1921 and again, as amended, in 1923, and put into force in 1924, early in January. We are moving for special amendments of a minor character and we also wish to deal with the licensing clauses. As has been stated, however, the matter is a very complicated one and for that reason we desire to have it thoroughly discussed before a special committee. This, I think, is a fair statement of the case. I am not prejudiced at all; I may be convinced tomorrow that the sections in question should remain in the act. But I think it would be a good thing to take them up before a special committee, and that is why I propose that the bill be read the second time and be referred to the committee. I shall have the honour to second my hon. friend's motion.

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State): Since the bill was introduced I have read it carefully and I agree with hon. gentlemen as to its complexity; it undoubtedly is both complicated and technical. I do not agree with the view that in allowing the second reading of the bill we are necessarily committing ourselves to its contents; in adopting the motion for second reading we are merely approving the necessity for an amendment. It would be impossible to discuss this measure properly in committee of the Whole and it would seem desirable to refer the matter to one of the standing committees. These committees, however, are rather large and I can see no objection to a special committee being appointed. For myself, however, I want to make it perfectly clear that in accepting the second reading of the bill I do not thereby necessarily accept the measure in detail. It seems to me that the bill is one that should receive very careful consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time. Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved that the said bill be referred to a special committee with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to hear evidence and report from time to time.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—PRINTER'S LIABILITY

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code—Printer's Liability.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill, which I introduced last year and which did not go beyond its second reading on account of private members day having been absorbed by the government, simply requires that every document or circular printed for publication and distribution shall bear on it the name of the publisher. There is also a provision requiring the printer or publisher to retain for six months a register of those who have employed him to do this printing, in order to afford facility to find out who the author of any particular document of that kind is. The reason for this legislation is as follows: During the war the public came to appreciate more perhaps than ever before the value of propaganda. And it did not cease with the war; it is a common practice nowadays, by means of anonymous documents, to seek to promulgate propaganda which is not always of a desirable character. False statements, libelous statements, scandalous statements, can be circulated in that way without recourse against the author who remains anonymous. They are also used for the circulation of seditious statements. I have in my hand one of these pamphlets which has been circulated. I shall not weary the House by reading it all, but I shall just quote one or two sentences. It goes on to state that the late war was all the cause of England. It says:

> Kaiser Wilhelm's telegram to Kruger, the president of the Transvaal, was the answer of brave Germany to the treacherous English.

Again I find this expression:

> Under the circumstances it is very logical to find this English monster, with all his power of wealth and cunning craft, acting against the interests of humanity.

And again:

> He will ruin the industries of all the nations for the benefit of tiny England. He will try his best to perpetuate disunion between different peoples. It will be, indeed, a hell on earth.

He winds up with the expression:

> I simply speak in the interests of our common human family.

The gentleman who sent me this document writes in part as follows—and I would particularly commend the opening paragraph to my hon. friend the member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). He says:

> Enclosed find a small pamphlet which might come in handy if some of our well-meaning but ill-informed M.P's from the east should again bring forward the matter of giving the supposedly greatly abused and loyal Hindus of British Columbia the right of franchise.

Of course I am now dealing with the matter from another aspect. Further on he says:

> It would be well within the lines of conservative truth to say that the sentiments of this pamphlet are cherished as gospel fact and concurred in by ninety per cent of the Hindus of British Columbia. I myself, after working with them for eighteen years and after having conversed with many of the smartest men, have invariably found this so. The enclosed pamphlet is receiving wide circulation in Hindu among their own people and also in English among the Asiatics who can speak our language. Read and judge for yourself its effect upon ignorant people.

If precedent is needed for this legislation I can point to the Dominion Elections Act, which makes it a criminal offence and, I think, disqualifies a man for seven years, if he circulates practically any statement about his opponent. If it is considered wise to prevent even the making of a remark about your opponent during an election in the form of a circulated document, it surely cannot be very far wrong to take steps against anonymous utterances against your neighbour in a community.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the bill does not prohibit the publication of those statements, because it might be a question whether they were right or wrong; it only affords some clue, so to speak, as to who is the author of them. I might further mention, in the matter of precedent, that the act upon which this is founded has been in force in Britain since 1839 and no fault has been found with it in that regard.

I may say further that subsection 334 of the bill provides ample exemptions to take care of any possible injustice that could occur. You will see that everything is provided for that could reasonably require consideration in that connection. I have pleasure in moving the second reading of the bill.

Mr. SHAW: May I ask my hon. friend before he concludes whether he has received any legal advice as to whether or not this bill is within the competence of this parliament?

Mr. NEILL: It has been suggested to me that the bill might meet the fate of what is known as the Lemieux Act, on the ground—and I think the argument is somewhat far-fetched—that it would traverse the jurisdiction of the provinces, which has to do entirely with civil rights, and might therefore be ultra vires of this parliament. Well, I think that is carrying to an extreme and absurd degree the principle on which the Lemieux Act was thrown out. If we are prepared to accept a decision of that kind we may as well tear up half our statutes, notably the Criminal Code. I picked up at random a few instances of clauses of the Criminal Code which might equally be held to be ultra vires if this one is. Here are some of them: The Criminal Code makes it an offence to disturb divine worship. I think it will be generally agreed that divine worship is a civil right rather than one of Dominion jurisdiction. Again, a breach of contract is made an offence under the Criminal Code. Well surely a breach of contract is a civil right and would therefore be held to be under the jurisdiction of the provinces. The matter of issuing trading stamps should, I think, be considered one of civil rights. The sale of a wreck without sufficient title comes within what may be regarded as civil rights. The leaving of a quarry unguarded; writing on or interfering with municipal election documents, interfering with private fishing, or, to come down to such small items as these, interfering with a grape vine or a vegetable—I should suppose that any rights with respect to grapevines or growing vegetables would be under the provincial jurisdiction. There is also a somewhat similar item to what I am discussing now; anyone who prints an advertisement offering a reward for a stolen article and undertakes to ask no questions, is liable to prosecution under the Criminal Code. Well, if the matter dealt with under my bill is a civil right, I presume that one would be also. I could refer to a number of other similar instances, but I have given enough to illustrate the idea that if we are going to accept the suggestion that this bill is only intra vires of the provinces, then we are going to eliminate half the Criminal Code, and many of our statutes would be in the same danger. I would suggest that as the question has not been raised in any authoritative way, it would be well to proceed with the act and it would be upon anyone who suffered from its provisions to raise the questions and take the matter to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—which I think is an extremely unlikely thing to happen.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Bill reported.

DIVORCE

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting Divorce.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I have been requested on behalf of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to allow this order to stand. I am glad to accede to that request.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, an act to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. McMURRAY: Explain.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this bill I would like to make it clear that I do not by any means think that if we were to pass this bill we would have a very good Elections Act. I think there are many other points in it that might well be dealt with, but I am proposing the repeal of these clauses 10 and 11 because they are more discriminatory against organized labour. Large corporations have had for a long time the name of corrupting political parties by their donations. I do not know whether they have done so or not, but I must confess I feel a little afraid as a member of the Labour party lest the Bankers' Association or the Manufacturers' Association may make large donations to us before the next election and possibly help corrupt the Labour party by donating too much money. At any rate there is a possibility of that.

Mr. McMASTER: Remote.

Mr. IRVINE: I agree it is very remote, but we ought to be very careful even against remote dangers. However, I will take the risk and ask that these clauses be removed from the statute book.

The purpose of clause 10 of the Dominion Elections Act evidently was to prevent large corporations from making donations to political parties. If this was not the intention, then it was the excuse for inserting this clause, and the covert purpose would be to prevent farmer and labour organizations from taking political action and from financing their political movements. I assume the original intention was to prevent large corporations from contributing to party funds. I ask that this clause be repealed because of its impotence to do that for which it was intended. It may, of course, be debatable whether or not a company should be prohibited from contributing to a political party which adopts policies which may be favourable to the interests of that company, but granting for the moment, for the sake of argument, that it is not advisable that a company should contribute from its funds for political purposes, I contend that it is not practicable to prevent them from so doing by clause 10. The best that section 10 could possibly do would be to effect an alteration in the manner in which the companies contribute. The funds would flow a little more circuitously, but they would be none the less bountiful than they were before this clause was inserted in the law. Economic interest is a much more potent factor in political affairs than pious wishes or legal clauses drawn on moral grounds. We cannot make a corporation moral by a legal clause, any more than we can make an individual moral by a legal clause. I affirm that new ways of contributing have been found, and new ways will be found of evading any such legislation. The letter of this particular section of the law is being praised, and its spirit is being mocked. Not only should this clause be repealed because it does not hinder corporations from contributing, but it should be repealed because of its influence towards anarchy. It is much better I think, and I am sure the House will agree with me, to have no law than to have one that people enjoy evading, a law that people actually play with as a game to see how easily they can get around it. Clause 10 affords such a pleasure to those who might be making large contributions to election funds. By this clause the pain of contributing would be offset to a considerable degree by the amount of pleasant excitement which the donor would receive from dodging the law in giving. It becomes a game to break the law. There were too many of these laws before this one came. I am not convinced, Mr. Speaker, that manufacturers or any corporation should be stopped from contributing to political parties; I am convinced that they cannot be stopped by legislation of this kind. I am also convinced that we should stop trying to stop them from contributing if they want to, and for that reason I ask that this clause be repealed.

But there is another reason why this bill should pass and that is that clause 10 of the Dominion Elections Act is much more effective against labour than it is in preventing corporations from contributing to election funds—the purpose for which it was presumably drawn. Large amounts could now be contributed under clause 10 by individuals for corporations and the penalties of the law be very easily evaded, but this is not so in connection with labour unions. This cannot happen in the case of labour because we have no very wealthy labour men who are prepared to donate five or ten or one hundred thousand dollars to an election fund. Election funds in the case of labour have to be collected in twenty-five or fifty cent pieces from individuals. Consequently, while this section may be very easily got over by those corporations against whom it was drawn, labour cannot avoid it quite so easily. It is true, of course, that provisions are made for the incorporation of any association of people for political purposes, and this incorporation would afford them the right under the law to contribute and collect funds. I want to point out that the labour organization in Canada are not in a position to avail themselves of this part of the election law. The labour organization is an industrial organization, it is acting under an international constitution, and that international constitution prohibits it from becoming incorporated for political purposes. For this reason the labour organization is unable to do what the organized farmers had to do in order to avoid the penalties of this section. The latter body became incorporated for political purposes and thus fulfilled the demands of the Dominion Elections Act. But labour is not in a position to do that, and consequently this section causes a particular hardship to fall on the labour organization. Now labour people hate to have to dodge the law for the contribution of a quarter or fifty cents as the case might be. If it were $100,000 or so, it might be worth the trouble, but when it is the case of a small donation, perhaps given by a trade union voluntarily, it is impossible for them to get around this act without a great deal of inconvenience. I contend, therefore, that this section should be repealed in order that a labour organization might voluntarily vote money to the funds of any party—Conservative, Liberal, Progressive or any other party—that they might wish, and that legislation which stands in the way of this voluntary action is certainly reactionary.

There is another point to which I would like to draw the attention of the House in this regard and it is, that this is one more means which stands in the way of preventing organized labour from seeking to take action in a constitutional manner. Much talk has been uttered in the past about the industrial action which labour men throughout Canada had taken at various times; it has been contended that they should adopt political methods, and that they should take political action and bring their grievances to parliament. But when they begin to take such action as is termed constitutional they find section 10 prohibits them from adopting that method. Perhaps at this point I had better read section 10 in order that there will be no misunderstanding as to what its import is. It reads as follows:

> No unincorporated company or association and no incorporated company or association other than one incorporated for political purposes alone shall directly or indirectly, contribute, loan, advance, pay, or promise or offer to pay any money or its equivalent to, or for, or in aid of, any candidate at an election, or to, or for, or in aid of, any political party, committee, or association, or to, or for, or in aid of, any company incorporated for political purposes, or to, or for, or in furtherance of, any political purpose whatever, or for the indemnification or reimbursement of any person for money so used.
> Every director, shareholder, officer, attorney, or agent of any company or association violating the provisions of this section, or who aids, abets, advises, or takes part in any such violation, and every person who asks or knowingly receives any money or its equivalent in violation of the provisions of this section, is guilty of an indictable offence against this act punishable as in this act provided.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Do I understand that the principal object of the bill is to allow labour organizations to contribute to electoral funds?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, the principal object I am seeking to gain by asking a repeal of this section is that labour may be allowed to contribute to election funds.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: May I suggest to my hon. friend that an amendment to the section would serve his purpose, an amendment just putting in two or three words after the following:

> No unincorporated company or association and no incorporated company or association other than one incorporated for political purposes—

I suggest the addition there of the words: "or labour organization". That would serve the purpose of my hon. friend.

Mr. IRVINE: I am quite aware that such would have served my purpose, but having discussed this matter with a goodly number of the members of the House I found they would be more willing to repeal this clause than to grant a particular privilege to labour or to any other group of people in the country. I felt also that I did not wish to ask even for a labour organization what I was not prepared to grant to similar organizations throughout Canada. Therefore I came to the conclusion that the best thing to do would be to repeal the whole clause.

I would also draw attention to section 11 which this bill also proposes to repeal. Perhaps I had better read that section. It says:

> Any person, not being an elector or a candidate, who resides without Canada and who, to secure the election of any candidate, canvasses for votes or in any way endeavours to induce voters to vote for any candidate at an election, or to refrain from voting, is guilty of an indictable offence against this act punishable as in this act provided.

I do not know any case where this has been enforced; I think it would be too absurd to be enforced. We often have labour men from Great Britain who write to our papers at election time. They might possibly be coming to this country during an election, and we could not ask even Ramsay MacDonald, the ex-premier of Great Britain, to take part in an election in Centre Winnipeg, because this particular section would prohibit us. That I say is absurd.

Mr. JACOBS: Would it not be the height of bad taste for Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to come in here and assist any person to carry an election?

Mr. IRVINE: Possibly it would. It is not a matter of taste that I am dealing with, it is the matter of the absurdity of this provision in the law. I think we can take it for granted, however, that if taking part in an election involved any flagrant departure from good taste a man of the calibre of the ex-premier of Great Britain would not take advantage of it. Consequently we do not need to have any precaution against that kind of thing. I want to say to my hon. friend that it is not unknown for Canadians to take part in elections in Great Britain, and there are no provisions in their statutes which prohibit us from doing that. I do not see why we should have such a ridiculous provision as this which might be used against perhaps very eminent men or women from Great Britain. I do not think it is necessary to argue this thing. I repeat that it is absurd. It is not enforced because of its absurdity, and why it should be here as a club over the labour organizations I fail to see. In conclusion let me point out, Mr. Speaker, that in the Election Act of Great Britain provision is made for labour people to contribute to election funds. I would also point out that in the memorandum submitted by representatives of organized labour in Canada to the government this year the repeal of these sections is urged. I hope the House will agree with me that it is in the interests of good law and the interests of Canada as a whole that sections 10 and 11 should be repealed.

Hon. E. J. McMURRAY (Solicitor General): The bill which the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) has presented to the House for second reading is one of great importance and very sweeping. Sections 10 and 11 of the Dominion Elections Act of the year 1920 were passed in this House under the guidance of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), who was then Solicitor General, and they were fully debated and carefully considered by the House at that time. Even then there was nothing new in the matter then incorporated into those sections. They both came down from the year 1908 with some slight amendments. In fact I think the first one went back as far as 1898. The provisions made in those sections are really very essential and very necessary The debate held in 1920, when the whole Elections Act was drafted, dealt with the necessity of preventing corporations using their funds in elections. The necessity of that is very apparent. It was a fact that in this country, and in the United States and other countries, large interests and corporations had not hesitated at times to use their funds in election matters, and the following section was passed:

> No unincorporated company or association and no incorporated company or association other than one incorporated for political purposes alone shall, directly or indirectly, contribute, loan, advance, pay, or promise or offer to pay any money or its equivalent to, or for, or in aid of, any candidate at an election.

A political association can be formed and moneys can be contributed by that association, but this went further and said:

> Every director, shareholder, officer, attorney, or agent of any company or association violating the provisions of this section, or who aids, abets, advises, or takes part in any such violation, and every person who asks or knowingly receives any money or its equivalent in violation of the provisions of this section, is guilty of an indictable offence against this act punishable as in this act provided.

And the fine for the violation of this section was increased, I think rightly and properly so. The reasoning of this would be very apparent. This is not aimed at labour, as my hon. friend the mover of the bill suggests at all. It is broad and involves all corporations. The necessity is plain. Funds in a corporation, and funds in a labour union are there for specific purposes. What right has a corporation to use funds for election matters when these funds were subscribed for an altogether different purpose? Now section 11 reads:

> Any person not being an elector or candidate, who resides without Canada and who, to secure the election of any candidate, canvasses for votes or in any way endeavours to induce voters to vote for any candidate at an election, or to refrain from voting, is guilty of an indictable offence against this act punishable as in this act provided.

The notable point about that section is that it deals with the period during which an election is in operation, and that is defined by clause (d) of the interpretation, which says:

> "During an election" or "at an election" or "throughout an election" includes the period after the issue of the writ for an election, or after the dissolution of parliament or the occurrence of a vacancy in consequence of which a writ for an election is eventually issued, until the elected candidate is returned as elected.

That simply prohibits people from outside of Canada, at the very period when an election is going on in this country, a matter of 30 or 40 days, from coming here and canvassing for votes, and taking a part in the election, and the reason for it is very apparent. We have embodied in this act measures to see that elections are conducted properly, and that no irregularities shall occur, and if outsiders were allowed to come to Canada they would be at liberty to conduct elections in a way that people at home here in Canada could not do and readily escape back to their own country. This applies not only to labour, but it is applicable to all classes of people. Wealthy corporations in the United States, with branch offices in Canada, cannot come into this country and canvass and take part in an election or induce the people to vote or to refrain from voting. The hon. gentleman who promotes the bill has laid stress on these two subsections as being calculated to injure labour. That was not the intention at all. The very language of the clause does not indicate that. It applies to all sections of the community, to all occupations, to every type of citizen at an election time. As another hon. gentleman pointed out, it would be very easy for the mover of the bill to have excepted labour unions or trade unions in this clause. Not content with doing that he actually proposes in this House to sweep out all these safeguards that protect us from fraud, and so on, at an election time, and in that way I say that the bill he has proposed is very vital and very serious.

Mr. SHAW: May I ask the minister if an exception with respect to labour were incorporated into the existing legislation would he approve of it?

Mr. McMURRAY: I would say to my hon. friend—and I intended to mention it in any event—that the government proposes before the close of the session to introduce a bill introducing some amendments to the Elections Act. There have been several reports made by the electoral officers since the Dominion Elections Act was passed. There are some amendments not of a sweeping character that we feel the House would concur in fully, and when sufficient information can be gathered a bill will be brought down in due course, but I would suggest to the mover of the bill that it would be better possibly if he would drop the bill; and consideration might be given to his proposal. I cannot urge him to drop it. The government bill will be considered in committee, and he will have a chance in committee when the bill is brought down to discuss the question he has raised in this House. But the House will see that this bill as drafted is simply sweeping away what has been on our statute books for a long time and exists there of apparent necessity. The government could not consent to the passing of the second reading of this bill at the present time.

Mr. IRVINE: Since this legislation has been on the statute books for so long, can the minister say that he thinks it has been effective?

Mr. McMURRAY: I think there is no doubt of that at all. I cannot tell what corporations might have done if the act had not been passed. We find it necessary to pass many laws against crimes of all kinds and generally they are effective, and I presume this law has been effective in this case. Surely the hon. member would not propose to throw down all the safeguards that we have.

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister find any objections to provision being made by which labour organizations could provide funds for political purposes, such as is proposed in principle by the mover?

Mr. McMURRAY: That is a matter for the deliberate consideration of the House. No man in this country is more friendly to labour than I am.

Mr. IRVINE: Answer the question.

Mr. McMURRAY: There would be great difficulties in that. Supposing my hon. friend was a member of a trade union and he put his money in it for the purposes of trade union work. Would he want the directors or officers of that union to vote it away for an entirely different purpose?

Mr. LADNER: Would the members of the union not decide that for themselves?

Mr. McMURRAY: That is where the difficulty arises.

Mr. FORKE: The matter contained in this bill may be viewed from two different angles. I can say frankly that when this measure was introduced in 1920, I think it was, political movement was pretty lively out on the prairies and the farmers were taking a stand to go into politics actively. There was some suspicion at that time that this law was aimed at movements of this character. Since then I have viewed the matter very carefully and we found a way of getting around it in a perfectly legal manner by becoming incorporated for political purposes. That may seem, on the face of it, to be a rather cumbersome way of carrying on political activities. Thinking the matter over, I have now come to the conclusion that, perhaps, it is just as well to avoid the very appearance of evil, and if people wish to go into politics actively in a body, I do not think there is any great hardship in asking that they should become incorporated if they wish to collect funds for that purpose. I quite sympathize with the ideas of the promoter of this bill in that he may think it a hardship that they should be compelled to incorporate for this purpose. Nevertheless, I am inclined to believe that the law as it stands now may have a very good effect as a warning to corporations and bodies of individuals who may wish to contribute towards political funds for the purpose of corrupting the public. In fact, I would be inclined to allow the law as it stands in section 10 to remain as it is.

As regards section 11, I am not so sure. I cannot, however, see that a great deal of harm would occur in allowing outsiders to come in and take part in our elections. As has already been said, Canadians go over to Great Britain, take part in the elections over there and get elected as members of the Imperial parliament. It is, perhaps, an open question just how far that should be allowed. I have listened to remarks made by the Solicitor General as regards foreigners coming in here, acting in a corrupt manner and then leaving abruptly so that they cannot be punished for what they have done. That may be perfectly true, but at the same time I would allow liberty of action in a matter of this kind and I would be inclined to be in favour of section 11 being withdrawn.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have to admit that I have been in public life in Canada longer than the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine), and I will give him the reasons why this section prohibiting outsiders from taking part in our elections was placed in the statute book in the first place. As a matter of fact, it was to prevent any party from bringing men, largely from across the border, to take part in our elections. Many years ago, when this act was first passed, each party was charging the other with importing men trained in election manipulation from various cities in the United States to assist them in doing in the campaign in Canada, work which the Canadian under the law would not dare to do himself. That was the basis of this law. My hon. friend will say, of course, that if a man was caught plugging, he could be arrested, but the difficulty was that he would do that kind of work, every person would know that he was in the country doing political work for some of the parties, but they could not discover until election day, perhaps, a direct violation of our law. Under the statute as it stands now, he could be arrested if he was found taking part in an election and you would not have to prove a direct violation of our election law in order to arrest him. If my hon. friend had passed through the experiences, particularly in the border counties, that many of us in Canada did years ago, he would not think of removing this restriction. There has been a great improvement in election methods since it became a part of our statutes. It never was intended to apply to a man like Ramsay MacDonald or any other man who, passing through the country, wished to make a speech, and a law is only justifiable in the way it is enforced. A law must be enforced with common sense or it will not remain law very long. I might warn my hon. friend that if he would persist in removing that section, we might have a return to the days when we were infested at election time with men brought across the border to do certain work that Canadians would not do themselves.

Mr. GOOD: In connection with the time at which the first section was adopted, my recollection is that it was adopted in 1920, and I was rather surprised to hear the Solicitor General state that it dates back to 1908. Perhaps he or the hon. member for South Wellington can give some authoritative information on that point.

Mr. McMURRAY: The present Dominion Elections Act was drafted in 1920. This particular section 10 comes, I think, from the Elections Act of 1908, with a slight amendment dealing with the opening words, "an unincorporated company or association," and the penalty was increased. Section 10 is substantially as it stood in the prior act. There is nothing new in the enactment in the statute of 1920. Section 11 is also the same.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my recollection serves me, clause 10 dates further back than the Elections Act of 1907. It was passed in 1898 and has been carried now on the statutes for over a quarter of a century. The other clause was passed in the year 1907 or 1908. My own opinion is that in view of the suggestion of the Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray), the hon. member who has moved this bill (Mr. Irvine) would do well to drop the matter pending the bringing down later on of the bill which the government proposes to introduce during the session. I assume that there will be quite a number of amendments to be proposed to the Dominion Elections Act. Some the Solicitor General says are of minor importance while others may be of greater significance. But there will be an opportunity then for the hon. member to move an amendment in the ordinary course as in the case of any other public bill. I think he would be well advised in the meantime to let this bill drop with the idea of reviving it, if he sees fit, when the general bill is under discussion. In the meantime we could give the matter further consideration.

Motion (Mr. Irvine) negatived.

MORRISBURG DAM

On the motion of Mr. Church:

For a copy of all papers, agreements, correspondence, telegrams and letters exchanged between the government of Canada, the governments of Ontario and the United States, and the Hydro-Electric Commission regarding the generation and distribution of power at what is commonly known as the proposed Morrisburg dam on the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The wording of this motion contemplates something more than it is possible for the government to comply with. It calls for all correspondence and so on exchanged between the government of Canada, the governments of Ontario and the United States and the Hydro-Electric Commission. We clearly are not in a position to bring down papers exchanged between the government of Ontario and the Hydro-Electric Commission, or between the United States and the commission. In other words, we can bring down only such papers as have passed between the government of Canada and any of the bodies mentioned in the motion that is to say, any correspondence to which this government has been 11 p.m. a party. If the hon. member will amend his motion to carry that meaning it may pass. I suggest that he insert after the words "the government of Canada" the word "and," and substitute the word "or" for the word "and" before the words "the Hydro-Electric Commission." If the motion is amended in that way it may be adopted.

Motion as amended agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT CONFERENCES

On the motion of Mr. Church:

For a copy of all papers, agreements, correspondence, letters and other data exchanged between the government of Canada and the governments of the municipalities or provinces, relating to unemployment, including a return as to what action was taken at conferences between the aforesaid governments on this question, and showing the amount spent on unemployment by the government of Canada during the past four years for unemployment relief.

[Mr. Guthrie]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not like to be critical, but my hon. friend uses an expression which is hardly appropriate—"the governments of the municipalities or provinces". I would suggest that he drop the words "governments of the".

Motion as amended agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the motion of Mr. Church:

For returns showing—1. The amount spent by the government of Canada in relieving unemployment in Canada in Winnipeg, Hamilton, Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal during the past six years.

2. What sum respectively was spent by the (a) Dominion government, (b) the provincial government, (c) the municipalities aforesaid, relieving unemployment in these five cities the past six years.

3. Whether the government during these years had any agreement with the provinces and municipalities as to any form of relief; if so, what the arrangement was.

4. Whether any steps have been taken during this winter by the government alone or with the provinces or municipalities to take care of unemployment, and to regulate and prevent the dumping of those out of work in the larger centres of population.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has a genius for asking for material to which he is not entitled. Section 2 of this motion asks for information regarding moneys spent by the Dominion government, certain provincial governments and certain municipalities. This government has no information and is not in a position to supply any in regard to what was spent either by the provincial governments or by the municipalities; and the rest of the second paragraph is therefore only a repetition of the first. If the hon member will delete the second clause altogether the government will be prepared to comply with the remainder of the motion. I suggest, therefore, that the motion be amended accordingly.

Motion as amended agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Friday, February 20, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Minutes of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons for the year 1924, pursuant to rule 9.—Mr. Speaker.

Copy of a convention between his Britannic Majesty, in respect of the Dominion of Canada and the United States for the extradition of offenders against the laws for the suppression of traffic in narcotics, signed at Washington, the 8th day of January, 1925.—Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King.

Copy of regulations made under the authority of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Act, chapter 29, section 1, second session of 1919.—Hon. Mr. Beland.

NARCOTIC DRUGS CONVENTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That four hundred copies in the English language and two hundred copies in the French language of a convention between Canada and the United States for the extradition of offenders against the laws for the suppression of traffic in narcotic drugs, signed at Washington on the 8th day of January, 1925, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Bancroft be substituted for that of Mr. Bird on the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Post Office Act.

He said: The object of this amendment is to provide for a uniform law, as in the United States, England and Australia, requiring sworn semi-annual statements from all newspapers, magazines, trade journals and other periodicals which contain articles designed to influence public opinion, giving the names and addresses of editors, owners and stockholders. There is a proviso that this act shall not apply to religious, fraternal, temperance, scientific, or such other publications. The names of small stockholders are not required to be given. A copy of these sworn statements shall be published in such newspapers or other publications after they have been filed as required by the act. Any such publication which fails to comply with these provisions shall be denied admission to the mails. Paid editorials and other reading matter for which money is paid shall be plainly marked "Advertisement", as they properly should be. Statements under the act are to be made in duplicate and delivered to the Postmaster General, who shall make regulations for the carrying out of the provisions of the act. This legislation is introduced solely in the public interest and in the best interests of a free press and of the liberty of the press in a liberty-loving country. If the press is to serve the public more adequately in the future this legislation is not only a social but an economic necessity.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ESTIMATES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways) moved:

That rule 10 of the House of Commons relating to the appointment of the select standing committee of the House be amended by adding to the select standing committees of the House for the present session a select standing committee on Railways and Shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government, to which will be referred the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Merchant Marine for the present session for consideration and for report to the House provided, however, that nothing in this resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of Supply, and that the said committee consist of Messrs. Cannon, Drummond, Drayton, Euler, Graham, Harris, Jelliff, Jones, Kyte, Mackinnon, Milne, Rinfret, Robichaud, Stewart (Humboldt) and Stork.

Motion agreed to.

OCEAN SHIPPING RATES

AGREEMENT WITH SIR WILLIAM PETERSEN

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that on Tuesday next the House go into committee to consider a certain proposed resolution to approve of the agreement between the government and Sir William Petersen.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I wish to ask the government if they will table the correspondence in connection with this matter prior to the consideration of it?

Mr. GRAHAM: Well—

Mr. STEVENS: If you will permit me to complete my remarks. There must be considerable correspondence, because in the report of Mr. Preston he states that he carried on his investigation largely by correspondence. That is, he submitted a sort of questionnaire—it was not a questionnaire but a letter of that nature to a large number of companies; but he does not give the replies in his report. There is that correspondence and such other correspondence as may be in the possession of the government.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no objection to tabling any correspondence that is not confidential. We will have the matter looked into and give a reply at the next sitting of the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Surely the minister will not suggest that correspondence between Mr.

Preston and the steamship companies should be confidential?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not making any suggestion. Probably there is none, but there may be correspondence between some other companies, say, and Mr. Preston that the company would wish to be confidential. However, I do not know that that is the case.

Motion agreed to.

ALLEGED FRUIT COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Yesterday I asked the question and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) being here to-day perhaps I can put it again: Has the government received, and will they file, a report by Lewis Duncan, a commissioner under the Combines Act who investigated charges affecting certain companies alleged to be in a fruit combine in western Canada?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): A report of the nature suggested by the hon. gentleman will be laid on the table of the House within a few days.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): I will make two statements of fact and on them ask a question regarding the diversion of water in connection with the Chicago drainage canal. In the first place, is the government aware that to-day at Washington Hon. Mr. Weeks, Secretary of War, is hearing an application to increase the 4,000 cubic feet allowance allowed by treaty to 8,500 cubic feet, and for a period of years? In the second place, several deputations, including private people and others are appearing before a committee of congress of a foreign power, and a foreign secretary, purporting to represent Canada in regard to a British treaty. They are taking this course over the heads of the Canadian government, and the British government, and the British Ambassador at Washington, instead of making representations through the usual channel of the Canadian and British government and the British Ambassador. I should like to ask how it is that the parties referred to are allowed to represent Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend but I submit that he is not putting a question, he is making a speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. gentleman that questions on the orders of the day must be very short and concise. The hon. member should put his question and not argue the matter.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the Prime Minister: Is the government of Canada represented at Washington to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The answer is, yes.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask if the course which I have indicated is the proper one to pursue? Why are representations not made to the British Ambassador instead of through a committee of congress?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In regard to the question of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) I understood the Prime Minister to say we were represented at Washington in the matter. Will the Prime Minister say who the representative is and before what body he is acting?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The representative is Mr. Stewart, of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before whom?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is appearing at the hearing. He is not taking any part at the present time other than observing the proceedings, and keeping the government informed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask, is the government doing anything?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the government has kept very careful watch of the entire proceedings, and has repeatedly placed itself before the United States government, through the British Ambassador, the Canadian viewpoint in the matter.

EVACUATION OF COLOGNE AREA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): I should like to ask, has the government protested against the refusal of the Allied governments to evacuate the Cologne area, and does the government approve of the act of the Allied governments?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not aware of any protest having been made.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not get a reply to the second part of my question: Does the government approve of the action of the Allied governments in regard to the delay in the evacuation of the Cologne area?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend that the government has not really considered the matter to which he refers.

GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): I should like to repeat my question of yesterday. Perhaps the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) can give a definite assurance to-day that the evidence presented to the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission will be laid upon the table.

Hon. Mr. ROBB: I shall direct the question of the hon. member to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as soon as he returns; he is not in his seat to-day.

KAMLOOPS-KELOWNA BRANCH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways whether the negotiations carried on between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific regarding the Kamloops-Kelowna branch have been completed, and if so with what result?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I am not prepared to say with what result, but there have been certain conferences, and I will give a definite answer in a day or two when I get the information from the management of the Canadian National Railways.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Agriculture—Fruit, including grant of $8,000 to the Canadian Horticultural Council, $200,000.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not want to hold up the estimates unnecessarily, but here is a large item without any definite statement or detail as to what the money is to be used for. I also object to the increase of $18,000. I do not see why there should be any increase in this estimate. There is also an item of $8,000 for the Canadian Horticultural Council. What are the functions of that council? What good do they do to the fruit industry or to the country?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): The first question is with regard to the increase. I may say that last year in a small way we took over a new service, which consisted of grading apples in the Okanagan valley, and issuing a certificate therefor. That was done on the request of the apple growers of British Columia, they offering to pay for the service. This service was only inaugurated with the Okanagan people to give us sufficient information, in order to show that a fee of $5 for inspecting a car and issuing the certificate would cover the cost of service. This $18,000 additional is for the purpose of extending the service to all the apple growers of Canada, in return for which we will charge a fee of $5, and the money will be recouped to the treasury. It was found that the old method of grading by the barrel was not as satisfactory nor as good for the industry as the government certificate would be.

With respect to the second question I may say the Horticultural Council was organized in Canada in 1922 and I think I could not do better than just read the report of the council to the House. The report says:

> To advance all matters tending towards the improvement of the horticultural and allied industries in Canada, including plant origination and registration, production, grading, packing, transportation, storage and marketing;
>
> (a) By bringing about a closer co-operation between those engaged in the horticultural and allied industries in Canada and a fuller understanding of their problems;
>
> (b) By initiating, fostering and assisting in obtaining such legislation and regulations as will be beneficial to the horticultural and allied industries;

Then as to the vegetable industry the report says:

> (c) By emphasizing through inter-provincial co-operation the importance of the horticultural and allied industries and to obtain for them the position they deserve as an important and progressive branch of agriculture;

And it goes on with a number of subdivisions; I do not think I need read the whole of them. The amount of grant each year was: In 1922 $5,000; 1923, $8,000; and so on. The reason the addition was made to the grant was the new work they took up in connection with the registration of new plants and new shrubs. That has been established for the first time in Canada, and I think for the first time on this continent: that is, issuing registration certificates for new breeds of plants and fruits, so that the originator of a new apple like the McIntosh or any other new variety of fruit could get a registration or pedigree, just as they obtain a pedigree for an animal. The report continues:

> What the council has (a) undertaking is:
> 1. To bring about a closer co-operation between those engaged in the horticultural and allied industries in Canada and a greater understanding of their problems;
> 2. The establishment of a plant registration bureau.
> 3. The establishment of trial gardens.
> 4. The establishment of demonstration gardens.
> 5. The encouragement of horticultural research and production by means of medals, awards and diplomas.

There are a large number of others. This vote was included in the miscellaneous vote in former years, but this year it is attached to this particular branch.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do we understand that the fees for grading apples will make this industry carry its own expense of grading?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, just the new grading. We have never officially graded apples or potatoes for shipment. It has always been done by the owner, and while that practice, which was introduced with the introduction of the Fruit Marks Act something like twenty years ago, has given great service, it is not altogether satisfactory. Consequently a species of government inspection on the car at the point of shipment was provided, to supervise the grading done by the owners, by opening the barrels and packages, to ascertain if they were graded correctly. If they are graded properly we issue a certificate to that effect. The issuing of that certificate by an impartial inspector gives additional value to the grades. The fee for that inspection is $5 a car.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then this $18,000 is to make the initial payment for this service?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: And this will be returned in fees?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, it will be returned in the revenues of the country.

Mr. CALDWELL: We understand this is only an advance to carry on the work and it will be returned in grading fees?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. I may inform the committee that it cost us last year $11,000 to give the service in the Okanagan valley and the fee of $5 a car would amount to about $12,680. It was done in a place where it could be done more cheaply before, and it will cost more now.

Mr. CALDWELL: If the results are the same next year your revenue will be double the outlay, and you will be able to reduce the cost per car.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, it may work out that way. With reference to charging the fee, it is a question whether we should not do the same thing for a large number of inspectional services. With reference to the inspection of wheat by the grain inspectors at Winnipeg, it has always been the custom to charge in the old days 60 cents a car for small cars and 90 cents a car at the present time. We have not, except on some occasions like this carried on the practice of charging for inspection or grading fees with regard to other farm products. We have the grading now of cheese and butter, and we have been discussing the wisdom of putting on a charge for grading butter and cheese, so much per box, two or three or four cents, and have this cover the cost of the service. We have discussed the wisdom of doing the same thing with regard to the grading of hogs. If the committee thinks that the time has arrived when these services are so well recognized, so valued and appreciated that we could very well charge a fee in the same way as we do for the inspection of wheat, I should be glad to hear what hon. members have to say regarding the matter.

Mr. CALDWELL: As regards the inspection of fruits and vegetables, is it proposed to have an inspector supervise the grading?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. The grading will be done exactly as before. A number of the receptacles will be opened in order that the inspector may find out whether the contents are up to grade and in good condition or not.

Mr. ROBINSON: Will this make a complete change in the method of inspecting apples?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. ROBINSON: To what extent will there be a change?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It will be supplemental to the present grading. The grading will be exactly the same. Whether it is a carload at the port or point of shipment, we send a man in to inspect the fruit and find out its condition and whether it is graded properly. It will be an additional precaution.

Mr. LOVETT: Will this be done by the same inspector?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON: The inspector will issue a certificate?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, a government certificate.

Mr. MORRISON: Is government inspection of these products to be made compulsory for goods consumed in Canada as well as goods for export?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is entirely optional. A request was made by the apple growers of British Columbia. They felt that they could well afford to pay five dollars a car to get a government inspector's certificate, so they made the proposal and offered to pay that amount of money. We thought we would try out this inspection in a small way last year. The proposal is to extend the service to any part of Canada where the people of that locality wish it to be applied. It will not be compulsory. Any part of Canada that wishes to get the old system of grading will be at liberty to do so.

Mr. CALDWELL: Did this request come from the shippers or the growers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: From both.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the inspection apply to potatoes as well as fruit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I understand the same request has been made with regard to the shipment of potatoes.

Mr. CALDWELL: From the growers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: What potato growers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In British Columbia.

Mr. CALDWELL: How many additional inspectors does the minister expect this will mean?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That will depend upon how many people take advantage of the service. It will probably mean from ten to fifteen inspectors. We had eleven last year. If the Niagara peninsula and the Annapolis valley both request a similar service, probably fifteen additional inspectors will be required.

Mr. CALDWELL: That will be for the fruit. Supposing this service is extended to vegetables, for instance potatoes?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That will take still more. The Ashcroft potato growers and others in British Columbia made the same request and we acceded to it on the same terms.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister has men who look after seed, feed and fertilizer control, and a great deal of that work comes at a different season of the year from the grading of fruit and vegetables. Would it not be possible to use the same staff on the two different branches of work instead of adding to the departmental staff for this purpose? It has been suggested to me that especially the seed inspection is a seasonal occupation that may occupy only a short part of the winter season, and owing to the fact that there is no continuous occupation for these men, the same men do not come back next year and a new crop of men is taken on. My opinion is that if the same men could be employed in the other branches of inspection work the minister would be able to retain those men through the season, have the advantage of any experience they had in past years and ensure much better results than would be possible with a new force of men taken on each year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That request on the face of it is reasonable enough. As regards the Seed branch, that will come before the committee in a little while. A sufficient number of new activities have been taken on by the Seed branch during recent years to occupy the whole of their time. The Feeding Stuffs Act has necessitated more time and men; but even since then, the act with respect to the grading of hay was taken over recently from the Department of Trade and Commerce and the act with respect to the inspection of hides and fertilizers has been taken over as well. All these additional services have been taken on by the Seed branch and they keep the time of the staff entirely occupied. The work of the great majority of the fruit inspectors, except possibly the port inspectors, is of a seasonal nature, four or five months.

Mr. SPENCE: Does the shipper or the buyer pay the charge of five dollars for the inspection of a carload of apples or other fruit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Whoever asks for the service pays for it.

Mr. SPENCE: The minister says that the inspector issues a certificate. Provided that the inspector issues a certificate that the fruit is in first class condition and deterioration sets in from any cause after a few weeks have elapsed in transportation, will the buyer be forced to accept the car on that certificate? I presume that is the intention.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are giving the same service, no matter who asks for it. If there is any objection on the part of the buyer to the grading after the certificate is issued, we will give a re-inspection.

Mr. SPENCE: Where?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: At the point of delivery.

Mr. SPENCE: Then it is optional whether a car is inspected or not.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SPENCE: I think the minister should go further and inspect every carload before it leaves the shipping point.

Mr. ROBINSON: Was the total number of inspectors in Nova Scotia reduced last season, and if so by how many, and why?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We thought that by making them work a little harder, cover a little bit more ground, maybe go on duty a week or two earlier and maybe stay on a week longer, a smaller number of the best men would be able to cover the work. As these activities increase in volume and number, the number of our staff is necessarily increased, and in our desire to keep that down to the minimum consistent with service, we cut some of them out. The taking on of this additional service will, of course, necessitate additional inspectors, but this expense will be paid out of the revenue that we derive from the charge of five dollars a car.

Mr. BOYS: If a car of apples is ordered and inspected and a certificate is given, has that certificate any binding effect so far as the purchaser is concerned in the event of the consignment proving on delivery to be not in accordance with the specification?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The system is merely a means of facilitating business between buyer and seller. The same question came up the other day in connection with the grading of dairy products and it has also arisen in the case of the grading of grain. I do not know of any system of inspection under which the government holds itself responsible for the consequences of its grading certificates.

Mr. BOYS: The minister misunderstands me; I do not suggest that the government would be responsible. If the certificate had a binding effect as between the two parties to the contract I could appreciate the fact that it would be far-reaching and useful. But so far as I know, it has no legal effect; it does not preclude the purchaser from rejecting the stock, whatever it may be. If, however, there is such a provision I should like to know where to find it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Invariably, where there is a system of grading provided by law, the certificate is accepted by buyer and seller, but I am not sufficiently versed in the law to know whether such a certificate would hold in court. That, however, is the practice. If, for instance, a car of potatoes is graded at point of shipment in the Maritime provinces, the purchaser being in Montreal, let us say, the consignment might be refused on the ground that the grading was too high. An inspector of the department would then be called in and would re-inspect the shipment, and the decision is usually accepted by the buyer in such transactions. I do not know, however, what force the certificate would have in law, although in my experience the arrangement has always been satisfactory to both buyer and seller. Indeed, both parties have always seemed to be so satisfied that new services of this kind are constantly being asked for. That is the reason for the present service. Last year, I might mention in illustration, several carloads of turkeys arrived from western Canada for Toronto and Montreal, the draft being attached to the bill of lading in the usual way. The buyers refused to take delivery on the ground that the shipment was not properly graded; the poultry, it appeared, was not dressed. There was no system of grading for dressed poultry; it was merely a matter of sending representatives to the siding to superintend the transportation of the consignment. It was cold weather, the birds got frozen, and their value was reduced. Finally by negotiation and adjustment an agreement was arrived at, but owing to the fact that there was no federal grading system some difficulty was experienced. The public are always running up against such difficulties and that is why they are asking for grading in order to facilitate business and reduce friction to the minimum.

Mr. BOYS: If the certificate were made binding by statute it would prevent a great deal of litigation which now goes on. If inspection were asked for by vendor and purchaser at point of shipment, the goods being sold f.o.b., and if the certificate being once given were in law binding on the parties, it would be of great service to the people. Without some such provision, however, it seems to me that very little good results; at the very most I suppose you provide a witness who may be called at the trial of the dispute and who, of course, by virtue of his office, would be an independent witness whose word would have weight with the judge. Beyond that I do not see what good results will accrue from the system without the element of binding force.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In my opinion, if the purchaser of a carload of vegetables or of apples refused to accept the inspector's certificate, he would find that the case would go against him if he attempted to defend his action in a court of law.

Mr. BOYS: Supposing that in the transportation of a carload of potatoes the consignment got frozen: surely you do not suggest that the purchaser would be bound to accept that consignment, notwithstanding that a certificate might have been given?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not suggest that. If the consignment was found to be unsatisfactory at point of delivery that information would be forwarded to the proper department and a re-inspection would ensue; and if the potatoes were frozen a report would be made accordingly and non-acceptance would be justified.

Mr. BOYS: That, then, involves the question as to whether the contract is inspection on delivery, or f.o.b. The whole feature lies in that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Re-inspection will be available to anyone who demands it, and our experience is that the system has always worked satisfactorily.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then your first certificate would not be of any effect. The question has been asked as to who pays for the inspection. Well, I think that is easily answered. The producer will pay for it eventually, because if there are two or three charges for inspection added to a cargo of goods, from the time it leaves the producer to the time it reaches the consumer, it is clear that a man will purchase cheaply enough to meet those charges. As a matter of fact, the purchaser does so, and that is right. My fear is that if you have two inspections on every carload, each of the parties will have to pay a five-dollar fee for the inspection and this will cut down the proceeds to the producer, which are already below cost of production, at any rate in the case of potatoes.

Mr. SPENCE: What about the consumer?

Mr. CALDWELL: The price to the consumer is controlled by competition from other sources. If our potatoes are made to cost, through inspection, more than we can buy potatoes for from the United States, the minister can see what a disadvantage the local producer would be under. And I presume that the imports from the United States would not be subject to the inspection. On that point it would be interesting to have some information.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Whoever asks for inspection gets it.

Mr. CALDWELL: Would potatoes coming from the United States be subject to inspection?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Those coming in would be subject to grading, but in the case of our own product the system is purely optional; only those who ask for the service receive it.

Mr. LOVETT: I am aware that the number of inspectors in the Maritime provinces has been reduced during the past year. Was the same proportion of reduction made in Ontario and British Columbia last year as in the Maritime provinces?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. We endeavour to divide the inspectors among the constituencies in the provinces on the basis of the number of barrels of apples exported. I can assure the hon. member that it is no easy matter to get down to mathematical exactitude, having regard to all the interests concerned. But the reduction was made uniformly.

Mr. MARTELL: For what reason was the inspectorial staff reduced and on whose advice was this reduction made? The province of Nova Scotia is a very important apple-growing centre, and this is becoming one of its great industries. The minister is proposing a system of certification and he wants to charge the producer of apples $5 on every car sent out. This will raise a riot among the fruit growers of the country. The inspection either is good or is no good, and it may be made at point of delivery or at the point where the apples are put on the train for transhipment. Nobody knows what is going to happen to these apples in transit; but if a man comes along with a government certificate that the apples were all right when shipped, then the vendee, who probably is defending an action on account of the goods not being in accordance with the guarantee, is non-suited. The sooner the minister gets away from endeavouring to put too many restrictions upon the fruit growers of this country, and the sooner he sees that adequate protection is given to our fruit growers the better it will be for all concerned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTELL: I do not mean "adequate protection" in the sense understood by my right hon. friend; I mean adequate protection to the man who puts up an honest pack. That is all I am asking. The minister brings down legislation regarding which, I venture, to say he has consulted nobody but his officials at Ottawa. He has not gone through the province of Nova Scotia, for instance, and ascertained the views of the fruit growing people there. With a lot of high paid officials here he endeavours to force through the House legislation which is detrimental to the fruit growing industry of Nova Scotia. The first thing he should do is to decrease the number of his high paid officials in Ottawa instead of cutting down the number of inspectors in Nova Scotia. Every one of those inspectors is a good man, I do not care who appointed him; each tries to do his duty. Last year he cut off an inspector in my constituency.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the trouble.

Mr. MARTELL: No, it is not my trouble. He can cut out the whole bunch so far as I am concerned. All I want to see is our people properly protected. The department cut off two inspectors in my hon. friend's (Mr. Robinson's) constituency in the county of Kings, where more apples are raised than in all the rest of Nova Scotia. Two more inspectors were cut off in Digby and Annapolis. The minister is not going to get a thorough inspection by discharging such good men. So long as there are apples to be shipped let the department keep a sufficient staff on hand so that the packers will not have to wait for inspection. To-day shipments are held up for lack of inspection. The minister says now that he is going to penalize the packer. Well, the average packer has faith in his pack, and he knows very well that any failure on his part to keep his pack up to standard means that in the final analysis he will simply penalize himself. But the minister wants to have a big staff of pack inspectors to issue certificates to the packers, with the result that the vendee has no rights whatever in a court of law. Everybody knows the minister is talking against reason.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MARTELL: I say that without hesitation. Every lawyer knows what he is up against in such cases.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTELL: It is all very well for my hon. friends over yonder to laugh; they never saw an apple grown; and I venture to say that the hon. minister never saw an apple grown where he came from. Why does he not take the same
4 p.m. course as his colleagues would take in similar circumstances, consult the men who are to be affected by his proposals? If he does not want to take his friends on this side of the House into his confidence, men who come from the apple-growing districts of Nova Scotia, let him get in touch with the apple growers themselves, instead of attempting to put legislation upon the statute book which is going to retard the apple growing industry of Nova Scotia. Let the minister come down to Nova Scotia, and we will show him that we can raise apples. We want proper inspection, we are not ashamed of the quality of our apples; but on account of a few men who do not agree on what constitutes proper packing, do not let the minister take the advice of his officials in Ottawa, who do not know anything about apples, and then turn around and try to put restrictions upon the apple growing industry of Nova Scotia.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) has touched a very important matter in connection with this item. I observe there is an increase of $18,000 over the estimate for last year, and an increase of $55,000 over that for 1921-2. What proportion of this vote is for the payment of officials and their expenses?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, I suppose we have to give this information to every newcomer, and I will try to furnish it again as briefly as possible. This service is entirely optional; no part of Canada, whether it be the Annapolis valley, the Niagara peninsula or any other fruit growing district need accept it. The service was asked for in the Okanagan valley, we gave it last year, and we have found it self-supporting. Now the proposal is to extend the service to any other part of the Dominion that asks for it. If the fruit growers of the Annapolis valley do not ask for it the service will not be forced upon them; but if they do ask for it we have to assume that they want it.

Mr. MARTELL: Who are the parties to ask for the service—two or three agitators?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The packer, the buyer or whoever else chooses to ask.

Mr. MARTELL: Would the minister put all the expense of administration on any locality at the request of one or two packers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has been upbraiding the officials at Ottawa for not knowing anything about apples; well, we do not pretend to be lawyers, but we do know that this service has worked out satisfactorily in the Okanagan valley, and we know that the people there want it continued. Obviously it would be unfair to give that service to one part of Canada only. Anticipating that other parts of the country will want the service, in spite of what my hon. friend says, we have asked for this increase. If the money is not wanted it will not be expended. If the service is required by other orchardists throughout the Dominion we think it should be given them. Instead of being upbraided for introducing this new principle, I think we should be congratulated on the fact that the service is self-sustaining. I have come to the conclusion that a great many other services that are now given free might very well be charged for just the same as this is. For instance, the grading of wheat is all paid for, and practically the entire cost of administration of the grain commissioners' offices at Winnipeg and Fort William is paid for out of the inspection fees.

Mr. SALES: There is a substantial profit besides.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That principle is recognized there. The reason we have not adopted it in the smaller services is because we thought it not advisable to do so until, through education, those services had become popular. The grading system is being popularized, and I do not think any hardship would follow if we charged a reasonable fee. We have adopted the principle in this case because a request came from the apple growers for the service, and we were in a position to say, "All right, we will give you the service if you pay for it."

Mr. MARTELL: Why give some people subsidies and take them away from others?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are not taking away anything at all, with the exception of the inspectors my hon. friend spoke about in Hants, Digby and Annapolis and Kings. You cannot split a man in two and give two districts a man and a half each; we had to have an even number of men. We had to reduce the staff by one man and we did it as nearly as possible on a pro rata basis according to the export business done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister complained about having had to answer questions so often every time a member came in, but he has not yet answered the question asked by the hon. member (Mr. Sutherland). What the hon. member asked was this: How much of this entire fruit vote goes for the payment of officials?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: While my deputy is looking that up, I may say that that was not a complaint; I was rather apologizing to those of the committee who had been here from the beginning and who had to sit in torture listening to the same explanation two or three times over. I do not object to giving the explanation, but it is not very entertaining to hear the same answer repeated several times.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has not given it even yet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am giving it in regard to the voluntary nature of this service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not what was asked.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is what the hon. member (Mr. Martell) spoke about. I overlooked the last part of the question of the hon. member for South Oxford. I am informed that a large proportion of this vote, the work being educational and inspectional in nature, goes to salaries and travelling expenses. That is inevitable.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I must protest against the practice which has been adopted by the minister of lecturing hon. members when they ask for information in order that they may get an intelligent idea of what money is being voted for. On Tuesday night we had the same experience: questions were asked time and again and the minister endeavoured to make the committee believe they had been answered. On Tuesday night, after putting a question to the minister several times, I was informed by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) that he had heard the Minister of Agriculture answer the question three times while he had been in the House seven minutes. Now, if the Minister of Railways will look up Hansard he will find that the question was not even answered once; and the same thing is being done here again to-day. Instead of bringing a statement before the committee which would indicate what the money is being used for the minister asks us to vote a lump sum to be used in any way he sees fit. Why not bring down a statement which would indicate to what various branches this money is to be devoted? The minister undertook to lecture us the other night and he is going to lecture us again; he is going to "torture" the committee, as he terms it, with long lectures that have no bearing upon the matter at issue. It would facilitate the work of the committee and shorten the discussion if a businesslike method was adopted; if a detailed statement was brought down showing what the money is to be used for. We are now informed that the bulk of this vote is to be used for certain purposes. The amount used for this purpose for the year ending March 31, 1924, was $147,477, so that a considerable portion of it was used for other purposes. With regard to the officials to whom the member for Hants (Mr. Martell) has been referring, I have had some experience of the minister's attitude with regard to inspectors in the county that I represent. Two inspectors received notice from the department that their resignations were required. Both were efficient inspectors. One of them complied with the request, and as a result he received a bonus and retiring allowance. The other said: "No, I am not going to send in a resignation. I think I have rendered good service, and if you want to dismiss me, you may." Well, he was dismissed, and he did not get any bonus. Is this the practice that the minister adopts in regard to the whole system, involving the payment of nearly $200,000 to an army of officials? We know his skill in evading the regulations of the Civil Service Commission with regard to the appointment of officials, but I did not think it was possible that two men working in the same locality, with practically the same qualifications and the same experience, could be accorded such discriminatory treatment. The minister will have to give something a little better than a lecture to the committee; he will have to give us some information if he wants to get his estimates through as easily as he imagines he will.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The first question that was raised when the committee opened proceedings was put by one of the members from Toronto and related to the increase over the estimate of last year. We started to discuss that and to show cause for the increase. We discussed the merits of it, the value of it, the effect of it. I must say to my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) that I did not hear his request for the amount that was to be paid out in salaries. My deputy informs me that he heard it, and I assume that the hon. member asked it, but I did not catch it. I thought we were on the question of this principle of charging for service, and that is what we were discussing in a general way. Now I have in my hand the exact information the hon. gentleman wants.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us have it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That, I supposed, was the next step in connection with the information that would be handed out.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What are my hon. friends laughing at? I cannot see where the fun is.

Mr. MARTELL: Will the minister explain to me—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member for South Oxford is now going on to a new phase of the question. There was no object in my withholding the information, and I have it here. I confess I am at a little disadvantage, but I usually hear what my hon. friend asks. The difficulty is that he not only asks questions but he makes pretty long speeches, and it is not easy for me to catch all his questions or even to remember them if I did catch them. Now, here is the information.

Mr. MARTELL: Will the minister explain—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MARTELL: Pardon me; I am asking the minister a question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It will be understood, then, that we are still on the other phase of it.

Mr. MARTELL: I am not going to be put off that way, because I represent the fruit growers in the county of Hants, the finest citizens of this country. I want to know from the minister why a person who grows fruit should pay for an inspection that he really wants, when the government is giving large subsidies to other people for services that the people do not want.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, they have volunteered in this case, and why should the government refuse a voluntary fee of five dollars for a service rendered when we need the money so badly?

Mr. MARTELL: Use it to encourage the fruit growers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the principle of taking a fee for a service rendered is a sound one. It is not a new principle, and it is something which I think we might carry out in a larger way.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When we have finished with this phase of it I shall be delighted to give the information—but one at a time is good fishing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am merely pointing out certain matters in order to enable the minister to reply with absolute clearness, because I am afraid he will wander away from the question—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: —and I want to lay suitable emphasis on the point. It has been pointed out that there was an increase of $18,000 in the estimates for the coming year over those for the year previous, and that there was an increase of $55,000 in this item over the years 1921 and 1922; and I ask what portion of the item we are now asked to vote is for the payment of the officials and their expenses?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will tell my hon. friend. I was replying to the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) first of all before taking up the questions of the hon. member for South Oxford. Let me now give the details asked for:

Fruit Branch

		Estimates 1925-26	Estimates 1924-25

The item for fruit transportation supervision and assistance deals with the inspection at the ports. At the port of Halifax, for instance, there is an inspector who opens an occasional barrel to see that everything is all right and in order, and that the fruit has been properly graded. As to the item of "Fruit growing and orchard specialist," that is educational work, I presume, in connection with the grading of fruit. It is carrying out the provisions of the law in respect to grading. Ever since the law was passed twenty years ago the grading has been done by the owners of the orchard, or whoever was packing the fruit, and educational work needs to be done from time to time to see that the fruit is properly packed. Indeed, a great deal of harm has been done to the fruit industry as a result of work of this kind being improperly done.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has given considerable information that I did not ask for. I observe that for the year ending March, 1924, the amount paid out for officials and their expenses was $147,477. Now, the minister states that there is $139,415 for that purpose in this vote.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These items are for different kinds of services but they have been classified under various sub-heads such as transportation, fruit packing, and so on.

Mr. MARTELL: The minister in the course of his remarks referred to an inspector at Halifax. I should like to ask him who the cargo inspector at Halifax is and what his qualifications are. I should also like to ask the minister what steps he has taken to provide proper wharves, warehouses, and so on at Halifax for the purpose of enabling the fruit growers of the western portion of Nova Scotia to ship their fruit under satisfactory conditions. I have been told that the matter has been taken up with the department and that there is a dispute between the Dominion Atlantic and the Canadian National railways as to who should supply these facilities. Now, many of the people from western Nova Scotia ship their fruit to Halifax. They are not exactly aware as to what time the boat which is to take this fruit overseas will arrive. The result is that much of the fruit that is sent down becomes frosted. There is also a danger that some of this fruit when it is put on board the vessel is cooked, owing to improper ventilation, and arrives in England in bad state. I submit that the Minister of Agriculture, who is supposed to look after the horticultural interests, as well as the agricultural interests in the Dominion, should see to it that proper care is given and that the right kind of facilities are provided in the city of Halifax for Nova Scotians who grow fruit and wish to ship it abroad. It is all very well to say that it is a question of a dispute between the Canadian National Railways and the Dominion-Atlantic Railway—and I may say the latter brings in the most fruit—as to who should provide the necessary wharf or pier; these facilities should be provided by the Dominion of Canada, and if there is a dispute between the Dominion-Atlantic Railway and the Canadian National Railways, I recommend the Minister of Agriculture to go to that very excellent administrator the Minister of Public Works and get him to supply the wharf, because the latter never starts arguing with you; he tells you "yes" or "no", and does not endeavour to put you off by a long argument.

Now, as I say, in the city of Halifax there is an inspector. Who is that inspector? If the minister does not know where he can get a good inspector I will tell him where he can get one.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTELL: Some hon. members may laugh but this man has proven his worth for the last three years. He is Mr. D. M. Wilson, of Windsor Forks in the county of Hants. He was down for one year as an inspector, and as a result of his work the fruit growers in western Nova Scotia were greatly benefited. This man is not one who fills an office for the salary that he receives; he is a man who is endeavouring in every way to find means and methods whereby fruit can be more efficiently packed, and the fruit growers can be protected. You have an old man in the city of Halifax at the present time as cargo inspector, and if the minister will have his officials inquire into the matter he will find ninety per cent of the time during the cold days of the winter this inspector was not on his job. If the minister had a man like Mr. Wilson down there, the fruit growers of western Nova Scotia would be amply protected. Wilson is a poor man as far as material interests go, but he is one who is constantly looking after the rights of the fruit growers of the province.

I want to impress upon the minister this fact: I happen to be one who is not particularly in his good books, but nevertheless I can protect myself and I can protect my constituents. Furthermore I am going to advocate the interests of my constituents as long as I have the honour of having a seat in this House. The minister went to the city of Halifax after he made a tour of western Nova Scotia and he was very much impressed with the proposition that proper piers, warehouses, and so on should be provided for the shipment from that city, which fruit, I may say, is largely grown in the western part of the province. It is all very well for our people to advocate shipping into the central market of Canada. It is all very well to ask us to sell our produce in western Canada. We cannot do it under the present system of railway rates. But though our people grow the best apples that are produced in the British Empire, we are unable, through the fault of the Department of Agriculture, to get our apples into the English market which should be our chief market. The minister when on a visit to Nova Scotia came to the conclusion that we were badly treated. What we are asking to-day is, not that he should ask the Dominion Atlantic Railway, nor the Canadian National Railways, to remedy the evil it is not their business; but it is the function of the Department of Public Works to provide properly heated accommodation, so that we may be in a position to ship our products to the markets of the world. Of course, I am only speaking as the member for Hants, but the people of Nova Scotia are not going to be satisfied, they are not going to be put off with long speeches and fancy terms and pats on the back. We want proper facilities in the city of Halifax, proper piers and proper warehouses, and it is up to the Minister of Agriculture, if he is going to be true to the principles of agriculture, and endeavour to make agriculture the primary industry in this country, to see that his colleagues give us the proper facilities.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. gentleman from Hants (Mr. Martell) has raised a very important and very old question: that is, with regard to the proper care of fruit at Halifax while awaiting shipment. The arrival of the vessels is sometimes a little uncertain, and during the time of waiting a trainload of apples may freeze on the track in the exposed piers at that point. Believing that something should be done to correct that menace to the industry, I made inquiries about a large pier that is there, a magnificent one, that I thought was capable of being heated sufficiently to take care of a cargo of apples, but I was told that we could not prevail on the vessels to tie up to that pier. So that I had to abandon that idea. The next idea was to repair one of the old wooden piers, so that the train might have sufficient shelter to protect the apples while they were held there awaiting the arrival of the incoming boat, but that would cause additional expense. The last year or two the Fruit branch by intervening with the railways have succeeded in inducing them to put on a sufficient number of heated cars to take care of the fruit shipment from the Annapolis valley during the severe weather. I have not discussed the matter with my deputy or with officials of the Fruit branch recently but I was assured last fall, when I asked our fruit commissioner how the situation was working out, that the railways had supplied a sufficient number of heated cars to avoid any reasonable risk in connection with the fruit in transit awaiting the arrival of the boats. Since then I have heard no complaint. While we did not get the protected pier, we got the protected cars; and so long as the difficulty complained of has been remedied, I do not know that it makes so much difference what method has been employed. The idea would be to run the trainload into the pier, and have sufficient protection to avoid possible freezing; but sometimes these trains of apples meet with severe storms in transit, and the best pier in the world would not protect apples that were storm-stayed; consequently the heated cars would take care of them in transit, as well as at the port awaiting the arrival of the ships. Whether that is a complete remedy or not the hon. member for Hants, knows better than I do, but that is my information. A year ago I made an interesting visit to that district and saw the condition of things, and I spoke to the Minister of Public Works about it, but I am sure the Minister of Public Works has a great many requisitions besides mine that he finds it impossible to fill at the present time. Mr. Wilson was the official down there who was giving such good service, and we are all glad to hear that good services rendered by a government official are acknowledged. Sometimes we hear them spoken of disparagingly.

An hon. MEMBER: Perhaps that is the reason he was let out.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know why he was let out but I presume somebody had to be let out, when there were too many in the department. I do not know how that was. The gentleman who is there now is Colonel G. A. LeCain. I have no information as to him. It is the first complaint I have against him.

Mr. MARTELL: I am not complaining of Colonel LeCain but complaining of a man by the name of Johnson who is your cargo inspector at Halifax.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand he is in the Dairy and Cold Storage branch.

Mr. MARTELL: He is dealing with fruit. I know more about your department than your officials.

Mr. CHAPLIN: One thing I have not got quite clear. I should like to have the minister explain again what is the need for two inspections of apples. If apples are inspected at the point of shipment, what necessity is there for having a second inspection at Halifax?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are not inspected by the grower. They are packed by the grower and graded by him. His work may be done quite conscientiously, yet naturally he sees his own apples with a favourable eye and will sometimes grade them a little higher than they should be graded, and in order to make sure they are according to grade they are inspected at the port. But they are not all inspected; the inspector will loosen the hoops of a barrel and open up the head and inspect, and if he finds evidence of over-inspection, he will inspect the barrel more thoroughly and will mark what they are. If the inspection is done with an apparent desire to deceive, then as the law makes provision for prosecution in such cases, action of some kind is taken.

Mr. STEVENS: Is there no inspection at the point of shipment where they are loaded?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No; that has always been the case. I remember when the Fruit Marks Act came out first over twenty years ago it did not provide the best kind of inspection, but it was the only one practicable, because otherwise you would require a whole army of inspectors.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the fruit inspected at the Okanagan valley?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is the grower who asks for the inspection. He is the one who gets it, and he pays $5 a car.

Mr. STEVENS: That is, in the Okanagan valley, at the point of shipment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does inspection take place of the apples which are imported into the country?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the minister tell us what quantity or what numbers of barrels of apples were imported last year into Canada from the United States?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: From the United States or from all places?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: From the United States.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does the committee desire all the years or just last year? We have the returns for 1923-24; the number of barrels imported was 195,693. We have each year dating back to 1919-20.

Mr. SPENCE: Is that boxes or barrels?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Barrels.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Has the minister the figures of the exports to the United States during the same year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not them classified by countries. The total export last year, 1923-24, is 1,653,206 barrels of apples exported from Canada entirely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have the figures here, but I wished the minister to put them on record. I cannot understand why he has not the exports to the United States as well as the imports. According to the trade returns issued by the Trade and Commerce Department, the quantity is 55,042 barrels.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have that.

Mr. COOTE: I heard the minister say some time ago that the gentleman who grew the apples graded them himself, and naturally he looked on them with a favourable eye. I heard the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) inquire how the apples that were shipped out of the Okanagan valley were graded, and apparently some of them are not graded at all. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) said that he would like an honest protection for the honest fruit grower; we need a little protection for the honest fruit buyer. I have here a few samples of apples that came from the Okanagan. The label on the box stated that they were "fancy, delicious." I should like the minister to take a good look at each one of these apples. They come from the province of British Columbia. I would wish that these samples could be laid upon the table of the House. The one that I am holding in my hand is the best looking apple in the lot and it would make about two bites for a child.

Mr. MARTELL: If the hon. member wants some good winter apples, we can give him from Nova Scotia Northern Spies or Wageners. In the early year we can furnish Gravensteins and so on. Our late apple, which is the Russet, is a very small apple, but when we pack them we pack them well.

Mr. COOTE: My particular reason for exhibiting these apples to the committee and the minister is to draw attention to something that, I think, is very unfair. I had what I thought was No. 1 wheat that weighed 65 pounds to the bushel and it was graded by officials of the government as No. 3 wheat. With the proceeds of some of this wheat, I buy No. 1 apples, Fancy, and then I get such apples as I have exhibited in this chamber: Is there any protection for the fruit buyer? If not, it is time there was some, if we are to spend thousands of dollars in grading apples and other fruit. If we who live on the prairies are to have our wheat and oats graded in this very strict manner and then have to buy apples that are graded by the growers themselves, certainly an injustice is being done to us. Either we should be allowed to grade our own wheat or the department should see that these apples are properly graded.

Mr. LOVETT: Were these apples that are exhibited here to-day marked as No. 1?

Mr. COOTE: No. 1, Fancy.

Mr. STEVENS: I appreciate the grievance my hon. friend has brought to the attention of the committee; but I think that in justice to the grower of fruit in this country one simple basic principle ought to be remembered, and that is, that all fruit is perishable; it is not like iron or wood, that will last indefinitely. The variety of apples to which my hon. friend refers is what we call an early winter apple. I think about December is its main month of marketing. You cannot expect to keep a fall apple, for instance, a Transparent, through to Christmas. Another variety, the McIntosh, which comes along about October and into November cannot be kept over until March unless it is kept under ideal cold storage conditions, and then, once released from cold storage, it must be used immediately. The placing of creamery butter in cold storage may keep it in perfect condition, but once it is released, it must be used. The same applies to any article that is of a perishable character. It is most unfair of the hon. member to suggest laying on the table a few selected specimens of apples and to say that these are a sample of what the Okanagan fruit grower sells or markets as No. 1 Fancy. The hon. member knows quite well that that is not the case. He, like anyone else, when he buys an article, is at liberty to use his eyes and to look the article over. I quite admit that if a retailer buys from a wholesaler a dozen boxes of apples, they are released from cold storage and he offers them for sale in his store. If he does not sell them for a few days, the very fact that they have been in cold storage and released will cause them immediately to commence deteriorating. If he keeps them in his store for a week, a month or two months—and probably these apples were in a store for six weeks or two months—naturally, they will deteriorate and they cannot be expected to maintain their perfection over a long period of time. No amount of inspection, no skill on the part of the inspector, no element of science in cold storage facilities, will ever rectify what my hon. friend is complaining of at this time. There is nothing that can be done in or out of this parliament, by scientists or others, that will change this condition; It is a condition of nature and nothing on earth can change it. I deprecate very much this suggestion being broadcasted throughout Canada in regard to the Okanagan fruit growers, a class of producers and horticulturists who have suffered perhaps as much as any other class of agriculturists in this country during the last thirty years in endeavouring to bring their products up to the highest degree of perfection possible. The result of their work is that this year the Okanagan fruit grower has, I think, time after time, taken first rank and first prize in international exhibition for his fruit.

While I am on this subject I should like to say a word in regard to some observations made by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell). I was in the Old Country last fall for a few months and I took particular care, for my information and satisfaction to look into the marketing of Canadian fruit. I saw a very large quantity of magnificent Nova Scotia apples marketed in England. I saw many of our own, and also a very large quantity of western American apples, that is apples from Washington and Oregon, Hood river and Wenatchee and so on, districts in the western states, offered for sale. The Canadian apples for sale on the London, Manchester, Sheffield and Liverpool markets in England did splendid credit to Canada. We are gradually building up a system of marketing these perishable goods at great distances and we ought to pause and realize what the grower is doing for himself, with the assistance certainly of the various governments, Dominion and provincial, through their officials. We ship scores of carloads of apples from the Okanagan Valley three hundred and fifty miles by rail to the Pacific coast, load them on steamers, ship them down through the tropical climate of the Panama canal, a month's journey or more, and unload them in England. And then they are distributed all over England, and distributed successfully, too. In a less circuitous way the Nova Scotians load their fruit on the Atlantic and do a similar business. This is something which a few years ago was looked upon as a hopeless undertaking and yet it is done successfully to-day. And we are doing it by the aid of science and through the devoted attention and assiduous application of the growers, and the persistence of the producers generally, with such help as is given by the department. I say, therefore, that Canadian fruit is not represented in anything approaching a fair light by the remarks and the exhibits of my hon. friend.

Now, as to the protection of the consumer. Undoubtedly we ought to do all we can to protect the consumer, but I do not know what more we can do than we are doing. You will not do it by inspection, for if you inspect an article you examine it when it is packed, and you cannot expect that box to remain in the same condition from the time it leaves the producer until it is used by the consumer. Perhaps the consumer leaves it in his cellar or in a hot pantry, and apples that are treated in that way must fall to pieces through the very processes of nature. So that when anyone gets up and suggests that a fruit after going through these miscellaneous experiences should stand up like the perfect article he is not talking—well, I was going to say, common sense, but at any rate he is not saying what is reasonable.

Mr. HOEY: That would not apply to the size of the apples.

Mr. STEVENS: The apples have shrunk in size in the natural course of things.

Mr. MARTELL: Does not the size depend on the quality of the apple?

Mr. STEVENS: Anyone can tell by looking at this apple which I have here that it has shrunk, and apples that have been in cold storage for any considerable length of time inevitably get that way. This particular apple that has been exhibited here looks to me as if it were half cooked; possibly the assortment from which it was taken was left near the stove in a country store in Alberta and shrivelled up.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is supposed to be for December consumption.

Mr. COOTE: When the hon. member interrupted me—

Mr. STEVENS: I did not interrupt you.

Mr. COOTE: You did interrupt me.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Macleod (Mr Coote) had taken his seat when the hon. member (Mr. Stevens) rose.

Mr. STEVENS: In less than half a day apples that have been kept in cold storage will deteriorate when brought into a warm store. Scores of times I have seen boxes of apples in this condition in grocery stores where the grocer had no interest in nor knowledge of the business of taking care of fruit, and very often the lid is knocked off the box and the apples are set beside a stove. Naturally this would ruin them.

Mr. MARTELL: Does not the size depend on the variety?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, of course. As to size, a No. 1 apple, which is preferred by the very best hotels, our highest class of trade, is usually about the size of this specimen I have here. You can get a Wolf River apple almost as big as my hon. friend's head—not as big as he thinks it is but as big as it actually is; and you can get on the other hand a Northern Spy, which my hon. friends from Nova Scotia produce in such perfection, two or three times the size of this one. It is not reasonable, therefore, to produce a few culls, the brief history of which no one knows, and suggest that they are a reflection on the producers of fruit in this country.

Personally I do not know very much about the activities of this branch of the department, but I do know some of the inspectors; and speaking only of those with whose work I am acquainted, I must say that the department deserves credit. And if the department observes in all its inspectors the same high standard I have found in the case of those whom I know, I should have no complaint to make in regard to the inspection of fruit. As to the broad problem of how far we should extend the system of inspection while at the same time taking care to conserve the public rights in the way of taxation, this is a question of considerable importance. I rise now, however, merely for the purpose of repudiating, and repudiating strongly, the aspersion that was being broadcast by my hon. friend in regard to the producers of Okanagan whom I have known for the last thirty years and with whose struggles I am quite familiar.

Mr. COOTE: In my remarks I did not refer to the condition that the apples were in. Now, I was born in an apple country and I have eaten my share of apples ever since I have been big enough to eat them, and I hope to continue doing so as long as I can get them. I know that a Delicious Apple will become bad in time; but for a man to say that these apples that have been exhibited here were entitled to the brand Fancy, even when they came off the tree, is absurd; he must have a very great imagination so far as the grading of apples is concerned. If the hon. member is proud of them I am sure he is at liberty to feel that way.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. SPENCE: Did the hon. member see the box out of which these apples were taken? I have never in my life seen a No. 1 like the specimen we have seen here and I have seen many cars of apples that came out of British Columbia.

Mr. COOTE: I may inform the hon. gentleman that the box from which these apples were taken is still in my cellar at home. I bought the apples as No. 1 Fancy Delicious, and hon. gentlemen will not wonder that I have brought the matter to the attention of the minister. I have a good deal of admiration for the apple growers of Okanagan, just as the hon. member (Mr. Stevens) has, I have personal friends in that part of the country. For this very reason I think it is in the interest of these fruit growers that such apples as these should not be put out under the label Fancy. The hon. member told us of the prizes which the British Columbia apple growers were able to win in the markets of the world. That is something we are all proud of. But what we would like would be to get some of these prize apples at home, and to know that we were getting good fruit when we paid $3.75 a box for apples. And that is what I paid for this particular lot. I bought them in the town of Nanton, sixty miles from Calgary.

I am not blaming the fruit growers of the Okanagan collectively for the condition of the apples I bought, I am simply bringing the matter to the attention of the minister; and when I do so I get a nice curtain lecture from the hon. member. Has he the interests of the apple growers at heart when he tries to make out that it is all right to label apples of this size and colour Fancy?

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member has misrepresented and misquoted me wholly and absolutely.

Mr. COOTE: So far as that goes, I leave it to the members of the committee who have heard all that has passed; I am quite content to leave the matter there. I want to ask the minister what constitutes a No. 1 Fancy apple; is there any regulation providing what size and colour such a grade of apple should be? I was very much disappointed with the apples and sent them back to the store with a request that they send me a larger size. The apples in the second box were not sufficiently red, and I sent them back with the intimation that I did not want to buy green Delicious apples. Anyone knows that such an apple is hardly fit to eat; neither is the small size. The small sizes of certain varieties of apples are all right, but surely no one who is familiar with the Delicious apple would want them green and very little bigger than crab apples. If I may repeat, it is in the interests of the growers themselves that their apples should be graded properly, or else they are going to undermine the confidence of the public, who will want to examine every box before they buy. We on the prairies have become used to taking it for granted that the apples we purchase are of the grade marked on the box, and very often they are.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will the hon. member kindly give the name of the shipper and the district from which the apples came?

Mr. COOTE: I will tell my hon. friend when I get out of the House. If I told him here I am afraid that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) would say that I was broadcasting the firm's name to the world. If necessary I will send home and try to get the label off the box. If the minister would give us specifications for No. 1 Fancy apples, it might help to clear the air.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is the description:

> Fancy, which shall include only firm, mature, clean, smooth, hand-picked, well-formed fruit of one variety of fair colour for the variety and free from all insect pests, diseases, bruises, spray burns, visible water, clear from skin puncture or skin broken, and provided that—

I accept this sample as being a bona fide sample of the grade that my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) says it is. But might I point out the impossibility of checking up every parcel, whether box or barrel. The apples are packed by the growers or packers and graded by them. Our inspector does not inspect every box or every barrel; that would be impossible. He does not empty the apples out. He takes the head off the barrel, knocks down the hoop so as to loosen the staves, and sometimes he takes out a stave so as to get a sectional view of the contents, and from the information so obtained he has to judge about a dozen other barrels. As in eggs we inspect only one case in a dozen, so in apples we inspect only one barrel in about a dozen. Even with that inspection we require a considerable number of inspectors. I hear complaints that my department has too many inspectors, yet if we gave inspection of every parcel of apples we would need ten times as many men, and even then an apple such as that my hon. friend refers to might escape detection. My hon. friends from the west will appreciate the fact that in spite of our inspection staff at Winnipeg and Fort William some cars of wheat get by that are

5 p.m. plugged with low grade wheat. If detected the whole carload is put at the lowest grade. Similarly with apples, when it is remembered that we inspect only one barrel out of twelve or fifteen, some inferior apples may get through. It only shows that if we had no inspection a much larger number of inferior apples would escape detection. When we had no Fruit Marks Act, I remember the quality of fruit sent into the west was terrible. A very marked improvement has taken place since, and we expect a still further improvement when the grower knows that he is going to be checked up more and more closely. Let me confirm the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) with respect to the quality of our apples. It is not on the inspection of one barrel or one apple that we are to judge of the quality of our apples. I can not only confirm the hon. member's statement, but I can go further, for according to the report brought back by my deputy, Canadian apples stand highest of any apples on the British market, showing that reasonable care is taken, not only by the men who grow the apples and pack them, but by the inspectors. I do not say that the system is perfect; you cannot get a perfect system of inspection as long as it is done by human means; even if every barrel were opened some odd apples of inferior quality would get past. The idea is, as has already been pointed out by one hon. member, to get such a system of inspection as will ensure to the buyer that he is getting the quality of apples described on the package and to get this inspection at a reasonable expense.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It seems to me that the inspection should take place where the apples are grown and not at the seaboard. I see no economy in reducing the number of inspectors in a county like Hants, and putting on an inspector in the city of Halifax. I think such inspection is an unqualified joke. We find the estimates for this department are increased by $18,000. We find also another item of $24,000, which is really an increase, because the minister takes that sum off this estimate in expectation of getting it from the growers. As I said before, this minister is some little spender, and I think he had better get down to earth.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have been charged with evading questions. I do not want to avoid answering any inquiries. Has the hon. member asked a question or made a speech?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have made a statement. I have asked all the questions I want answered.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If we are going to give such inspection as will stop apples of the quality referred to by the hon. member for Macleod from coming through we will need ten times as many inspectors as we have to-day. We are giving reasonable inspection that ensures Canadian apples of the highest quality arriving on the British market, and we have the testimony of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, of my deputy and of others that our apples are the best of any arriving there. That is pretty good.

Mr. MARTELL: The minister should keep up the inspectoral staff instead of cutting it down as he did last year, thus putting too much work on the inspectors who have to work morning, noon and night, because they have often to show the packers the requirements of the law. Surely the apple growers of this country are entitled to have every possible assistance from the department, and I am only asking the minister not to overwork his inspectors. We were satisfied with the staff which the department had in Nova Scotia two or three years ago, but unfortunately that staff has been cut down. Now the chief inspector of fruit in Nova Scotia should be located at or near Kentville in the county of Kings which is the centre of the fruit growing belt and is a county which produces more apples than the whole of the rest of the province put together. The chief inspector has been in his present location since the days of the Laurier government. I am not criticising the chief inspector personally, but there is no question that he should be situated where the inspectors from the other counties—Hants, Kings, Annapolis, Digby, Lunenburg—can conveniently meet him. Lunenburg, I may say, was not very much of a fruit growing county in the days gone by but is rapidly coming into its own in that respect. Last year the minister dropped five inspectors in Nova Scotia. That should not have been done. The result may have been to save $5,000, but the consumer as well as the fruit grower have been injured to that extent. The fruit grower is an honest man, but perhaps one in a hundred would be crooked in the packing of his fruit, and he has to be watched. There should be a proper system of inspection, and the inspector should exercise a little common sense in the carrying out of his duties; he should, you might say, temper justice with mercy. If he finds a man wrongfully packing, a man who, perhaps, did not understand the law, the inspector should show him his error and point out the requirements of the regulations. When I asked the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) if he did not vote for reciprocity in 1911 he quoted the words of Tennyson:

> Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
> And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.

Yes, I doubt not that in commercial matters we must be broadened out with the process of the suns, and that is why I direct attention to some of these matters affecting my province. The hon. member for Digby and Annapolis may not agree with my suggestion regarding the chief inspector, as he is now in the hon. member's county. But the counties of Hants, Kings and Annapolis are the fruit growing counties. In Hants fruit growing is increasing, and Kings produces sixty per cent of the apples of Nova Scotia. So I say to the minister that these matters should be adjusted, and the expenditure should not be cut down with the effect of making both the consumer and the producer suffer. The apple producer in Nova Scotia is not afraid of inspection; what he wants is a fair inspection by men who will do their duty without being elated over the job they hold and without trying to put down industry. The minister brags about the fact that the fruit of Canada arrives in Great Britain in first-class shape. Quite true, but that is altogether due to the fact that the honest producer of fruit in this country wants his goods to be put on the market in the best possible condition. That is why I ask for the provision of apple facilities at Halifax by way of heating and cooling houses on the piers so that the present difficulties in respect to the handling of fruit through that port may be overcome. When the fruit arrives at Halifax it is in good order, chilled or frozen, but it often becomes overheated, before it is put on the boats. I am not advocating anything particularly for Halifax; I am asking for facilities for the fruit growers of Nova Scotia. As I have already said, do not put it up to the Dominion Atlantic Railway. They are bound to get the traffic there anyhow, whether the result is good, bad or indifferent. The Canadian National will not do it; the Canadian National to us in western Nova Scotia is not worth a snap of the fingers. I ask the minister to go to his colleague the Minister of Public Works and demand that this be done. The thing we most need in Nova Scotia is proper facilities at the chief port in the province for the shipping of our products; we need that before we can look for larger markets. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) made reference to certain apples which he displayed here. Now, he was born in the fruit country, but I am afraid that when he got away from fruit he ceased to know what good fruit was. He does not remember that what may be an excellent size in Northern Spy or Bishop Pippin or Gravenstein or Wagener, might be considered a very large size as compared with Russet, for instance, which is a very small apple. Now, we are not asking for unfair things. All we ask is that we get proper inspection, under efficient inspectors—and I am not complaining of any inspector—properly situated, and the necessary facilities in the way of piers and warehouses at Halifax for the handling of our fruit. The minister was himself impressed with that necessity when he was in Nova Scotia about two years ago, because he gave an interview to the press and we thought something was to be done. We were put off, however, with fine words and nice pretensions.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend knows that he has a heated car service now that he did not have then.

Mr. MARTELL: The heated car service is due to the Dominion Atlantic Railway, not to the department or to the government. In Halifax the department has a man by the name of Johnson who does not spend one-tenth of his time in the inspection of cargoes that go abroad. I understand that he is interested in the dairy end of it and that he also inspects fruit. It is said that he had a scheme of his own for a cage or loading device that he wanted to foist on the department. No, I cannot prove this in any way and I do not want to say anything on the floor of the House by which advantage would be taken of a man outside, but the rumour current in Nova Scotia is that Mr. Johnson was in league with the others in a plan to foist on the department this cage or loading device in which he was interested. I say to the minister that the quicker Johnson is removed from there, the quicker the chief inspector is placed in the central portion of the fruit growing belt and the quicker you get proper facilities established at Halifax, the quicker you will have a contented fruit growing people in Nova Scotia. Do not give us promises; the day has gone by in this country when people are willing to accept lukewarm promises—the patting on the back and the statement that you are a good fellow and that sort of thing will not go down. We want a recognition of the facts; we want action. We want to see results, and if we do not get results, party politics in this country will not last long—though I am a Liberal of Liberals I say this and abide by it.

Mr. STIRLING: I should not like this matter to be dropped without my making a few remarks with regard to the disgusting looking vegetables which were exhibited to the committee this afternoon. The hon. member describes them as No. 1 Fancy. I know what a No. 1 apple used to be. It has now been susperseded by an Extra Fancy. I am familiar with a Fancy apple. But I have not the least idea what a No. 1 Fancy is. It rather smacks of the mixture of thought which sometimes emanates from the oriental's brain, and I think it is possible that in some sections of the valleys of the interior the orientals may have invaded the realm of tree fruits, and have shipped out an article which they have chosen to call a "No. 1 Fancy." But whether it was fair or unfair on the part of the hon. member to bring these things here with the object of tainting the name of Okanagan fruit, I do not regret that he did so, because no finer argument could be advanced in favour of this inspection service which the growers in the interior of British Columbia have asked the Dominion government to help them to provide. It was a voluntary act on the part of the shippers of fruit. Their desire in asking for such an inspection was to demonstrate by their grade, by the accuracy with which their grade was maintained, that the exhibition fruit, which in international and imperial shows has demonstrated the unexcelled qualities of the Okanagan product, is of the same standard as their commercial pack. The fruit is grown in valleys of the interior that are pretty widespread and is collected in those valleys by various shipping houses. Many of them come under the control of the co-operative movement known as the Associated Growers of British Columbia. That associated head office has under its control from twenty to thirty "locals" and it is by the "locals" that the collecting and the shipping of apples is done. In addition there are a considerable number of independent fruit shippers, but they ship small amounts of fruit in comparison to the large quantity shipped by the Associated Growers. And so long as human nature is what it is, there will be times when the grading is not carried out in the best possible way, and if fruit inperfectly graded ever goes on the market in that way it is certain to bring trouble. That is the very reason why the growers voluntarily approached the Dominion government, through its fruit commissioner, to help them to put on such an inspection service that they would be helped in demonstrating to the wholesale trade that they were endeavouring at any rate, to live up to the grade that is stamped on their boxes. They did not wish, in this matter, to ask for a gift from the government, for they recognize the very considerable advantages there are in working toward something they are ready to pay for. That service, as the minister himself stated earlier in the afternoon, is more than paid for by the growers themselves; and we would like to see it extended so as not only to ensure that every consignment that goes out of the various packing houses in the valley may be subject to careful inspection, but in order to stamp it on the minds of wholesalers who handle our fruit in the market, and of the consumers in Canada as well as in the export countries to which our apples are increasingly going, that when they see the British Columbia apple marked a certain grade they may be perfectly sure, so far as human possibilities go, that the apples contained in that box are of that grade. I should like, in closing, to ask the minister if he will give us the opinion of his department as to how far that very aim has been attained this year in the inspection?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In reply to the hon. member for Yale I beg to say that the results have been very gratifying, and that we are getting complimentary letters and communications testifying to the increased guarantee the inspection gives to the purchaser of the fruit that he will get what he is paying for.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I desire, in particular, to refer to the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). The discussion has developed practically into a consideration of the fruit growing industry as it affects British Columbia. May I be allowed to point out that the Okanagan valley is not the only fruit growing district in Canada, although hon. gentlemen to my right seem to convey that impression, nor is it the only fruit growing district in British Columbia. Let me say that the Creston district in my constituency is a very promising one, and in the matter of carrying off prizes has been quite equal to the Okanagan district. Furthermore, no such fruit as that to which the hon. member for Macleod has drawn attention has ever been known to be grown in the Creston district. With respect to the samples which have been displayed it should be pointed out that fruit on its way to the consumer has to pass through so many hands that the grower should not be held responsible for the shortcomings in every instance. Even though the grower devoted all his time and attention to the packing and grading it is sometimes hard to assure that every apple going into a box shall be up to the required standard. In the particular case to which my hon. friend (Mr. Coote) has called attention there were probably, say, four inferior specimens out of a total of one hundred or two hundred sound apples. I am in very close touch with the fruit growing district in my constituency and I believe I am safe in saying that this is an absolutely isolated case, and I am sure if the hon. member had gone to the trouble of bringing this to the attention of the grower, together with the packer's number, he certainly would have been reimbursed and would have been willingly provided with another box up to the standard it was supposed to be.

Now in regard to the fruit grower, he is the one who is most anxious to put his apples on the market in first class condition. The grower in the Creston district is doing everything possible to put the best grade of apples upon the prairie market; and I state before this committee that they consider the prairie market as one of their best markets. There is no such thing as two grades of apples going out from the fruit growing district of British Columbia. It has been stated too that the best grades go to the foreign market and that the inferior grade is used for home consumption. I believe I am quite safe in saying that that does not work out. The apple growers endeavour to supply the best grade of apples for home consumption. Two or three of my prairie friends are eager to buy if they can be supplied with the best grade of apples; and the grower has agreed to supply that market with the very best grade of apples that he can produce. In regard to the inspection, I again say that I am in close touch with the inspection of fruit throughout the Creston district, and this is the first time I have ever heard it stated by anyone that the matter of thorough inspection had been overlooked in any way. I can commend the government for the way they have endeavoured to carry out the regulations and to assist fruit growing in the Creston district. They are endeavouring to inspect this fruit, and to protect not only the grower but the consumer, giving as good a service, I think as it is possible to give under the circumstances. I have had some complaints from the growers; but as a whole the regulations have been working out fairly well, and I am sure I would not like to have the impression created in this House or throughout the country that the case brought to the attention of the committee by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) was a common occurrence. Keeping in mind the thousands upon thousands of cars that are sent out of the British Columbia fruit growing districts in the year, this being only one case of poor apples, I think it is not worth while occupying very much time with it. If it were a common case you may be sure that the different retail men, the jobbers and consumers would bring it to the attention of the fruit growers.

Mr. LOVETT: I cannot let the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) get away with the contention that the fruit growers and the fruit growing industry of the Annapolis valley have suffered as a result of the office of chief fruit inspector remaining in Middleton. I believe it is only a personal interpretation on the part of my hon. friend. I may say that the chief inspector is not an appointee of this government but of the preceding government, at the instance of my predecessor, Mr. Davidson. The location of the chief inspector is in the town of Middleton on the border between Kings and Annapolis. I have never heard of a request from those associated with the fruit industry to have the location of the chief fruit inspector changed. Middleton is situated an equal distance from the county of Hants and the county of Yarmouth. It is in the centre of the fruit producing section of the Annapolis valley, and in addition to that the chief inspector does not sit in his office at Middleton, but visits every fruit producing section of the entire province. He goes out to the different places and looks after the section of the country under him. The hon. member for Hants spoke of the county of Lunenburg fast becoming a fruit growing section. I am glad to know that Lunenburg is improving in that respect, but if Lunenburg is to be served by the chief fruit inspector, he should remain where he is at the town of Middleton, as that is the terminus of the Canadian National railway which comes in from the south shore, and it is therefore much easier for the people of Lunenburg county to get in touch with the chief fruit inspector. I do not know the feeling of the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Robinson) on this point, but I have not heard that he was insistent on any change of this kind.

Mr. McBRIDE: The hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Humphrey) was quite right when he said that some people tried to represent to the people of Canada that in British Columbia the Okanagan valley was the only place where fruit could grow. I am here to state that the best fruit grown in British Columbia is grown at Salmon Arm, and if people would insist on getting fruit from Salmon Arm, they can depend upon getting no such fruit as has been exhibited here this afternoon.

Mr. LADNER: After listening to the criticism of the remarks on fruit inspection, which is very important, I am at a loss to learn why the minister should have any difficulty in that respect. Many hon. members will remember that in the famous year 1921 one of the charges levied against the government that preceded this one was that it was extravagant and wasteful. The fact of the matter is that, notwithstanding the unsatisfactory conditions mentioned in the debate this afternoon—I would like the minister to pay attention to this point, and I will wait until he is disengaged—since 1921 the increase in this one item has been 35 per cent, apparently without satisfaction to those engaged in the fruit industry. The expenditure was as follows:

1922	$145,000
1923	151,000
1924	171,000
1925 estimated	182,000
1926	200,000

Now has there been an increase in service to the country to the extent of 35 per cent. In these days of economy we are reminded of the election time in 1921 when these gentlemen spoke from platforms in the country, declaring that they would not only practise economy, but would reduce the extravagance and waste of the previous government, but now we find an increase of 35 per cent in this item which apparently does not even satisfy the members of the government themselves. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) is not on diplomatic relations with his ministers largely because some of the expenditures in his district have been cut down and because there is a lack of expenditures which had been previously made in his district. The point I am making to the committee—and I propose to make it on every item that comes up—is that the government's protestations as the champions of economy are not sincere when we find at this juncture and under present conditions in the country, although these items in themselves may be important, an increase of 35 per cent in the expenditure. Now I have a question for the minister: What services have been increased during those three years in addition to those which existed formerly to account for the increase of $55,000 in this item? I would remind the minister that the inspection is paid for by the very industry and is not an item chargeable against the department.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will start first on the general complaint that the cost of administering this branch, indeed, of almost all the branches, has increased during recent years. If my hon. friend will look at the bottom of the estimates, he will find that the vote for agriculture this year is $103,500 less than last year. I am not going to boast about that; it is nothing to boast about. I would much rather see it $103,500 more than last year, as I am afraid that some of the services may not be taken as good care of as circumstances would warrant.

You cannot get away from the increase in regard to the fruit service. That is accounted for by the new service that is going to pay for itself. It is unavoidable that the amount be paid out first, but it will come back to the Receiver General and will really mean no increase. As regards the other services that have been introduced in addition to this new service, there is an improvement all along the line. More advertising is being done for fruit; more expenditure is being made in the matter of securing markets, of keeping fruit growers posted with regard to market prices, and when you add a little here and a little there all along the line of improving the service, that means more men and travel and costs money. In the main, the increase that has caused the discussion is the additional $18,000. Part of this increase is caused by the fact that we have absorbed a vote of $8,000, the grant to the Canadian Horticultural Council that was formerly in the latter part of the estimates under the heading of "Miscellaneous."

Mr. ROBINSON: As Kings county has been brought into this discussion by various members, it seems only fair that, as the representative of that county, I should say a word. The placing of the chief apple inspector in Annapolis county was done some years ago, and at that time Annapolis county was possibly a greater producer of apples than Kings. The situation, however, has changed, and to-day Kings county is the banner county in Nova Scotia in the production of apples. I think though that the question of where the chief inspector should be placed would be a matter to be dealt with by the department rather than by this committee. I would not in any way speak against the wish of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) that the chief inspector be placed in Kings county. It would hardly be loyal to my county for me to repudiate that in any way, but I still believe that is a matter for the department to decide ultimately.

I wish to say a word about the decrease in the number of inspectors last year. I do not believe this is a wise move. The apple crop in Kings county was smaller last year than in previous years, and I understand that the number of inspectors was decreased on account of the crop being about 75 per cent of an average crop. I do not believe that is a reason for decreasing the number of apple inspectors, because as the crop was small, there might be a greater tendency to over-grade. The people having been educated to expect a certain degree of grading, that should not be lowered in any way, and I do not believe the inspection during the last year was carried on as well as in former years simply because we had not sufficient inspectors to do the work.

I wish to say a word also about the bringing into this chamber of apples by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). Speaking of the fruit growers as I know them, I believe, as a class, whether British Columbia growers or Nova Scotia growers, they wish to put on the market the very best apples possible. I do not believe it is fair to select a few apples or even one box or one barrel and to try to measure up the entire production of a province by that. We grow good apples in both British Columbia and Nova Scotia. What we require is stricter inspection, and a training and education of the people. If the new method of inspection that the minister speaks of will produce better inspection and a better grade of apples, I can assure him that we in Kings county will be in favour of it in every way.

Mr. SPENCE: I think the minister will agree with me now that it will be much better to put in a detailed statement of the expenditure for this particular item. The Fruit Marks Act has been attacked by hon. members, and in defence of this, I want to say that since the act has been established, packing in this country has been improved 100 per cent. I am sorry the hon. member for Macleod had occasion to bring into this chamber apples of this variety and sample. I have no reason to doubt that he bought this box of apples, but I have not yet known of an apple being marketed as No. 1 Fancy. There is no such grade that I know of. I have been in the business for thirty-five years and possibly I have seen many more apples than any hon. member who has spoken, but I never saw a box of that variety or quality packed or shipped anywhere. British Columbia, in the last ten years, has developed the apple industry much better than she expected. In the early days, we had to buy all our apples from Oregon and Washington. To-day, instead of doing that, we are buying all the apples we possibly can from British Columbia, and they are giving entire satisfaction. The people in that province have learned both to grade and to pack. No doubt, the Department of Agriculture has been assisting in that work and to-day we are getting good results from British Columbia.

Mr. MARTELL: I have in my hand an apple which is a Nova Scotia Wagener and which has been in the House of Commons in both heat and cold. When it came here it was hard and firm; to-day it is spongy, but it is a first class apple. Will my hon. friend undertake to help me to get a cheap freight rate for our apples?

Mr. SPENCE: I would like to get cheap rates everywhere, because high freight rates are hurting the apple business as well as every other business. An apple such as one of those exhibited by the hon. member for Macleod could have been perfect when it was shipped, say in November. It may never have been in cold storage, but lying around a place, sometimes hot and sometimes cold, it will commence to deteriorate. The time for this variety of apple was past around Christmas. It is a mean, contemptible thing to bring up a matter like that on the floor of this House and to try to hurt the apple industry of British Columbia. It ill becomes any member of this House to discredit the apple industry of this country.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend knows that certain apples are good at certain seasons.

Mr. SPENCE: Certainly.

Mr. MARTELL: It is of no use to bring in the month of February say a Bishop pippin which is good in the month of December, or a Gravenstein, which is good for September or October and possibly until the first part of December, in February when it is spongy, and to show them as samples. Apples must go according to season.

Mr. SPENCE: That is perfectly true as regards apples. Some apples will live up to April and some up to June.

Mr. MARTELL: It depends on the variety.

Mr. SPENCE: Yes. These apples that have been shown here probably went bad about two months ago, but there are apples that will be worthless in November and others in December. A Delicious No. 1 can be kept in cold storage and be of real value at this time of year, but that does not necessarily apply to this apple. I am proud to know that there are in the House members from British Columbia who are capable of defending their own province; and I refer especially to the new member who represents the constituency of Yale (Mr. Stirling). That hon. gentleman certainly knows how to defend himself and his country and I am glad to have the opportunity of saying this word on his behalf. We should all be pleased to see the apple industry of this country develop and we should give it every encouragement. If the apple industry of British Columbia went down we should all be forced to buy our apples elsewhere. Of course, we should no doubt get supplies from Nova Scotia, but that province, being on the seaboard, commands an overseas market in England, and for that reason we do not use many of the Nova Scotian apples. A few years ago we got considerable quantities of the eastern fruit in Toronto and Montreal but there is a bigger demand for it in the Old Country. I must congratulate the province of Nova Scotia as well on its apple industry; undoubtedly there has been a great improvement in every respect. I remember the time when one could not get an honest apple from Nova Scotia any more than from Ontario, but to-day there is not a province that ships out apples that are not fit for consumption. You can sit in your office and ship a consignment of apples from any one of 90 per cent of our packers, and without looking at the fruit rest assured that it will be free from criticism. That is what the act has done for us and the Department of Agriculture is to be complimented on its work. I am not referring particularly to the present department, but ever since the act came into force every minister over the department has approved of it. And why should they not? We are spending a lot of money in this connection and some day I hope we shall see perfection.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am quite surprised that neither the minister nor his deputy has referred the committee to the section in the act which would easily answer all complaints made in regard to the selling of fruit. This summer a large quantity of peaches was shipped throughout the country and one dealer in Kingston had the misfortune to receive a large number of packages which were unfit for consumption.

An hon. MEMBER: Surely not.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): If the hon. gentleman who makes that remark knows so much about fruit he ought to be aware of the provision in the act which would save him and others a few dollars in transactions of this kind. But whether or not the Department of Agriculture thinks fit to draw the attention of the public to this matter, I, for one, would feel that I had been remiss in my duty if I did not refer the committee to the section of the act which I have mentioned. If those who have made complaints had been aware of this provision it would have prevented the loss which they have incurred. This summer a large quantity of peaches was shipped from the Niagara district and sold, and a few days afterwards it was found that the fruit was unfit for consumption. I took the matter up with the department and I will give them credit for having referred me to the section of the act governing this matter. By that one action of the department the consumer in the city of Kingston was saved quite a few pennies. The section in question reads:

(7) No person shall sell, or offer for sale, any fruit in any package that is so diseased, wormy or otherwise depreciated as to render it unfit for consumption.

That provision appears on page 8 and it is sufficient to protect the consumer. If the fruit is not fit for consumption all he need do is return it. The dealer in Kingston refused to pay for the consignment of peaches and I was pleased to know that this section was in the act. The consumer in all cases can have recourse to it, for it is intended for his protection. As I said a moment ago, I am surprised that the minister or his deputy did not mention the clause in reply to the complaints made.

Mr. MARTELL: Is there not also a clause in the act providing for prosecution and summary conviction in case of misrepresentation.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Absolutely; it is all in the act.

Item agreed to.

Seed, feed and fertilizer control, $295,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The man who makes up the agricultural estimates deserves the description which one of our writers applied to King Charles I. He said that the king just before his death had confessed his sins in half an hour, and observed that he was a great master of condensation. The other estimates are all much more detailed than those of the Department of Agriculture; why, I do not know. In the agricultural estimates five or six million dollars is crushed into about eight or nine items: for example, there are live stock, $1,280,000; experimental farms $1,440,000; health of animals, $1,905,000, and so on. It seems to me that we could study them in advance and compare them with other years much more easily if they were subdivided as is the case in Railways and Canals or in Public Works. I do not say that the minister initiated this plan; I do not know who did; it may have been the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), but the condensation is carried to an extreme. It means nothing at all to be told, "Live stock, $1,280,000", if the various activities of the Live Stock branch do not appear. If they were given half a dozen in number the estimates would be much more illuminating and one could study them in advance.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That criticism is well taken. I have not found it easy introducing reforms in this House; I have tried a few but I find that one runs up against a stone wall before he has got very far. To a large extent, therefore, I have been accepting these matters as I found them. If, however, my hon. friend will look more closely he will find that the arrangement is different. I have here these votes subdivided however, into six or seven items. We have for example, for administration $11,000; subventions in connection with seed fairs, $77,500; Inspection and Sale Act—that is to say, the new Hay Act we have taken over this season for the first time—$12,000. Then we have laboratory and inspection services, which is a system of laboratories that extends across the country almost from ocean to ocean. The first of these is situated at Calgary and provides for the inspection of grass and clover seeds, germinating tests, freedom from weed tests, and so on. That inspection applies to the whole five subdivisions into which Canada is divided. The next is at Winnipeg, and gives similar services. The next is at Toronto, the centre of the grass and clover seed business of the Dominion. The next is the central station here at Ottawa. There are also fees for chemical analyses; these are given to certain analysts who have authority to analyse the various brands of fertilizer placed on the market. Roughly speaking, that is the subdivision of the work under this branch, but it includes other services of minor importance.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Item No. 50: Seed, feed and fertilizer control, $295,000.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the minister explain this vote?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We had five minutes on this vote before six o'clock. The leader of the opposition suggested that these votes be subdivided as to the various branches of expenditure, and I have concurred in that suggestion. I will give the subdivisions of each vote as we come to it.

Mr. BROWN: Will the minister repeat the subdivisions of this item, which he gave before six o'clock?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Administration costs, $11,000; subventions for seed fairs, $77,500, including production and markets; Inspection and Sales Act, $12,000; laboratory and inspection service, $180,000; fees for chemical analyses, $5,000; sundries, $10,000.

Mr. STEVENS: What progress is being made in that branch which has to do with the improvement of seed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About twenty years ago the Canadian Seed Growers' Association was organized with the idea of producing pure seed which would be true to variety. They have members all over Canada and they conduct a very active campaign in this direction. In Alberta a plant has been established for the cleaning of any of this registered seed that is offered for that purpose in order that it may be fitted for the market. It is impossible to put seed in first class condition for the market with the ordinary farm appliances, and by means of this seed cleaning apparatus they make the seed comply with the provisions of the Seed Control Act. There is a similar organization in Saskatchewan, with Moosejaw as its headquarters. During the last twenty years not only this registered seed but the various commercial seeds that are put on the market—clover, grass and garden seeds—have been greatly improved, and an export market has been established on account of the high quality of our product. Moreover, when seeds are imported our inspectors have samples sent to their laboratories and these are carefully inspected before they are allowed to go on the market. This service has also been extended to field and garden seeds such as beets, mangels, and the like. The Seed Control Act, which came into force a little over twenty years ago and has been twice revised, is admitted to be one of the best seed control acts on the continent.

Mr. LUCAS: Is this seed cleaning done in a central plant, or are there various plants throughout the Dominion?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In Alberta it is done at one plant, and there is one in Quebec. It is purely a voluntary matter.

Mr. LUCAS: Are these not provincial activities?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, yes; they are usually organized provincially, and in each case I think a good deal of assistance is given by the provincial government.

Mr. LUCAS: I know that Alberta has recently established a seed cleaning plant but I was not aware that the Dominion had given any assistance to it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, we give them a grant.

Mr. LUCAS: What is the amount of the grant?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It does not go to the cleaning plants; these have only recently been established. The grant is for educational work generally and for the organization of seed fairs. The straight grant to the Seed Growers' Association is $10,000, and the amount under the head of production and markets, including subventions for seed fairs, is $77,500. This plan was adopted some fifteen years ago for the purpose of unifying seed fairs.

The Dominion held seed fairs, and the provinces also held seed fairs. Finally it was decided by the Dominion Seed branch that instead of holding Dominion seed fairs they would hand over the amount available for the purpose to be administered by the provinces, and that practice has been in vogue ever since. It was one of the steps taken to avoid overlapping. While it did not save us any money, it resulted in a consolidation of the work and, I think, yielded better results.

Mr. DECHENE: Is the minister able to tell us whether any money is still given to farmers who are trying to raise seed for seed purposes? I remember that some years ago the federal authority used to give a subsidy, or an amount of some kind, to help the farmers to produce seed. In fact I remember that in the province of Quebec clover seed was grown by encouraging farmers to form co-operative associations and obtain the necessary machinery for the purpose. The province used to make a contribution, and I think the federal government also granted a certain amount towards the production of this seed. Since that time the province of Quebec has been growing its own clover seed, instead of making importations as it used to do. I think if we could aid the farmers to some extent in the way I have indicated it would have very good results.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: From what I can gather from the hon. gentleman's remarks he is referring to one of the functions of these seed fairs.

Mr. DECHENE: I remember well that in my constituency some ten years ago the farmers organized a small co-operative society to buy the machines necessary in the production of clover and other seeds.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think any aid granted of that kind must have been by the provincial Department of Agriculture.

Mr. DECHENE: No, I think there was a grant from the federal government as well as the provincial authorities, and it gave very good results. In fact they were so successful that we are exporting clover seed now instead of importing it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understood some assistance of the kind used to be granted towards the purchase of machinery, but it has not been given of recent years.

Mr. DECHENE: As I say, the grant was very helpful to the farmers and brought about very good results without much cost to the federal treasury. I think if the minister would look into this question again he would see the desirability of restoring the federal grant for this purspose. Aid by the government should not be confined to the fair associations. In the case of these agricultural associations the farmers usually come round to the member for a five dollar contribution. My hon. friend the member for Rimouski (Sir Eugène Fiset) who is sitting beside me suggests $50. That might be a proper amount for wealthy men but in the case of poorer members they are satisfied with $5. I think it would be a very wise measure to encourage the formation of co-operative associations of farmers to purchase the proper machinery for growing improved seed. When they go to a dealer they get what is called "No. 1" seed but sometimes that seed is not what it professes to be. I would urge the minister and his officials to consider the matter and see whether aid of some kind cannot be granted. The provincial government might also unite in helping these co-operative organizations to purchase the necessary machinery in order to produce their own seed. In that way more beneficial results could be had than by any other method.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I shall be very glad to consider my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the minister tell us how the $77,000 referred to is apportioned among the provinces?

[Mr. Dechene.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is primarily on the basis of population as nearly as it can be arrived at. Of course some provinces, by reason of their more efficient organizations, take greater advantage of the system. In other provinces there have not been organized so many seed fairs. At any rate the basis of apportionment is the population. But the farmers must organize locally before they are eligible for the grant.

Mr. LUCAS: Does the administration of the Feeding Stuffs Act come under this vote?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. LUCAS: Last year that act was amended. I should like the minister to state how it is working out in its amended form?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not had a single complaint since. We were acting right on the straight in connection with that matter, although I noticed at the time there was a good deal of suspicion as to what the object of the amendments was. However, I do not think we have had a single complaint since. Our miller friends are behaving beautifully.

Item agreed to.

For experiments in dehydration, $15,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This class of expenditure was first incurred two years ago for the first time for the purpose of utilizing some of our second grade fruits. They were not exactly culls, but at the peak of the season it was felt that every practicable means should be used to take care of the peak crop when the fruit was ripening in order to save as much of it as possible from any ultimate damage. In view of the fact that millions of pounds of dried fruit of various kinds were coming into the country from the outside, it was felt that it would be a calamity to allow a lot of our own fruit to go to waste for the lack of some system of dehydration. Dehydrating is nothing but drying in accordance with the most scientific methods. There are members of the committee who can recall that apples used to be dried by hanging them round the kitchen stove pipe, a convenient roost for the flies. Later on the evaporated apple system came into vogue and it was a great improvement. Well, the dehydration system is just as much an improvement on the evaporated method, as evaporation was an improvement on the old kitchen drying system, and three experimental plants have been put up, one at Grimsby to take care of the Niagara peninsula, one at Ottawa, and the other one at Penticton in the Okanagan valley. I do not know that I can furnish any evidence yet that capitalists are prepared to put the necessary money into a plant; but we are demonstrating the feasibility, and the practicability of it, and the quality of the goods. They are being recognized as very much superior to dried fruit and almost equal to green fruit. That is the position, and that is what this vote is for.

Mr. BROWN: Have the experiments up-to-date been profitable? Have you demonstrated the profitableness of the venture?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As we are experimenting with such comparatively small quantities, we have to make an estimate as to that; but we figure that it will be profitable. Really a commercial plant would be much larger than these plants I refer to, and making allowance for that fact we think it will be profitable. There is no reason why it should not be.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Can the minister tell us how dehydrated fruit is received by the public? I have noticed that it is offered for sale in certain stores in this city, and perhaps the minister has some figures as to how the public are receiving it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have had samples of it in the offices here, and a good many hon. members took pleasure in sampling it, because it tasted "real good," and the public have taken to it well. It is a matter of keeping it before the public. That is a practical way of advertising it and I think will get the result.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the difference in the effect between dehydration and evaporation on the tissue of the fruit itself?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the secret of it is that the dehydration is done under better conditions and the fruit is not subject to the constant change of air, and the effect on the tissue is not the same. Dehydration is very much more favourable because of the fact that the product retains the flavour of the green fruit better than in the case of any other method.

Mr. TOLMIE: Dehydration does not break down the cells the same as evaporation does?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think not.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the difference in the cost of dehydration as compared with evaporation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have no figures on that. It is pretty hard to get figures sufficiently reliable; and furthermore we have not an evaporation plant.

Mr. TOLMIE: I understand the handling is about the same, but what is the difference in the consumption of fuel?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have only one plant. In order to make an intelligent comparison we would require to have an evaporating plant running at the same place.

Mr. TOLMIE: I understand it requires only half as much fuel in the one case as the other. What was the nature of the test they had in British Columbia? What quality of fruit do you use for best quality of dehydrated product?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is just like anything else, the better the fruit you use the better the dehydrated product would be; but we can use a second grade fruit, which otherwise would be a drug on the market; and in this way we prevent that waste. First class fruit would make a good dehydrated product but there is no particular object in putting first class fruit into dehydrated plants, because it could be sold on the market. In the same way you would not want to make pulpwood out of first class timber although I believe it is sometimes done.

Mr. TOLMIE: How many pounds of fresh apples are required for one pound of evaporated fruit and how many pounds would be required for the dehydrated fruit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not that information. To make a real test between this system and the evaporating system all along the line, we would require to have both systems. The principal object we had in mind was to take care of a lot of second grade fruit as the season was approaching when it would be a glut on the market. We desired to put it on the market in a more toothsome and acceptable condition than ordinary dried fruit. There is really a prejudice against dried fruit, if it is not well done. However, there is not sufficient prejudice to prevent enormous quantities of it coming into Canada. Apparently they have it down to a greater science in other countries than we have reached in Canada; otherwise I cannot imagine why so much is imported. Plums, apricots and apples come into Canada in enormous quantities, running into the millions, and our aim is to put a better article on the market by means of this dehydration.

I may say to my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) we have not the information as to what amount of raw fruit it takes to make a pound of dehydrated fruit. We know however that because of the cellular construction of the fruit being well maintained, the moment it is moistened it swells out almost like green fruit; you can scarcely distinguish the difference. I have here statements of some of the importations of dried fruit, which we wish to have replaced by dehydrated fruit eventually. Apparently there is a great deal of fruit which is not dehydrated being brought in. Here are the figures:

	Pounds	Value
Apples dried..	1,216,631	$ 56,000
Apricots dried..	1,627,000	144,000
Peaches..	1,574,000	132,000
Prunes and plums unpitted ..	10,403,000	474,000

I am not giving the odd dollars, just round numbers. In the face of these large importations and the very considerable waste of green fruit in the fall, we felt it was advisable to use every means practicable to take care of our green fruit rather than to have it go to waste. The future only will tell the result.

Mr. TOLMIE: Suppose you had a hundred pounds of evaporated fruit and a hundred pounds of dehydrated fruit, and you moistened them, how many cooking pounds would you have of each?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think we have that for information.

Mr. TOLMIE: I am not asking these questions to embarrass the minister. I may say that the dehydrated fruit is of very great value to British Columbia.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Would the dehydrated fruit be the heavier?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, it is heavier. With reference to the sun-dried fruit in California that we hear so much about, are they still drying it in the sun or using the dehydration process?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Our information from the Fruit branch was that most of these importations are dehydrated fruit.

Mr. TOLMIE: I understand that dehydrated fruit is taking the place of dried fruit in California to such an extent that, whereas in 1922 there were only four plants in California, last year there were 1,500. Owing to the fact that they have advertised sun-dried fruit in California to such an extent, and sold so much real estate on the strength of the sunny climate, they are keeping the dehydration under cover; but dehydration of prunes can be done in 22 hours as compared with six weeks by the sun-drying process.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): This is the third or fourth time that I recall this vote having come up in the estimates, and I am wondering how long this experiment will have to be conducted to get conclusive results. Perhaps the minister can give us some information as to what further results may be expected if the experiments are carried on this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is only the second year that I can recall—and my deputy confirms me in my statement—that we have had this vote.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): The estimate of last year was $10,500, I think.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, then this is the second year.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I mean for the year before.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let us put it then at three years. This is more or less like any other class of investigation work. We do not expect to sow to-day and reap to-morrow in this world. It is a sort of missionary work. You have to cast your bread upon the waters and sometimes wait for many days to get returns. At this time when there is not much capital seeking investment, you cannot expect many results. There are many reasons why there is not much capital seeking investment. In the first place, capital would want to see this a little further demonstrated. Moreover, we have labour and other troubles that make capital timid at this particular time, and I would be surprised to see a great deal of capital invested in this right now. Later on, when capital is not so timid, is freer, I hope to see investments, if we can demonstrate in the meantime that this is good business. Judging from the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) and from our own information that large quantities of dehydrated fruit have been coming in from the United States, I see no reason why we should not be able to dehydrate just as well in Canada. So far, we have not done so. We have been keeping on importing the foreign goods. We have no estimate how long we shall have to continue this experiment, but I would imagine that we shall have to continue it for two or three years more.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I was desirous of finding out whether there was any hope of achieving any result, or whether the department is simply tiding this over for a further period. What is the nature of this vote? Is it for experimental purposes, or is it simply to keep this product on the market?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For both purposes. It is to demonstrate that dehydration can be done in Canada and also to take care of the surplus fruit. Some varieties are better adapted for putting on the market in a green state. Others, that are less acceptable for putting on the market in a green state, can be put on the market in a dehydrated state. One would not think of putting on the market as pulpwood some of our finest timber. It is timber of inferior quality that is put on the market as pulpwood.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): The minister does not get my point. We do not maintain an experimental bureau year after year in order to demonstrate to the lumbermen of this country that they should not put certain timber on the market as pulpwood. It has been pretty well demonstrated, through these experiments and experiments in the United States, that dehydration is a success and can be just as successful in Canada as elsewhere. If that is so and there is nothing further to be gained in the way of experiments, why continue this vote from year to year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Would my hon. friend suggest a period at which he thinks this experiment should terminate? The committee will remember that the other day we ceased demonstration work in connection with the dairy business, the Finch creamery. That was run for twelve or thirteen years as a demonstration to show that a large creamery was capable of turning out butter and cheese and of handling milk and cream. It took twelve years to get the full advantage of that experiment. After having sold it to a private company, we were still adversely criticised because we did not keep it on. We concluded that we had come to the end of that experiment; that we had made the demonstration, and yet we were criticised for parting with it. My hon. friend wants to know why we do not discontinue this experiment at the end of two or three years. I do not think twelve years will be necessary to demonstrate this properly; but in addition to experiments as to the acceptability of fruit when it is dehydrated, there are other experiments as to what particular varieties of fruit lend themselves best to dehydration and what it is best to put on the markets in a green state. That will take some years to demonstrate, and I do not think my hon. friend should be in too great haste to terminate this experiment. It is doing good work and we will not run it one year longer than necessary.

Mr. BROWN: Are experiments being carried on in regard to other fruits than apples?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, all fruits.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I do not wish the minister to misconstrue my attitude in this matter. Although I come from a province which does not engage in the production of fruit, I would not want it to be supposed that I am opposed to experiments along this line. I have, however, observed that it is sometimes difficult to discontinue these experiments and inquiries that we start in this House, and it is well that we keep our eye on these points. If the minister can show us—and that is the question which I have asked him—that there is actual reason why this experiment should be carried on with the hope of good results, I am in favour of carrying it on to the extent of twelve years, if necessary, but I want to be sure that it is being carried on with some prospect of definite results.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I have shown my hon. friend, in the case of the Finch creamery, that we can stop these experiments, return to the government treasury the full amount that was expended and also distribute a very large amount of money amongst the farmers of the district. We do not hope to have such magnificent financial results in this case, but we hope to demonstrate to capital that this is a good business in which to invest money. This is not a particularly attractive time for capital, and we should not stop in the middle of an experiment of this character, but should proceed.

Mr. TOLMIE: As regards British Columbia, the government plant was burned out in 1923 and there has not been a chance to demonstrate there.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have restored that.

Mr. TOLMIE: I understand that in 1924 it was very successful. Has the 1924 crop been disposed of?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has been distributed around and sold. We have renewed the plant.

Mr. TOLMIE: What success has the department had with crabapples?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The experiments have been successful in the extreme in connection with crabapples. They jelly out as well as if they were green apples.

Mr. ANDERSON: What was done with the product?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was sold. There are a few samples around Ottawa.

Mr. ANDERSON: What quantity of fruit has been experimented on?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The following amounts were paid for fruit in Grimsby and Ottawa in 1924:

Grimsby—
Apples	$2,576 99
Pears	548 40
Peaches, cherries and plums	57 15
Total	$3,182 54
Fruit bought at Penticton, in 1924, apricots, peaches and pears, fresh	$2,435 18
Prunes and crabapples (culls)	167 18
Total	$2,602 36
From the United Growers, outside lots, including loganberries	$ 600 00
	$3,202 36

Mr. ANDERSON: I presume it is the object of the minister to get some private concerns to take up this method of dehydrating fruit and to establish a plant in Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the idea. I would not be surprised if the fruit growers, if they can once get their stride, will take this up themselves as a part of their activities.

Mr. ANDERSON: Are any companies thinking of taking up the system?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The associations are taking more active interest in the matter. They have already taken the initial steps to organize a co-operative pool throughout Canada for the purpose of selling fruit and there is no doubt that they will investigate every branch of activity to make the thing successful.

Mr. MARTELL: Is the government subsidizing any plants at the present time, or are there any in existence of which the government is in control?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are handling it ourselves.

Mr. MARTELL: Where are these plants located?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is one at Grimsby, one at the experimental farm in Ottawa and one at Penticton in the Okanagan.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

Mr. MARTELL: Does the department contemplate establishing one in Nova Scotia?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will establish one if there is a demand for it, but there does not seem to be any necessity for such an undertaking in the Annapolis valley, where climatic conditions are cooler and consequently there is no danger of glut on the market. In the Annapolis they can harvest their apple crop conveniently inasmuch as they have early and late varieties. By starting soon with the early varieties they can get this crop off their hands before the late ones come in, so that there is no danger of any loss through a glut on the market. And the facilities make for a satisfactory condition of affairs. I do not think that there has been any particular demand for a plant down there. In British Columbia, however, where there is a quantity of smaller fruits, things are different; and the same applies to Niagara. In these places there is a tremendous glut and every conceivable effort is necessary, in the way of cold storage, freezing, drying, and so on, to enable producers to harvest and dispose of their crops satisfactorily.

Mr. MARTELL: Some of the earliest varieties in Nova Scotia are not picked, for the reason that the fruit growers have no market for them; and there is also a great percentage of culls or windfalls which people do not bother with at all. Will this process enable them to treat their apples profitably?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I think so. If there is any demand for the system down in Nova Scotia we shall be glad to test it out. I remember a violent storm that took place in that part of the country some time ago when the ground was covered with windfalls, which no doubt could have been profitably treated. We shall be glad to consider the matter.

Mr. MARTELL: I take it that the minister will undertake to give the system a trial in what is commonly called the Annapolis valley, but particularly in the county of Hants.

Mr. STIRLING: Is dehydration carried on in the three western states of the American union, Washington, Oregon and California, or are those states watching the experiments in Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They took the lead in this matter. Their interests are extensive and their co-operative activities are quite marked, particularly in California. I understand that a great part of the fruit we import from the United States is treated in this way. I have no information as to how the system is working there.

Mr. TOLMIE: Under this process 5 pounds of crabapples will make 4½ pounds jellied; at the end of one week they will yield only 3½ pounds, while after two weeks there will be only 1 pound of jelly. Many of these apples reach the prairie provinces in about a week's time and the jellying properties are preserved in this process; the apples can make as much jelly as the fresh fruit will yield.

Mr. KELLNER: In operating the plants, do you buy the fruit and re-sell the product or is the farmer charged so much for the operation? A second question I should like to ask: In view of the fact that we have had a two-day discussion now of provincial rights, does not the minister think that this whole work belongs to the provinces and that he is infringing on their sacred rights when he undertakes activities of this kind?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As soon as any particular kick is registered from the standpoint of provincial rights we shall accept the hon. gentleman's suggestion and gracefully withdraw. We are not imposing ourselves on anyone who does not want our assistance. The plant at Penticton and the one at Grimsby were anxiously requested.

Mr. KELLNER: With regard to the operation of the plants, do you buy the fruit and re-sell the product?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. I read the amounts a moment ago showing what quantities were bought.

Mr. KELLNER: Did the minister read a list of the sales also?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not a complete statement of that inasmuch as we have certain stocks on hand.

Item agreed to.

Live stock, $1,280,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In regard to this item I might submit the following analysis of this substantial amount:

Organization of horse clubs..	$ 65,000
Remount stations, of which there are 4, 2 in Ontario, 1 in Alberta and 1 in Quebec.. ..	15,000
For motors and inspectors..	46,000
Fox development: for promotion of the fox industry, principally inspectors, and in connection with registration and certification..	20,000
Cattle, record of performance..	56,000
Bull distribution..	140,000
Livestock promoters' work..	119,000
Sheep and goats, including wool grading.. ..	8,000
Sire distribution..	5,000
Co-operative marketing..	7,000
Sheeps fairs..	7,000
Boys' and girls' clubs..	3,000
Salaries and expenses..	65,000
Various minor matters..	5,000

Without going further, I may say that the same activities run all through the departments of swine and poultry. Some of these services should be strictly provincial, such for instance as boys' and girls' clubs, swine clubs and sheep clubs. Strictly speaking these activities are associated with production and they are provincial; and whenever a province becomes familiar with the value of the work we have gradually handed it over to the provincial authorities. In the western provinces at the present time a good deal of the cow testing and organization work has been handed over to the provincial departments. In the Maritime provinces and in the older provinces the work is still conducted by this department although I am watching for the opportunity of gradually handing it over to the local authorities because it is really work that they should do. Sometimes they cannot do it however and rather than have it neglected we take care of it for the time being.

Mr. FORKE: It is rather unfortunate that estimates should be printed in this way. I cannot keep track of the different amounts and the various activities to which they are devoted. I tried to follow the minister while he was making the statement, but I could not get the details. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) objected this afternoon to the items being included in a lump sum; I make the same objection now. I think the estimates are printed in a very impracticable form.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I agree with that, Mr. Chairman. Before the estimates were prepared I asked my deputy to try to remedy the situation, and I have two pages of particulars affecting all the branches of live stock under one vote, exactly as I have read the details. If it is the wish of the committee to have the vote so minutely subdivided, I shall certainly endeavour to have it in this form.

Mr. FORKE: We had better proceed as we are at present. We are not shorthand writers and therefore cannot take down the details as the minister reads them out.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I suppose the present form was thought more convenient by those who originated it, but I agree it is not satisfactory to hon. members who are not familiar with the vote and desire to criticise it.

Mr. SPENCE: Take it item by item, and we will get through it a little quicker.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All right; horse club—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before the minister proceeds, I took exception the other night to the voting of money in a lump sum without having information as to what it was to be used for. After several hours of discussion we elicited that there were two items in the estimates which were not to be used under the vote in which they were included, one of those items being cow-testing, which was to be transferred to the live stock vote. This is a very large sum, amounting to $1,280,000, and probably the most important of the minister's estimates. By referring to the Auditor General's report we find how the money was expended in the previous year under the headings there given. They are not so very numerous. I think if the minister would have particulars of his proposed expenditure placed in the hands of members it would facilitate the passing of his estimates and save a lot of cross-firing that does not conduce to the very best feeling at the time. I know there is a good deal of dissatisfaction with the way in which a considerable portion of the money voted under this item has been expended in the past. As the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) has indicated, it is impossible for us to take down the particulars as read out by the minister and know exactly what is being done.

Mr. LEADER: This very important item of $1,280,000 is worthy of careful consideration. Good live stock being one of the determining factors in the improvement of agriculture, I may be pardoned for saying a word or two in regard to this industry. I wonder if the minister or the government have entirely given up the notion of effecting better trade relations with the United States? The rearing of live stock can only be profitable if we secure proper markets for its disposal. Our logical market is to the south. I do not wish to minimize the importance of the home market, which I think is the best, but the next in importance for live stock, as well as for other farm products, is certainly that to the south. In 1923 we shipped 120,947 head of cattle to the United States, in 1924, 183,000, and in former years our shipments were even larger, amounting in 1920 to as high as 500,000 head. In spite of the fact that we are penalized by a duty of $20 per head entering that market, we have to send them there anyway.

I have secured some figures from the Bureau of Statistics relating to the cost of shipment of our cattle to the United States markets. The cost of transporting a one-thousand pound steer from Calgary to St. Paul is $7.05, and to Chicago $9.20, as against a cost of $45 per head to Liverpool; from Winnipeg to St. Paul the cost of transporting a thousand-pound steer is $4.20, and to Chicago $5.85, as against $42 per head to Liverpool; or a saving in favour of the American markets of approximately $36 per steer. The following quotations from the Chicago and the Winnipeg markets, taken from the agricultural papers of February 5, will no doubt be interesting to the committee:

Comparative prices on Feb. 5, 1924

	Winnipeg	Chicago	Difference
Choice steers..	$6.75	$12.50	$5.75
Prime butcher's steers ..	6.00	10.50	4.50
Common butcher's steers	4.00	9.00	5.00
Choice feeder steers ..	4.75	8.00	3.25
Choice stockers	3.75	7.25	3.50
Butcher cows..	4.00	7.50	3.50
Butcher heifers..	5.00	10.50	5.50
Choice calves	8.00	14.75	6.75

Now, I maintain that one of the greatest blunders ever made in Canadian politics was when we voted against reciprocity with the United States. I say "we" because I was one of those—as I have confessed in the House before—who voted against the proposal. Since then I have had my eyes opened, and I wish I could get another chance to-day to vote in favour of reciprocity. I know that this proposal is not considered in a favourable light in some sections of the House and in certain sections of the country; and we read that reciprocity is not now favourably considered by many people in the United States, particularly the government, but I believe a big body of people across the line are in favour of closer trade relations with this country. In proof of this statement I have here a clipping from the Fair Tariff League pamphlet printed in the United States, a league having a backing of about three million people. The matter is of such importance that I deem it my duty to delay the committee in order to put this on the record. It says:

9 p.m.

The research department of the American Farm Bureau Federation, after thorough investigation declared that there is practically no benefit to any phase of the American cattle industry from the present tariff, and that it is a distinct injury to cattle feeders.

The U. S. Tariff Commission reported to congress in 1922 that the only effect of the emergency tariff was to injure Canada.

In 1923 the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Pennsylvania Farm Bureau, Illinois Agricultural Association and others appealed to the Tariff Commission for relief from this tariff.

Our tariff on cattle is a direct affront to Canada, that formerly exported some 200,000 head of range cattle annually. Northwestern farmers need these Canadian feeder cattle. The United States as a whole requires 4,500,000 feeders annually. Canadian feeder cattle should carry to Europe the corn and other feed of our Northwest. By the sudden imposition of our Fordney duties Canada was left without a market.

The just wrath of Canadians will not be overcome in many years. Their purchases from us were reduced by $400,000,000 in one year, not from anger only, but mostly because we would not accept, on fair terms, of such of their commodities as we could well use in payment for our goods.

This goes to show that if we are to sell goods to a foreign country we must buy goods in return. I quote further:

A destructive phase of this tariff, intended to be protective, is seen in the recent diversion of Canada's surplus cattle from the United States to England.

It goes on to say:

We make a mockery of our boast that our unguarded Canadian boundary line is imaginary only. We fortified it with worse than guns, with a tariff of distress and ill-will that gave us never a benefit.

Canada errs in attributing this action to the American people. She apparently thinks that our public rules in tariff matters. She does not realize that the Fordney law was enacted by a few over-powerful manufacturers, who betrayed the principle of protection, fooled the people and disregarded the better judgment of many manufacturers who wanted lower duties on their own and other manufactures.

Then I have an article from the Breeders' Gazette by Alvin H. Sanders, one of the plenipotentiaries who was sent over by President Taft to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity with the Canadian government. The heading of this article is, "Boosting the Tariff on Wheat." Mr. Sanders says:

While the action may meet with the approval of wheat growers for the time being, The Gazette questions the wisdom of any move that has for its object any serious restriction of interchange of commodities between Canada and the United States. As a member of the United States Tariff Board some years ago, the writer hereof was a party to the negotiation of a treaty of reciprocity by President Taft between the two governments which was finally approved by our Senate, but ultimately rejected by the Dominion authorities, due, as we recall the facts, largely to Ontario opposition.

Note this—Mr. Sanders says:

The Gazette has always been a believer in reciprocity —the exchanging of customs concessions in the interest of increased interchange of commodities.

Mr. Sanders is a protectionist, yet he believes in a measure of reciprocity with Canada. Recently I have had some correspondence with one of the outstanding breeders of the United States. He wrote me a personal letter in answer to a question I put to him. I will not give the name, though I could give it to anyone who wanted it. He says:

I have no information as to when the United States is likely to admit Canadian cattle free of duty, but I imagine it will be soon as there seems to be developing a shortage of cattle in this country, particularly in the middle west; and I believe the corn belt feeders will be demanding free entry of Canadian cattle soon, in fact some of them are already.

The fact that the government of the United States have raised the tariff walls so high that we can scarcely see over them does not lead to the conclusion that it is of no use to negotiate with them with a view to the securing of better trade relations. I would be one of the last to keep knocking at a neighbour's door or to insist on swapping horses or cattle with him if he did not want to trade with me, but I am convinced that a great many of the people of the United States —indeed, the vast majority—are willing to trade with Canada if they only had the chance. If some of the politics and politicians could be eliminated I believe we would have an opportunity for the establishment of better trade relations with this great neighbour. Prosperity in agriculture can be maintained only by the rearing of live stock, therefore it is essential that good markets be found for our products. If the government succeeds in getting a reduction in the transportation charges overseas and in bringing about a decrease of the American tariff on our feeder cattle, the live stock industry in this country will be given a great impetus, and with the prosperity of agriculture the wheels of industry in eastern Canada will immediately respond with increased revolutions.

I heard it stated in the House that we should not send an ambassador to the United States. It is my view, however, that if we had a good practical man at Washington, a man who knew the needs of Canada and was willing to carry on negotiations in a practical way, it would be to the benefit of both countries. I should very much like to see an ambassador at Washington working in the interests of Canada. True, it would cost some money, but I think I can suggest where the minister could provide the necessary funds. We have in this country a great army of live stock promoters, sheep promoters, and so on. In looking over the Auditor General's report for last year I located at least seventy, and their travelling expenses amounted to about $140,000. This year we had less; in the Auditor General's report I could not find as many as I found last year. These are very splendid men; I have met a great many of them. They are doing their best to show us how to improve our live stock. But that is of no use if we are not provided with a market. The first duty of this government is to help to get us a market, and then if we need the live stock promoters we can take them on. In the meantime we do not need any live stock promoters; if we are assured of a reasonable profit we will do the promoting ourselves. So I suggest to the minister and to the government that if they contemplate appointing a minister at Washington they should give some of these live stock promoters a holiday without pay and provide the money in that way.

I did not intend to delay the committee so long, but I will close by mentioning just one or two little banquets. I notice in the Auditor General's report for the year ending March 31, 1924, on page 74, an item for a banquet held at the Chateau Laurier, "58 dinners, $116; cigars, $9.50." Then, a banquet was held at the Queen's Hotel, Toronto: "dinners, $200: service and cigars, etc., $30." Now I wish to be as kind as possible in this matter. I do not blame this minister so much or this government, they are simply following in the steps of their predecessors. These expenditures for banquets and dinners have been going on for some years; we have too many of them and it is high time the practice was discontinued. I would ask the minister, therefore, to bear these remarks in mind and to try to curtail his expenses for banquets. I would like him to tell me what he thinks of the desirability of our trying to establish better trade relations with the United States.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member has given us a very interesting resumé of the live stock situation. I assure him that I am with him on the question of reciprocity. If everybody who was in favour of it had voted for it we would have had it now—and I am not suggesting that my hon. friend did not vote for it. Had it been dissociated from politics, had we had a plebiscite on it, we would have got it. But that was not the way it went. We had the opportunity but we missed it, and we will have to take the consequences; that is all there is to it. The opportunity may come around again but it does not look very much like it now.

An hon. MEMBER: Try a banquet.

An hon. MEMBER: Try a plebiscite.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That would not be a bad idea. It would be a "safety first" way anyhow.

With regard to the promotors, we have got one horse promoter in the three prairie provinces, and last year we succeeded in developing a trade, very largely through his activities, of 12,000 horses that were shipped from the prairies to eastern Canada even down as far as the Maritime provinces. This is a case of very marked success as a result of a promoter's activities. The promoter in question is Mr. Wilson, who is located at Calgary. I do not know when he was appointed, he was in the position before I had anything to do with it, but his services have been valuable to the extent that they facilitated that trade last year of those 12,000 horses from the west where they were a perfect drug on the market in some parts.

Now then in the province of Manitoba, from which the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) comes, they have been hammering at our door this last year or more asking us to put on another promoter for that province. I believe we should have one too, but in response to the general desire that these expenditures be kept down we have refrained from putting an additional man in that province. As a matter of fact these services are a little bit undermanned; that is the actual situation.

Mr. FORKE: Will the minister explain what he proposes to do in Manitoba? What is the promoter going to promote?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The promoters are facilitating the sale of horses to buyers in any part of the country where they are in need of them.

Mr. FORKE: Have you any idea what those 12,000 horses brought; would the price realized help to pay for the services of the promoter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The chances are that if those horses had not been sold in that way there would not have been any sale for them at all. They were horses that were suitable for the lighter lands down here but were not suitable for the heavy lands in the west. Besides they were getting up in years. A great deal of work has been done in trying to promote the sale of these western horses to Russia, but on account of the high freight rates, the exchange, and the difficulty of getting credits from Russia nothing has yet come of the movement. But we have worked up quite a trade down this way. Now, in regard to the question of banquets I do not want—

Mr. SPENCER: Before the minister gets away from the point—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had three points to reply to, and I did not wish my hon. friend the member for Portage la Prairie to imagine that I was ignoring him. Somebody suggested that the precedent set by our predecessors was not a good one to go by. I do not think we should assume that all the acts of our predecessors were wrong and cut them all out. We will conduct these matters along the lines of our predecessors if they are sound; if they are not sound we will depart from them. Take the question of legislating in regard to fruit if you like. I have been reprimanded by my good friend from Hants (Mr. Martell) today for not consulting the people of his constituency and taking counsel with them. Well, I believe in the principle of consulting every part of the country before you bring down legislation when you are legislating for a country of the size of Canada. We have recognized that principle too by providing, in several of our acts notably the Seed Control Act and several others, for the appointment of advisers, so that the department may be constantly in touch with practical men throughout the country from whom they might obtain guidance and advice.

Now, with respect to this particular banquet it was a banquet to live stock men, in connection with the advanced registration scheme, I think it was, that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) spoke of the other night, based on a record of performance by dairy cows. We invited them in for a conference on a forward movement along that line. If there is one weak point in our dairying it is the small production of the dairy cow. So we invited the farmers to leave their work and come down to Ottawa, and some of them travelled two thousand miles at their own expense. When we gave them the banquet it saved them that much more on their expense account. I will guarantee that the charge per plate for the banquet was not any more than their dinner would have been at the Chateau, even with the cigars thrown in. There was not any 4.4 stuff there, much less native wine. If that is an evidence of dissipation it comes to about $2 per plate. How many will go to the Chateau—I mean in the proper frame of mind and condition for a good meal--and will get away with less than $2 per plate. Turn a farmer loose in there with the government to foot his bill and see if he will let you off with $2. As a matter of fact it is a saving proposition to have these banquets.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): Seeing that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has brought up the question of the export cattle trade, and the barriers against it, I wish, as a farmer in the province of Ontario, to make a few comments on the importance to the farmers of our province of the export market for cattle. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie has referred to the barriers which keep our cattle out of the market in the country to the south. But we are glad to know that we have at the present time, and have had for the last couple of years, a market across the seas for our export cattle without which the cattle raisers in the province of Ontario would be very badly handicapped. Now, as a matter of fact there is a good demand for our cattle there. They want our cattle in that market, and our cattle are going over there and proving very satisfactory. I think that in the year 1923 the value of the Canadian cattle exported to Britain amounted to fifty-six thousand and some odd hundreds of dollars. In the year 1924 the value of the cattle exported was $80,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was it.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): In order to show you how our cattle are received over there I will read a few extracts from the Commercial Intelligence Journal issued every week by the Department of Trade and Commerce of Canada. In the issue of that publication, dated February 14, last I find the following statements by Mr. G. B. Johnson, Trade Commissioner in Scotland:

> During the past year the shipments of Canadian cattle to Scotland have been fully maintained, but the total numbers are still far short of requirements.

Then further down:

> The cattle were mostly stockers of a good class, weighing from 1,100 pounds to 1,300 pounds live weight landed in Scotland; they have been purchased by farmers in many parts of this country, but the Eastern Counties—Forfarshire, Fifeshire, Perthshire and the Lothians—have taken most of the cattle and have been most prominent in the trade.
>
> The demand for Canadian cattle has greatly improved, owing to the farmers being well satisfied with them, and the prices have been generally higher. The highest price given for Canadian cattle during the year was 67s. per live cwt. of 112 pounds, and the average for the season was 52s. to 58s. per live cwt.
> Farmers have found by experience that Canadian cattle are very healthy, free from disease, good feeders, and quick in coming to prime beef.

It seems to me too bad that for over thirty years we were deprived of the British market for our export cattle on the plea that Canadian cattle were not healthy. We now know that that was only a plea. I believe the British people realized that, but as long as they followed the old beaten path in their efforts to have the embargo raised they did not achieve this success. But when they departed from the beaten path in the field to the consuming public the results were satisfactory.

> Farmers have found by experience that Canadian cattle are very healthy, free from disease, good feeders and quick in coming to prime beef. It is almost an unheard-of thing for a farmer to lose a Canadian bullock through illness, and they are now known to be stronger in constitution than most other cattle.

Just one other paragraph:

> The only complaints against Canadian cattle are on account of their age and on account of branded hides. The latter point appears to be in process of elimination, but the matter of the age of cattle is reported to be one that deserves the serious attention of Canadian shippers. The farmers in Scotland want young cattle, not more than two years old if possible. If this important point is attended to, and a good class of well-graded cattle shipped, there is ample room in Scotland for a great increase in the number of Canadian cattle which can be absorbed.

I read that just to show the market that we have access to across the sea, and the demand there for our cattle, but the one point which I wish to refer to is the restriction that is placed on us when we try to reach that market across the sea. We have before us, and I have read during the last few days, the report of Mr. Preston regarding the Atlantic shipping combine. I was a little surprised a few days ago to know that practically the whole afternoon was taken up in this House in trying to discredit Mr. Preston, intimating, I take it that this report which was brought down would also be discredited. We do not need to rely entirely on the report of Mr. Preston, but let us read the report of the special agricultural committee which reported during the session of 1923. We find there ample evidence that there was at that time—and we believe there is yet—a combine that is hampering our trade across the sea.

I do not wish to dwell longer on this because we know the government in the Speech from the Throne has promised to deal with this matter and I have no doubt they will endeavour to deal with it satisfactorily. I might say here, by way of asking for information, that I am not very clear as to why it should be necessary for us to subsidize an outside company when we have a fleet of government-owned ships of our own. It does not appear to me that the situation is as it should be. However, we will leave that until the discussion comes up in the House. While speaking about restriction by ocean combine, in the matter of ocean rates, I will read an extract to the House. It is not in reference to the effect of the North Atlantic steamship conference. This is another situation that sometimes does and I believe will this year develop, and I may call it the cornering of space for our Canadian cattle. This is in reference to a private individual, and he has apparently successfully cornered the space for the shipment of Canadian cattle. This article appeared in the Toronto Globe under date of January 20, and says in part:

> Not only is it established by information in the hands of the federal officials that Charles Schamburg of New York city has effected a corner in cattle space on the various steamship lines sailing from the ports of Halifax and St. John during the present winter, but it is becoming increasingly evident, according to the same information, that the three principal lines handling Canadian cattle—the Donaldson, the White Star-Dominion and the Canadian Government lines—are making a more or less concerted effort to increase the price for cattle space. The prevailing rate is $20 a space, nominally, but in operation it is more.

I for one thought that the government-owned lines—and I think the average Canadian citizen thought—were to be another facility of transportation, a facility owned by the people, and to be a competing factor to keep down the rates, in order that our produce from this Dominion might reach the overseas markets of the world; but instead of being a competing factor we find that they are in league with the others, and are taking their part in the matter of increasing freight rates. A little further down this article says:

> All the cattle space to Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow is now held by Mr. Schamburg, and Canadian live stock producers wishing to ship to those ports must do business with his representatives in Canada and at his rates.

I do not know anything about Mr. Schamburg, but from reading the reports, and from perusing the report of the special committee on Agriculture of 1923, I gather that he is a cattle shipper himself; at the same time the impression which I got from this—and I think I am justified in forming the impression—is that he has purchased all the space available, not only for his own use, but also to hold, to force the price up to others who need the space, and that is the feature to which I take exception. If he purchased the space for his own needs, to ship his own cattle across the sea, I would have no objection, and I do not think anybody else would have an objection, but we want to be sure that he purchased the space for that purpose alone and not to prevent others getting it. It is of vital importance to the farmers of Ontario who have access to the British market for their export cattle, and we are looking to this government to see that the restrictions that are placed upon us in regard to ocean rates and the cornering of space on the ships, are not permitted to continue, so that we will not be placed in such a position that we will be in the hands of those who may hamper our trade in this respect.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister in answering a question put by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) intimated that the horses sent from the west to eastern Canada were not good working horses, were not fit to work in the west and therefore sent eastward. I should like to correct that impression in this House. I want to say that, as far as I am concerned, the people were very particular in regard to not buying any horse that was not worth while, or any horse which could not be called a good working horse. I should like the minister to give us some idea of what was being paid on the average for those horses. The House might understand from the statement of the minister that there was a good, thriving business in the horse trade from western Canada, but judging from the figures I have seen, the prices that were being paid for those horses were not equal to the cost of raising them.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I hope I did not leave the impression that they were the culls from the west. I pointed out that there was a certain class of horse in the west running about 1,200 pounds, which was quite common. These horses were unfitted for the heavy lands of that country, but they were all right for the lighter lands down in Ontario. No doubt some good horses were sent down as well as other kinds.

Mr. SPENCER: Did not the minister refer to the old horses?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I pointed out that they had been accumulating and had been gradually getting older, the market was so poor. Of course no horse on the market ever does get beyond nine years of age. But speaking more seriously, we did not buy or sell these horses; we merely facilitated the getting together of the buyer and seller and promoted the trade in that way, and I presume the class of animal that was required by the buyer was sold to him, because there was a surplus there, and the buyer could pretty nearly fix his own price. If he wanted a lighter horse, he got it. If he wanted a heavier one and had the money, he got that—whatever he required. The point was that there was a surplus continually getting older, whether they were being used or not.

Mr. THURSTON: Does the minister think there is a scarcity of horses in Ontario? My understanding is that a small number were sold in Ontario?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. THURSTON: Was the reason for giving the assistance that the government thought there was a scarcity of horses in Ontario?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, but it was partly that.

Mr. THURSTON: We have a surplus in Ontario as well as in the west.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Why did they go there then? It must have been because they could secure a cheaper horse.

With regard to ocean rates, I think we had better defer that question until Tuesday when we shall probably have a full discussion. I do not know how the question of space could be regulated. If the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Ross) desired to make sure of some space and was fore-handed enough to secure it, to get a corner on it, to make sure that he would have enough for himself at all events and, if he had any over, that he could dispose of it, I do not know of any law that would prevent him from doing so. The same thing is true on the Great Lakes. The big exporter, it is considered, makes his profit largely by buying an abundance of space in advance as cheaply as he can.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): Does he secure that space to resell it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I mean if he had not enough goods to fill it. There is no law that I know of against retailing space. At the same time, there is an opening for a great deal of abuse and of putting the small shipper into a corner. I do not know the condition of affairs in Ontario, but the western people who are using space have pools by which they have men looking after their interests and seeing that the small man is not sidetracked. It is pretty nearly imperative these days that farm products be sold in bulk. I might point out that we have a request at the present time for assistance to bring all the potato growers, vegetable growers and fruit growers into one pool for the purpose of promoting the better marketing of these articles. That has been brought into prominence as a result of the investigation under the Combines Act by my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). Certain undesirable practices have been discovered that render it necessary for the farmers to follow the fruits and vegetables further on towards the ultimate market. Should we not look favourably on a project of that kind? I think we should. As regards the space question, as soon as reports were sent abroad with regard to the cornering of space, my department made diligent inquiries at Montreal, and so far as we could find out, there was no substantial or general abuse of the cornering of space. I think the mercantile marine, with its limited space, was all taken up before some people could secure some who expected to secure it, and they were naturally disappointed. Outside of that and certain other exporters in connection with other liners, the space was largely required for their own activities. If a person had sufficient funds and saw an opportunity of retailing space, he could buy it up, but he would be running a considerable risk. I think the committee understands that in all the sailings of last year about 30 per cent of the spaces that were available either were not used or had to be knocked down for want of animals to occupy them. Consequently, the man who would buy them all up would run the risk of not being able to fill 30 per cent of the space, and such a risk is not likely to be taken. I understand that our department has had no complaint and we have no complaints now with respect to the shortage of space. There was some talk of shortage of space for the immediate opening of navigation at Montreal. There was a tremendous demand for space for that particular time by people who did not want to feed any longer than that, and the result naturally was a congestion just for that time. Apart from that, there is abundance of space.

Mr. MILLAR: I should like to make a suggestion to the minister with regard to an expenditure at the experimental farm at Indian Head that, I think, would be advantageous. I had intended to make this suggestion under the next item, experimental farms, but since the expenditure would come from this grant, perhaps I may just as well make it now. The minister has made reference to the number of horses that have been shipped east, and there has been some little criticism as to the quality. As regards the Indian Head experimental farm where I think some money could be spent to advantage, I have pointed out to the minister before that raising a large quantity of horses, cattle or of any other stock of a very ordinary type, such as can be found on the surrounding farms, does not seem to be of very much benefit. I doubt if we get full returns for the money expended. It is necessary to keep well ahead of the community in which the farm is situated. At the present time the experimental farm there has a fine herd of pure-bred Clydesdales, females, some of them of a very fine type. Many of them have taken prizes in very good classes at Chicago, Toronto and other large shows. They are, however, very much lacking in having a suitable sire for such an important place. I know that a certain amount of money is allotted to experimental farms, year after year, but I am inclined to think the amount available will not be sufficient to get the animal desired. If the minister would use a part of this vote to assist in getting the right type of animal, he would be well ahead of the other breeders in the community and the farm would then render a real service. I believe the herd there is somewhat in the neighbourhood of a score of female animals and the minister would do well to carry out this suggestion. I have another suggestion to make when we come to the next item, but I trust the minister will see that this suggestion is given consideration. I know that the community would appreciate it if he carried out this suggestion, and if we follow that policy in time, there will not be so much criticism about the poor type of horses we have to sell and to ship out.

Mr. HOEY: I was not altogether satisfied with the minister's reply to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) when the latter referred to the desirability of closer trade relations with the United States as respects cattle. About three weeks ago I was present at the annual convention of the Illinois Agricultural Association held at Champaign-Urbana where there were present about 800 delegates and 400 visitors. I was there for two days and I embraced the opportunity extended to me to interview as many of the delegates as possible, all of whom are representative farmers from that state, in an attempt to find out from them their attitude as regards the entry of Canadian cattle, that is feeder cattle, to the middle west. I did not meet a single delegate who was not in favour of reducing or abolishing the duty. You may say that these men were not frank with me in view of the fact that I had gone down there on their invitation as a Canadian visitor. But in my judgment they were frank with me, because the same delegates who told me that they were in favour of the abolition of the duty on cattle also informed me that they were in favour of an immediate increase in the duty on Canadian butter. If I mistake not, that convention appointed a delegation to go from there to Washington with a demand that the duty on Canadian butter entering the United States be immediately increased. I make this statement in the hope that the minister and the officials of his department are fully aware of the sentiment existing in the middle west at present with regard to the entry of our cattle into the United States. There is nothing at all unselfish in the attitude of those people towards us; they are demanding our cattle to-day because they believe they can make money on the finishing. If the agriculturists are in favour of allowing our cattle in free, surely the consumers in the United States cannot possibly be opposed to their entry. I think we might in this way obtain reciprocity piecemeal. There is a demand in western Canada, as the minister knows, for the entry of Wisconsin dairy cattle free, and I have often wondered whether he could not with some hope of success enter into negotiations with the powers that be at Washington and come to some agreement whereby they would allow our cattle to enter the United States free if we gave them some concession in return.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Replying first to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), with regard to the situation at Indian Head, at a great many of our experimental farms we have suitable stallions at the head of the stud. At Indian Head, however, it was not thought necessary to purchase an animal for the reason that there was one in the immediate neighbourhood. But if the condition at Indian Head is as represented I have no doubt the suggestion will be taken into consideration and will be kept in mind in a subsequent year. Saskatchewan Clydesdales have won a reputation not only nationally but internationally as well; that province is reputed to raise the best Clydesdales in Canada.

Mr. FORKE: How would it do to have one at Brandon also?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think there is one there.

Mr. FORKE: I never heard of it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know there is one at Windermere and if there is not one at Brandon it must be owing to the fact that there are exceptionally good ones in the neighbourhood.

Mr. FORKE: If there is one we never heard of it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Hoey) we had ambitions two or three years ago of trying to accomplish what he suggested, that is to say, to bring about a sort of reciprocity piecemeal; and in the estimates of two years ago we provided something like $6,000 of a grant to an organization with headquarters in Calgary, whose primary object was to promote trade relations with the United States in cattle. They had an emissary in the United States and were developing various markets and we felt that we were going as close to securing a market of that kind in that roundabout way as we dared, having regard to ordinary international courtesies which demand that we do not interfere with another country's business. It was just about that time, or prior to that, that Mr. Manning Doherty met with a good deal of criticism in the United Kingdom for pursuing his activities contrary to the orthodox methods. I am not entering into the pros and cons of that matter, but if he got results, most of us, I suppose, are not worrying as to how he obtained them. Any port in a storm is an old saying that sometimes is very appropriate. But there are international courtesies that must be observed; and to take part in any indirect method of trying to get into a market by a side door rather than through the front door is very apt to lead to difficulties. Take, for instance, the preference which was promised on fruit by the British government and which was afterwards retracted. There was a very strong effort made by some of the fruit growers in Canada at that time to have us intervene with the British government and try to induce them to stand by their original plan of a preference for our fruit. Now, that is a very delicate matter and I would point out to my hon. friend that a similar delicacy characterizes this cattle business. As a matter of fact we went as far as we felt we could go and get away with it.

Mr. HOEY: Public opinion may have changed since then.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Possibly; and I think that it is changing. They will not pursue their present course indefinitely because it seems to me to be a false attitude. It is only a matter of time, when foodstuffs go up sufficiently high and the people in the United States cry for cheaper articles, when there will be access given to our stock. But whether we can get our cattle in by means of these local activities to which I have referred is doubtful, although I tried it, with the dangers I have mentioned apparent on all sides.

Mr. LOVIE: One of the drawbacks in the transportation of cattle from western Canada is the fact that the animals lose condition on the long rail route from Winnipeg to the Atlantic coast. That difficulty could be overcome if the Hudson Bay railway were completed. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) last year made a trip through the Hudson bay country, although he did not go the whole way, and in an interview published in the Manitoba Free Press in September he was quoted as having said that as soon as he got back to Ottawa and met with his colleagues he would do his very best to see that the railway was finished right up to Port Nelson. Cattle, as we well know, do not lose condition on the ocean trip, but they certainly do on a long rail route, and the thousand miles between Winnipeg and Montreal might be eliminated through the use of Port Nelson. And Port Nelson is just as near to Liverpool as is Montreal. This, however, is by the way. What I want particularly to refer to is the matter of horse clubs for which $25,000 is being asked. I do not want the minister to run away with the idea that I am opposed to these clubs, for I do not object to federal assistance to horse breeders. I do think, however, that there is need for a little change in the operation of these institutions. Some of the parties feel that they have a grievance in the working of the rules, and this grievance could be obviated if section 6 of the act providing federal assistance, page 13, were eliminated. That section provides that the owner or owners of a stallion shall not belong to a club. I should like to see that provision repealed. Horses are becoming scarce in every part of Canada; indeed, they are becoming scarce throughout the world. There is a scarcity of horses in the eastern provinces, according to the official figures, and in western Canada there will not be many available for shipment. Stallions of high quality certainly are scarce. To get the benefit of federal assistance it is necessary that horse breeders should hire a stallion and at present there are very few that can be hired; they must be purchased outside and brought in. But private individuals cannot afford the risk of purchasing high priced sires. Consequently the businesslike way is for a number of farmers to form a company, put up the necessary cash and select one or two of their number to purchase a good stallion; but simply because they are working in that businesslike manner they are penalized; they get no federal assistance. The Breeders' Gazette of the United States in its issue of January 15 last has the following editorial:

> The majority of the work animals are nine years old or over; many of them being twelve to fifteen years of age. Many farmers are already looking about for pairs of horses or more for next season's work, and finding it difficult to locate the really good type of horse that they have been accustomed to use. The net result of all this is that there is a general feeling among farmers in the cornbelt states east of the Missouri that breeding must be re-established.

The editor continues:

> The most practical method is for ten or twelve men in the community to organize a corporation capitalized at a few thousand dollars in shares of $100 each. The expense of incorporating with the assistance of a friendly lawyer or banker will usually not amount to more than $50. As many shares can be sold as may seem necessary for the purchase of a horse, and the balance of the stock held in the treasury. Fifteen shares sold to fifteen separate farmers will raise $1,500 in cash; and two men of unquestioned integrity, who are good judges of horses, can take the money and go direct to the stable of any dealer or breeder and buy a very good horse, ship him home, and still have a little money left over.

We have associations in this country doing identical work, but they can get no federal assistance for the simple reason that the clause of the act which I have quoted excludes the stallion owner or owners, as the case may be, from belonging to a club. We know that horses are going to be scarce in a year or two, and if we wait until there is an absolute shortage before we begin breeding operations we will find ourselves in trouble.

To-day I endeavoured to obtain from the Live Stock branch figures of the number of horses in Canada, but without success. However, I have the figures given at Toronto on February 12, by the president of the Clydesdale Horse Association. He said:

> While the total shows an increase as compared with 1923, the number of colts and fillies shows a decrease. As compared with 1919 the number of colts and fillies or young stock coming on to supply the annual wastage shows a decrease of 291,100. There is a decrease of over 13,000 in the number of colts and fillies in 1924 as compared with 1923. The number of stallions in Canada shows a decrease of 20,492 since 1919, or nearly 42 per cent. The figures show a decrease of 10,554 the largest decrease in any one year since 1919.
> Horses show an increase last year in every province excepting Ontario and New Brunswick as compared with 1923, the decrease in Ontario being around 10,000. The greatest decrease in the number of stallions is in the western provinces, 1,694 in Manitoba, 5,278 in Saskatchewan, and 2,625 in Alberta.

There is a decrease of 18,000,000 horses, mules and asses taking world conditions all over. The question is, what is to be done to encourage farmers to go into the breeding of horses. It is well known that there are many indifferent sires travelling at a very low fee, consequently the high priced stallions have to compete with them unless they are clubbed, and the really good sires are not being used. It must also be borne in mind that the farmers who have been sufficiently well off to purchase high class sires are in many cases quitting the business, and the young men taking their places do not care to invest money in horse breeding. In my district there has been what you may call a horse club, a horse association, or a horse syndicate, going steadily for 25 years, and yet we are finding it very difficult to carry on, simply because we can get no federal assistance. We are doing our utmost to purchase the best sires available. In proof of what I say, allow me to read a cablegram which I received on January 23:

> Can ship genuine good horse rising five years able win international well bred, price five hundred pounds. Cable reply.
> James Kilpatrick, Kilmarnock.

I had to turn down that offer because our people felt that they could not afford to put up the money without federal assistance. Last year we had on the road the grand champion of Brandon in 1919 and yet that stallion in competition with the poorest grade of horses only had a season of 42 mares where he generally had 100. That is going to put our association absolutely out of business, for on account of scarcity we find it next to impossible to hire or club a horse. Besides, there are disadvantages. In hiring a stallion for a season you may not get the same horse the second year, and it is well understood that a sire has got to travel in the district four or five seasons to get the best results. I should like the minister to consider this proposition, for at present those who are doing their level best to purchase good sires co-operatively are being discriminated against as though they were criminals.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Touching the last point first, I think the remedy for meeting the competition made by the cheaper stallion would be to raise the standard of the pure bred stallions. I understand that Manitoba has a law prohibiting the travelling of any but pure bred animals. Is not that right?

Mr. LOVIE: Yes, but that does not prevent them standing at home.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is right, you can hardly prohibit a man keeping any kind of stallion he wants to for his own use at home. I know in the province of Saskatchewan we introduced the principle of a licensed stallion area, with a board to examine the animals that were allowed to travel in those municipalities, and this raised the quality of the stallions immediately. In Manitoba the principle was adopted generally all over the province at the outset, and I think there must be a marked improvement there. You will have to develop a desire on the part of breeders to use the best animals available. With regard to the other objection raised by my hon. friend, that no stallion owner shall belong to a club, the primary object of this regulation is that the club is intended to help, not the stallion owner, but rather the man who has no stallion. If you permitted stallion owners to become members of a horse club, they would be getting the benefit of the use of their own horses and the government's subsidy as well. I am sure my hon. friend must recollect that years ago in the west before the horse club business was organized the owners of stallions used to go all over the country organizing syndicated stallions, and with their natural desire for gain, and with no supervision of the animals, a bunch of farmers would be hoaxed, with the result that when these clubs came in the desire was to help not so much the stallion owner as the man without a stallion in an effort to improve the horse breeding industry. There may be a hardship on some, but speaking generally I think it is a wise provision.

10 p.m.

Mr. LOVIE: What is the difference between twenty farmers hiring a stallion and twenty farmers purchasing a stallion? Why should they be benefactors of the country in the one case and criminals in the other? If the stallions are not to be had here and they go overseas and purchase, why should they be discriminated against? That is the point I wish to make, and the point that the minister has not seen yet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will give that somewhat delicate matter further consideration.

Mr. DOUCET: Is the minister lessening his activities under this vote?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Where we can make arrangements with the province to take over some of the activities that are essentially associated with production, yes. In the provinces that are not ready for that, we will continue.

Mr. DOUCET: The activities in the matter of cow testing represented an expenditure last year of something over $40,000, and this year they have been taken from the Dairy branch and put under the Live Stock branch; yet the vote is the same this year as last. Have arrangements been made for the inspection of eggs brought into this country?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. Practically no Chinese eggs have come to Canada via the Pacific coast during the last two or three years, owing to the fact that we have insisted upon inspection. Two carloads of eggs coming from the United States were turned back at the border because they were unfit for human consumption, so that this inspection is very necessary.

Mr. DOUCET: That is certainly a wise precaution, because when you insist upon the inspection of eggs produced locally which have to come into direct competition with imported eggs you are certainly placing a serious handicap upon the Canadian farmer. That condition did exist for a couple of years.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it did exist for a year or two.

Mr. DOUCET: Has any appointment been made to the position of egg inspector for New Brunswick?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not recently, I understand.

Mr. DOUCET: Is compensation paid to breeders and farmers whose cattle are slaughtered as a result of tubercular testing?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, based upon the valuation of the animal as made by the veterinary inspectors. We will come to that very soon under the health of animals vote.

Mr. DOUCET: I am informed that there has been an importation of Chinese eggs this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have no authority to exclude them if they are sound and comply with our instructions, but we have made our inspection reasonably tight and anything that is not good we do turn back. The bulk of the Chinese eggs that come here are frozen eggs for cooking purposes; they do not go into general consumption. Manufacturers of pastry, cake and the like, made considerable objection when our regulations were tightened up with the consequent exclusion of about half the usual import of Chinese eggs. As they are getting them now in bulk, frozen, their requirements are met and there is very little interference with our own egg trade.

Mr. DOUCET: I suggest that the department tighten up again and keep out the other half.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will consider that.

Mr. DOUCET: It is unfair that the Canadian product should be placed in direct competition with the Chinese product.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is very little of the Chinese product coming in now. The Department of Agriculture does not control the financial policy of the government. If you want real restriction you have to go there rather than to my particular department.

Mr. DOUCET: I quite understand that, yet the incumbent of the portfolio of agriculture must have something to say in determining the financial policy of the government.

Mr. TOLMIE: Do I understand the minister to say that you can use a stale egg for cooking purposes? Is it possible to use in pastry eggs that are unfit for food when used in any other manner?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am sure my hon. friend has often heard the expression, "Well, it is not just up to the mark but it is all right for cooking purposes." I would not like to say just where the line is. There is a certain staleness that makes an egg objectionable for eating either boiled or fried, but which still permits it to be used in pastry or for cooking purposes.

Mr. TOLMIE: The minister cannot explain how it is that a stale egg may be all right for cooking when it cannot be used for anything else.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I suppose it is spiced up with all sorts of niceties to disguise it—that may be the reason.

Mr. TOLMIE: The addition of the spices would hide the real flavour of the egg?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The egg would be there to do the lightening and the spice to give it taste.

Mr. DOUCET: Have steps been taken by the department to place an embargo on poultry coming from the United States?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A disease known as European fowl plague has struck the poultry of ten or twelve of the states, and the United States government have themselves quarantined all these states. We have put an embargo against the states that they themselves have quarantined, and that embargo is still on.

Mr. LUCAS: In connection with the list of items the minister read out this evening I notice an item of $140,000 for the purchase of bulls?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. LUCAS: That is in connection with the cattle clubs?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the minister say what system is followed in the purchase of these animals?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Years ago they used to be bought from individuals but that policy has been, I think, entirely abandoned, and now they are usually bought at the bull sales that are held periodically in each of the provinces. A member of the department goes there and competes with other buyers at the sales. All these animals have a certificate of freedom from T. B. before they are allowed to go into the sale at all, so the department is quite protected in that respect. We enter into competition with the ordinary buyer, but we buy the bull not the owner.

Mr. LUCAS: Is that system strictly adhered to at the present time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Almost entirely. There may be a very rare exception to it, but we find the policy of attending these bull sales so much more satisfactory that we have adopted it generally.

Mr. LUCAS: I should like to commend the minister for carrying out that policy of buying by auction at any rate. I know personally of cattle clubs that have received bulls from the department that have been a disgrace for any farmer to have on his place; and a very strong feeling has been manifested on the part of a number of our breeders because certain pure bred cattle, of inferior grades that could not be sold on the open market have been peddled off on the government. I know that has been the case through the experience of some of these cattle clubs who applied for these bulls and received them, but simply had to turn them back again. Where such a large expenditure of money is made for the purpose of raising the standard of our cattle I would urge upon the minister that the very greatest care be taken in any purchase so as to procure only the very best types of animals. This sum of $140,000 which is to be devoted to the production of improved live stock is, as I have already said, a very large amount, whereas only $7,000 is being voted for the encouragement of co-operative marketing. I believe it was the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) who said to-night that if the farmers of this country could get a fair remuneration for their products they would do a great deal of the necessary promoting themselves. One of the greatest difficulties experienced up to the present time is the obstacles to the proper marketing of our products; and I think if the government would give a lead now and encourage the farmers to start this movement themselves it would have the most beneficial results. In the province of Alberta at the present time we are trying to adopt co-operative marketing in the case of all our farm products. I think in the past we have been looking more to governments to do a lot of these things which should have been undertaken and carried out by ourselves.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that is right.

Mr. LUCAS: At the same time it is the duty of the government to remove the obstacles that lie in the way and to extend any encouragement they possibly can. I trust that the minister will see to it that a greater amount will be apportioned for encouraging the development of co-operative marketing of the farm products of this country.

Mr. BRETHEN: There is a feature of the live stock question, particularly as regards poultry, that I should like to draw to the attention of the minister, and that is the importation of baby chicks from the United States due, I believe, to a recent ruling of the Post Office Department by which these birds can come in by parcel post. The columns of every Canadian agricultural paper were flooded during the past season with advertisements from large American poultry hatcheries, with the result that hundreds of thousands of baby chicks were brought into Canada. I believe these birds have been brought in to the detriment of the Canadian poultry industry. At the experimental farm we have a record of performance in order to raise the standard of the production of the Canadian hen. I believe that work is carried on at great expense and for a worthy purpose. The Ontario government is doing work along similar lines, and I believe they have accomplished very beneficial results in raising the standard of production. Under the circumstances why should all this work, or a great deal of it, be lost by the introduction of inferior chicks from the United States? In view of the price at which these birds are offered I believe they have no records of production behind them—they are simply ordinary chicks. I do not think we can afford to go on spending money year after year building up the standard of our Canadian live stock and then, with respect to one particular branch of it, nullify the whole work in one single season. I think there must be something done to find a remedy, either by a working arrangement with the Post Office Department or by some other method.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The embargo that I spoke of with respect to disease will keep them out from all but a dozen of the American states, for the present year anyhow, but I have a question to ask my hon. friend. I am sure there is a lot to be said in behalf of this contention, but I should like to hear him show cause why the man who wants to buy these chicks should be deprived of the opportunity of doing it. Before there is a sale by the United States poultry man there must be a purchaser in this country. He sends an order to the American poultryman that he wants a hundred day-old chicks. Now it is impossible to tell how these chickens are bred; you do not even know what breed they belong to or even what age a great many of them are. You do not know how they are registered or anything about them except that they are chicks. They may be two or three days old but they are usually called "baby chicks". How could I defend the keeping of them out when there are a lot of people in this country who want to buy them? I am honestly looking for information because I think I should like to see what my hon. friend suggests carried out. Is my hon. friend not afraid there is something like a protective suggestion about his proposition. I am not joking now, I should like to know how to get over the difficulty.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, you cannot.

Mr. BRETHEN: I am not scared because the minister has introduced the word "protection" in the expectation probably that I would throw up my hands. I think if the minister will look through the record of the Ontario Department of Agriculture he will find all kinds of regulations for saving the farmer from himself. Now, if it is going to ensure Canadian production I do not think it would do any harm to give the Canadian farmer, if necessary, protection from himself. These chicks are shipped over here under a system of camouflage. Hon. gentlemen know very well how it is done. All kinds of criticism has been indulged in with respect to pamphlets that have been scattered abroad to attract immigrants to Canada. That practice has been very strongly condemned here, and I think it has been admitted that it resulted in a great deal of harm. In this case pamphlets are coming in from American poultry hatcheries in order to influence the importation of what I might call "immigrant chickens". Surely there should be a stop put to this practice. The flaming advertisements to which I have alluded are, unfortunately, likely to delude some Canadian farmers, particularly the ordinary farmer who has not very much knowledge of the breeding and records of Canadian hens. I think it would be well, and the department would be able to defend its work in this matter, if it devised some means to prevent it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am almost a convert to my hon. friend's contention, for the simple reason that there is no way of checking that up. Under the Customs Act pure bred animals, or animals used for breeding purposes are let in free. Under that section chicks that profess to be pure bred, although nobody can tell whether they are pure bred or not, are let in free. They are often scrub stuff and do our poultry business no good; and because of the impossibility of checking a chick and ascertaining whether it is what it pretends to be, I believe some minimum valuation should be put upon a chick before it is permitted to come in. I may say that, discussing this matter a few weeks ago with my deputy, we came to the conclusion that the best way to deal with it would be to make some such provision. Possibly we may take action before the session is over. I am informed by my deputy that the conclusion we have arrived at has already been forwarded to the proper quarters, that the minimum value of a chick must be 40 cents before it will be admitted, and that will be some guarantee of its quality.

Mr. GARDINER: Would you apply the Dumping Act there?

Mr. TOLMIE: There is precedent for the action the minister proposes to take. I remember round about the year 1900, or a little before or shortly after that date, there was a great influx of what is known as the broncho horses from the western American ranges into this country. They were valued at $10 a head; some were only valued at $5. The government of that day put a valuation of $50 a head on these bronchos, and compelled them to pay duty on that amount, and that had the effect of keeping out many cheap horses. The same thing might be done to stop the importation of chicks.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I recall that incident.

Mr. STEVENS: This is most cheering, delightful and entertaining. Here we have my hon. friend from the great free trade party in Canada a Simon-pure free trader—

An hon. MEMBER: And in a Conservative seat.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes: he dare not utter such words from his own seat for fear he would contaminate the seat and would never be able to go back to it when he returned to his free trade principles. He sits in a Conservative seat and propounds a doctrine of absolute and extreme protection for the Canadian "biddy" which we approve of, and the minister says he is converted.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And have been for some time.

Mr. STEVENS: We have the splendid endorsement of just what we have been advocating in this House right along, not only for the Canadian "biddy" but for Canadian workmen and manufacturers, for Canadian people and Canadian industries generally. The same principle exactly applies to the great manufacturing industries and great productive industries of Canada. My hon. friend is absolutely right. Why should we go to expense in Canada giving information, and scientific training to breeders and farmers to improve the standard of our poultry, bringing them from what is commonly known in the calling as boarders up to the standard of producers, just what my hon. friend has been discussing with reference to dairy cows, changing them from a non-profitable standard to a profitable standard, unless we protect them from outside competition? He is going to do this by protecting the Canadian products from competition, from the overproduction or from the massed production south of the line, exactly the same principle as we apply, and seek to apply in this House for our Canadian industries based upon other natural resources, and it is certainly refreshing to have that minister declare publicly his conversion to it and to have the member to my left advocating it. I wonder if the leader of the party to my left will give his views.

Mr. FORKE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I rather apprehend after we have disclosed the enormity of the subject we have been talking about we will see a little pussyfooting, and an effort to walk around gently, and view with Scottish care the departure of one of his lieutenants. But seriously I want to commend my hon. friend for the stand he has taken. It is the proper stand. Let us use the words we mean and not evade the thing and cover it over with specious talk about charging 40 cents for a young hen. Let us understand that we are going to protect the Canadian poultry and put it on a high standard by the process of protection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member is not going to get away with that quite so easily. There is no comparison between the chick and the manufactured article. No living man can tell what a chick is, except that it is a chick, and it comes in under the section of the Customs Act as pure bred stock, but it is not known whether it is pure bred or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would not apply to the old horses my hon. friend spoke about.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not responsible for that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister applauded the statement.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, not necessarily.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not dispute it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I saw the minister applaud. My heart was cheered.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is something to be said on behalf of the old chicks, but it is not so apparent with regard to the low-grade horses, because you can see them. You can see a chick but you do not know what kind of a rooster or hen it is going to develop into. No living man can tell. Therefore it is not on all fours with a developed animal of that kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it is not on all fours at all—no question about that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I knew my hon. friend would find consolation there. I do not object to it. My hon. friends can apply whatever term they like. There is one thing sure; there is an abuse under the pretence that the old chicks are pure bred when they are not. They should come in under the regulation in the Customs Act regarding non pure bred animals.

Mr. LADNER: Would the principle which warrants the minister in protecting the chick that had developed into the rooster or hen apply equally to the protection of eggs?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, not quite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will get the minister into a protectionist on chicks and old horses and oleomargarine, and that is reasonable progress for one night. I have been looking anxiously around to see where the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) had gone. I can just picture the tears dropping from his eyes as he hears these backsliders in his party talking. Where is he going now? There is not a thing the minister said as to chicks or horses that does not apply to every importation that competes with home production, and if he moves on step by step—and I am told he has that name out west—I believe he may live long enough yet to become a real Canadian, a man who believes in Canadian industry and protection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are not there yet. We have only made the recommendation.

Mr. FORKE: As the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) mentioned my name in connection with this matter, I may say a few words. I could see from the very commencement that the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Brethen) was treading on rather dangerous ground. At the same time I think I can draw a distinction between protection, as advocated by my hon. friends to the right, and the protection that the hon. member for East Peterborough is wanting in this regard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the protection that my hon. friend advocated at Montreal the other day?

Mr. FORKE: I am unaware that I ever advocated, at Montreal, any protection that I would not advocate in this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That speech is a pretty good protectionist speech.

Mr. FORKE: I have never seen a correct report of that speech. Anything I said at Montreal, I am prepared to say in this House or anywhere else in the Dominion of Canada. Our friends to the right are always fond of alluding to this party as a free-trade party. We believe in the principle of free trade. Speaking for myself, personally, I am convinced that absolute free trade is not possible in Canada at the present time, although the principle is perfectly sound. That is what I said at Montreal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. member mean by saying that a principle is sound if he does not apply it?

Mr. FORKE: Protection has been the policy in force in this country for forty years and you cannot put it out of existence in one day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not?

Mr. FORKE: Let me proceed with my statement. I am going to refer to the speech of the hon. member for East Peterborough. He is not asking for protection in regard to competition in price; he wants protection against deterioration of the poultry of Canada. That is an entirely different thing from protection against competition in price from other manufacturers. I am not altogether endorsing all that he said; I want to point out simply the difference between the protection advocated by my hon. friends to the right and the protection that the hon. member for East Peterborough is speaking about. I know my hon. friends are sometimes very anxious to put words into our mouths and to place us in a false position. I can, however, assure hon. gentlemen that we are quite prepared to stand on our principles and to defend ourselves when necessary.

The leader of the opposition referred to my speech at Montreal. I had a letter from a very prominent manufacturer in the city of Montreal the day before yesterday, in which letter he stated that he had entirely lost confidence in the Conservative party in Canada and he hoped that some other friends from the other side of the House would join with some of the Progressive members and form a truly national party that would do something to save this country from the position in which it was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have heard that in Montreal too and I have passed my blessing on it. May it take place. I have never stood between my friends to the left and the gentlemen across the floor. Let them get together in the same camp and quit the camouflage, the sham. Let them walk on together and then we shall have a showdown in this Dominion and see what the people of this country want.

Mr. FORKE: The right hon. member used that very same expression "camouflage" last year. I do not know anything about camouflaging. I said not "members on the other side," but "some particular members on the other side" that are not very popular in their own quarters.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who are they?

Mr. FORKE: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a principle you must not talk about.

Mr. FORKE: I hope hon. members are getting a little pleasure out of this. I have got it and I hope we have all got it. There is in this House to-night a spirit of good feeling and fellowship that I have not seen for a long time, and we are indebted to the hon. member for East Peterborough for bringing about that state of affairs.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says that he is prepared to stand on his principles. A moment ago he said that his principle was free trade, but he is not going to practise it. Where is he standing?

Mr. CARROLL: What has this to do with sick cattle?

Mr. STEVENS: It is sick chickens, I think, we are talking about. How is my hon. friend going to protect the Canadian pure bred hen?

Mr. FORKE: I did not say that I would protect it.

Mr. STEVENS: He says that he is going to do this by the process the minister is following that is, by valuating them at forty cents apiece, although he knows quite well—

Mr. FORKE: I rise to a point of order. I deny that I used any such words as the hon. member is putting into my mouth.

Mr. STEVENS: I admit that my hon. friend is very chary about the word "protection". It is, however so difficult to distinguish between his meaning and his words that I find my vocabulary too limited altogether. How is he going to do it? He is going to do it by valuating these chicks at forty cents apiece, which is admitted by the minister—and the minister will not charge me with misstating the facts—is almost if not quite equal to an embargo.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. High class chickens are worth that.

Mr. STEVENS: It is intended to keep out the ordinary chicken, is it not?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, a poor one, but not a good one.

Mr. STEVENS: By putting on a valuation that certainly is not there. Supposing we were to apply that to our principle of protection, that we were to value all goods coming into this country at twice or three times their value to prevent them from coming in, what would our hon. friends say to us? We do not advocate any such extreme protection; but we say frankly that Canadian industry, whether it is the poultry industry, manufacturing industry, woollen industry, or agricultural industry in any of its branches, should be protected against unfair competition from the outside. For the leader of the party to my left to repudiate all idea of protection and talk about principles of free trade, but the impracticability of it, is all nonsense and moonshine. It is about time that we faced in this House the main principles of division in the trade policy of this country. One is a drift towards a freedom of imports, a freedom from import duty on the part of imports, and the other is a sufficient protection to Canadian industry against competition from the outside.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If there is to be any protective policy on baby chicks coming into this country, I want to protest, because frequently I have had occasion to ship in baby chicks and eggs for hatching purposes, and the man who is going to use these chicks should be considered as well. If we are going to protect the Canadian breeders, that is a different question.

There may be something to be said for the policy of protection that is at present being advocated by my hon. friends to the right. One thing that has amazed me for many years in connection with protection is that the real protectionist was always a free trader when the matter was one of farm production. I am glad to see that it is getting on a more logical basis. As a farmer I maintain that if it can be shown to be beneficial, it is perfectly logical for the exponent of the policy of protection to ask for protection on farm products too, although in my opinion the farmer cannot be protected. That is what was done in the United States. The farmers there fought protection for a long time, but they realized that protection was going to be the policy of the country and they demanded a share of the benefits. If protection is going to be the policy of this country, then any benefits that might accrue from that policy should be shared by the farmers as well as others. Therefore, I say that my hon. friends in the new policy that they are advocating to-day are putting it on a more logical basis than it has ever been before.

Since the question of cattle marketing has been interjected into the debate under this item, has the minister had any reason during the last year to consider this question of marketing chilled and frozen beef in the old country?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, we have not conducted any more experiments than we reported last year.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I suggested something to the minister last year. I am not sure that I have any concrete proposals, but I should like to impress upon him the necessity of looking into this question a little further. From what study I have given of the subject, I am thoroughly convinced that if we can press it far enough we can eventually establish a very profitable market for chilled and frozen beef in the British Isles. We are discussing cattle rates and we are prepared to enter into an agreement with a company and bonus them to a large extent to carry our cattle overseas. I contend, as I have always done, that that is not a proper trade to build up at all. We were told a few years ago that the British people did not want chilled beef, but the figures disprove that. I have here the report for trade and navigation of the United Kingdom for the calendar year ending December 31, 1924, showing that there was imported into the Old Country for home consumption fresh meat to the extent of 34,969 hundredweights, a very small quantity, whereas in chilled beef we find that the British Isles imported 8,307,276 hundredweights from Uruguay and the Argentine republic as well as from some smaller countries. And classified as frozen meat we find importations amounting to 4,226,000 tons. The total importations of beef including a small amount of salted meat are given as 13,630,000 hundredweights. So that after all the great volume of the beef consumption of the Old Country, at least of importations—because they have a fresh meat production at home—consists of chilled and frozen beef. A good many people claim that we cannot compete on an equal basis with the Argentine republic, and we have heard it frequently stated also that we are unable to compete with New Zealand in butter. I am not prepared to admit any of that; I contend that we can compete with any of these nations notwithstanding any question of distance or transportation difficulties or anything else. With the price of our land, the quality of the soil and the ability of our farmers to produce we can compete with the Argentine or any other country. But it needs energy and hard work to develop a market. Most of our beef shipped overseas is grain-fed, of a superior quality to the Argentine product. I think the deputy minister is on record as saying that a great deal of our chilled beef is thawed out and sold on the British market as British fresh beef. We get the price of chilled beef for it but it is sold at a large profit by the retailer.

I am not sure that I have any constructive suggestions to offer the minister, but this is something that the department should look into carefully. When we examine these figures and see the enormous quantities of this particular product consumed in the Old Country, and when we reflect that the consumption of this class of beef is increasing rapidly there, we should make some special effort to meet the situation. I am not very sure whether it will ever be practicable to ship live beef into the British market. There are a good many things that may help us; we are trying, for example, to secure a lower ocean rate, and another thing that might help us would be the securing of a reasonable grain rate from Winnipeg to Quebec over the Transcontinental. If we could ship mixed cargoes out of Quebec, including grain and cattle, we could handle the cattle through that port at from $4 to $5 per head cheaper than from Montreal. That is another question which I may discuss at some other time, and although I do not suggest that the minister should carry out any experiment at a loss such as he told us was incurred two years ago, I do think that he ought to examine into this question further and see whether something cannot be done to get us a share of this chilled and frozen beef trade.

Mr. SALES: I am sorry to disagree with my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell), but I do not think he thoroughly understands what he is talking about; when he says that our chilled beef goes over to the Old Country and is thawed out I am sure he does not. Our beef does not need to be thawed out for it is only chilled. When he talks about our competing with the Argentine republic I do not agree with him. The Argentine is a wonderful beef country and we can compete with them only from the standpoint of the shorter distance from Canada to the Old Country. It takes thirty days to bring meat from the Argentine to England and you cannot carry chilled meat that length of time. I contended in this House last year that our geographical position placed us in a favourable position to carry on a chilled meat trade, and I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make the experiment. Where we have fallen down in the past has been in our lack of a regular supply. When I was in the butcher business in the Old Country, if you came with beef from Canada my first question would have been whether I could get a supply of the same quality next week and the week after, and the week after that, so that I could tell my customer who enjoyed his Sunday dinner that I could supply him with the same sort of meat regularly. That is the important thing, and the minister knows that this is the condition with our butter. We have to have a regular supply. I agree that the live meat business is one in regard to which there is not much hope; a great deal of the proceeds is consumed in the rail and ocean rates. I am sure that if the minister would try the experiment I have suggested it would produce satisfactory results. But it must not be spasmodic; it must be carried on week by week for at least six months. The trouble in the past has been that beef going from here chilled was not supplied in a continuous volume; we shipped a quantity this week and shipped none for three weeks. An attempt of that kind certainly cannot succeed.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Perhaps I was wrong in referring to chilled beef having to be thawed out, but in other respects my hon. friend (Mr. Sales), after declaring that he did not agree with me, has endorsed practically every word I said. He pointed out that if we continued the trade long enough we could build it up permanently. Beef from the Argentine must be frozen, and although it may be classified as chilled beef it is in reality partly frozen when it reaches the United Kingdom. Our beef is in refrigeration for about seven days as against twenty-one days or more in the case of the Argentine product, and that puts the Canadian beef in a different class. I would, therefore, take what my hon. friend says as an endorsation of my remarks, and I believe the minister would be well in his rights in carrying out this experiment. This problem is one that concerns not only the west but eastern Canada as well, and if we build up a profitable trade in chilled and frozen beef we do not need to worry about ocean rates; that question will solve itself.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Having lost so much money on the first shipment we did not feel that we had more money to throw away on the experiment, particularly when we knew that one of the packing companies sent about one hundred consecutive shipments extending over a year and lost money on all with the exception of two on which they broke even and two on which they made a profit. I simply wanted to check up the abattoirs to see whether our figures would correspond with theirs, and they tallied exactly. In the light of their continuous losses for over a year in about a hundred shipments, and our pronounced loss in the one shipment we made, I have not much hope of success even if we observe the conditions suggested by the hon. member, (Mr. Sales). Before you can get the best results you must have a continuous supply of acceptable meat from week to week, so that when the customers get used to it they will buy it regularly. But even with that advantage the abattoir people, with the four exceptions I have indicated out of one hundred, have lost money. In the light of that I did not feel justified in taking more chances of losing money at the present time. I would have no objection to trying it out again if the committee, particularly those members closely interested in the live stock industry, consider it to be worth while. But is it wise to do so when we are almost certain to lose out? I am very glad we conducted the experiment, because it gave us first hand information and removed the suspicion entertained by some that the abattoir experiment was not quite bona fide. To-day I believe it was.

Mr. SALES: Has the minister studied the figures of the experiment carried on by the Harris Abattoir Company?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SALES: I did not know that we would reach this item of chilled meat to-night. I have the figures submitted to me by Mr. McLean, of the Harris Abattoir Company, and it is apparent that the shipments were a long way from being regular, in fact they were most emphatically what might be termed spasmodic. Any experiment so carried on is bound to fail. If the minister will look up the figures I think he will find my assertion is correct.

Mr. GOULD: Would the minister advise the committee whether it is not a fact that the people of the Argentine, our greatest competitors, own their ranches, their lines of steamships, and their retail shops all over Great Britain? I think that is perhaps the idea in the minds of hon. gentlemen here when they talk of the proposed experiment. I do not think the Harris Abattoir Company conducted their experiment in that way. I make the suggestion—I believe it has been made before—that if the minister established a couple of retail stores in the larger cities of Great Britain and guaranteed shipments regularly, a trade could be established in chilled meat. It seems to me it is a very opportune time, particularly when we have in prospect a line of steamships to carry over our stuff at reduced rates. I dissociate myself from the protectionist remarks voiced by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell). While he does not believe in protection for the farmer, yet he gives a mild endorsation to the principle.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) misunderstood me entirely; I did not advocate protection at all.

Mr. GOULD: I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that if the farmer were given protection in any particular, it would be used as an excuse by the protected interests to ask for increased protection, so that in the long run the percentage of protection to the farmer would be nil; consequently we would be losers in the end. I would bring the protected interests down to our footing rather than attempt to reach their level, because they have the whip hand.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understand that officials of the Harris Abattoir Company expressed the opinion that if they had been able to carry on the experiment long enough with a regular flow of products to the retailers the trade in the end would have been quite profitable. I have that second hand, but I think I am quite safe in stating it as authentic.

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Chairman, we have had a very interesting discussion all afternoon and evening on perhaps one of the most important items in the whole of the minister's estimates. We have in this group a number of members who take a very keen interest in live stock matters, but they have been compelled to leave for Toronto and other parts of Ontario and also for Quebec.

Under those conditions I would ask the minister to be good enought to allow this vote to stand, in order to afford those absent an opportunity to take part in the discussion on Monday, or whenever he brings up his estimates again.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, it is awfully hard to resist so reasonable a request asked in such a gentlemanly way, but the Prime Minister intimated that he would like to see this item go through to-night. I remember last session quite well that in the softness of my heart I acceded to a similar request, on the dairying vote, but that vote remained untouched until towards the end of the session, when it went through with a rush. I wonder if my hon. friend could press his request less courteously so I would have some excuse for refusing it?

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, I have a great deal of sympathy with what was said earlier in the discussion this afternoon about some of us being compelled to listen to explanations over and over again. We on this side of the House have spent a long time upon this item, and if it has got to be passed why should we not pass it now? If the request is acceded to we will have to come back on Monday and listen over and over again to the explanations made to-day.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. BROWN: Many of us come long distances and spend a great deal of time in the House, and yet often our time is sacrificed for the convenience of hon. members who can go to their homes over the week end. I do not think we should be asked to sacrifice any more of our time on their account.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me point out to the minister that we have passed several items this afternoon, and this one under discussion is a very large and a very important item. Let me also remind my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Brown) that I do not recall a day last session or this 11 p.m. when there has been more of what I am warranted in terming intelligent discussion of estimates than there has been to-day. This compliment I pay to my hon. friends to my left very gladly; they knew what they were talking about, and we had a very excellent discussion. As far as we in this section of the House are concerned, outside of a little by-play on the protection issue, very little has been said on this item, and several of our members sat here until half past ten before they left to catch their trains. On Friday nights we usually adjourn even earlier than this. This has been a profitable discussion with not a moment wasted, and we have not by any means touched all the branches included in this item of a million and a quarter, which branches ought to be given consideration. Therefore I think this is a reasonable request, Mr. Chairman, and I am quite certain the minister will accede to it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Weli, I imagine that after the rest over Sunday we will simply come at it fresh when we resume next week. The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) after the week end will be good for another whack at it.

Mr. BROWN: Having made my protest against listening to the same statement over and over again I will withdraw any specific objection I offered.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My difficulty is to refuse a request made in such a gentlemanly way.

Mr. STEVENS: Do not refuse it.

Mr. CARROLL: Could it not be arranged that on some other item anyone who is out of the House to-night might express his opinions on live stock? I noticed to-night that matters which had no bearing whatever upon live stock were discussed here.

Mr. SALES: Let us go on for another hour.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have other live stock items, such as the health of animals vote, under which any fag ends of this discussion that were strictly relevant to live stock could be taken up. Will that suit my hon. friend?

Mr. TOLMIE: I have no serious objections, provided hon. members on this side be given that opportunity, and that the arrangement be clearly understood.

Mr. SALES: Just before we close I would like a little information. I have spoken about duplication of effort on the part of the federal government and the provincial government. At the same summer fair last year I saw the federal government in charge of a live stock exhibition and the provincial government in charge of a live stock exhibition. I would like to know how many bulls were sold under this live stock distribution, what the cost of the bulls was and what the expenses were.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You mean loaned, not sold?

Mr. SALES: No; I am asking how many were sold and what expenses were incurred—that is, in the live stock promotion and in the distribution of animals.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We do not sell any of them except the old ones. Altogether something like 1,500 are loaned to the cattle clubs throughout the Dominion Last year alone 301 new ones were loaned. The cost was $42,571, an average of $141 for each animal.

Mr. SALES: The cost of distribution is what I am after.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That would be difficult to secure; to get the cost per animal would require a good deal of accounting.

Mr. SALES: What was the total cost?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not much, I understand. It consists largely of railway freight.

Mr. SALES: I find that in Saskatchewan alone we have Mr. Byers with a salary of $1,646, a bonus of $54 and an expense account of $2,770. Mr. Byers is a stock promoter. Then there is Mr. Douglas, Mr. Moorehead, Mr. Sully, a stenographer, and Mr. Whiting. The total cost is considerably over $10,000 for our province alone.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These men are not all engaged in the distribution.

Mr. SALES: All except Mr. Byers, who is a stock promoter, are mentioned in the Auditor General's report as engaged in the live stock distribution. It seems to be a very expensive matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, animals will not travel by themselves; you have got to have a chaperon with them of some kind, and it costs money.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Béland the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Monday, February 23, 1925

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Second interim report of the commisioner appoointed by the Governor in Council to investigate, under the Combines Investigation Act, 1923, an alleged combine in the distribution of fruits and vegetables.—Hon. Mr. Murdock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ASH WEDNESDAY

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Health) in the absence of the Prime Minister moved: When this House adjourns on Tuesday, February 24, instant, it stand adjourned until Thursday, February 26, instant.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (East Edmonton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Railway Act, 1919.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. KELLNER: What is known as the open rule mixture now prevails in some sections of the country but not in others. The bill is designed to make it applicable all over the country in the case of mixed cars.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSE TO SIT ON ASH WEDNESDAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the House return to the order of Motions.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A motion has just been passed that the House adjourn over Ash Wednesday. The government feels that it would be better to proceed with business on that day. I would therefore move that the motion for an adjournment over Ash Wednesday be rescinded.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask if the consent of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has been obtained to this motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may reply that it has.

Mr. GRAHAM: Solidarity of the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it the intention of the government that the civil service shall work on Wednesday also?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is.

Motion agreed to.

GOODS VIA UNITED STATES PORTS

Mr. CLARK:

1. Is Customs duty collected by the Canadian government upon goods originating in Canada, shipped via American atlantic ports to Canadian pacific ports?

2. If so, under what authority, statutory or otherwise, is the duty collected?

3. Is customs duty collected by the Canadian government upon goods originating in Canada and shipped through the United States on American roads to Canadian ports?

4. What is the distinction between the circumstances referred to in paragraphs 1 and 3 hereof?

5. How much duty has been collected at Canadian points on goods originating in Canada and shipped via American ports to Canadian ports?

6. Have any rebates of duty been granted to Canadian shippers since January 1, 1922?

7. If rebates referred to in the preceding paragraph hereof have been granted, what are the names, with addresses, of the persons, firms, or corporations, to whom such rebates have been granted, and the amount of the rebate in each individual case?

8. Under what authority are rebates granted?

9. Has the same practice been followed in regard to granting of rebates in each individual case?

10. What are the reasons for granting of rebates in the individual cases hereinbefore referred to?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

(1) Yes, except when the goods are forwarded from the port of shipment in Canada under customs supervision via the port of New York and transferred there, under the supervision of a Canadian customs officer and transported therefrom in British registered vessels, under regulations established by order in council.

(2) When goods are otherwise shipped, they are regarded as importations and subject to duty under Canadian customs tariff.

(3) No. When the goods are forwarded under Canadian customs manifests in sealed cars such seals remaining intact until the cars arrive at the frontier port of re-entry in Canada.

(4) In the circumstances in question (1), the goods are not shipped under Canadian customs supervision, whereas they are so shipped in the circumstances in question (3). Regulations have been established by order in council for the shipment of such goods by rail under customs manifests in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (q) of section 286 of the Customs Act, respecting the powers of Governor in Council as follows:—

(q) Prescribing the rule and conditions under which goods imported in bond or duty-paid, and products or manufactures of Canada, may be transported from one port or place in Canada to another port or place therein, over any territory or waters outside the limits of Canada: provided that the goods so transported shall, upon arrival in Canada from any place beyond the limits of Canada, be treated with regard to the liability to, or exemptions from, duty, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of Canada;

(5) No information available.

(6) Yes.

(7) Morrison Steel and Wire Company, Limited, Vancouver, B.C., duty and sales tax $3,510.52; Compressed Gas Company, Limited, Vancouver, duty $653,62.

(8) By order in council under authority of section 92 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

(9) Yes; refunds only authorized by authority of order in council.

(10) As a matter of relief, the parties being unaware at the time of shipment that the goods when so shipped were liable to duty.

CANADIAN RAILWAY DATA

Mr. NEILL:

1. What is the total mileage of railway operated by the (a) Canadian National Railway; (b) Canadian Pacific Railway?
2. In respect to each of the above railways what is the (a) total number of employees of the headquarters staff; (b) total salaries paid to such employees in 1924; (c) average salary of such employees?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1.

(a) As at December 31, 1924—21,835

(b) As at November 31, 1924—14,025

2. Canadian National.

(a) 2,684.

(b) $5,047,118.

(c) $1,880.

No information as to Canadian Pacific Montreal employees.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—WIRELESS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. What Canadian National Railway wireless broadcasting stations have been installed?
2. What has each cost?
3. What has it cost to equip Canadian National Railway passenger cars with wireless?
4. What purpose is the latter equipment proposed to serve other than the amusement of the staff, and some passengers?
5. What revenue has been earned, if any, from each of such wireless stations?
6. In what way is it expected that such wireless installations will produce revenue over expense?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Two; one at Ottawa and one at Moncton.

2. The Ottawa station, $18,253.20, and Moncton, $22,500.

3. Twenty cars have been equipped at a total cost of $10,843.39; average per car, $542.17.

4. Equipment is placed on trains, not for the purpose of entertaining the staff, but to afford information and entertainment for passengers, and thereby attract passenger business to Canadian National lines.

5 and 6. No direct revenue, but the management have ample proof, based upon reports from the Traffic department, that the advertising obtained by the aid of these stations has resulted in increased earnings for the railways. During the month of January, 1925, ten programmes were broadcasted from the Ottawa station. The management received 3,122 telegrams, cards and letters acknowledging the broadcasts, or an average of 312 per concert. The acknowledgments were received from all sections of Canada, practically the entire United States, and Cuba.

The average number of communications received from the station at Moncton is 350. Those are received from the Maritime provinces, Newfoundland, New England states, Quebec and Ontario. In one mail recently, there were received at Moncton fourteen letters from the British Isles acknowledging receipt of the Moncton broadcast, and it is fair to assume that the interest displayed by the recipients of Canadian National Railway broadcasts will result in increased business to the railway.

EGGS, POULTRY AND LIVE STOCK—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. DOUCET:
